Chamblin of Riverside, who became the lecturer for the movement, no one took a more active part in it), all at his own expense and without compensation. He was a director of the San Antonio Fruit Exchange, and as its first acting secretary placed the organization upon a business system approved by his associates. Devoting his attention to the improvement of his orange groves, he took no part in the management of the Claremont (Cal.) Fruit Growers' Association and the San Antonio Fruit Exchange aside from serving as a director, but in 1895 the condition of the co-operative movement became critical; in fact, its very existence was threatened; the business having fallen into the hands of incompetent (if not unfaithful) agents and employees. At that critical point he entered the breach and in November, 1895, accepted the position of secretary and general manager of the San Antonio Fruit Exchange; after two years' hard labor in this position the movement took on new life so that the quantity of fruit shipped by this organization under his management increased tenfold in the next four years, and no exchange has a more cohesive body of members. It is through his active and sympathetic efforts that the annual meetings of the local associations are so interesting and largely attended by its members.

The gross volume of the business in his direct charge approximates a million dollars annually, about forty per cent of which goes to the transportation lines for expenses, while the balance is paid to the members of the associations at Pomona, San Dimas, Claremont and North Pomona. Since 1896 he is the representative of this exchange to the Southern California Fruit Exchange, and the director on the board of that organization, attending the weekly meetings of that body each Wednesday and taking a most active part in its business. Here his business acumen comes into active play again, and many of the most valuable and practical features of the present complete and successful system of marketing citrus fruits by that organization were introduced by him, including the present perfect system of agent's telegraphic reports, the plan of co-operative insurance of their fruit in transit, as well as the co-operative insurance of packing-houses among the local associations. He is a staunch supporter and strong advocate of any practical measure that will advance the interest of the Citrus Growers of Southern California, with whom he has cast his lot. In politics he is now, and always has been, a staunch Republican, and while living in Illinois was his party's nominee for county sheriff in 1872, but the Republicans were beaten in the county that year on account of the Greeley movement, their entire ticket failing of election.

The activity of Mr. Dreher in the citrus industry was not expected by him, as he came to California anticipating a retired life after an active business career in Illinois. However, to a man of his temperament, the greatest happiness is found in avenues of industry and usefulness, and as long as life shall last it is probable that he will continue his intimate and helpful association with the leading industry of Southern California.

CAPT. GEORGE F. ELLIS, of Santa Barbara, is descended from one of the oldest families in this country. The founder of the Ellis family in America landed at Plymouth, Mass., in the year 1630 from England. He married a member of the Bourne family who came over in the Mayflower in the year 1620 and they settled at North Sandwich, about fifteen miles from Plymouth, where descendants of the family have lived ever since. The land on which the Ellis homestead is situated was bought from the Indians and George F. Ellis has the original deed, dated 1668, signed by the cross of the Indian Chief Quochatecy, remaining in the family ever since.

When the Revolutionary war broke out Ephraim Ellis joined the army and was killed and buried in New York state. During the war of 1812 his son, Ephraim Ellis, was captain of a vessel running between Cape Cod and New York and was captured by a British man-of-war. It happened that the British captain was one of his acquaintances and as soon as he discovered the identity of his prisoner he said he regretted that he had not known it sooner. However, he proved his friendship by having the American captain landed on shore and given his freedom with the pleasure of walking two hundred miles to reach his home.

N. B. Ellis, the father of George F. Ellis, was not inclined toward a sea-faring life as his ancestors had been and he built up a large nail manufacturing business in his native town of North Sandwich, doing a very extensive business until the financial crisis of 1837 swept over the country, when he lost his fortune. After this he went into the live-stock business, and when the most westerly terminus of any railroad in the country was at Syracuse, N. Y., he used to go to Ohio and Indiana, then considered the far west, buying live stock and driving it to Syracuse, shipping thence to Boston. He continued in this business until the railroads of the country extended far west of Chicago and he saw that city grow from a small town to be the greatest live-stock market of the world.

George F. Ellis was born at the old homestead in North Sandwich in 1848. He resembled his ancestors and possessed a love for adventure that found its outlet in a stirring life on the frontier and in the mines of the west. He first crossed the plains in 1868 before any railroad was completed across the continent and when vast herds of buffaloes and antelopes roamed the country that is now built up with cities and towns and divided into ranches and cattle ranges. He spent the years of 1868-69 mining in Arizona and had many adventures and much trouble with the Indians. He returned to the states in 1869 and engaged in commercial pursuits until 1879, when he first came to California on a pleasure trip and has made that state his home ever since. He was engaged in hydraulic mining in the northern part of the state and when the mines in Tombstone, Ariz., were discovered he went there and later drifted down into Sonora, Mexico, where he with some others had some valuable mines. They had much trouble with the Indians and were raided twice by Apaches under Natchez, one of Geronimo's chiefs. In 1882 he sold out and came to Santa Barbara, Cal., where he married Mary J. Rogers. They and their family, consisting of two sons and two daughters, now reside in this city. Here he turned his attention to a sea-faring life in which he had gained previous experience. He soon rose to the position of a captain and was successfully engaged in hunting sea otter. When the boom in Southern California real estate occurred he made quite a fortune in buying and selling real estate. He filled many important positions in Santa Barbara; at one time he was president of the Santa Barbara Transfer Company, agent for Wells-Fargo Express Company, and agent for the Pacific Coast Steamship Company.

In 1896 Captain Ellis went to Alaska for the North American Transportation and Trading Company. It happened that he was in the locality when the gold mines at Dawson were discovered and he hastened to that point, being one of the first on the ground. His early arrival and his knowledge of mines enabled him to make some very fortunate selections in properties. He was interested in claims No. 12 and 13 on El Dorado Creek, which proved to be very valuable; for a time he took out $10,000 every twenty-four hours from No. 12. He bought other claims and re-sold them, making immense profit. After three years he sold out, and in 1899 returned to Santa Barbara. His account of those early days at Dawson is particularly interesting and shows vividly the hardships of life in that camp. Expenses were very high. Labor was $15 a day; flour sold at $1 per pound; moose meat at $1 per pound; eggs at $2 each; butter at $5 per roll; beans, sugar, bacon, etc., were proportionately high. Captain Ellis was so successful and fortunate in his ventures that Joaquin Miller, in his letters from Alaska, refers to him as the Monte Cristo of the Klondike. Since his return to California he has been engaged in quartz mining in different parts of the state. His real estate possessions include some valuable property in Santa Barbara. He votes with the Republican party, and is identified with the Masonic fraternity as a Master Mason.

ROBERT COWPERTHWAIT SUDDEN.

The most praiseworthy and substantial of the many undertakings which have been crowded into the life of Mr. Sudden are inalienably associated with the growth and realized possibilities of Ventura. As one of the native born of California, and as the son of a man whose ambitions and capabilities have culminated in renown in shipping and transportation circles in San Francisco, he has maintained the traditions of ancestors who formulated their healthful aspirations and lived their useful lives upon the heaths and moors of Scotland. A native of San Francisco, he was born November 21, 1861, a son of Robert and Catharine Sudden, natives respectively of Scotland and Ireland.

Robert Sudden, than whom there is no man in the west more competent in his line, followed the fickle and uncertain fortunes of the sea while a small boy, and later engaged in the fishing industry in Nantucket, Mass. At the time of the discovery of gold he came to California and continued his former occupation, rapidly rising to the front as his opportunities were strengthened and his knowledge increased. He was one of the first men employed by the Pacific Coast Steamship Company and their predecessors, and as captain for the company his charge was first the steamboat Salinas, and the last boat, the Ventura. He also branched out into the wharf business, building wharfs along the coast, and incorporated the San Buenaventura Wharf Company, of which he has since been president. Possessed of a strong personality and keen financial understanding, he has not only added to a store of worldly goods, but has made his influence felt and his worth appreciated. In his honor has been named a station on the new coast line at Point Arguella, where he also owns a fine ranch. His possessions in the shape of vessels and other water craft ply the high seas, bound with their cargoes for near and distant ports. He is prominent in Masonic circles, and is one of the honored citizens of San Francisco.

The second in his father's family of three sons and one daughter, Robert C. Sudden received his education in the public schools of San Francisco and Heald's Business College. After graduation he entered the ship builders' store at San Francisco, and in 1878 came to Ventura for the first time, thereafter coming and going between his birthplace and the Southern California town until 1881, when he permanently settled in Ventura with the San Buenaventura Wharf Company. In 1892 he became manager of the wharf, which is fourteen hundred feet long, and where boats halt from all stations along the coast. His directorship in the company by no means represents the extent of his activities, as he is an enterprising citizen, whose ability has called him into many channels of usefulness. He is among other things a stockholder in the Ventura County Bank, owns and operates a small farm, and is one of the organizers, and the vice-president, of the Saticoy Water Company. He is a member of the Board of Trade, and socially stands high in the community, and is vice-president of the Caledonia Club. His ambition to aid in the improvement of the city was strongly evinced while serving for eight years on the city council, a position which in 1899 he refused longer to accept.

In San Francisco Mr. Sudden married Eleanor Drucker, a native of the Pacific coast city. They are the parents of five children: Robert E., Ruth, Anita, Donald and Dorothea. The family occupy one of the pleasant homes of Ventura, built by Mr. Sudden, on the corner of Meta and Fir streets.

CALVIN HARTWELL. No more public spirited Ohioan has transferred his allegiance to the Pacific coast, or more enthusiastically entered into the diversified interests here represented than Calvin Hartwell, a carpenter by trade when he came to California in 1874, and since identified with Pasadena. A native of Sandusky, Ohio, Mr. Hartwell was born December 17, 1848, and was educated in the public schools in the vicinity of Marshalltown, and at Grinnell College, under the presidency of Dr. Magoun. His father, Henry D. Hartwell, was born in Ontario, Canada, whither had removed the paternal grandfather, Ebenezer, from England, although he later settled in Ohio. Henry D. Hartwell became a pioneer farmer near Marshalltown in 1855. His first wife was Miss Rogers, of York state, where they were married. After their removal to Ohio she died, and later he was united with Elizabeth Rogers, a native of New York state, and daughter of Reuben Rogers, who removed from Saratoga county, N. Y., to Ohio, and died in Iowa. Of the seven children born to Henry D. Hartwell and his wife, but four are living, Calvin being next to the youngest. One of the sons, Henry, died during the Civil war as a soldier in the Twenty-third Iowa Regiment.

Having learned the carpenter's trade Calvin Hartwell set out for the west in 1874, and upon arriving in Pasadena plied his trade. He bought a small piece of land and engaged in horticulture, and during the boom branched out into extensive real estate dealings. He was one of the organizers of the Pasadena Cemetery Association, of which he was secretary and treasurer from the beginning until disposing of his interest therein in 1900; and he laid out Mount View Cemetery, covering twenty-two acres. He also laid out the Hartwell subdivision in East Los Angeles, and from time to time some of the most desirable property in Pasadena passed through his hands. He organized and is president of the Galena Gold Mining Company, who have a ten-stamp mill in Chaparal, Yavapai county, Ariz., and are capitalized for $125,000. He also has other mining interests in the same district, including the Dividend Gold Mining Company.

In Marshalltown, Iowa, Mr. Hartwell married Mary L. Giddings, a native of Ashtabula county, Ohio. Mr. Hartwell is a staunch Republican, and has held many offices within the gift of his fellow townsmen, including that of mayor of the town. While presiding as chief executive of the city he instituted many important changes and accomplished valuable improvements. He has been county commissioner, and is now a candidate for county recorder. During his two years' service in the council he was president the entire time, and while on the school board for three years he was largely instrumental in securing the erection of the Lincoln avenue and Columbia school buildings. As a Mason Mr. Hartwell has taken the thirty-second degree. He is a member of the Pasadena Lodge No. 272, of which he has been past master for one term, and in the chapter he has been high priest for one term. He is also connected with the Pasadena Commandery No. 31, and with Al Malakiah Temple, N. M. S. He is a member of the Board of Trade. It is doubtful if any enjoy to a greater degree than he the confidence and good will of the entire community, or have more forcibly impressed their own stability upon the development of Pasadena.

J. W. KLASGYE. The present site of Gardena was a field of waving barley when J. W. Klasgye came here in 1890, and established his present blacksmithing and implement business. Few residents had as yet settled in the neighborhood, and there was not even a general merchandise store to accommodate the scattered farmers. Mr. Klasgye was born in Normandy, Bedford county, Tenn., August 9, 1871, and is a son of John William Klasgye, who was born in Ohio, lived for some years in Bedford county, Tenn., and eventually died in Cleveland, Ohio. He was a machinist and railroad engineer. He married Julia Montgomery, a native of Tennessee, with whose mother, Elzira Montgomery, J. W. Klasgye lived until the time of her death.

After finishing his education in the public schools J. W. Klasgye learned the trade of blacksmithing under his uncle, Jesse Powell, and in 1889 turned his attention to clerking in the grocery of another uncle, T. J. Montgomery, in Tennessee. He removed to Gardena in 1890, and has built up a fine business, having greatly enlarged the original capacity of his store and shop. He carries a line of buggies and wagons, and is recognized as an upright and enterprising business man and skilled workman. He has considerable property in the town besides the two lots upon which he lives and conducts his business.

After coming to Gardena Mr. Klasgye married Lexie A. Nichols, who was born in Los Angeles. Of this union there is one daughter, Maud, who is five years old. Mr. Klasgye is fraternally associated with the Independent Order of Foresters and the Fraternal Brotherhood. In politics he is a Democrat, but has never taken an active interest in political undertakings. He is public spirited and broad minded, and readily comes to the front in all matters pertaining to the upbuilding of the town.

W. H. SUDDEN. The soundest and most advanced commercial interests of Lompoc are represented by W. H. Sudden, president of the bank of this place, and a resident of Santa Barbara county since 1886. The career of Mr. Sudden has been largely interwoven with that of his father, Capt. Robert Sudden, a skipper upon the seas for many years, a man of brawn and strength inherited from his Scottish ancestry and developed in his youth in his native land. He shared the gold fever which swept over the land in 1849, and during that year sailed from New York, to which he had in the mean time immigrated, and arrived at the end of his journey around the Horn to San Francisco in 1850. He subsequently proved his right to inherit the land as well as to sail the seas, for he has become a power in the business world of California, and has acquired large holdings in Ventura and Santa Barbara, and is owner of the wharf of Ventura. His home is in San Francisco. His life is a meritorious and enviable one and is worthy of emulation by those who believe in success earned by the exercise of natural ability and determination to succeed.

W. H. Sudden was born in San Francisco January 2, 1864, and received a college education in his native city. He came to Santa Barbara county in 1886, and for ten years engaged in ranching and a general merchandise business. He then became the second president of the bank which was organized in 1890, with a capital stock of $100,000, and with a paid-up capital of $25,000. The bank building is 50x100 feet in dimensions, built of brick, and with offices upstairs. In connection with his important banking responsibility Mr. Sudden continues to be interested in ranching and stock-raising, and is heavily interested with his father and other parties in the shipping business, their vessels plying principally between San Francisco and Australia. In politics he is a Republican, and has been on the town board for one term and on the board of school trustees for three terms. Fraternally he is a Mason and senior warden of the lodge, and is also associated with the Workmen and the Woodmen.

In Santa Barbara in 1886 occurred the marriage of Mr. Sudden and Antoinette Hernster, a native of San Francisco and a daughter of George Hernster, a very early settler in Santa Barbara, where he died. Of this union there is one child, Leta H., who is fourteen years old. Mr. Sudden is one of the successful, affable and popular citizens of Lompoc, and his untarnished integrity and devotion to the public welfare is a matter of pride with his friends and associates, and of enormous benefit to the town.

ORREN HENRY HAYES. While the early association of Mr. Hayes with Pasadena was due to his father's selection of the city as a home, and not to his own decision, the home of his boyhood continues to be his place of residence, and he believes it to be one of California's ideal spots. His father, William F., who was born near Hopkinsville, Ky., and followed the cabinet-maker's trade in Taylorville, Ill., brought the family to California in 1875, settling in Santa Barbara, where he took up the business of a brick manufacturer. From there in 1881 he came to Pasadena and opened the first exclusively grocery establishment in the city, his store being on Fair Oaks avenue, south of Colorado street. After a few years he relinquished his business interests, but he has since continued to make Pasadena his home. While living in Taylorville he married Elizabeth Richardson, who was born in Illinois and died in Pasadena. Three sons and one daughter were born of their union, all still living. The eldest of these, Orren Henry, was born in Taylorville, Ill., November 15, 1863, and was about twelve years of age when the family came to the Pacific coast. Hence his life has been principally associated with the growth and progress of the west, his education was mainly acquired in California schools, and the associations of youth and manhood are with this state.

For a few years after coming to Pasadena Mr. Hayes assisted his father in the grocery. Later he engaged in teaming and freighting between Los Angeles and Pasadena, and at the same time gradually drifted into the hay and feed business. In 1893 he abandoned freighting, in order to devote his time entirely to the feed business. For a time his headquarters were on Union and Raymond, later on Union near Raymond, but in October, 1900, he bought a lot on the corner of Union and Broadway, erected a suitable building, and removed his business to this point. His store is of brick, 32x76 feet in dimensions, and is utilized for the retail trade. On Fair Oaks avenue he has a warehouse for storage purposes, 75x75, with a capacity of one thousand tons of hay. In addition he owns a lot, 76x214 feet, on Union and Broadway, where he has his coal and wood sheds. The Hayes Feed and Fuel store is well known throughout Pasadena, where a trade has been built up that is permanent, important and increasing.

The marriage of Mr. Hayes was solemnized in Pasadena and united him with Miss Linda Wallis, who was born in Wisconsin and in 1875 came to California with her father, Henry A. Wallis, a pioneer of Pasadena. The three children born of this union are Benjamin, Nina and Frank. Ever since attaining his majority Mr. Hayes has voted the Republican ticket and given his influence towards the men and measures of that party. At the time of the organization of the Merchants' Protective Association he became a charter member and later served as a director. He is also connected with the Pasadena Board of Trade. Conspicuous among his fraternal connections is his membership in the order of Masonry. He was made a Mason in Pasadena Lodge No. 272, F. & A. M., in which he is senior deacon; became a member of the chapter and commandery in this city, and is furthermore connected with Al Malakiah Temple, N. M. S., of Los Angeles. In Lodge No. 324, of Pasadena, I. O. O. F., he is a past officer, and at this writing is district deputy of the encampment. The Maccabees, Independent Order of Foresters and Woodmen of the World have enrolled his name among their members, while, along lines more strictly social, he is identified with the Americus Club.

MRS. A. W. JONES. A resident of California since 1887 and of Gardena since 1893, Mrs. Jones was born in LaGrange, Lewis county, Mo., and is a daughter of Thomas and Louise (Clack) Merrill, natives respectively of Boston, Mass., and Nelson county, Ky. Her grandfather, Thomas Merrill, Sr., was a native of Connecticut and in early life a sea captain, but on retiring from that occupation engaged in farming in Ohio, where he died. The maternal grandfather, Spencer Clack, was born in Knoxville, Tenn., and educated for the law in Philadelphia, Pa. However, while still in school he was converted and decided to enter the ministry, a decision that so displeased his father that further financial assistance was denied him. In order to gain needed funds he began to teach school, in which manner he acquired the money with which to complete his education and start in life. He became president of Oxford College, as well as professor of Greek, Latin and Hebrew. Removing to Louisville, Ky., he became pastor of a Baptist church in that city and also edited the first Baptist periodical ever published in Kentucky. Among his intimate friends was Alexander Campbell, founder of the Christian Church. His utmost endeavors were used in attempting to dissuade this reformer from leaving the Baptist denomination and in his last hours he dictated a letter to Campbell, the last words of which were, "Brother, I hold fast to the truth." One of the most fruitful efforts of his life was the establishment of a school in Louisville where young men were educated for the ministry. On leaving Louisville about 1831 he went to Missouri as a missionary and organizer of churches, and some of his most effective work was in that then frontier state, where he lived the self-sacrificing, devoted and earnest life of a home missionary. At the same time he bought a large tract of land near Little Union, Mo., where he gave considerable attention to the improvement of the land and the building up of a comfortable homestead. Indicative of his fine mind is the fact that he had mastered eight languages at the time of his death. Indeed, he may be classed among the most scholarly men of his day and denomination. To a large extent his talent has descended to his descendants. His granddaughter, Ida M. Merrill, became a writer of local note, and married Jesse H. Butler, of Los Angeles, who was also a talented writer and the author of several books. As a girl she made constant and earnest efforts to save the Talbot boys, of Marysville, Mo., from being hung; however, her efforts were futile, but after their death it was discovered that they were not guilty.

Thomas Merrill, Jr., was educated for a lawyer, but to please an uncle, who was a jeweler, he took up that trade in Columbus, Ohio, later succeeding to his uncle's business. From there he moved to Columbus, Ill., and thence to Quincy, same state, where he was a pioneer. His next location was LaGrange, Mo., where he started two retail jewelry stores, one of which was conducted by his son. He died in LaGrange and was buried in Woodland cemetery at Quincy, Ill., one and one-half miles from LaGrange. His wife, who was a great-niece of Sterling Price, of war fame, was at one time matron of Mount Carroll Seminary in Mount Carroll, Ill., and during that time her daughter, the subject of this article, was a student in the school, entering at nine years and leaving when sixteen. Next she took a course in the Gem City Business College at Quincy. After living for a time in Knox county, Mo., she came to California, arriving in Los Angeles with only $6. Though friendless and well-nigh penniless, besides being far from strong, she was not easily daunted. Without trouble she secured work as a seamstress, thus making a living for herself and her mother. Soon she had saved a little money, and with this she bought a cow and began selling milk. Later another cow was bought and finally she started a dairy business in Los Angeles. This she sold to Victor Hall for a neat sum. In 1890 she removed to Buena Park, Orange county, taking there her herd of sixty-five cows and selling milk to the condensers at that place. In 1893 she came to Gardena, where at first she rented pasture, later buying a home and afterward purchasing an eight-acre tract, part of which was in strawberries. In addition, she owns property on Thirty-ninth street, Los Angeles, and two lots on Forty-third street and Central avenue. As a proof of her success, it may be stated that she now has a herd of one hundred and six head of cattle, and, besides, takes charge of fifty head belonging to other parties. In her herd she still has the first cow that she bought, and now seventeen years old. In raising horses she has also been successful, though making less a specialty of this than of the cattle. In her home, as the special object of her love and care, is her mother, now seventy-five years of age; the two have never been parted, and their devotion to each other is particularly deep and strong. In all work planned by the daughter the mother has been a constant helper, and her sympathy co-operation and wise counsel have been of the utmost aid.

HON. C. J. WILLETT. While New York was still a straggling village on the banks of the East and Hudson rivers the Willett family came from England and established itself in the new town. On the incorporation of the city one of the name was elected the first mayor. On Long Island, too, they were pioneers, and Willett's Point was named in their honor. One of their most noted representatives was Col. Marinus Willett, who won fame in the French and Indian wars and as a Revolutionary soldier, and afterward received from the votes of his admiring fellow-citizens the office of mayor of New York.

During the war of 1812 Col. James Willett, who was the son of a lieutenant in the Revolutionary struggle, held the rank of colonel and commanded his regiment on more than one fiercely-contested battlefield. The latter part of his life was passed upon a farm in Washington county, N. Y. His son, Rev. J. T., was born at Argyle, that county, and graduated from Union College, which conferred upon him the degrees of A. B. and A. M. Entering the ministry of the Presbyterian Church, he labored as a pastor in New York state, and then in Michigan, settling in 1865 at St. Louis, Gratiot county. His death occurred near Cincinnati, Ohio, when he was seventy or more years of age. His life was one of self-sacrificing devotion to the cause of Christ and the church, and the memory of his honorable career is a priceless heritage to posterity. His wife, Cornelia A., was born in Essex county, N. Y., and died near Cincinnati, Ohio. Her father, Hon. Reuben Whallon, was born in New Jersey of Irish descent and became a prominent citizen of Essex county, N. Y., where for many years he held office as county judge and later was honored by election as member of congress from the district.

In a family of four children, C. J. Willett and Mrs. Nora W. Spooner, both of Pasadena, are the only survivors. The former was born in Essex county, N. Y., June 5, 1849, and spent the first sixteen years of his life in his native locality. After graduating from the Grand Rapids (Mich.) high school in 1867, he entered the University of Michigan, from which he was graduated in 1871, with the degree of A. B. Three years later the degree of A. M. was conferred upon him. Upon leaving college he taught for a year at Chelsea, Washtenaw county, after which for three years he was connected with a bank in St. Louis, Mich. Meantime his leisure hours were devoted to the study of law, and in 1877 he was admitted to the bar at Ithaca, Mich., after which he opened an office at his home town of St. Louis. In that city he married Miss Hattie C. Crosman, who was born near Welland, Ontario. For years he was one of the town's leading men. The various offices to which he was elected testify to his activity as a citizen and his popularity as a man. For one term he served as county attorney, and he also acted as city attorney, city treasurer and mayor of St. Louis, filling these various positions with credit. The welfare of the local schools was promoted through his efficient service as a member of the board of education, which position he filled for ten years. In 1883 he was honored by election as regent of the University of Michigan, and this office he held for eight years.

Since coming to Pasadena in 1893 Mr. Willett has been as deeply interested in the city's welfare as in his former home in Michigan. While engaging in the practice of law, he has not only managed his private professional affairs, but has also held official positions. Under the new charter he is the first to occupy the office of city attorney, in which position he is proving himself to be the "right man in the right place." For six years he has been a member of the board of education and is now its president. He is a member of the Los Angeles County Bar Association, and has been admitted to practice in all of the courts, county, state and United States supreme court. In religion he is an Episcopalian. While in St. Louis he was made a Mason, served as master one term, and was raised to the Royal Arch degree. In Ithaca, Mich., he joined the commandery, K. T., and at Detroit the consistory, A. A. S. R., while he became a Shriner in Moslem Temple, N. M. S., at Detroit. At this writing he is connected with Corona Lodge in Pasadena; also the chapter here, in which he is past high priest; and the commandery, in which he is past eminent commander. On the organization of the Pasadena Consistory he became a charter member and is now a past officer and thirty-third degree Mason, besides which he is a member of Al Malakiah Temple, N. M. S., Los Angeles, and past potentate.

HON. CHARLES B. GREENWELL. The secretary of the Hueneme Wharf Company, and state senator from Santa Barbara and Ventura counties, was born in San Francisco, Cal., in 1866. Though comparatively a young man to have attained to the distinction so readily accorded him, his success is not surprising when it is known that his life is fashioned somewhat after the strong and substantial outlines indicated in the career of his father, Capt. W. E. Greenwell. Captain Greenwell (who is represented at length elsewhere in this work) was a distinguished member of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey, and was born in St. Mary's county, Md., in 1824. He was a graduate of the Georgetown (District of Columbia) College, and studied law in the office of the distinguished Washington jurist, Brent. He received his appointment to the coast survey from Dallas Bache, superintendent, and an intimate friend, and served in Mobile bay, on the coast of the Gulf of Mexico until 1854. The following year he was transferred to the coast of California to assume charge of the coast survey party under General Ord, and was thus employed until 1861. Although a southerner, he espoused the cause of the Union during the Civil war, and was stationed at Washington, D. C., during the secession congress. After the war he returned to California, and continued in the coast survey until a few years before his death at his home in Santa Barbara, August 27, 1886. A distinguished man and capable officer, his strong and forceful personality dominated and invested with truth and wisdom every condition with which he had to deal, and it is said by those who knew him best that the government never obtained the services of a more loyal, disinterested, or wholly worthy man.

Charles Bennett Greenwell was reared in Santa Barbara, and was graduated from the high school and college of that place. As a preparation for future independence he learned civil engineering and practical surveying, and was for a time city engineer of Santa Barbara, and also served as county surveyor. In 1884 he became identified with the Hueneme Wharf Company, which position he has since held, being also a stockholder in the company. From an early period in his life he has been interested in the politics of the Republican party, and his singular fitness for office was rewarded in 1898 by his election to the state legislature from Ventura county, by a plurality of six hundred and seventy-one votes over the fusion candidate. In 1900 he was elected to the state senate from Santa Barbara and Ventura counties. He is past president of the Hueneme branch of the Native Sons of the Golden West, and is fraternally associated with the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks.

The marriage of Mr. Greenwell and Leslie Lilly, of Ventura county, occurred in Santa Barbara.

H. J. FINGER, member of the state board of pharmacy, and for many years one of the most capable and active pharmacists in California, was born in San Francisco, Cal., March 19, 1853. His father, Theodore Finger, was born at Frankfort-on-the-Main, and was a graduate of that historic seat of learning, Heidelberg University. When a young man he came to America and settled near Belleville, Ill., where he engaged in farming. At Alton he enlisted in an Illinois regiment for the Mexican war, serving until its close. He then returned to Illinois and peacefully pursued his former occupation until the rumors of golden treasure swept back over the land from the Pacific, and then the certainty of a farmer's livelihood in Illinois was exchanged for the possible but hardly probable rapid acquisition of mineral wealth. He came to California via New Orleans, sailing around the Horn, and arriving in San Francisco in 1850. After engaging in mining in different parts of the state with spasmodic success for three years, he settled in Redwood City, San Mateo county, Cal., and there improved and conducted a magnificent farm, upon which he remained until his death in 1887. Tragic was his demise, for he was killed by the railroad in front of his residence. His wife, formerly Mina Koch, was born in Germany, and immigrated with her parents to Illinois. Her marriage occurred in St. Louis, Mo., and she is now living on the old homestead in San Mateo county. Three children were born of this union, H. J. being the oldest, and the only one living.

Mr. Finger was reared on his father's farm in San Mateo county, and graduated from the high school at Redwood City. When seventeen years of age he entered the University of California as a member of the first class of pharmacy, and there obtained his education in the drug business. In 1872 he came to Santa Barbara as pharmacist for Robert Breitzmann, and after three years established a drug store of his own in the Clock building. During the years intervening between 1875 and 1890 he catered to a large and increasing trade, and discontinued his chosen occupation only because of a stubborn siege of illness which promised no immediate surcease, and from which he has even yet not fully recovered. In 1891 he was appointed to the state board of pharmacy by Governor Markham and served for six years, his position being filled by a Democrat when Governor Budd occupied the gubernatorial chair. However, in 1901 he was re-appointed by Governor Gage, and is still serving in that capacity. He has varied interests in Santa Barbara, and as proof of his faith in the continued prosperity of his adopted town has invested in considerable real estate. He is a member of the American Pharmaceutical Association, to which he was elected in November of 1878. Politically he is a Republican, and is fraternally an Odd Fellow. For three years he was county coroner and public administrator.

Mrs. Finger was, before her marriage, Ella C. Huntley, and is a native of New Haven, Conn., where she was educated.

WILLIAM P. WEBER. The proprietor of the Santa Paula nursery came to Ventura county in 1887, enjoying the distinction of being a passenger, June 19, on the first train that ever came into Ventura county and Santa Paula. The business which he has successfully followed is one in which he early gained a wide and valuable experience. He was born in Tipton, Mo., where his father was for years the proprietor of the Tipton nursery, having established the same in 1855. In time the son succeeded his father in the management of the nursery, but after two years, believing the Pacific coast offered better opportunities, he disposed of the business and in 1886 came to Los Angeles. After having traveled for the Belleville nursery as a salesman for a year, he came to Santa Paula and in 1888 purchased a tract of raw land, which forms the nucleus of the present nursery. This was the first regularly established nursery in Santa Paula and practically the first in the entire county that carried all kinds of stock. From ten to twenty-five acres are in citrus, deciduous and ornamental trees, and from this nursery have come a large per cent of the orchards in the county. Since 1892 he has carried lima beans and has produced a large proportion of the seed beans used in the vicinity, besides shipping to Eastern seed houses. Having spent his entire active life in the nursery business, he is familiar with all of its detail and thoroughly understands all of the problems connected with it. Realizing the value of producing the finest grades of English walnuts, he makes this one of his specialties. An industry in which he is interested is the buying and drying of fruit. He acts as purchasing agent for the North Ontario Packing Company of Ontario, Cal., and in buying beans represents Mr. Levi, of Hueneme.

During 1901 Mr. Weber bought and handled nineteen cars of walnuts, besides many cars of other California products. It is his hope to establish a canning factory in Santa Paula, in which to can all kinds of fruits. Among the fine orchards of Ventura county, the one which he owns is entitled to special mention. Its products are varied and valuable. About two hundred boxes of the finest navel oranges are produced each year. His ranch of one hundred and five acres near Santa Paula is devoted largely to fruit-raising and from five to fifteen men are employed upon the land. The plans are completed for a fine stone residence, to be erected upon the ranch.

Fraternally Mr. Weber is connected with the Foresters. He is a member of the Santa Paula Board of Trade and a stockholder in the River Street Water Company's ditch. In the work of the Democratic party he is interested. In 1892 he acted as a delegate to the state convention of his party at Fresno. Successful in his personal affairs, he does not limit his attention to business matters, but takes an active part in all plans for the upbuilding of the community. In every branch of the fruit industry he is considered an authority, and much of his time is spent in the development of the business throughout the state.

W. M. WATERMAN. The mercantile interests of Oxnard are well represented by Mr. Waterman, who is one of the leading business men of the city. A native of Bavaria, Germany, where he was born in 1869, he early developed ambitious tendencies which resulted in his immigration to the United States in 1885. The following year he settled in Ventura county and has since become an integral part of its mercantile expansion. Like most of our country's successful men, he began with little means and has mastered every step of the way by hard work and application to business. As a clerk in the employ of his present partner, Mr. Lehmann, he conscientiously fulfilled his duties at Hueneme for about six years. He began in business at that time for himself, as a competitor of Mr. Lehmann, and continued in that way until about 1897, when a consolidation took place through the purchase by Mr. Lehmann of the interest of Mr. Waterman's partner.

In the spring of 1898 Mr. Waterman opened the first store in Oxnard, erecting for that purpose a building 84x100 feet in dimensions, which was well stocked with such necessities as are required by the people of a growing town. This establishment is now managed by the two partners, under whose supervision business has progressed satisfactorily. The firm own an entire block of ground in Oxnard, and if the present rate of increase in population continues, they will in the near future erect an even more commodious place of business. During the time that they have been supplying the manifold needs of the town, at least two thousand people have settled here, and all are hoping that the town will soon be incorporated, in order that its welfare may be best promoted.

It is not to be supposed that Mr. Waterman is devoted exclusively to mercantile pursuits, for he is one of those liberal and progressive men who are naturally to the front in all matters of public moment. His influence on the side of improvement is emphatic. Although a Republican and actively interested in town and county elections, he does not care for office himself. Fraternally he is connected with the Ancient Order of United Workmen at Hue-neme, the Maccabees and the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks. A leading Mason, he is a director in the Masonic Club at Oxnard and one of the prime movers in the erection of the Masonic Temple, a brick and stone building, which was completed in August, 1901, and has proved an important addition to the business portion of Oxnard.

CAPT. EMIL HARRIS. From his native land of Prussia, where he was born December 29, 1839, Captain Harris came to the United States with an aunt at thirteen years of age and for one year remained in New York City. Having relatives on the coast he decided to come to California, and so took passage on the North Star steamer to Panama, and on crossing the isthmus boarded the John L. Stevens for San Francisco, where he arrived in March of 1857. With the intention of learning the printer's trade he entered an office, but the work did not prove congenial and he soon left. His next employment was as a waiter in the New York restaurant on Gearney street. Going from San Francisco to Stockton he worked in his uncle's billiard hall, and when the uncle moved to San Francisco he formed a partnership with him in the cigar business. Two years later he took charge of a billiard hall of eight tables at Visalia, this being a business venture of his uncle, and when the latter sold out he returned to San Francisco.

The residence of Captain Harris in Los Angeles dates from April 9, 1869. A year later, when the first regular police force was organized, he became a patrolman, continuing as such for some years. Meantime he gained some valuable experience in detective work and proved the possession of signal abilities in that line. One of the most interesting recollections of his life is in connection with the capture of the noted bandit, Tiburico Vasquez, who, after a series of appalling robberies and murders, was finally captured May 14, 1874, at the house of "Greek" George, nine miles west of Los Angeles, not far from the Cahuenga Pass. The capture was made by a number of deputy sheriffs with Under-Sheriff Albert Johnson in charge, and was a skillful and scientific culmination of a carefully-laid plan of Sheriff W. R. Rowland to secure the bandit without loss of life to the attacking party. Captain Harris rode with the others to the house and, firing one shot at the retreating Spaniard, the latter threw up his hands in surrender. He was taken to Tres Pinos and later tried at San Jose for murder, found guilty, and was there hanged March 19, 1875. The bandit's rifle is in Captain Harris' possession, and his knife and saddlebags have been given to the Historical Society.

Another interesting case in which Captain Harris did detective work was in connection with the murder of T. Wallace More at Ventura in 1877 during the squatter's war. The working up of this case took an entire year, but was successfully consummated. In 1877 and 1878 Captain Harris was chief of police of Los Angeles, and during his term the Temple Bank was robbed. Within three weeks he had captured the robber and secured the money, $10,060. This case he worked up without any aid whatever, while attending to his regular duties as chief. It seems that the robber was a confidential bookkeeper of the assignee in bankruptcy, who broke the lock, thus giving the impression that the robbery had been committed by outside parties. However, the manner in which the lock was broken convinced Captain Harris that it had been removed from the safe, and he at once began to look around the bank for the guilty party. On being accused of the crime, the bookkeeper made confession and dug up the money, which he had buried in the outskirts of the city. In 1871, while Captain Harris was still a patrolman, the country was flooded with counterfeit ten and twenty dollar greenbacks. There were only six policemen in the city then, and each of them had to work ceaselessly in an effort to find the guilty parties. Finally, after the captain and Officer George E. Gard had been without sleep three days and nights, they captured one of the counterfeiters, with $1,500 in tens and twenties on his person, and a month later, after a chase through California and Arizona, secured another, thus breaking up the gang. In 1888 a change in politics caused him to resign from the force, and the following year he established a detective office, since which time he has engaged in private cases.

In the organization of the fire department in 1870 Captain Harris was actively interested. With ten others he organized the Turner Germania, which has grown to be a very important organization, with five hundred members. He is the only charter member of Golden Rule Lodge, I. O. O. F., who still remains in Los Angeles. Politically he is independent.

1. L. FETTERMAN. Since becoming a citizen of Long Beach in 1884, Mr. Fetterman has been identified with several of the important interests here represented, all of which have benefited by his business ability and general progressiveness. At first interested in the hotel and livery business, he worked up a large trade and established a reputation for unswerving integrity and enterprise, and upon disposing of this enterprise in 1898 engaged in contracting of heavy work, such as grading, excavating and house moving. This business has assumed large proportions, and is at present by far the most pretentious in this part of the county, many large street contracts having fallen to the lot of Mr. Fetterman.

A native of Pennsylvania, Mr. Fetterman was born in Venango county, April 7, 1849, and is the youngest in a family of eleven children born to Isaac and Nancy (Titus) Fetterman, and the only one of the four now living who is in California. Isaac Fetterman, also a native of Venango county, Pa., was of German descent, and an own cousin of that Captain Fetterman after whom the fort of that name is called, and who was killed in the terrible Fort Kearney massacre. Isaac Fetterman was a farmer in Pennsylvania, and was captain of the Pennsylvania militia, and about 1855 removed with his family to Mitchell, Osage county, Iowa. He was a pioneer of this part of the state, and carried on large farming and stock-raising enterprises up to the time of his death at the age of sixty-five years. His wife, who died in Iowa, was a sister of the founder of Titusville, Pa., which was the place of her birth. One of her sons, Daniel, served during the Civil war in a Minnesota regiment, and gave up his life for the cause he deemed just.

At the age of four years I. L. Fetterman removed with the family from Pennsylvania to Iowa, and he was but eight or nine years old when his father was taken from him by death. He was educated in the public schools, and at a comparatively early age started out to carve his own fortunes. Upon removing to Minnesota he lived on a farm at Orinoco, near Rochester, and afterwards lived for a couple of years at Jackson, Mich. He then repaired to the oil region near Titusville, Pa., and soon became one of the pioneer workers at Pit Hole, where he engaged in drilling and developing. He then embarked upon an extended lumber business throughout the south, and in the spring of 1868 located in Butler county, Kans., and began to raise cattle on homesteaded land. In 1873 he came to California and settled in Kern county on government land, and while in this county was in the employ of Carr & Hagen as foreman in charge of the construction of the old Goose Lake canal, probably the largest in the state, and one hundred and forty feet wide on the bottom where it leaves the river. Having completed this task he removed to Los Angeles county and bought a farm near Downey, where he engaged in farming and stock-raising with considerable success. In 1876 he began contract pork-packing with Speedy, Dodsworth & Co., and when he became a member of the concern three years later the name thereof was changed to Dodsworth & Co., Mr. Fetterman representing the company. He continued in charge of the packing department, probably the largest in Los Angeles, until 1884, in which year he came to Long Beach, as heretofore stated.

The marriage of Mr. Fetterman and Minnie Carey was solemnized in Butler county, Kans., Mrs. Fetterman being a native of Indiana, and daughter of J. A. Carey, one of the old time pioneer Indian traders of Kansas. To Mr. and Mrs. Fetterman have been born seven children: George W., Charles E., Leonard, Samuel, Clarence, Maude A. and Minnie. Mr. Fetterman is a Democrat in political affiliation, and has been extremely active in local political affairs. He has served for two terms as a member of the city council, and he was one of the organizers and a member of the first board in the town. Fraternally he is connected with the Long Beach Lodge of Masons No. 327, and he is a member of, and liberal contributor towards, the Methodist Episcopal Church. Mr. Fetterman is one of the substantial business men of the town, and has the respect and good-will of the entire community.

ELBERT B. TURNER. Since coming from Oregon to California in 1884 Mr. Turner has made Ventura county his home and has acquired the ownership of one of the finest ranches on Sespe avenue. Through the close study he has made of horticulture, he has gained a thorough knowledge of the science and is now considered one of the local authorities on the subject. He has found the raising of citrus fruits to be remunerative and hence devotes considerable time to the industry, besides which he is also successfully engaged in raising apricots. Such of his land as is not available for fruit-growing is under alfalfa.

A native of Carroll county, Mo., E. B. Turner was born in 1859, a son of Samuel and Martha (Bailey) Turner, natives respectively of Tennessee and Kentucky. The maternal grandparents, Alexander and Sallie Bailey, were Kentuckians, descendants of old American families. Born in 1819, Samuel Turner was six months old when his parents removed to Missouri, and much of his life was passed in Carroll county, where he became a prosperous farmer. During the days of '49 he came to the far west and for three years mined in Eldorado county, but, deciding there was no place like the old home, he returned to Carroll county and resumed farm pursuits. His death occurred there in 1898, when he was seventy-nine years of age. His wife also died in Carroll county. They were conscientious members of the Baptist Church and he officiated as a deacon. Politically he voted with the Democrats and on that ticket, during the Civil war, was elected county sheriff.

In a family of eleven children E. B. Turner is the only one on the Pacific coast. In the common schools of his native county he received his education and this has been supplemented by practical experience in later life. When a young man he went to Kingman county, Kans., and four years later, going still further west, settled in Yamhill county, Ore., where he engaged in farming for two years. In 1884 he arrived in Ventura county, his present place of abode. When the railroad was built, he bought sixteen acres of raw land on Sespe avenue. This he first put under cultivation to prunes, but after a few years took out all of these trees and replaced them with navel oranges, which he finds more profitable. There are now ten acres in orange trees that are six years old. In 1894 he erected the finest residence on the avenue, and in 1890 built the Cottage Hotel in Fillmore, which he subsequently sold. His system of irrigation is said to be among the best in the vicinity, and enables him to secure the largest possible results from his ranch.

While in Kansas Mr. Turner married Miss Lucinda Hammond, a native of Henry county, Ill., and daughter of William T. and Sarah Hammond. They have one son, Elvin Edgar Turner, who is now seven years of age. In politics Mr. Turner holds to the principles of the Democratic party. In his financial undertakings he has been successful and deserves the credit for his present high standing among horticulturists. Being a progressive, public-spirited man, he has not only improved his own home, but has done all in his power to improve the town as well, and any plan for its upbuilding finds in him a hearty supporter.

F. A. SNYDER. For a considerable period Mr. Snyder has acted as manager of ranch property in Ventura county. He was born in Pennsylvania in 1854 and his education was received in that state. At sixteen years of age, starting out to make his own way in the world, he went to Kentucky, and a year later settled in Illinois, where he remained four years. During his residence in these states he learned to be a telegraph operator and worked at civil engineering, which occupations he followed for many of the following years. In 1875 he came to California and settled in Ventura county, where for a time he was interested in sheep-raising with Messrs. Bates, Brown, Gerberding and Taylor. Later for three years he was a resident of Los Angeles. He acted as foreman for the Kester and Patton ranches in the San Fernando valley, and in 1879 became foreman for J. H. Kester at Vina, Tehama county (now the Stanford vineyards). The following year he went to Simi, where he farmed for three years. During a subsequent residence in Montana he was with his mother and brother for two years. In 1888 and 1889 he was in the employ of a horse and cattle company at Santa Paula.

During 1890 Mr. Snyder was appointed manager of the Los Posas Land and Water Company, and had charge of putting in their water system, covering seventeen thousand acres and irrigating ninety-three ranches. The land is owned by Senator Thomas R. Bard and several colleagues, among the foremost of these being Captain Green and J. R. Erringer of the Pennsylvania Central Railroad. With the exception of a few orchards belonging to Senator Bard, all of the property is rented to tenants, who raise principally barley, wheat, beans and beets. As superintendent, Mr. Snyder oversees all of the work connected with Los Posas ranch, and makes his home thereon, having a comfortable residence presided over by his wife, who was formerly Miss Mary J. Gray of the Ojai valley. In politics Mr. Snyder is a Republican. Fraternally he is associated with the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, Santa Barbara Lodge No. 615, and with the Ancient Order of United Workmen at Hueneme.

HON. W. L. TALBOTT. At present a member of the city council of Lompoc and formerly a member of the state legislature, Mr. Talbott is intimately connected with many of the public activities of Santa Barbara county. He was born in Rochester, Cedar county, Iowa, in 1848. His father, M. J. Talbott, was a farmer during the early part of his life, and was a native of New York state. In 1852 he came to California with ox-teams, and after a journey of five months arrived in Placerville, where he engaged in mining with considerable success until 1864. His subsequent residence in the west has been prolific of success, and now well-to-do, he lives retired from business cares, making his home at Sutter Creek. Despite his eighty-one busy years, he is still hale and active. He married Anna C. Thompson, a native of Germantown, Ohio, who is also enjoying good health, although, in common with her husband, advanced in years.

The early years of W. L. Talbott were influenced by the family migrations in search of a permanent abiding place, but in 1855 they settled at Michigan Bar, Cal., where he acquired a common-school education. At the age of sixteen, facing the problem of self-support, he started out to independent farming and continued the same until 1875, when he transferred his activities to the same line in the Lompoc region. In 1890 he turned his attention to the livery business, and now has, on Ocean avenue, the finest and best equipped barn in Lompoc, with a corresponding large patronage from the townspeople.

In 1877 Mr. Talbott married Amelia Irwin, a native of Canada. They have six children, who are receiving at the hands of their parents the best possible educational advantages and who are destined, by reason of good mental endowment and energy, to make their mark in their respective avenues of accomplishment. They are as follows: Edward, who is a graduate of the University of California, and now a student in the Hastings Law School; Homer, who is studying dental surgery in the State University; William, a student in the same institution, where he is taking the course in mining engineering; Lloyd, a student in the Lompoc high school; Chester and Irene, also students in the local schools.

A Republican in politics, Mr. Talbott has been prominent in local and county affairs, and was elected to the legislature in 1892, serving one term. In April of 1900 he was elected to the city council, of which he is now an active member. Fraternally he is associated with the Knights of Pythias, being a charter member and past chancellor of Lompoc Lodge No. 57; he is also a charter member of Lompoc Lodge, Foresters of America. Personally he is highly esteemed in the community of which he is an enterprising citizen, and his efforts to further the cause of progress have not been unavailing.

R. W. DAVIS. Various enterprises necessary to the well-being of Gardena number Judge Davis among their promoters, chief among these being the creamery, which he conducts on the co-operative plan. At the time of its purchase by him, the plant was producing two thousand pounds of milk per day, but under his energetic oversight and judicious management the capacity has been increased until the output is now six thousand pounds a day. Had he been easily discouraged, perhaps he would have abandoned the enterprise in a few months, for during the first year he barely made expenses, and even the end of the second year found him very little ahead, but he has now placed the business on a paying basis, and is enjoying a merited success. He owns and operates the Watson creamery near Long Beach, which has a capacity of four thousand pounds of milk per day. In addition to the creamery business he has for four years served as justice of the peace and also acts as agent for the Liverpool & London Globe Insurance Company.

In Hempstead county, Ark., Judge Davis was born December 17, 1854, a son of Levi B. and Lydia (Teague) Davis, natives respectively of North Carolina and Tennessee. The paternal grandfather, R. Washington Davis, was a native of North Carolina, and did not remove from that section of the country until he was ninety-eight years of age; he then joined his descendants in Arkansas, where he died in 1875, at the age of ninety-nine and one-half years. Reared in Tennessee, Levi B. Davis removed from there to Arkansas in 1853 and homesteaded a quarter section of land, after which he followed farm pursuits. His remaining years were quietly passed, with no other interruption except his period of service in the Confederate army. He died at Mineral Springs, Ark., in the spring of 1890, having survived his wife, Lydia, twenty-four years. They were the parents of five sons and two daughters, of whom four sons attained maturity. R. W., who was next to the youngest of the family, received his education in public schools and Mineral Springs College, after which he engaged in merchandising at Hope, Ark. In 1886 he removed to Texarkana, Ark., and in 1889 came to California, where he has since made his home. His first purchase comprised twenty acres at Downey, from which point in 1897 he came to Gardena, his present home. Since then his attention has been given largely to the creamery business. About 1899, when the ranchers around Gardena had trouble marketing their butter, he agitated the organization of a society to secure relief, and it was largely due to his energy that the Los Angeles and Orange County Creamery Board was established. This board meets every week and controls the butter market of Los Angeles, handling from fifty to sixty thousand pounds every week.

In Mineral Springs, Ark., Mr. Davis married Miss Bettie Brown, who was born in Murfreesboro, that state, being the daughter of Benjamin Brown, a Tennessean, who was killed in the Civil war. The three children born of their union are Hugh F., Ethel and Mabel. Chiefly to have the benefit of their insurance protection, Mr. Davis has allied himself with the Woodmen of the World and the Independent Order of Foresters. He is also connected with the Knights of Pythias. In politics he has always voted with the Democrats, and during his residence in Hope, Ark., was on that ticket elected city recorder, which office he filled for one term.

A. SWENSEN. No city offers greater opportunities for the contractor and builder than does Los Angeles, whose picturesque environment and beautiful lawns lend the touch of art and culture so essential to the highest success in building. Mr. Swensen was born in Jotland, Denmark, September 11, 1859, and received a good education in the public schools, also an excellent training at home. His parents, Michael and Elizabeth Swensen, were also natives of Denmark. The former was a soldier during the revolution of 1848 and followed the building business as a means of livelihood. In the family there were seven children, all but one of whom are living. Four reside in America, the subject of this article being the youngest of these. In his youth he gained a fair knowledge of building from his father. He was also apprenticed to learn the trade in the School of Technique at Aarhus. On the completion of his apprenticeship he traveled as a journeyman in different parts of Europe, visiting Switzerland, Austria, France, Holland and Belgium. In 1879 he settled in Birmingham, England, where he followed carpentering for nine months.

Crossing the ocean in 1880, Mr. Swensen proceeded by boat to the Isthmus of Panama, and from there went to San Francisco. In 1886 he came from that city to Los Angeles, where he followed his trade. For a time he carried on business as an architect, but this he later relinquished, and has since engaged exclusively in contracting and building. Among his contracts were those for two of the finest business blocks in Los Angeles, namely: the Homer Laughlin and the Douglas blocks. Among other contracts were those for the Blanchard building, Los Angeles metal works, the Casa de Roses, the Harkes residence, and the Third street tunnel, the largest in the city.

The marriage of Mr. Swensen and Mary McGarry, a native of Philadelphia, occurred in Los Angeles. They have four children, Mary, Freda, Elizabeth and Dorothea. Mr. Swensen is a member of the Chamber of Commerce, the Builders' Exchange and the Master Builders' Association. Fraternally he is associated with the Maccabees.

WILLIAM McC. RAMSEY. Lying along the foothills and overlooking the valley of the Santa Clara, where it presents one of its most attractive views, stretches a vast tract of highly improved land, which is known as Olivelihoods, and of this beautiful place Mr. Ramsey is the proprietor. A drive through this wonderland should occupy a prominent place on the program of every tourist who visits this county. One of the attractions is the largest orchard of English walnuts in the world, also an orchard consisting of about thirty-five thousand olive trees.

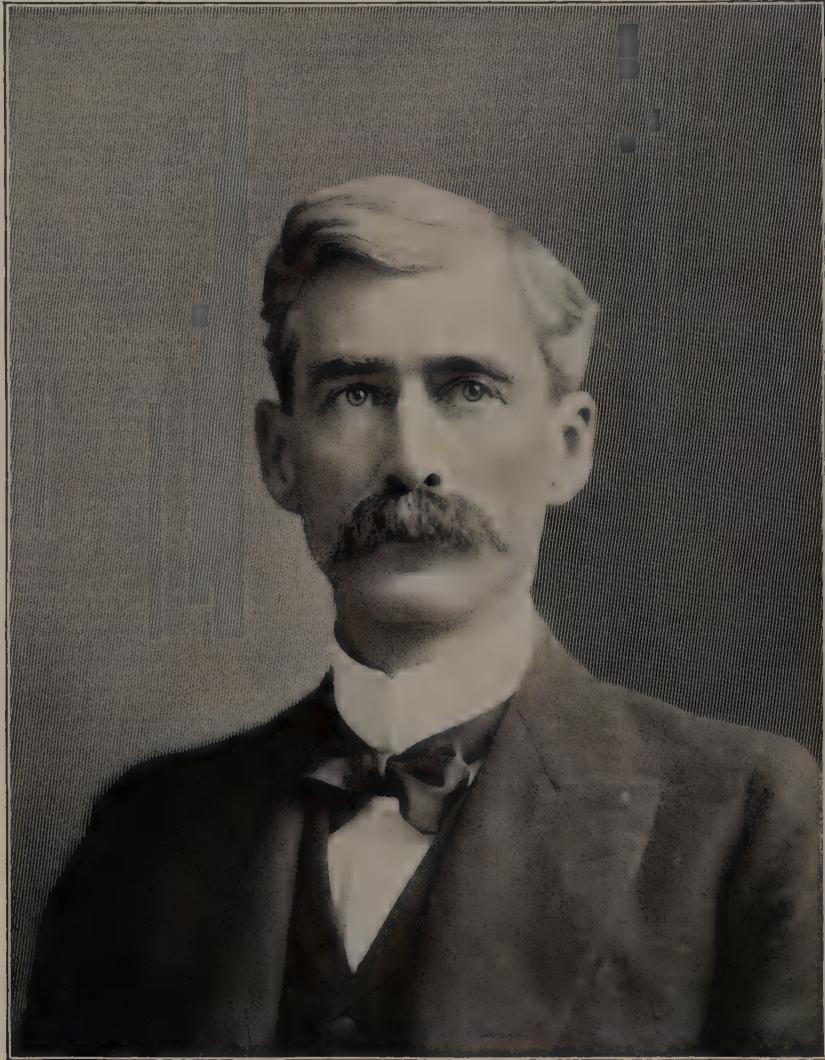

Upon an eminence overlooking the orchard stands the residence, which is occupied by the owner, and beyond this a vista of rare beauty is opened up in the miles of fertile farm lands and orchards. Near the residence are buildings which are occupied by the superintendent and employes, a walnut washing house, warehouse, large barns, and all the machinery and implements used in the operation of a great ranch. As you look out over the wooded hills you see immense herds of Jersey cattle, and the hills and vales abound in game, for the game law is strictly enforced and no poaching allowed.

In conjunction with Olivelihoods, and under the same ownership, is operated a water supply of fifteen hundred miners' inches, furnishing about twenty millions of gallons per day, which is used for irrigation purposes on the ranch, and the remainder sold to other irrigators in the valley. Situated as it is in the foothills, the crops are never injured by frost. The estate, which is owned by Mrs. W. McC. Ramsey and three minor children, consists of about twenty-six hundred acres, all the land being exceptionally rich and producing heavy crops without fertilization. Between four and five hundred acres are in bearing walnut trees, most of which are eleven years old. About four hundred acres are planted to olives, of which a fine crop is yielded each year. Perhaps one hundred and fifty acres is bare land on which general farm crops are raised. The walnut crop, however, is the bulk of the income, and a ready market is found for them.

WILLIAM H. TRASTER. One of the most efficient engineers in Los Angeles is William H. Traster, who is a man of broad experience in his line of work. He was born in Winchester, Van Buren county, Iowa, February 22, 1867, and is a son of Isaac and Mary (Chamberlain) Traster, the former of whom was of German descent and born in the east, while the latter was born, of Scotch descent, in Salem, Mass. In the parental family there were five children, three of whom are living, William H. being the eldest. His youth had its load of responsibilities, for at the age of thirteen he began to be financially independent, and thereafter his life was devoted to the accomplishment of his ambition to be an expert engineer. During the summer months he worked in the Ruffer machine shops at Ottumwa, Iowa, while in the winter he attended school at Mount Pleasant, that state. At the end of eighteen months he became identified with the Globe iron works at Keokuk, Iowa. In two years he had completed his trade and was ready for the future with its emergencies.

After a short time in Van Buren county, Iowa, in 1886 Mr. Traster came to California and at Fresno was chief engineer of a planing mill. In the spring of 1887 he located in Los Angeles, but soon after went to Fallbrook, and assumed the management of his aunt's large stock ranch, a responsibility discharged for three years. In 1890 he settled near Daggett, San Bernardino county, and became chief engineer for the Pacific Coast Borax Company's power plant, remaining there for a little more than three years. This position he resigned to accept a place as telegraph lineman for the Santa Fe Railroad Company at Ash Fork, Ariz., and superintended the putting in of the telegraph line between Ash Fork and Prescott. This task completed, he undertook the charge of the pumping plant at Prescott and Del Rio. After two months he became assistant engineer of the Los Angeles Cable Company's plant at the corner of Seventh street and Grand avenue, and was thus employed for three and one-half years. On the consolidation of the different lines he went with the Los Angeles Railway Company at Sixth street and Central avenue, and helped to put in the Ellis engine. His next position was that of chief engineer of the Wilcox block, but two months later he resigned to become chief engineer of the Van Nuys Broadway plant, of which he had charge for four years and eight months. June 5, 1901, he became chief engineer of the Angelus hotel, where he was master of a fine engine. This position he resigned, April 1, 1902, in order to engage in the engine room supply business at No. 610 North Main street.

Along the line of his occupation Mr. Traster is identified with the North American Stationary Engineers, is ex-vice-president of the local division, and represented the same at the grand lodge in Pittsburg, Pa., in 1897, and in Rochester, N. Y., in 1901. Fraternally he is a member of the Maccabees, in religion is a Baptist, and politically is allied with the Republican party. In April of 1902 he married Miss Catherine Coleman, daughter of J. C. Coleman, an old settler of Los Angeles. In his chosen line of work Mr. Traster is an expert, and has a reputation as deserved as it is high.

HON. MATTHEW T. ALLEN, one of the superior judges of Los Angeles county, has been identified with professional life in Southern California since 1887. Of Scotch-Irish paternal descent, he was born in Greenville, Darke county, Ohio, September 17, 1848, and was educated at the common schools of his city and county, supplemented by a partial course at Otterbein University. With characteristic promptness he determined upon the law as a fitting field for his ambitions and abilities, and after qualifying at Winchester, Ind., was admitted to the bar on the twenty-first anniversary of his birth. A potent factor in the formation of his life plans was the example set by his older brother, Judge William Allen, one of the pioneer lawyers of Ohio. This brother represented his district in congress from 1858 to 1863, and died in 1881. The father, Rev. John Allen, a clergyman in the United Brethren Church, was born in County Down, Ireland, and immigrated to America with his father, William, and the rest of the family in 1818, settling in Butler county, Ohio, where they lived upon a farm. He died in Ohio in 1858. The paternal great-grandfather, John, was born in Scotland in 1724. The mother of Judge Allen, formerly Elizabeth Ash, was born in Butler county, Ohio, and died in Ohio in 1862.

After being admitted to the bar, Mr. Allen was for a short time assistant prosecuting attorney at Winchester, Ind., and in 1872 began the practice of law in his native town of Greenville, Ohio. Owing to overwork and close application his health became undermined, and he removed to California in 1886, and has since rapidly forged his way to the front as a lawyer, jurist and substantial man of affairs. He was appointed United States attorney for the southern district of California, by President Harrison, but resigned during President Cleveland's term of office, and continued the practice of law with his former assistant United States attorney, and afterwards United States attorney, Frank P. Flint. In January of 1897, he retired from legal practice, having been elected judge of the superior court in 1896. He has handed down several important decisions which have been approved by the supreme court, one of the decisions being that marriages at sea, between citizens of the state, without license, and where the ceremony is performed by one not authorized by the laws of the state, are void. Another decision was that an indigent husband, driven from home by the cruelty of his wife, is entitled to support from the separate estate of his wife. Judge Allen is a Republican in politics, and is a member of the California Bar Association and the Chamber of Commerce. While living in Ohio in 1873, he became a Mason, is past master, and a member of the Chapter and Commandery in Los Angeles. Since 1890 he has been associated with Al Malakiah Temple, N. M. S.

In 1879 Judge Allen married Mary Whiteside, of Camden, Ohio, and of this union there are two daughters, Echo and Lois Allen.

FRANK P. McDIVITT. During the past decade the ranching possibilities of Ventura county have been enlarged and promoted through the efforts of its progressive and practical citizens. Especially has there been development along the line of one industry, viz.: that of raising lima beans, and Mr. McDivitt is one of the men who is proving the success of this industry. An accurate estimate of his crops shows that the yield is twenty-two hundred pounds to the acre. However, his attention is not limited to this one occupation, for he also devotes considerable time and thought to fruit-growing, and there is no apricot orchard near Santa Paula that is finer than his.

The father of this well-known rancher is one of the leading public men of California and his name is particularly well known in journalistic circles. Hon. C. J. McDivitt was a native of Pennsylvania and in 1860 identified himself with the original Greeley colony in Colorado, where he assisted in the building of ditch No. 2 at Greeley, and served efficiently as a member of the Colorado state legislature and as chief clerk of the house of representatives. The year 1872 found him in Kansas, where he was variously interested in farming, merchandising and publishing. For several years he was editor and proprietor of the Abilene Chronicle, a weekly paper. From Kansas he came to California in 1888. Settling at Santa Paula, he purchased the Golden State from Stephen Bowers, and this he enlarged and merged into the Chronicle. During the three years of his connection with the paper he acquired considerable prominence throughout Ventura county. In 1892 he was appointed custom inspector of the port of Santa Barbara. On resigning that position he removed to Kern county and has since been editor and proprietor of the Randsburg Miner, the only paper published in the Mohave desert.

The war record of C. J. McDivitt is worthy of special mention. During 1862 he enlisted in the One Hundred and Twenty-fifth Pennsylvania Infantry, and was assigned to the army of the Potomac, in which he served for two years. Among the famous engagements in which he participated were those at Chancellorsville and Second Bull Run. Throughout the entire period of his service he fought with his regiment in all of its encounters with the enemy, and won a record for bravery of which he and his might well be proud. On the organization of the Grand Army of the Republic, he at once became interested in this movement, and later, for one term, was honored with the office of department commander of Kansas.

In Huntingdon county, Pa., Frank P. McDivitt was born in 1865. His childhood days were passed in Kansas and his education was obtained in the public schools of Abilene. Much of the time when a boy he traveled through Kansas and Colorado in a wagon, thus gaining a thorough knowledge of the then frontier. In 1888 he came to California and soon was followed by his parents. Entering the occupation which his father had adopted, he was associated with him in the publication of the Santa Paula Chronicle, for a time acted as editor and proprietor of the Santa Paula News, and is now interested in the Randsburg Miner. Another occupation in which he was interested was that of mining, and he prospected and developed several good claims in Kern county. In 1894 he removed to the old Haines ranch near Santa Paula and has since made this place his home. His wife is a daughter of Abner Haines, former owner of this property, and a leading pioneer. Mr. Haines settled near Santa Paula in 1867 and remained here until his death, which occurred in 1893. In political views Mr. McDivitt is a staunch Republican, devoted to the interests of his party. He is progressive and aids in good works for the upbuilding of the community.

J. B. CORSON. One of the participants in the most famous tea party ever given in America was Moses Corson, whose subsequent service during the Revolutionary war proved him to be loyal to the struggling colonies. When independence had been established he moved to Maine and settled near Acton, where he took up a tract of government land and reared his eight sons and four daughters. Among the sons was Capt. Seward Corson, who was born in Massachusetts in 1793 and died in Maine in 1842. The title by which he was known came to him through his services in an Indian war. His wife, Huldah (Barrett) Corson, was born at Dublin, N. H., in 1794, and died in Wisconsin in July, 1870. She was a niece of Nathaniel Barrett, who commanded the patriots at Charlestown Bridge. Her father, Joseph Barrett, a native of Charlestown, Mass., became one of the very earliest settlers of Canaan, Me., out of which were made the following towns: Skowhegan, Bloomfield, Fairfield and Pittsfield.

In the family of Capt. Seward Corson was J. B. Corson, born at Canaan, Me., August 31, 1834. Nothing of special moment marked the years of his youth, nor were his travels more extended than mere neighborhood journeys, until 1857, when he settled in Sheboygan county, Wis. Two years later he returned to New England and in 1860 began to clerk in a wholesale house of Bangor, Me., but soon turned his attention to agriculture, buying a farm of two hundred acres. As soon as the Civil war was opened the blood of his forefathers became apparent. Fired with patriotic zeal, he enlisted in Company B, Thirteenth Maine Infantry, of which the celebrated temperance advocate, Neal Dow, was the commander. With his regiment he went to camp at Augusta, November 1, 1861. February 2, 1862, they were ordered to Boston, Mass., and on arriving there camped for one night in Faneuil Hall. The next day they were placed on the steamship Mississippi, which sailed to Fortress Monroe under command of Neal Dow for the purpose of taking on General Butler. He took part in the battle of New Orleans and the siege of Port Hudson in 1863. His service included the offices of provost-marshal of the Mississippi river, lieutenant and captain, until the time of his closing term of service.

The war having expired, Mr. Corson took up the pursuits of civic life. For a time he was engaged as a contractor on the eastern division of the Chicago & Northwestern Railroad. In 1869 he embarked in the manufacture of furniture, having his factory at Sheboygan, Wis., and conducting the business under the title of the Sheboygan Manufacturing Company. In 1886 he came to California and established his home in Pasadena.

The only fraternal orders which have claimed the allegiance of Mr. Corson are the Masons and Odd Fellows. At no time has he been active or conspicuous in politics, his independent views not bringing him into close touch with either of the great parties, while his tastes are for domestic life rather than public service. His marriage took place at Canaan, Me., in 1866, and united him with Flora A. Goodwin, who was born in that village. The children of Mr. and Mrs. Corson were named as follows: Maude, Stella, Flavilla and Ralph. The oldest daughter died in February, 1894; the second married R. W. McDonald, of Pasadena, and the third is the wife of R. Bland, also of Pasadena. The only son, who is vice-president of the Cleburne (Tex.) Light and Water Company, married Miss Jean Nelms, of Pasadena.

HON. ALEXANDER A. McDONELL. Years ago the clan Macdonell lived and flourished in Inverness, Scotland. The grandfather of Alexander A. was Donald, whose father, Allen, was a son of Donald and the latter in turn a son of Allen, the two names of Donald and Allen alternating almost as far back as the record can be traced. In 1802 the grandfather took his family to Canada, among his children being Alexander, who was then a boy of ten. Some years later this son bought a farm sixty-five miles from Montreal and there he lived and labored. Though in the midst of the "Canucks" he continued to use only Gaelic, and in this way all of his children became familiar with the language. His wife, Janet McIntosh, was born in Canada, her parents having removed there from Inverness. They had ten sons and two daughters. Among the sons was Donald, who during the Civil war was a member of a cavalry regiment and was captured in Missouri by the Confederates, after which he was confined in prison for a year.

The oldest child in this large family was Alexander A., born in Cornwall, Canada, March 2, 1821. Until fifteen years of age he worked on the home farm, after which he was employed as foreman in the construction of the Cornwall and other canals. Going to Vermont in 1847, he was a contractor on the Rutland & Burlington Railroad, having charge of the contract to construct ten miles of road. Next he was engaged on the Rutland & Washington Railroad in the same state, and after a time took a contract on the southern division of the same road, where two years were consumed in completing five miles of heavy work. From Vermont he went to Ohio with Joseph Chamberlain on the Cleveland & Pittsburg Railroad, where he graded many miles of road from Hanoverton to Salines-ville. Next he went to Morrowtown and Dayton, and engaged as superintendent of construction on the Cincinnati, Wilmington & Zanesville Railroad. Thence he returned to Sandysville, Ohio, where he built a large tunnel on the Tuscarawas Railroad branch. After a few years of very successful work in Ohio, he went to Wisconsin, where he took a contract for one hundred miles between Madison and Prairie du Chien, completing the same after two years, March 17, 1857. At the same time he built forty miles or more from Janesville to Monroe.

Having established his home at Madison, Wis., in the fall of 1857 Mr. McDonell was elected from that district to the state legislature on the Republican ticket. His election was a test of his personal popularity, for the district usually gave a Democratic majority of three hundred. While in the assembly he won the friendship of all, even those who opposed him politically, and his record was the unusual one of never having lost a bill. During the session of 1857 the contract for erecting the capitol building had been let to a Milwaukee contractor, who began work, put in the foundation, but after eighteen months abandoned everything. Milwaukee was anxious to secure the capital in her own city and members had been elected to the legislature pledged to work for the removal from Madison to Milwaukee. Meanwhile the people of Madison were anxious concerning the matter and greatly desired to have the capitol completed, so the legislature could meet in it. The impression gained ground that the capital would be moved to Milwaukee if the building was not soon completed, and doubtless such would have been the result. As a loyal citizen of Madison, Mr. McDonell was anxious to promote its welfare, and urged that John Ragcraft (the Milwaukee contractor) be sent for and bought out, declaring that he would find a man to complete the capitol before the next election. His proposition was carried out. Ragcraft was sent for and forty men joined to buy him out, after which Mr. McDonell completed the building just thirteen days before the legislature convened. When the old papers were turned over to him, they showed that the contract should have been given to him in the first place according to his first bid. He had taken $50,000 in Madison capitol bonds and the city attempted to repudiate them, but he watched over his interests in each legislature and finally the bonds were paid.

During his entire business experience Mr. McDonell had no contract more important or more difficult than that for the building of the tunnel under Lake Erie in order to secure fresh water for use in Cleveland. The filling of this contract required four years of arduous labor, night and day, and during that time many unexpected difficulties arose to retard the progress of the work and increase expenses. The principal difficulty was in connection with the springing of leaks, which caused the tunnel to fill up with sand, and it was not until he conceived the plan of tunneling around it that the difficulty was surmounted. After four thousand feet had been tunneled the water broke through the solid wall of rock and again the tunnel filled up with sand. This time he stopped work at that point and began at the crib, building from there to the point where he had previously worked. Every day he lost money on the contract, but he kept his men at work and paid them regularly, securing the money for this by taking a contract in Wisconsin for a tunnel one-quarter of a mile long, on the Chicago & North-Western Railroad. Finally the entire distance from the shore to the crib, one and one-fourth miles, was completed and the tunnel turned over to the city. The council was so pleased with the work that its members passed a resolution recommending that the board of water works pay the contractor an amount sufficient so that he would not be the loser financially. This they did, in recognition of his success in completing a task no one thought it possible for him to accomplish.

Another important contract successfully filled by Mr. McDonell was in Chicago. The Washington street tunnel had been commenced by a contractor, but had caved in, and the work had been abandoned. Then Mr. McDonell, associated with Charles B. Farwell and J. K. Lake, took up the work and completed it from new plans which Mr. McDonell had originated himself. At various times he had railroad contracts and his success as constructing engineer was little less than remarkable. During the war he was with Governor Randall of Wisconsin as engineer, with the rank of brigadier-general on the governor's staff. In 1879 he bought the Mark Twain copper mine near Globe, Ariz., which he worked for fifteen months and then sold to a New York firm. In June, 1883, he came to Los Angeles and later bought the residence on West Adams street, in which he afterward made his home. After coming here he still continued his interests in Arizona. As chief engineer and superintendent of construction, he was connected with the building of the Mineral Belt Railroad from Flagstaff to Globe, which work was begun in the fall of 1886 from Flagstaff south. An agreement had been made whereby the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railroad Company was to take each five miles of roadbed at $5,000 a mile. When the president of the road, J. W. Eddy, went to the company for the first payment, they told him they would pay the entire amount when thirty-five miles had been finished. Again, when the stipulated amount had been completed, Mr. Eddy came out from Boston to interview the Santa Fe officials, but found they were not in a position to pay, therefore the work was necessarily abandoned.

At White Hall, N. Y., Mr. McDonell married Frances Elizabeth Bailey, who was born at Troy, N. Y. They became the parents of eleven children, as follows: Mrs. Elizabeth A. Taylor, of Los Angeles; Mrs. Emma M. Schloesser, of Los Angeles; Alexander Edward, who was drowned at the age of six years; Charles A., M. D., a railroad contractor now in Mexico; Mrs. Mary C. Carroll, of Los Angeles; Alexander Walter, of Catalina; William F., who died of yellow fever off the coast of Mexico; Francis J., deceased; George D., of Mexico; Mary, wife of James Marsh, of British Columbia; and Joseph Henry, of Los Angeles.

Mr. McDonell was made a Mason at New Philadelphia, Ohio, and at New Lisbon he was initiated into the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. In religion he was a member of St. Vincent's Catholic Church. Politically he always voted with the Republicans. As might be expected, during his long and active career he met with many experiences. While in Vermont he had a foreman through whose head a bar of iron was blown, yet the man not only survived the shock, but for years afterward carried on his usual work. The case was so remarkable that it was reported in the American Medical Journal about 1850. The death of Mr. McDonell occurred at his residence on Adams street, December 21, 1901. Of his personal attributes it may be said that energy and perseverance were dominant traits. Where obstacles confronted him, he met them with a determination and persistence that always proved effectual. No difficulty was allowed to discourage him, no reverses daunted, and no opposition conquered his forceful will. Possessing these characteristics, it is not strange that, without the influence of means or friends, he should work his way to a position of eminence among the construction engineers of the latter half of the nineteenth century.

J. H. LOVE, M. D. In the list of popular physicians and surgeons of Ventura county none is more highly respected for professional ability and success than is Dr. Love, of Ventura. He was born in Higginsport, Brown county, Ohio, November 23, 1847, and is a son of Charles and Elizabeth (Hoover) Love, natives respectively of Higginsport and Felicity, Ohio. His maternal grandfather, Joel Hoover, was born in Kentucky, of Pennsylvania parentage. The paternal grandfather, Alexander Love, was a native of county Donegal, Ireland, born in 1776, and came to America in 1794. From Pittsburg he journeyed down the Ohio river to Cincinnati, and from there in 1806 went to Higginsport, Brown county. Buying one hundred acres of land at $2.25 per acre, he made a home and improved a farm. His wife, Ellen, was a daughter of Charles and Margaret (Swyer) Canary. Born in Germany in 1744, Mr. Canary came to America before the Revolutionary war, in which he served under General Washington. Accompanied by his wife, who was a native of Philadelphia, he removed to Ohio in 1804, and settled in Lewis township, Brown county, where he engaged in improving a farm from the wilderness.

Farming formed the principal occupation of Charles Love and in it he met with fair success. His activity in local affairs is shown by the fact that he served in county offices. His death occurred in Brown county at eighty-six years of age. His thirteen children are still living, J. H. being the sixth in order of birth. Two of the sons served in the Civil war, Sylvester and Wesley, both of whom are now residents of Higginsport. Sylvester served in Company K, Fifty-ninth Ohio Infantry, while Wesley was first a captain in Colonel Collins' Regulars and afterward was promoted to the rank of major; since the war he has been a practicing physician. The education of J. H. Love was received in common schools. At the age of nineteen he began to study medicine under his brother, Dr. Wesley Love, and in June, 1870, was graduated from the Cincinnati College of Medicine and Surgery, from which institution he holds the degree of M. D. Returning to Brown county, he opened an office at Hamersville, where for twenty years he conducted a general practice. In the spring of 1890 he removed to California and for some months resided in Los Angeles, but in March, 1891, came to Ventura, where he has since engaged in the practice of medicine and surgery. Under President Cleveland he was appointed a member of the United States board of pension examiners and served for four years as president of the same. Among the professional organizations with which he is identified are the American Medical Association, California State and Southern California Medical Societies.

The marriage of Dr. Love was solemnized in Felicity, Clermont county, Ohio, and united him with Miss Addie McCoskey, daughter of Dr. Hugh and Rebecca A. (Tucker) McCoskey, natives respectively of Beaver county, Pa., and Clermont county, Ohio. Her father was a graduate of Augusta College in Kentucky and the Ohio Medical College, after graduating from which he practiced his profession at Newark, Ohio, next at Ripley, and later at Felicity, remaining at the latter point from 1849 until 1877, when he removed to Hamersville, and his last years were passed in that city. Mrs. Love was reared in Ohio, received an excellent education, and is an active member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Born of her marriage are three children, namely: Hugh McCoskey, a graduate of the Ventura high school, winner of the Examiner's prize trip to Chicago in 1893; and later a student in the Chicago University, class of 1901; Louis Cartisle and John Hoover.

While living in Ohio Dr. Love was made a Mason in Georgetown Lodge No. 72, A. F. & A. M., and he is still connected with the lodge and chapter in that town. In Hamersville he affiliated with the lodge of Odd Fellows, and the Knights of Pythias. In political views he is a Democrat and at one time served as chairman of the Ventura county central committee. Such are his qualities as a citizen and a man that he is fortunate who numbers him among his chosen friends.

MICHAEL FAGAN. The honored citizen after whom Fagan Cañon is named and who is one of the pioneers of his section of Ventura county, has practically demonstrated the truth of the saying that "All things come to him who hustles while he waits." On eight hundred acres of the ex-mission grant, purchased in 1883, he has succeeded in overcoming the obstacles at all times to be found in a wild mountainous country, and now has a fine stock and grain farm. Large herds of cattle roam at will over the grassy slopes, the average number being almost three hundred head. A fine grade of cattle they are, and their market value is such as to justify the care exercised in their raising. Horses also are raised in large numbers, and the ranch being so near Santa Paula, many horses are pastured for the townspeople. A general farming enterprise is carried on, and an abundance of fruits raised for home consumption.

Born in Pennsylvania, August 26, 1840, Mr. Fagan arrived in Calaveras county, Cal., August 13, 1852, having made the journey overland with ox-teams. His mother, formerly Annie Dinnell, had died in 1851, while his father, John Fagan, a native of Ireland and in boyhood an emigrant to Canada, died in Calaveras county in November, 1852. After his father's death Michael Fagan and three brothers engaged in mining in partnership, and from 1852 to 1854 were located at Murphy's camp in the placer regions, where the old gulch liberally released its hidden store in response to the labor of those who trusted in it. As a result of his mining ventures he was worth $11,000 when eighteen years of age. In 1855 he removed to San Joaquin county, near Linden and Stockton, where he engaged in farming and stock-raising on a large scale. However, owing to the drought of 1864, his crop of one thousand acres of wheat was a complete failure. Disposing of the interests which he had held in partnership with his brother, John, he determined to try his fortunes in Mexico, and accordingly crossed over into that country. For a time he was interested in cotton-raising and for six months clerked in a store. His next venture was as a miner and prospector in Nevada. While in Mexico, he witnessed the disturbances caused by the overthrow and subsequent assassination of Maximilian. The return journey from Mexico to California was undertaken overland through Arizona, and on the way he prospected and mined at Wickenburg above Phoenix.

In 1866 Mr. Fagan bought a large ranch in Stanislaus county, where he farmed and raised stock as heretofore. Two years later he disposed of his enterprise and came to the Santa Clara valley, where, on the Sespe ranch, for three years he made a specialty of raising hogs and sheep. At times he had as many as three thousand five hundred head of sheep, and for a part of the three years was in partnership with L. Snodgrass. Some of the sheep were later sold and the balance traded for property in Ventura, which sold at a profit during the boom. He then bought one hundred acres in the vicinity of Saticoy, and began to raise beans, also set out the first orchard in that part of the country. Sheep were also raised extensively, and in order to carry on his enterprises he rented several other ranches in the same neighborhood. His ranch near Saticoy was disposed of in 1883 and he forthwith purchased the ranch upon which he has since lived.

April 9, 1879, Mr. Fagan married Hattie Tilotson, a native of New York, and of their union five children were born: Frank D., Cora May, Ettie Belle, Walter Miller and Marion Morris. Politically Mr. Fagan is a Democrat, and has been active in local politics. On several occasions he has served as delegate to state and county conventions, and has intelligently represented the needs and wonderful development of his locality. He is one of the most practical stockmen of the county, as well as one of the most progressive citizens. He is interested in furthering the cause of education and in all enterprises for upbuilding the valley. At one time he was a member of the People's Lumber Company, also a member of the committee that purchased the land on which the Santa Paula branch of this company was established. Fraternally he is affiliated with the Masons at Santa Paula.

LEON LEHMANN. In any California town of the size of Oxnard it would be difficult to find a more complete line of merchandise than that carried by the popular merchants, Lehmann & Waterman. In addition to dry-goods they carry a fine line of hardware. Indeed, almost anything in reasonable and general demand may be found on the shelves of this establishment. A continually increasing trade is enjoyed as a result of the energy and wise judgment of the proprietors, who also conduct a branch store at Hueneme, the latter being under the management of a trustworthy assistant.

The knowledge of business possessed by Mr. Lehmann has been acquired through a practical experience that covers many years. When he first came to California he secured employment as a clerk for the mercantile firm of Wolf & Levi, with whom he remained for almost nine years as an employe. During that period he gained a thorough knowledge of the details connected with a business of that kind, and his experience has since proved of the utmost help to him. His ability was recognized by his employers and he formed a partnership with one of them, under the firm title of Wolf & Lehmann. Their association was continued until 1897, since which time Mr. Lehmann has been connected with Mr. Waterman. The two have made their association mutually profitable and congenial.

Mr. Lehmann was born in Alsace-Lorraine, Germany, February 6, 1861, and is a son of Morse and Estella Lehmann, natives of Germany. The father died in his native land, but in 1893 Leon returned to Europe and brought back his mother, who has since made her home with him in Oxnard; she is now sixty-three years of age. In addition to the advantages derived from attendance at college and diligent study of text-books, he has since learned much through his habits of close observation and through his varied experiences in the world. Hence he ranks to-day among the well-informed German-American residents of Ventura county. Besides his business interests, he has real estate in Oxnard and other towns and is also the owner of a ranch of one hundred and twenty acres.

In politics Mr. Lehmann is a Republican, yet he is not a partisan and is too busy a man to devote any time to politics. Fraternally he is connected with the Elks, Maccabees and Masons, in which latter organization he was the first member to join Hueneme Lodge No. 311, F. & A. M., and has ever since been active in Masonry.

W. H. FLEET. The efficient superintendent of the Piru fruit rancho has filled his responsible position for many years and is well known among the ranchers of Ventura county. He was born in Henrico county, near Richmond, Va., March 29, 1861, and was the eldest of the nine children of Capt. W. C. and Lucy E. (Roan) Fleet, descendants of old colonial stock. The old plantation home where he was born was established by his great-grandfather, who was a pioneer of King and Queen county, Va. The grandfather, James R. Fleet, was the proprietor of large flour and grist mills, and owned a large hay and tobacco plantation, but, unfortunately, during the Civil war, the fine improvements of his homestead were almost totally destroyed. He died in 1875. In the house where he was born also occurred the birth of his son, Capt. W. C. Fleet, who succeeded to the ownership of the flour and grist mills, and in connection with the same operated a sawmill. He was a prominent man in his community, and served as supervisor both of Middlesex and also of King and Queen counties. During the Civil war he served in the Confederate army with the rank of captain.

The higher education of W. M. Fleet was obtained in Blacksburg (Virginia) College. In 1882 he settled in Lafayette county, Mo., and for a few years engaged in raising cattle. From there he came to California, and was for a short time employed by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company in Los Angeles county. Later he came to Ventura county, since which he has lived in the same locality and been connected with the same ranch. His first employer was David C. Cook, the Sunday-school publisher of Chicago and Elgin, Ill., who had purchased the Temescal land grant, comprising fourteen thousand and nine hundred acres. The former owner of the property disposed of it, in August, 1900, to the Piru Oil and Land Company, which, recognizing Mr. Fleet's ability, retained him in the position he had so satisfactorily filled with Mr. Cook.

Since becoming superintendent, Mr. Fleet's attention has been given undividedly to the practical matters connected with the management of the ranch. The surveying and hydraulic engineering, water system, canals, flumes and pipe lines receive regular attention from him. No one understands more thoroughly than he how to protect the system from damage in case of a storm. Devoted to his work, he understands all of its details. The immense orchards reflect great credit on his supervision and the work of his five efficient foremen. Fifty men are given steady employment on the ranch, while during the busy season this number is increased to between four and five hundred. A specialty is made of dried fruit, which is hand picked, sun dried and cured, and cannot be excelled for color, cleanliness, flavor and quality.

Adjoining the elegant mansion built by Mr. Cook is an attractive residence, which is owned and occupied by Mr. Fleet, and presided over by his wife, whom he married January 21, 1897, and who was formerly Lorena C. Scott, being a native of Madison county, Ky. In 1887 Mr. Fleet became a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Piru City, and since that time he has served in the capacity of trustee, steward and Sunday-school superintendent, also was a member of the building committee when the house of worship was erected. For ten years he has been a school trustee. As a Republican he is active in politics, has served several times on the election board and is a member of the county central committee. Among the citizens of Piru none has a higher position or numbers more friends than does W. H. Fleet.

C. E. KING. This pioneer photographer of Santa Paula is also connected with the city's activities through his ownership and management of a furniture and undertaking establishment. He came to this place in January, 1893, from Illinois, where he was born, at Springfield, August 31, 1858. Reared and educated in that state, at the age of twenty years he started out for himself and went to Kansas, settling in Winfield. There he was united in marriage, October 12, 1880, with Miss Mary Felton. From Kansas he returned to Illinois and taught school in Carlinville for twelve years, during the last two of which he held office as assistant principal of schools.

As soon as he came to California Mr. King began to look for a suitable opening. Shortly afterward he bought a photograph gallery at Santa Paula from J. C. Brewster and was the first photographer to settle permanently in the town. In addition to the regular photographic business, he handles supplies of all kinds, with which he supplies amateurs throughout the entire county. His Ventura county views, of which he makes a specialty, are excelled by none. He also devotes attention to the framing of pictures and the furnishing of artist's supplies. The amateur photographer has in him a friend, and many of these come to him for advice in regard to the developing and printing of pictures.

In 1895 Mr. King became a partner in the firm of Reilly Bros., undertakers, since which time the firm has been known as Reilly & King until June 1, 1901, when he bought Mr. Reilly's interest. Being an experienced embalmer, he is well qualified for successful work in the undertaking business. January 1, 1902, he bought out the furniture store of J. B. Beardsley on Main street, and has since conducted this business in connection with other enterprises. He also handles sporting goods. His success is worthy of commendation, for he has had nothing but his perseverance and energy to assist him in getting a start. He is a member of the Santa Paula Board of Trade and a worker for all plans tending to promote the prosperity of his city and county.

Fraternally Mr. King is connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and is past grand of the lodge. In the Ancient Order of United Workmen he holds office as district deputy. He is a member of Olive Encampment No. 79, at Ventura. In these various organizations he is active and influential. Another lodge in which he is prominent is that of the Fraternal Brotherhood, in which he was the first president and is now the secretary.

JEFFERSON L. CRANE. No name in the Santa Clara valley carries with it more of honor than this, nor does any suggest larger undertakings in the pioneer days. Near Akron, Medina county, Ohio, Mr. Crane was born June 17, 1839. His father also was a pioneer, having settled in Ohio in an early day and taken up a government claim of timber, which he cleared and upon which he made his home and reared his family of seven sons and one daughter. He was born in Massachusetts and died in Ohio in 1885. The grandfather, Barnabas Crane, led an interesting life between the ocean and the land, in the summer time commanding a ship upon the sea, and in the winters engaging in educational work. He lived to be four score and four years old. At an early day in the eighteenth century some of the ancestors left their home in England and settled in Massachusetts, and were later among those who fought for release from British tyranny during the war of the Revolution.

Jefferson L. Crane arrived in California in October of 1861. Almost immediately he became associated with his uncle, G. G. Briggs, in the Santa Clara valley, whose ranch he managed for seven years. This property Mr. Briggs had purchased from the More Brothers in 1862, paying $45,000 for eighteen thousand acres, and the following year Mr. Crane set out an orchard of two hundred acres, this being the first orchard planted in the entire valley. The country at the time was wild and uninviting, the only inhabitants of Saticoy being Indians, while the nearest white neighbors were eight or ten miles away. Game was plentiful, and deer and bear were frequently seen when one walked abroad. It had been the intention of Mr. Briggs to colonize the valley, but a drought visited the region that ruined the crops and in the light of that discouragement the enthusiasm of the settlers vanished.

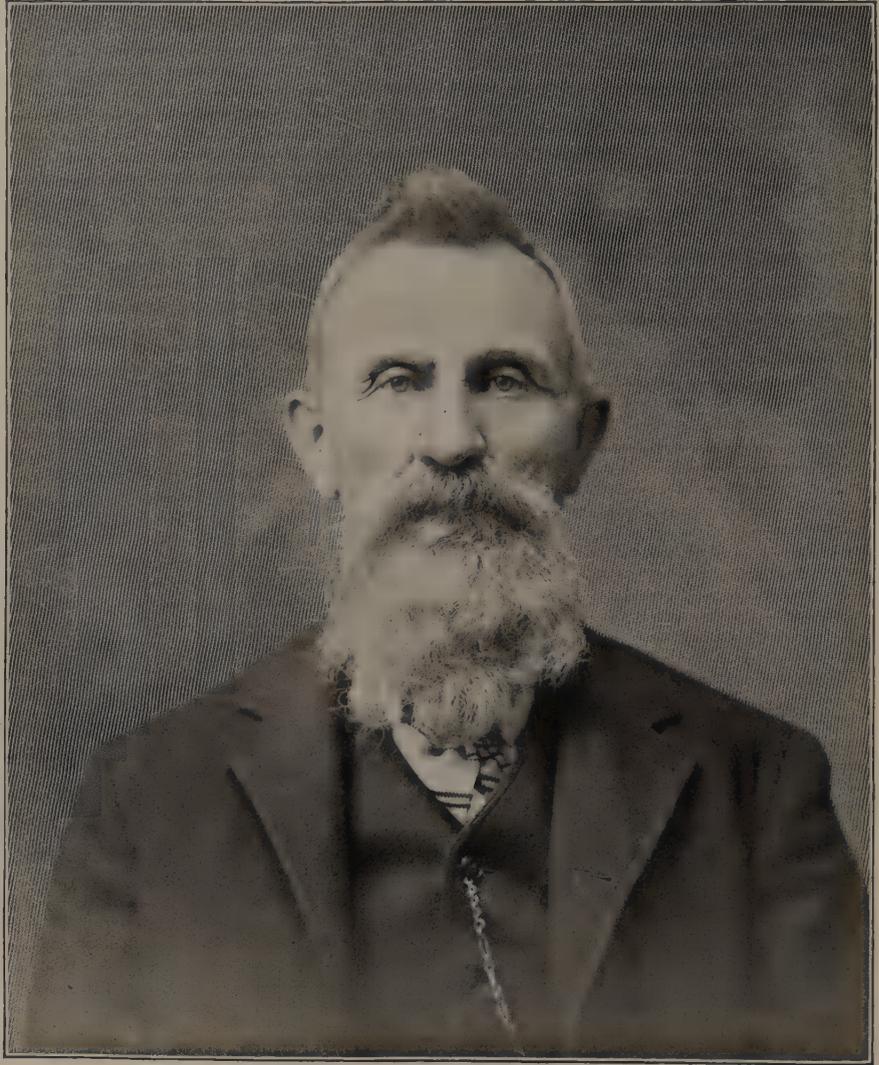

In 1861 occurred the marriage of Mr. Crane and Jeanette Briggs, a native of Massachusetts. The five children of this union were born in Ventura county, and are named as follows: Emmett C., Lincoln P., Cora L., Charles and Chauncey. During 1868 Mr. Crane returned to Ohio, but after ten months he decided to again try his luck in California. Upon returning he lived for a time at Carpinteria. Eventually he bought the ranch on which he now lives and which was a portion of the old Saticoy ranch. The property contained one hundred acres, but in 1888 he sold fifty, retaining fifty acres as his homestead. On his land he raised walnuts, Bartlett pears, apples, and various other kinds of fruit, in the cultivation of which he has had success. At times his pears bring as high as $300 per acre. At this writing he is grafting the English walnut on the American black walnut root, and is finding the experiment to be a success. In addition, he is engaged in preparing a nursery, with which business he has become familiar in all its phases, being a master in the art of growing, budding and pruning plants. He has made excellent improvements on his place, has good buildings and a pleasant home. Many of the important enterprises of the neighborhood owe much to his enthusiastic support, among these being the Saticoy Walnut Growers' Association, in the organization of which he assisted and whose president he has since remained. In politics he is a Democrat.

EMMETT C. CRANE. Prominently connected with the general growth of Saticoy is Emmett C. Crane, at present engaged in conducting the largest general mercantile establishment in the town. A native of Ventura county, he was born on the old Briggs orchard farm April 6, 1863, and was educated at Carpinteria, Ventura and Santa Barbara. His father, Jefferson C. Crane, is one of the most esteemed of the early pioneers of the county, and to his earnest efforts in behalf of its upbuilding is due the credit which is so generously bestowed upon him.

Possessed of natural financial ability, and desiring to embark in commercial life, Mr. Crane in 1887 started the first general merchandise store in Saticoy, and soon after took as partner Charles S. Duval, the affairs of the concern being then conducted under the firm name of Crane & Duval. This partnership was dissolved after eighteen months, and the firm name then became Crane Brothers, by the addition of L. P. Crane to the business. From this time on the interests broadened, and to the other departments of the store was added the shipping of beans and general produce. The association of the brothers continued amicably until 1896, when Mr. Virden became the substitute of the junior brother, and the firm name became Crane & Virden. In 1898 Mr. Crane bought out Mr. Virden, and has since been sole manager and owner of the general merchandise business.

Added to his other responsibilities, Mr. Crane operates and owns the only livery stable in Saticoy, and in 1899 he became interested in the oil development, and now owns considerable oil stock. He has been prominent in the politics of his town, and in 1896 was elected supervisor on the Democratic ticket, his term of service covering four years. He has taken an active part in the improvement and building up of the town, and was one of the board and chairman of the committee who attended to the building of the Santa Clara river bridge. This same board erected the present court house, and made themselves generally useful in a multitude of ways. Among their considerate and thoughtful undertakings should be mentioned the system inaugurated by them of sprinkling the country roads.

In 1884 Mr. Crane was united in marriage with Miss Mary E. Cross, who was born in Wisconsin, and of this union there are three children, Cora L., Ella P. and Clarence E.

W. W. MARTIN. Several different sections of Southern California have profited by the experience and wise judgment of Mr. Martin, who since 1889 has been a large land owner and fruit-grower at Sespe, Ventura county. His first purchase of property in this vicinity was made from F. C. Howes, of Los Angeles, immediately after which he established himself in the fruit business. Since then he has, on several occasions, bought land from the Sespe Land and Water Company, and now his possessions aggregate one hundred and eighty-nine acres, valued at from $100 to $150 per acre. Without doubt his orange and lemon grove is one of the most thrifty in Sespe. In addition, he carries on a nursery business. The majority of the young trees forming the orchards of this vicinity have been secured from his nursery, and he also set out ten thousand trees for the Sespe Land and Water Company on the Sespe rancho. In one contract alone, he sold five thousand lemon trees to this same company, guaranteeing the growth of the trees, and all of them are now bearing. On his farm hay, alfalfa and barley are produced in large quantities. The value of his land is materially increased by the fact that it is mostly under irrigation, rendering possible an abundant supply of water. Besides all of his other enterprises, for the last three years he has been president of the Fillmore Irrigation Company. He is also interested in stock-raising and keeps on his place a large number of horses, notably the Norman-Belgium breed, some of which weigh as much as fifteen hundred pounds each.

Coming to California when twelve years of age, Mr. Martin almost considers himself a native of the state. He was born in Missouri May 9, 1845, and at twelve years of age settled with his parents at Solano county, Cal., where his father died. After attaining his majority he became a farmer in Solano county, continuing there until 1867, when he moved to Monterey county. In 1869 he embarked in the dairy business near Cambria in San Luis Obispo county. The year 1871 found him in Los Angeles, soon after which he bought forty acres near Tustin, Orange county. In that locality he set out many orchards of walnuts and oranges, and also engaged in the nursery business. During the great boom of 1886-87 he was an enthusiastic worker and promoter, buying and selling several properties. In fact, during his entire active life, it has been noticeable that he has always something to sell, and is also ready to buy, being a land speculator in the best sense of that term. While living in Orange county he became a director in the Bank of Tustin, and is still one of its stockholders. He was also one of a number of gentlemen who bought the Olive Milling Company's business at Olive, Orange county, in addition to which he assisted in organizing the Tustin Improvement Company and served as a director in the same until it was disbanded. Another concern with whose organization he was identified was the Santa Ana Grand Avenue Improvement Company, and he was also a director in this until it closed out. From Orange county in 1889 he came to Ventura county, which has since been his home.

In Petaluma, Sonoma county, Cal., Mr. Martin married Miss Barbara J. Keim, a native of Indiana, and daughter of Benjamin Keim, a Pennsylvanian, of German descent. Six children blessed their union, all born in Orange county, namely: Ira B., who is postmaster of Sespe and a merchant of this town; Leo Rollin, who is interested in the oil business; Alice Rosella, Arthur Clyde, Lela Ada, and Guy Randolph Martin.

The principles of the Republican party have always received Mr. Martin's staunch support, both in local and national elections. Personally he stands for the best interests of society and is a true example of an ideal Californian. Both by precept and example he has given his influence toward temperance, and has never touched liquor or tobacco of any kind. He has been equally averse to card-playing, and prides himself on never having touched a card. Indeed, sobriety and temperance in all things has been one of the guiding principles of his life, and the success he has attained may be in part attributed to his abstemious habits and his integrity of character.

FRANK E. DAVIS. Having made Santa Paula his home since 1878, Mr. Davis has been intimately associated with its progress and active in the development of its enterprises. He was born and reared in Vermont, and in 1873 crossed the continent to San Francisco, where for five years he acted in the capacity of general manager of the Continental Oil Company. From San Francisco he came to Santa Paula with I. E. Blake and organized the Old Mission Transfer Oil Company, of which he was elected president. The company operated on the ex-mission rancho and was the first to inaugurate the oil industry in the Santa Clara valley. Indeed, it was through the efforts of the company that Hardison and Stewart were led to identify themselves with this valley in 1883. Early in 1880 they sold out to the Union Oil Company, since which time Mr. Davis has been interested in different oil companies as a stockholder.

In addition to his various oil interests, Mr. Davis has been otherwise identified with local interests. He is a director of the Limoneira rancho, the Santa Paula Horse and Cattle Company, and also of the First National Bank of Santa Paula. For several years he has engaged in the livery business in his home town. Numbered among his real-estate and property holdings is an interest in the Petrolio Hotel building. Another possession is a ranch of six hundred and forty acres, on which he has about one hundred head of fine horses, as well as other stock. At one time he owned Walter J., a celebrated pacer. In 1887 he assisted in organizing the Santa Paula Driving Park Association, in which he owned an interest.

As a member of the Republican party Mr. Davis is active in politics. In 1888 he was elected a member of the county board of supervisors, and this position he held for eight successive years, during four years of which he served as its chairman. Various minor offices have also been creditably filled by him. At this writing he is a member of the county central committee. Fraternaly he is connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Knights of Pythias, besides being especially active in Masonry, as a member of blue lodge, chapter and commandery, and Al Malakiah Temple, N. M. S., of Los Angeles. Not only has he been successful in personal undertakings, but he is also ready and willing to assist in any plans for the upbuilding of Santa Paula and is numbered among the prominent men of this city.

GEORGE COOK. The life of Mr. Cook in California demonstrates what can be accomplished by intelligent and well-directed efforts in the cultivation of the soil, and his success furnishes an example and stimulus to all young men desiring to become citizens of this state. Coming here from Kansas in the spring of 1881, he is now engaged in ranching between Montalvo and Ventura. He was born in Marshall City, Mich., August 16, 1849, and at five years of age was taken by his parents to southeastern Iowa, where the years of his youth were spent on a farm. His primary education was received in public schools, after which he attended Prof. S. L. Howe's private school in Mount Pleasant, Iowa. On leaving school he began to teach, which occupation he followed for five successive winters, meantime engaging in farming during the summer months. In 1879 he went to Smith county, Kans., and took up a homestead, where he remained almost three years. Before leaving Iowa he had been united in marriage with Miss Emma Smith. Four daughters, all living, were born of their union, and they also had one son who died in early childhood.

At the time of coming to California Mr. Cook had little money and he was also hampered by sickness in his family, but by his persistent and untiring efforts to win a place for himself, aided and encouraged by his faithful wife, he steadily gained a foothold and is now prosperous. It speaks well for him that he gives his wife credit for a large measure of his success, realizing that her intelligent counsel and economical management of the home have been of the greatest help to him. It was not until 1891 that he was able to become a property owner. He then bought fifteen acres of the Collins ranch, but this he soon sold, and bought sixty-nine acres where he now resides, between Montalvo and Ventura. By the purchase of additional property he is now the owner of one hundred and one acres, and he also rents some land, operating two hundred and thirty acres altogether. One hundred and sixty-five acres are under lima beans, in which industry he is an expert and authority. He is considered one of the most capable growers of beans in the entire valley. Besides this product, he makes a specialty of raising apricots and has one thousand trees that yield him a large crops of fine fruit each year. During 1897 he assisted in organizing the Lima Bean Association of Santa Clara valley, of which he was president and a director during its entire existence.

For several years Mr. Cook acted as local agent for the Eagle Manufacturing Company of Davenport, Iowa, a house handling all kinds of agricultural machinery. At this writing he acts as agent for the California Implement Company and the Newell Mathews Company, and since 1893 has devoted a share of his time to this work, selling several carloads of machinery in the valley.

Active along political lines, Mr. Cook is a staunch Republican. For six years he was clerk of the Montalvo school district and for a similar period served as a member of the board of directors of the union high school of Ventura. His interest in educational matters makes him ready to lend his aid to all plans for promoting the interests of the schools of his county. Fraternaly he is connected with the blue lodge and chapter, also the council of Masons at Ventura. Enterprising and public-spirited, he is a citizen of whom any community might well be proud.

H. L. BRANDES. As a contractor and artistic painter Mr. Brandes has no superior in Santa Barbara county. In the line of mural decorating and frescoing his work has an old-world finish, an elegance of motif and harmony of coloring, possible of acquirement only after close study in the great cities of Europe, where masters of decorations have expended their most aspiring efforts upon the palaces, churches, museums and public institutions. The most effective and beautiful results along this line in Santa Barbara have been accomplished by Mr. Brandes, some of whose finest work may be seen in the Hopkins and Gilbert residences, the Whitelaw, the Washington school, Dr. Park's Monticilo, and the new bathhouses. The materials for painting are purchased in large lots from the factory, thus insuring the best possible results as well as sufficient quantities for the business carried on by this busy frescoer and painter.

A native of Elze, Hanover, Germany, Mr. Brandes comes of a family which trace their descent through Hanoverian ancestry for several centuries. His father, Franz Brandes, was a shoemaker by trade and died in his native land; the mother, Johanna (Rodemann) Brandes, is still living. H. L. Brandes was the youngest in a family of four children, and the only one in America. He was born July 15, 1869, and received his early education in the Collegiate school of Elze. When thirteen years of age he was apprenticed to a fresco painter in Hanover, with whom he served for three years. Upon completing his term he traveled as a journeyman all over Germany, also into Austria. Owing to the oppression of military duty, in 1891 he left home and sailed to Australia, the good ship Erlanger taking its departure from the Antwerp dock upon a voyage of fifty-six days through the Mediterranean sea, Suez canal and Indian ocean. Arriving at his destination he followed the occupation of painting in different cities, including Petersburg and Germalton, going thence to Singapore, Java, Japan and China. After a trip of five months a ship from Yokohama landed him at Tacoma, Wash., in the spring of 1897, and he then came to Santa Barbara. His decision to make this city his permanent abode he has never had reason to regret. The lot upon which he built a shop and where he now transacts business is located on the corner of Chapala and De la Guerra streets.

GOCHENAUER & FISET, M. D. The private sanitarium of Drs. Gochenauer & Fiset in San Diego has proved a blessing, not merely to people within a radius of a few hundred miles, but especially to invalids who have crossed the continent to receive the benefit of an ideal climate, together with the services of physicians of acknowledged skill and ability. The senior member of the firm, Dr. D. Gochenauer, was born in Shippensburg, Pa., and at a very early age began to assist his father, who had large interests in milling, merchandising, dairying and mining. At the age of sixteen he entered the militia and for one year served in the quartermaster's department, after which he was promoted to be first lieutenant of recruiting officers assigned to Company G, Two Hundred and Second Pennsylvania Infantry. Shortly afterward he was promoted to be captain of his company, and in that office continued until the close of the Civil war. During one engagement he was wounded in the hip, and again in the knee.

At the expiration of his military service the young captain entered medical college in Philadelphia, and in 1868 received the degree of M. D., after which he began professional practice at York, Pa. Four years later he went to New York City in order to have the advantages for special work which the metropolis afforded. Eight years were spent there in the midst of heavy professional responsibilities. From that city he went to Mexico, where he not only practiced, but also acquired mining interests of some value. While on a prospecting tour through California he was so favorably impressed with the ideal climate of San Diego and its picturesque location on the bay that he decided to establish his home and practice here. Accordingly he came to the city in 1887 and at once started into general practice. The following year he formed the San Diego Rapid Transit Street Car Company, of which he was president and one of the principal stockholders. Under the direct oversight of this company was built the first street car line from Old Town and University Heights to San Diego. In 1892 he sold his interest to the present company.

As he had been foremost in securing adequate transportation facilities for San Diego, so also Dr. Gochenauer was active in other matters of general importance. Noticing that the superb climate attracted many seekers after health and realizing that the city did not have suitable accommodations for such, he purchased from Louis Weyland a large house on the corner of Sixth and Beech streets, and here he established a sanitarium. The location could not be surpassed. The building stands on an elevation of three hundred feet above the sea, and commands a splendid view of the bay, harbor, islands, ocean and mountains, besides overlooking the business part of San Diego. The house not being large enough for his wants, he added to it a three-story building, covering about one-half block. In every detail the establishment is modern. There are private rooms to accommodate forty patients, also two suitably equipped operating rooms, one electrical room, six baths, one sterilizing room, a large laundry, spacious kitchen, and surrounding all are well-kept lawns, fountains and walks. The large office and reception rooms are retained on the corner of Sixth and C streets. From the first twenty-four hours the institution has been self-supporting, which speaks volumes for the business and executive ability of its founder. The estimation in which the establishment is held by professional men is indicated by the following from Dr. J. B.

Murphy, of Chicago, a surgeon of world-wide fame: "We have nothing finer or more thoroughly up-to-date in Chicago. Your rooms are all neat, cheerful and inviting, and your operating and sterilizing rooms are as fine as can be found anywhere. With such superior facilities, and in an atmosphere that is free from the infection we have to contend with in large cities, you are armed with all the advantages possible for successful surgery."

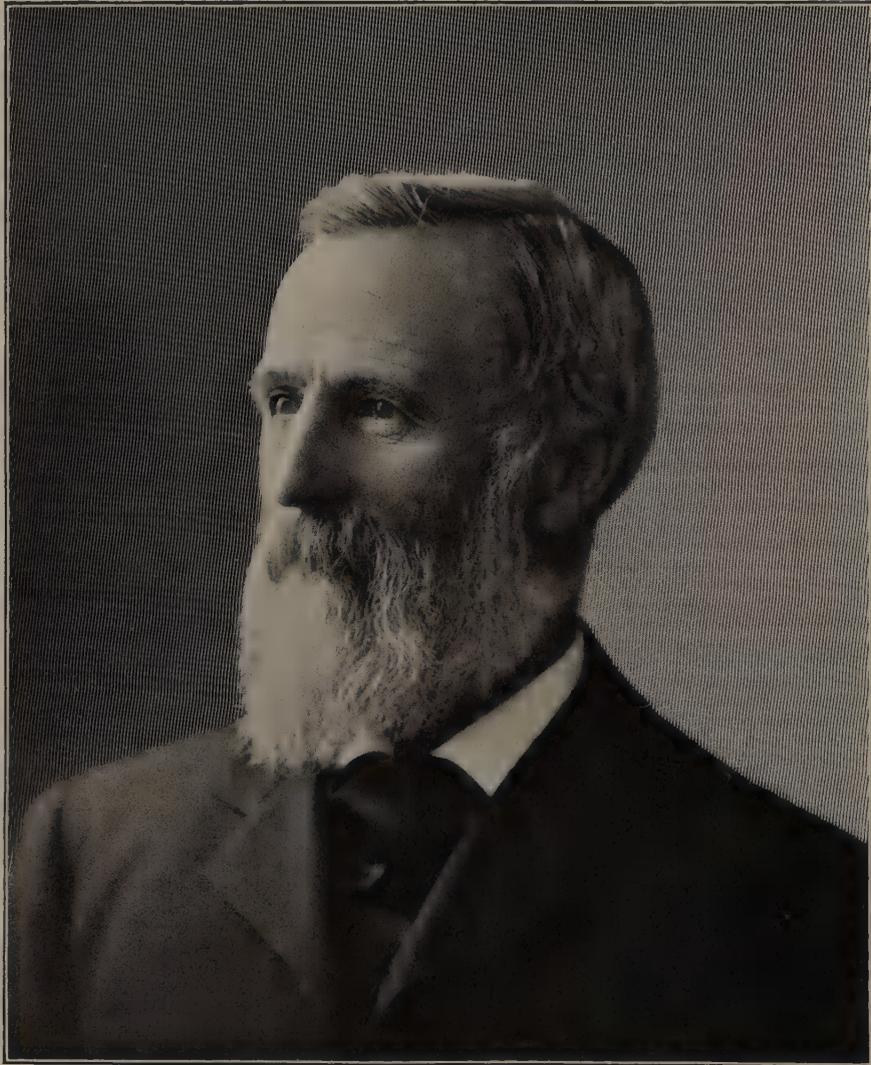

Many articles from the pen of Dr. Gochenauer have appeared in different publications, these pertaining especially to the climatic advantages of San Diego. He is a member of the Elks, Loyal Legion, Foresters and Grand Army of the Republic, in which latter he is an officer. For nine consecutive years he has served as county physician, during the changes of three administrations, and he is also examining physician for pensions. In politics he is a staunch Republican. His marriage united him with Miss Mary L. Grove, of Baltimore, Md., a granddaughter of Judge Tracy, one of the most famous jurists of that city.

The first partner of Dr. Gochenauer in the sanitarium was Dr. Ketcham, but at the end of one year and three months he sold his interest to Dr. Louis O. Fiset. The latter was born in Bangor, Me., a son of George and Adaline Fiset. His literary studies were completed in the University of Michigan, from which he received the degree of A. B. in 1890. Four years later he was given the degree of M. B. from a medical college at Toronto, Canada. Immediately afterward he began to practice at Grand Forks, N. D., and there held the office of member of the board of health for one term and county physician for two terms. Seeking a more congenial climate, in 1900 he came to San Diego, where he has since been connected with the sanitarium. He acts as medical examiner for several insurance companies; in politics votes with the Democrats, and fraternally is connected with the Knights of Pythias, Elks and Modern Woodmen of America. By his marriage to Bessie A. Hornbrooke he has two children, Eugene and Adaline Frances.

CHARLES HAROLD GRANGER. The business interests of Pasadena have a progressive and well-known representative in Mr. Granger, who acts as the agent in this city for the Union and National Ice Companies of Los Angeles. Though of English birth and parentage, he has been practically a lifelong resident of the United States and since the age of fifteen years has made Pasadena his home, hence is familiar with the opportunities it offers to young men of energy and ability. Born in Bedfordshire, fifty miles from London, England, September 7, 1869, he was the youngest of the ten children of William H. and Ann (Wilkson)

Granger, natives of the same shire. When scarcely three years of age he was brought by his parents to America in 1872, the entire family of father and mother and ten children crossing the ocean together and going to Colorado Springs, Colo. In addition to his mining interests, the father became connected with a large cattle-raising business in El Paso county and also conducted a wholesale butcher business. For a number of years he was prosperous, receiving gratifying revenues from his cattle, his meat business and his mines in the Gunnison, Leadville, Durango and Silverton districts, but his death, which occurred in Durango, cut short his activities while he was still in middle life. His widow, who is a daughter of William Henry Wilkson, a farmer of Bedfordshire, England, came to Pasadena in 1884 and now makes her home with her youngest son, Charles Harold. Three of her children died in Colorado, the survivors being as follows: Mrs. Jane Hannaford, of Pasadena; Mrs. Richard Knight, of Durango, Colo.; H. W., a contractor at Aspen, Colo.; Mrs. Emily Curtis, of Vancouver, Wash.; Mrs. Julia Poor, also of Vancouver; Mrs. Mittie Cashin, of Los Angeles; and Charles H., of Pasadena. The last-named was educated in the public schools of Colorado Springs and Parker's Academy in Pasadena. His business experiences began in 1887, when he secured a position as clerk in Swan's grocery. Two years later he entered the employ of the Union Ice Company as their agent, and when the National Ice Company also embarked in business he received a similar appointment from them, since which time he has had charge of the consolidated business. Under his capable oversight a steady increase in trade has been established, so that now four wagons are in constant use, and shipments from the factory are made in carload lots. Besides the position of agent he is a stockholder and director of the Needles Smelting Company, which operates a smelter at Needles, Cal. Both in the Pasadena Board of Trade and the Merchants' Protective Association he holds membership.

The marriage of Mr. Granger took place in Pasadena and united him with Miss Florence Young, who was born in Brockton, Mass., and received an excellent education in Throop Institute at Pasadena, having accompanied her father, J. J., from their eastern home to South Pasadena in her girlhood. Reared in the Episcopal faith she is identified with this denomination and a contributor to its maintenance. In political views Mr. Granger is a believer in the policy and platform of the Republican party, while fraternally he is connected with the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks. Personally he is popular, not only in business but also in social circles, and numbers many friends among the leading residents of his home city.

Mr D L Coe

M. DeL. TODD. In what is now Ventura county lies the Rancho Santa Paula y Saticoy, on a portion of which Mr. Todd began general farming in 1869. There is much of interest associated with the history of this tract. Originally granted to Manuel Jimeno April 28, 1840, seven years later he was given possession of its thirty thousand acres. The name "Saticoy" (said to be the Indian term for "Eureka") is derived from the Saticoy tribe of Indians, who made their headquarters at the springs of that name. Being one of the choicest pieces of land in the county, the rancho was settled before much of the other regions and has always been populated by a high class of residents.

Born in Chautauqua county, N. Y., February 13, 1837, Mr. Todd passed his boyhood years on a farm. Going to Nebraska in 1854, he preempted and proved up on a claim in Cass county. After five years on the land, deciding better prospects awaited him elsewhere, he started on horseback, for California. For ten years he engaged in ranching in Sutter county, from which place he came to Ventura county October 1, 1869, and bought eighty-six acres of the Santa Paula y Saticoy Rancho. The entire property was in wild mustard, no attempt having been made at improvement. For a few years he made a specialty of raising cattle and hogs, and the crops raised on the land were used principally for feed. Finally, however, he decided that the land could be used for other purposes and net greater returns. About 1880 he planted fifty acres in lima beans, which crop has proved so profitable that he now realizes about one ton per acre. In addition he raises standard and soft shell walnuts of the Placentia, Perfection and Santa Barbara improved soft shell varieties, having twenty-five acres of grafted trees. The crops of the older trees average eight tons to thirteen acres. The homestead is one of the most attractive in the Santa Clara valley of the South, its appearance being enhanced by the excellent buildings, shade trees, fruit orchard, and the air of thrift everywhere noticeable.

The family of Mr. Todd consists of six daughters and one son, namely: Mrs. Alice McGregor, Mrs. Ida Yungling, Mrs. Jessie L. Browne, Mrs. Edna Puchen, Marquis de Lafayette Todd, Beatrice and Ernestine Todd. The oldest daughter was born of Mr. Todd's marriage to Mary Beckwith, daughter of A. W. Beckwith. After her death Mr. Todd married Miss Dora Ricker, who was born in Boston, Mass., and is a daughter of John G. and Louisa (Hartwell) Ricker, natives of Maine. In an early day the Ricker family came from France and settled in Maine; the Hartwells were of English extraction. During the exciting days of '49 John G. Ricker made the long journey around Cape Horn from Boston to San Francisco. With him were three eastern friends; all returned to Boston, where two died quite wealthy. In 1854 he settled in Iowa. Coming to the west a second time in 1866, he spent a year in Oregon and then removed to Solano county, Cal. In 1869 he came to Ventura county and settled on a farm, where he still resides. A Democrat in politics, he served as supervisor of Ventura county for three years and, both in Iowa and California, for years held the office of justice of the peace.

Fraternally Mr. Todd is connected with the Santa Paula lodge of Masons; the lodge, encampment and canton of Odd Fellows; and is a charter member of the Ventura County Pioneers' Association. He is an active worker in the Santa Paula Universalist Church and officiates as president of its board of trustees. As a member of the Republican party, he is deeply interested in public affairs. His party nominated him for the legislature in the fall of 1896. Among the local offices held by him is that of road overseer. For several years he was a member of the county central Republican committee, while he has been a delegate to county and state conventions. For years he was a member of the school board. Realizing the necessity of securing irrigation, in 1871 he assisted in starting the Farmers' water ditch, and for years served as a director of the company. The Lima Bean Association numbers him among its directors. Among the other important enterprises to which he has given his support may be mentioned the People's Lumber Company, of which he is a director, acting also as a member of the committee that established a branch yard at Santa Paula. To all movements for the benefit of the county he gives his hearty support. In his business undertakings he has been eminently successful, his present prosperity being the result of his indefatigable energy, unwearied perseverance and honorable dealings with all men.

A. A. GARLAND. Since inaugurating the business at Nordhoff in which he is now engaged Mr. Garland has gained a deserved and constantly increasing patronage. It was in 1895 that he began to cater to the merchandise requirements of the citizens of his adopted town, and his financial ability, tact and honest business methods are bringing him desired results. The store, 24x75 feet, in which his affairs are conducted, was erected by him and is the first brick and stone structure built here. In it may be found a complete line of general necessities as well as many of the luxuries and conveniences to be found in an up-to-date and enterprising establishment in cities larger than this.

In Green county, Wis., Mr. Garland was born August 22, 1857, and is a son of Addison and Hannah (Noble) Garland, natives of Maine

During the early '50s the father settled in Wisconsin, where he engaged in mercantile pursuits. After coming to California in 1875 he started a general mercantile business in which his son, A. A., assisted as a clerk. So apt was the latter in acquiring a knowledge of the business that in time he became a partner and continued in that capacity until he removed to Nordhoff in 1895. The father died at Santa Barbara in November of 1900, and the mother is still living in that city. In the family of three children A. A. was the eldest. He received his education in public schools and has in later years learned much from reading and observation, until at the present time he is unusually well informed.

The marriage of Mr. Garland was solemnized at Santa Barbara in 1882 and united him with Ida M. Paddock, daughter of Charles Henry Paddock. Of this union five children were born, one of whom, Ray Paddock, died at the age of nine months. The four now living are Ruby, Eldon, Arthur and Ruth. In politics a Republican, Mr. Garland cast his first presidential vote for James A. Garfield, and has ever since voted the straight Republican ticket. With his wife he is a member of the Unitarian Church in Santa Barbara, but since coming to Nordhoff he has usually attended services at the Presbyterian Church here. Fraternally he is associated with the Channel City Lodge No. 232, I. O. O. F., at Santa Barbara and the Modern Woodmen of America in Nordhoff.

WALDEMAR G. HANSEN. The industry with which Mr. Hansen is particularly associated is typical of twentieth century progress, as exemplified in that interesting invention, the automobile. When he first became proprietor of the Pasadena machine shop it was limited to the usual scope of business which its name suggests, but he has since added an automobile stable, erecting a building 50x60 feet, in which he carries a full line of horseless carriages, both gasoline, electric and steam. A three-horse power dynamo is used for the charging of the electrical apparatus. His specialty is the manufacture of the Hansen gasoline engines, of four and one-half horse power, designed by himself, and useful not only as motive power for automobiles, but also for boats in which gasoline is the propelling power. As a sample of the possibilities of his machine, it may be stated that he made a trip in his gasoline automobile from Pasadena to the Yosemite valley, covering the entire distance of eleven hundred miles in eleven days.

In Chicago, Ill., Mr. Hansen was born February 1, 1879, being a son of Col. L. P. Hansen, represented elsewhere in this volume. In the schools of Chicago he was primarily educated, and after accompanying his parents to Pasadena in 1890 he continued his public school studies. In 1895 he entered the Throop Polytechnic Institute, where he took a course of three and one-half years. Meantime he became interested in mechanical engineering and on leaving the institute in 1898 he bought an interest in the Pasadena machine shop, of which he became sole owner in June, 1901. The business is the oldest of its kind in the city, having been started in 1891, and is now located at No. 37 South Broadway, at the Southern Pacific depot. The management of the plant and its increase through the addition of automobiles consume Mr. Hansen's attention and leave him little time for participation in public affairs, in which, indeed, he takes no part other than casting a Republican vote at local and general elections.

JAMES H. WHITE. In common with a majority of the residents of Moneta, Mr. White is interested in the berry business. When he came to this portion of Los Angeles county in February, 1895, he bought eleven acres of partly improved land, and this he placed under cultivation to apples, strawberries, dewberries and Logan berries, together with other fruits. While the care of his vines and trees engages much of his attention, he also finds time to manage his poultry yard and sells large quantities of eggs in the markets; besides this he has four cows and sells milk.

Near Leavenworth, Ind., Mr. White was born July 9, 1840, being a son of Richard and Barbara (Harmon) White. The former, who was a native of Tennessee, settled in Indiana at an early period and bought a tract of wild land which he brought under excellent cultivation. During the pioneer days of Iowa, in 1841, he removed to that state, where he bought and improved a farm of two hundred and forty acres. On that homestead his death occurred in 1847 at fifty-six years of age. His wife was born near Lexington, Ky., and died in Iowa. They were the parents of ten children, the youngest being James H. White, of Moneta. When a boy he not only attended public school, but also had college advantages. At the opening of the Civil war, in 1861, he enlisted in the Second Missouri State Militia, and later was assigned to the Third Iowa Cavalry, which was sent south and took part in about forty engagements with the Confederates. After an honorable service in defence of the Union he was discharged June 26, 1865.

Resuming the avocations of civic life, Mr. White carried on a real estate business at Memphis, Mo., for two years, after which he taught school for twelve years near Macon, that state. A later occupation was the cultivation of a farm in Iowa, from which state he came to California January 24, 1887, and settled in Monrovia. This now thriving section of the state was then wholly unimproved and sparsely settled, its resources being as yet unknown. He purchased two and one-half acres of orange land, and improved and cultivated the property, but after a few years sold out and removed to Moneta.

The marriage of Mr. White occurred in Van Buren county, Iowa, and united him with Miss Susan C. Elliott, who was born in Muskingum county, Ohio, her parents being John and Elizabeth (Buchanan) Elliott, natives respectively of Ohio and Pennsylvania. Her grandfather, William Elliott, was of Irish birth and Scotch descent. When a young man he crossed the ocean to America and settled in Ohio, where he took up unimproved farming land. At the age of seventy years he died on his Ohio farm. In 1852 John Elliott removed from Ohio to Iowa and settled near Birmingham, Van Buren county, where he first bought a quarter section of farm land and later added forty acres of timber land one-half mile from town. When he died, in 1890, his body was interred in the cemetery which he had deeded to the town. His wife had accompanied her parents to Ohio when twelve years of age, and from there came to Iowa. In 1896 she came to California to make her home with her daughter, Mrs. White, in Moneta, and here her death occurred in December, 1901, when she was eighty-seven years of age. Mrs. White received fair educational advantages and is a lady of refinement, an active worker in the Woman's Relief Corps, and a generous and kindly helper of those in need. By her marriage to Mr. White one child was born, a daughter, Mintie, who is now the wife of Prof. R. J. Rogers, of Moneta. Fraternally Mr. White is connected with the Ancient Order of United Workmen, the Degree of Honor and the Grand Army of the Republic.

S. M. WALKER. There are few men in Southern California whose life occupation has permitted of such extended and interesting travel as has fallen to the lot of S. M. Walker, who has the reputation of knowing all there is to know about boilers and their manipulation. Following up years of practical experience in near and remote corners of the American continent, he established on Main street, Los Angeles, in March of 1900, the pioneer boiler works of the city, where in the midst of a ceaseless and deafening din are turned out all kinds of boilers and oil and water tanks. He is the fortunate inventor of several modern and up-to-date tools which greatly facilitate his work, but which have never been patented. His shop is one of the most complete in Los Angeles, having a full complement of electric and other machinery, including motors, power punches, drill press, air compressor, and bolt cutters.

A native of Chillicothe, Ross county, Ohio, Mr. Walker was born on his father's farm, August 19, 1855, and was educated at the public schools, and at the German Lutheran College. His father, Edwin P. Walker, was also born in Ross county, whither his forefathers had removed from Virginia at a very early day. The family were represented in the Revolutionary war by the paternal greatgrandfather. Edwin P. Walker removed from Ohio to Elkhart, Ill., and engaged in the mercantile business until the beginning of the war, when he volunteered in Company I, One Hundred and First Illinois Infantry. After three years of active service he was captured by the Confederates and sent to Andersonville, from which he succeeded in escaping, only to be forced to live, until reaching the Union lines, in the deadly malarial swamps, from which he soon after contracted a fatal fever. He married Anna Elder, who was born at Frankfort, Ky., on the old Elder plantation, a daughter of Isaac Elder, who was killed in the Indian war. Mrs. Walker, who now resides in Los Angeles, is the mother of three children, of whom S. M. is the only one living.

In 1874 Mr. Walker discontinued his studies at the German Lutheran College, in order to fit himself for future financial independence. For a time he was employed in the boiler shops of Wilson & Drake, on Tenth and Washington streets, and later completing his trade at Jacksonville, Ill., in the Jacksonville Boiler works. In 1876 he took charge of the Vulcan Iron Works, at St. Joseph, Mo., and in 1882 came to Los Angeles in charge of the boiler department of the Baker Iron Works, on Second and Main streets. Six months later he bought out the boiler works and ran it for six months, when he organized the Union Iron Works, of which he became manager and one of the proprietors. In 1884 he assumed charge of the Alhambra Gold and Silver Mining Company, at Hawley, Cal., and was later in the employ of the Santa Fe Railroad Company at National City, a position which he resigned at the end of four years. A later venture was with the Mexican Central Railroad at Chihuahua, Mexico, after which he went to the city of Mexico and undertook the management of the Mexican National Railroad boiler shops. This position was resigned to take the contract of the Mexican government at Vera Cruz, but, owing to the prevalence of yellow fever, he departed for Havana, Cuba, from where he took the steamer to Aspinwall. The climate there was anything but satisfactory, and the prospects even less so, which led Mr. Walker to migrate to Point Lemon, South America, and later to Galveston, Tex. At Eagle Pass, Tex., he took charge of the Mexican International Boiler Shops, March 17, 1890, and while there had one hundred and seventy-five men under him. In 1894 he traveled to Vellerdenia, Mexico, and had charge of the boiler department of the Vellerdenia Milling and Smelting Company for a year, and from there went to Durango City, Mexico, and had charge of the Durango Iron and Steel Company's boiler and blacksmith shop for a year. This position was resigned to take up a contract with Maximillio Damm in the state of Durango, Mexico, to overhaul his whole plant, a task that was satisfactorily completed in one year. He then opened an engineer supply house and had a fine business, and afterwards obtained a concession from the Mexican government to open a foundry and machine shop in Torreon, state of Coujhouila. This enterprise was placed on a substantial footing, and disposed of in 1898 to a large syndicate, and Mr. Walker then returned to Los Angeles, which has since been his home. His ranch of seven and a half acres, two blocks northeast of the city limits, was set out in various kinds of fruit, and devoted to general horticulture, and it is at present the home of Mr. Walker and his family, who live in a comfortable and convenient house, with beautiful surroundings.

The first marriage of Mr. Walker was contracted in Los Angeles with Clara Van Buskirk, of Bloomington, and who died in El Paso, Tex. The present Mrs. Walker was formerly Mrs. Janet (Henwood) Essery, who was born near Plymouth, Cornwall, England, a daughter of William Henwood, representative of an old Cornish family. The father was a dry-goods merchant in Callington for over forty years, and died after his retirement from business, in London, England. His wife, Mary (Davis) Henwood, who also died in London, was a first cousin of Sir Henry Lippincott. Of the six children born to Mr. and Mrs. Henwood, two are in America, Mrs. Walker, and Mrs. Cranwell Tucker, of Denver, Colo. Another daughter married an American, Arthur Sheridan Lee, who is now Doctor of Divinity at Cambridge College, England. Mrs. Walker went to Canada when quite young with her aunt, Mrs. Hall, and was educated in the convent at Toronto. She then returned to London and married John Essery, a civil engineer and surveyor of London, and who came to San Antonio, Tex., where his death eventually occurred. Mrs. Essery then came to Los Angeles, where she lived until her marriage to Mr. Walker in 1894. To Mr. Walker's first marriage were born two children, Viola and Jessie. Mr. Walker is fraternally associated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows in the city of Mexico; the Knights of Pythias, of which he is chancellor; the Ancient Order of United Workmen, of which he is past master workman; and the Select Knights, of which he assisted in forming the first lodge on the Pacific coast. He is also a Mason, and a member of the Eagle Pass (Texas) Lodge No. 85. Politically he is a Republican. Mrs. Walker is affiliated with the Episcopal Church.

WILLIAM J. HESS. Previous to coming to Pasadena in 1887 Mr. Hess had for years been connected with building and political interests in his native state of Michigan, where he was born near St. Joseph, Berrien county, June 6, 1839. He was the oldest son in the family of twelve children born to George and Mary (Higbee) Hess, the father a native of Westmoreland county, Pa., and the mother born near Syracuse, N. Y. George Hess settled first near Bucyrus, Crawford county, Ohio, and in 1836 removed to Michigan, while that locality was still a territory. The land upon which he settled in the very early days became a well improved farm, and in connection with the improvement thereof he followed his trade as carpenter and builder. He was public spirited and enterprising and held various township offices, including those of supervisor and treasurer, and he was well and favorably known in the county where he lived to be eighty-seven years old. His wife was also an early settler of Michigan, having removed to the territory with her father in 1834. She lived to be sixty-two years old, and of her twelve children eleven attained maturity and are still living.

While living on the paternal farm in Michigan William J. Hess attended the public schools and also spent two years at Albion College. At the age of seventeen he began teaching school, and for the following eight years employed his winters in teaching and his summers in working in the harvest fields. In the meantime he had acquired a fair knowledge of the carpenter business from his father, and when very young had become proficient in the use of tools. After leaving the farm he devoted his entire time to carpentering, in which capacity he was unusually successful during his five years' residence in St. Joseph, Mich. He then removed to Quincy, and later to Coldwater, and while in the latter place did a large business in residence, church and school buildings. Near Quincy he erected the S. D. Kimbark carriage factory, and for many years was councilman of the town. He was at one time identified with building in Benton Harbor, and served as city assessor for seven years.

In the fall of 1887 Mr. Hess came to California and after living a year in Los Angeles settled in Pasadena, where he established a building and contracting business. He was formerly an architect as well as builder, but of late years has devoted his energies almost exclusively to contracting. Among the buildings in Pasadena for which he has contracted are the Spaulding Hotel, the Casa Grande Hotel, the Earl, Staats, Lacy, and Merwin residences, besides school houses and business blocks all over the city. He has erected some of the finest and most artistic homes in the city, and has the reputation of being one of the best in his line in Los Angeles county.

While a resident of St. Joseph, Mich., Mr. Hess was united in marriage with Miss S. J. Weir, a native of Milan, Mich., and of the children born of this union three are living: Carrie is now Mrs. J. W. Henley, of Los Angeles; Arleigh C. is an electrician in Seattle, Wash.; and Harry W. is a musician of Pasadena. Mr. Hess is a Republican in national and local politics, and in fraternal affiliation is a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen. He is one of the best known builders in the city and enjoys the confidence and esteem of his fellow craftsmen as well as the community at large.

BENJAMIN F. THOMAS. The family represented by this influential attorney of Santa Barbara was established in America by his great-grandfather, a Welshman, who settled on a plantation in Virginia and served during the Revolutionary war in the colonial army. James, a son of this pioneer, was born in Virginia, and removed to Ohio county, Ky., but about 1830 became an early settler of Lewis county, Mo. He married a Miss Miller, a native of South Carolina, and of German descent. When sixty-five years old, in 1855, he crossed the plains to California via Salt Lake, where he was met by his son, Massey. His last years were spent in California, where he died. In religion he was a Baptist and a man of deep Christian belief and experiences.

Massey Thomas was born in Ohio county, Ky., in 1813, and became a farmer of Lewis county, Mo. In 1849 he crossed to California, via ox-train, and after mining for a short time, turned his attention to freighting and merchandising, with a brother-in-law, John Bain. In the fall of 1851 he returned east via Panama and New Orleans, but in the spring of 1853 left Missouri permanently, selling all his interests there. With his family and with four hundred head of cattle he had bought, he traveled via Council Bluffs, up the Platte, via the Humboldt route, and through Carson City to Sonora, Cal., where he rested his cattle. Buying land in Gilroy, Santa Clara county, he engaged in stock-raising, and besides cattle he raised fine Percheron and Clydesdale horses. The drought of 1864 forced him to move his cattle, and he soon after sold them. Thenceforward until his death he devoted himself to general farming. In religion he was a member of the Christian Church. In politics he affiliated with the Whigs during the existence of that party, and afterward became a Democrat. His death occurred in April, 1900.

The marriage of Massey Thomas united him with Phoebe Bane, who was born near Lexington, Ky., and died in California in 1892. Her grandfather, a Revolutionary soldier, was of French descent. Her father, who was a pioneer of Missouri, married a Miss Reynolds, of a New England family. Ten children comprised the family of Massey and Phoebe Thomas, nine of whom attained maturity, namely: James Baldwin, who was the first student to enter Harvard University from California and who died in 1859, at the close of his sophomore year; Susan, Mrs. Hartsough, of Fresno county; T. R., a grain merchant, who died in Gilroy; William, who was a farmer at Hollister, but died at Gilroy; John, a farmer living near Hollister; B. F., of this sketch; Massey, Riley and Charles E., who are farmers near Gilroy.

Near Monticello, Lewis county, Mo., B. F. Thomas was born February 22, 1846. In 1853 he was brought to California. His education was obtained in the Gilroy public schools, and the San José Institute and Commercial College, of which Freeman Gates was principal. On leaving school he began the study of law with S. A. Barker, of San José, and P. B. Tully, ex-Member of Congress from Gilroy. January 12, 1874, he was admitted to the bar in Sacramento, after an examination in open court. An appointment as agent of the Guadalupe ranch for Theodore LeRoy led Mr. Thomas to come to Santa Barbara county in 1874, and the position he held for two years, meantime selling the first land to a colony of four Swiss who bought about two thousand acres. In the fall of 1873 he was elected district attorney of Santa Barbara county, and took the office in March, 1876, filling the same for a term. Since then he has continuously engaged in the practice of law. He was a member of the Board of Freeholders that framed the first charter of Santa Barbara, but the charter was defeated at that time. A few years later he was again elected to that board and again assisted in framing the organic law of the city. This time it was adopted, on the approval of the legislature. In addition to his residence, on the corner of Santa Barbara and Mission streets, he owns ranch property in San Luis Obispo county and a ranch at Gilroy, where he has forty acres in prunes.

In Guadalupe Mr. Thomas married Miss Georgia H. Owen, who was born near Springfield, Mo., and received an excellent education in the San José Normal School. During the '50s her father, P. B. Owen, crossed the plains and settled in Sonoma county, Cal. The children of Mr. and Mrs. Thomas are named as follows: LeRoy, who died at fourteen years; Leona C., who possesses considerable talent as an artist and was formerly a student in Mills College, but is now a special student in Hopkins Art School, San Francisco; Reginald, a member of the high school class of 1901; and Cecil T. The family are connected with the Christian Church, in which Mr. Thomas is a member of the board of trustees and the building committee. Several times he has served as chairman of the county central committee of the Democratic party. While in Gilroy he was made a Mason, and after coming to Santa Barbara he was for eleven years master of the blue lodge here, also high priest of the Royal Arch Chapter for four years, and for two terms eminent commander of St. Omar Commandery No. 30, K. T. In the lodge of Ancient Order of United Workmen, he is past master workman.

CAPT. CHARLES H. HOWLAND. From the earliest period of New England history the Howland family had its representatives in America, three brothers, Arthur, Henry and John, having come to this country from Essex county, England. John accompanied Governor Carver in the Mayflower in 1620 and afterward married Elizabeth Tilley, who was a fellow-passenger on that historic ship. A short time afterward Arthur and Henry joined their brother in the Plymouth colony. The descendants of Henry lived in the vicinity of Duxbury and Dartmouth, Mass., until 1790, when Peleg moved to Dutchess county, N. Y. Zoeth, a son of Henry, was killed by Indians at Pocasset in 1676 during King Philip's war. Later generations proved themselves to be equally valorous and freely offered their services to the country in times of war. Franklyn Howland enlisted in the Union army at New York April 19, 1861, and was wounded in the first battle of Bull Run. After serving a year in the army of the Potomac he was assigned to duty in the department of the south with the Ninth Army Corps, and, being captured by the Confederates, was for almost a year imprisoned in Libby and Salisbury (N. C.) prisons and at New Orleans.

Descended from Henry Howland, one of the original emigrants, was Jonathan Howland, a lawyer at Cape Vincent, Jefferson county, N. Y., where he died in 1841. His son, Frederick Aiken Howland, was born on Carlton Island in the St. Lawrence river, in 1827. Joining his three older brothers at Toronto, Canada, in 1843, with them he engaged in building up a large milling and manufacturing business in that city. His brother, Sir William Pierce Howland, was finance minister of Canada in 1862-63, receiver-general in 1863-64, postmaster-general in 1864-66, minister of inland revenue in 1867-68, and lieutenant-governor of the province of Ontario from 1868 to 1873, when he was made a knight of the Order of the Bath. On his retirement from public life, in 1879, he received from Queen Victoria, as a reward for his services, the Order of St. Michael and St. George.

The marriage of Frederick Aiken Howland united him with Matilda Musson, who was born and reared in Ontario, her father having gone there from England and settled on a large estate near Toronto. Six children were born of their union, four of whom are living, three sons and the only daughter making their homes in Los Angeles, while the remaining son is in Ontario and holds the position of president and general manager of the Irondale, Bancroft and Ottawa Railway. Of the sons, Charles H. was born near Toronto March 25, 1863, and received his education principally in Upper Canada College, in that city. It was his intention to learn the milling business in all of its details, but a short period of work showed him that the dust was proving injurious to his health. On leaving the mill he traveled through the Northwestern territory, where, as yet, no railroad had been built. In 1881-82 he acted as assistant on astronomical survey for the Canadian government through Manitoba and the Northwest, after which, from 1882 to 1884, he was with the Hudson Bay Company as land inspector. During that period he once met Sitting Bull, of whom he retains a vivid recollection. Seeking California in 1884, he settled in Los Angeles, where he now makes his home. For a few years he was employed in surveying and civil engineering, and later turned his attention to ranching. He was one of the organizers of the Conservative Life Insurance Company of Los Angeles, and at this writing is a director in the Broadway Bank and Trust Company. After coming to Los Angeles he was married, in 1888, to Miss Grace Freeman, and they reside at Inglewood. In religious belief both are Episcopalians. Politically Captain Howland is a Republican. On the organization of Troop D he entered the National Guard of California as a private in the same. From the ranks he was promoted step by step. September 21, 1897, the governor commissioned him captain of the troop for two years, but he continued in the office until 1900, when he resigned. During his term as captain Troop D volunteered for the Spanish war, but, being a cavalry company, was not accepted.

R. C. TRUAX. A long and honorable and most exemplary railroad career has been that of R. C. Truax, without doubt one of the most successful and experienced men in his line in Southern California. Through all the different stages he has worked his way up to the responsible position of conductor, and covering a period of more than thirty years has been singularly exempt from the difficulties which often accompany a railroad career. Strange to say he has never had an accident, nor has he been summoned to court for trial or as a witness. Even granted that good luck was on his side, this is certainly a remarkable showing, and would seem to indicate a world of common sense and wide knowledge of his many-sided calling.

A native of Canandaigua, N. Y., Mr. Truax was born July 21, 1846, and comes of Scotch ancestry. His father, John, was a native of the same place, and while living in New York was overseer of the Gregg estate in Canandaigua. At an early day he settled in Hillsdale county, Mich., about 1854, from which state he enlisted for service in the Civil war, first in the First Coldwater Battalion, and afterwards in Company D, Second Michigan Volunteer Infantry. He saw very hard service and suffered many deprivations, and eventually died from the long-continued strain. On the maternal side Mr. Truax is descended from Gen. Benjamin Wells, one of the most courageous and persistent of those who fought upon the battlefields of the Revolution. This was the great-grandfather of Ann Wells, the mother of Mr. Truax, who was born in New York state, a daughter of Benjamin Wells, a farmer in New York and afterwards in Michigan. Mrs. Truax, who died in Texas on the way to California, was the mother of eight children, four sons and four daughters, of whom two sons are now deceased, R. C. being the youngest son living. Another son, Jerome, is living in Toledo, Ohio.

Mr. Truax was reared in Michigan and educated in the public schools, and in 1862 enlisted in Company D, Second Michigan Volunteer Infantry, and served in the army of the Potomac, participating in many of the important battles of the war, including Spottsylvania, the Wilderness and Cold Harbor. In the latter named battle he was wounded in the left hip and was laid up in the hospital for a year, and was honorably discharged at the end of the war. Upon returning to Hillsdale, Mich., he attended school for eighteen months, and then began his railroad career as brakeman on the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railroad, running between Toledo and Elkhart. He was in time promoted to be a conductor, and thus put in his time until 1883. He then came to California on a visit to his wife's relatives, and being favorably impressed with the climate and general prospects, decided to, henceforth cast his fortunes with the less worn activity of the west. The Southern Pacific road offered him a position as brakeman to begin with, but after three months he was promoted to conductor, and since 1887 he has run on the Long Beach division. This has been his home since that year, and he has built a fine residence and is permanently located in this town.

In Grand Rapids, Mich., February 14, 1872, he married Jennie A. Stevens, a native of Bakersfield, Vt., and sister of G. A. Stevens, of this town. Of this union there are four children, viz.: Bertha, who is a graduate of the Pomona College, and is now the wife of B. Bellows, of Dakota City, Iowa; J. Wells, who is a graduate of the Long Beach high school and is now employed by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company at Pasadena; Harry, who is a graduate of the Woodbury Business College of Los Angeles, and is an operator with the Santa Fe Railroad at Winslow, Ariz.; and Viva, who is living at home. Mr. Truax is fraternally associated with the Knights of Pythias. In political affiliation he is a Republican, but has never devoted any time to office-holding. Mrs. Truax is connected with the Rathbone Sisters, Order of Maccabees, and is an officer of the Relief Corps. Mr. Truax is possessed of many admirable characteristics, is well read, enterprising, and one of the most highly esteemed citizens of Long Beach.

THOMAS STORY. Few among the people now living in Burbank district have been identified with its interests for a longer period than has Mr. Story, and probably no one has maintained a deeper interest in its development and progress. When he arrived at the present site of Burbank, October 8, 1876, the surrounding country was a desert in which few attempts had been made at improvement. Hence his work was that of a pioneer. As a man of business he has been energetic, while his work as a farmer and stockman bears comparison with that of any other successful cattle-grower or agriculturist in his neighborhood.

In Waterloo, Seneca county, N. Y., Thomas Story was born July 7, 1850, a son of Amos and Cornelia (Smith) Story, natives of the same county as himself. About 1854 the family removed to Michigan and settled on a farm in Kent county, where the father hoped to build up a large estate and gain financial success. Death, however, soon brought an end to his hopes, for he passed away when only thirty-two years of age. His widow and five little children were left with only limited means, but for a time they kept together, the mother working for the children until they were old enough to care for her. Thomas was taken into his grandmother's home in Seneca county, N. Y., and cared for by her until he was twelve. In 1862 he came to California with an uncle, Hiram Smith, who settled at Donner Lake and took up a timber claim. Three years later the family moved to Placer county in the mines of Todd's valley. About a year later Mr. Story secured work with A. A. Pond & Co., who owned a store and large mines there, and until he was nineteen he drove a team for the company.

During 1869 Mr. Story came to Southern California, where at first he worked on a grain farm and then rented land, after which he made a start for himself at Burbank, buying a squatter's right to seventy-eight and one-half acres one mile northwest of the village. This he improved and cultivated. On the subdividing of the Burbank ranch, a portion of which he had previously rented, he bought forty acres of the tract, and this he later sold, together with his farm, to the West Los Angeles Water Company. Having disposed of that property he bought another forty acres. In 1898 he opened a livery and sales stable, and for a year also conducted a dairy business, since which time he has given his attention principally to dealing in stock and land. At this writing he owns twenty-five acres at the foot of the hills, one mile from Burbank, under cultivation. After coming to this locality he married Miss Emma Fisher, who was born in Ohio, and in girlhood accompanied her father, Henry Fisher, to California, settling on a ranch in Burbank district. They have two sons, Henry Amos and Walter A. The family attend the Methodist Episcopal Church and Mrs. Story is an active worker in the congregation, interested in various of its societies and a contributor to its maintenance. Not being a politician, Mr. Story considers his duty as a citizen discharged when he casts a Republican ballot at local and general elections, and has not sought the honors of office for himself. In fraternal relations he is connected with the Independent Order of Foresters.

C. N. STANLEY. The first of the Stanley family to settle in America came from England and established his home in North Carolina. Lewis, a son of this immigrant, and a native of North Carolina, became a farmer in Indiana, making his home first in Fayette county and later in Hancock county. By his marriage to Mary Ann Johnson, who was born in Tennessee and died in Indiana, there were born fourteen children, all but two of whom attained maturity, and ten are now living. Three sons participated in the Civil war, namely: John, of Indianapolis; Thomas and Van B., all of whom were members of the Seventy-ninth Indiana Infantry. The color-bearer of the regiment being shot down at Chickamauga, Thomas picked up the flag and carried it through the battle; he was afterwards killed in a skirmish at Missionary Ridge. Van B. fell while fighting for his country at Stone River. The sixth in the family circle was C. N., who was born in Fayette county, Ind., March 4, 1846. On attaining his majority he went to Illinois and began farming in McLean county. Two years later (1869) he removed to Jackson county, Mo., and settled on a farm near Hickman's Mills. During the pioneer days of Kansas he became identified with the history of that state, and in 1871 began carpentering at Humboldt, Allen county. During 1873 he removed to Chicago, Ill., where he followed his trade for nine months. His next location was Indianapolis, Ind., where he worked at contracting and building for many years, meantime having contracts for many fine

Near Jacksonville, Ill., Mr. Stanley married Miss Mary Rex, who was born in Indiana and died in Pasadena, Cal. Two children were born of that union, of whom Florence died in infancy, and Eva G. is Mrs. Charles E. Rice, of Pasadena. The second marriage of Mr. Stanley took place in Pasadena and united him with Mrs. Sarah (Michels) Clatterbuck, a native of West Virginia. Two children bless this union, Lewis and Earle. By her union with Mr. Michels there was one son, George.

During 1887 Mr. Stanley came to California, since which time he has followed contracting and building in Pasadena. Among the contracts he has had in this city are those for the Hopkins and other blocks, and numerous fine residences, besides which he built the First National Bank building of Monrovia and the Monroe block. Since coming west he has been made a Mason in Pasadena Lodge No. 272, F. & A. M. His enthusiastic support of Democratic principles makes him an influential member of his party in local politics, and he is now rendering able service as the representative of his ward in the city committee and also as a member of the county central committee.

FRANK A. SEABERT. The Seabert family was founded in America by Philip A. Seabert, Sr., who, as an officer in Bonaparte's army, suffered the fate of the adherents of the Napoleonic empire and was forced to flee from France, the home of his ancestors and his own native land. Seeking refuge in Canada, he spent the remainder of his life far from the unquiet scenes of his early manhood. The large property which he owned in France was confiscated, and his descendants have endeavored fruitlessly to regain its possession. His son, Philip, Jr., was born in Gascony, and accompanied his father to Canada after the battle of Waterloo. Later he became a prominent lawyer and statesman of Vermont, led in the work of the Democratic party, and served four terms as a member of the Vermont legislature, afterward declining a nomination for the senate. Through his efforts a law was passed limiting a legal day's work to ten hours. His death occurred in Gascony, whither he had been called in connection with litigation for the recovery of the family estate.

In Brattleboro, Vt., Frank A. Seabert was born April 17, 1838. His education, begun under private tutors, was continued in Heathcote school, Brown's Academy, and Harvard College. For a time he studied medicine in Bellevue Medical College and Hospital, but the failure of his health forced him to abandon his studies. After a long rest and the full recovery of his health he entered the Polytechnic School at Troy, N. Y., where he took a full course in civil engineering. Afterward he entered the railroad service, being first with the Vermont Central Railroad, and later with the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Road. At the opening of the Civil war he responded to the call for ninety-day men. At the expiration of that time he enlisted in Company C, Seventh Pennsylvania Reserves, and later assisted in organizing the One Hundred and Forty-ninth Pennsylvania Infantry Bucktails. From the ranks he was gradually promoted until he reached the office of brevet-colonel, being mustered out as such in 1865. During his service in the army of the Potomac he was several times wounded, but never seriously.

The railroad life of Mr. Seabert began with his entering the service of the Vermont Central road. A later position took him to Scranton, Pa., where he was employed on the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad. For a time he was a member of the civil engineering corps, next was track master and assistant superintendent, and later became superintendent, which last position he filled for fifteen years, having charge of the division at Buffalo, N. Y. Meanwhile for seven years he was a member of the Buffalo board of education, for six years was a director in the Young Men's Christian Association and chairman of its railroad department, also served as a trustee of Fitch Institute, trustee of the Calvary Presbyterian Church, president of the Eagle Loan and Trust Company, a member of the committee of management of Fitch Hospital, president of the Western New York Car Service Association, and one of the committee that framed the rules and by-laws of the association.

The pressure of heavy responsibilities undermined Mr. Seabert's health and in 1894 he came to California, where he soon regained his strength. He then entered the Southern Pacific service as assistant superintendent of the Tucson division of six hundred and forty miles. However, the extreme heat of the desert proved so trying that he resigned and returned to California, settling at Redondo, where he has since engaged in the general mercantile business. While this is a complete change from railroad-ing, in which he met with such striking success, he has proved himself a man of diversified gifts, able to conduct different enterprises successfully. Several clerks are employed to assist him in the business, and a full line of general supplies is carried. He is a member of the executive committee of the Affiliated Retail Grocers' Association of Southern California, and was largely instrumental in organizing the Redondo Board of Trade, of which he has served as president. From the organization of the Republican party he has been firm in his allegiance to its principles. In religion he is of the Presbyterian faith. While living in Pennsylvania he married Miss Mary E. Bird, who was born in New Jersey and from there in childhood moved to Pennsylvania with her father, William Bird, an extensive farmer. Born of their union were two children, namely: Jennie T. and Charles P., who is engaged in mining in Arizona, where Mr. Seabert himself has various important gold and silver mining interests.

T. R. FINLEY. The legal prestige of Santa Maria is well sustained by T. R. Finley, attorney-at-law, who has a deserved reputation and popularity by reason of a thorough adaptation to the requirements and amenities of his profession. A Californian by birth and training, he was born in Santa Rosa June 3, 1854, and is a son of William H. and Ann J. (Maze) Finley, natives of Kentucky and Tennessee respectively. Generations ago the Finley family resided in Scotland, and from there crossed the ocean to North Carolina, where among their members were many representative and honored citizens.

One of the well-known characters of pioneer days in California was William H. Finley, a pioneer of 1853. As a miner he worked in the old town of Lynchburg (now Oroville), Butte county, from which place he removed to the San Joaquin valley and engaged extensively in the cattle business, after 1864 being largely interested in the raising of general farm products. In 1869 he settled in the vicinity of Modesto, Stanislaus county, where he cultivated several thousand acres of land and met with a success that was well deserved. At a later period he established his home in Los Angeles, where he died March 24, 1901. Everywhere he was honored for his integrity and honesty. He was a faithful worker and an elder in the Christian Church.

The education of T. R. Finley was acquired for the greater part in Stockton, San Joaquin county, and in Christian College at Santa Rosa, after which he was graduated from the Hastings Law School. His preliminary practice was secured in Modesto, Stanislaus county, but after two years he removed to Redding, Shasta county, where he acted as manager of the Shasta County Abstract Company for a number of years. His residence in Santa Maria began in 1896, since which time he has built up a large general law practice, being admitted to all the courts of the state of California. His efforts in behalf of the town are by no means confined to professional services, for he is prominently identified with business and social life and has also had much to do with promoting the cause of education. In politics a Democrat, he has had no time for office, other than to serve as a member of the school board. Fraternally he is a master Mason and a past chancellor of the Knights of Pythias.

The marriage of Mr. Finley and Margaret A. Mearns occurred in San Francisco in 1888, Mrs. Finley being a daughter of George and Elizabeth Mearns, the former of whom is well known and a prominent member of Dr. McKenzie's Church. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Finley, namely: William H., George M. and Theodore R.

WILLIAM EDGAR SHEPHERD. The science of law in Ventura has no more forceful exponent of its unyielding principles than William Edgar Shepherd, who was born in Fairfield, Jefferson county, Iowa, June 30, 1842. Of Scotch-Irish ancestry, the emigrating members of the family settled first in Virginia and later removed to Kentucky, where Thomas, the father of William E. Shepherd, was born and reared. When a young man he moved to Fairfield, Iowa, and there followed the tanner's occupation, but died in middle age, when his son was one year old. His wife, Sarah J., was born near Xenia, Greene county, Ohio, of English descent, and was a daughter of James Edgar, a native of Pennsylvania and a farmer in Ohio. Of the three children born to her marriage William Edgar alone attained maturity. At the time of her death he was nine years of age. His education was acquired in Oskaloosa, Iowa, and he was graduated from the academy at twenty-two years of age.

During the Civil war Mr. Shepherd was mustered into Company H, Third Iowa Volunteer Infantry, at Keokuk, and served for three years in the army of the Tennessee. After participating in the battles of Shiloh, Holly Springs, the sieges of Corinth and Vicksburg, he was detailed in the United States postal department at Vicksburg, and was chief clerk in the military postoffice until his discharge from the service June 8, 1864. Returning to Iowa he became local editor of the Oskaloosa Herald. During the administration of President Lincoln he was appointed postmaster of Oskaloosa and held the office for five years, with the exception of six months, when he was removed by President Johnson on account of his refusal to support the presidential policy. His letter, "I am not for sale," in answer to what was called President Johnson's "bread and butter" policy, brought him words of praise from all parts of the United States, but it also caused him to lose the postoffice for six months, which, coming on the eve of his wedding, caused him no little financial inconvenience, but he did not allow policy to triumph over principle. His reinstatement followed upon the passage by congress of the tenure of office act.

In the meantime Mr. Shepherd had improved whatever of leisure came his way by studying law, and was admitted to practice at the Iowa bar in 1866, following which he practiced his profession in partnership with John F. Lacy, now member of congress from Iowa. He was a delegate to the National Liberal Republican convention which brought about the nomination of Horace Greeley for president, and in 1872 he was a candidate for state elector. A perusal of the work upon Southern California written by Charles Nordhoff led Mr. Shepherd to locate in the far west, believing that the climate would be beneficial to Mrs. Shepherd. In 1873 he came to Ventura and bought the Signal, of which he was managing editor for five years. During that time he named the town of Nordhoff after the writer. On the Democratic ticket, in 1878, he was a delegation candidate for the constitutional convention of California, but was somewhat in the minority on account of a combination, and was consequently defeated. The same year he began the practice of law and has since built up an extensive clientele, his reputation as an astute and able practitioner being of an enviable nature. He is recognized as a strong advocate and strenuous fighter, guarding well the interests of his client at every point, and quick to seize and persistent in holding the point of vantage. As a criminal lawyer he has few equals in Southern California. He possesses a fine argumentative ability, and when convinced of the correctness of his position nothing swerves him from his stand. For a number of years he has been city attorney of Ventura.

In this résumé of the life of Mr. Shepherd it is fitting that mention be made of Mrs. Theodosia B. Shepherd, who has a world-wide reputation as a floriculturist and seed-grower, and who occupies a prominent position as an originator of new plants. From her seed gardens in the heart of Ventura have come many astonishing revelations in the propagation of flora novelties, consummations which could have come only from an intensely artistic and beautiful nature, and one who sufficiently appreciates the possibilities of soil and climate by which she is surrounded to spend years of enthusiastic toil in endeavoring to practically convince the nation that here, of all places under the sun, is the home of her delightful and inspiring occupation. In the very nearness of nature's heart, she has succeeded from a small greenhouse, costing less than $5, to a trade that reaches to nearly all the countries of the world. Her green, bath and packing houses requiring the continual labor of several men. So great an authority is this lover of all that is beautiful in nature that her correspondence is great, especially from members of her own sex, who admire her spirit and success, and would profit by her experience. Numberless correspondents have visited her grounds and written up her work, and she is known as the pioneer flower seed and bulb grower on the western coast of California. Her work is dearer to her than are the ambitions of the devotees of art and fashion. She has been a contributor to many journals and periodicals, is interested in many subjects, and keeps abreast with the developments in the arts and sciences. To her the study of plant life has been only a preface to the study of astronomy and metaphysics, and the present and the future to her are full of promise and hope. In the face of the fact that she has reared a family of four children, has been a moral and progressive force in every good undertaking in the community, and is a woman of unusual tenderness and resourcefulness in the making of a delightful home for her family, it seems remarkable that in addition she has also found time for the exercise of her knowledge and talents in a special direction. Along the line of her favorite occupation she has been a great student, and also keeps in touch with the work by attending flower conventions.

Mrs. Shepherd was born in Keosauqua, Iowa, October 14, 1845, a daughter of Judge Augustus Hall, one of the first members of congress from Iowa and late chief justice of Nebraska, a man of rare ability and noted for his equitable rulings and lucid exposition of the law. His son, Richard Hall, is a prominent attorney of Omaha and at one time was a law partner of Senator Thurston. The education of Mrs. Shepherd was principally acquired in Batavia, N. Y. The children born of her marriage are named as follows: Augustus H., a resident of Ventura; Mrs. Myrtle Lloyd, of this city; Margaret, who has been her mother's assistant in the business; and Edith, wife of Fred Kelsey, of Ventura. Mr. Shepherd is a member of the Grand Army of the Republic. He entertains liberal religious views, regarding all denominations as equally worthy of consideration and assistance. As a Democrat he has been a delegate to numerous state and county conventions, and is ex-chairman of the county committee.

STEPHEN TOWNSEND. The roll call of the strong personalities who have contributed to the upbuilding of California would be incomplete without due mention of Stephen Townsend, at present one of the real estate men of Long Beach. As long ago as September 21, 1876, he came to what is now Pasadena (then a purely speculative proposition), and was one of the first to buy on the Lake Vineyard tract. His five acres were put under oranges and developed into a paying investment, and when the boom was instituted the property was diverted into other channels of activity, and in due time was platted under the name of the Townsend subdivision, and thus passed into the hands of home-seekers and builders. With unerring foresight he saw the future of Pasadena, and set about bringing within its borders the advantages which drew people from other localities. He obtained the first franchise in the city and organized and built the Pasadena street railway, of which he was president for five years. Later on he contracted for and built the Altadena Railroad and other street car lines, and his energy and enterprise brought about the grading and building up of Orange Grove avenue, the finest avenue in the city. He also built up the Pasadena Warehouse and Milling Company's plant, and operated the same for some time. In his effort to secure admirable municipal government he accepted the office of city trustee on the second board. His conservative judgment and enterprising plans for the general improvement were accepted and acted upon by a large contingent in the growing town, and his influence extended into various channels of development. Prior to coming to Long Beach he became identified with the Wakena Land Company, which bought eleven thousand acres of land in Tulare county, to the management of which he devoted himself for about six years.

Of English ancestry on both sides of his family, Mr. Townsend was born in Hamilton county, Ind., October 19, 1848, and is the oldest son in a family containing thirteen children, four of whom are living. One of his brothers, W. H. Townsend, is engaged in the real estate business in Los Angeles. His father, David, was born in Ohio, and in 1855 located in Cedar county, Iowa, near Iowa City, where he farmed and raised stock until 1876. He then removed to California and became a member of the Indiana Colony, now Pasadena, where he engaged in horticulture up to the time of his death. His wife, formerly Sidney Mandlin, was born in Ohio, and now, at the age of more than four score years, is living in Pasadena. After completing his education in the public schools and at the Iowa State University, Stephen Townsend began to farm on his own responsibility upon land purchased in Franklin county, where he lived for three years. He then returned to Cedar county and was similarly occupied for a couple of years, and in the fall of 1876 accompanied the rest of his family to the present site of Pasadena.

In 1895 Mr. Townsend became permanently associated with Long Beach, where he had bought twenty acres of land on the Anaheim road, adjoining the city limits, and one mile from the beach. The following year he started out in the real estate business and laid out subdivision block 14, and lots 1 and 24, as well as the Tutt tract, and the Townsend, Robinson & Co.'s tract of twenty-five acres on the Anaheim road. In time he contemplates the laying out of his original twenty acres on the Anaheim road. He is one of the organizers and directors of the Long Beach Improvement Company, and a member of the Long Beach Board of Trade. In 1901 he took as partners in the business Frank E. Robinson and B. P. Dayman, and has since conducted his affairs under the firm name of Townsend, Robinson & Co. This is one of the most substantial firms of the kind in this part of California, the high character and ability of the men comprising it giving assurance of continued real estate activity.

In the state of Iowa Mr. Townsend married Annie M. Carroll, a native of Indiana. They are the parents of two children. Vinton Ray Townsend is a graduate of the high school and is now attending the University of California, from which he will graduate in the class of 1903. Esther Bell Townsend, now Mrs. Dr. Cavert, of Los Angeles, is a graduate of the Los Angeles State Normal. Mr. Townsend is a member of the Fraternal Aid, and is active in the Methodist Episcopal Church, of which he is a member of the board of trustees and assistant superintendent of the Sunday school. His many sterling qualities have made him a notable acquisition to the localities which have profited by his enterprise, and he is especially honored in Long Beach, for the betterment of which he has labored so faithfully and well.

ROBERT STRONG. The mental and moral strength and fine business ability of Robert Strong have, for many years, been appreciated by the community of Pasadena. He came here in 1888, and has not only been extensively engaged in real estate, but has large interests in cement and oil, and has been foremost in promoting the general growth of the city. The remote forefathers from whom he is descended lived their useful lives in Scotland, and the family fortunes were shifted to the north of Ireland through the removal of the paternal great-grandfather to county Donegal. The family was established in America by the paternal grandfather, Robert, who was born in the north of Ireland, and settled in Albany, N. Y., where he was a merchant and assistant in the post-office. His son, Anthony M., the father of the present Robert, was born in Albany, and though his active life was devoted to the wholesale mercantile business in his native town, his later years were spent in Philadelphia, Pa., where he died at the age of eighty-two years. He was a member of the Presbyterian Church. In young manhood he married Sarah Jones, a native of Groton, Mass., and the granddaughter of the widow of Captain Davis, who fell at the head of his minute men at Concord Bridge in 1775. Her portrait, by Harding of Boston, made in 1840, when she was ninety-eight years old, is a striking picture of a woman of the Revolution. Mrs. Strong, who died in New York, was the mother of three sons and one daughter, of whom one son and one daughter are still living. Richard died during the Civil war as adjutant of the One Hundred and Seventy-seventh New York Volunteer Infantry; and Charles, who was a merchant in Albany, died in New York City.

Robert Strong was born November 20, 1836. He graduated from the Albany Academy in 1854, and from Princeton College in 1856, with the degree of A. B., his alma mater conferring upon him the degree of A. M. in 1859. In 1856 he entered the Albany Medical College with the intention of devoting his career to that profession, but at the end of a year changed his mind and entered the Princeton Theological Seminary, from which he was graduated in 1861 with third honors. He was ordained in Minneapolis and took charge of the Westminster Church in that city until the breaking down of his health in 1865. To regain his lost strength he returned to Albany, convinced that the ministry necessitated closer application than his health would permit. Hoping much from the climate of California he came here in 1872, and was so delighted with the prospects that he settled in Westminster, Orange county, where he purchased a half section of land, and engaged in farming and horticulture. He also started and maintained a nursery, and went into the extensive raising of fine stock. In connection with these varied interests he also preached for a short time, but was soon convinced of the futility of any additional work. He became prominent in the affairs of Westminster, and was appointed superintendent of the colony there assembled. He disposed of all the lands of the colony and entirely wound up the business of the owners.

In 1888 Mr. Strong allied his fortunes with Pasadena, and has since been in the real estate and notary business. In connection with his partner he laid out Madison square, comprising ten acres, and under the firm name of Farris & Strong accomplished much towards the improvement of the city. Since the death of Mr. Farris, March 24, 1902, he has continued in business alone, with every prospect of a future increase of business. He is a director in the California Portland Cement Company; the Pasadena Mutual Oil Company, operating on the Kern river; and in the Del Rey Oil Company. He is a member of the Alumni Association of Princeton, the Kappa Alpha Society, and of the Society of Pioneers of Los Angeles County. A Republican in political affiliation. Mr. Strong has never entered the arena of office seeking. As a member of the Presbytery of Los Angeles he served as clerk from the organization of the church in 1874 until his resignation in 1889.

The union of Mr. Strong and Villa Marquis occurred in Westminster, Orange county, Cal.

C. J. Daily

Mrs. Strong was born in Pennsylvania, and is a daughter of Rev. John Marquis, a clergyman in the Presbyterian Church. To Mr. and Mrs. Strong have been born two children: Archibald McClure, who is a graduate of the Leland Stanford University, class of 1899, and is now a mining engineer and United States deputy mineral surveyor at Independence, Cal.; and Robert Marquis, a prospective graduate of the class of 1903, of the University of the City of New York.

CHARLES J. DAILY. Although at present devoting his attention to the cultivation and improvement of the ranch that he recently purchased, comprising three hundred acres of valuable land, two miles northwest of Camarillo, to the majority of the residents of Ventura county Mr. Daily is best known through his work as manager of the Patterson ranch, which position he held for many years. This splendid ranch property, one-half mile north of Hueneme, lying on the sea between the Hueneme and Ventura road, is one of the best known and most finely developed country places in Southern California. Formerly the property of John D. Patterson, now of Geneva, N. Y., it was sold by him in 1900 to the Patterson Ranch Company, stockholders in the sugar beet company. The president is Robert Oxnard and the agent, Major T. A. Dreffill. In 1885 Mr. Daily was called to the position of manager and continued in that capacity until December 1, 1901, meantime having the entire management of the tract of five thousand and twenty-one acres. The land was originally a colonial grant. The continued cultivation of years has transformed its barrenness into unexcelled fertility and gratifying productiveness, the large crops of beets and beans making the ranch a profitable investment for its owners. On the property are three sets of ranch houses, one in the center, the others at either end of the tract, the finely furnished offices being in the former. The cultivation of the land is conducted upon a scale commensurate with the size of the tract, and it is an interesting scene to watch from the road the multitude of horses working in the fields, giving the appearance of a vast cavalry brigade, as they follow one another in teams of from four to eight horses.

A knowledge of agriculture and an appreciation of its possibilities are inherited by Mr. Daily, and this inheritance has been fostered by years of experience in the occupation. The Dailys are of Irish extraction. The great-grandfather, Thomas Daily, Sr., was born in county Tyrone, parish Gorton, and when a young man came to the United States, settling in Pennsylvania. For years he conducted a farm in Monroe county, N. Y., where he died at ninety-six years of age. The oldest child born of his marriage to Miss Wilcox was Arthur Daily, to whom belonged the distinction of being the first male child born in Rush township, Monroe county. He became a farmer and died in his native county when sixty-nine years of age. Originally a believer in Democratic principles, his views changed during the Civil war and thereafter he voted with the Republicans. He married Lorada Baker, who was born in New York and died in young womanhood, leaving two children, Charles W. and Elizabeth, the latter now deceased.

After having farmed for some years in New York, Charles W. Daily went to Kansas, where he suffered many hardships during the struggle between the abolitionists and pro-slavery element. For two and one-half years he served in Company L, Fiftieth New York Engineers, and at the close of the war was honorably discharged at Elmira, N. Y. Afterward he conducted a farm in Van Buren county, Mich., then returned to New York, later settled in Isabella county, Mich., and finally, after having once more gone back to New York, came to California in 1892, since which time he has made his home with his son, Charles J. He has two other sons in California, these being Erastus W. and W. P., who are ranchers at Springville. His wife, whom he married in New York, was Ruth F. Green, a native of Ohio.

Near Rochester, N. Y., Charles J. Daily was born February 7, 1859. At the age of thirteen he accompanied his parents to Michigan. In 1885 he came to California and has since made Ventura county his home. In 1891 he married Theresa Gisler, whose father, the late Max Arnold Gisler, was a pioneer of Ventura county. Born of this union are four children: Thomas, Lillian, Edna and Milton. In national politics Mr. Daily is a Republican. On the subject of ranching few are better posted than he, which fact was proved by his long retention as manager of the Patterson ranch, and his experience in raising beets and beans has given him a thorough knowledge of these two very important products.

SAMUEL STRATTON. The fact that Mr. Stratton has made Pasadena his home since 1882 entitles him to a position among the city's early settlers, as he has also been one of the most active and prominent developers of its real estate. By birth a Kentuckian and by descent connected with the F. F. V.'s, he is a son of Robinson and Nancy (Miles) Stratton, natives of Virginia and pioneers of Robinson county, Ky. In the latter county Samuel was born January 17, 1832, and there his father died three years later. The widowed mother, accompanied by her five children, removed to Illinois and settled in Macoupin county near Carlinville, where she remained until death. Of her family Samuel is the sole survivor. The educational advantages which even the poorest boy of to-day enjoys did not fall to his lot, for it was necessary that he should aid his mother in the support of the family at as early an age as possible. His time was given largely to the breaking of raw prairie land, for which ox-teams were used. In the winter months, when work on the farm was suspended, he was allowed to attend a pay school, held in a log building, destitute of all conveniences, and where the method of instruction was as crude as the text-books employed. His independence of spirit and energy are indicated by the fact that, when only fifteen years of age, he started a small store in Piasa, Ill., and this he continued, on a larger scale, until 1854, meanwhile also acting as deputy postmaster.

Believing that the west offered greater advantages than the east, Mr. Stratton determined to cast in his lot with the gold-seekers of the '50s. The year 1854 found him coming via Panama to San Francisco, and from there he went to the placer mines of Shasta county. Four years later he returned to Illinois via the Nicaragua route and New York. Taking up mercantile affairs again, he opened a store in Litchfield, Montgomery county, and later bought a farm near Litchfield, where he was one of the first in the county to take up the raising of fine Jersey cattle. For the purpose of securing the best breeds, in 1877 he went to the isle of Jersey and purchased about twenty full-blooded animals. After having for some years carried on a prosperous business, in 1882 he sold out and settled in Pasadena, buying ten acres on the southwest corner of Colorado and Moline streets and laying the land out in acre lots. His were the first acre lots that were sold in Pasadena. He also laid out twenty acres on Marengo avenue and California street, known as Webster & Stratton's subdivision; and two and one-half acres on the corner of Marengo avenue and Colorado street, known as Skillen & Stratton's subdivision. On this last-named corner he erected the first apartment houses ever built in Pasadena, and he also built an apartment house on Marengo avenue, both of which blocks he still owns. Another improvement was the building of business property on Colorado street. He assisted in organizing and became a director of the Pasadena Street Railway Company that built (on Colorado street) the first horse-car line in Pasadena. For some years he was a director in the Lake Vineyard Water Company. Though reared in the Democratic faith, his sympathies are strongly Republican. His first presidential vote was cast for Fillmore, and he has never failed to vote at each succeeding general election. Formerly he held office as a trustee of the Methodist Episcopal Church, to the work of which he has long been an earnest contributor.

The marriage of Mr. Stratton, in Macoupin county, Ill., united him with Miss Mary Webster, who was born in Jerseyville, that state, of Virginian and Maryland parentage. They are the parents of four children, namely: Samuel W., a graduate of the University of Illinois, and now at the head of the bureau of weights and measures in Washington, D. C.; Mrs. Olive Newcomb, of Pasadena, Matie, at home; and Mrs. Lucy Hobbs, of Chicago.

B. M. BLYTHE. Long Beach is fortunate in the possession of many citizens whose character and attainments would be a credit to any locality in the country, and among these none is more worthy the appreciation of a grateful community than is B. M. Blythe, a typical western man of affairs, at present engaged in the business of mining, real estate, loans and insurance, and a member of the firm of Lowe & Blythe.

As the name implies Mr. Blythe is of Scotch descent, and he was born in Graves county, Ky., September 4, 1855. The paternal great-grandfather was born in Glasgow, Scotland, and upon immigrating to the United States long before the Revolutionary war settled in Virginia, where he became a planter on a large scale. Here was born the paternal grandfather, Solomon Blythe, who also was a planter, and who lived and died in Virginia, from which native state he enlisted for service in the Colonial army of 1776. The father of B. M. Blythe, James T., was born in Virginia in 1823, and reared on the paternal plantation in Southampton county. No finer example could be found of the self-made man than the elder Blythe, who, when twenty-one years of age, started out on foot from Virginia and walked to Kentucky, where he had settled three of his uncles. His uncle Zack lived in Graves county, where he had accumulated large holdings, and he readily gave employment to his nephew for three years, at the rate of twenty-five cents a day. At the expiration of this service the younger man had evidently displayed many worthy qualities and shown himself adaptable and capable, for he was given two hundred acres of the plantation to work on shares, a distinct gain over the twenty-five cents a day limit. He was unusually successful at raising tobacco, and in time saved sufficient money to permit of an individual investment of farm land, which he turned to the best possible account and became one of the foremost planters in the county. Nor was he content to travel in the comparatively narrow groove of the planter, for he became interested in the mercantile business, and ran with equal success a saw and grist mill, besides raising large numbers of fine stock. A commendable ambition directed energies into the banking business in Kentucky, and he was not only a director in several banks, but was as well president of a number of institutions. In 1875 he removed with his family to Meridian, Tex., and engaged in the loan and banking business, and in 1887 located at Downey, Cal., where he organized the Los Nietos Valley Bank of Downey, of which he was president until his death, June 11, 1895. He was a broad, liberal minded man, and forcibly impressed all who associated with him in whatsoever capacity. Fraternally he was a Royal Arch Mason, and he took an active part in the political developments of his time. Through his marriage with Sarah A. Adair, a native of Graves county, Ky., and a daughter of John Adair, who was born in Ireland and came to Kentucky with his parents when a boy, later becoming a blacksmith there, thirteen children were born, eight of whom attained maturity: Martha J. is now Mrs. Sims, of Fresno; S. W. is president of the Los Nietos Valley Bank at Downey; John T. was killed October 4, 1900, by an engine in Fulton, Ky.; Oscar is a farmer in Fulton county, Ky.; Clinton lives in Long Beach; Lou is the wife of Mr. Thomas, of Redondo; and Virginia is now Mrs. Harper, of Long Beach. Mrs. Blythe died June 23, 1891.

The preliminary education of B. M. Blythe was acquired in the public schools of Graves county, Ky., and in 1874 he went to Meridian, Tex., his family following one year later. There he engaged in the mercantile business, and was also greatly interested in the cattle business. While in Meridian he became prominent in general affairs, and was deputy sheriff for a time, besides holding other offices of trust and responsibility. Upon locating with the family in Downey in 1887, he engaged in real-estate and loans for a couple of years, and when the famous Thomas H. Blythe case came up he went to San Francisco and pushed the matter for six years with his lawyers. After returning to Downey in 1894 he continued his former business in the real estate and loan markets, and was also a director of the Los Nietos Valley Bank at Downey. In June of 1901 he came to Long Beach to engage in the business of real-estate and loans, bringing with him a firmly established reputation for push and veracity and general enterprise, which was not slow in assimilating with the conditions of his adopted town. He is a leading influence and the vice-president of the Long Beach Improvement Company, which company purchased three hundred and thirty lots in Alameda, and he is a director in the Long Beach Savings Bank. His real-estate transactions are mostly in connection with his own property, and he owns many valuable holdings in the town and county.

In Norwalk, Cal., Mr. Blythe married Mary E. Merchant, a native of Texas, and daughter of Dr. W. T. Merchant. Dr. Merchant was a native of Alabama and a graduate physician, and a practitioner of Norwalk up to the time of his death. His wife, formerly Sarah McMullen, was also a native of Alabama. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Blythe, Vernon Merchant, Sarah Eskaleen, and Virginia Corinne. Mr. Blythe is prominent in fraternal circles, and is associated with the Independent Order Odd Fellows, the Independent Foresters, the Ancient Order United Workmen, the Maccabees, and the Woodmen of the World. He is a member of the board of trade, and has an enviable social and business standing in Long Beach.

EDGAR R. BRALEY. The pioneer bicycle establishment of Pasadena is owned and managed by Edgar R. Braley, who has been a resident of the city since 1887. He at first started a fruit business on the site of his present store, and in 1892 added thereto bicycles and supplies, as well as a repair department. So popular and remunerative was this combination of interests that recently the owner thereof purchased outright the ground, upon which he has erected a large building, 50x90 feet in dimensions. He at first carried only Crescent and Eagle wheels, but has since added to his stock the Tribune, Stearns, Eldridge and Echo makes, and also handles the Thomas Motorcycle and Waverley electric vehicles.

A native of Jasper county, Iowa, Mr. Braley was born at Kellogg February 24, 1867, and was educated at the public and private schools of his native town. His father, Carleton, was born in Vermont, the paternal grandfather, Joseph, having settled there at an early day. The grandfather was a farmer and builder, and the father a farmer during their active lives, and both were well and favorably known in Kellogg and vicinity. Carleton Braley married Eliza Ann Rice, a native of Vermont, and member of a well known New England family. Mrs. Braley died in Iowa, leaving nine children, five sons and four daughters, two of her children having died when young.

As the youngest son in his father's large family, Edgar R. Braley undertook to earn his own living when fifteen years of age, and found employment on a farm for a couple of years. He then clerked in a general store in Kellogg for three years, and in 1887 located in Pasadena, which has since been his home. He married in Newton, Iowa, Alice E. Estes, a native of Kansas, and of this union there have been born four children: Rex, Ruth and Ruby (twins) and Everett. Mr. Braley is a member and trustee of the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, and is also a Modern Woodman of the World. He is a Republican in political affiliation, but aside from the formality of casting his vote is not actively engaged in political undertakings. He has been very successful from a business standpoint, his enterprising methods and devotion to the best interests of his patrons ensuring a constantly increasing trade.

E. B. CUSHMAN. The various agencies which have tended to the development of Southern California since the beginning of the '80s have had an interested spectator in E. B. Cushman, one of the pioneer real-estate men of Long Beach, and the manipulator of land and property deals in different parts of the state. His initial experience in California life was acquired in 1882, when he located in Santa Ana, and served as deputy postmaster under his uncle, C. E. French. He then removed to Los Angeles and had charge of the registry department of the postoffice under Colonel Dunkleberger, and was thus employed during the great boom. A still later connection with government affairs was as mail agent between Los Angeles and Deming, N. M., a responsibility resigned in 1886, to engage in the real-estate business in Los Angeles. He was remarkably successful owing to the favorable conditions prevailing during the rush for property at that time, and among other undertakings handled the Long-street place. While in Los Angeles he established an office in Long Beach in 1886, and managed the affairs of both offices from his headquarters in the larger city. In 1896 he located permanently in Long Beach, and in connection with his other and general work has been the agent for several years of the Alamitos tract.

The youth of Mr. Cushman was centered in the city of Boston and vicinity, and he was born in Northampton, Mass., in 1854. A just pride of ancestry has been maintained by latter day members of the family, who recall with satisfaction that one of their number, Robert Cushman, was secretary of the Mayflower Company, and crossed the seas in the vessel of that name. In after years, when the supremacy of England began to be questioned by the colonists, the paternal great-grandfather, Cushman, left his plow and shouldered his weapons on the great battle fields of the Revolution. His son, Samuel, the paternal grandfather, was born in Maine, and became a country squire with broad acres and large possessions. Among the children whom he reared was I. S. Cushman, who became a clergyman of the Methodist Episcopal denomination, and belonged to the New England Conference. Like his grandfather, he was not wanting in patriotism, and when the occasion of the Civil war created a demand for courage and devotion he served as chaplain in the Thirty-third Massachusetts regiment, with the rank of captain. He saw much of the grim and relentless and fearful side of warfare, and from the exposure incurred during the service died in 1871.

His wife, formerly Sarah Elizabeth Baker, was born in Portland, Me., and comes of a prominent New England family. She is now a resident of Boston, and is the mother of four children, two of whom are living, E. B. being the only son.

At a comparatively early age Mr. Cushman embarked upon a business career in Boston, as clerk for C. F. Hovey & Co., for five years. In 1878 he removed to Yankton, S. D., near which he purchased a ranch on the Missouri river and began to raise stock. His stay in the north was unexpectedly terminated by the great freshet of 1880, which carried away his stock and demoralized his possessions. Thereafter he returned to Maine, and at North Anson married Helen Bunker, a native of that town, with whom he came to California in 1882, as heretofore stated. Mr. Cushman is a Republican and is a cousin of ex-Governor John A. Andrews, of Massachusetts, a sincere promoter of the principles of the party. Mr. Cushman has held some positions of trust here and in the east, and was deputy city clerk for one term of Long Beach. He is a member of the Board of Trade, and is fraternally associated with the Knights of the Maccabees and holds the rank of major of the Sons of Veterans, Division of California. He is a member of the Congregational Church. Mr. Cushman has rendered valuable service in the upbuilding of Long Beach, not only as an enterprising real-estate man, but as a citizen whom all are glad to honor.

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN COONS. In the capacity of agent of the Southern Pacific at Riverside, and also commercial agent on a number of the branch railroad lines of the fruit belt of this region, Mr. Coons has made many acquaintances in Southern California. He possesses marked executive ability and merits the high degree of esteem which is accorded him by the general public, as well as by his superior officials in the railroad service.

Mr. Coons is proud of the fact that he is one of California's native sons, and that his father was one of the "forty-niners" of the Pacific coast. The latter, George W., was born in Baltimore, Md., a son of George Coons, a merchant of that city, and a native of Germany. G. W. Coons also followed merchandising in his early manhood, and in 1849 crossed the plains by the Omaha, Humboldt and Nevada Pass route, and with ox-teams. At the end of a six months' trip he arrived in Sacramento, and, having built the first quartz mill in California, operated it for about a year. Then, going to San Francisco, he embarked in a mercantile business and in the spring of 1852 returned by the overland route for his wife and four children. Together they traversed the plains and located upon a ranch near Elk Grove, Cal. Not until 1853, however, did Mr. Coons cease his business operations in San Francisco, and thenceforth he gave his entire attention to farming. In the early years of his residence on the coast he experienced some strange vicissitudes, and as a member of a vigilance committee and in every possible manner supported law and order. For a number of years he was a justice of the peace in his county. When in his fiftieth year, in 1870, he passed to his eternal reward. He was survived by his widow, Mrs. Semphronia (Hamilton) Coons, who passed away in Sacramento in 1897. Of their thirteen children, ten lived to maturity and eight sons and a daughter are yet living, all being in the northern part of this state, with the exception of our subject. Mrs. Coons was a daughter of George H. Lanham, a Baltimore merchant. Both were natives of that city and came of a very prominent family of Maryland, of Scotch extraction.

Benjamin F. Coons was born in Sacramento, Cal., April 5, 1862, and lived upon a farm until 1880. In the mean time he received a liberal education in the common and high schools of Sacramento, and was graduated in the latter in June, 1880. On the following Monday he assumed the duties of a telegraph operator at Hot Springs, Nev., on the Central Pacific, for while at school he had become familiar with the business by devoting his spare time to mastering the craft. During the next four years he was agent and operator at different stations along the Central Pacific road in California and Nevada. As secretary of the committee having in charge the railroad exhibit for these two states at the World's Fair held in New Orleans, he spent seven months there. In 1886 Mr. Coons married Miss Jennie Taylor, at Roseville, Cal. Born in St. Louis, Mo., she accompanied her parents to California when five years of age, and was educated in San Francisco. The couple have two promising sons, namely: Ernest Alvin and Wallace A. B.

Returning to the employ of the Central Pacific, Mr. Coons was stationed as an agent at Elk Grove, Cal., from the time when he completed his duties in the Crescent City, in the spring of 1885, until 1888, when he was installed as agent at Wheatland. His residence in that place extended over a period of nine years, and from 1897 to May 30, 1900, he was located at Covina, Cal., being the commercial agent of the line between Pomona and Bassett. Since the date given he has been the Southern Pacific's agent at Riverside and also has been its commercial agent between Banning and Pomona. In his territory there are fifty miles of the main road, seven miles of the Colton branch, four miles of the Redlands branch, three miles of the San Bernardino road, and nine miles of the Chino loop. With railroad men he is very popular, and is a member of the Traveling Passengers Railroad Agents Association of the United States. While with him business and the interests of his employers ever are paramount, Mr. Coons is and always has been very fond of athletic sports. At Wheatland he was president of a tennis club and was vice-president of a gun club; at Covina was one of the organizers and later was chairman of the Country Club's house committee; was president of the Covina Tennis Club, and vice-president of the Gun Club. At Covina he was initiated into Masonry, and now belongs to Evergreen Lodge. Besides, he is past president of the Native Sons of Golden West, is sir leading knight of the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks and is connected with the Roubidoux Club. Though surrounded with Democratic influences in his youth, he was independent and at length identified himself strongly with the Republicans.

JESSE DRISKILL, one of the foremost contractors and builders of Long Beach, was born in Bond county, Ill., September 30, 1850, and comes of an ancestry intimately connected with the history of Scotland. The emigrating ancestor was the paternal great-grandfather, who was born in Scotland and removed to the north of Ireland, from where he embarked for the United States. He settled in North Carolina, and served during the Revolutionary war under Gen. Francis Marian. The paternal grandfather, Jesse, was born in North Carolina, and served with distinction in the war of 1812, at which time he was under command of General Jackson at the battle of New Orleans. William Driskill, the father of the present Jesse, was born near Fayetteville in middle Tennessee, and settled in Bond county, Ill., about 1830. He was a farmer during his active life, and died in Illinois at the age of forty years. His wife, formerly Mary Cruthis, was a native of Bond county, and a daughter of John Cruthis, born in North Carolina, and one of the first settlers of Tennessee. He removed to Bond county, Ill., about 1824, and farmed for the remainder of his days. He was a Quaker in religious belief. In his young manhood he married Milberry Redfearn, who was of Scotch descent, and whose father, Isaac, served during the Revolutionary war under General Marian. Mrs. Driskill, who died in Illinois, became the mother of two children, and of these John is a resident of Bond county, Ill.

Until his seventeenth year Mr. Driskill lived on the paternal farm in Bond county, Ill., and attended the public schools, supplemented by training at McKendree College, Lebanon, Ill. He then engaged in farming with his brother in Bond county, but from his earliest years showed a special aptitude for things mechanical, and especially carpentering, and when twenty-four years of age gave up farming to learn to be a builder. He afterwards built and contracted in Bond county, and while there attained to some political prominence, filling among other offices that of justice of the peace for four years. Later he started out as a traveling salesman for a St. Louis house, and was successful in the sale of agricultural implements, heavy hardware and blacksmith supplies, throughout the south and southwest. At the end of three years of journeying he came west to California, and was made superintendent of the building of the Hotel Coronado at San Diego. Upon the completion of the now famous house in 1887 he continued to build in San Diego until after the boom, and then went to Calamali, Cal., and superintended the erection of the quartz mills at that place. Nine months later he went to Tacoma, Wash., where he put up the large school building and other constructions of importance, remaining in the Washington city between 1889 and 1895. Following this he spent two years working at his trade in Los Angeles, and in October of 1897 located at Long Beach, where he has since had all the work he could attend to. He built the fine new high school and many public buildings and residences, but of late has turned his attention almost exclusively to street contract work, and has probably done more cement work than any other one man in the town.

In Jefferson City, Mo., Mr. Driskill married Ida Holbrook, a native of Bond county, Ill. Of this marriage one child was born, William L. Mr. Driskill is a Democrat in political affiliation, and while living in Washington served as justice of the peace and police magistrate. He is a member of the Board of Trade, and is fraternally associated with the Masons, and belonged to the Sumner (Wash.) Lodge No. 70, F. & A. M. He is also a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen and the Eastern Star.

G. H. CARDER, M. D. One of the members of the medical profession in Pasadena is Dr. G. H. Carder, who is not only a disciple of homeopathy, but also an artist of more than ordinary skill. He was born in Kalamazoo, Mich., February 2, 1852, and was educated in the public schools, graduating from the high school and the commercial college. His natural inclination was towards a life devoted exclusively to art, but in the following of this plan he met with decided objections from his father, who put him to learning the upholsterer's trade. E. A. Carder, the father of G. H., was born in Connecticut, and was a furniture manufacturer in Kalamazoo, Mich., in later years doing business also in Jackson and Grand Rapids. He died in Kalamazoo in August, 1901, at the age of eighty-two years. His wife, formerly Sarah A. Green, a native of England, survived him but four months, her death occurring in November, 1901. There were five children in the family, two sons and three daughters, of whom G. H. Carder was the third oldest.

After learning his trade Mr. Carder established an upholstery business, yet so much did he regret his absence of art chances that he hired a basement in Kalamazoo and put in a supply of clay and marble with which to prosecute his art work. Although otherwise employed during the day, he modeled and studied far into the night, and often until two or three o'clock in the morning, and in this way made great headway with a foundation upon which to base his future exertions. In the mean time he had decided to study medicine under Dr. Charles Adams, of Chicago, and eventually graduated from the Homeopathic Medical College in 1882. He began practicing in Chicago, and at the same time lectured on obstetrics for a couple of years in the National Medical College. In connection with a large obstetrical practice, he worked up a large patronage as an oculist, with offices on the corner of State and Washington streets, and would doubtless have still been a member of the profession in Chicago had not ill health in his family rendered a change of climate imperative.

In February of 1900 Dr. Carder came to California and located on a ranch in La Canada, but by the following December had decided that ranching was not his forte, and so returned to his profession, and is now located in Pasadena, with an office in Masonic Temple. He was married in South Bend, Ind., to Elizabeth B. Roberts, a native of that place, and of this union there is one child, Robert H. Dr. Carder is a member of the Illinois Medical Society, and he is fraternally associated with the Auburn Park Lodge of Masons, at Chicago, in which city he joined the chapter. He was formerly a Knight of Pythias. In political affiliation he is a Republican. Mrs. Carder is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. During all his practice Dr. Carder has maintained his interest in art, and from sculpture has branched out into painting, many admirable canvases having developed under his brush.

WILLIAM BRYANT. The early experiences of Mr. Bryant in California were not such as to give him rose-tinted views of the opportunities offered by the state, but since he came to Gardena he has been far more fortunate than before, and has not only retrieved past losses, but has also established himself upon a solid financial basis. He is a native of Ohio, born in Belmont county, February 16, 1849, and his parents, John and Mary (Van Dellan) Bryant, were also born in that state. In 1877 the family removed to Kansas and settled near Geneseo, Rice county, where the parents still make their home. Of their fifteen children nine attained mature years, William being fourth in order of birth.

On coming to California, after having gained a thorough knowledge of the fruit business in the east, he settled in Los Angeles county, making an investment in five acres. However, the depreciation in the value of the property and the impossibility of successfully conducting a fruit-raising business thereon, forced him to sell the place at a great sacrifice, and when he came to Gardena in 1891 he was without means. Wishing to thoroughly investigate local conditions before purchasing property, he rented a five-acre place for five years, with the privilege of buying in the mean time if he so desired. So satisfactory was his study of the soil and the results of his early efforts thereon, that at the expiration of two years he became the owner. He erected a neat house and made other improvements that enhance the value of the property. Two acres are under cultivation to Logan berries, and two are in blackberries, while eight acres of leased land are in alfalfa. The cozy home is presided over by Mrs. Bryant, who was formerly Miss Kittie Thompson, of Nebraska.

In addition to the raising of berries, Mr. Bryant is much interested in the dairy business, and now has a herd of fourteen milch cows, comprising Jersey, Holstein and Durham breeds. This industry he has found to be a profitable occupation, netting him an appreciated addition to his income. In politics he is a Republican, while in religion he is a believer in the doctrines of the Society of Friends.

HON. ROBERT M. CLARKE. The efficient services rendered by Mr. Clarke as member of the state assembly from Ventura county are especially worthy of recognition, inasmuch as he is the youngest member of that body and is gaining his first experience in statesmanship. Prior to his election he had engaged in the practice of law in Santa Paula and it is his plan, on the expiration of his official term as legislator, to resume professional labors in his home town. As one of the native-born sons of Ventura county (where his birth occurred in 1879), his rise into prominence is a source of gratification to the people among whom he has always made his home.

On the completion of his high-school education Mr. Clarke began to study law in Santa Paula, later going to Los Angeles, where he continued his readings. April 10, 1900, he was admitted to the bar before the Los Angeles supreme court, and at the same time began the practice of his profession in Santa Paula. For a time he was associated with George E. Farland, the partnership continuing until Mr. Farland was made county clerk. On the Republican ticket, in the fall of 1900, Mr. Clarke was elected to the assembly, and it was a source of gratification to his friends that he ran ahead of the ticket. In the assembly he is a member of the judiciary committee, the committee for the revision of the code, and the committee on highway and military affairs. In local matters he maintains an interest, and whatever makes for the progress of Santa Paula or the development of the resources of Ventura county is sure of his appreciation and support. In any work for the upbuilding of the community he is always ready to assist.

During 1900, the year of his admission to the bar, Mr. Clarke established domestic ties, and was united in marriage with Edna M., daughter of J. R. Thurmond, a pioneer of the Carpinteria valley. In the Santa Paula Parlor of Native Sons he has officiated as president, and he is also actively connected with the Masonic Order.

FRANK D. BISHOP, M. D., one of the most successful medical practitioners of Long Beach, was born in Charlestown, Portage county, Ohio, January 22, 1856, a son of O. D. and Mary A. (Brown) Bishop, natives respectively of Charlestown and Toronto, Ontario. The mother, who is now living in Ohio, is a daughter of Amos Brown, who was born in England, and upon immigrating to this country settled first in Toronto, and afterwards in New York state, where his death occurred. The paternal grandfather, David Bishop, was of Scotch-English descent, and, though born in Connecticut, was one of the very early settlers of Charlestown, Ohio. His son, O. D. Bishop, the father of Frank D., was a farmer during his active life, and died in Ohio in 1899.

The oldest in a family of five children, Frank D. Bishop was reared on the paternal farm in Ohio, and graduated from the high school in Ravenna. His first business venture was as a hotel man, and in this capacity he managed the St. Cloud Hotel, in Canton, Ohio, for about eight years. In the mean time he had become interested in medicine and surgery, and having decided to devote his future energies to this branch of science, began to study under the capable instruction of Dr. K. B. Waite, of Cleveland. He then entered the University of Medicine and Surgery at Cleveland, and after graduating therefrom began to practice in Cañon City, Colo. Not realizing his expectations in the Colorado town, he returned to Ohio and practiced medicine in Windham, Portage county, for a couple of years, going then to Harriman, Tenn., where he remained for two years. Owing to the uncertain state of his wife's health, he was obliged to make frequent changes in location, and eventually took up his residence in the salubrious climate of Albuquerque, N. M., where he worked up a large and satisfactory practice. While in the Mexican city he was medical director of the government Indian School at Albuquerque, and was also appointed to the board of territorial medical examiners by Governor Otero. Both of these positions he resigned upon coming to California in 1899, and in June of 1900 located at Long Beach, where he has since conducted a medical and surgical practice.

In Cleveland, Ohio, Dr. Bishop married Manon Spaulding, who was born in Spafford, N. Y., and was educated at Hillsdale College. Mrs. Bishop is also a graduate of the Cleveland Homeopathic Hospital College, and assists her husband in his large and lucrative practice. Three children have been born to Dr. and Mrs. Bishop, Ruth, Francene and Winfred. The doctor is a Republican in national politics, and is fraternally associated with the Independent Order of Good Templars. He is medical examiner for the Pacific Mutual and Phoenix Insurance Companies and Order of Pendo. He is now a member of the Southern California Homeopathic Medical Society, and was formerly associated with the medical societies of Ohio, Tennessee and New Mexico. In the Methodist Episcopal Church, of which he is a member, he is serving as steward.

FRIDOLIN HARTMAN. The association of Mr. Hartman with Ventura began in 1873, at which time the predominating element consisted of a small Spanish population, who faithfully observed the customs of the mother country. Prosperity reigned from a Spanish standpoint. Churches were wealthy and good fellowship prevailed throughout the surrounding country. Beyond the settlement stretched the mustard fields, with latent fertility as yet unsuspected. Sheep trails wound in and out, which are now roads in common use. No spectator has watched modern development with more interest than Mr. Hartman, and none has established a more honorable place for himself in the community by which he is environed.

A native of Bavaria, Mr. Hartman was born February 2, 1844, his parents being August and Theresa (Koll) Hartman, natives of Bavaria, and residents of Germany during their entire lives. The father was a hotel and commercial man, and lived to be eighty-seven years old, but the mother died in middle age. Of their large family, nine children are living, Fridolin being the youngest and the only one to settle in America. He received a common-school education and when young learned the brewing business, being for four years in the employ of Smith Brothers. Later he traveled in Austria and France, in which latter country he entered the employ of a large brewing concern. In 1870, owing to the declaration of hostilities which culminated in the loss of Alsace and Lorraine to the French, he found it dangerous to remain in France, but was unable to get to his native land; accordingly he boarded a ship bound for America, and arrived in New York in August of 1870.

Going at once to St. Louis, Mo., he was employed there by the Phoenix brewery (Christian Staley, proprietor) until April of 1871. The persuasions of a former acquaintance in Germany, Joseph Dilger, induced him to come to California, and he worked with Mr. Dilger in the City brewery of Sacramento until 1873. Following this he spent several months in San Francisco. Acting on the suggestion of a San Francisco firm, he came to Ventura in April of 1873. For about one year he managed the Ventura brewery for other parties, after which he purchased the plant. For a time business was conducted in a wooden shanty, but this he was enabled to replace for a more pretentious structure and continued prosperity repaid his efforts during the years that followed. The absence of railroads brought him a large country trade, but when these were built through the county and when large breweries were established in Los Angeles and San Francisco, the smaller concern proved unprofitable, and in 1898 was closed.

Years ago Mr. Hartman was elected to the Ventura city council and held the office until his election as a member of the board of supervisors of Ventura county, which he held for three terms. In 1884 he was elected supervisor of the first district and has held the same continuously since, with the exception of four years when he was town trustee. His present term as supervisor will expire in 1904.

The marriage of Mr. Hartman and Katie Kaufman occurred in Ventura in 1874. Mrs. Hartman is a daughter of Michael and Mary Kaufman, and was born in Minnesota, to which state her parents had removed at an early day, and where they resided during the Indian massacre. To Mr. and Mrs. Hartman have been born sixteen children: Ludwig, Theresa, Fridolin, Katie, Karl, Anna, George, Rose, Lena, Fannie, Willie, Henry August, Nellie, Chester, Ralph and Walter. Two, Rose and Henry August, are deceased.

ROBERT B. LYON. One of the most delightful pleasure resorts in Ventura county is that owned and managed by Mrs. Gertrude Lyon at Matilija. When taken possession of in 1871 the Cliff Glen Mineral Springs was an unimproved and discouraging looking squatter's claim, with but one man in the neighborhood to relieve the monotony of desolation. But the squatter's claim had latent possibilities ready to expand under the touch of enterprise and industry, and there has since been developed all those exhilarating and charming surroundings which enticingly beckon to all in search of a change of environment, or in need of physical and mental relaxation. Hither gather many guests during the season, impelled by the transparent air, the advantages of bathing and fishing, the excellent viands provided for her guests by mine hostess, and the general prevailing air of courtesy, geniality and jolly good fellowship. Placidly taking its way through the grounds is the Ventura river, with its clear, limpid depths, and numerous members of the finny tribe, and this trout stream flowing through the canyon has more than anything else made possible the improvements so fully appreciated to-day. The buildings for guests and horses are modern and conveniently constructed, and there are tents on the banks of the river, and splendid camping grounds. The enterprise which has built up the resort has also looked well after the surrounding roads. The springs in the canyon are located a mile from Mitilija postoffice, eighteen miles from Ventura, seven miles from Nordhoff, the nearest railroad point, and forty miles from Santa Barbara. The genial hostess of this ideal retreat has abundant cause for gratitude that her lines have fallen in such pleasant places, that her efforts are so well appreciated, and that those who seek immunity from care in the unchanging smile of nature, are glad to do so under her competent guidance and unremitting care.

The squatter's claim, so well transformed, was purchased in 1871 by Robert Lyon, who was born in New York City in 1836. Ill health drove him to this lovely spot in the mountains every summer, but he did not open it to the public until 1887, a short time before his death. He was a noble, brave man of whom his children, wife and friends alike were proud.

W. W. BROUGHTON. Splendid in conception and stupendous in execution has been the accomplishment par excellence of W. W. Broughton. For in the estimation of any who would faithfully chronicle the deeds of the pioneers of Santa Barbara county, no more large minded project than the founding of the Lompoc colony has animated the enthusiasm of any settler, however great his loyalty, or his faith in the possibilities of his adopted part of the world. While Mr. Broughton has many claims to distinction, the fact seems clearly defined, that when his reputation as a lawyer, publisher and journalist has faded in the light of subsequent events, his name will be recalled indefinitely by those who have profited by his farsightedness, clear reasoning power, and practical common sense, in directing them to the scene of their unending harvests, and their peaceful homes in an ideal locality.

The youth of Mr. Broughton was spent in his native town of Tonawanda, Erie county, N. Y., where he was born July 29, 1836. His preliminary law experience was gained in the office of W. W. Thayer, since governor of Oregon, and also judge on the supreme court bench of that state. After coming to California in 1859 he combined the practice of his profession with newspaper work, and among the different papers which have been founded, edited and published by him may be mentioned the Santa Cruz Enterprise, started in 1874, and now merged into the Santa Cruz Surf; the New Age, which first saw the light in 1865, a San Francisco periodical now in its thirty-sixth year, and which was the first Odd Fellows' weekly paper published in the United States; and the Lompoc Record, founded in 1875, and at present continuing the success to which it is by reason of long years accustomed.

In 1870 Mr. Broughton conceived the idea of colonizing the Lompoc valley, and in furtherance of his desire visited Colonel Hollister, one of the owners of the Lompoc rancho of forty-six thousand acres. The grand old pioneer thought well of the plan proposed by Mr. Broughton, and negotiations were at once instituted for the consummation of the same. In the meantime the Record was doing a large business in placing before the public the merits of the valley, and the interest in the colonization became widespread. The Lompoc colony lands embrace all the territory of the Lompoc and Mission Vieja de la Purisima ranchos, and the title is by United States patent. The lands border for seven miles on the Pacific ocean and extend back from the coast about twelve miles. The original Lompoc rancho containing 38,335.78 acres of land, was granted by the Mexican government to José Antonio Carrillo, April 15, 1837, and the Mission Vieja, containing four thousand four hundred and forty acres, was granted to Joaquin and José Antonio Carrillo, November 26, 1845. Carrillo sold the land to the More brothers, they sold to the Hollisters, Diblees and Cooper, who in turn disposed of it to a stock company negotiating for the colonies. The main valley consists of thirteen thousand acres, and the Santa Ynez river runs westerly through the ranchos, for twelve miles forming their northern boundary.

The name Lompoc is from the Indian, meaning lagoon, or little lake. The price paid for the colony lands was $500,000, payable in ten annual installments, and the capital stock was divided into one hundred shares of $5,000 each. In the deed was placed an iron-clad clause providing against the manufacture or sale, upon the lands of the colony, of any intoxicating beverage. The land was surveyed, and divided into tracts of five, ten, twenty, forty, and eighty acres, and a mile square was reserved for the town site near the center of the valley. November 9, 1874, occurred the auction sale of the lots, amounting to more than $700,000 for city and farm tracts, about thirty-five thousand acres remaining unsold, for which the former owners offered $270,000. Soon building operations were begun, and within an incredibly short time nearly a hundred families were occupying their new homes. By 1875 the town of Lompoc bore many evidences of enterprise, supporting besides the Record, a physician, a justice and a notary. From time to time much difficulty was experienced holding to the original resolutions regarding prohibition, and eventually the community yielded to high license. Owing to its high moral character, an unusually large number of people have been attracted to the Lompoc region, and this, added to the manifold natural advantages of rich alluvial soil, and the possibility of raising the most diversified crops, has converted this part of Santa Barbara county into an ideal residence section. The flood water of the Santa Ynez river will in the near future be utilized for irrigation purposes. It is needless to say that the work connected with the carrying out of so large a scheme was stupendous, and the fact that Mr. Broughton was the vital force, and the guiding hand at the helm, place him in the position of being one of the greatest benefactors that the county of Santa Barbara has known. An active Democrat, he has filled almost every position of trust within the gift of the people of his town. He is now serving his third term as supervisor, and has been chairman of the board. He is also president of the town council of Lompoc, with which he has been connected since the incorporation.

The marriage of Mr. Broughton and Amanda Elizabeth Anthony occurred in 1862, Mrs. Broughton being the only daughter of George T. Anthony, a well-known citizen of Santa Cruz. The Anthony family comes from New England and has many Quakers among its members. They have ever exerted a strong moral influence in the communities with which they have been connected; one of their members, Charles V. Anthony, is at present a retired clergyman, residing in San Francisco. Mrs. Broughton was born in Fort Wayne, Ind., in 1848, and is the mother of seven sons and five daughters, of whom three daughters and five sons are now living.

OTHO M. JONES. The business career of Otho M. Jones has been so closely identified with that of his father, Hon. A. H. Jones, that a résumé of the mercantile experiences of the latter must of necessity shed considerable light upon the success of the former. Few more interesting personalities have invaded the commercial ranks of Long Beach than that of the Hon. A. H. Jones, who was born in Asheville, N. C., and came of a prominent old Virginia family. His first impressions of life were gained on the farm of his father, George Jones, a large land owner, and afterward he embarked upon a mercantile enterprise in Hendersonville, Henderson county, N. C. Although of southern birth his sympathies were entirely on the side of the Union, and when the strife between the north and south culminated in the declaration of war, his one thought was to reach the Union lines. This proved a hazardous undertaking to say the least, and after an exciting trip, interspersed with many adventures and hardships, he was captured in Tennessee and imprisoned in Richmond, Va. Through the exercise of strategy he was enabled to escape in 1862, and once through the Confederate lines he remained in the north until the restoration of peace. In the meantime his wife and boys remained on the southern farm at the mercy of the injustice of the Confederacy, and suffering great deprivations. Needless to say that his return was hailed with delight. Almost immediately Mr. Jones embarked upon a journalistic venture in Hendersonville, publishing the Pioneer of that town, the same being later removed to Asheville. In the meantime he was a member of the state constitutional convention, and helped to frame the laws, and in 1868 was elected a member of congress from his district, and re-elected in 1870. At the termination of his service in congress he engaged in the hotel business in Washington, D. C., and afterwards engaged in farming in Prince George county, Md. Upon returning to Asheville, N. C., he engaged in the mercantile business for eight years, and as before took a leading part in the conduct of town affairs.

With the opening of the Oklahoma strip in 1889, Mr. Jones availed himself of the remarkable opportunity and bought a claim near Norman and engaged in farming and stock-raising. He also became interested in the mercantile business and bought the ground and built two store buildings and laid in a fine stock of groceries. His business was conducted in partnership with his son, Otho M., the firm name being Jones & Son. Mr. Jones remained in Oklahoma until 1897, when he came to Long Beach and bought the corner lot upon which was erected the Jones building, and which is thirty-two by fifty-two feet in ground dimensions and two stories high. Here he started the large mercantile business which is now managed and owned by his son, and in which he was vitally interested up to the time of his death, January 29, 1901. He was a staunch Republican, and was a member of the old-time Methodist Episcopal Church. In Hendersonville, N. C., he married Sarah D. Brittain, a native of North Carolina, and a daughter of William Brittain, a farmer in that state. Mrs. Jones, who survives her husband, is the mother of five children, four of whom are living, Otho M. being the youngest. Two daughters are living in North Carolina, and the other son, Thaddeus W., has distinguished himself in the United States army, of which he is still a member. He is a graduate of West Point, on the Hudson, and during the Spanish-American war began to serve with the rank of major, and for meritorious conduct at the battle of Santiago was appointed to the rank of lieutenant-colonel of a regiment of United States Volunteer Infantry.

Otho M. Jones was born January 5, 1850, and was educated in the public schools and spent two years at the East Tennessee University, now the Grant University, at Athens, Tenn. He then discontinued further study to engage in business with his father, and has ever since been a member of the firm of Jones, Son & Co. Since the death of the elder man he has had entire control of the large business, and he is among the foremost substantial men of Long Beach. He is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and like his father is affiliated with the Republican party.

JEROME CALVIN WILSON. In addition to his business interests in Santa Barbara, Mr. Wilson is associated with oil enterprises in the Summerland district, where he began to put down wells in December, 1894, and has since become the owner of eighty wells in the same locality, besides owning the water right and the water system there. His Santa Barbara interests include the ownership of the Olympic stables, opposite the Arlington hotel, and the Blackhawk stables, corner of Cota and Chapala streets, in both of which he conducts a large livery, feed and sale business.

The Wilson family comes from Scotch ancestry. David Wilson was a native of the north of Ireland, whither his ancestors had fled to escape religious persecution. He came to America on an English man-of-war and settled at Londonderry, N. H., later being a pioneer farmer of St. Johnsbury, Vt., where he died at a great age. In religion he was of the forceful Scotch Presbyterian type. His son, James, a native of Vermont, and a soldier in the war of 1812, engaged in farming until his death at Sutton, Caledonia county, Vt., at eighty years. Next in line of descent was Calvin Wilson, a native of Vermont, and for fifty years a resident on the same farm, but since 1888 making his home with his son in Santa Barbara. Elizabeth, wife of Calvin Wilson, was born in Glover, Vt., and died in Santa Barbara, Cal., May 13, 1901, when almost eighty years of age. Her father, Lindon French, was a native and farmer of Kirby, Vt., and of English descent. He married a member of the old Massachusetts family of Howards.

The family of Calvin and Elizabeth Wilson consisted of ten children, eight of whom are living, namely: Jerome C.; Charles Austin, of Santa Barbara; Henry, who is in San Francisco; James W., who has a livery business in Santa Barbara; Mrs. Elvira Bessil, also of this city; Mrs. Lilla Russell, of Los Angeles; Alonzo R., a farmer living in Hollis, N. H.; and Mrs. Rosette Rice, who lives near the old homestead in Vermont. Jerome Calvin Wilson was born in Caledonia county, Vt., April 20, 1849, and received his education in the Sutton grammar and high schools. Going to Boston in 1869, he became interested in a mercantile business, and remained in that city until he came to California in 1885. For a year he carried on a restaurant business in San Francisco, and in 1886 came to Santa Barbara. Soon after his arrival he rented a lot on the corner of Cota and Chapala streets. On the lot stood an old shed, and in this he began a livery business. A year later he bought the lot and has since purchased adjoining property and removed the old buildings, erecting in their place a two-story stable of larger dimensions on Cota and Chapala streets. In the raising of standard-bred horses he is meeting with some success, and now owns, among others, Maggie E., record 2:17. He is the owner of a farm of seven hundred and fifty acres in the San Fernando valley, two and one-half miles from Pacomia, on the Southern Pacific road. Of this tract three hundred acres are in barley, one hundred and eighty in apricots, producing a crop valued at $20,000 annually, one hundred and eighty acres in peaches, producing fine crops, and ninety acres in olives. In addition to this place he owns other tracts of farm land in the county, besides his various holdings in Santa Barbara city and county. He is a member of the now well-known Guarantee Oil and Refining Company of Beaumont, Tex.

Politically Mr. Wilson is a Republican. He is a charter member both of the Knights of Pythias and the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, and is actively connected with the Odd Fellows. He was made a Mason in Lodge No. 242, A. F. & A. M., and is now also connected with Chapter No. 51, R. A. M., St. Omar Commandery No. 30, K. T., Al Malakiah Temple, N. M. S., and Bruce Consistory of Los Angeles. He is a charter member of the Santa Barbara Chamber of Commerce. His marriage took place in this city May 6, 1890, and united him with Miss Lillie Renwick, who came to California with her father, John Renwick, now of Lompoc. The two children of Mr. and Mrs. Wilson are named Roy and Ruth.

CHARLES B. McCAY. The vast grain and stock-raising possibilities of Ventura county have been utilized by Charles B. McCay, who has been a resident of California since November, 1873, and is accounted one of the authorities on stock and agriculture in this part of the state. He was born in Steubenville, Jefferson county, Ohio, in 1848, a son of Joseph and Fannie (Day) McCay, the former a native of Pennsylvania, and for many years well known as one of the experienced Ohio river men. The parents died in Ohio, where their son, Charles B., received a common-school education and in comparatively early life acquired a fair knowledge of general business. Upon removing to California he lived for twelve years in Hueneme, where he became identified with building and mercantile interests, and, as the second meat-marketman, built the first store of any size in the town.

At the present time Mr. McCay has a ranch of five thousand acres, called Canada Verda, and located thirty-two miles east of Ventura. Upon its broad and fertile meadows graze nine hundred head of cattle and horses, and some of the finest of their kind are the result of the methods of breeding here adopted. An additional responsibility was assumed by Mr. McCay in 1888, at which time he took charge of the ranch of the Simi Land and Water Company, which, at the time, contained ninety-six thousand acres, and of which Senator Bard was president. The present holder of the position is Dr. Cochran, of Los Angeles, and the land has been disposed of until but eight thousand acres remain, over which Mr. McCay has still entire management. The staple crop is wheat and barley, and there are still three thousand acres of tillable land for sale. For the accommodation of travelers, the Simi hotel has been erected at the east end of the valley, and here are housed Mr. McCay and family. The railroad station is also on the premises.

While living in Ohio, in 1872, Mr. McCay married Lizzie B. Garrett, a native of Pennsylvania, and of this union there are two children. Henry is a graduate of the Los Angeles Business College and is interested in the iron works at Bakersfield. Nellie is also a graduate of the Los Angeles Business College, and is living at home. Mr. McCay is a Republican in national politics, and cast his first presidential vote for Rutherford B. Hayes.

WESLEY L. STEVENS. When looking around for a suitable location, in 1893, Mr. Stevens visited Long Beach, which was then a small town with scarcely five hundred people. Finding the climate equable and delightful he determined to establish his home here and accordingly purchased the hardware business of L. A. Bailey. Since then he has continued the business at the same site and in the same building, the latter being 25x100 feet in dimensions and two stories in height, and standing on the corner of Second and Pine streets. Through the admission of his son, Spencer R., as a partner, in 1898, the firm title became W. L. Stevens & Son.

Near Meadowgap, Huntingdon county, Pa.,

W. L. Stevens was born December 25, 1842, the thirteenth child and youngest son of Benedict Stevens. His grandfather, Benedict, Sr., was a son of a Vermonter who settled in Huntingdon county, Pa., and who was of Scotch-Irish descent. In the parental family there were fifteen children, all but two of whom attained mature years, and seven are living. Those in California are Wesley L., Frank D. and Mrs. Rebecca J. Weight, of Pasadena. Five of the sons served in the Civil war, F. D. being in the Twelfth Pennsylvania Reserves; William H., chaplain of the One Hundred and Forty-eighth Pennsylvania Infantry; B. T. in the Twenty-second Pennsylvania Cavalry; David W., who was killed in the battle of the Wilderness, served in the Twelfth Pennsylvania Reserves; and Wesley L. was at the front during much of the war.

When the first call came for volunteers, in 1861, Wesley L. Stevens enlisted for three months, but found the quota filled. September 8 of the same year he volunteered in Company B, One Hundred and Tenth Pennsylvania Infantry, and was mustered in for three years at Camp Crossman. However, after the battle of Winchester he became seriously ill and was confined in the hospital for some time, after which he received an honorable discharge July 17, 1862, by reason of physical disability. For some months he remained at home recuperating and as soon as his health was regained he again offered his services to the Union. June 16, 1863, his name was enrolled in Company A, Twenty-second Pennsylvania Cavalry, and he served in the Shenandoah valley until he was honorably discharged at Harrisburg, February 5, 1864. His final enlistment took place August 29, 1864, when he was mustered into Company K, Two Hundred and Second Pennsylvania Infantry, at Harrisburg, after which he was sent to the Shenandoah and served on detached duty, finally being mustered out at Harrisburg August 3, 1865, by reason of the special order discharging all soldiers at the close of the war. During his service with the Twenty-second he took part in a number of cavalry dashes and saw considerable hard fighting.

Soon after the close of the war Mr. Stevens entered the Iron City College at Pittsburg, where he remained until graduating. In 1867 he opened a general merchandise store at Three Springs, Huntingdon county, where he was also a member of the first board of city trustees. In 1883 he bought out the hardware business of his brother, Frank D., at Mount Union, Pa., and continued there until 1886, when he sold out, came to California, and formed a partnership with his brother, F. D., in Pasadena. The Stevens Hardware Company became the largest of its kind in the city and the proprietors were also active in the buying and selling of real estate. The loss of health forced Wesley L. to sell his interest in the business, after which he set out and superintended an orange grove in Pasadena, continuing at that occupation until he had regained his health, when he came to Long Beach. Here he recently completed an attractive and commodious residence of three stories on the corner of Fourth and Cedar streets. Politically he is a Republican, and in religion a member and trustee of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He is connected with the Master Plumbers Association of Long Beach and Long Beach Post No. 180, G. A. R. In Harrisburg, Pa., he married Sarah Jane Keister, who was born near Maddensville, Huntingdon county, Pa. They have twelve children, viz.: Lou May, a bookkeeper for her father; Raymond B. and Spencer R., both associated with the business; Winnie, in Los Angeles; Chester W., a plumber in Pasadena; Dyson, a plumber employed by his father; Mitchell, who is employed in a meat market at Long Beach; Ina, Myrtie, Claudine, Beatrice and Viola.

FRANK D. STEVENS. In Huntingdon county, Pa., Frank D. Stevens was born March 13, 1841, a son of Benedict and Eva (Ow) Stevens, natives of Pennsylvania. He was reared on the home farm and received a common-school education. In March, 1862, he enlisted in Company I, Twelfth Pennsylvania Reserves, army of the Potomac, and took part in the battles of Mechanicsville, White Oak Swamp, Fredericksburg (where he was twice wounded), Gettysburg, the Wilderness, Mine Run and Bristow Station. During the campaign in the Wilderness he was captured and for nine months was kept in prisons in Georgia and South Carolina, but was finally paroled in March, 1865, and the next month was honorably discharged with the rank of first lieutenant. Returning to Pennsylvania he began in the hardware business at Mount Union, where he remained for seventeen years. Coming from there to California he spent a year in Los Angeles and then came to Pasadena, where he is the head of the Stevens Hardware Company at No. 8 East Colorado street, and is also a director of the Pasadena Lake Vineyard Land and Water Company. He has been commander of John F. Godfrey Post No. 95, G. A. R., and is a trustee of the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Pasadena. While living in Pennsylvania he married Annie A. Bush and after her death was united with Anna Hiney, who died in Los Angeles in 1886. Later he married Dora M. Bucher, of Philadelphia. Five children were born of his first marriage, one of whom, Ethel F., is deceased. Those living are Arthur B., of Pasadena; Claudine D., Mrs. W. A. Benschoff; Rev. Frank G. H., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal denomination; and Kingsley N., of Pasadena.

E. W. OLNEY. The name of Olney is derived from an island in the Severn river, England, and the emigrating ancestor was one of the venturesome voyageurs who landed on Massachusetts' shores from that historic craft, the Mayflower. E. W. Olney, rancher, and one of the most popular and enterprising citizens of Gardena, was born in Chenango county, N. Y., March 7, 1840, and is a son of Rensselaer Jesse Olney, born at Saratoga Springs, N. Y., in 1807. The elder Olney removed from New York to Illinois when his son, E. W., was five years of age, and settled on a farm of eighty acres in the town of Kingston, DeKalb county, where he died at the age of seventy-eight years. His father, Jesse, was born at Stillwater, Saratoga county, N. Y., in 1755, and, having qualified as a practicing physician, continued to live among his native surroundings up to the time of his death, in 1810. In 1831 Rensselaer Olney married Rachel Ireland, born in New York, and daughter of Thomas Ireland, who came from his native country, England, to the United States in young manhood, and was a farmer during the years of his activity, being successful and prominent in the locality in which he lived.

The youth of Mr. Olney was spent in the vicinity of Chicago, Ill., where he was educated in the public schools, and engaged in farming on his own responsibility. In response to the need of the Union he served during the Civil war in Company F, Thirteenth Illinois Infantry (the first regiment that was mustered into the Government service from Illinois for three years), and during his service was under General Sherman for the most of the time. He saw much of the terrible and grewsome side of warfare, and received a gunshot wound in his left shoulder which necessitated eleven months of hospital treatment. He was mustered out in Springfield, Ill., and the following year exchanged his occupation of farming for that of a clerkship in an hotel. Thereafter he turned his attention to the buying of wheat in Iowa, and for five years this proved a profitable business. He then removed to Nebraska and homesteaded one hundred and sixty acres of land near Lincoln. In 1897 he settled in Gardena upon an alfalfa ranch of five acres. The California property of Mr. Olney is well improved, and utilized for alfalfa and deciduous fruits.

In Sycamore, DeKalb county, Ill., Mr. Olney married Elizabeth D. Dunlap, a daughter of David Vescelius, who moved to Michigan with his parents when but a boy, and later settled in Illinois. He married Patience Mitchell, who was born near Liverpool, England, and came to America with her uncle when twelve years of age, settling near White Pigeon, Mich. Mr. and Mrs. Olney have no children of their own, but adopted a daughter, Kitty, who by her first husband, Abner Thomson, had one child, Olney Thomson, now adopted into the family of Mr. and Mrs. Olney. Mrs. Thomson married a second time, being now the wife of William Bryant of Gardena.

Mr. Olney is a Republican in politics, and served as supervisor while living in Nebraska. He is fraternally associated with the blue lodge of Masons in Kingston, DeKalb county, Ill., and the Modern Woodmen of America. He is president and a director of the Gardena Water Company, and is treasurer and a director of the Co-operative Creamery Company of Gardena. Mrs. Olney is a member of the Royal Neighbors of America. Mr. Olney is one of the substantial, large-hearted, and public-spirited men of this community, has one of the most beautiful ranches for many miles around, and has hosts of friends who appreciate his fine personal characteristics and pronounced success.

• JOHN ROBERTS. That Mr. Roberts possesses those sterling and common-sense attributes in accord with developing conditions, no one questions, for his life has been cast in pioneer grooves, and during a long and well-directed career he has started a couple of towns and assisted at the early upbuilding of others. When he first came to Long Beach, in 1884, the aggregate of residences, barns and outbuildings was seventeen, and this nucleus of future prosperity had need of just such enterprise and wise conservatism as characterized the industry of this honored citizen. In August of the year of his arrival he constructed a home with his own hands, having completed which he engaged in the lumber business as manager of the San Pedro Lumber Company at this point, and he sold the first lumber in the village, thus encouraging building and general trade. In this capacity he continued until his resignation in 1888, since which time, though practically retired from active business life, he has contributed in an all around general way to the best interests of the town of his adoption.

The emigrating ancestor of the Roberts family was one Cadwallader Roberts, who left the home of his forefathers in Wales and settled in Montgomery county, Pa., soon after the settlement of that state. He was a member of the Society of Friends, as were many of his latter-day descendants. The paternal grandfather, Ezekiel, was born in Pennsylvania and settled in Ontario about 1800, but after the war of 1812 removed to Belmont county, Ohio, where he engaged in farming. He afterwards located at Samantha, in Highland county, and was there extensively interested in the nursery business.

He also was a member of the Society of Friends. While living in Ontario his son, Charles, the father of John Roberts, was born, and later became a farmer in Belmont county, Ohio, and in 1845 removed to what was then Delaware county, near Mount Gilead. His death occurred in Chariton, Lucas county, Iowa. After his marriage to Sarah Harris, a native of Belmont county, he departed from the faith of his ancestors and accepted the teachings of the Methodist Church, in which he had implicit confidence for the remainder of his life. The Harris family came from old Virginia stock, and John Harris, the father of Mrs. Roberts, was born in old Virginia, whither his family had removed, and where they were surrounded with Indians. After the Civil war the father and mother removed with their children to Akron, Mo., and later to Iowa, where both eventually died. There were thirteen children born of this union, eight of whom are living, John Roberts being the oldest of all, and the only one in California. One of the sons, Wright, served during the Civil war in the Forty-third Ohio Infantry, and at Corinth, Miss., had his left hand shot to pieces. He now lives in Harrison county, Mo.

John Roberts was born in Belmont county, Ohio, June 16, 1831, and in his boyhood days attended the early subscription schools, supplemented by a partial course at the Wesleyan University at Delaware, Ohio. Owing to illness he was obliged to shorten his study at the latter institution, and he therefore turned his attention to farming in Ohio, until his removal to Iowa in 1856. Upon settling in Montezuma, Poweshiek county, he worked at the carpenter's trade until October of 1857, when he started across the plains with a horse team and wagon, crossing the Missouri river at Nebraska City, and locating in Otoe county, Neb., at the head of the Little Nemaha river, surrounded by a wilderness of prairie. While there he helped to locate and found the town of Palmyra, and also named it, and contributed much towards its early development. In the immediate vicinity thereof he cleared and improved two farms, but that he might better educate his children, eventually disposed of his interests and moved to Nebraska City. His life at the head of the Little Nemaha was replete with interest and also with vicissitude, for during the first two years of his residence there he was nine miles from his nearest neighbor. He first pre-empted one hundred and sixty acres of land, and in 1865 homesteaded another farm the same size, and he was one of the first settlers of that now flourishing region. For four years also he was connected with the overland stage, and in this way became familiar with the extreme wildness in surroundings, and in humanity as represented among the crude but promising conditions.

After removing to Nebraska City, Mr. Roberts was a delegate the same fall to the national convention at Philadelphia, convened for the second nomination of General Grant for the presidency. In 1873 he was appointed outside deputy internal revenue collector for the northern half of Nebraska, the division line being the Platte river, and the headquarters in Omaha. This responsibility was dutifully discharged until 1878, at the close of which year he took up his residence in Lincoln, another town which he had helped to plan and locate. He there engaged in a manufacturing business, with fair success, until failing health rendered a change imperative. He therefore came to California in 1884, and after a few months in Los Angeles settled permanently in Long Beach. He was a member and president of the first and second city councils, and mayor also, these services covering in all seven years. He helped to form the city government, and rendered invaluable service by his wise and practical counsel, and his thorough knowledge of municipal life in all its bearings. Assisted by an earnest and efficient board of trustees, he brought about the construction of the Long Beach pier, which, more than any other factor in the history of the town, has completed the prosperity at present prevailing. Another advance due to his energy and forethought was the securing of the franchise for the terminal railroad which, without his assistance, had been long delayed.

Thrice married, the first union of Mr. Roberts was in Morrow county, Ohio, with Mary Barrett, a native of that county, and who died in Ohio in December of 1852. Of this marriage there was one child, Mary, who is now the wife of C. O. Mortley, of Centerburg, Knox county, Ohio. The second Mrs. Roberts was formerly Sarah A. McKee, a native of Morrow county, Ohio, and who died in Long Beach. Of this union there were the following children: Charles H., who is a graduate pharmacist from a New York college, and is now a traveling salesman in West Virginia for Park, Davis & Co., of Detroit, Mich.; Sarah E., who is the wife of Dr. Steer, of Long Beach; Ida Frances, who is now Mrs. Christy, of Los Angeles; Eda Bell and Eva Dell, twins, and now Mrs. Fleming, of Los Angeles, and Mrs. Welsh, of the same town: John, who died at the age of five years; and Dwight J., who is a practicing physician of Los Angeles, and a graduate of the Hahnemann College, Chicago. The third marriage of Mr. Roberts occurred in Long Beach, and united him with Mrs. Clara F. (Richardson) Meyer, a native of Canada, and a resident of California since 1889. Mr. Roberts is a staunch Republican, and was formerly a Whig. In Palmyra, Neb., he was justice of the peace, and was a member of the board of county commissioners for three years. In Nebraska City he was made a Mason, identified with Western State Lodge No. 2, and is at present connected with the Long Beach Lodge No. 327.

DAVID HARRIS. Integrity and perseverance were the foundation stones upon which Mr. Harris built the superstructure of an honorable life. These qualities were his by inheritance from a long line of Welsh forefathers, as well as by careful training in a Christian home. His boyhood was passed in Glamorganshire, Wales, where he was born May 24, 1821, and where his father, David, Sr. was a miner. It was but natural that he, too, should learn mining and follow the occupation which was the principal industry in his shire. Indeed, he could scarcely remember when he first began to work in the mines, as his recollections at seven years were of such scenes and such labor. Coming to the United States about 1843, he located at Niles, Ohio, where he laid the first stone on the foundation of the rolling mills at that place. He next went to the copper mines in Michigan, and from there went to Pittsburg, Pa., where he was married, and then returned to Gallipolis, Ohio, where he superintended in mines. On going to Ohio he bought one hundred and fifteen acres and upon that place was the superintendent of coal mines, but later he laid out the land and built up the town of Mineral Ridge, of which he was virtually the founder. As a partner of John Morris (brother of David Morris), under the firm name of Harris & Morris, he operated mines of his own, and attained a degree of success which his industry and determination well merited. Having been familiar with mining from childhood, his fertile mind had grasped every detail of the industry, and his judgment in every detail of the business was regarded as authoritative. Not only did he possess broad views and original ideas, but he also had the energy and ability to execute these plans, and in the prime of his life he reaped the reward of the preceding years of toil and application. In 1873 he moved to Denver, Colo., and bought a residence in that city. However, after some years, deciding that Los Angeles offered special advantages in climate, he came to this city in March, 1882, and afterward lived retired, with the exception of a general oversight of his interests. His death occurred here January 10, 1896, when he was seventy-six years and six months old. Fraternaly he was connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, having joined that order in Wales. In politics he was a Republican.

April 13, 1848, in Pittsburg, Pa., Mr. Harris married Miss Margaret Jones, who was born in Brownsville, Pa., a daughter of Daniel and Mary (Young) Jones, the former a native of Glamorganshire, Wales, and the latter born near Brownsville. When twenty-one years of age

Mr. Jones came to America and settled in Pittsburg, where he engaged in the hotel business. His death occurred in Pittsburg when he was fifty-two years of age. In all of the labors of Mr. Harris his wife proved a wise counselor and true helpmate, and the credit for much of his success he gave to her. With a sincere desire to be an influence for good in the world, she has given aid to religious and philanthropic movements. Since coming to Los Angeles she has been an active member of the First Christian Church, in the work of which she takes a deep interest.

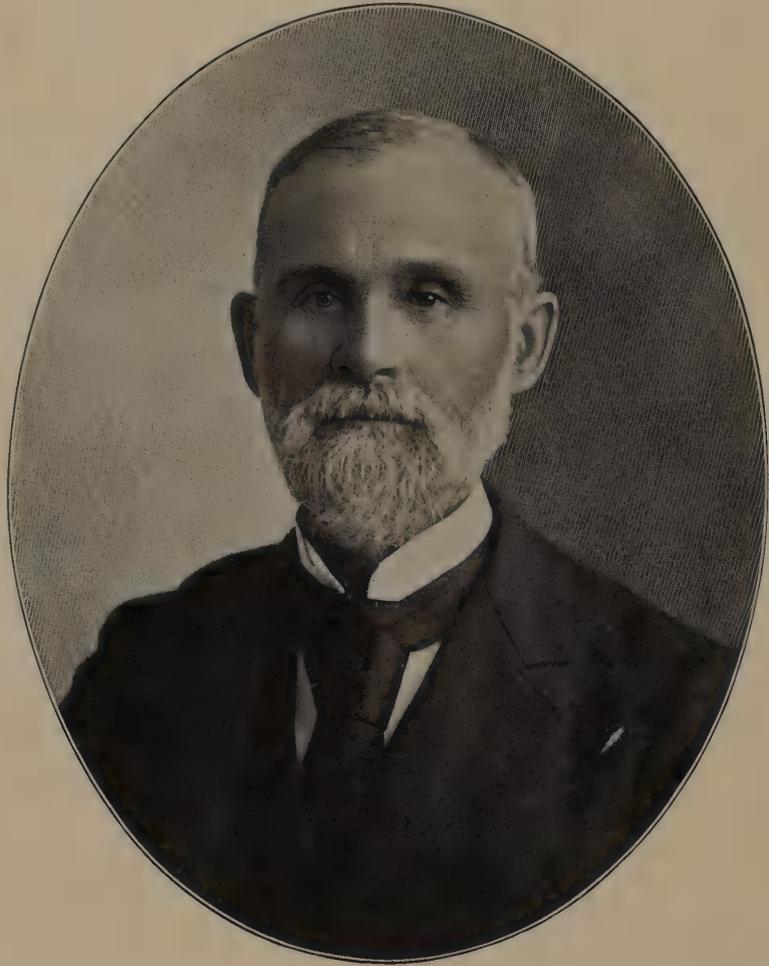

J. H. HASSINGER. The Hassinger family is among the oldest in Pennsylvania. Samuel K. Hassinger, who was a merchant in Dauphin county, removed from Pennsylvania to Nebraska in 1870 and settled near Palmyra, Otoe county. His death occurred at Hastings, that state, March 4, 1893. While living in the east he married Mary S. Barnes, who was born in Westmoreland county, Pa., of an old family there, and who died June 16, 1863. Their first child, a son, died in infancy. J. H., born in Latrobe, Pa., May 4, 1859, accompanied his father to Nebraska when he was eleven years of age, and grew to manhood in Otoe county. While still a boy he became familiar with the carpenter's trade, and in 1881 went to North Platte, where he turned his attention to merchandising and afterward engaged in farming. For five years he was postmaster at Nesbit, Logan county, Neb., was also county auditor for three years and treasurer of the school district for nine years.

On coming to California in 1894 Mr. Hassinger at once settled at Ocean Park, where he now makes his home. The village at that time was in an embryo state, containing few possibilities of future growth or prosperity. Believing that it had many advantages of climate and location, he invested in property here and determined to identify himself with the town's future growth, a decision which he has not had cause to regret. In the intervening years he has built almost one hundred and fifty buildings, and has done much to promote the welfare of the place. While living in Nebraska he was married at North Platte, April 5, 1882, to Miss Ella M. Jones, who was born in Owasso, Mich. Her parents, Thomas J. and Nancy A. (Bogue) Jones, were natives respectively of Virgil and Rochester, N. Y., and in 1872 settled at North Platte, Neb., where Mr. Jones followed sheep ranching. During the early days he was a famous buffalo hunter, and his success in bringing down his game made his name familiar throughout the hunting regions of the west. Mr. and Mrs. Hassinger have three children now living, Thomas Hamilton, Charles Bogue and Ella June. Their three eldest children died before leaving Nebraska, and in Ocean Park another child died in infancy, February 22, 1895.

The political views of Mr. Hassinger bring him into sympathy with the Republican party, whose men and measures he supports. Realizing the need of a well-equipped fire department in Ocean Park, he has been interested in the securing of the same and is now officiating as its secretary and treasurer. The Santa Monica Board of Trade numbers him among its members. Fraternally he is associated with the Modern Woodmen of America, and in religion is of the Unitarian belief. His identification with Ocean Park has been intimate and long-extended, and it is worthy of note that he acted as the first agent of Kinney & Ryan in the management of their tract and the beach. All through the period of his residence at the beach he has proved himself an enterprising citizen, with the firmest faith in the future of Ocean Park and its increasing popularity as an attractive resort.

L. W. DREWS. The spring of 1894 found Mr. Drews a new comer in California, and he has since made Moneta his home. He was born in Leavenworth, Kans., May 14, 1871, being a son of Rudolph and Catherine (Kempter) Drews, natives of Germany. When a boy of fourteen years the father left his native city, Hamburg, and with his parents crossed the ocean to America, settling in New Orleans. In that city he studied to be an architect. However, when the news of the discovery of gold in California reached him, he dropped all his work and at once started for the far west. By means of a sailing vessel that ploughed its slow course down the Atlantic, around the Horn and up the Pacific, he arrived in San Francisco in 1850. In order to secure the means necessary for a livelihood he worked at his trade, but carried on mining pursuits at the same time. During 1852 he crossed the plains to Kansas and established his headquarters in Leavenworth, from which point he engaged in the freighting business to Pike's Peak. Those were the days of large freighting expeditions, when people were moving westward in great throngs, and hence his wagons were constantly in use. With the money thus earned he bought a farm of eighty acres near Leavenworth, and subsequently increased his possessions by the purchase of two hundred and twenty acres in the same locality. When he had accumulated sufficient for his old age and wished to retire from active farm cares, he came to California in 1899, and settled at Moneta, where his death occurred at the age of sixty-seven years. His wife had accompanied her parents to the United States when she was twelve years of age, and for a time lived in Illinois, but later removed to

John D. Chaffee M.D.

Leavenworth, Kans., near which city her father homesteaded one hundred and sixty acres.

The boyhood years of L. W. Drews were passed in the common schools and on the home farm. Leaving Kansas in 1894, he came to California and settled at Moneta, where he bought thirteen acres. At this writing he owns twenty-two acres altogether, and has a neat and comfortable home. The improvements on the place speak of his energy and perseverance, and his desire to transform the land into one of the most productive ranches of the community. Another enterprise that commands his support and attention is the Moneta cannery, of which he is vice-president and a director. In addition, he owns one-half interest in a gas pumping plant, with a capacity of one hundred inches, the water from which is sold to other ranchers.

The lady who presides over the home of Mr. Drews was formerly Nellie Becker, and was born in Leavenworth, Kans. Her father, Valentine Becker, was a native of Germany, but came to America in early manhood and afterward devoted himself to farm pursuits near Leavenworth. While Mr. Drews is not a partisan in the usual sense of that word, he is a staunch and pronounced Democrat and believes thoroughly in supporting party principles. Fraternally he is connected with the Rathbone Sisters, Knights of Pythias, Uniform Rank, and the Independent Order of Foresters.

JOHN D. CHAFFEE, M. D., whose homestead, The Pines, forms one of the most valuable properties at Garden Grove, is a member of an old English family that settled in Vermont. His father, Eber C., was born near Belows Falls, that state, and was the son of Rufus Chaffee, a farmer. When a youth he learned the trades of tanner and currier, but after removing, in 1839, to Kane county, Ill., he turned his attention to agriculture, and improved a farm of four hundred acres in Campton township. He married Anna Davis, who was born in Rutland county, Vt., of Welsh and English descent. Both died on their homestead in Illinois. Of their twelve children all but two attained mature years. They were as follows: Mrs. Sarah M. Johnson, who died at Batavia, Ill.; Sereno S., who died in Los Angeles, Cal.; Fernando H., who resides in Illinois; Mrs. Marcia Ryder, of Clinton, Iowa; Edmond, who died in Texas during the Civil war; Alonzo, of Wasco, Ill.; Dorr B., who served in an Illinois regiment during the Rebellion and is now a farmer at Garden Grove, Cal.; John D.; Simon E., also a veteran of the Civil war, and now living in Wasco, Ill., being freight solicitor for the Great Western railroad; and Albert, a farmer of Garden Grove.

Near Elgin, Kane county, Ill., Dr. Chaffee was born November 5, 1843. On completing the studies of the district schools he attended Mount Morris (Ill.) Seminary. From boyhood it was his ambition to enter the medical profession and, in spite of obstacles which would have daunted one less determined, he persevered, making every occupation in which he engaged a means to the end desired. While still living in Illinois he conducted a large dairy and furnished milk for a condensing factory, building up a business, that was profitable and important. On determining to come west, in 1875, he sold the property and spent three months in Los Angeles, going from there to Westminster. In February, 1876, he settled on the place which has since been his home, and which comprises ten acres. Since then he has acquired another ten-acre ranch, and has planted both in fruit trees of different varieties.

Years ago, with only one text book to assist him, Dr. Chaffee began the study of medicine, and his rudimentary knowledge of the science was acquired without the aid of an instructor. Other books were afterward added to his medical library and the contents of each absorbed by his receptive mind. In 1884 he entered Hahnemann Hospital Medical College in San Francisco, from which he was graduated in 1887. However, he had practiced considerably prior to his graduation, and he is now, in point of years of professional activity, one of the oldest physicians in Orange county. In addition to following a general practice of medicine, he has had considerable experience in surgery and is deeply interested in that branch of the profession.

The marriage of Dr. Chaffee took place in Elgin, Ill., September 29, 1868, and united him with Miss Ellen M. Bradley, who was born at Dundee, Kane county, Ill. She is eligible to membership in the Daughters of the Revolution, some of her paternal ancestors having participated in the first war with England. Her grandfather, Anson Bradley, spent his entire life in Vermont, and her father, William S. Bradley, was also a native of that state, born in Fairfield, but in 1838 settled at Dundee, Ill., becoming a pioneer farmer near that town. In 1881 he removed to California, where he remained retired from active cares until his death, at seventy-six years. He traced his ancestry to English and Scotch progenitors. In religion he was connected with the Methodist Episcopal Church. His wife, who bore the maiden name of Lucia Keiser, was born in New Hampshire, and died at Garden Grove, Cal. Their family consisted of four daughters, namely: Jane C., Mrs. Wauzer, who died in Wisconsin; Mary E., Mrs. Hill, who lives in Garden Grove; Ellen M., Mrs. Chaffee; and Lois E., who, with her husband, Charles Hitchcock, was murdered on their ranch at Garden Grove, in January, 1888. After completing her education in Elgin Academy, Mrs. Chaffee became a teacher in Kane county and continued in that occupation until her marriage.

The distinction of being the only surviving charter members of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Garden Grove belongs to Dr. and Mrs. Chaffee, and he has always been one of its leaders and an important factor in its progress, both as a member and through his service as chairman of the board of trustees and in other official positions. When fourteen years of age he experienced religion and was converted, since which time he has endeavored to exemplify in his own life the teachings of Christ. Besides starting the church, he also started the Sunday-school at Garden Grove, and for three years he served as a trustee of the same. He is connected with the Fraternal Aid as its examining physician. Among the professional organizations to which he belongs, the most important are the National and the Southern California Homeopathic Societies, and he keeps in touch not only with these, but also with all associations for the benefit of the profession and is a reader of various periodicals devoted to scientific inquiry. In his political adherence he is a staunch Republican and active in the local work of the party, but at no time in his life an aspirant for official honors.

JESSE S. STINE. Early in the history of our country the Stine family settled in Virginia, whence one of the name removed to Bucks county, Pa., and from there to Fremont and later to Sandusky, Ohio. In religious belief he adhered to the faith of his ancestors, who had been Lutherans since the days of the Reformation. I. D. Stine, a son of this Ohio pioneer, was born in Bucks county, Pa., and became a contracting mason in Fremont, Ohio, later following the same occupation, as well as building, in Elmore, Ohio, and South Bend, Ind. In 1885 he removed to California and engaged in contracting and building in Los Angeles, but since 1895 has been retired. During the Civil war he was a member of the Thirty-first Ohio Infantry, and now has membership with the Grand Army in Los Angeles, where he also is identified with South Gate Lodge, F. & A. M. He married Rebecca, daughter of Jesse C. Coe, a pioneer of Fremont, Ohio; she was born in Sandusky county, that state, and died in Indiana, leaving three sons, two of whom reside in California, the third being in Mexico. The oldest of these is Jesse S., of Tropic, who was born in Fremont, Ohio, April 21, 1861. At ten years of age he accompanied his parents to South Bend, Ind., where he learned the mason's trade under his father. At fourteen years of age he also began to learn the plumbing business, at which he continued until 1878 in South Bend, later working as a journeyman in different western states. During 1882 he enlisted in the Second United States Cavalry, Company F, and was stationed at Fort Custer. After five years of service he was honorably discharged at Walla Walla, Wash., from which point in 1887 he came to Los Angeles.

After assisting his father as a contractor in Los Angeles for five years, in 1892 Mr. Stine embarked in business for himself. Indeed, he has considered Glendale his home since 1889, and is well known among the contractors of this vicinity. The firm of Stine & Bullis has been given many important contracts and ranks high among men who demand the finest grade of work. In addition to contracting Mr. Stine carries on horticultural pursuits and owns a five-acre tract at Glendale, in the cultivation of which he has for some time been interested. His marriage took place in Tropic, Los Angeles county, June 13, 1888, and united him with Miss Tessa Bullis, who was born in San Rafael, Marin county, Cal., in 1872, and is a daughter of P. H. Bullis, of Redondo Beach. One child, Richard W., blesses this union. The political views of Mr. Stine bring him into affiliation with the Republican party, whose ticket he always votes. Fraternally he is connected with the Woodmen of the World, the Sons of Veterans and the Odd Fellows.

C. B. SMITH. Many of the finest residences and public buildings in Long Beach are due to the skill of C. B. Smith, who has been engaged in building and contracting here since 1900. An architect also, Mr. Smith draws his own plans, and the houses that he has erected and offered for sale find a ready market among those who are looking for all that is desirable in a home. His work is of the substantial, up-to-date and artistic order, and contributes in no small measure toward the generally excellent effect of the buildings of the town.

A native of Iowa, Mr. Smith was born in Delaware county, October 10, 1861, a son of Ephraim Smith, a native of Noble county, Ohio, and a grandson of Anderson Smith, who was born in Pennsylvania. The grandfather was one of the early settlers of Douglas county, and afterwards removed to Iowa, and then to Nebraska, where his death occurred. Ephraim Smith lived in Delaware county, Iowa, until 1871, and then removed to Columbus, Platt county, Neb., for a year, later taking up his residence on a farm in Boone county. Nebraska at that time was exceedingly wild and uncultivated, and neighbors were separated by wide stretches of country. The family were obliged to go forty miles to market and for the mail, and sixty miles to the mill to have their grain ground. The Smith home was the third house in Boone county in Cedar valley, and the occupants thereof underwent many hardships and deprivations, as well as dangers from Indian attacks. The father left Nebraska with his family in 1893 and located at Hanford, Cal., living there for five years and moving from there to Santa Ana, Cal., and thence to Long Beach, where he is still living, and where he is engaged in the feed and grain business. He married Drusilla M., daughter of Jacob Foutz, a native of Ohio, and a shoe man by occupation. Mr. Foutz was one of the '49ers who crossed the plains in search of fortune, and who eventually found their way to Southern California. He was fairly successful as a miner and remained on the coast until 1880, in which year he returned to Nebraska and died in 1882. Mrs. Smith, who died in Santa Ana, Cal., was the mother of eight children, five of whom are living, C. B. being the oldest.

As a boy C. B. Smith shared the family fortunes in out of the way places, removing from Iowa to Nebraska, where he studied in the district schools as opportunity offered, but, as may be imagined, the chances for acquiring knowledge were few and far between. When fourteen years old he used to travel the sixty miles to the mill at Shell Creek, a trip covering four days, and would return to the waiting ones at home laden with the provisions necessary for housekeeping in the wilds. When quite young he was initiated into the mysteries of a printing office at Cedar Rapids, Neb., and used to set type on the Echo. When twenty years of age he began to learn the carpenter's trade, and afterwards was foreman for a year for a contractor in Barstow, Neb. He then returned to Boone county and contracted and built there and in Greeley county, and eventually found his way over a considerable part of the state in his capacity as a builder. In May of 1890 he came west to Madeira, Cal., and remained for a year, and then went to Hanford and engaged in contracting and building and brick manufacturing. He worked up a large business and continued in the locality for three years. In 1896 he moved to Southern California on account of sickness in the family, and located in Santa Ana, where for four years he was foreman for McNeil & Preble. In April of 1900 he came to Long Beach, and has since found this a profitable field of activity.

In Hanford, Cal., Mr. Smith married Mary M. Maloon, a native of Shelbyville, Ill. Mr. and Mrs. Smith have adopted a daughter, Ruth G. Smith. Mr. Smith is associated with the Modern Woodmen of America, and with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. Politically he is a free silver man, and in religion is a member of the Baptist Church.

G. P. FITZGERALD. In no portion of the world has the art of man more harmoniously supplemented the beauties of nature than in Southern California. As a result a veritable wonderland has been created that challenges the admiration of all. The eye of the artist greets with peculiar pleasure the vision afforded by the homestead of Mr. Fitzgerald, where the skill of workmen, guided by the owner's refined taste and intelligent mind, have brought to perfection an environment peculiarly the recipient of nature's bounties. Lying in the foothills overlooking Duarte, the chill winds and frosts that carry destruction to the groves at many places gain no entrance here, hence trees and flowers grow with especial luxuriance.

On coming to California in 1890 Mr. Fitzgerald spent a short time in San Diego and Los Angeles, after which he bought one hundred and twenty-two acres at Duarte. Few improvements had then been attempted, and much of the land was covered with brush and in the primeval condition of nature. Twenty-five acres had been planted in seedling oranges and twenty-five in vines, but no other attempt at cultivation had been made. Under the present owner's keen supervision and capable management the entire place has been transformed. Six thousand oranges, Washington navel variety, have been planted, and five hundred late valencias. Half way up the mountain side a mansion has been erected, before which spread the orange trees extending down the foothills. The grounds have been laid out into a park of marvelous beauty, with drives and flowers and artistic stone work. In his horticultural pursuits and in the improving of the property Mr. Fitzgerald is an enthusiast, and the result of his skill may be seen on every side. A choice collection of plants and shrubs abound, the diversified arrangement of which adds greatly to the attractive appearance of the grounds. To bring the ranch to its present perfection $140,000 has been expended, yet, vast as the outlay has been, an offer of this sum would not induce the owner to part with the ranch which he calls his U. S. A. home.

In Waterford county, Ireland, Mr. Fitzgerald was born and reared, and his education was acquired at Harrow, supplemented by a course of study in Cambridge. For seven years he was a member of the militia, ranking as first lieutenant. After coming to America he married Miss Eleanor Niccol's, who was born in Uniontown, Pa., the only child of John A. and Leonora (Thompson) Niccolls. Her father, a native of Belle Vernon, Pa., devoted his active years to the buying and selling of coal stock. He died in Uniontown, where his wife still makes her home. The children of Mr. Fitzgerald are John P., Edward and Gerald. The family are identified with the Roman Catholic Church. Besides his possessions in California, Mr. Fitzgerald has been a heavy investor in Pennsylvania coal mines and is the owner of other American properties. Included in his Great Britain possessions is the island of Waterford, which contains six hundred acres. He also has property in Manchester, England.

The Fitzgerald family is descended from the Duke of Leicester's family and belongs to the nobility of Great Britain. The genealogy is traced back to Otho Geraldino, who, according to the Battle Abbey Book, came to England with William the Conqueror, from Normandy, under whom he was a chief commander. In the sixth year of the reign of that famous king, he was created a baron. He had two sons, Waltero and Robert, the former of whom was the ancestor of all the Fitzgeralds in Ireland. His son, Gerald, was the father of Maurice Fitzpatrick, who was one of the early invaders of Ireland, landing there in 1169. By this representative the surname was changed from Geraldino to Fitzgerald, although long afterward they were still alluded to as the "Geraldines." So famous were they for chivalry and valor and so widespread the tales of their deeds of daring that one of the well-known songs of those days recounted their virtues:

"These Geraldines! These Geraldines! Time wears away the rock,

And time may wear away the tribe that stood the battle shock;

But evermore, while one is left of all that honored race,

In front of Ireland's chivalry is that Fitzgerald's place."

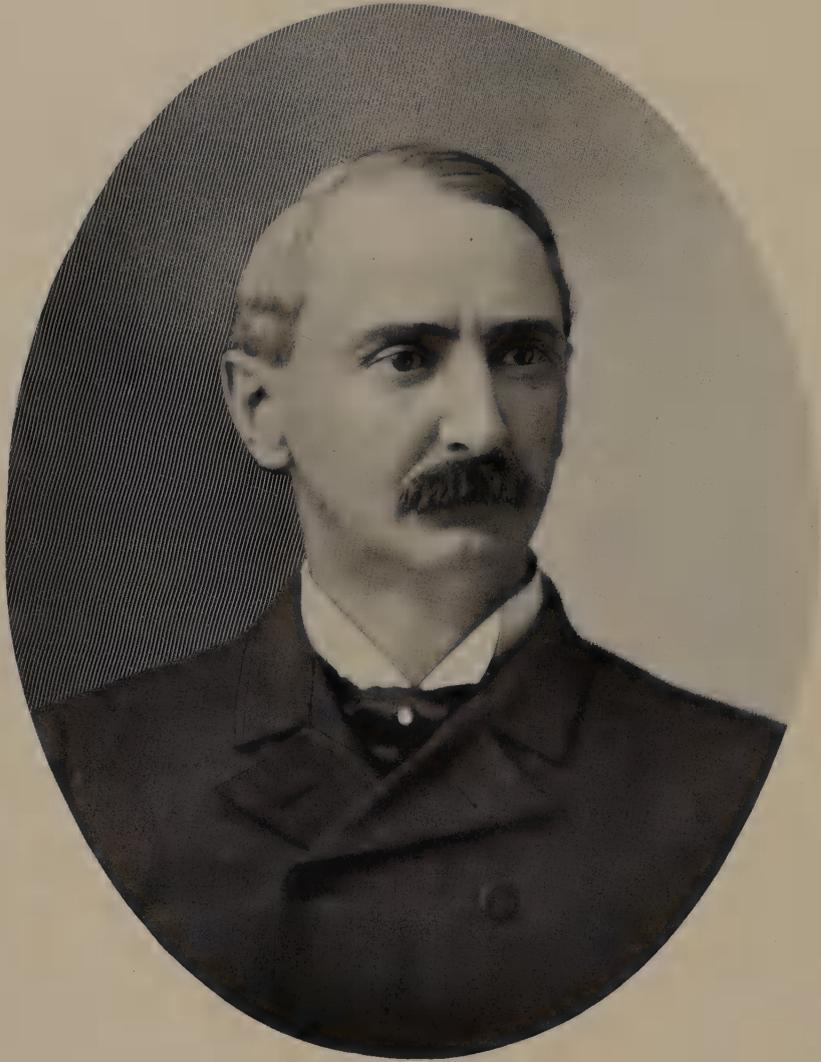

JOHN EARLE JARDINE. On the pages of history the Jardine family appears as having gone from Normandy to England and in the latter country the name is first found in the roll of Battle Abbey. They were later granted land in Scotland. Archibald Jardine, who was a native of Wigtonshire, Scotland, and an agriculturist by occupation, established the family in the United States, settling in New York City. His son, John, who was also a native of Wigtonshire, was twenty years of age when he crossed the ocean to New York, and there he has since resided, having made architecture his life work. In the prosecution of this calling he has gained a local reputation for skill and artistic ideas, and is now one of the city's most prominent architects. Like his ancestors, he adheres to the Presbyterian faith. At this writing he is vice-president of St. Andrew's Society of New York City.

The first marriage of John Jardine united him with Miss Mary E. Earle, a daughter of Morris and Mary (Dodd) Earle, natives respectively of New York City and Hartford, Conn. Both these families were among the colonial settlers of Connecticut, and were of English and Puritan stock. For one hundred and fifty years the old Dodd residence has stood in Hartford, an historic landmark, and it has been continuously occupied by members of the family. Mrs. Jardine was born in New York City, where her father was a successful merchant. The schools of that city afforded her excellent educational advantages, while her religious instruction was received in the Episcopal Church. She died when her only child, John Earle Jardine, was a child. He was born in New York City December 7, 1871, and at ten years of age removed with the family to the suburb of Yonkers, where he attended a private school and academy. After completing his studies he entered upon a position with a wholesale and importing chemical house.

Desiring to visit the Pacific coast, of which he had heard much, Mr. Jardine came to California in 1892 on a tour of inspection, and was so pleased with the country that he decided to make it his home. Settling in Pasadena in January, 1894, he began the improvement of a tract of thirteen and three-fourths acres on South Marengo avenue. This land was in the rough, and required constant supervision for several years to be put in a condition where it would respond to cultivation. A large number of orange and lemon trees, also grape fruit, may be now seen on the property, and in citrus culture the owner has proved himself an adept, carrying on all of his work scientifically and with due regard to conditions of soil and climate. Los Robles Park (such is the name of the estate) is one of the most attractive homesteads in the vicinity of Pasadena, and its two residences are fitted up with modern appliances and improvements. In the thrifty appearance of its orchard, in the substantial buildings and in the air of comfort and prosperity overhanging all, the property stands as a monument to the wise judgment and executive ability of the owner.

Various enterprises, in addition to the supervision of his homestead, receive attention from Mr. Jardine and, when their value is proved, his co-operation is always to be relied upon. He is a director both in the Orange and the Lemon Growers' Associations of Pasadena, and a director of the San Gabriel Valley Bank. On the organization of the Euclid Avenue Water Company he was chosen its president and still fills the position, having meantime developed water for the various properties reached by the company. When the Pasadena Country Club was organized he became one of its charter members, and is now its secretary and treasurer. In political views he is a pronounced Republican. Some years before coming to California he made a tour of Great Britain and the continent, finding one of his chief pleasures in visiting the scenes familiar to his father in boyhood and youth, and dear to the family through the long association of previous generations with the locality. He is a vestryman in the Church of Our Savior (Episcopal) at San Gabriel, and in it was solemnized, in 1893, his marriage to Miss Mary C. Peck, daughter of George H. Peck, Sr. They have an only son, John Earle, Jr.

J. Hayes,

HON. JOSEPH SIBLEY NOYES was born in Marshall, Mich., September 19, 1859, and received a common-school education in his native town. September 17, 1881, he was admitted to the bar and at once began to practice in Marshall. The following year on the Republican ticket he was elected circuit court commissioner of Calhoun county, and for two years discharged the duties of the office faithfully. That his services were satisfactory his election as prosecuting attorney in 1884 proved. In 1886 he was honored with re-election to the office, by an increased majority, but resigned in 1887 on coming to California, and soon afterward established his home and office in Riverside. From the first period of locating here, he realized the importance of separating what is now Riverside county from the old counties of San Bernardino and San Diego, and the attainment of that result was due not a little to his efforts. In April, 1893, he was nominated for judge of the superior court on a non-partisan ticket and was elected without opposition. The next year, at the general election, he was elected by the largest majority given any candidate on the ticket. At the expiration of six years, in 1900, he was re-elected, after a bitter partisan opposition in which a large number of disappointed litigants of his own party participated. He carried thirty-two out of forty-seven precincts, and received the largest vote of any candidate on the county ticket. Many of these cases have become causa celebre throughout the state and the affirmance of his decision has established for him a position in the fore ranks of his profession. Among the many decided by him are the case of Gage vs. Atwater, involving the title to six hundred and forty acres of land within the city of Riverside, where the decision of Hoke Smith, secretary of the interior under Cleveland's second administration, was sustained and upheld, as against a number of "land jumpers" who sought to wrest the title from Gage by fraud; the case of the State of California, ex rel, Barker vs. Shaver, an action to remove a supervisor of the county who had been fairly elected, on the ground that he had not qualified according to law, Judge Noyes deciding against the state and in favor of Shaver, as against the judgment of Governor Gage (who attempted to appoint his successor), the attorney-general and local counsel, but an appeal was promptly upheld by the supreme court; (this decision made many political enemies for Judge Noyes within his own party, who unsuccessfully attempted to defeat his renomination and election in 1900); the case of the San Diego Water Company vs. City of San Diego, after being appealed to the supreme court and reversed, was on retrial brought before Judge Noyes, presiding in San Diego county. His decision was in favor of the water company, setting aside the ordinance of the city of San Diego, establishing water rates. This litigation involved some of the most serious and complicated questions under the federal and state constitutions ever brought before our state courts. The decision of Judge Noyes, however, was so eminently sound that no appeal was ever taken and the judgment has become final. Other cases were Anderson vs. Anderson; Iowa & California Land Company vs. Hoag; Widemueller vs. Stearns Rancho Company; Swope vs. Rothschild; South Riverside Land & Water Company vs. Hohenshell, and many others affirmed by the supreme court. These cases have become leading authorities on the law involved. Being the only judge in a large and prosperous county, it has fallen to his lot to pass upon more legal questions than any other judge in Southern California. The case of Barrows vs. City of Los Angeles, involving the legality of $2,090,000 worth of the Los Angeles City water bonds, has recently been decided by Judge Noyes declaring the bonds illegal and void, and both sides to the litigation have accepted his decision as final.

G. W. HERRING. The paternal ancestors of Mr. Herring were of German birth, while his maternal progenitors were of the Scottish race. His father, George, son of Henry Herring, was born and reared in Germany, whence he immigrated to the United States. Selecting as his home a farm of one hundred and sixty acres in Pennsylvania, from that time until his death he devoted himself to agricultural pursuits. After coming to this country he married Fannie, daughter of Henry Knowles, who was a native of Scotland, but passed his life principally as a Pennsylvania farmer. In the family of George Herring there were five sons and one daughter, G. W. being the third of these; and by another marriage there were three sons and one daughter. The children of the first union were as follows: Jeremiah, deceased; William, of Pennsylvania; Peter, who also lives in that state; Lewis, who was killed in the battle of Chancellorsville in 1862; G. W., and Mary Jane, a widow living in Pennsylvania.

Near Titusville, Pa., G. W. Herring was born August 27, 1839. When he was a young man the Civil war broke out and he at once offered his services to the country, enlisting in Company A, Eighty-third Pennsylvania Infantry, under General McClellan. In the various engagements of the Peninsular campaign he bore an honorable part. At the second battle of Bull Run he was wounded in the right side by a minie ball, also shot through the right hand by a spent ball. On this account further service was impossible and he was mustered out and honorably discharged in December, 1862. Returning to Pennsylvania he worked in the oil fields for eighteen years. In 1884 he removed to Kansas and homesteaded three hundred and twenty acres near Kingsley, Edwards county. This place he brought under cultivation and improved with neat buildings and the various accessories of a modern farm. In 1901, hoping that a change of climate might prove beneficial to his wife, he removed to California and settled in Gardena, where he owns a neat little homestead. The various communities where he has resided have received the impetus of his energy and public spirit. A staunch believer in protection and sound money, he has always given his support to the Republican party.

The marriage of Mr. Herring was solemnized in Crawford county, Pa., and united him with Miss Harriet Root, whose father, James Root, was a native of New York and became a farmer in Pennsylvania. Born of their union were the following named children: Edward and Frank, of Los Angeles county; Walter Scott, of Gardena; Hugh, of Los Angeles; Julia Anna, wife of C. L. Harris, of Kansas; Jennie, Mrs. Robert David, of Kansas; Mattie, who married G. Smith and lives in Kansas; Mrs. Hattie Kennedy, wife of Samuel Kennedy, of Kansas; and Matilda, at home.

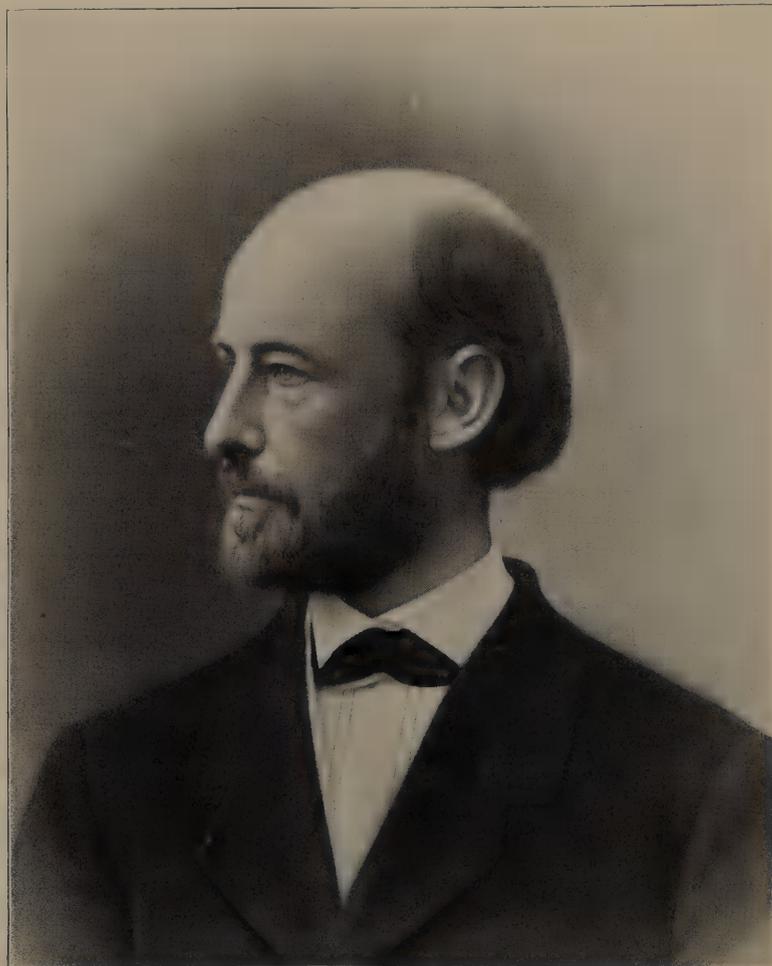

W. B. LOUGHERY came to Pasadena in January, 1884, when the second grocery store in the town was in process of construction, and there were few indications of the present prosperity. On a scale to compare with the other industries of the hamlet he started a little harness shop on East Colorado street, and from this nucleus has from time to time enlarged his business to its present proportions on West Colorado street. He has in the meantime taken a lively and substantial interest in the general development of the town, has started two subdivisions, the Hartwell and Langley, which have been disposed of, and at present he is interested in others of an equally paying nature. Since 1896 his harness establishment has been conducted under the firm name of Loughery & Stone, and the house caters to a large and exclusive trade in the town and vicinity.

Of Scotch-Irish parentage, Mr. Loughery was born in Sussex, New Brunswick, Canada, and his early days were spent on his father's farm and in learning the lumber business. He attended the district schools and when twenty years of age was apprenticed for three years to a harness maker in Sussex. Having completed his trade he started in business in Waterford, New Brunswick, and during his four years' residence in that town worked up a large business. In 1883 he sought to improve his business prospects by removal to California, and in January, 1884, started his present business in Pasadena.

While living in Los Angeles Mr. Loughery married Emily Lane, who was born in St. Johns, New Brunswick, and of this union there are three children, George, Laura and Donald. Mr. Loughery is a member of the park, fire, water and police commission of Pasadena, and of the Pasadena Board of Trade. Fraternally he is associated with the Knights of Pythias and the Royal Arcanum. He is a member and liberal contributor of the Presbyterian Church. Mr. Loughery is possessed of sterling and unquestioned integrity, shrewd and conservative business ability, and untiring devotion to the best interests of the community.

ANTONIO J. ORELLA. Well known through his connection with various enterprises in and near Carpinteria, Mr. Orella was born in Santa Barbara, Cal., December 27, 1865. He is a descendant of a distinguished Castilian family who entertained that pride of birth and lineage so characteristic of the residents of old Castile. His father, Bruno Orella, who had a large acquaintance all along the Pacific coast, was a native of Spain and possessed an adventurous spirit which found vent in a seafaring life. Beginning at the age of fifteen years he was for several years a sailor on the deep seas. His arrival in California was simultaneous with the excitement caused by the discovery of gold. In 1850 he sett'ed in Santa Barbara and embarked in general merchandising. In connection therewith he owned a ranch of five thousand acres of land northwest of Santa Barbara, where he carried on a large stock-raising business. He became known far and wide as one of the sturdy landmarks of the county, and the success which came to him was evidence of his financial ability, and his adherence to noble principles in all the walks of life. His death in San Francisco, in May, 1901, when he was seventy-one years of age, left a void in the hearts of those who had known him during his useful life and who had enjoyed his friendship and confidence. In 1852 he married Mercedes Gonzales, and of this union there were born seventeen children, eleven of whom are now living, namely: Mrs. Jossie Erro, of Nordhoff; Mrs. Juana Erbuero, of Ventura; Frank, who is living in Santa Barbara; Bruno, who occupies the home ranch; Antonio J.; Fermin R., a practicing physician of San Francisco, and whose education was obtained in London, England; Nello; Victor P., who is following the dental profession in San Francisco; Mercedes; Charles and Lawrence. Mrs. Bruno Orella and several of her children reside in Santa Barbara.

W. H. F. F. F. F.

Antonio J. Orella was reared on his father's ranch and received his education in Santa Clara College. His first business undertaking was with Wells-Fargo Company, and he continued with them for eight years, being, meantime, stationed at Santa Barbara, Oakland, the City of Mexico, and Nogales, Ariz. For a short time he was deputy postmaster at Santa Barbara, and for a time bookkeeper for Edwards & Co., hardware merchants. He is an excellent accountant, a talent which has served him in good stead on many occasions, and gained him an added reputation among business men. In 1899 he purchased a ranch of thirteen acres at Carpinteria, upon which are raised walnuts, fruits and alfalfa, and which is proving a profitable investment. During the same year he opened a general mercantile and grocery store on the ranch. Personally he is an enterprising man of unquestioned integrity, and possesses many fine business and social traits. He is accounted an addition to the community around Carpinteria, which has profited by his public spirit and received the benefit of his enterprise. However, he recently removed to Santa Barbara, where he now resides.

In 1897 Mr. Orella married Miss Mary M. Freeman, of Pasadena, and they are the parents of two children, Ursela and Dariel. Mrs. Orella is a daughter of Dr. Charles James Freeman, who was born in England and reared and educated in London. As early as 1848 he settled in San Luis Obispo county, Cal., and in 1851 he came to Santa Barbara county, being the first regularly graduated physician to engage in practice in the city of Santa Barbara. After coming to this state he married Martina R. Foxen, a native of California, her father, Benjamin Julian Foxen, having come here from England. Among the people of Santa Barbara Dr. and Mrs. Freeman held the highest positions. As a physician he was highly regarded. He was a doctor of the old school, a worthy disciple of Æsculapius, possessing a keen sense of professional propriety, a broad knowledge and experience in medical science, and having also the polished manners and dignity of a Chesterfield. His death occurred in Santa Barbara in 1886. The family of which he was a member belonged to the ancient nobility of England and its escutcheon was: Arms, Quartern, Ermine and Vert. Three Lozenges, conjoined in Fess or Crest. A Wolf's Head rising out of a Ducal Coronet surmounting a Helmet.

WILLIAM HOWARD FESSENDEN. The family of which Mr. Fessenden was a member has been identified with the history of America since a very early period of its settlement and has given to our country brave soldiers in times of war as well as keen and successful business men in times of peace. During the war of 1812 Gen. Samuel Fessenden served as an officer of a Maine regiment. His son, William Pitt Fessenden, father of William H., was one of the most conspicuous public men of his day and during the Civil war wielded a powerful influence toward the perpetuity of the Union, standing close to Abraham Lincoln in executive councils and aiding particularly in maintaining the credit of the United States financially.

William Howard Fessenden was born in Portland, Me., May 15, 1846. Like his father, he was a graduate of Bowdoin College, and was admitted to practice at the bar of Maine. However, he did not give his attention actively to professional work. For a time he was engaged at Portland, Me., in the manufacture of machinery for steamboats and stationary engines, and also built steamboats. In 1880 he came to Riverside, Cal., where, in addition to the practice of law, he became interested in horticulture, setting out twelve acres on North Orange street, and also owning a block of two and one-half acres bounded by Sixth, Seventh, Lemon and Orange streets, but this he later platted in lots and sold. At his home in Riverside his death occurred in September, 1898.

HON. JOHN L. BEVERIDGE. John Lourie Beveridge, governor of Illinois 1873-77, and now a resident of Hollywood, Los Angeles county, was born in Greenwich, Washington county, N. Y., July 6, 1824. On both sides of the house he traces his lineage to Scotland. About 1770 his grandfather, Andrew Beveridge, crossed the ocean with his mother, sister and half-sister, and settled in Washington county, N. Y., where, instead of taking up his trade of a weaver, he turned his attention to farming. During the war of 1812, his sympathies were on the royalist side. At the time of his death, in 1831, he was eighty-two years of age. Among his eight sons was George, a native of Hebron, Washington county, born in March, 1786, and reared on a farm. In early manhood he married Ann Hoy, who was born in Jackson county, N. Y., in 1788, and died in May, 1865.

George Beveridge in 1842 took his family to Dekalb county, Ill. Sixty miles west of Chicago he bought government land and improved a farm, which continued to be his home until he died, in 1871, at eighty-five years. During the existence of the Whig party he advocated its principles. After the Republican party was organized he always voted for its principles. During the war of 1812 he enlisted as a private with two brothers and accompanied his regiment down Lake Champlain, but the battle of Plattsburg was fought before their arrival and he therefore saw no active service.

A few months after the family arrived in Illinois John Lourie Beveridge entered Granville Seminary, where he studied one term, then taught school during the winter. With the money thus earned he studied in Rock River Seminary, Ogle county, after which he resumed teaching, then again attended school, studying five terms altogether. The other members of the family, seeing that he possessed fine mental resources, desired to aid him in securing a college education, but independence was one of his dominant traits and, rather than be a burden to his parents, he started out alone, with $40 in cash, to seek a livelihood. Going to Tennessee he taught school, reading law in the meantime, and was admitted to the bar by Judge Campbell of the circuit court. During the latter part of 1847 he returned north, and in the Clark Street Methodist Episcopal Church, Chicago, January 20, 1848, was united in marriage with Miss Helen M. Judson, the ceremony being performed by her father, who was pastor of that church. Returning with his young wife to Tennessee, he was prospered for a time, but, through the mismanagement of an associate, lost all of his accumulations. Hoping to get a new start in the north, he returned to Dekalb county, where he arrived with twenty-five cents for his cash capital. Borrowing the necessary money, he opened an office in Sycamore, after which he practiced law, kept books and, indeed, turned his hand to anything feasible.

Meantime the Northwestern University authorities had laid out the town of Evanston, twelve miles from Chicago, and his father-in-law, who was financial agent and manager of the institution, advised him to locate there. In April, 1854, he settled in Evanston, and in the spring of 1855 opened an office in Chicago, where he was practicing with Gen. John F. Farnsworth as a partner when the Civil war began. Eager to serve his country, he at once set about raising soldiers for the army, and afterward served until February 6, 1866, holding the ranks of major and colonel. In the fall after his return from the army he was elected sheriff of Cook county, Ill. In November, 1870, he was elected to the state senate, under the new constitution. In November, 1871, he was chosen congressman-at-large to fill a vacancy caused by the election of General Logan to the United States senate. A year later he was elected lieutenant-governor on the ticket with Governor Oglesby, but the latter accepting a seat in the United States senate, he only served as lieutenant-governor for ten days, when he took the oath as governor of Illinois, serving out the term of almost four years.

Under his administration the revision of the statutes was completed, and Illinois prepared an excellent exhibit for the Centennial at Philadelphia. On his retirement from the gubernatorial chair, he became a member of the firm of Beveridge & Dewey, bankers of Chicago. In December, 1881, under President Arthur he was appointed assistant United States treasurer, but resigned in September, 1885, in order that his friend, Luther Dearborn, might be given the place. Retiring from business in 1888, he lived quietly at his Evanston home until December, 1895, when he came to Hollywood, Cal., his present home. He is a member of the California Commandery, Loyal Legion, and Barlett Logan Post, G. A. R., of Los Angeles, and is identified with other organizations of a fraternal and patriotic character. Of his two children, the daughter, Alla May, born in Tennessee, February 20, 1849, is the wife of Samuel B. Raymond, county treasurer of Cook county, Ill.; they have two sons and one daughter. The son, Philo J. Beveridge, makes his home at Hollywood, where he is a large property owner and well-known citizen. He was born December 1, 1851, is married and has four daughters. The two oldest daughters reside in London. Of these Kuehne Beveridge, the well-known sculptor, executed a bust of Cecil Rhodes of South Africa and also a bust of King Edward of England for the city of Leeds, England.

Z. C. SAFFELL. The professions of law and medicine are not alone in supplying material for specialists, for in the important and indispensable occupation of building and contracting there are opportunities galore for the specialist, a fact which assumes greater proportions with every passing year, and is taken advantage of by the men of business discernment. In this connection Mr. Saffell has been particularly far-sighted, and while turning his attention to the best possible construction of flat buildings, has probably put up more of these modern attempts at luxury and comfort on a small scale than have any two of his fellow artisans in Los Angeles. Rows and rows of flats have gone up under his able management all over the city, a preference being noticeable for eight and four-flat buildings. Since he arrived in the city in May of 1894, his business has steadily increased, and now, during the busy season, he has a pay roll of $350 per week. At first he carried on his enterprises in connection with the firm of Wright & Saffell, but at the end of two years proceeded on independent lines, and has since been sole manager and proprietor of the business, which has its headquarters at 1744 West Twentieth street.

Of French descent, Mr. Saffell was born in Boone county, Ark., January 30, 1854, a son of

S. P. Saffell, who was born in Tennessee, and was one of the early settlers of Alabama. The elder Saffell was a builder and contractor, wagon-maker and cabinet-maker by occupation, and in after years settled in Junction City, Kans., where he followed his trades for some years. He later homesteaded a quarter section claim west of Salina, and in 1872 brought his family to Middletown, Lake county, Cal., where he worked as a carpenter. He now resides at Stockton, Cal., and is eighty-three years of age; his wife, formerly Mary Watson, a native of Alabama, died in Fresno, Cal. There were thirteen children in the family, seven of whom are living, Z. C. being the fourth. Mr. Saffell was educated in the public schools of Arkansas, and while still a young boy became familiar with the manipulation of carpenter's tools. He accompanied the family to California in 1872, and began contracting at Red Bluff, but in 1877 returned to Kansas, and in Muscotah, Atchison county, engaged in building and contracting for eight years. In 1886 he yielded to the lingering spell of allurements cast by his former visit to California, and returned hither, and in Fresno engaged for two years in his former occupation. In 1888 he went into the planing-mill business with his brother Fred, and after three years began to build and contract, during his residence in Fresno putting up some of the fine residences and public buildings. From Fresno he came to Los Angeles in 1894, as heretofore stated, and has since been identified with many different interests in the city. He is a Republican in national politics, and while living in Muscotah served for some time as councilman. He is fraternally connected with the Ancient Order of United Workmen. As a member, and president of the board of trustees of the Methodist Episcopal Church, he is active in promoting humanitarian projects in the city, and contributes generously to all worthy and seemingly wise efforts at improvement.

In Kansas Mr. Saffell married Lucy Platt, who was born near Natal in South Africa, being the daughter of Sidney Platt, a native of England, and a sugar planter in Africa. Mr. and Mrs. Saffell have one child, Herbert R.

S. C. PITZER. Counted among the influential men of Pomona and as one whose assistance has ever been given to the promotion of worthy local movements, Mr. Pitzer easily merits a position among the men to whom the present prosperity of the city may be attributed. He was born in Macoupin county, Ill., in 1841, and was reared on farms in Illinois and Iowa, in which latter state he gained his first experience in independent farming. On disposing of his Iowa interests he went to Nebraska, where he spent five years on a farm and where he still owns property. In order to give his children educational advantages he moved to Colorado and purchased property near the State University. While making his headquarters there he traveled much in various parts of the country and during a trip through Southern California became so delighted with the climate and the possibilities of Pomona that in 1894 he purchased a home here and an interest in the canning factory. Dispatching letters to his family at Boulder, Colo., he notified them of the change in his plans and directed them to prepare for a removal to the west. Soon he was joined by his wife, who was formerly Alice Kelly, of Iowa. With her came the children, Grant, Clara, Lee and Russell. The eldest of these was born in Hillsdale, Iowa, in 1868, and graduated from the Colorado University in 1894, since which time he has been associated in business with his father; he married Lizzie Whipp of Pomona and they own an attractive residence. The only daughter is the wife of Arthur Derward, of Hanford, Cal. Lee is associated with his father, and the youngest son is a student in the San Francisco Law School.

The canning factory in which Mr. Pitzer has been interested was built by Isaac Sanburn in 1888, and the business was established by him in association with others. The original officers of the company were J. H. Mertz, president; Isaac Sanburn, vice-president; C. C. Moore, secretary; and J. E. Ball, treasurer; Isaac Sanburn acting as manager from the first. The first work of the factory was the canning of peaches and pears, and later they also put on the market apricots, prunes and plums. Subsequently they entered into all kinds of canning, and have so continued. To secure adequate amounts for their use they raise their own berries, tomatoes and apples. The original building of brick has been enlarged from year to year in order to meet the constantly increasing demand for their canned goods. In 1901 the output was over one hundred car loads, and during the season five hundred hands were employed. The output for 1902 promises to be even larger than that of the preceding year. The special brands of peaches are Orange Blossom, Mocking Bird, Chrysanthemum, Searchlight and California Poppy, besides which they have fine brands of apricots, tomatoes, peas, etc., and dry fruits in addition to canning. So popular have their products become that they can scarcely supply the demand, which is itself the greatest testimony of their success. About 1895 Grant Pitzer was admitted to the firm as a partner, and three years later Mr. Pitzer turned his interest over to his other son, Lee, since which time he has been to a large extent retired, although his assistance and advice are ever at the call of his sons, and his long experience makes his counsel particularly valuable. During the Civil war Mr. Pitzer enlisted in the Second Nebraska Volunteer Cavalry in April, 1863, serving one year, and also took part in the battle of the White Stone Hills in North Dakota against the Indians. He and his wife have a commodious and attractive home at No. 683 Garey avenue. His ranch has ten acres in lemons and a similar tract in navel oranges.

J. L. SANDERSON. Were Mr. Sanderson to narrate his various adventures while connected with the stage routes which preceded the building of the railroads across the plains, he might furnish material for some aspiring teller of tales with which to interest the rising generation for years to come. The youth of Mr. Sanderson was spent among the hills of Franklin county, Vt., where he was born May 16, 1844. His paternal grandfather, Sanford, was born in Massachusetts and became a farmer in Vermont, and served with courage during the war of 1812. His son, Sanford, the father of J. L., was born in Franklin county, Vt., and he also was a farmer near the town of Highgate, and served for many years as a selectman. In his young manhood he married Jane Diamond, who was born in Vermont, and died there, and was the mother of three boys, two now living. The great-grandfather, Diamond, was born in Massachusetts and became one of the Pioneers of Highgate, and there the grandfather, Moses, was born, and became a farmer and served as an officer in the war of 1812.

J. L. Sanderson was reared on his father's farm, and attended the Highgate high school, and in 1866 went to Kansas City, Mo., where his uncle, J. L. Sanderson, had settled in 1860 and had the mail contract from St. Louis to Kansas City, Mo., during the war. In 1866 the uncle secured the government mail contract between the Missouri river and San Bernardino, Cal., and his nephew was a messenger on the overland stage route from Kansas City to Santa Fe. The stage line was conducted by Barlow & Sanderson, and those were busy times on the plains, especially during the Indian raids in 1867-69. The stage was often chased by the redskins and its passengers and driver had many narrow escapes from capture, which meant certain death and perhaps torture. From Fort Lyon to Larned the stage had a government escort. When the Santa Fe Railroad began to be built the firm contracted ahead of the railroad until they arrived in Santa Fe. During this time Mr. Sanderson served chiefly as agent and general assistant to his uncle. When the Leadville mines were discovered he ran the stage and mail to the town, and continued in the rather exciting occupation until the coming of the Rio Grande Railroad. In 1880 he ran a stage line from Salida to Gunnison, and later extended the line to Ouray, Silverton, and Grand Junction, on the frontier all the time. His uncle had four hundred miles of contract in Northern California, including Sonoma, Lake, Mendocino, and Humboldt counties, and the younger Sanderson was manager of the route for four years, with headquarters at Cloverdale, Cal.

January 1, 1887, Mr. Sanderson came to Los Angeles and engaged in the livery business, running the Eureka stables for three years. Since 1890 he has been located at 510 South Broadway, and has barns 51x150 feet in dimensions. The location near the center of the city greatly facilitates trade, and in fact the barns are the largest in the city proper. The enterprise is a livery, feed, and sale stable, and has a fine line of vehicles of all kinds, including tally-hos and outing traps, and horses which are above the average. Mr. Sanderson is a Republican in politics, and is a charter member of the Chamber of Commerce. Fraternally he is associated with the Foresters of America and with the Maccabees.

ADELMO SCHROEDER. The junior member of the firm of Schroeder Brothers, decorators and frescoers and sign painters, possesses the true western spirit, and knows how to apply his talents to the advantages of the artistic and social community of Los Angeles. Like his brother, Hugo, the senior member of the firm, he was born in Nauvoo, Ill., the old Mormon town, June 28, 1855, a son of John C. Schroeder, for many years identified with the Icarian movement in Illinois and Iowa, and a man of remarkable character and attainments.

The second in his father's family of six sons. Mr. Schroeder was educated in the private schools of Davenport, and when the family removed to Icaria, Iowa, in 1871 he began to work for the elder Schroeder, having in boyhood learned every department of the painting business. The little settlement of Icaria, founded by the father, contained mostly frame houses, and these Adelmo painted after the most approved method, and he was similarly employed after removing to Corning, three miles distant. He later went with the family to Creston and still contracted and painted, and December 1, 1874, removed to Los Angeles, the rest of the family following him in May of 1875. The father and sons opened a little shop in an adobe house near the corner of First and Main streets, Los Angeles, and which is the present site of the McDonald painting establishment. Work quickly came their way as their versatility and understanding of their business became known. They decorated the houses of Benjamin Truman, Mr. Hellman, Governor Downey, and Colonel Howard, which were but a few of their notable commissions. As sign painters the firm gained a truly enviable reputation, but this important branch of city decoration has been abandoned, owing to the demand for their services along purely decorative lines. However, they accomplished all of the fine sign work in the city, and in this have no superiors on the Pacific coast. From the original location the enterprise was shifted to the corner of First and Spring streets, and later to Temple street, and later still to where Gerson, the jeweler, is now conducting business. They were afterwards on different parts of Spring street, but since 1897 have conducted their affairs from the headquarters at No. 121 East Second street.

In San Francisco Mr. Schroeder married Augusta Breuer, a native of that city, and a daughter of O. S. Breuer, a miner and business man of San Francisco. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Schroeder. Adelmo, whose untimely death left a void in the hearts of all who knew him, met with an accident July 4, 1901, and died therefrom four weeks later. He was an unusually promising boy, and during the fifteen years of his life had graduated at the high school, begun to learn the machinist's trade, and developed a very fine singing voice. The other children are Augusta and William. Nineteen years ago Mr. Schroeder bought thirty feet of land at No. 731 South Broadway, which has since been his home. He is variously identified with the organizations in which Los Angeles abounds, and is a member of the Turn Verein, of which he was a trustee for one term. Fraternally he is associated with the Red Men and the Modern Woodmen of America. Mr. Schroeder has always been greatly interested in amateur plays, and at one time took a prominent part in this form of entertainment. He is a man of broad culture and exhaustive knowledge of general affairs, and is a citizen whom any community would be proud to have in its midst.

HUGO SCHROEDER. The many sided art of frescoing and decorating as interpreted by the Schroeder Brothers has placed Los Angeles in a position to compete with any city in the country, and to challenge the admiration and criticism of all who appreciate the vast amount of talent necessary for the accomplishment of harmonious embellishment. Although compelled by the pressure of general decorating demands to abandon for a few years past the business of sign painting, in this department alone the firm has inconceivably elevated the standard in the city. And when one reflects to what an extent the character of signs denoting different lines of business please with the compliment of harmony or repel with the insolence of crudity, and how sweepingly universal is the habit of advertising, this one phase of city life would seem to be of large and important proportions.

Hugo Schroeder, the elder of the brothers, was born in Nauvoo, Hancock county, Ill., March 28, 1853, a son of John C. and Amelia (Lemme) Schroeder, natives of Hamburg, Germany. John C. Schroeder, artist, educator, humanitarian, and scholar, possessed an intellectuality above the average, and embellished with his many sided culture whatever seemed to him worthy of consideration. In his native land he started to learn the apothecary business, but owing to his father's death, and the necessity of immediate self support, he adopted a much more congenial means of livelihood and developed an unusual talent for painting, especially landscape. This he continued for some time in Germany with much success, but an innate love of freedom, and a rebellion against the limitations by which he was surrounded, induced him to seek the larger possibilities of America. April 22, 1847, he left Hamburg on a sailer and arrived in New Orleans November 7th of the same year, and in the Louisiana city continued to paint landscapes and also frescoed, with the results achieved in the land of his forefathers. The same spirit of tolerance which had impelled his immigration to the United States inspired his life in New Orleans and caused him to view with abhorrence the evidences of bondage all through the south. In order to get away from the slave and his woes he removed to Nauvoo, Ill., July 2, 1851, and joined the Icarian community in which he became much interested. When a new colony was established in Adams county, Iowa, September 29, 1859, he identified his fortunes with the embryo undertaking. While the little band was still in its infancy, in 1860, he went to Davenport, Iowa, on a furlough, and for ten years worked at his favorite occupation, and became identified with the highest educational and material growth of the city. It was entirely owing to his recognition of its necessity that the first Froebel kindergarten school of Davenport was started, an enterprise in which he took much interest, and assisted in a practical and lasting way. During the Civil war he served his adopted country by fulfilling the duties of a recruiting officer in Davenport, a position to which he was appointed by the governor of the state. The Iowa city was rendered memorable to him also because of the death in February, 1863, of his wife, whom he had married in New Orleans, and who was in all senses of the word a helpmate and companion. In June of 1870 Mr. Schroeder went to Chicago, Ill., and remained until the following month, when he again sought his friends in Icaria, Iowa. Though he was a German by birth and education he was by this French colony elected president of the society, a position maintained for two terms.

This happened during the Franco-Prussian war, but Mr. Schroeder showed no inclination to return to fight the battles of the Fatherland, but rather continued his peaceful life in Icaria and as a frescoer made rapid strides as one of the most expert in his line. In 1874 he removed to Corning, Iowa, where he had established a business for the society, and the same year he went to Creston, Iowa, and engaged in sign painting and frescoing with his sons. Owing to a severe attack of rheumatism which nearly incapacitated him he came to California in November of 1874, a fortunate decision, for in time he regained his old strength of mind and body, and his talents shone with even greater brilliancy. He went into business with his sons in Los Angeles and worked up one of the largest sign and fresco trades in Southern California, and was thus employed until his death December 29, 1892. He was an artist of pronounced ability, a fine penman, and a writer of force and originality, and he understood the practical forces which go to make up an ideal community. Thus he was one of the founders of the German Benevolent Society, of the Turn Verein, the Germania Society, and the German Dramatic Society, in Davenport. The seventy-two years of his life were fashioned after broad intellectual lines, and his influence wherever he chose to reside redounded to the material, intellectual, moral and artistic well-being of his locality. Of the sons who have profited by the example of his life, and who revere his memory and recall with gratitude his efforts in their behalf, William is president of the California Art Glass Works of San Francisco; Adelmo is the partner of his brother, Hugo; Edward died at the age of three years; Fremont is a painter in San Francisco; and Emil lives in San Francisco and is an architect by profession. Emil Schroeder was adopted by his uncle, Edward Lemme, who had no children, and has since taken the name of Lemme. He is remarkably successful as an architect, and designed and carried out the Sutro Baths and the Cliff House, besides numerous important commissions in different parts of San Francisco.

Hugo Schroeder removed with his father to Icaria in the fall of 1859, and in the spring of 1860 went to Davenport, where he studied in the public schools until 1867. He then went to Denver, Colo., and apprenticed as a carriage-painter with the Weber Carriage Manufacturing Company, with whom he remained for four years. He then returned east and joined the family at Icaria, Iowa, and assisted his father in his business until 1873. After the family removal to Creston the sons operated with their father under the firm name of J. C. Schroeder & Sons, and in 1874 located in Los Angeles, where their skill won for them almost immediate recognition. For years headquarters of the decorating, frescoing and sign painting business were on Spring street, afterwards on Broadway, and since 1897 at No. 121 East Second street. They have an enormous trade, and have been called upon for the most responsible and artistic undertakings in the city. The business is conducted under the firm name of Schroeder Brothers.

In Los Angeles Mr. Schroeder married Jennie Happ, who was born in Buffalo, N. Y., a daughter of Martin Happ, who early settled in Los Angeles, and was a merchant tailor by occupation. Mr. Happ now lives in retirement in Los Angeles, and is the father of seven daughters, six of whom are living. To Mr. and Mrs. Schroeder have been born three children: Leo A., who is a graduate of the medical department of the University of California, class of 1902; Laura C., who is attending the high school and Walter H., who is also a student at the high school. Mr. Schroeder is the friend and patron of education, and is a man of liberal tendencies and unquestioned devotion to the public welfare. He is one of the commercially reliable men of the city, and his professional skill and numerous admirable personal characteristics have won for him a high standing in the community. He is a Republican in politics, and a member of the Master Painters' Association, of which he is a director.

GEORGE A. SMITH. One to whom the surroundings of Los Angeles have seemed to offer unusual inducements for the conducting of an ideal dairy business, and who has had the perseverance and common sense to carry his ideas to a successful termination, is George A. Smith, one of the most enterprising in his line in Southern California. From every standpoint Mr. Smith is a self-made man, for in his youth no good genius made the way smooth for future accomplishment. He was born in Macoupin county, Ill., near Bunker Hill, July 14, 1866, and is a son of John E. and Mary (Eddington) Smith. His paternal grandfather was born in St. Louis, Mo., and by occupation was an architect and builder in that city. Both himself and wife died within a few hours of each other during the first great cholera siege in the south. John E. Smith was born in St. Louis, and afterwards became a farmer in the vicinity of Bunker Hill, Ill., from which locality he removed to Los Angeles county, Cal., in 1896, and is at present ranching at Lamanda Park. During the Civil war he served on the Union side in the One Hundred and Fifty-second Illinois Infantry, and is at present a member of the Grand Army of the Republic. His wife was born in Macoupin county, Ill., a daughter of Joseph Eddington, who, at an early day, came from England and became one of the pioneers of the locality around Bunker Hill, Ill. Mrs. Smith, who died in Illinois in 1892, was the mother of three sons and two daughters, of whom George A. is the oldest. Joseph E. is a rancher in Los Angeles county; Frank T. is agent for the Santa Fe road at Redondo; Hattie P. is now Mrs. Sanders of Litchfield, Ill., and Cora B. is living at home.

On his father's farm Mr. Smith received a practical bringing up, and was educated in the district schools around Bunker Hill and at the academy in the town. In order to secure higher education he started in at the age of nineteen to teach school in McLean and Woodford counties, having paid his way through the academy by working on the farm during the summer, and he was therefore able to take a three years' course at the Illinois State Normal. In 1891 he came to Los Angeles, and at the time his available assets consisted of $1.40. He soon found a position in the Lynwood dairy as butter maker and engineer, and at the end of eighteen months resigned to engage independently in the butter and milk business. Then was started the enterprise which has since proved such a satisfactory source of revenue, but which was on a small scale, so small that one horse and wagon could take care of all the delivering. At the end of two years seven wagons were required for the carrying on of the business, and the largest retail butter and milk business in the city rewarded the enterprise of the owner thereof. Good goods and fair prices were the rule of the establishment, and absolutely fair treatment was assured to all who desired to profit by the opportunity to get the best the market afforded. In the mean time the men who were driving the wagons were gaining a knowledge of the business, and to them Mr. Smith sold his interests on the installment plan in 1897, and in due time the debt was entirely cancelled.

In May of 1897 Mr. Smith opened the wholesale creamery business in which he is now engaged, and which is located at No. 1235 East Ninth street. It would be difficult to find a more systematically conducted enterprise than what is known as Smith's creamery. The daily capacity is twelve hundred pounds, and the milk is obtained from different parts of the county, viz.: Clearwater, Downey, Long Beach, Bixby, and Cerretos. The most approved and modern machinery is used in the manufactory. A really remarkable increase in volume of business has followed Mr. Smith's ideal methods, for, whereas in 1897 about ten dollars' worth of business was done a day, there is now an average of over $10,000 a month, and a yearly average of $125,000. This is constantly increasing, and arrangements are always available for an enlarged capacity. The manufactory is equipped with a cold storage plant and the butter manufactured is sold to wholesale trade only. A more than local reputation is accorded the excellent article known as Smith's creamery for it is shipped to all surrounding towns and as far north as Ventura and also to Catalina island.

The marriage of Mr. Smith and Nellie M. Raymond was solemnized at Bunker Hill, Ill., November 12, 1890, Mrs. Smith being a daughter of Frederick Raymond, who was born in Somersetshire, England. Her paternal grandfather, Joseph, also a native of Somersetshire, brought his family to America when his son, Frederick, was twelve years of age, and became a pioneer farmer of the vicinity of Bunker Hill. Frederick Raymond, who was also a farmer near Bunker Hill, died in 1889. His wife, formerly Annie Jane Culp, was born in Tennessee, a daughter of Amos Culp, who removed from his native Tennessee to Brighton, Ill., where he was a pioneer farmer. There were seven children born to Mr. and Mrs. Raymond, of whom Mrs. Smith is the fourth, and the only one in California. Of the three children born to Mr. and Mrs. Smith, but one is living, George A., Jr. Nellie C. died at the age of nine years, and Clarence W. died at the age of two years. Mr. Smith is one of the charter members of the Los Angeles Creamery Board of Trade, of which he is ex-vice president and ex-director. He is also a charter member of the Dairyman's Association of Southern California. The success of Mr. Smith is based upon the application of universal principles of fairness and integrity, augmented by an unflinching courtesy and unusual tact.

WILLIAM P. SNYDER. When the work of building up Ocean Park was begun Mr. Snyder saw a favorable opening in the new town and accordingly began to do business here in his line of contracting painting. At the time of his arrival there were only about seventeen cottages, but the growth has been little short of remarkable since that time, and in 1900, the business growing very large, he deemed it advisable to move to the town, where he has since made his home. In 1901 he had contracts for about one hundred and twenty-five cottages and during the busy season furnished employment to twenty hands. His headquarters are in a new building he has erected on the corner of Lake and Hill streets.

In Marshall, Mich., William P. Snyder was born September 20, 1869, being the youngest child of Porter and Sarah Jane (Eddy) Snyder, mention of whom is made in the sketch of George D. Snyder. When fifteen years of age he began to learn the painter's trade, at which he served an apprenticeship in Jackson, Mich. During the four years of his time he learned every department of the trade. Returning to Marshall he worked for a year. In February, 1890, he settled in San Bernardino, Cal., and became foreman of painting in the bridge and building department of the Southern California Railroad between Barstow and San Diego. At that time he first beheld the site of the present village of Ocean Park, then called South Santa Monica. Nothing was to be seen but sandhills and the general aspect was unattractive and uninviting.

At the close of the strike in 1895 Mr. Snyder resigned his position with the road and began contract painting in Los Angeles, where he remained until his removal to Ocean Park. Even now he often returns to the city to fill a contract for one of his former customers. The careful and painstaking manner in which all of his work is done is recognized by the people and has won for him their confidence and appreciation. While in San Bernardino he married Helen M. Schoch, who was born in Marshall, Mich., of Pennsylvania parentage. The three children forming their family are Catherine, Paul and Phil. Mr. Snyder is a contributor to the Methodist Episcopal Church, of which his wife is a member. Fraternally he is connected with the Knights of Pythias, Uniform Rank, Royal Arcanum and Fraternal Brotherhood of Santa Monica.

QUINTUS LYMAN SPAULDING. The youngest in a family of five children, Q. L. Spaulding was born in Rumney, N. H., November 10, 1865, being a son of Lyman Spaulding and a brother of F. L. Spaulding of Los Angeles. After completing the studies of the district school, at the age of fourteen he entered Colby Academy at New London, N. H., where he remained for one term. Afterward for eight months he made his home with the family of August Tuffs, of Maulden, Mass., and rode two races for Mr. Tuffs, who was a well-known horseman. However, on account of illness he was obliged to return home. A year later he went to Boston and after a short clerkship in a grocery, began to learn the carpenter's trade, working up from an apprentice. The firm with which he remained for five years made a specialty of church and public buildings and had contracts in every part of New England. During 1886 he went to Florida, where he was hotel carpenter in Magnolia hotel and after his return to New England had a similar position in White Mountain hotel.

During the fall of 1887 Mr. Spaulding came to California and secured work at his trade in Pasadena. Soon he became interested in Laverne, where he bought land and was employed as carpenter by the Laverne Land and Water Company. However, the venture did not prove a success, and he then went to Oregon, returning to Massachusetts in 1888 and resuming work with his former employers. However, his short stay in the west had filled him with a love for California and he determined to return. The trip west was made via Denver, where he worked a short time; Spokane, where he was employed in the building of Hussey's bank; and Seattle, where he worked on the Pioneer building. After arriving in Los Angeles, he worked for his brother one year and then became his partner, continuing with him for four years, when he was severely injured by falling from a building on Adams street, and for a year was unable to engage in work of any kind. While he was still in very poor health he went to the Copper river country in Alaska, taking passage on the steamer Alice Blanchard, October 19, 1898, and landing at Orca. With his partner, David Fales, and taking a supply of thirty-two hundred pounds of provisions, he started for Bremner river, each man hauling his sled with its load of supplies. The entire winter was consumed in an effort to reach Bremner river, and, finally arriving at their destination, they engaged in prospecting. They found favorable indications but were unable to get to bed rock, as it was a mountain swamp and there was no way to handle the water. In the fall of 1899 they had the thrilling experience of boating down the Copper river, with its many rapids and countless dangers. On the 6th of November Mr. Spaulding arrived at home, little richer than when he left, but in the possession of the best of health, for which reason he counts his trip to Alaska as of inestimable value. For a time he worked at his trade in Tucson, Ariz., but in January, 1901, returned to Los Angeles, where he has since conducted a building business. He has erected stores and residences in every part of the city, and has an excellent reputation for reliable and skilled work.

In Santa Monica, Cal., Mr. Spaulding married Miss Gertrude Downs, who was born in Independence, Iowa. They and their children, Albert and Gwendolen, have a comfortable home at No. 746 East Twenty-fourth street, Los Angeles. Fraternally Mr. Spaulding is connected with the Maccabees. His political views are independent, and his vote is cast for the men whom he considers best qualified to represent and serve the people, irrespective of party ties.

E. J. STANTON. It is doubtful if Southern California contains among its many experienced lumbermen one more thoroughly conversant with every branch of the business than is E. J. Stanton, who deals in this necessary commodity on a scale of large proportions, and has probably accomplished more for the lumber interests of Los Angeles and vicinity than any one other individual. Nor must it be supposed that any short cut methods have resulted in Mr. Stanton's grasp upon one of the greatest industries of America, for when a boy with undeveloped perceptions he received his first impressions of business among the pineries of Michigan, under the capable tutelage of his father, one of the pioneer lumber manufacturers of Ionia and Montcalm counties.

A native of Angelica, Allegany county, N. Y., Mr. Stanton was born April 26, 1856, a son of Hon. E. H. Stanton, born in Greenville, N. Y., and grandson of R. H. Stanton, a farmer of New York state, and a soldier during the war of 1812. E. H. Stanton, who possessed capabilities for large public service, and business acumen for substantial enterprises, left New York in 1857 and settled in Beloit, Wis., where he was a large land owner, and was successfully engaged in the banking and general merchandise business. About 1861 he removed to Michigan and became interested in the manufacture of lumber, and was one of the first to realize the latent possibilities within the forests of Ionia and Montcalm counties. To facilitate his enterprises he organized the Ionia & Stanton Railroad, and laid out the town of Sheridan, Montcalm county. In recognition of his services in that part of the state the town of Stanton, the county seat of Montcalm county, was named after him, and the town of Sheridan, where the mills were located, attained a high degree of prosperity under the impetus of his enterprise and solid worth. He was a Republican in politics, and represented Ionia and Montcalm counties in the state senate for two terms, and he was mayor of Ionia for three terms. After years of well directed energy and ceaseless striving for the largest accomplishment, he retired from active business life, and died in Ionia in 1886, at the age of seventy-one years. He married Mary Sanford, a native of Greenville, N. Y., and who died in Riverside, Cal. Mrs. Stanton was the mother of six children, four of whom are living, E. J. being the third. Charles H. is the manager of the lumber business of H. M. Laud & Co., of Buffalo, N. Y.; Mrs. E. T. Montgomery lives in Ionia, Mich.; and Alice M. is a resident of Riverside, Cal. E. B. Stanton, a prominent attorney of Riverside, died July 31, 1901.

The education of Mr. Stanton was begun in the public schools of Ionia, Mich., and from earliest boyhood he began to acquire a knowledge of the lumber business. In 1876 he became manager of his father's large business at Sheridan, and continued in this capacity until the interests were disposed of in 1880. He then located in Saginaw, Mich., and was identified with the Saginaw Lumber & Salt Company for twelve years as manager of their sales department. In 1892 he removed to Williams and became a partner in the Saginaw Lumber Company, which, however, went out of business the following year, at which time he located in Los Angeles and started a lumber commission business. In 1896 Mr. Stanton began from comparatively nothing the lumber yard on East Seventh street, which now covers two blocks, and which owes its present commercial prestige to the perseverance and wide understanding of the owner and proprietor. Mr. Stanton conducts a purely wholesale business, and he is the sole representative south of Fresno of the Colorado Sugar and White Pine Agency of San Francisco, the lumber of which includes the sugar and white pine from every mill in the west; and he is representative of the C. C. Mengle Company lumber concern of Louisville, Ky., a large hardwood firm; and the George T. Houston Company of Chicago, Ill., the largest hardwood firm in the world.

In Albion, Mich., Mr. Stanton married Fannie Boynton, a native of Benton Harbor, Mich., and of this union there are three children, Adelaide, Roy E., and Lillian. Mr. Stanton has accumulated considerable property in Los Angeles, and he is prominently connected with the most exclusive social organizations of the city, including the Jonathan and Union League Clubs. He is also a member of the Chamber of Commerce. Fraternally he is associated with the Knights of Pythias, the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. He is a Republican in national politics, and is one of the versatile, popular, honorable and thoroughly representative citizens of this commonwealth.

LOUIS J. STENGEL. As a pioneer nurseryman of Los Angeles, where he established himself in business in 1873, Mr. Stengel has a wide acquaintance with the people of Southern California. His first location was on Los Angeles street, between First and Third, and for many years he continued there, but, finally, feeling the need of more space, about 1891 he removed to a six-acre tract between Johnson street and North Griffin avenue, where he now has his exotic gardens and nurseries. Visitors to the gardens are attracted by the complete assortment of ornamental trees and nursery stock, and admire particularly the collection of palms, which is the most complete to be found in this section of the state. A total of thirty-five thousand square feet of glass is utilized in the growing of plants, and the value of the gardens is further enhanced by a private reservoir and water plant. In addition to this property, Mr. Stengel is the owner of a large plantation in Mexico, near Guadalajara, and forty miles from Omaca, where he has set out two thousand acres in eucalyptus, pine and other trees, which he is raising for the wood.

Near Stuttgart, Wurtemberg, Germany, Mr. Stengel was born April 13, 1843, the third in a family of one daughter and three sons. All of these children came to America and two sisters still reside in New York state, where one brother, John, a harnessmaker, died recently. The father and grandfather both bore the name of Gottlieb Stengel, and were born near Stuttgart, being of a very old family of Wurtemberg. In their occupation, too, there was identity, as both were harnessmakers. Both attained advanced years, the grandfather dying at eighty-seven, while the father was ninety-seven when he died, and the latter was so hale and hearty to the last that he was able to continue work at his trade. The grandfather was a soldier during the Napoleonic wars from 1812 to 1815. The marriage of Gottlieb, Jr., united him with Annie Jelter, whose father, Charles, an innkeeper, and grandfather took part in the war with Napoleon, the latter, a lieutenant, participating in the march to Moscow and later serving in the Prussian army from 1812 to 1815. Mrs. Annie Stengel was forty-eight at the time of her death.

Reared in Ballingen and educated in the high school and gymnasium, Louis J. Stengel was fifteen at the time he crossed the ocean to America, arriving in the new world July 2, 1858, and celebrating the 4th in Boston, Mass., after a voyage of sixty-eight days from Havre on the sailing vessel Rufus Choate. His first employment in America was on a farm near Dedham, Mass., where he was paid $4 per month and board for a year, then for the second year $6 and board, and afterward received $20 per month as a gardener at Worcester, in charge of the Taylor estate, filling the position three years. In 1866 he was given a contract to carry United States mail between Klamath, Ore., and Yreka, Cal., a distance of one hundred and four miles, which he usually covered in twenty-four hours, with a horse and pack mule. Two round trips were made each week, until he resigned, after a year. No accident had happened nor did he meet with any attacks from savages, but had he done so, he would have been protected by his fine Maynard rifle, which carried twice as far as an ordinary gun.

In 1867 Mr. Stengel went to San Francisco and two years later settled in San Diego, where he opened a nursery on Fifth street, in the rear of the Horton house, remaining there until he removed to Los Angeles. During his residence in San Diego he married Miss Mary Reed, who was born in Placerville, Cal., and died in Los Angeles. The only child of this union, Louis, is a member of the United States Engineer Corps now in Japan. The second marriage of Mr. Stengel, in Los Angeles, united him with Miss Marie Brandis, who was born in Holstein, Germany, and by whom he has three children, Lillie, Carl and Elmer. The family are connected with the Episcopal Church. While in Massachusetts Mr. Stengel was made a member of King David Lodge, A. F. & A. M., with which he is still identified. During war times he was a member of the Union League. Ever since attaining his majority he has voted with the Republicans and worked for the principles of that party. The success which he has gained in the nursery business proves that he is especially adapted to that occupation. Under his care and oversight plants grow and blossom, and trees become hardy and strong. Indeed, it might be said that he had formed a partnership with Nature, and the result is that his nursery stock, fed by Mother Earth, warmed by the kindly rays of the southern sun, trained and nurtured by the wise skill of the gardener, attain a beauty and strength not always seen, but always greatly to be desired.

M. STEPAN, one of the successful brick-work and masonry contractors in Los Angeles, was born in Freistadt, Austria, July 10, 1848, and at the age of fourteen years was apprenticed out to learn the brick and stone mason's trade. His family was of German descent, early members having settled in Austria, and his father, John, was born in Freistadt, as was his mother, Sophia Capell, and his paternal grandfather. The family vocation was farming, and the twelve children born to John and Sophia Stepan were reared to a knowledge of the best way to conduct agricultural enterprises. M. Stepan was the youngest of this large family, and at his tenth year the other children, as well as the parents, were hale, hearty, and well, and in possession of their best faculties.

After completing his trade, M. Stepan traveled in different parts of Austria and worked as a stone mason, and then, to escape military duty, resolved to immigrate to America, where he would be at full liberty to pursue his effort to make his way in the world. Arriving in Baltimore, via Bremen, on the steamer Ohio, he made his way north, and at Winona, Minn., engaged at his trade with considerable success. So rapid was his rise that in 1875 he began contracting and building, extending his field of operation to St. Paul and Minneapolis, and including in his undertakings some of the largest and finest business blocks in Winona. In 1882 he married, in St. Paul, Mary Sophia Rowekamp, a native of Iowa, and of German descent. Shortly afterwards he removed to Jamestown, N. D., where he contracted and built until 1887. Among the buildings that went up under his good management were banks and the state asylum, as well as many public buildings and residences.

In the spring of 1887 Mr. Stepan settled in Los Angeles, where he has since been prominent in building circles, and has put up, among others, the Louis Roeder building, the Hoffman Hardware Company building, the Maier & Zobelein brewery building, the Los Angeles Brewing Company building, the Madera Trading Company's building, the Wilson block on First street, St. Joseph's Church, and many other constructions of equal prominence. Also, he has erected a pleasant and comfortable home for himself at No. 1942 Los Angeles street, in which are living his wife and seven children: Mary, John, Annie, Sophia, Vine, Edith and Clara. John is assisting his father in business. Mr. Stepan is a member of the Builders' Exchange, of the Turner Society, and the St. Joseph Society. In national politics he is a Democrat, but not an office seeker.

P. T. SULLIVAN. The Columbia Dairy, with its capacity for catering to one of the largest and most exacting trades in Los Angeles, owes its immunity from adverse criticism to the capable management of P. T. Sullivan, who thoroughly understands the many sides of his interesting occupation. His birth occurred in Kansas City, Mo., January 30, 1875, and he was brought to Los Angeles by his parents the following May. For many generations his ancestors tilled the soil of Ireland, and the paternal grandfather, Timothy, was no exception to the rule. His son, Timothy, the father of P. T., was born in county Kerry, Ireland, but with larger ambitions immigrated to the United States, where, for several years, he was longshoreman in Buffalo, N. Y. In 1869 he removed to Kansas City, Mo., and was there employed by the Union Pacific Railroad Company until his removal to Los Angeles May 24, 1875. In the west he engaged for a time in ranching, but eventually became interested in the dairy business to the exclusion of all other interests, operating on the site where his son now conducts his business, and where his death occurred in 1882. His wife, formerly Johanna Flaherty, was also a native of county Kerry, Ireland, and died in Los Angeles in 1897. Of her six children, Mary A., of Los Angeles, John, of Idaho, and Timothy, who died at the age of twenty-one years, were born in Buffalo; P. T. was born in Kansas City; and Margaret F. and Honore, both of San Mateo, were born in Los Angeles.

At the public schools of Los Angeles P. T. Sullivan received his preliminary education, this training being supplemented by further study at St. Vincent's College, Los Angeles. After her husband's death the mother reared her children on the home ranch, and in order to assist in the family's support P. T. left school in 1893, and, with his brother, John A., started the Columbia dairy business, under the name of Sullivan Brothers. In 1897 P. T. Sullivan bought out his brother, and has since independently managed the interests of the dairy. He has thirty-two acres of land between Rosalyn and Hollenbeck avenues, east of Ninth street, and he leases besides one hundred and fifty acres of land adjoining on the west. His own place is under water, as are also fifteen acres of the leased land, and the balance of the property is devoted to alfalfa and pasture for the cattle. The three barns, which are 48x160, 70x40 and 22x45 feet in dimensions, are modern of construction, and the dairy house is fitted with boilers, and is model in all of its appointments. The silo capacity is three hundred tons, and Mr. Sullivan finds no trouble in supplying his long list of patrons, for he bases his calculations upon the universal principle that pure goods will always be in demand, and that therefore he is entitled to at least a fair showing of the best custom of the city, and arranges accordingly.

July 17, 1900, in Los Angeles, Mr. Sullivan married Marie Le Mott, a native of Los Angeles, and a daughter of John S. and Maria (McGuire) Le Mott, natives respectively of Montreal, Canada, and Ireland. John S. Le Mott, who was of French extraction, and a copper and tinsmith by trade, located in Los Angeles about 1873, where he applied his trade with considerable success, and where he died in 1891. His wife is still a resident of Los Angeles. To Mr. and Mrs. Le Mott were born three children: Stephen M., who is an electrician in Los Angeles; Mrs. P. T. Sullivan; and J. W., who is a machinist in the employ of the Southern Pacific Railroad. Mrs. Sullivan is the mother of one child, Thomas Joseph. In national politics Mr. Sullivan is a Democrat. He is a broad-minded and enterprising citizen, and his success in life materially promotes the prosperity of his city.

PETER TAYLOR, Sr. The early representatives of the Taylor family were seafaring men. The grandfather of our subject was Capt. Peter Taylor, who was engaged in the wheat trade in the Mediterranean and Baltic seas and continued to follow the sea until he was seventy-six, his death occurring when he was eighty-seven years of age. Captain Taylor's father and grandfather were also in charge of ships in the same trade, and our subject has in his possession a Bible, printed in 1615, which these captains carried during their various cruises. The third of these captains had a son, George, who was born in Heddington, Scotland, July 21, 1791, and served for a time in the English navy, after which for years he was steward of the large estate of Sir John Hugh Dalrymple, Viscount Stair. He died in Scotland in 1865.

The wife of George Taylor was Elizabeth Storey, who was born in Northumberlandshire, England, and died in Scotland in 1848. Of her three children, Peter alone survives. She was a daughter of John Storey, a farmer on the Tweed. One of her brothers, Robert Storey, was well known as the Northumbrian poet and received a prize of one hundred guineas for his poem, "The Death of Byron." Early in life a school teacher and also a famous athlete, after his marriage to a lady of wealth he became editor of the Leeds Intelligencer and in an editorial capacity won distinction. He was honored with appointment as secretary of the audit office in London. His son, Gourley Pierson Storey, is now rear-admiral in the English navy.

The education of Peter Taylor, Sr., was secured in the schools of Edinburgh and vicinity. When sixteen he began as fireman on the Edinburgh & Glasgow Railroad, on whose first locomotive he had ridden when eleven years of age. After two years as fireman with that road, he accepted a similar position with another and was soon made engineer and later promoted to other positions. Coming to America in 1850, he engaged as engineer in the pinneries of Wisconsin and resided successively in Yellow River and Portage. Later he began to manufacture lumber, bringing the necessary machinery from Chicago. In 1860 he came to California via Panama, and at first ran an engine, then engaged in saw-milling, and in the fall of 1861 went to Virginia City, where he put in machinery and ran engines for mining companies. In 1867 he went to Arizona as superintendent of the Vulture mine at Wickenburg, but through the dishonesty of the mine's manager, he lost about $14,000. In 1873 his wife came to Los Angeles and he joined her here the next year. Buying fifteen acres at first, he added to it until he had forty acres within the city limits, and he still owns twenty-eight and one-half acres, but this he rents. Since coming to Los Angeles his life has been a very busy one. He laid pipes for the water works at Santa Monica and then assisted in building a locomotive for the plant. Next he was superintendent of the Emigrant mine in Inyo county and later opened gold mines in the Beverage district, where he put in a 5-stamp mill, conveying all the machinery on mules twelve miles over the mountains. On account of an injury by a runaway team, he found himself seriously affected by the high altitude, and was obliged to dispose of his interests, at a serious financial loss to himself. His reputation as an expert in judging mines led to his frequent employment in that capacity. For one year he prospected for a company of English investors in San Gabriel Canon, since which time he has been retired. During his long experience in mining life he has had many narrow escapes, and time and again he was in the greatest peril. Misfortunes, too, have come to him, perhaps in a larger degree than they come to most, but he has borne them with an undaunted spirit and a brave heart, and the evening of his existence is being passed in quiet contentment in his pleasant home.

June 28, 1852, at Decorah, Columbia county,

Wis., Mr. Taylor married Miss Jane Wilson, a native of Nelson, Renfrewshire, Scotland, and a daughter of James and Mary (Robertson) Wilson, who were born in Scotland and died in Wisconsin. They were the parents of six sons and four daughters, seven of whom are living, Mrs. Taylor being one of the youngest. In 1843, when thirteen years old, she accompanied her parents to America and settled in Wisconsin. Of her marriage three sons were born, in whose future the hopes of their parents centered. The oldest, George, was a stalwart youth, possessing a splendid constitution, and standing six feet and three inches tall. When he was twenty years of age he was in Arizona, fixing a flume for the Vulture mine, and when about ten miles out from the mine, he was waylaid by Apache Indians and assassinated. The second son, James, was burned to death in 1891 when the family lost their home by a fire. The youngest son, Peter, alone survives, and he is engaged in superintending his father's ranch.

S. W. VAN DOMPSELAAR. A descendant of one of those fine patrician families whose social standing, cleanly morals, and wise conservatism have kept alive the enviable prestige of the Netherlands, Mr. Van Dompelaar was born in Franker, Province of Friesland, Holland, January 10, 1845. His grandfather, Albert, was born in Utrecht, in the north of Holland, and was a landscape gardener by occupation, while his father, William, was a native of Friesland, and was a landscape gardener on a large estate up to the time of his death at the age of forty-five. He married Aaltje Wassenaar, who also was born in Friesland, a daughter of Pier Wassenaar, representative of a Friesland family of ancient lineage. Mrs. William Van Dompelaar, who died when thirty-one years old, was the mother of three children, of whom S. W. is the oldest and the only one in America.

At the age of fifteen Mr. Van Dompelaar was left an orphan with little to depend on save his own enterprise and ability, and he proved worthy of the emergency created by the death of his parents. In order to prepare himself for self-support he discontinued his educational researches at the public schools, and with the thoroughness characteristic of Dutch character and undertakings began to learn the trade of building. He shouldered the lowly hod with its burden of brick or mortar and patiently made his way to the greater responsibilities involved in brick-laying and plastering. Every department known to master builders was invaded and conquered by this careful workman, and at the end of four years he started out on the roads of Holland as a journeyman builder. After years he was rewarded with the position of foreman of construction on a high-school building, and from then on his trade was comparatively easy of prosecution and attended with considerable success.

Of a decidedly ambitious nature, Mr. Van Dompelaar rightly estimated that a broader field than the Netherlands awaited him in America, and in the spring of 1873 he located in Minneapolis, Minn., where he was not long in finding carpenter work, and where he soon after turned his attention to building and contracting. He in time found a remunerative position as superintendent of the tile and slate roofing department of a Minneapolis firm, following which he traveled over different parts of the country in search of a desirable permanent location, visiting on his journey Iowa, Nebraska, North and South Dakota and Washington, and in the spring of 1893 located in Los Angeles, where he engaged in the carpenter business. Six years later, in 1899, he began contracting and building, and at the present time has much admirable work to his credit, his particular aptitude seeming to run towards the designing and construction of artistic and convenient residences, of which he has put up many in different parts of the city. Among his important contracts have been those for George W. Stimson and for Neimeyer on Central avenue. He has also accomplished some work on his own responsibility, and has built three different residences for himself.

In Holland Mr. Van Dompelaar married Regyna Veltman, a native of that country, and of this union there are two children, Theresa, who is engaged in educational work, and is a graduate of the Los Angeles Normal, class of 1897; and Dollie Alida, who is living at home. Mr. Van Dompelaar is a Republican in national politics, and is fraternally connected with the Independent Order of Foresters. He is one of the substantial men of Los Angeles, and probably has no superior in the building line in Southern California.

MARTIN WETZEL. As chief engineer of the county court house plant, also as a broad-minded politician and enterprising and respected citizen, Mr. Wetzel is well known in Los Angeles, and is one of the town's most faithful upholders and advocates. He was born in Louisville, Ky., September 12, 1853, and is the oldest (and only child in California) in a family of two daughters and three sons, of whom one daughter is deceased. His father, Anton, a noble patriot of the Fatherland, was born in Baden, Germany, and came to America when a young man. After locating in Kentucky, he engaged in the boot and shoe business, and was thus employed when the army of freedom was established in Baden in 1848, in the hope of shaking off the yoke of German rule. He decided that his duty lay in the direction of fighting for the freedom of Baden, and, accompanied by his brother-in-law, Fred Schweickert, who died later in San Diego, Cal., he returned to his native land to fight for an already doomed cause. With the collapse of the patriotic movement he escaped with Carl Schurz to America, their party including Stube, the historian, General Siegel and many others. In Louisville, Ky., he resumed the boot and shoe business, and in connection therewith managed with admirable success his large plantation near the city. At present he is living in Louisville, and, at the age of seventy-eight, is hearty and well, and young in heart and appearance. His wife, formerly Barbara Snyder, was born in Baden, Germany, and died in Kentucky.

The education of Mr. Wetzel was acquired in the public schools of Louisville, and he graduated from the high school. His first business experience was gained with his uncle Schweickert, who had a government contract to furnish stores with hardware and merchandise, and in 1866 he accompanied his uncle as clerk and had charge of several stores along the way in Nebraska and later in Wyoming, as far as Bear river. In 1867 he went to California, by stage from Corinne to Wells, and by train to Sacramento, and thence to San Francisco and San Diego. Finding nothing in his line to be done, he returned to Wilmington and came to Los Angeles, and still finding no occupation, returned to Wilmington and worked on the wharf at that place. When the Wilmington & Los Angeles Railroad was started he entered the employ of the company in the machine shop, and later became fireman and machinist. In 1872 he was promoted to the position of engineer, and the following year began to run between Downey and Los Angeles, until the line was extended to Anaheim, twenty miles distant, after which he ran between Los Angeles and Colton, the end of the road. He was the first to be promoted to engineer on the Southern Pacific in Los Angeles county, and when the road was connected with the Southern Pacific to San Francisco he was promoted to passenger engineer, and ran overland between Los Angeles and Mojave for many years. In 1893 he resigned from the service and went to Old Mexico, on the Mexican Central, between Guadalajara and Irapata, and upon returning to Los Angeles, entered the employ of the Pasadena & Los Angeles Electric Railway Company. During the six years in this capacity his tasks were pleasant and congenial, and the position is remembered as one of the most satisfactory in his career. In 1900 he resigned to accept his present position as chief engineer of the county court house plant, which has an engine and two boilers.

In Los Angeles, Mr. Wetzel married Julia Snyder, who was born in Rochester, N. Y., and became the mother of three children: Emma is now Mrs. Robert Heaney, of Los Angeles; Charles was accidentally shot while hunting, at the age of fifteen; and Raymond was killed in the Southern Pacific shops when eighteen years old. Mr. Wetzel is a Republican all the time, and has been prominent in the political affairs of Los Angeles. He has served on the central committee, and was superintendent of street sprinkling for two years. Fraternally he is associated with the Wilmington Masonic Lodge No. 198, and is a charter member of the Los Angeles Ancient Order of United Workmen No. 55. He was reared in the Lutheran faith, and his wife is a member of the Presbyterian Church. At No. 514 Pasadena avenue he made his home for twenty-five years, and his present residence is at No. 2114 Pasadena avenue.

ROBERT P. VIVIAN. The identification of Mr. Vivian with the Los Angeles Electric Company began in January, 1895, when he accepted a position as machinist in their plant. Three years later, in recognition of his ability and faithful service, he was promoted to the position of chief engineer, in which capacity he has since continued. The duties of the place are discharged with intelligence, and the engineer's quick and versatile mind is ever eagerly reaching forward, in an endeavor to apply important improvements and to discover more perfect methods of mechanism than those already attained. With this thought in view, he has invented a number of devices in improved machinery, including an automatic safety stop and a metallic rod packing device, both of which have been applied successfully in the works.

As first mate of a vessel that sailed round the Horn during the early '50s, Robert Vivian, a native of Cornwall, England, and a member of one of that country's old families, came to California in the pioneer days of this state's history. His voyages had taken him to every important port and every sea in the world, but after settling in San Francisco he gave up a seafaring life, and, as a member of the firm of Green & Vivian, conducted a ship-rigging establishment until his retirement from business. In that city he died when fifty-two years of age. Fraternally he was connected with the Improved Order of Red Men. In Boston, Mass., he married Catherine Byrne, a native of county Waterford, Ireland, whence she immigrated to Boston, Mass. At her death, which occurred in San Francisco in 1898, she left three sons and one daughter, all of whom remain in San Francisco except Robert P., the youngest of the family. He was born in San Francisco April 23, 1868, and at an early age began to learn the machinist's trade, serving for four years in the Risdon iron works. Meantime, in order to secure desired advantages, he attended the Lincoln evening school, from which he was graduated with honors.

In order to assist in putting in the machinery of the Boyle Heights and Downey avenue plants of the Los Angeles cable railway, Mr. Vivian came to Los Angeles in 1889. While putting in the engines, his work was executed so promptly and with so much skill and intelligence that he attracted the attention of the superintendent of the plant, who tendered him the position of engineer at Boyle Heights. His ambition had been to return to San Francisco and complete a course in draughting and drawing, and it was only after considerable thought, as well as persuasion on the part of the master mechanic, that he was induced to relinquish his plans for the future. For two years he acted as engineer of the Downey avenue plant and for three years was a machinist in the Southern Pacific shops, after which he entered the employ of the Los Angeles Electric Company, where he has charge of a plant of three thousand horse-power. At one time he was secretary of the National Association of Stationary Engineers, Los Angeles No. 2, which he represented in the national convention at Milwaukee in 1900. By his marriage to Elizabeth M. Smith, a native of San Francisco and the daughter of pioneers of that city, he has two children, Robert Joseph and Irene, the family making their home at No. 724 Lawrence street. In religion they are of the Roman Catholic faith, holding membership in St. Viviana Church, and Mr. Vivian is also associated with the Catholic Order of Foresters. Fraternally he holds membership in the Ancient Order of Hibernians.

WILLIAM A. WING. A resident of Los Angeles since 1893, Mr. Wing was born in Levant, Me., and is a descendant of an English family that came to America during the colonial period, thenceforward identifying themselves with the progress and development of Maine. In Dexter, that state, occurred the birth of both A. J. Wing and his father, Joshua. The latter was a millwright, but the former took up the work of a contracting painter, and as such became known throughout his section of the state and was given contracts for many large buildings. Though not active in politics, nor an office-holder, he was a stanch Republican. In religious views he was connected with the Baptist Church. He died at Levant in July, 1901. His wife, who survives him, was Jane L. Mills, daughter of William Mills, a farmer of Maine and a descendant of English ancestors.

In the family of eleven children (all living), William A. Wing was sixth in order of birth, and he and a brother, Walter F., are the only ones in California. He was born February 20, 1871, and received his education in the Levant grammar and high schools. When fourteen years of age he began to work under his father, with whom he continued for seven years. From 1892 until 1893 he was employed in Lowell, Mass., and in the fall of the latter year came to California, settling in Los Angeles. During the spring of 1894 the firm of W. T. Dunvell & Co. was organized, consisting of himself, W. T. Dunvell and Richard Arenz. Six months later the junior members bought out the principal partner and the partnership of Wing & Arenz was formed, which has continued to the present day. The firm have had many contracts for painting, among them being those for the Boston Dry-Goods Store, Laughlin building, Angelus hotel, New Raymond hotel, First Baptist Church, St. Paul's Reformed Episcopal, Jefferson Street Methodist Episcopal and Christian Science churches; the Van Nuys, Posey, Bonfilio, Francis, Canfield and Neur residences; besides residences, churches and public buildings all over Los Angeles county. During the busy season employment is furnished to about fifty hands, and these are superintended by Mr. Arenz, while Mr. Wing gives his attention to the taking of contracts and a general management of the business. He is connected with the Builders' Exchange and has been treasurer of the Master Painters' Association ever since its organization. Politically he is a Republican, and fraternally is connected with Lynde Lodge No. 174, A. F. & A. M., in Hermon, Me. His business location is No. 117 Winston street, while the residence of himself and wife (the latter formerly Louise Barz, of San Francisco) stands at No. 1029 West Seventeenth street.

EDMUND B. FOSTER. This pioneer of the Buena Park district came to Orange county in the winter of 1876, and two years later bought and settled upon the land where he has since lived. The ranch which he owns comprises eighty acres and is devoted to dairying and to a general farming business. Of eastern birth and parentage, he was born in Oneida county, N. Y., December 31, 1837. At the age of four years he was taken by his parents to Madison county, N. Y., and there grew to manhood, meantime becoming familiar with all the duties connected with the management of a farm.

At the time that he settled in Orange county and purchased his present property he found the land in practically a wild and primitive condition, he being the first permanent settler on the farm. The improvements now noticeable are the result of his energy and capable foresight, and he has made of the tract one of the best ranches in the neighborhood. In addition to the management of his property he has maintained an interest in local affairs, especially in the welfare of the schools, and as a member of the board of trustees of the Centralia school district has done much to advance the standard of scholarship and elevate the condition of the schools of the district. In his former home in the east, as here, he was an active worker in the Republican party, and his efforts were always to be relied upon in the interests of his party. During his residence in Stockbridge, Madison county, N. Y., he held a number of offices, including those of assessor and highway commissioner. His connection with the business interests of the county was also intimate, and for several years he was manager of the Siloam cheese factory at Smithfield, that county.

ALVIN M. WOODS. Shortly after the close of the Mexican war, in which he was a soldier, John Woods, a native of Cincinnati, Ohio, and a farmer of Hamilton county, that state, conceived the idea of attempting to raise stock and general farm products in California. At that early day little was known concerning the far west and few residents of the east had braved the dangers of the unknown mountains and deserts or the monotony of a voyage around the Horn, in order to try their fortunes in a region so remote from civilization. With all the courage and enthusiasm of youth, in the fall of 1847 he crossed the plains along the northern route, and finally arrived at Sutter's Fort, where gold had been discovered only a few weeks before. He operated the first sawmill at the fort, but his original intention of becoming a farmer was never lost sight of, and in 1849 he entered one hundred and sixty acres of government land at Santa Cruz, which through his efforts was transformed from barren waste to an improved farm. On that homestead his death occurred in 1884, when he was sixty-nine years of age. His wife, Mary A. (Silvey) Woods, was born in Bedford, Mo., and died at Santa Cruz, Cal., when sixty-two years old. Of their eleven children, all but one are still living, Alvin M. being one of twins that were about the middle of the family in order of birth. In Santa Cruz, where he was born February 9, 1860, he attended grammar and high schools.

On leaving the farm, when seventeen years of age, Mr. Woods became a fireman on the railroad between Santa Cruz and Watsonville. Three years later he secured a similar position on the California Southern, running to San Diego. Eight months later he was transferred to San Luis Obispo as stationary engineer during the building of the road, and after another eight months he went to New Mexico, where he engaged as a machinist and erecting engineer in the mines of Grant county. A year later he went back to Santa Cruz, where he was chief engineer of the electric light plant of the city. A mining expedition to the Columbia and John Day rivers in Oregon consumed six months, after which he was locomotive engineer on the line of the Oregon Railway & Navigation Company for eight months. Again returning to Santa Cruz, he later was engaged by a San Francisco mining company to erect their patent amalgamating machinery in Calaveras and Sonoma counties. After the completion of this responsible work, he resumed the position of chief engineer of the Santa Cruz electric light plant, where he continued for two years.

The first position held by Mr. Woods in Los Angeles, where he arrived in 1894, was that of engineer of the power house of the Los Angeles cable railway. Eight months later he was employed to assist in putting up and starting the Sherman plant. For eighteen months he was chief engineer of the Santa Monica electric light plant, and the two following years were devoted to erecting work. In 1901 he accepted the position of chief engineer and electrician at the Hollenbeck hotel, since which time he has superintended the remodeling and enlarging of the fine power plant. His thorough knowledge of machinery adapts him for responsible positions, and in the various capacities in which he has been employed his work has always been satisfactory and reliable. Prominently connected with Los Angeles No. 2, National Association of Stationary Engineers, he has held the offices of corresponding secretary and vice-president in the local division. The nominees of the Republican party receive his ballot and its principles his support, while fraternally he is associated with the Modern Woodmen of America. After coming to Los Angeles he was united in marriage with Miss Dora Robertson, who was born in Indiana, but was reared principally in the west. They have one child, Grace Woods.

CHARLES ALLGEYER. On a ranch near Brookhurst, in Orange county, Mr. Allgeyer has made his home since 1890, previous to which he resided for several years near El Monte, this state, and followed general farm pursuits in that locality. At this writing he is the owner of a homestead of thirty acres, all under cultivation, and another ranch of ten acres situated about one and one-half miles south of his home place. All of the trees on both tracts were set out by himself, all of the improvements were made by him personally, and therefore the present condition of the land may be attributed to his perseverance and judicious labor.

In Baden, Germany, Mr. Allgeyer was born November 2, 1854. The first fourteen years of his life were passed in Germany, where he received a fair education. He then accompanied his parents to America, taking passage at Havre on the steamer Atlantic, and landing in New York after a voyage of twenty-six days. From the latter city the family proceeded to Montgomery county, Mo., and there remained for many years, meantime carrying on farm pursuits.

He is a member of the Fullerton Walnut Growers' Association and is well known among the horticulturists of his vicinity.

E. HENRY WAY, M. D. Since establishing his residence in Riverside, in 1884, Dr. Way has won and maintained a high reputation for skill in medicine and surgery. Through previous years of successful practice in the east, added to post-graduate courses of study not only in this country but also abroad, he had acquired a thorough knowledge of the science to which the active years of his life are being given. On the formation of Riverside county he was appointed county physician. He organized the hospital and continued in charge of the same for three years, when it was moved to San Jacinto, and he resigned. His special courses in Europe include post-graduate work at Guy's Hospital, London, England, in 1878; a course at Vienna in 1891, and six months in the same city in 1900-01, where he had the advantage of personal contact with the most famous specialists of the old world.

Referring to the personal history of Dr. Way, it may be stated that he was born in Paynesville, Ohio, August 25, 1851, being the youngest of seven children. After acquiring a preliminary knowledge of therapeutics as a student of Dr. E. W. Robertson, he entered the Cleveland Medical College, from which he received the degree of M. D. in 1874. During the same year he became assistant to his former preceptor, with whom he remained for two years. He then embarked in independent practice, selecting Jefferson, Ohio, as his location. After a few years the failure of his health led him to remove, in 1881, to Ludington, Mich., where he not only built up an excellent general practice, but also was employed as surgeon for several of the large milling companies. Owing, however, to the severity of the climate, his health again failing, he was obliged to make another change, and thereupon came to Riverside.

During his residence in the east Dr. Way was a member of the hospital board, and he also served as county health officer for two years until the office was discontinued. The California State Homeopathic Association numbers him among its members, as also the Southern California Homeopathic Medical Association, and he has also been connected with the American Institute of Homeopathy. The Republican party receives his support politically, while in religion he is identified with the Congregational Church. While living in Jefferson, Ohio, he was made a Mason and raised to the Chapter degree. He is a charter member of the Riverside Chapter and past eminent commander of the commandery at this point. The residence which he occupies stands on Orange street and was built under his personal direction. He has for many years owned orange grove property, but has devoted himself to professional and not horticultural work.

CHARLES WHITTED, D. D. S. In the practice of dentistry, to which he is giving his mature years, Dr. Whitted has gained a reputation for skill and thorough professional knowledge, and has established a practice that is a tribute to his ability. Both in Indiana, where the earlier years of his practice were passed, and in Santa Ana, where he opened an office in February, 1894, his position is among the successful representatives of his profession. Of eastern parentage, he was born near Bloomington, Ind., December 12, 1853, a son of Silas and Lucetta (Owen) Whitted. Primarily educated in the public schools of Springville, Ind., he afterward carried on his studies in the high school. On graduating therefrom, he matriculated in the University of Indiana at Bloomington, where he took the complete scientific course, graduating with the degree of B. S. On the completion of his literary studies, he turned his attention to the study of dentistry, and for a time was a student in a dental school in Cincinnati, later continuing his studies in Indianapolis, where he was graduated, both in the regular course and in a post-graduate course. He received the honors of his class, his standing surpassing all previous records in scholarship. His first location for practice was at Bloomington, where he established a growing practice that in time extended among the best families of the place. From the beginning of his practice in Santa Ana, Cal., he met with the recognition due his skill and drew an increasing patronage, as a result of his thorough professional knowledge and superior skill.

BELMONT PERRY. The ancestral home of the Perry family was in central England, and the immigration of some of their members to the United States long before the Revolution resulted in the immeasurable gain to American history of such distinguished representatives as Commodore Oliver Hazard Perry, the "Hero of Lake Erie," and Commodore M. C. Perry, known to fame through his association with the Japan expedition. Belmont Perry, attorney-at-law of Santa Ana, was born in Flemington, N. J., March 14, 1854.

The education of Mr. Perry was obtained at the Pennsylvania Military Academy, at Chester, Pa., and at St. Stephens College, New York, after which he studied law with his father, Judge Perry, and with Judge R. S. Kuhl, of Flemington, N. J. He was admitted to practice at the New Jersey bar in June of 1875.

At Woodbury, his former home in New Jersey, he assumed numerous important responsibilities, and was for a time city solicitor, bank director, an officer in the Gloucester County Bible Society, and for ten years was president of the City Library Association. He arose to conspicuous eminence in New Jersey Democratic affairs, was twice chairman of state Democratic conventions, and was favorably mentioned as a candidate for gubernatorial and congressional honors. As state's attorney Mr. Perry prosecuted three of the most famous murder trials ever held in New Jersey, viz.: the State vs. George M. Dunham; the State vs. James Hillman; and the State vs. Michael Tighe.

Owing to failing health, Mr. Perry came to California in 1898, and for a time was engaged in journalistic work, as editor of his purchase, the Santa Ana Standard. In California and in the east he has engaged in miscellaneous literary work, and started, and for a time edited, the Gloucester (N. J.) County Democrat, and also aided in a preparation of the history of Gloucester county. Valrosa, the beautiful home of Mr. Perry, is located on his splendid fruit ranch on the outskirts of the city, and is graciously presided over by Mrs. Perry, who was, before her marriage, Lida, daughter of Rev. Daniel Thackeray, of Woodbury, N. J.

HUBERT HENRY WAKEHAM. The fine Wakeham ranch, five miles south of Santa Ana, is a monument to the industry, enterprise and good citizenship of Hubert H. Wakeham, who, though dead since March 26, 1888, is nevertheless remembered by many who knew him during his sojourn in Southern California. He was a model agriculturist, a good business man, and the possessor of those sterling traits of mind, character and attainment which win esteem and consideration. His counsel and purse were ever at the disposal of worthy and needful causes, and his practical, common-sense views and honesty of expression made him eagerly sought for on important occasions. Although a member of the Republican party, he was in no sense a politician, his existence being fashioned on those serene lines wherein the strife and uncertainty of politics had no place.

To an unusual extent he inherited the substantial traits of the English race, his ancestors for generations having been loyal adherents of English rule. He was born in Revelstock, Devonshire, England, in November, 1832, a son of John Wakeham, of Devonshire, and an agriculturist by occupation. Hubert H. immigrated to the United States when twenty-one years of age, his journey taking him through Canada, and he remained in Illinois for some time. Eventually he made the overland trip to California, and lived in Sacramento prior to locating in Los Angeles county in 1867. From there he came to what is now Orange county. He purchased a tract of unimproved land, which his enterprise converted into a paying property, and upon which he instituted all modern and convenient improvements.

The year of the Centennial at Philadelphia found Mr. Wakeham in the Quaker city, an enthusiastic tourist and keen observer of the marvelous things there to be seen. True to the memory of an early love across the sea, he returned to the scenes of his youth and married Elizabeth S. Helmer, a native of Plymouth, England, and a daughter of Frederick and Ann (Evans) Helmer. On returning to the United States with his bride he settled on the ranch improved by himself, and erected what was then one of the finest rural homes in Southern California, south of Los Angeles.

JOHN D. PARSONS. Not only through his work as a business man, but in other lines of enterprise, Mr. Parsons has been able to promote the welfare of his home city, Santa Ana. That he maintains a deep interest in local matters is evinced by his acceptance of the position of member of the city council, to which he was elected by acclamation and in which office he is now serving his third term. During this period he has given his support to such measures as seem best adapted to promote the welfare of the city and the development of its material resources.

The oldest of three children, John D. Parsons was educated principally in Maine, but at the age of eighteen he returned to his native county in Missouri. In a short time he located upon a farm in St. Louis county, where he took up the work of an agriculturist; but, owing to ill health, was obliged to sell his interests there and seek a more congenial climate. It was in this way that he was induced to come to California. November, 1886, found him a resident of Santa Ana, where he has since made his home. As soon as he was restored to health he took an active part in the enterprises of the town. In 1892 he opened a grocery at No. 414 West Fourth street, where he has since successfully continued in business. In addition to the management of his store, he owns a walnut orchard northeast of Santa Ana and also valuable city property.

WILLIAM CROWTHER. One of the largest, best known and improved properties in Orange county is the ranch owned by William Crowther. The one hundred and thirty-six raw and unpromising acres which came into his possession in 1875 have been induced, under the influence of unremitting care, to yield abundantly of the products which have rendered this section of the country world famous. Eighty acres of land are under English walnuts and about twenty-five acres under oranges, deciduous fruits and a small vineyard. Although so successful as a horticulturist, this particular branch of industry would seem to be but incidental in the life of a man whose start in life was propitiated by the learning of a useful and at all times needful trade. To the accomplishment of this early forethought he owes many of the opportunities which, when worked out, have placed him among the benefactors of an appreciative community.

As one of the intelligent pioneers of his locality Mr. Crowther necessarily became conscious of the many improvements required before the soil would yield even fair returns, and the available facilities for irrigation be such as to induce those in search of homes to locate within the county. He therefore gave to the subject of waterways his most earnest consideration, and was one of the originators of the present means of irrigation provided by the Anaheim Union Water Company. As one of the directors for many years and as the president of the company for this, his second term, he has evinced a continual interest in the waterway and been of invaluable assistance in the conduct of its affairs. Interesting to note is the fact that he made the first pick used in the construction of the canal, and he was also the company's blacksmith for the first eighteen months.

ARCHIE McFADDEN. As far back as the genealogical records extend, the McFadden family was identified with the history of Scotland and lived upon a small island off the shores of that country. The first to come to this country was John McFadden, who was reared to agricultural pursuits and became so efficient as a farmer that he was awarded a silver medal for doing the best plowing on the Isle of Butte. This medal is now in the possession of his son and namesake, John, Jr. While he was still quite young, he crossed the ocean to America and settled near Delhi, Delaware county, N. Y., where he became the owner of a valuable farm comprising two hundred and twenty-five acres. Industrious, frugal, diligent and persevering, he secured a competence in return for his diligent cultivation of the soil, and was able to surround his family of twelve children (one of whom was an adopted son) with the comforts of life. The integrity which manifested itself in every action had its root in a fervent religious belief, for he was from youth a sincere member of the United Presbyterian Church and long served as a ruling elder in the denomination. After the organization of the Republican party he gave it his allegiance, but he was not a politician and preferred the quiet pursuit of daily duties to participation in politics. At the time of his death he was sixty-six years of age. Later, his wife, Effie (Lamont) McFadden, went to Newburgh, N. Y., and there her life came to a close at the age of four score years. She, too, was a native of the Isle of Butte, but it is supposed that her family originated in France. Among the most prominent members of the Lamont family is her nephew, Daniel Lamont, ex-secretary of war.

On the old homestead in Delaware county, N. Y., Archie McFadden was born March 2, 1835. Reared to farm pursuits, he selected agriculture as his life occupation, and for fourteen years after his father's death he continued to operate the home farm. On selling the estate, he came to California in 1875 and settled at Santa Ana, near which town he bought a farm of forty acres. His next purchase was a farm within the corporate limits of the town, and this property he still owns. The improvement and sale of real estate and the buying and selling of farms constituted his occupation for some time, but in addition he superintends a walnut ranch of fifteen acres, which he owns and upon which he resides, and he also owns twenty-two acres north of Tustin. He has given considerable attention to the fruit business and is well posted concerning the productiveness of the soil. Indeed, few residents of his county are more familiar than he with the various qualifications necessary to success in fruit-growing, and his advice upon the subject is always worthy of thoughtful consideration. While he is not a politician, he takes an interest in local and national affairs and supports Republican principles.

HENRY HETEBRINK. The history of the Placentia district from 1876 up to the present time would be incomplete without due mention of the successful efforts in behalf of his own and the general welfare on the part of Henry Hetebrink, one of the substantial general farmers and dairymen of Orange county.

The first ambitious incentives to success which entered the life of this earnest pioneer were formulated in Hanover, Germany.

For several years after landing in America he contented himself with the conditions existing in New York City, but subsequently became imbued with the western fever of the latter '50s and journeyed to California via the Isthmus of Panama in 1859. After a short residence in San Francisco he took up his residence in Alameda county, Cal., where he lived for a number of years. Though moderately successful and sufficiently pleased with California to contemplate with unanimity the prospect of a continued residence within its borders, he sought to still further improve his prospects by removal to the Placentia district, which has since been his home. In the beginning he purchased for future cultivation one hundred acres of crude and unpromising land, to the improvement of which he bent his entire energy with the result so gratifyingly evinced in the present. Although the greater part of the land is devoted to general farming and dairying there is also a grove of English walnuts, which has proved a profitable and satisfactory investment.

THEO LACY is a member of an old family of North Carolina and Alabama.

In a family comprising seven daughters and three sons, Theo Lacy was third in order of birth. He was born in Morgan county, Ala., April 22, 1850, and received his education in the public schools. At the age of six years he was taken by his parents to Washington county, Ark., and there remained until twenty years of age. On starting out for himself, he went to the Indian territory and was employed as a clerk in the mercantile house of F. B. Severs, of Okmulgee. Subsequently he went to Muskegee and engaged in the cattle industry and the mercantile business. After a number of years of successful work in that line, he disposed of his interests in the territory, and in 1882 came to California, settling at Santa Ana. For some years he carried on a livery business, after which he gave his attention to farming.

The people of Orange county have frequently chosen Mr. Lacy to serve in positions of trust and honor, and in every instance he has proved himself to be faithful to every trust reposed in him. He was twice elected treasurer of the city of Santa Ana, in which capacity he served four years. In November, 1890, he was elected sheriff. His term was so satisfactory to the people that he was re-elected in November, 1892, serving another term of two years. In November, 1898, he was elected for the third time, this term being for four years.

OTTO DES GRANGES. An interesting, eventful and noble life was that of Otto Des Granges, who died in the Placentia district, Orange county, June 24, 1899. His loss is sincerely mourned by all who knew and appreciated the life-long effort of this German-American, who so materially aided in sustaining the national characteristics which have accomplished much towards the substantial development of their adopted land. He was among the very early settlers of the locality, and, upon first coming here in 1873, purchased eighty acres of land, which for several years was devoted to general farming. He eventually turned his attention to oranges and walnuts, in the cultivation of which he accomplished satisfactory results.

Though a quiet, unostentatious man, Mr. Des Granges had a wide knowledge of the world, having traveled extensively and observed keenly. He came of a family whose distinction he endeavored to maintain, and whose traditions reached into remote European history. With the countless hundreds who fled from France after the revocation of the edict of Nantes, his ancestor of Protestant belief settled with other Huguenots who sought a refuge in Germany, and became loyal to the government and institutions of the asylum country. There the descendants have lived up to the present time. In Prussia, Germany, Mr. Des Granges was born March 26, 1816, and was a son of Philip and Sophia Des Granges. His education was far in advance of that enjoyed by the average German youth of that time, and was of a military nature, acquired in the famous military school at Potsdam, near Berlin. He later attended the military school of war at Berlin, and subsequently, at the age of twenty, entered the Prussian army as a first lieutenant, serving for three years. In 1839 he left the army and went to India, where he engaged in coffee culture for several years, but, owing to the failing health which usually accompanies extended residence in that country, he returned to Europe and entered the employ of the Austrian army as a civil engineer. For a time he was employed at building railroads.

HON. JOHN WESLEY BALLARD, the judge of the supreme court of Orange county is a descendant of an English family long identified with the history of New York. His father, Gilson Ballard, a native of that state, for some years engaged in farming near Dryden, Tompkins county, but early in the '40s he removed to Illinois and settled in Franklin county. Later he established his home in Hancock county, the same state.

It was from this locality that the family in 1863, started on their long journey via the Isthmus of Panama, to California. They had only been in Suisun, Solano county, two weeks when the father died, and three years later the mother also passed away. They were survived by three sons: Duane, now of San Francisco; Hooker, now deceased; and John Wesley. Before the family left Carthage the last-named son had commenced the study of law under one of the leading attorneys of Illinois, and he continued his readings in Solano county under M. A. Wheaton, now a wealthy resident of San Francisco. Later he went to Petaluma, Sonoma county, where he read with W. D. Bliss, attorney. From there he went to San Francisco, where he was employed as accountant for several years, and finally became a clerk in the freight department of the Southern Pacific Railroad. Considerations of health influenced him to remove to a farm in the Reese River valley in Nevada, where he not only engaged in the stock business, but also taught school and resumed his law studies. In 1882 he was admitted to the bar by the supreme court.

After a few years in Nevada he came to Southern California in the fall of 1883 and settled at Tustin, where he carried on mercantile pursuits for six years. On the organization of Orange county he was appointed deputy district attorney, acting as such under Col. E. E. Edwards, after which he resumed the practice of law. Later he was elected district attorney for a term of four years, but at the end of the second year he resigned the office in order to accept that of superior judge, to which he had been elected. During his discharge of official duties he has sat on the bench while a number of famous cases have been tried, among them one which was transferred from San Diego county and involved $1,500,000 of city bonds. In politics he has never displayed a partisan spirit, although he is staunch in his support of Republican principles. He is connected with the Odd Fellows and has passed all the chairs in his lodge.

ROBERT LEE BETTNER. In an early day in America's history the Bettner family came from Germany and settled in New York, from which state some of that name afterward enlisted in the Revolutionary war. James Bettner, Sr., who was a large land owner on the Hudson river, married Annie Carnochan, a sister of Dr. John Murray Carnochan, and a daughter of John Murray Carnochan, who emigrated from Scotland and first settled in Savannah, Ga. Later he became the owner of the Apalachicola tract, comprising sixty miles square of land in Florida.

James Bettner, Jr., father of Robert Lee Bettner, was born at Riverdale, on the Hudson, N. Y. He was admitted to the New York bar, but gave his attention principally to civil engineering, and after graduating from the Troy Polytechnic school, surveyed the Northern Pacific Railroad through Montana. As a result of exposure in inclement weather, his health was impaired, and he was obliged to resign his position. He then came to Riverside, where he was among the first to make experiments in fruit-raising. While here he aided in organizing the free public library and became a member of its first board of trustees. He also started the Riverside Fruit Company, which was one of the earliest concerns of its kind. In addition to his property here, he owned real estate in Santa Monica, Los Angeles and various other points in Southern California. His death occurred in Riverside in 1888. By his marriage to Catherine Allen, who resides on Magnolia avenue, Riverside, he had four children, of whom the eldest and the sole survivor is Robert L. The last-named was born in New York City, March 11, 1865, and received his education in the Charlier school, completing his study of the classics under a private tutor in Riverside.

Throughout his residence in Riverside, Mr. Bettner has maintained a close connection with its fruit-growing interests, and he now combines horticulture with his real estate dealings. On Terquesquite avenue he has thirteen acres in an orange grove, and he owns residence property at the corner of Magnolia avenue and Jefferson street. As a member of the firm of Bettner & Osburn, he has an office at No. 666 Seventh street, Riverside, opposite Glenwood Tavern, and there he spends much of his time. He is a member of the Board of Trade. In politics he is a gold standard Democrat.

In the organization of the Riverside Country Club, Mr. Bettner took a warm interest, and he was chosen its first secretary, afterward acting as its president for several years. At this writing he is president of the Riverside Polo Club. For three years he held office as president of the Casa Blanca Lawn Tennis Club. After the organization of the Southern California Lawn Tennis Association, in which he bore a prominent part, he was elected its secretary and treasurer, serving as such for several years, after which he acted as president for some years. He also aided in organizing the Pacific Coast Polo and Pony Racing Association, of which he is now the vice-president. In all of these organizations he is influential and active, as he is in all movements for the benefit of his community.

Since coming to Riverside, Mr. Bettner has married, his wife being Lucy Elisa Gilliland, who was born and reared in England and came to Riverside with her brother and sister and her mother, Mrs. Lucy Gilliland. They are the parents of one child, Dorothea Annie Catherine. The family is connected with the Episcopal Church.

ALBERT S. WHITE, in whose honor the beautiful little park of Riverside was named, has taken a very active part in the upbuilding and improvement of this city, and is held in high esteem by all of our citizens. Mr. White was born in Belfast, Me. After graduating from the high school, he located in New York City, and for eleven years was engaged in the ship chandlery business under the firm name of Gilchrist, White & Co. Having been prostrated by a severe attack of pneumonia, and failing to rally from its effects, he crossed the continent in January, 1876, in search of health. In Riverside he purchased forty acres of land on Magnolia avenue, which he planted to an orange orchard.

Being energetic and public spirited he threw himself into every enterprise tending to advance the prosperity of the city of his adoption. Together with H. J. Rudisill, Esq., in 1879 he organized in Riverside the first citrus fair ever held in this country. This proving a great success, he at once raised the funds for the erection of the pavilion which was built on Main, corner of Seventh street, on the ground now occupied by the Loring opera house. This pavilion was thereafter used for citrus fairs as well as for all public entertainments, until its destruction by fire in 1887. Among the many public works with which Mr. White was prominently connected were the building in Arlington of the schoolhouse and Presbyterian Church; the founding of the Mercantile library, which has since developed into the public library, with both of which he was connected as trustee, and the organization of the Citizens' Water Company and its successors, the Riverside Water Company, and the Riverside Land Company, he serving as director on the board of each company. He was one of the incorporators and directors of the Arlington Railroad Company and the Riverside Railway Company, both of which have been merged into the Electric Railroad Company, of which he is also a director. In 1887 he was president of the Riverside Improvement Company which developed and piped the domestic artesian water supply to this city. He is president of the Riverside Heights Water Company, which supplies the water for White's Addition to Riverside. He is director and treasurer in the Loring Opera House Company. It was largely through his efforts that the beautiful stone church of the Universalist faith was erected. When the state board of horticulture was organized Mr. White was appointed a member by Governor Perkins to represent Southern California.

THOMAS SPENCER, M. D. While the duration of Dr. Spencer's residence on Orange-thorpe avenue, near Fullerton, was comparatively brief, yet his residence in California covered many years, and no one was more familiar with its growth and progress than he. During the fall of 1888 he settled on a ranch in Orange county, and afterward gave his attention to the cultivation of the property, which comprised twenty acres. Under his supervision, the land was planted in oranges and walnuts, and the property was developed into a remunerative investment. On this homestead his death occurred June 9, 1891, thus closing a life that was all too brief for the consummating of the plans that he cherished.

A native of Newcastle, England, Dr. Spencer was a boy of fourteen years when he came to America with his parents, Edward and Lillie Spencer. With them he settled in Eddyville, Iowa. Probably about 1854, while he was still a mere lad, he started for California, working his way across the plains by driving teams in an emigrant train. On reaching this state, he settled in the northern part thereof and remained in that locality for twenty years. Meantime he studied medicine and received the degree of M. D., later practicing in Santa Rosa for a number of years and meeting with fair success in the profession. Finally, returning to Iowa, he settled in Lucas county and became interested in the stock-raising business, which consumed his attention for years. However, during that period he by no means forgot his old home state of California, and finally determined to return hither and spend his remaining years. This he did, settling near Fullerton, adjoining the Orangethorpe schoolhouse.

HEBER C. PARKS. The first white man who had the courage and hardihood to settle with the owner, Louis Rubidoux, on the Rubidoux ranch, comprising one and a half leagues, of which he became third owner, was Arthur Parks, the father of Heber C. Parks. This pioneer was born in England, and upon immigrating to the United States settled at St. Louis, Mo., where he conducted a mercantile business for three years. He then removed to Cedar City, Utah, where he remained for two years, and from there undertook the journey to California with wagons and ox-teams. He settled at San Bernardino, which was at the time a little cottonwood fort, occupied by the Mormons, and in 1857 removed to West Riverside, and the following year made his first purchase of land. Later he moved closer to the mountains, and there passed the serene evening of his life, which was followed by his death, in 1892. He left ten different pieces of property, aggregating one hundred and fifty-eight acres, all of which was located on the west side.

Heber C. Parks came to California with his father and is, therefore, the very oldest surviving white settler in Riverside county, the Parks family being the first American family that settled in Riverside. The ranch belonging to Mr. Parks is seventy acres in extent, twelve of which are planted in oranges, nine acres being devoted solely to navels. He also raises large quantities of alfalfa, and has considerable raw land as yet unimproved. He has developed his property from its sage-brush condition to one of the best ranches in West Riverside.

HENRY ADAMS PEABODY. Now a resident of Santa Ana, Mr. Peabody was born in Detroit, Mich., March 19, 1837, a son of Adams and Frances Peabody.

During the Mexican war he received his first practical experience of life by working as a newsboy in Cincinnati, Ohio. Later he learned the printer's trade in Columbia, Mo. In 1857 he came overland to California. His first work in the west was driving three yoke of cattle from Colusa to Petaluma, a distance of over one hundred miles, for which he was paid $25. His next move was to Santa Rosa, Sonoma county, where he secured employment in the composing room of the Sonoma Democrat, a weekly paper. During the seven months he worked there he was paid $30 per week. Afterward he was employed in San Francisco for eighteen months, first with the Globe, next with the National (now the Examiner).

During the Civil war Mr. Peabody served in the Confederate army. After returning to California, he became foreman of the Sonoma Democrat, and later was one of its proprietors.

After disposing of his interest in it, he became foreman of the Daily Independent of Vallejo, Cal., and later was foreman of the Times, a weekly paper of Visalia, Tulare county; afterward becoming foreman of the state printing office at Sacramento under Governor Irving's administration. His next position was as foreman of the night force in the state printing office. When the Republicans came into power, he was retained in the position, which was a pleasant surprise to him and a tribute to his ability. At the end of the term the printers, who were, of course, mostly Republicans, presented him with a valuable watch suitably inscribed.

Having bought the Dispatch at Ukiah, Cal., (afterward consolidated with the Democrat) Mr. Peabody remained in Ukiah for ten years. Coming from there to Santa Ana, he became part owner of the Morning Blade, but this he sold two years later. Under the second administration of President Cleveland, he was for four years postmaster at Santa Ana, but was succeeded by a Republican on the election of President McKinley. He then returned to the east and visited his old home in Missouri, after which he purchased a store at Newport Beach, Cal., retaining, however, his residence in Santa Ana.

CYRUS B. PULVER. At the age of twenty-one years Cyrus B. Pulver left New York state and settled in Will county, Ill., where he engaged in farming. His next location was Champaign county, Ill., but his labors there were not rewarded with success. Hoping a change might be beneficial, he went to LeRoy, Kans., and secured employment with Coffin & Graham, cattle dealers. With the money thus earned, he bought a team and then engaged in breaking prairie land near Wichita. After five years of pioneer farming, in November, 1881, he came to California, and bought a farm of forty acres near Newport. Unlike his experience in the east, he here met with success, and after five or six years sold the land to good advantage during the boom. Previous to this he had purchased nine acres on Santa Clara avenue, Santa Ana, where he now resides, and in addition, he owns twenty-five acres near Olive. Politically he is a Republican in national issues, but independent in local affairs. While living in Kansas he was married, in Wichita, to Isabelle S., daughter of Chauncey Hatch, a native of Vermont.

DON PIO PICO, the last governor of Upper California under Spanish rule, was born in the mission of San Gabriel May 5, 1801, and was a son of José M. Pico by Doña Maria Eustaquia Gutierrez, the former of whom died at San Gabriel in 1819 and the latter in 1846. One of their sons, Gen. Andrés Pico, a conspicuous character in the early history of California, was born at the old presidio of San Diego November 30, 1810, and died February 14, 1876. When the United States invaded Mexico he served in the army of his country as general and signed the peace agreement with Gen. Fremont, who in after years was one of his staunch and warm friends. Another of the sons, José Antonio Pico, who was a soldier at Monterey, died at Santa Margarita. There were several daughters in the family, one of whom became the wife of Don Juan Forster, and another was Mrs. Maria Ortega, while two others married, in succession, José A. Carrillo.

The life of Don Pio Pico covered almost the entire period of the nineteenth century. He often in later life recalled the great earthquake of 1812 that destroyed the unfinished church of San Juan Capistrano, with many lives. He also remembered that in 1810 his father was imprisoned on account of having talked concerning Mexican independence in the company of which he was sergeant. In 1818 his father was sent to San Gabriel on account of the rising of the neophytes of the mission, but during the same year was recalled to San Diego to assist in the defense of that port against some pirates.

In 1821 Don Pio was employed by his brother-in-law, José Antonio Carrillo, to take twenty-five barrels of brandy to distribute among the missionary fathers of the northern part of the territory, as a present from Carrillo, who was then one of the most influential men in California. In 1828 Don Pio was appointed secretary of a commission, of which Captain Portilla was the head, which was ordered by Governor Echandia to try some charges against a Mexican citizen, in which the question of the precedence of the civil over the military authority was vigorously contested. The course of General Victoria was resisted by him, with others, in 1831, and their pronunciamiento gained the support of all the military companies in San Diego. General Echandia placed himself at the head of the force and sent fifty men, under Captain Portilla, to Los Angeles, with orders to imprison the alcalde, Vincente Sanchez, and set at liberty citizens illegally imprisoned. These orders were faithfully carried out. At the same time General Victoria reached the mission of San Fernando. The next day an engagement took place between the two forces, which resulted partly in favor of Victoria, but the next day he surrendered to Portilla.

Don Pio Pico was governor at the time of the change of government and faithfully endeavored to defend the territory, but the contest was a hopeless one, and he and his brother accepted the inevitable and became good American citizens, continuing as such their remaining years.

FRANK J. CARPENTER, came to Los Angeles in the latter '40s, and in 1851 became jailer of the county and city jail. During his services in this capacity for nearly a quarter of a century he witnessed the most stirring and reckless period ever experienced by a western town, but from the first was master of the situation, and of all who sought to violate the laws of justice and humanity. A strong and dominant personality, his magnetic influence was far reaching in its effects, and secured for him a reputation far beyond the confines of the little town. When his term as jailer had expired, he was for years a policeman in Los Angeles, and while patrolling the streets of the crude village was face to face with the worst crimes of which human nature is capable. A shrewd financier and practical business man, he amassed a considerable fortune in stock and other enterprises. He was a Democrat in politics, and a man of liberal views and humane instincts. His death in 1894 was deeply mourned by innumerable friends, by the hundreds who knew him by hearsay and appreciated his services in the pioneer days, and by all who are loath to note the passing of the landmarks among the characters of Southern California.

JOHN T. CARPENTER, a native of Platte county, Mo., was educated in the public schools of Los Angeles, and in 1858 engaged in the stock-raising business near the town, in partnership with his father, Frank J. Carpenter. This occupation continued for four years, and in May of 1862, he married Deogracia Harri-meias, who was born in Los Angeles, of Spanish descent. For a time after his marriage he was deputy jailer for his father at the city and county jail, and subsequently pre-empted one hundred and sixty acres of land near the town of Los Angeles. This he improved and farmed for a short time, but eventually sold, and came to Orange county, and purchased one thousand two hundred acres of land, which was a part of the old Santa Ana grant, and upon which he lived for a number of years. He then went to Los Angeles and engaged in the wood and coal business, which was followed by his removal to San Fernando, Cal., where he farmed until 1885. He then located in San Diego county on a ranch near San Marcos, where he engaged in farming pursuits until his removal to Olive precinct. The ranch of Mr. Carpenter is composed of twelve and a half acres, and is devoted to vineyards and fruit culture in general. In marked contrast to the size of his other possessions, it is yet a model property, under fine cultivation. An interesting feature in the life of Mr. Carpenter, and the one circumstance which has most conspicuously placed him in the public eye, is the outgrowth of his possessions on the old Santa Ana ranch. By virtue of purchase and residence he became legal owner of the one thousand two hundred acres, and of the water right which legally belonged to the land, under the riparian rights law. This right was for years under litigation, and was finally decided by the supreme court in favor of the John T. Carpenter water right. This enormous and just advantage to Mr. Carpenter has caused him to be known throughout the entire state. He is variously interested in the affairs of his locality, and is a prominent member of the Democratic party.

HERMAN W. HELLMAN, came to Los Angeles May 14, 1859. He was at the time about fifteen years of age and Los Angeles was a town approaching three thousand inhabitants. He brought little with him besides a good public-school education, backed with good health, temperate habits and a resolute purpose to do something and do it thoroughly and successfully. The following June he entered the employ of Gen. Phineas Banning, of Wilmington, as freight clerk in the forwarding and commission business. In December, 1861, he resigned the position to join a cousin in the stationery business in Los Angeles. After several years he embarked in the fancy goods and stationery business on his own account, and continued therein until March, 1870, when he disposed of his business and spent a year and a half in Europe. Upon his return, in November, 1871, he and Jacob Haas (an old schoolmate) founded the house of Hellman, Haas & Co., which under Mr. Hellman's general direction carried on an extensive and successful wholesale grocery business for nineteen years, extending their trade throughout Southern California, Arizona, New Mexico and Texas. The life and energy of this aggressive business house have become a material feature of the splendid commercial history of Los Angeles.

From time to time Mr. Hellman made large and judicious investments in Los Angeles realty and substantial business enterprises, among which may be mentioned the purchase of stock in the Farmers & Merchants Bank, of which he was elected a director. In 1890 he retired from the firm of Hellman, Haas & Co., and accepted the position of vice-president and local manager of the Farmers & Merchants Bank, since which time he has given to the direction of its extensive business his best energies and close personal attention.

JOHN ALPHEUS WILLSON, of Santa Ana, was born in Rockbridge county, Va., October 22, 1838.

The education of John Alpheus Willson was obtained principally in Lexington and Brownsburg, Va. At the age of nineteen he became a dry goods clerk, and later acquired a business of his own in Lexington, Va., also in Sherman, Tex., where he was quite successful. During the Civil war he enlisted as a private in the Confederate army and was afterwards promoted to be captain of Company H, Rockbridge Guards, Twenty-fifth Virginia Infantry. While taking part in the battle of Antietam he was wounded in the hip. Soon afterward he was transferred from the infantry to the Fourteenth Cavalry, and served on the staff of Gen. John McCauslin until the surrender of Gen. Lee's army at Appomattox Courthouse.

The first sojourn of Mr. Willson in California was in 1887, but he soon returned to Sherman, Tex., with the hope that the change might benefit his wife's health—a hope that was destined to disappointment, for Mrs. Willson soon afterward died. Before his return to Texas his two daughters, Evelyn and Carrie, had married, Evelyn becoming the wife of W. W. Henry, who is from Rockbridge, Va., and resides on St. Clair avenue, Santa Ana, where he has ten acres in walnuts and oranges. Carrie, is the wife of J. E. Copeland, and resides on Chicago avenue, Riverside, Cal. The two sons are William Dunlap Willson, an employe of the Santa Fe system in Los Angeles, and James Scott Willson, of Santa Ana. The second marriage of Mr. Willson took place in Santa Ana and united him with Mrs. Henrietta Jackson, of Columbia, Tenn., who by her former marriage had two children, James Jackson, of Columbia, Tenn., and Mrs. Effie Eckley, of Santa Ana.

GEORGE J. MOSBAUGH was educated in the public schools and at the state university of Indiana, and also studied at Louisville, Ky. He enlisted as a private in May, 1864, in Company D, One Hundred and Thirty-third Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and served until his honorable discharge in September of the same year. After returning to his home in Indiana, he left for Pittsburg, Pa., and was for nine years engaged in active business. In the spring of 1875 he came to Orange county, Cal., and for eight and a half years was interested in horticulture, having started from the beginning and learned everything pertaining thereto. Naturally he became interested in the question of water supply, and for one year was secretary of the Santa Ana Valley Irrigating Company. At the time of the organization of the Commercial Bank of Santa Ana, he was the first bookkeeper of the bank, a position which he creditably maintained for five years. He then became associated with the newly organized Bank of Orange as cashier, and for six years faithfully and conscientiously worked for the interests of that institution. In the meantime he had been elected cashier of the Commercial Bank of Santa Ana, with which he had formerly been identified, and he has creditably sustained the same up to the present time.

The commercial prosperity of Santa Ana has been augmented by the enterprise and public spirit of Mr. Mosbaugh, and he has held local offices of trust and importance. After the incorporation of the city he was the first city treasurer, and as such looked well to the best interests of the community which he served. He is a member of the Republican party politically, and is associated with the Masons and the Grand Army of the Republic.

L. C. WAITE. Upon the organization of the First National Bank of Riverside, in May, 1885, Mr. Waite became one of its first stockholders, and seven months later he was chosen to fill the office of vice-president. In September, 1900, he became president of the institution, which, under his careful supervision, has gained a place among the substantial banks of Southern California, with deposits reaching upward of $800,000. During the year 1890 he aided in the organization of the Riverside Savings Bank and Trust Company, of which he has from the first been a director and is now the president. This company has deposits aggregating more than $500,000, and is upon that solid financial basis which is the precursor of permanent success.

It is a matter of local history that Mr. Waite was the first attorney-at-law to settle in Riverside, the first notary public and the first justice of the peace here, he having come to this city in December, 1870. Born near Lake Geneva, in Walworth county, Wis., September 12, 1842, he is a son of Sidney and Permelia (Barker) Waite. During the Civil war he served in the Union army. In the spring of 1870 he was admitted to the bar in Tama county, Iowa, and in December of the same year he opened the first law office in Riverside, Cal., where later for four years he was justice of the peace. Soon he began to be interested in horticulture, which his keen foresight assured him would in time become the principal industry of Southern California. At that time it was not known what varieties of fruits were best adapted to this soil and climate, therefore his first ventures were in the nature of experiments. Through experience he soon acquired a thorough knowledge of horticulture with relation to local conditions. As a member of the firm of Waite & Simms he conducted a large nursery in this city, thus aiding others in getting a start in the business. He was the first horticulturist who successfully budded trees, and the different varieties that he imported have since become well known among the recognized products of the region.

In addition to the nursery in Riverside, which he retained until 1896, Mr. Waite established the first nurseries in Redlands, also one at Highland. He laid out the town site of Highland and aided in the building up of that now beautiful and prosperous region. At this writing he is president of the Highland Domestic Water Company. Besides his orchard of thirty-five acres adjoining Riverside, he owns forty acres at Highland. He organized the North Fork Water Company at Highland, securing water from the Bear valley reservoir, and during the first ten years of the company's existence he held the office of president, but finally resigned in order to accept the position of president of the East Riverside Water Company, which he has since filled. Through his instrumentality was organized, in 1894, the La Mesa Packing Company, of which he has since been the president.

C. W. FILKINS. Born in Saratoga Springs, N. Y., in 1844, C. W. Filkins received a liberal education, completing his studies in Schenectady College. In 1866 he went to St. Paul, where he was engaged in the wholesale dry goods business for eleven or twelve years. Then, owing to failing health, he sold out and removed to San Francisco, and in the fall of 1880 located in Riverside. Here he soon embarked in several enterprises and in 1881 was appointed postmaster by President Garfield. Later he held the same position under Arthur's administration until he resigned, March 4, 1885. It was not until August, however, that his resignation was accepted, a special request by telegraph at last receiving attention. In the meantime Mr. Filkins had become a horticulturist and the second orange grove at Redlands was improved by him. He also dealt considerably in real estate in Riverside and locality and improved a twenty-acre tract, situated sixteen miles west of Riverside. For years he has devoted a part of his attention to the raising of standard-bred horses of the Inka and Strathmore strains.

Perhaps the most important of his many enterprises was the organizing of the Banning colony and the formation of a stock company known as the Banning Land & Water Company. Those associated with him in this company are Evan Williams, Jacob Klein, Theodore H. Hofer and George W. Bryant, the last-named of Carson City, Nev. On one occasion, when riding through the country in the vicinity of the present flourishing town of Banning, Mr. Filkins conceived the idea of irrigating the then desert land thereabout, as he noted the flume which had been constructed by a lumber company, for the purpose of transporting cord-wood from the mountains to the Southern Pacific Railroad. Laying out the town of Banning on the railroad mentioned, eighty-eight miles east of Los Angeles, in 1883, it has grown to large proportions, and has justified the hopes of its founder. Fine products are annually yielded by the well irrigated soil of that region, peaches, apricots, plums, almonds, figs, grapes and raisins being among the fruits raised. Owing to the alkaline character of the ground, at points between the mountains and the land which it was planned to irrigate, cement ditches were constructed, and in these channels the water flows pure and life-giving, fresh as in the mountains. Over two thousand acres have thus been placed under cultivation, and to-day extensive crops of grain are raised, in addition to other products.

HERBERT S. HAZELTINE, the manager of the D. E. Smeltzer celery farm near Santa Ana, is one of the enterprising young business men of Orange county. For some years he has made a specialty of the raising of celery, and it is doubtful if any resident of Southern California is more familiar with the industry than he. Through careful study he has gained a thorough knowledge of every detail connected with the occupation, is an excellent judge of the variety of soil adapted to the raising of the product, and is master of the situation in every instance. The business of which he is now the head is the largest of its kind in the world, five hundred cars of celery being shipped each year from Smeltzer's Station to eastern and southern points, and as far northeast as Canada.

WILLIAM F. LUTZ. This well-known business man of Santa Ana, who is president of the William F. Lutz Company, was born in Esslingen, Wurtemberg, Germany, June 18, 1867. The years of boyhood he spent at the old homestead, but at the age of sixteen he came to America, in October, 1883, to seek a livelihood from a country that offered greater advantages than his own. Landing in New York, he proceeded at once to Chicago, joining some relatives who were engaged in business there.

In order to prepare himself for a commercial life, Mr. Lutz attended the Bryant & Stratton Business College. On leaving that school, he secured employment as bookkeeper for the Haegele Ice Company, with which he remained five years. In March, 1888, he came to California, settling first in San Francisco, but in September, 1889, he removed to Los Angeles, where he was employed as stenographer by S. W. Luitwieler, dealer in agricultural implements and vehicles. After three years in Los Angeles he came to Santa Ana, in 1892, and bought the branch implement house of Mr. Luitwieler, since which time he has been identified with Orange county and its interests. At the time of purchase, the business was conducted upon a very small scale, but with the constant development of the county his own enterprise has kept pace, and it is now the largest business of its kind south of Los Angeles. In the store may be found all kinds of vehicles and farm implements, and the proprietor is prepared to fill orders for every variety of farm machinery. The success attending the business is due to his energetic and capable management, and proves that he is a man of executive ability and commercial instincts.

J. A. SIMMS is numbered among the early settlers of Riverside, as he came to this locality in 1875, and during the intervening years has labored to promote its welfare. Born September 20, 1851, near Port Royal, Henry county, Ky., and from his sixth year reared in Indiana, J. A. Simms received a good education and thorough training for the practical duties of life. In 1875 he came to Riverside with his uncle, Dr. W. H. Ball, one of our pioneer physicians and horticulturists. At once becoming intensely interested in the subject of fruit-raising, Mr. Simms entered the employ of P. S. Russell, the pioneer nurseryman of this district, and during the three years of his service with him learned the business thoroughly.

In 1878 Mr. Simms commenced to develop an orchard on a ten-acre tract of land situated on Brockton avenue, and in connection with it carried on a small nursery. In 1886 he entered into partnership with L. C. Waite, under the style of Waite & Simms, and planted the first nursery along the line under the Gage canal. Devoting twenty acres to oranges, they soon had a large line of trees ready for the market and in 1890 and 1891 made their most extensive sales. They continued in business until 1895, when they allowed the remainder of their grove to become a bearing orchard, and recently disposed of the property, which had become very valuable.

B. G. BALCOM. The genealogy of the Balcom family is traced back seven generations, to one of the passengers on the historic Mayflower, Edward Doty, 1620, who left his native country, England, to establish a home on the bleak Atlantic shores. At Cumberland, R. I., B. G. Balcom was born August 31, 1847. He was reared principally in Attleboro, Mass., where he attended the public schools and academy. When the war began he was only fourteen years of age and his youth alone prevented him from being one of the first to enlist in the Union army. However, before the war closed he was accepted into the service, becoming a member of Company C, Forty-second Massachusetts Infantry, in July, 1864. His regiment was assigned to the army of the Potomac and was sent to Virginia, remaining there until the expiration of the period of service and receiving an honorable discharge at Boston. After the war Mr. Balcom resumed his academic studies. On starting out for himself, he decided to come to the west, as offering a field of opportunity for young men far greater than that afforded by the over-crowded east. The year 1868 found him in Quincy, Ill., and the following year he spent in Missouri. Desirous of going still further west, in 1870 he joined a prospecting party and went to Salt Lake, spending several years in Utah and Nevada.

During 1874 Mr. Balcom arrived in California, where he became the managing agent for one of the large ranches in San Mateo county for two years and then was employed by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company as their agent at Williams, Colusa county. The immediate object of his removal to Southern California was to enter upon his duties as the newly appointed agent of the Southern Pacific Railroad at Santa Ana, which position he filled from 1881 until 1888. On resigning as agent he became bookkeeper in the Bank of Orange and later was promoted to the position of cashier. From 1892 until 1895 he acted as cashier of the Commercial Bank of Santa Ana. During the latter year he established, incorporated and opened the Fruit Growers' Bank of Fullerton, of which he was chosen president and which began business with a capital stock of $25,000. The establishment of a bank at that place was a wise decision, as in the vicinity of Fullerton oranges, lemons and walnuts were being cultivated profitably, and shipped east in large quantities, which helped to develop the general prosperity of this region. The increase in the business transacted by the bank after a few years demanded a reorganization, which was effected in January, 1900, with an increase of capital stock to $50,000 and a change of name to the First National Bank of Fullerton.

THOMAS BAKEWELL. Of the many who have come from the east to spend the evening of their lives in the sunlit brightness of California, none is remembered as possessing more sterling worth than Thomas Bakewell, who died at his home in Riverside, January 22, 1898. Prior to his removal to the west in 1886 his youth and manhood had been spent in Pittsburgh, Pa., where he was born April 12, 1836. He received superior educational advantages, and studied at St. James College in Maryland. His first independent undertaking was as a clerk with a salt company with whom he remained for many years. Towards the close of the war he became identified with the Lippincott Axe Company (later Hubbard, Bakewell & Co.), manufacturers of edged tools, axes, saws, etc., and in the capacity of commercial member of the firm traveled extensively through many states of the Union.

In Riverside Mr. Bakewell purchased twenty acres of the Hartshorn tract on Magnolia avenue, and for twelve years was an interested worker and observer along horticultural lines. He instituted many improvements in his land, erected a cottage, and raised a fine grade of navel oranges.

JOHN N. DUNLAP. Since coming to Riverside in 1887, Mr. Dunlap has given his attention to the study of plant life, particularly as exemplified in the growing of citrus fruit trees. For nine years he was connected with Waite & Simms, in the nursery business. In 1899 he purchased seven and one-half acres on Linden street, near Iowa avenue, and here he makes his home. In addition to the management of his own property, he is employed to superintend orange tracts for others, and at this writing has the care of thirty acres belonging to other parties; indeed, until very recently, he had the supervision of more than seventy acres. Among those for whom he acts as superintendent of land, is L. C. Waite, whose twenty acres on Linden street he set out in orange trees and has since had the supervision of the same. He is a member of the Fruit Growers' Association.

In Adams county, Ohio, January 18, 1861, John N. Dunlap was born to James R. and Mary C. (Taylor) Dunlap, natives respectively of Pennsylvania and Ohio. His education was obtained in schools of the home neighborhood. He was twenty-six years of age when he cast in his fortunes with the horticulturists of Southern California, and since then he has been industriously devoted to his chosen occupation.

BRADFORD MORSE, mayor of Riverside, was born May 4, 1848, and was reared on a farm, mean time attending the public schools and the English high school. When nineteen years of age he went to Brockton and until 1881 was employed in a shoe factory. In the mean time he served for eleven years in the Third and First Regiments, Massachusetts National Guard, passing through all grades, being captain of Company I, First Regiment, for four years, resigning and removing to California in February, 1881, and here it may be mentioned that since coming to this state he assisted in organizing a company at Riverside, first known as Company C of the Ninth Regiment, California National Guard. Joining its ranks, he was chosen first lieutenant, and was later made battalion adjutant, resigning after six years of service. Various enterprises have engaged the attention of Mr. Morse since he arrived in Riverside, and at the present time he owns a ranch of one hundred and sixty acres, situated near Box Springs, and there carries on general farming. Mr. Morse was a member of the first county board of horticultural commissioners of San Bernardino county, resigning after one year to attend to other duties.

From 1886 to 1892 Mr. Morse was city marshal and tax collector, serving three terms. In 1893, when Riverside county was created, Governor Markham appointed him as president of the commission having in charge the organization of the county in all of its details. He was one of three members of the Riverside county division executive committee, who prepared and presented the bill for the creation of the county, to the legislature of California, for enactment. The work of organization of the county by the commission was successfully carried forward. A special election was called, and in May, 1893, county officers were elected, among them being Mr. Morse, who was chosen as county assessor. As city marshal he had made a creditable record, and made a sturdy fight against the saloons, succeeding in winning fifteen out of the sixteen cases prosecuted in the corporation limits. From 1884 to 1893 he was one of the Republican central committee of San Bernardino county, and from 1886 to 1893 was on the executive committee. Upon the organization of Riverside county in 1893 he was made chairman of the first county central committee, and since that time has been a member of the state Republican central committee two years, from 1894 to 1896. He was appointed expert for the legislative assembly committee on revenue and taxation in 1895. The bill for the revision of those laws which he had aided in preparing was reported by the committee, and passed both houses without a dissenting vote. In April, 1894, he was elected city trustee, serving as such for four years; in 1898 was re-elected, and in April, 1900, was chosen as president of the board.

JUDGE J. W. NORTH. Not only Riverside county, but Southern California as well, owes a great debt to the late Judge J. W. North, for his efforts and indefatigable labors in the founding of Riverside and the aiding and directing of the little colony during the '70s accrued much to this entire region, as colony after colony of substantial eastern people, encouraged by the success attending this enterprise, poured into this then sparsely settled and arid territory, which soon was converted into a paradise. This was the greatest accomplishment of his long and useful life, and knowing that this tribute to his memory will be sincerely appreciated by his multitudes of friends, the following has been compiled from authentic records:

Born in 1815, in Rensselaer county, N. Y., Judge North was reared upon a farm, attending the district school for three months in the winter, as was the custom. Though thus limited in educational advantages, he early manifested exceptional ability, and after pursuing studies at a select school for three months commenced teaching. Subsequently he went to Cazenovia Seminary for a few months, and entered the Wesleyan University at Middletown, Conn., for it may here be said that his parents were active members of the Methodist Church. About 1845 he was admitted to the bar and commenced the practice of law at Syracuse, N. Y. The wife of his youth, Emma Bacon, died some eighteen months after their marriage. In August, 1848, he married Ann H. Loomis, daughter of Dr. George S. Loomis, of Dewitt, N. Y., and four sons and two daughters were born to them.

In 1849 the judge settled at Minneapolis, Minn., and there acquired a fine practice, which he was obliged to abandon on account of poor health. In company with others he became a pioneer at Faribault, where he built the mills and started numerous industries. Then, disposing of his interests, he founded the town of Northfield. In 1851 he was elected to represent his district in the territorial legislature and served as president of that body.

In 1860 he was elected as a delegate to the national Republican convention at Chicago, and was made chairman of his delegation. In that notable convention, after Lincoln had been nominated, Mr. North was appointed one of the committee which went to Springfield and officially notified him of the results of the political assemblage. Subsequently, the judge was so thoroughly recognized as a party leader that it was generally considered entirely right and proper when Lincoln appointed him as surveyor-general of the territory of Nevada. Soon after locating his family in Nevada, he set about the building of a quartz-mill. When the office of surveyor-general was abolished he resumed the practice of law, and soon was appointed judge of the supreme court of Nevada, by President Lincoln, who had been recommended to this action by the bar of the territory in question.

At the close of the Civil war Judge North located in Knoxville, Tenn., where he established a large iron foundry. Unfortunately, it was a failure. He then turned his attention to Southern California, at that time almost undeveloped. There were no railroads in the state south of Stockton, save a twenty-mile stretch between Los Angeles and its seaport, San Pedro. Believing that with a good system of irrigation semi-tropical fruits could be profitably raised in the district now included within Riverside county, he succeeded in enlisting the influence and capital of Hon. Charles N. Felton, and proceeded with his plans. A portion of the old Jurupa rancho was selected, and it was divided into blocks of two and a half acres, at the townsite, while in the neighboring country little fruit farms of twenty acres each were laid out. These tracts were sold with water rights, the ditches to be constructed by the heads of the colony. For a decade he labored indefatigably, and at last witnessed at least a partial fulfillment of his fond hopes. In 1880 he disposed of his property here and removed to Oleander, Fresno county, Cal., where he lived a very active life for nearly ten years, dying at the home of his daughter, Mrs. J. C. Shepard, in Fresno, loved and honored by all.

NOAH PALMER. When the Isaac Owen missionary train made its slow way over the plains, with wagons and teams, spending six months in their westward journey, one of the young men who accompanied them was Noah Palmer. In all the dangers and hardships of that memorable trip he shared, and when finally California was reached he settled at San José. Later, however, he removed to Santa Clara, where he carried on agricultural pursuits for years. At the same time he became identified with local politics and was a leader in the Republican party. For four years he was tax collector of Santa Clara county and for a term represented his county in the lower house of the California state legislature.

To the then small hamlet of Santa Ana Mr. Palmer came in 1874. He secured seven hundred acres comprising a portion of the Santiago de Santa Ana grant, which had originally contained sixty-two thousand acres. On this property he has continued to reside, although, through sales made at various times, the size of the homestead has been reduced to two hundred and fifty acres. Perhaps in no way has Mr. Palmer been more closely identified with local history than through his banking interests. For two years he was president of the Orange County Savings Bank. In the incorporation of the Commercial Bank of Santa Ana he was actively interested and he is now president of the same, having served in this capacity for a number of years. He was also a promoter and incorporator of the Bank of Orange in the city of that name and the office of president has been filled by him ever since the institution was founded. Nor do these two banks represent the limit of his activities in financial circles, for he is also interested in the Bank of Tustin and has officiated as a director for some years. When the Santa Ana, Orange & Tustin Railway was projected, he was one of its principal promoters and aided in its construction, being chosen as its first president and holding the office for some years.

The life-record of Mr. Palmer shows that he was born in Lewis county, N. Y., September 3, 1820, a son of Ephraim and Hannah (Phelps) Palmer, natives of New York. His father, who was of Quaker ancestry and English lineage, lived to be eighty-eight years of age, but the mother died when her son, our subject, was seven years of age. The boy was then taken into the home of a sister in Jefferson county, N. Y., and there he remained until eighteen, meantime attending local schools. His first occupation was that of a school teacher, which he followed about ten years, first in New York and then in Indiana, where he settled in 1840. From the latter year until 1849 he made his home in Franklin county, Ind., and it was from there that he started upon his journey across the plains at the time of the discovery of gold in California. While living in Indiana, in 1843, he married Susan Evans, a native of Franklin county, that state. They became the parents of five children, of whom three daughters are living, namely: Mrs. R. E. Hewitt, of Los Angeles, Cal.; Emma A., wife of George J. Mosbaugh, cashier of the Commercial Bank of Santa Ana; and Lottie E., who resides with her parents.

WILLIAM H. PETTIBONE. The attributes that individualize Mr. Pettibone have always been his faithfulness to every duty and his purpose of will. It was in 1856 that, a youth of sixteen, he left his home in western New York and secured employment on grade work with the Erie Railroad Company. At the expiration of seven years he was made eastern passenger agent, at No. 233 Broadway, New York, which position he held for two years. His next position was as master of transportation for the Ohio & Mississippi Railroad in Ohio, in which capacity he continued for one and one-half years, resigning to accept an appointment as superintendent of the Rockford, Rock Island & St. Louis Railroad, at Rock Island, Ill. During the two and one-half years he filled that position he had charge of the building of the road from Rock Island to St. Louis. From there he went to Cedar Rapids, Iowa, as general superintendent of the Burlington, Cedar Rapids & Northern Railroad.

The ability displayed by Mr. Pettibone in his various positions had attracted the attention of one of the greatest railroads in the world, the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe, by which company he was tendered and accepted the position of superintendent of their lines west of Emporia, Kans.

When the railroad had been built as far as Ratoon, N. M., he resigned his position, and accepted the general superintendency of the Chicago & Grand Trunk road from Chicago to Port Huron, Mich., in which capacity he continued for five and one-half years. Next he was called to the position of general superintendent of the Toledo, St. Louis & Kansas City Railway. There was then a narrow gauge from Toledo to St. Louis, but under his management the road was changed to standard gauge.

On the organization of the San Francisco, Clear Lake & Humboldt Railroad by an eastern syndicate, Mr. Pettibone was elected vice-president and general manager, and, accepting the office, came to California to assume the construction and management of the same. On the completion of seventy-five miles of grading, the company sold out to the Southern Pacific Company and work was abandoned. Mr. Pettibone thereupon returned east and joined Dr. W. S. Webb as general superintendent of the Adirondack & St. Lawrence Railroad. This post he filled for two years, at which time he retired from railroading.

While connected with railroads Mr. Pettibone had made various trips to California and the charm of the climate had woven its spell over him. Believing it to be the Italy of America and the fairest spot found in all of his travels, he determined to establish his home in Southern California. In 1895 he bought twelve acres at Highgrove, Riverside county, and employed a man to work the same for three years, when he located upon the place and has since made it his home, enjoying the comforts of an attractive home and a fine grove of navel oranges.

MARTIN W. ROSE. The family to which Mr. Rose belongs was founded in this country by his great-grandfather Rose, who came from the Netherlands and settled in Orange county, N. Y. The name was originally Roos, but was Americanized to its present form. At Greene, Chenango county, N. Y., M. W. Rose was born April 9, 1832. In 1848 he went to Albany, N. Y., where he began merchandising. In 1854 he decided to follow Horace Greeley's advice and go west. During the year 1860, when at the Tremont house in Chicago, he had the pleasure of meeting this famous statesman and editor, whose advice he had followed six years before.

While on a visit to his brother, Charles Rose, in Illinois, in 1854, Mr. Rose entered the employ of the Galena & Chicago Union Railroad, then in process of construction. On its completion he was made operator and station agent at Afton, Wis., and while there became acquainted with W. B. Strong, then the agent at Milton Junction, and afterward president of the Santa Fe system. His next locations were Elgin, Ill., and Beloit, Wis., and he built the first telegraph line between the latter place and Belvidere, Ill. In 1869 he became connected with the chief engineer in the survey and construction of the Chicago & Michigan & Lake Shore line (later the Chicago & West Michigan) and opened the stations on the new road. After a time in the general offices of the company, he was made general agent and then assistant general freight agent, which position he filled from 1886 until 1898, on the Chicago & West Michigan, and what is now the Pere Marquette lines, having his headquarters in Grand Rapids.

On resigning his position with the railroad, in 1898, Mr. Rose came to California, which he had visited for the first time three years before, buying a tract of more than one-half block on Market and Eleventh streets, Riverside. This he subdivided and sold for building purposes. Among his other purchases was that of forty acres on Colton avenue, of which he has sold nine acres. About one-half of the remainder is in oranges, forming a fine orchard of bearing trees that is said to be one of the healthiest groves in Riverside. In 1901 he erected a residence on Colton avenue, where he has an attractive homestead, with the surroundings that add to the comforts of life.

W. B. SAWYER, M. D., was born November 22, 1854, at Easthampton, Mass., and is one of three living children. Reared at his birthplace, he received a fine education, attending Williston Seminary four years and being graduated in Amherst College in 1875, with the degree of Bachelor of Arts, his alma mater conferring upon him the degree of Master of Arts three years later. From 1875 to 1879 he was a student in the medical department of Harvard College, receiving his degree in the last-named year. Then returning to his birthplace, he practiced his profession for eighteen months, and subsequent to his marriage determined to locate in the west. Until 1882 he lived in Kansas City, then removing to Los Angeles, Cal., where he remained for about two years. The great attractions of Riverside drew him to this point in 1884, and ever since he has carried on the practice of medicine and surgery. Like most of the citizens, he has been engaged in horticultural pursuits to some extent.

For eight years Dr. Sawyer served as a health officer here and has been local surgeon for the Santa Fe since it was constructed through this district. Prior to the organization of Riverside county, when the territory was more than double in size (including San Bernardino county), he acted in the capacity of deputy coroner for four years. Besides being a liberal and valued contributor to medical literature, and magazines east and west, he has the honor of having been the editor of the first magazine published hereabout, its title being the Southern California Monthly. He also edited the Riverside Tribune for a short time, this being the first paper here which published daily reports of the associated press. Feeling the need of such a journal, the business men of Riverside, including Dr. Sawyer, enlisted in this enterprise, and they induced him to become one of its editors. Eventually the plant was sold to the Press and Horticulturist.

JOHN HENRY REED has been a leader in horticultural affairs of Riverside county and a liberal contributor to modern ideas on the subject of fruit culture. The first meeting of the Riverside Horticultural Club was held in his house and his influence was strongly brought to bear upon the organization of the society. He is rightly called the "father" of the Southern California Society of Farmers and Horticultural Clubs, of which he is serving on the executive committee, and at whose last annual meeting forty clubs were represented. The Riverside Club was the first organized. Mr. Reed also belongs to the Southern California Pomological Society.

The birth of John H. Reed took place June 18, 1833. After attending the Marlborough Academy he commenced teaching in his county. He completed his education at the Southwestern Ohio Normal at Lebanon, Ohio, where he made the acquaintance of Miss Kate Morris, whom he married in that city July 19, 1858. From 1854 to 1859 both taught in Lebanon Normal School, and then Mr. Reed became superintendent of the Mansfield (Ohio) schools. In 1865, owing to impaired hearing, he resigned his position in the schools of Mansfield, and during the next eleven years devoted his attention to merchandising and manufacturing in that place. From 1876 to 1890 he was a grain and stock farmer of Columbus, Neb., owning and cultivating an entire section of land. At length, becoming an invalid, he came to Riverside and engaged in orange and lemon culture, of which fruits he now has forty-five acres in bearing, from his own planting. He is financially interested in La Mesa Packing Company. His two children, Mrs. Lois R. Pickett and Fred M., reside in Riverside.

HIRAM K. SNOW. The Snow family was founded in America by three brothers who came from England in 1624 and settled at Bridgewater, Mass. The grandfather, Isaac Snow, was born at Bridgewater and died in New Hampshire. During the Revolutionary war he was a soldier in the colonial army. The father, James Snow, was born in Massachusetts, and became a blacksmith in Whitefield, N. H., besides which, with a brother, he built and operated the first sawmill in the whole state. He married Statira Hutchins, who was born in Fryeburg, Me., and died in Solano county, Cal. Her father, Stilson Hutchins, was born in Maine, of remote English descent; and her grandfather, Stilson Hutchins, Sr., when a young man, was captured by the Indians and carried to Canada, but managed to effect an escape and returned to Maine, later enlisting from that state in the Revolutionary war. James Snow was twice married and by the two unions had ten children who attained mature years, three sons and one daughter now living. The oldest son, Asa B., enlisted in the Civil war as surgeon of the First Corps of New York Engineers. He was stationed at James Island, where he was taken ill and died when en route to New York. Another son, Horace, was first lieutenant in the regular army, but resigned his commission after the war and some years later died in Tustin, Cal.

The next to the oldest child born of his father's second marriage, Hiram K. Snow was born in Whitefield, N. H., November 15, 1834. In the spring of 1852 he left his native town to start upon the long journey to California, going to Boston, where he sailed on the ship Witch of the Wave, arriving in San Francisco, via the Horn, October 17, 1852, after a voyage of one hundred and sixteen days. At once he proceeded to the mines of Calaveras and Mariposa counties, where he remained for four years. In 1856 he returned east via the Panama route. After a few weeks at his old home he settled in Osage, Mitchell county, Iowa, where he carried on business pursuits for two years. During his residence there he married Miss Cynthia O. Downs, who was the first white child born in Janesville, Wis., and was a daughter of a pioneer physician of that town, Dr. E. M. Downs. In 1859 Mr. Snow removed to Bandera county, Tex., and embarked in the cattle business, remaining there until the Civil war broke out, when, not wishing to live in a state that seceded from the government, he started for California. At the time it was impossible for Union sympathizers to get through El Paso, so his party took an out-of-the-way route through Chihuahua, Mexico, where they had the protection of the Mexican government. The trip was not without its heavy personal sorrow, for Mr. and Mrs. Snow buried their only child, Carrie, on the way, and they themselves were ill and worn when, after five months of travel, they arrived in San Francisco in November, 1861.

For seventeen years Mr. Snow engaged in the mercantile business in Vallejo and meantime served for two years as recorder of Solano county. During 1877 he bought fifty-six acres of raw land at Tustin, and upon it he settled the following year. But little improvement had been made, and his was the arduous task of bringing the land under cultivation. As yet no irrigation had been introduced, but the same year he joined with others to bring a ditch from Santa Ana, forming the Santa Ana Valley Irrigation Company, of which he has served as a director for some time. A number of experiments were necessary before he found to what products the soil was best adapted. Later he bought two hundred acres north of Tustin, but afterward sold half of the tract, and of the balance had eighty-five acres in grapes and fifteen acres in apricots. Unfortunately, blight killed the vines, causing a loss of $20,000, while the apricots proved to be a kind that did not bear in this soil. Since then he has planted ten acres in olives, forty acres in oranges, twenty acres in lemons, while the remainder is in alfalfa. At his old home place he owns twenty-six acres, in oranges, lemons and walnuts. He has built lemon houses on both places.

In the development of the peat lands Mr. Snow was a pioneer, his first effort being to utilize them for corn, but later celery was proved to be more profitable, and on his place was raised the first celery for eastern shipment. He owns three hundred acres near Fairview, of which two hundred are improved. Among his other possessions may be mentioned a walnut grove of one hundred and twenty-five acres in Ventura county, where the trees that he set out are now in fine bearing condition. The grove lies near Oxnard and is one of the largest south of the Santa Clara river. All movements tending toward the development of Southern California's resources have in him a warm champion, and he has been prominently identified with various organizations founded for this purpose. The Orange Growers' Association has had the benefit of his counsel and encouragement from the first, as has also the Walnut Growers' Association of Santa Ana. He aided in organizing the Tustin Fruit Growers' Association and for some time acted as a director. Formerly he also represented Orange county as a director of the Southern California Fruit Exchange. At one time he was a member of the American Horticultural Society, and he was a member of the first board of horticultural commissioners of Los Angeles county. In politics he has worked for the Republican party. While in Osage, Iowa, he was made a Mason, and after coming to California he was raised to the chapter in Vallejo and consistory in San Francisco.

The children born of Mr. Snow's first marriage are as follows: Hiram K., Jr., a rancher at Oxnard, Cal.; Lottie C., Mrs. Sinnard, of San Francisco; James Edmund, who has charge of the ranch at Fairview; Asa Geib, now a student in Throop Polytechnic Institute at Pasadena, and Charles Otis, at home. The second marriage of Mr. Snow united him with Miss Lucinda Elva Downs, who was born in Texas and is a sister of his first wife. The only child born of this union is named Elvetia Snow.

LELAND B. STEWARD. As a member of the board of directors of the Anaheim Union Water Company, and the Fullerton Walnut Growers' Association, Mr. Steward has wielded an influence in matters connected with the growth of Orange county. He is one of California's native-born sons, his birth having occurred in Placer county, October 29, 1863. His parents, Newton B. and Lorana (Gilbert) Steward, were natives respectively of New York and Michigan. The father spent fifteen years in the far west, and returned to Michigan in 1865. From that time until 1888 he made his home in Wayne county, Mich., but in the latter year again came to California, this time settling at Santa Ana, where he died September 24, 1896. His widow, who was born in 1836, is still living in Santa Ana.

When two years of age, Leland B. Steward was taken by his parents to Wayne county, Mich., where, later, he was given good educational advantages, including a two years' course of study in the Michigan State Normal School at Ypsilanti, Mich., and he was graduated in 1889 from Cleary's Business College, also in Ypsilanti. On the completion of his education he was employed as an instructor in commercial bookkeeping and penmanship for one year in a business college at Toledo, Ohio. His next enterprise was as a dealer in baled hay and straw at Albion, Mich., where he remained several years, being a member of the firm of Bentley & Steward. From Michigan he came to California in January, 1898, and settled near Fullerton, where he owns a ranch of twenty acres.

HARRISON L. MONTGOMERY. A resident of California since 1852, Mr. Montgomery has witnessed the unparalleled growth of the state and has himself contributed thereto, especially through his work as a horticulturist. In 1868 he came to Los Angeles county, his first home being in the vicinity of Downey, and he purchased a tract of land from Don Pio Pico, the last Spanish governor of California. In 1869 he settled on a ranch near the present site of Rivera, and for thirty years gave his attention to the cultivation of the land, superintending its planting to various fruits and to English walnuts, and bringing it to a high state of cultivation. In 1889 he and his wife came to the village of Rivera, where it is their intention to spend their remaining years. However, he still owns the ranch.

In company with two brothers, in 1852 Mr. Montgomery went from Ohio to New York and there took passage on an ocean vessel bound for San Francisco. The voyage was comparatively uneventful, and after one hundred and sixty-five days he landed at the Golden Gate harbor. His object in going west had been to try his luck in mining, and he proceeded to the Auburn gold mine on the Middle Fork of the American river, where he prospected and mined for a short time. His next location was in Sutter county, Cal., four miles from the old John A. Sutter residence, where he remained for thirteen years, meantime engaging in the wood business. Subsequently he turned his attention to farming and stock-raising. In 1866 he settled in Mendocino county, Cal., and engaged in farming, but two years later he established his home in Los Angeles county, where he has since remained. He was one of the first in this county to grow English walnuts, and his success stimulated others to embark in that industry, which is now one of the most staple in California.

DAVID C. BOYD. Improvements made upon his place in Riverside bespeak the intelligent activity of Mr. Boyd. When he came to this city, on the 1st of January, 1893, he established his home on Riverside avenue, where he owns fourteen and three-fourths acres of fruit land, under an excellent irrigation system and fenced with cypress hedge. The land is set out in navel oranges. To prove the results of his wise management, it is but necessary to state that when he picked his first crop of oranges from his orchard the entire output could be placed in two boxes, but now he picks about twelve car loads from the same grove.

In Bethany, Butler county, Ohio, Mr. Boyd was born July 22, 1850, being the youngest of three children, two now living. As early as 1882 he became interested in California, during which year he purchased nine and one-quarter acres of land in Riverside. Two years later he made his first visit to the coast, inspecting his purchase, and was so favorably impressed that he determined to remove here, as soon as it would be practicable. This he did, but he still owns property in Ohio. His aunt, Mrs. Eliza Sarber, had come to California in 1882 and settled in Riverside, where she still resides, and it was in no small measure due to her favorable reports that he was led to invest here.

Politically Mr. Boyd has always been a staunch Republican, and in religious belief is a Presbyterian. He was united in marriage, in Butler county, Ohio, with Miss Lizzie Magie, who was born in Ohio, and is a member of an old family of that locality. They are the parents of three children, Shirley B., Mary Alice and Harriet Mildred.

DR. PALMER ROSS REYNOLDS, of Santa Ana, was born in Clinton county, N. Y., December 28, 1863. While making his home with an uncle, Barber B. Reynolds, in Dundee, Huntington county Canada, he attended a grammar school and later studied in a high school. He then returned to his father's home and from there started on a tour of the western states, principally Kansas and Minnesota. In the latter state he visited two uncles, and in the former state he was clerk in a hotel at seventeen years of age. Later he again went to his father's home, where he remained for three years, and then came to the Pacific coast. In Los Angeles he took up the study of dentistry with E. L. Townsend, D. D. S., his brother-in-law. After gaining in this way a rudimentary knowledge of the profession, he entered the medical department of the University of Southern California, from which he was graduated in the class of 1893. Soon afterward he passed the examination before the State Board of Dental Examiners and received a state license, after which he opened a dental office in Santa Ana. He has a finely equipped suite in the Bristol and Rowley building and is building up an excellent practice.

WILLIAM GRANT FRASER. Having completed his literary education in the Academy of Inverness, in 1882 Mr. Fraser sailed for Halifax, and thence soon went to New Glasgow, Pictou county, where he became a bookkeeper in the Bank of Nova Scotia. Continuing in the banking business until October, 1887, he then resigned his position and came to California, locating at Elsinore, now in Riverside county. There he held the office of cashier of the Elsinore Bank until it was merged into the Exchange Bank. Locating in Riverside in June, 1890, he entered the employ of the Riverside Trust Company, which was just starting to develop Arlington Heights tract and the Gage canal system. At first he was connected with the surveying corps, and in January, 1891, became an accountant in the office. In 1899 he was made assistant manager of the same, and in December, 1900, was appointed manager of the entire company's interest. The company perfected the Gage canal, twenty miles long, and thereby brought over eight thousand five hundred acres under possible cultivation to oranges and lemons. This land, watered by the canal, is considered the best orange orchard district in this vicinity. The company has about fourteen hundred acres of its lands planted to oranges and lemons, and the product is marketed through the Arlington Heights Fruit Company.

J. DE BARTH SHORB. For many years Mr. Shorb was one of the most substantial business men and best-known citizens of Los Angeles county. An important factor in business life and public affairs, he won and retained the confidence and esteem of his fellow-citizens. He was widely known as president and general manager of the San Gabriel Wine Company and as president of the San Gabriel Valley Railroad and the Pasadena & Alhambra Railroad. For a time he was also president of the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce. His interests were therefore varied and important, and his name was well known in commercial circles in Southern California.

In 1867 Mr. Shorb purchased an interest in the Temescal grant and began mining operations. During the same year he married a daughter of Benito Wilson, who at that time was a prominent citizen of Southern California.

Mr. Wilson advised his son-in-law to give his attention to the raising of grapes and the manufacture of wine. It was through his influence that Mr. Shorb became a member of the San Gabriel Wine Company, whose interests include ten thousand acres of land, one thousand and three hundred acres of this property being devoted to the culture of the grape. It is said that this vineyard, both in its equipment and the quality of its grapes, is one of the best in the world.

FRANCIS MARION BRUNER, M. D. Very early in the history of this country a German family settled in Virginia. A later generation journeyed down the Ohio river and settled in Kentucky during pioneer days.

Francis Marion Bruner, son of Henry Bruner, in 1870 was called to the presidency of Oskaloosa College in Iowa, at the head of which he remained for seven years. He then cast in his fortunes with Abingdon College, and when that institution was united with Eureka College, he was chosen president of the Bible department of Eureka College, which position he filled for nine years, until the failure of his health necessitated his retirement from teaching.

By the marriage of F. M. Bruner to Esther Lane, who now resides in Des Moines, Iowa, seven children were born, Francis Marion, of this sketch, being next to the youngest. While the family were living at Abingdon and Eureka, he attended the colleges at those places. Afterward he studied in the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor and was graduated from Bellevue Hospital Medical College in New York with the class of 1890. Going to St. Louis, Mo., he was for two years employed by the health department in the City Hospital. Afterward he practiced near Des Moines, Iowa. In June, 1899, he came to California and opened an office in the Hervey building, Santa Ana, where he has since engaged in practice.

FRANK E. ABBOTT. In the Highgrove district, under the Gage canal, are the orange groves which Mr. Abbott owns and superintends. Of the sixty acres, forty-five are in bearing condition, while fifteen acres contain young fruit. The fact that the oranges are the finest quality of navels makes them marketable at fair prices, and the owner has found the management of the property not only an interesting relaxation from business pursuits, but a source of no inconsiderable profit as well.

After completing high school studies, Frank E. Abbott began clerking, and later was book-keeper for a paper company, but, owing to poor health, in 1885 he traveled through Montana, Oregon and California, hoping that the change might prove beneficial. January 25, 1886, he came to Riverside for the first time and was so pleased with the place that he returned to New York and arranged to locate here permanently. He embarked in the real estate business, and in 1892 accepted a position as secretary and manager of the Riverside Savings & Loan Association, retaining the latter position until he was appointed postmaster, August 11, 1894, by President Cleveland. In September of the same year he assumed the duties of his office. His business administration was a source of gratification to the people of the city. The free delivery limits were extended under his supervision and other improvements were made. The fact that his administration was satisfactory to all is especially noticeable by reason of his opposition by six candidates when he first entered the race for the office. He gave his undivided attention to the position, and his industry, constant oversight and tact were fruitful of a large success. August 17, 1898, he retired from the office, and since then he has followed horticultural pursuits. His residence is on Line street, in addition to which he has built other substantial houses.

JAMES A. WHITAKER. On coming to Southern California in 1885, Mr. Whitaker purchased six hundred and ninety acres of land in Orange county and at once embarked in the stock-raising business. On the advent of the Santa Fe system in what is now Buena Park, he was induced by the railway officials to lay out the village, platting for the purpose a portion of his original purchase. From that time to the present his name has been inseparably associated with the growth and upbuilding of the little town. Every enterprise calculated to promote local interests receives his active support and co-operation. Among these may be mentioned the Pacific Condensed Milk Company, of which he was a promoter, expending large amounts in order to secure its location in Buena Park, and subsequent events have proved the wisdom of his judgment, for the company now pays out large sums of money for labor and for milk gathered from farms throughout the locality. His foresight in developing this region has been largely instrumental in bringing into it, as investors, such prominent men as Andrew McNally, George B. Reeve and Frank W. Emery, all of whom have purchased large tracts of land and are developing them into fine fruit ranches.

On leaving Chicago in 1884, Mr. Whitaker came to California and spent some months in San Francisco, thence came to Orange county in 1885. He now owns one of the finest residences in Buena Park, and is closely identified with the history of this place. Actively interested in town and county politics, he has frequently represented his district as a member of the Republican county central committee, and has often been solicited to accept important offices, but has invariably declined, preferring the quietude of home life.

D. W. HASSON, M. D. The medical profession of Southern California has no more popular or capable addition to its ranks than is furnished by the medical and surgical services of Dr. Hasson, of Buena Park. While distinguished in the calling to which he has chosen to devote the remainder of his life, he is no less known as a politician of the broad and comprehensive kind, and at present as the state representative of the Seventy-sixth California assembly, to which office he was elected in November of 1900 for a term of two years.

A varied and useful existence preceded the removal of Dr. Hasson to California in 1893. He was born in Jo Daviess county, Ill., February 20, 1847, and served in the Civil war. After years of professional and public service in South Dakota and Nebraska, he came to California in 1893.

For a time after locating in California Dr. Hasson lived in San Bernardino county, and later spent a few months in Downey before coming to Buena Park in 1898. He has steadily advanced in the good will and confidence of his fellow townsmen, and, aside from the influence acquired from a large and lucrative practice, has been a promotive factor along educational and general improvement lines. He is at present a member of the board of trustees of the Buena Park school district and clerk of the board.

WILLIAM LIONEL ROBERTS. The orange industry is indebted to Mr. Roberts for some important improvements in the methods of fertilizing, principally brought about through his introduction of the Thomas phosphate powder, an article manufactured in the steel works of Great Britain, Germany and Belgium. It has many points of excellence as a fertilizer which appeal to the thinking and progressive horticulturists, not the least advantage being a reduction in the price over the old methods. Several ranchers have tried it to their satisfaction, and have found that it greatly strengthens the trees. The most noticeable improvement was apparent on the ranch of Mr. Roberts, who raised without the fertilizer two thousand one hundred loose boxes one year, and with the fertilizer his output increased to three thousand six hundred loose boxes the following year. About fifteen pounds of the Thomas phosphate are used to the tree, with two or three pounds of sulphate of potassium, and a similar quantity of nitrate of soda, and the mixture is about ten dollars cheaper per ton than the old-time fertilizers.

The activity of Mr. Roberts extends into several lines of industry, among them being the oil business with which he is extensively connected. He is one of the original promoters of the Grand Central Oil Company, which owns forty acres of land on section 4, on the famous Kern river. He is also one of the original members of the Tamarack Oil Company at Los Angeles, which has an extensive field southwest of the city. As a horticulturist he was one of the organizers and stockholders of the California Fruit Company, which erected a cannery at Ontario, Cal., for canning deciduous fruits, and which is one of the largest in Southern California.

ROBERT M. TEAGUE, proprietor of San Dimas Nurseries, established in 1890, is a prosperous horticulturist and nurseryman. Having made a study of horticulture, he is qualified to carry on successfully the propagation of nursery stock. Years of experience in both orchard and nursery have afforded him every opportunity for wide observation and investigation as to the best methods of producing a superior article of fruit, as well as the best nursery tree for orchard planting. In his nursery are all the well-known varieties of oranges, including the unsurpassed and unsurpassable Washington Navel, the China Mandarin, Thomson's Improved Navel (originated in 1890 by A. C. Thomson, of Duarte), Dancy's Tangerine, Valencia Late, Ruby Blood, Mediterranean Sweet, Paper Rind St. Michael, Kumquat or Kin-Kan (a native of Japan and a unique member of the citrus family), Malta Blood and Satsuma (which ripens as early as November). Among lemons he has the Eureka, Villa Franca and Lisbon varieties; in grape fruit, the Marsh seedless, Triumph G. F., Imperial G. F., and Improved Pomolo, also the Citrus Medica Cedra, from which citron rind is obtained.

REV. FRANCIS R. HOLCOMB. A native of Portage county, Ohio, Francis R. Holcomb was born June 4, 1841, a son of Chester R. and Adaline (Spencer) Holcomb, natives of Granby, Conn. When five years of age he was taken by his parents to what is now Muscatine, Iowa, and there received an academic education. Having decided to devote his life to the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal Church, he was ordained in 1878, and subsequently acted as pastor of various churches throughout Iowa. He became influential in promoting the cause of education, and in this capacity served for many years as clerk of the board of trustees of Bloomington township, Muscatine county. Upon removing to California, in the fall of 1888, he became pastor of the Fullerton Methodist Episcopal Church, and during his five years of service was also connected for two years with the church of the same denomination at Anaheim, and for a year with the church at Garden Grove.

In the early '90s he was transferred from the Iowa conference to the Southern California conference of the church, and still retains his membership in the same.

After many years of active service in the cause of humanity, Mr. Holcomb is enjoying a well-merited relaxation from his former responsibilities, and as an horticulturist at Fullerton is living near to nature, and her wonders of sky and air and harvest. He is the possessor of a ranch of thirty acres, eight of which are under oranges, which have been developed by his industry from a practically barren stretch of land. He also raises English walnuts and asparagus, and ships through the Fullerton Walnut Growers' Association, of which he is a member.

JOSEPH HOWARD. Though at present living in retirement in Santa Barbara, Mr. Howard has gained an enviable reputation in the city of his adoption, his integrity being unquestioned and his public-spiritedness an oft-demonstrated fact. An easterner by nature and training, he was born in Hartford, Conn., and spent his early years in Connecticut and Rhode Island. His father, Joseph Howard, was born in Providence, R. I., and his mother, Jane (Wells) Howard, was a native of Hartford, Conn.

Joseph Howard eventually removed to Orange, N. J., where he lived until 1872, at which time he located in Santa Barbara, and became interested in the management of a part of the Conejo ranch. He is now enjoying a well-earned relaxation from active business affairs, though an integral part of the city's growth, and an interested spectator of its increasing prosperity. He is a member of the Board of Trade and the Chamber of Commerce, and is a Republican in politics.

AMBROSE DICKEY. During the latter part of his life Mr. Dickey was associated with orange culture at Riverside. There were but three or four houses east of the Santa Fe Railroad, and the six acres purchased by Mr. Dickey on what is now Ruston avenue had all the discouraging aspects of a desert, from which little could be expected. After much fertilizing and irrigating the grove was planted, in 1890, and now the yearly output of navels, Mediterranean sweets and bloods is evidence of his wisely executed plans.

The occupation of horticulture was not a new one to Mr. Dickey when he first came to California. The years of his childhood were spent on the old homestead in Madison county, Ind., where he was born, in 1855. During his youth and early manhood he lived upon the same acres, in the conscientious pursuit of general farming, stock-raising and fruit-growing. He came to California in September of 1885, and the following year located at Riverside, where his death occurred July 6, 1900. He was a staunch upholder of the principles of the Republican party, and cast his first presidential vote for Ulysses S. Grant. He was a member of the United Brethren Church, to which his wife and children also belong.

ROBERT W. BURNS. The splendid service and management which have resulted in excellent protection against fire for the citizens of Los Angeles is due incidentally to the modern equipment evolved from the brain power of those who make a study of the most menacing danger of city life, but principally to the innate courage of those who unflinchingly strive for the individual preservation of life and property. Among those in high places who have won distinction as fire fighters may be mentioned Robert W. Burns, secretary of the Los Angeles fire department.

Although comparatively a young man to have so impressed his worth upon the community, Mr. Burns, who was born in Chicago, Ill., September 7, 1874, has improved his opportunities and has worked his way from the bottom round of the ladder. His father, John Burns, was born in Dumfries-shire, Scotland, that part of the country made famous by the poetical accomplishments of his famous kinsman, Robert Burns. When quite young he learned the grocery business, which he practiced after his emigration to Oswego, N. Y. His lines were afterwards laid in Chicago, Ill., and during the fire in 1871 he lost so much that he afterwards removed to Ontario, Canada, in the hope of replenishing his finances. After engaging in the mercantile business for eight years in the northern country he came to Los Angeles, in 1886, where he was similarly employed until disposing of his Los Angeles interests. He is at present living on a ranch at Moneta, Los Angeles county. He married Harriet Emily Smyth, who was born in England, and who also is still living. Of the four daughters and two sons in the family, Robert W. is the youngest, while his brother, William, is also living here and is an employe of the city parks.

Mr. Burns was educated in the public schools of Ontario, Canada, and in Los Angeles, in which latter city he graduated from the high school and from the Los Angeles Business College. From his earliest boyhood he had been interested in fire engines, and the undertakings of the brave men who gladly risked their lives for the sake of humanity, and used to follow the engines when they went out on their errands of mercy from his home across from old Number 3, between Main and Spring streets. He also used to drive the hose cart at an age when the average boy would be considered incompetent for so grave a responsibility. After his graduation he became bookkeeper for C. E. Crowley, later assisting with the construction of the Gila canal for a period of six months. In time he returned to his former position as bookkeeper, and when twenty-one years of age entered the fire department as callman, and was at the same time accountant. In 1896 he was called into the office and served on detail work, and when the office of secretary was created he was given the appointment with the rank of captain. He is chief aide-de-camp of the present chief, and in his absence assumes the arduous responsibilities which fall to the lot of the older man.

In Los Angeles Mr. Burns married Rosa Nevell, who was born in Morristown, N. Y., and who came to Los Angeles when six years of age. Mrs. Burns had excellent educational opportunities, and supplemented her training at the public schools by graduating at the State Normal. Mr. Burns is a member of the Hollenbeck Lodge of Masons at Los Angeles, and has been raised to the Signet Chapter No. 57, R. A. M. He is identified with the Los Angeles Commandery No. 9, K. T., Al Malakiah Temple, N. M. S., and the Independent Order of Foresters. In political affiliation he is a Republican. In addition to his many interests Mr. Burns is a natural musician, performing with skill on several instruments. This talent has been of great benefit to him in many ways, and has opened possibilities of meritorious accomplishment. During the Spanish-American war he was principal organizer of the Seventh Regiment Volunteer Band in San Francisco.

ALEXANDER GRANT, builder, traveler and citizen of Los Angeles, was born in Linlithgowshire, Scotland, November 25, 1868, and is a member of the old and famous Clan Grant, whose latter-day adherents retain familiar customs. His father, Alexander Grant, was a native of the same locality, and was formerly a locomotive engineer on the National Road, in the employ of which he remained until his retirement. He is now seventy-two years of age. When a young man he married Margaret Heggie, a native of the same shire, and a daughter of John Heggie, who was born in Herringshire. Mrs. Grant, who died in 1883, was the mother of three daughters and two sons, and of these two daughters and one son are in America. John Grant was one of the early settlers of Los Angeles, but is now in South Africa. He is a builder by occupation.

The youngest in his father's family, Alexander Grant was reared in Linlithgow, Scotland, and when fourteen years old began to learn the trade of pattern making, at which he worked for four years. He then came to America and crossed the continent to California, arriving in Los Angeles October 1, 1886. Here he engaged as a carpenter for his brother, and in 1889 returned to Scotland, where he remained for three months. Upon resuming his building operations in Los Angeles he was successful in securing work. In 1893 he visited for three months the old familiar surroundings in his native land. Three years later he left his building interests in Los Angeles and started for South Africa, via England, and at London embarked on the steamer Rosencastle, bound for Capetown, a journey which took sixteen days. In Capetown he engaged in building and contracting until the breaking out of the Boer-English war, when he made his escape on the next to the last train out of Johannesburg. From Capetown he sailed to English shores. Arriving in London, he traveled through England and Scotland and returned to Los Angeles December 25, 1899.

As a contractor and builder Mr. Grant has succeeded beyond his expectations, and the city contains many evidences of his right to a continued patronage. He erected many residences, as well as numerous public buildings and flats. Mr. Grant is a Republican in national politics, and is a member of the Presbyterian Church.

J. C. HADACHECK. One of the important and substantial industries to which Los Angeles may lay claim is the brick yards at Pico Heights, of which Jensen & Hadacheck are the owners and proprietors. J. C. Hadacheck, the junior member of the firm, is one of the most experienced brick men in Southern California, and had a large amount of experience before casting his fortunes with the city of which he is at present an honored citizen. He was born near Tama City, Tama county, Iowa, in 1869, and is a son of J. C. Hadacheck, who was born in Germany, and upon immigrating to the United States settled near Tama City, Iowa. He was a farmer during the greater part of his active life, and was the father of ten children, of whom J. C. is third. The education of Mr. Hadacheck was acquired in the public schools of Tama county, Iowa, and he was reared on his father's farm. At a comparatively early age he felt the limitations by which he was surrounded, and when seventeen years old, in 1886, started out to make his own living. As a preliminary he went to Salt Lake City and learned the brick business, and eventually had a brick yard of his own, where he manufactured adobe brick with considerable success. He then went to Portland, Ore., and lived in Los Angeles during 1888-89 removing later to Iowa, and then to Chicago, Ill. In 1893 he settled permanently in Los Angeles, and engaged in the brick business as foreman for Jensen, and in 1897 journeyed to Alaska, where for two years he took part in the boom on the Copper river. Returning to Los Angeles, he continued in business with Mr. Jensen on Pico Heights, where they are doing an extensive business and catering to a constantly increasing trade. The yards are run to their utmost capacity, and the making of reliable brick assures a continuance of the present enviable prosperity. Instead of using coal, the machinery is worked by oil.

Mr. Hadacheck is widely known in business and social circles in Los Angeles, where his genial and kindly personality, tact and sympathy have won for him a host of friends and the approval of the business world. He is a member of the Fraternal Brotherhood.

HENRY C. JENSEN. Upon no one in Los Angeles does the grace of success rest more deservedly than upon Henry C. Jensen, the pioneer brick manufacturer of Los Angeles, and the first to make brick in the city with entirely white labor. A native of the vicinity of Plon, Schleswig-Holstein, Germany, he was born September 22, 1859, and was educated in the Merdorf common schools. His father was a brick manufacturer, and the son, while still quite young, gained a fair knowledge of this business. In 1882 he came to Chicago and was employed by Mayer & Toll as a moulder, and in 1887 tried to improve upon his fortunes by removal elsewhere. His original intention was to locate in South America, but upon arriving at New Orleans he somehow missed connections, and this setback completely changed his plans. Somewhat aimlessly he found his way west, and with no definite plans arrived in Los Angeles, where the conditions seemed particularly favorable for the prosecution of his favorite occupation. He started in building kilns for others and managed the same, and in Santa Monica also built kilns and prepared the way for brick-making. He then returned to Chicago and disposed of his interests there, and in the fall came back to Los Angeles, and ran a brick yard in Ballerino Place under the firm name of Pico & Hover. He furnished brick at that time for the Los Angeles theatre, the Produce block, and many other constructions of the early days, and then settled in Salt Lake City, where he made brick for a year. A later place of effort was Portland, Ore., where he also lived for a year, and just before the World's Fair found him in Chicago, with the full intention of starting a yard in order to supply the supposed unprecedented demand for building materials. More wise than many, he foresaw the disparity between the actual and the imagined, and pulled out of the gala city in time to avoid the undertow which engulfed the over-ambitious.

Upon returning to Los Angeles Mr. Jensen started a brickyard near the Catholic cemetery off from Buena Vista avenue, where he remained for three years, and then located at his present place on Western avenue and Sixteenth street, and was the first in the city to build his own brick yard and manufacture his own commodities. Since moving his plant he has disposed of the original one, and now has sixteen acres of land, and a very large capacity. Among the buildings for which he has furnished the brick may be mentioned the plant of the Ice & Cold Storage Company, and the Barlow dry goods store, besides numerous other buildings in different parts of the city and vicinity. Besides his brick manufactory, Mr. Jensen has other large responsibilities on his hands. He is the owner of lands and houses in Washington, and owns considerable property in Los Angeles.

In Los Angeles Mr. Jensen married Emma M. Decker, who was born in Schleswig-Holstein, and of this union there are two children, Walter and Robert. Mr. Jensen has several fraternal associations, and is a member of the South Gate Lodge No. 320, F. & A. M., the Fraternal Brotherhood and the Maccabees. Politically he is a Republican. He is a member of the German Lutheran Church, and contributes generously towards its charities and support.

GEORGE KITCHEN. That department of building which has to do with plastering has no follower in Los Angeles more expert than George Kitchen, a resident of this city since 1894. He was born in Glenham, Kane county, Canada, on the banks of Lake Erie, October 26, 1869, a son of George Kitchen, a native of Glenham township, Brant county, Ontario. The emigrating ancestor of the Kitchen family left his home in England and settled on the Delaware river in Pennsylvania long before the Revolutionary war. In this then unsettled portion of the state the paternal great-grandfather was born, and in time arose to meet the demand created for his services by the oppression of the colonists, by bravely shouldering his musket among the hosts of Washington. His son, another Wheeler Kitchen by name, and the grandfather of George, was born upon a farm which at present constitutes a part of Philadelphia, and from where he removed in 1812 to Ontario, of which section he was one of the very early pioneers. Upon his farm in Glenham township his son George was born. The latter became a blacksmith at Glenham, and in 1900 came on a visit to Los Angeles. He afterward went to Washington and at Pullman, that state, was terminated his long and useful life. He married Eleanor Huston, a native of Ontario, and of Scotch descent, and the representative of a family intimately connected with the origin of the Methodist Church in Canada. The grandfather of Mrs. Kitchen, Rev. Mr. Huston, was born in Ireland, and was one of the first twelve ministers sent into Canada to promote the interests of the Methodist denomination. He was for many years an elder in the church, and his death occurred in Florence, Ontario. Mrs. Kitchen, who is at present living with her son, George, is the mother of four children, the three others being Judson, who lives in Washington and is a contracting plasterer, and William and Wesley, who are residents of the east.

At the age of fourteen George Kitchen was sent to Duluth, Minn., where he learned the trade of plastering under his brother, his time of service being three years. In 1887 he removed to Tacoma, Wash., and engaged in contract plastering, in time working up a large and appreciative trade. While in the northern city he did the plastering for the Pacific National Bank, the City Hall and many important buildings and private residences. In the fall of 1894 he removed to Los Angeles, and continued in his former line of occupation, his success being equally pronounced in the new location. He superintended the plastering of the Harvard Military School, the Athletic Club Block, the Imperial, the Westlake Methodist Episcopal Church, the Christian Science Church at Riverside, the hotel at Long Beach, the Telephone Building, and many prominent residences in this and surrounding towns.

In Tacoma, Wash., Mr. Kitchen married Carrie Johnstone, a native of Lawrence, Kans., and of Scotch descent. To Mr. and Mrs. Kitchen have been born two children, Beatrice and Elizabeth. Fraternaly Mr. Kitchen is associated with the Knights of Pythias, the Southern California Lodge, F. & A. M., and the Maccabees, of which latter organization he is lieutenant commander of Tent No. 2. He is a Democrat in national politics, and is an ex-member of the Contracting Plasterers' Association. Mrs. Kitchen is a member of the Baptist Church.

REMI NADEAU, an early settler of Los Angeles county, was born near Quebec, Canada, in 1820. During 1860 he crossed the plains. Arriving in Sacramento in the spring of 1862 he followed the trade of millwright there, as he had done the winter before in Salt Lake City. Then he bought and sold produce in the mining regions of Northern California, and in the autumn of the same year came to Los Angeles. Here he kept five or six ox-teams busy, transporting goods and supplies from the sea-board. Later he employed mules for the conveying of the freight which he distributed at various points, as desired; and at one time he had eight hundred mules in the different departments of his business. For fifteen years he continued to devote his energy to his chosen field of enterprise. As stated above, he came to Los Angeles in 1862, and in 1864 took up his permanent residence here, his family joining him in 1868. He became wealthy and was enabled to retire many years prior to his death, which event took place January 11, 1887. Of his three sons and four daughters, two sons and a daughter survive.

DIETRICH H. P. VON DER LOHE. The name of Von Der Lohe is inalienably associated with different departments of building in Los Angeles, and not the least progressive and successful of the representatives of a distinguished German family is Dietrich H. P., who, like his brother, J. H. C., has led a varied and interesting life, and is one of the pioneer cement contractors of the town. At the time of his birth, February 6, 1868, the family fortunes were centered near the ancestral home in Germany, and for six years he led the care free life of the average Teutonic lad. He was then taken to Shillerplaner, where his education was acquired in the public schools, his life having in the meantime sustained a severe loss through the death of his father, Henry Von Der Lohe.

In 1884 the prospects of Mr. Von Der Lohe were materially brightened by his emigration to America, and by his location in the prosperous farming region of Berlin township, Otoe county, Neb., where he remained until 1886. He then took up his residence in Unadilla, of the same county, and located on a farm, and in June of the following year came to Los Angeles and engaged in the cement contracting business, which has since been his untiring occupation. At first associated with the Charles Malliton cement works, he went the following year to San José and was foreman for the enterprise of Mr. Otto until 1891, after which he returned to Los Angeles and continued the cement business for Clark & Neiman as foreman of their works. At the expiration of two years he traveled east for a few months, and when again in Los Angeles was foreman for Frank Linderfeld until 1897. The same year an opportunity to increase his information in general was afforded when sent on a mission as foreman for Kreip & Co. to South Africa. He went from San Francisco via British Columbia to New York, and from the eastern city took steamer to Liverpool, traveling thence to London, from where he again boarded a steamer bound for Cape Town, Africa. The latter journey consumed twenty-one days, and upon arriving at Johannesburg Mr. Von Der Lohe had charge of about twenty men during their labor of constructing the forts and laying in of the cement work. He then repaired to Pretoria and accomplished the cement work of the Building of Justice, after which he went to Kimberley and worked on the Market Hall. In Bollowayo, Rhodesia, he was also engaged for a time and then returned to Johannesburg, where the last work done in Africa was the floors of the jail, which, however, was never used, because of the approach of war, which disaster compelled them to leave their tools behind them. The master masons left Johannesburg October 2, 1899, and upon arriving at Cape Town took steamer to South Hampton, England. After sixteen days the shores of England reared their friendly cliffs, and soon after another steamer bore them back to the land of their adoption.

Until 1901 Mr. Von Der Lohe again associated himself with large cement works as foreman for Carl Leonardt, after which he located in Loveland, Colo., and was foreman of the sugar factory. Upon returning to Los Angeles he again assumed his old position as foreman for Mr. Leonardt, and has since undertaken some of the most important cement contractions in the city. Mr. Von Der Lohe has a wide acquaintance in Los Angeles, and his public spirited efforts to advance the general welfare of the town have placed him in the front ranks of the popular citizens of this community. He is fraternally associated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and is a Democrat in political affiliation.

GEORGE W. WAITE. One of the contractors and builders of Los Angeles is George W. Waite, who was born in De Soto, Vernon county, Wis., July 25, 1860, a son of Seymour Waite, a native of Genesee county, N. Y., and a grandson of William Waite, who died many years ago in New York state. Seymour Waite, when left an orphan at an early age, learned the printer's trade. In 1848 he removed to Port Washington, Ozaukee county, Wis., and entered upon a journalistic enterprise, and later removed to De Soto of the same state. During the Civil war he served in the Fiftieth Wisconsin Infantry as sergeant of his company, and after being mustered out of service returned to De Soto and substituted contracting and building for journalism. He served for one term as justice of the peace. In 1887 he located in Los Angeles, where he is living in retirement. His wife, formerly Ruth Osgood, was a native of New Hampshire and a daughter of James Osgood, a physician in Boston. Three children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Seymour Waite, two sons and one daughter, of whom George L. is the second. The oldest son, James O., is a rancher near Compton.

Until his twelfth year George W. Waite lived in De Soto, Wis., and attended the public schools, after which, in 1879, he graduated at the high school at Viroqua. His higher education was acquired solely through his own efforts, for from his sixteenth year he engaged from time to time in teaching, and was thus enabled to enter the University of Wisconsin, where he remained until the junior year. He then accompanied his parents to Creighton, Knox county, Neb., and while there was principal of one of the schools for a year, after which he engaged in the lumber business as manager for the Kansas City Company of Chicago. His parents having in the meantime removed to California, he resigned his position with the lumber company in 1887, and in Pasadena, Cal., engaged in the real-estate business for a year. Owing to dull times in the California city he repaired to Seattle in 1888, before the fire, and engaged in contracting and building. After the havoc wrought by devouring flames he found a prolific field of activity, and contributed his share towards the rebuilding of the city. The Ranier Hotel, the first large hostelry to rise above the ruins, was constructed by Mr. Waite, as well as the Bailey block, the club house and many public and private structures.

In 1890 Mr. Waite located in Los Angeles and continued his former occupation, and afterward became manager of the San Pedro Lumber Company, of Compton Yards, and established for them and managed their Clearwater yards. In this important capacity he remained for seven years, or until 1899, when he resigned his position to engage again in building and contracting. The wisdom of this decision has been repeatedly demonstrated, for success has crowned his efforts, and while engaged in building of a general character, is especially to be commended for his skill in putting up residences and flats. He is well known in the business and social life of Los Angeles, and is fraternally associated with the Independent Foresters and the Modern Woodmen of America.

In Creighton, Neb., Mr. Waite married Lillie Mills, a native of Winona, Wis., and a daughter of Stephen S. Mills. Mrs. Waite, who is a graduate of the Winona high school and a woman of particularly pleasing personality, is the mother of four children, Wendell, Ruth, Evelyn and Walter.

WILLIAM HAYES PERRY was born October 17, 1832, near Newark, Ohio, where he spent his boyhood. In 1853, partly on account of his health, he started for California overland with Colonel Hollister, of Santa Barbara, who crossed the plains that year with stock, sheep, cattle and horses. The party, which comprised about fifty men and five ladies, crossed the Missouri river at Bennett's ferry, south of Council Bluffs. Much annoyed by Indians on the way the party at length reached California, having made the journey via Salt Lake City, thence south via San Bernardino to Los Angeles, arriving in Los Angeles in February, 1854.

Having finished his apprenticeship in cabinet-making and turning before leaving the east, Mr. Perry engaged in this business on his arrival in Los Angeles. In less than one year from the time of his arrival he opened the first furniture store in Los Angeles. With the articles of his own manufacture, and with shipments he made from San Francisco, he kept a full and complete assortment, and held the trade solidly, having no competitor for four years. In 1846 he took in, as a partner, Mr. Brady, whom Wallace Woodworth bought out in 1858. With the latter he continued in business for twenty-five years, or until Mr. Woodworth's death in 1883, the name of the firm being Perry & Woodworth. In 1873 they changed from the furniture and cabinet business to dealing in lumber, mouldings, doors, sash, blinds, builders' hardware and finishing supplies of all kinds. They bought and built on the property now occupied by the business, extending through from Commercial street to Requena street, and on the south side of Requena street, building a branch of the Southern Pacific Railroad through the property, so as to avail themselves of railroad facilities in handling lumber, etc. After Mr. Woodworth's death Mr. Perry incorporated his business, and it is now known as the W. H. Perry Lumber and Mill Company. Mr. Perry and associates organized the Los Angeles and Humbolt Lumber Company at San Pedro, carrying there a stock to supply the Arizona and foreign trade. He organized the Pioneer Lumber and Mill Company at Colton, to supply the territory east of Los Angeles county, and also organized the Los Angeles Storage, Commission and Lumber Company. This company, in addition to lumber, carried lime, plaster, cement, fire-brick, etc., to supply the market.

Mr. Perry owns much of the most valuable real estate in this city, and is interested in steamers and sail vessels plying on this coast. He is a stockholder in the Nevada Bank and Union Trust Company of San Francisco, and stockholder and director in the Farmers and Merchants' Bank of Los Angeles; president of the W. H. Perry Lumber and Mill Company, president of the Pioneer Lumber and Mill Company, president of the Los Angeles City Water Company, president of the Crystal Springs Water Company, president of the Southern California Pipe and Clay Company, president of the Bard Oil and Asphalt Company, director in the Olinda Crude Oil Company, director in the Reed Oil Company, stockholder in the Slocan Oil Company, stockholder in the Union Oil Company, stockholder in the Kern Oil Company and many other corporations.

LARKIN SNODGRASS was born in Rock Castle county, Ky., March 11, 1824. In his youth he attended the common schools and when he was only twenty-two years of age he crossed the plains to California. Here he spent four years, then returning home, but, though he continued to dwell there some seven years, his purpose was to come back to the west, sooner or later. For the second time he turned his face westward and arriving in Sacramento, turned his attention to the raising of cattle and sheep. He lived there for eleven years, gradually accumulating a fortune, and in 1868 he removed to Ventura county, where he also engaged in the raising of live stock. He assisted in the organizing of the Ventura Bank and served as its president for four years. He stood high in the estimation of the people of that county, and by them was elected to the responsible position of treasurer of the county, serving two terms.

In 1884 he removed to Los Angeles and about four years later bought a large ranch located several miles southeast of the city, and it was not until 1890 that he disposed of this property. He then purchased his present fine stock farm, which is nearly three miles northeast of Compton and about an hour's ride from Los Angeles, when seated behind one of his splendid roadsters. He makes a point of raising thoroughbred trotting horses, and, indeed, is one of the few who hold the palm in this specialty in Southern California.

AARON M. OZMUN. Not a few of the men now prominent in commercial and financial circles in Los Angeles are those who had previously won success in various business activities in the east. Such is the record of Aaron M. Ozmun, president of the Columbia Savings Bank of Los Angeles, and one of the representative men of the city. Prior to his settlement in California he was for years intimately identified with the business interests of Minnesota, and especially the cities of Rochester and S. Paul, where he won an honorable position by reason of his business activity.

On the farm where his father's birth had occurred A. M. Ozmun was born in 1838. He removed with the family to Minnesota in 1856. In 1859 he left the home farm and secured employment in the hardware store of Taggart Brothers, at Ripon, Wis., where he remained for four years. On his return to Minnesota in 1863, with his father he established the hardware firm of A. Ozmun & Son, at Rochester, where he continued in business for twenty years. Finally, impelled by the need of a more central location, he removed to St. Paul, and became a partner in the house of Farwell, Ozmun & Jackson. In 1887 the business was incorporated under the title of Farwell, Ozmun, Kirk & Co., which name is still retained. A trade was built up by the house that was not limited to Minnesota, but extended through all the west and even to the Pacific coast. Mr. Ozmun was president of the corporation and one of its principal stockholders.

In 1893 Mr. Ozmun came to California. It was not his intention to engage actively in business, but he was prevailed upon to accept the presidency of the Columbia Savings Bank on South Broadway, and he has since stood at the head of this well-known banking house.

During his residence in Minnesota Mr.

Ozman married M. Cecelia, daughter of John V. Daniels, who was for years a member of the Minnesota state senate, and whose son, Hon. M. J. Daniels, his successor in the senate, is now president of the Orange Growers' Bank of Riverside, Cal. The only son of Mr. and Mrs. Ozmun is R. W., cashier of the Columbia Savings Bank. He is married and has a son who bears his grandfather's name.

HON. JOHN D. POPE. On a farm near Atlanta, Ga., Mr. Pope was born in 1838. About the close of the Civil war he established himself in law practice in Atlanta, and for years afterward was a partner of Hon. Joseph E. Brown, who was four times elected governor of Georgia and also held the office of chief justice of the supreme court. Association with a man so eminent and so able could not but prove helpful to Mr. Pope. His ability was recognized by his selection as judge of the superior court of the Atlanta circuit, state of Georgia, in which position he served for three years, resigning to accept the office of United States attorney, to which he was appointed by Ulysses S. Grant, then president.

On resigning as United States attorney, Mr. Pope resumed the practice of law in his southern home. In 1873 he removed to St. Louis, where he practiced law until 1890. He then came to Los Angeles, where, in addition to his general practice, he is counselor for a number of large corporations, including the Santa Monica and Mount Lowe Railway Companies. He is also president of the Title Guarantee and Trust Company.

HON. JOHN D. WORKS. Until he came to California in 1883 Judge Works made his home in Switzerland county, Ind., where his father, James A. Works, a Kentuckian by birth, was long a leading lawyer. He was born in Indiana in 1847. On changing his residence from Indiana to California Judge Works opened a law office in San Diego. In 1886 the governor of the state, on the petition of the bar, appointed him superior judge of San Diego county, and at the next election he was chosen for the same office without opposition. After one year of service as superior judge he resigned and entered into law practice in San Diego with Hon. Olin Welborn. A year later he was appointed a justice of the supreme court of California, to serve until the ensuing election. At the election following he was chosen to serve as a supreme court justice to fill the unexpired term of Judge McKinstry. When the term expired he declined to be a candidate for re-election, and returned to San Diego, taking up the practice of law with Hon. James A. Gibson and Harry L. Titus, under the firm name of Works, Gibson & Titus. He made a specialty of the law relative to water rights and water companies; few attorneys in the state are more familiar than he with this most important branch of the profession. He is now and has been for years attorney for the San Diego Water Company, and acts in the same capacity for the San Diego Flume Company and the San Diego Land and Town Company. In 1896 he removed from San Diego to Los Angeles, his present home, but he still retains his office in San Diego, where his son represents the firm of Works & Works. In Los Angeles he is at the head of the firm of Works & Lee, which has in the Henne block one of the finest office suites in the city and also owns a very exhaustive and valuable law library. Besides his connection with other matters of law he acts as attorney for the Consolidated Water Company, which was organized under the laws of West Virginia and carries on business in San Diego.

HON. ROBERT NELSON BULLA. In 1883 Mr. Bulla came to Southern California, arriving in Los Angeles December 26. For the next four years he was connected with the offices of Bicknell & White, after which he practiced alone. In the campaign of 1892 he was induced to accept the nomination, by the Republican party, for the assembly in the seventy-fifth district, comprising the second and third wards of Los Angeles city. Mr. Bulla was elected by a handsome majority. He took an active part in the session of 1893, although his party was in the minority in that branch of the legislature. It was during this session that he introduced an entirely original idea in legislation, a bill which provided for the purchase, by the state, of all land sold for the non-payment of state and county taxes. No other state has even grappled with this question in this manner. Owing to its novelty it met with strenuous opposition on the part of some of the state officials, but its excellent features commended themselves strongly to the members of the two houses and it passed and went to the governor for his signature. Representations were made to Governor Markham that its operation would deprive the state of its revenue. He therefore vetoed it, much to the disappointment of its friends.

Two years later Mr. Bulla was re-elected to the assembly. He accepted the position chiefly to re-introduce his now famous bill. At this election his opponent was a fusionist, but he won the election by a majority far greater than at his former election. In the session of 1895 he again introduced the delinquent tax bill. It passed the legislature and was approved by Governor Budd. The law has been in force for several years, and has been found a measure wise and beneficent toward those who are unfortunate in having their realty sold for taxes, saving them enormous sums in percentages upon redemption, delivering them from the unjust exaction of purchasers of tax titles. It has also proved to be the means of increased revenue to the state, because it receives the benefit of all the penalties upon redemption.

Appointment was prohibited by the constitution of the state. In the fall of 1898 he was a candidate for the state senate from the thirty-seventh district and was elected by the largest majority of any Republican on the ticket. During the session of 1897 he was chairman of the senate committee on claims and as such passed on all claims against the state which were presented to the legislature. He was also a member of the judiciary committee and the committee on municipal corporations. During this session his bill on Torren's land transfer, which had been defeated in 1895, was passed, notwithstanding the strenuous efforts of a paid lobby to defeat it. At this session he introduced and had passed a bill changing the laws governing the state normal schools, the object being to remove them as far as possible from political influence. He also introduced a bill, which became a law, preventing divorced persons from remarrying within a year from the date the decree of separation was passed. This bill has received severe criticism from some, yet it is doing much to free the state of California from the stigma of numerous divorces, which had grown to be an evil of no small dimensions.

A. W. SEPULVEDA. Even the most casual visitor to Southern California becomes familiar with the surname, Sepulveda. Dolores Sepulveda, the grandfather of A. W. Sepulveda, was one of the old landholders of Los Angeles county, his vast estates extending along the sea coast from San Pedro to Redondo Beach, and for miles back into the foothills. While on his way to Sacramento to obtain a patent to his ranch he was killed by some Indians, who had stealthily awaited his coming. Much of his property was handed down to his son, Joe Diego Sepulveda, who was born on the old ranch near San Pedro in 1813. The latter, as he grew to maturity, followed in his father's footsteps as a financier and business man, handling his vast possessions with masterly ability. He owned his share of one-fifth of thirty-nine thousand acres of land in one body, and over the hills roamed his great herds of cattle and flocks of sheep. During the war of the United States with Mexico he was loyal to the country which destiny had decreed was to be the victor in the conflict. Besides contributing generously of cattle and horses, money and provisions from his own private stores, he fought in the American army and materially aided in extending the dominion of the United States to the waters of the Pacific. He died on his ranch in 1869, aged fifty-seven years. His wife was Maria Desalda, daughter of a wealthy Spanish officer, who lived in San Diego.

On the ancestral estates A. W. Sepulveda was born September 28, 1854. When a mere boy he moved with the family to San Pedro, and here he has spent most of his life. Since he was fifteen years of age he has practically been independent, but his father having taught him lessons of industry and wisdom, he has heeded his early training and has been judicious in the expenditure of the capital which passed into his hands at the death of his father. He still owns large tracts of land in Los Angeles, besides property in the surrounding country.

WILLIAM L. ADAMS. One of the successful ranchers and business men of Santa Maria valley is William L. Adams, who was born in Lancastershire, Scotland, August 7, 1836. From earliest youth he was accustomed to the surroundings of a farm, his parents having been successful farmers in his native land. At the age of twelve he accompanied the rest of his family to America, where for one year they lived in Salt Lake City, Utah, the following year being spent in San Bernardino. From there they removed to the northern part of the state, and for five years carried on farming in Alameda county. Mr. Adams then started out on his own responsibility, and in 1860 settled in the Pajaro valley, Santa Cruz county, where for eight years he was fairly successful as a farmer and stock-raiser. Following this experience he removed to the Salinas valley, Monterey county, remaining there for two years, or until settling in the Santa Maria valley, Santa Barbara county, in 1869.

In the general upbuilding of this productive valley Mr. Adams has taken a prominent part, and particularly before its advantages were commonly known or many had settled here with permanent intentions. He opened the first merchandise store in the valley, which establishment received a lucrative trade for many miles around and for many years. The store has long since passed into other hands, and Mr. Adams has devoted his entire time to farming and stock-raising. His home is located one and a half miles west of Santa Maria, on the Guadalupe road, and here are to be found all manner of modern improvements and labor saving devices, also large tracts of beets and beans, and many cattle and horses. Nor does this represent the extent of the land possessions of Mr. Adams, for he owns large tracts in Santa Barbara and San Luis Obispo counties.

In 1861 Mr. Adams married Elizabeth Conner, daughter of James Conner, of Santa Clara county, and of this union there are seven sons and four daughters. Mr. Adams is a Republican in politics, and has taken an active part in the politics of his county and state. His exceptional executive and financial ability finds ample scope as president of the Santa Maria Bank, and as president of the water works. He is widely known in the community which he has so materially benefited, and by all is regarded as one upon whom his friends and associates may implicitly rely.

GARRETT L. BLOSSER, proprietor of the Champion stables at Santa Maria, was born in Stockton, Cal., in 1865, a son of Lorenzo W. Blosser, a native of Pennsylvania. The elder Blosser came to California in 1850 and with his family removed to Santa Maria about 1869. He was a blacksmith by trade, and had no superior in his line in the county. His son, Garrett L., started out at an early age to earn his own living, and as an experiment ran a butcher shop for a couple of years. Convinced that this kind of business was hardly to his liking, he entered another field of activity, namely, the livery business, in which he has since been engaged.

In all, Mr. Blosser has been in the livery business in Santa Maria for eighteen years, and during that time has gained a reputation for correct business methods and integrity which have brought in an extended patronage not only in the town but throughout the surrounding country. His rigs and horses are above the average to be found in small towns, and the appointments in his barns show a consideration for the comfort of the dumb creatures entrusted to his care.

June 17, 1894, Mr. Blosser married the daughter of a rancher and an early settler of this vicinity, and they have two children. In politics Mr. Blosser is a Republican, and has been prominently identified with the political undertakings of his adopted town. He is at present serving as constable and deputy sheriff, having been appointed in 1898, and having formerly held the position of deputy constable for seven years. Fraternally he is a Mason and an Odd Fellow at Santa Maria. The residence of Mr. and Mrs. Blosser is located on Church street, and is a comfortable and homelike place, and evidently the scene of happy home surroundings.

J. W. ATKINSON. Years of practical experience have converted Mr. Atkinson into one of the foremost authorities on sugar-making in the United States. It may be said that practically his entire business life has been devoted to this branch of industry, and that he has entered into the details of every branch of the manufacture and has accomplished gratifying results by reason of his experiments. He was born in Placer county, Cal., and is a graduate of the State University of California. In time he became identified as superintendent with the Alvarado Sugar Company in Alameda county, and it was here that he gained his first and most useful lessons in the manufacture of sugar, beginning at the bottom and working his way up. At this time the factory was the only one in the United States, and he is at the present time the second oldest sugar factory superintendent in the country. For ten years he continued with the Alvarado Company, but in 1898, when the Union Sugar Company was organized, and built their factory, he became associated with them in his former capacity of superintendent.

The small village which constituted the field of operations for the Union Sugar Company is located six miles southwest of Santa Maria, and six miles east of Guadalupe, on the banks of the Guadalupe lake. The lake is about seven miles in length, and is reached by the Southern Pacific and the Pacific Central Railroads. The officers of the company are: John L. Howard, president; E. C. Burr, vice-president; James Coffin, secretary; and J. W. Atkinson, superintendent. The president, vice-president and secretary are at the home office in San Francisco. In the valley there are fifty thousand acres of beet land, and the company owns four thousand two hundred acres. It is said that there are plenty of opportunities to rent or buy beet land in the valley, and every one asserts that it is a pleasant and profitable business. Besides the factory, which is built of brick and steel and has the most complete and modern equipment, there are fine offices and ranch houses, besides the residence of the superintendent, the whole making up a little village at the Union Sugar Works. Besides there is a post office called Betteraira, of which Mr. Atkinson is postmaster. The capacity of the factory is five hundred tons daily, granulated sugar being exclusively manufactured. The credit for building up and maintaining the excellent character of this sugar enterprise is traceable directly to the efficient and intelligent management of Mr. Atkinson, and it must be a source of immense consolation to him that his services are so thoroughly appreciated by those who in the beginning entrusted to his skill and conscientious application the conduct of a concern of such magnitude. Mr. Atkinson is a Republican in politics. His pleasant and hospitable home is presided over by Mrs. Atkinson, whom he married in Alvarado.

WHEELER C. BLUMBERG. No name in the Ojai valley is better or more widely known than that of Blumberg, nor does any carry with it more joyous memories of summers in the midst of the most beautiful mountains and natural surroundings in Southern California, an interlude from the heat and strife of cities, to trout fishing, hunting, rambles in shady glades, drinks from life-giving springs, baths that strengthen jaded muscles, and excellent accommodations when the day's exertions are over, augmented by ample provision for the most fastidious needs of the inner man. For of all the delightful resorts which charm the eye and rest the mind of man, in this miniature Yosemite is surely one of the most desirable, and one of the most tactfully and intelligently planned.

Inseparable from, but by no means overshadowing the attainments of his son, Wheeler C. Blumberg, the proprietor of Wheeler's Hot Springs, is the pioneer career of Abraham Wheeler Blumberg, the founder of Nordhoff and the manager of the Ojai Hot Springs up to the time of his death in September of 1899. The elder Blumberg was born in Roxbury, Delaware county, N. Y., July 19, 1836, a son of Christopher and Jane (Mackey) Blumberg, natives of New York. His ancestry was Scotch and German, the paternal grandfather, George Blumberg, having emigrated from Germany and settled in Delaware county, N. Y. He was educated in New York and afterwards studied law in Iowa, being admitted to the bar of that state. In 1871 he brought his family to California, and after a short time in Los Angeles came to the site of Nordhoff, the twenty acres of which had been donated by a Ventura speculator. His wife named the town because of the interest which the book of Charles Nordhoff inspired in her, and which first seriously interested her in the marvels of California. The family lived several years in Nordhoff and three years in Santa Paula, and in 1887 the father established the Ojai Hot Springs, located in the cañon called Montilija, meaning, when interpreted from the Indian, "Mother of all Waters." The efficacy of the sulphur and other springs was never questioned, nor was the grace and inspiration of its location ever doubted, hemmed in as it was by mountains a thousand feet high on either side, and nine hundred feet above the sea. Mr. Blumberg also became postmaster of the place, and he built the store, bathhouses and all necessary adjuncts to his well patronized resort. He was a successful business man, and took the utmost pains in regard to the comfort and convenience of his guests. He accumulated a great deal of real-estate during his residence in California, and among his other undertakings built the Nordhoff Hotel, later changed to the Ojai House. He married in 1859 Catherine E. Vancuren, a native of New York, and of this union there were five children, four of whom are living: Inez O., Wheeler C., Birdsel W. and Irene M. Mr. Blumberg was a Republican and served as justice of the peace, and was a Master Mason. Mrs. Blumberg died in 1891.

One year after the establishment of the Ojai Hot Spring Wheeler C. Blumberg started the Wheeler's Sulphur and Mineral Springs, which has now a world-wide reputation as an ideal place in which to recuperate and revel in the splendors of nature. The location for his idyllic retreat was discovered by accident, while on a deer hunt, and to his experienced eye and trained intelligence the only course to pursue was to gain government title to the whole cañon. Arriving at Nordhoff from Ventura, the pleasure-seeker is driven in the Wheeler Springs turnout through fields of hay and corn and all manner of orchards and live oak groves over the mountains to this aggregation of enticing arrangements for the pleasure and gain of travelers. Too numerous to mention are the opportunities afforded in this rugged and weird scenery. What with fishing and boating and camping, driving and riding and swimming, taking advantage of the various springs for the curing of as many ills of the human anatomy, one is fully occupied, and at the same time rest is assured by the constant change and communion with nature's wonders. There is a long-distance telephone to call up the world beyond the mountains, an admirable hotel and cuisine, pavilion, bowling alley, tennis court, club rooms, guides, rigs and saddle horses. The grounds are lighted by electricity, and the rates for this multiplicity of favors are within the reach of the most unassuming bank account. Summer and winter the scene of gayety is patronized with unabating fervor, its convenient location, which, by the way, is unexcelled, being a hundred miles from Los Angeles, forty-five miles from Santa Barbara, twenty miles from Santa Paula, nineteen miles from Ventura, seven and a half miles from Nordhoff, and two and a half miles from the Montilija postoffice, rendering it easily accessible from all points. The genial proprietor of the springs has many friends among those who visit him year after year, his tact and good judgment, knowledge of the workings of human nature in the winter and summer, and his innate desire to please endow his establishment with a popularity complimentary in the extreme.

Mr. Blumberg was married in San Francisco in 1880, and his wife died in February of 1884, leaving one child, Charles William, who is living at home. He married again in 1885, and of this union there are two children, Etta R., who is fourteen years of age, and Carl B., who is ten years old. Mr. Blumberg is a Republican in politics (as were also his grandfather and father) and cast his first presidential vote for Benjamin Harrison. He is a member of the Odd Fellows at Ventura.

J. F. CORBETT. One of the most energetic and successful contributors to the general popularity of Long Beach is J. F. Corbett, a blacksmith by occupation, and for some years a dealer in all manner of agricultural implements. In his disposition of his various responsibilities he seems to have introduced some of the proverbial breeziness existing in his native place of Nova Scotia, in the vicinity of Halifax, where he was born June 2, 1865. His father, Thomas, was born in Nova Scotia, where the paternal grandfather had settled after emigrating from Scotland. Thomas Corbett was a farmer in Nova Scotia, and in 1868 removed to Rhode Island, and from there to Detroit, Becker county, Minn., in 1872, where his death occurred in 1887. He was a member of the Congregational Church, and was a man of large heart and good judgment. The mother, formerly Rachel Fisher, who was born in Nova Scotia, and is of French descent, now lives in Minnesota, and is the parent of eight children, six sons and two daughters, of whom one son is deceased, J. F. being the second youngest son.

After the family removed to Minnesota in 1872, J. F. Corbett attended the public schools, and learned to be a model farmer under his father's instruction. While still very young he became interested in all kinds of machinery and carpenter work, and when opportunity offered learned both trades. During the winter time he worked as a blacksmith in Detroit, Minn., and during the harvest season in the summer time worked as an expert on binders and threshers for about fourteen years, his territory being the Red River valley in Minnesota and Dakota. On account of his wife's health he was obliged to make a change of location, and in 1894 came to California and spent the winter in Colton. In 1895 he located in Long Beach, and July 11, same year, bought out the Vanderburg Pioneer blacksmith establishment of the town. He continued the business and carried on a general repair trade, and in 1901 enlarged his business by laying in a stock of agricultural implements and wagons. He represented Baker & Hamilton, machines, implements and wagons, and had a well equipped enterprise at No. 130 West First street, with an implement house adjoining the shop and office. He was successful in carrying on his business, and the excellence of his work brought him several remunerative contracts. For instance, he competed with eastern rivals for the privilege of putting the cages in the jail, and the work was satisfactory in every way. Recently Mr. Corbett sold out his business in Long Beach and accepted a position with the Norvell-Pickrell Mining Company of Encampment, Wyo., of which company he is a director.

In Detroit, Minn., Mr. Corbett married Edith Stoddard, who was born in Milford, Mass., and who died in Long Beach. Mrs. Corbett was the mother of four children: Harold; Eugene; Malcolm, who died at the age of four years; and Meredith. The second marriage of Mr. Corbett was solemnized in Long Beach, and united him with Mrs. J. (Peck) Campbell, a native of Illinois. Mr. Corbett is a member of the Board of Trade, and is a member of the official board of the Baptist Church, in which he served as Sunday-school superintendent. He is a Republican in national politics.

MRS. MARY DREER. On the brink of the arroya, commanding a beautiful view, stands one of the beautiful homes of Pasadena, it being the residence of Mrs. Dreer, since 1888 an honored and estimable citizen of this place. She was born in Reading, Pa., September 24, 1827, being a daughter of William Curtis and Susan (Deysher) Leavenworth, natives respectively of Woodbury, Conn., and Berks county, Pa. Her father was admitted to the bar in 1821 and during much of his active career followed the profession, although about 1837 he retired temporarily from practice in order to turn his attention to iron manufacturing. When gold was discovered in California, a love for adventure and desire to see more of the far west led him to sail to California, via the Panama route, and on his arrival he became infatuated with the alluring prospects, so remained much longer than he had anticipated. On his return east he settled at Honeoye Falls, and there his life came to an end in 1882. He was a son of John Peck Leavenworth, a native of Connecticut and for years a farmer in Rush township, Monroe county, N. Y., where he died.

The maternal grandfather of Mrs. Dreer was John Deysher, a native of Pennsylvania, in whose family were fifteen children, nine living to manhood or womanhood. The great-grandfather of Mrs. Dreer, John Lescher, was appointed a member of the constitutional convention in Pennsylvania and served through the entire period of the Revolutionary war. Afterward he resumed iron manufacturing.

Being the only child of well-to-do parents, Miss Mary Leavenworth was given every advantage ample means rendered possible, and was educated principally in private schools and academies. In Philadelphia, Pa., June 22, 1847, she became the wife of Henry A. Dreer, who was born in Philadelphia and received his education in private schools there and in the parish school of old Zion Church. When seventeen years of age he began to assist his father in the manufacturing business and two years later established a business of his own. From 1838 until his death he conducted the seed business which still bears his name. His interest in matters relative to his chosen occupation led him to accept the office of treasurer in the Philadelphia Horticultural Society. Socially he was identified with the Union League of Philadelphia. All enterprises calculated to advance the general welfare received his substantial aid and encouragement, and his death, which occurred December 22, 1873, was recognized as a distinct loss to the commercial interests of the city.

The family of Mr. and Mrs. Dreer comprised the following-named children: Mary L., wife of Edwin Greble, of Pasadena; William F., of Philadelphia; Susan A., wife of Col. William J. Volkmar, U. S. A.; Augusta N., who resides in Pasadena with her mother; Harry, deceased; and Louise, wife of A. C. Tower, of New York City. All worthy measures, but particularly such as are maintained by the Presbyterian Church, receive the sympathy and help of Mrs. Dreer, and she was active in fostering many of such movements personally until injuries received in a recent runaway accident somewhat lessened her activity, though not decreasing her interest nor impairing the keenness of her mental faculties.

ABEL POMEROY HOFFMAN. The genealogy of the Hoffman family is traced to Germany, whence Richard Hoffman emigrated to Pennsylvania with his parents and settled in Washington county, later removing to Wayne county, Ohio, from there to Illinois, and in 1856 going via the Nicaragua route to California, where he died the following year. Abel, son of Richard, was born in Washington county, Pa., in 1818, and was four years of age when the family removed to Wayne county, Ohio. When seventeen he went to Clinton, Ohio, and for two years clerked in a store. Next he carried on a dry-goods business at Canal Fulton, that state. Removing to Illinois in 1846, he bought a farm near Princeton, and later removed to land near Troygrove, where he carried on agricultural pursuits for eighteen years. His next removal was to Mendota, where he engaged in the stock, grain and wool business about thirty years. The year 1892 found him in California, where he superintended his son's ranch for three years and then improved a ranch of his own in the San Fernando valley. The planting of fruit trees and caring for the same engrossed his attention until 1898, when he retired, and has since made his home in Long Beach. Twice married, for his first wife he chose Sarah Pomeroy, who was born in Ohio, her father, James, having removed to that state from Pennsylvania. She died at the age of twenty-three, leaving two children, of whom one survives, Abel Pomeroy. The other son, James R., served in the One Hundred and Fourth Illinois Infantry during the Civil war, and died in Kansas City, Mo., in 1887, aged forty-four years. His wife and one son, Leon, survive, now living in Chicago. The second wife of Mr. Hoffman was Margaret Ann (Liken) Porter, who spent much of her life in Illinois, but died at Long Beach, Cal., in 1900, aged eighty-two years. Of this second union there were two children, Sarah Samantha and Florence Rebecca.

At Canal Fulton, Ohio, Abel Pomeroy Hoffman was born April 13, 1845. In early childhood he lived with his grandparents near his birthplace, but when nine years of age accompanied his father to LaSalle county, Ill., and during boyhood was a student in Mendota College. In May, 1864, he enlisted in Company A, One Hundred and Thirty-second Illinois Infantry, and was mustered in at Chicago, thence sent to Kentucky after Morgan, the guerrilla, and into Missouri after Price. With his regiment he was honorably discharged at Chicago in November, 1864. Returning home, he soon resumed his collegiate studies, but left school before graduating in order to enter upon a business life. His first experience of mercantile pursuits was obtained at Mendota, where for a time he was employed by Scott Brothers, a branch of the Chicago house of Carson, Pirie, Scott & Co. With this same company he also worked in stores at Ottawa and Bloomington. On his return to Mendota he embarked in business for himself, dealing in dry goods and clothing. For two years he also engaged in the manufacturing business in the same city. From 1879 to 1884 he made Chicago his home and conducted a grocery. Meantime, in 1883, he made his first trip to California, also traveling through Arizona and other portions of the west. So pleased was he with the prospects on the Pacific coast that in the fall of 1884 he established himself in Los Angeles, where he carried on a fire insurance business. During the existence of the Southern California Insurance Company he acted as its agent and when it was merged into the London & Liverpool he remained with the latter as agent.

About 1886 Mr. Hoffman began to speculate in Los Angeles property and the following year became interested in Long Beach. Among the land syndicates of which he was a member were the Simi, Porter and Lankershim Land Companies, of which latter he was vice-president. At the close of the boom he concentrated his holdings in the Lankershim, where his company had twelve thousand acres and he himself owned six hundred acres. On his personal holdings he planted four hundred acres in orchards near the town of Toluca, twelve miles northwest of Los Angeles, and was the first to experiment with oranges in that locality, but the forty acres thus planted did not prove a success. However, he also planted some walnuts and deciduous fruits, all of which grew and thrived. At this writing he retains three hundred acres, including the old Lankershim homestead, with one of the best deciduous fruit orchards in the whole state, there being two hundred and fifty acres in these fruits and forty acres in walnuts. During 1900 he developed water on the place by means of two wells, from which, by portable galvanized iron pipes,

In addition to his Lankershim holdings, Mr. Hoffman owns four hundred and eighty acres in the Sespe oil district and a similar amount in the Castec oil district; is a large stockholder in an Arizona copper company and a director in the Hercules Oil Refining Company, and president of the Nevada Tonopah Mining Company. The investments in Long Beach were made by his wife, who is the possessor of independent means. Acting upon his suggestion, some years ago she began to buy property in Long Beach, and the results have proved the wisdom of his judgment. In the spring of 1897 was erected the Julian Hotel, the largest in Long Beach. This was enlarged in 1901 and again, the following year, when a third story was added. The location of the hotel is central and convenient, its rooms are commodious and equipped with modern improvements, and it is admirably adapted to comfortably house the many visitors whom the delightful climate of this coast resort attracts hither. This hotel is to be duplicated on their Los Angeles city home property in the near future. Mrs. Hoffman was formerly Florence Liken, and was born in Pennsylvania, but as a girl lived in Geneseo, Ill. For some years she and her husband have made their home in their cottage, Idlewild, being in the same block and a few doors from their hotel. From here Mr. Hoffman for years superintended his San Fernando ranch, but it is now leased. Before the Civil war he joined the Presbyterian Church and ever since has been active in its work, at this writing being a member of the board of trustees of the Long Beach congregation. The work of the Y. M. C. A. has also appealed to him, and he was a warm supporter of the plan for building up the organization in Los Angeles. The Chamber of Commerce of Los Angeles and Board of Trade of Long Beach number him among their members. In politics he has always been a staunch believer in Republican principles; having never swerved in his allegiance to the same since the days when he went to the front as a Union soldier. He is connected with the Ohio and Illinois Societies and is also identified with Long Beach Post No. 181, G. A. R., in the meetings and work of which he maintains a warm interest.

GEORGE C. POWER. A very old and still prominent family is that to which Mr. Power belongs. Authentic records of the lives and deeds of its members extend to the days of the Revolution, and to the association of the first emigrants with Nantucket, their original home in America. Some bearing the name and claiming the same ancestry lived in Providence, R. I., but departures from the ranks were made during the last century to Hudson, situated on the river of that name in New York, where the paternal grandfather, John Power, was born, lived and died. In this same town, opposite Athens, on the historic and beautiful stream, George C. Power was born in 1851, a son of George H. and Adeline E. (Cuffin) Power, natives of New York, the former born in Hudson in 1817. The father has for years been a steamboat and railroad man at Hudson, and owns several boats which ply the river.

To the exercise of his profession of civil engineer Mr. Power brings all the knowledge acquirable through unexcelled educational opportunities and subsequent practical experience. He was graduated from Yale College in 1874, and then spent three years in England, perfecting himself as a civil engineer. Upon returning to America he followed his calling at Hudson, his first contract being for ten steel bridges for the Catskill Mountain Railroad Company. His ability received gratifying recognition, and for four years he did a large business, especially in the business of bridge construction. Owing to the failing health of his wife, whom he married in 1875, at New Haven, Conn., and who was formerly Mary, daughter of Marshall Brace, he decided upon a complete change of surroundings, and came to California in 1884. After three or four years of travel through different parts of the state he settled in Ventura in 1887, and has since followed his profession in the town of his adoption. His responsibilities and honors have been in keeping with his ability to sustain them, and he has been engaged in private and county work, and served as deputy county surveyor for two terms beginning in 1887. He was then elected county surveyor, a position which he has held at different times for eight years, co-incident with that of city engineer for twelve years, from 1887 until 1899.

Among the important public services which the town of Ventura owes to Mr. Power may be mentioned his plans and construction of the city water system, a new departure, in that it was the first attempt to discharge the drainage into the ocean. So successful has this plan proved that it has since been adopted by Los Angeles. He also designed and superintended the construction of the bridge over the Santa Clara river, at a cost of $50,000, as well as other work of a similar nature. Another decidedly successful undertaking was the making and publishing, in 1897, of a fine wall map of Ventura county, gotten up on the scale of one inch to the mile, and which was the first ever made of the county. Mr. Power is a Republican in politics, as was also his father, and he is a member of the Episcopal Church, as is also his wife, and daughter Helen. Fraternally he is connected with the Masons, Knight Templars, Odd Fellows and Ancient Order of United Workmen, all at Ventura.

J. L. SEBASTIAN. The little town of Camarillo owes much of its present standing among the enterprising settlements of Ventura county to the excellent citizenship of the popular postmaster and merchant, J. L. Sebastian. His entire life has been spent within the borders of California, for he was born in Tehama county, at Red Bluff, in 1865, and came to Ventura county at the early age of three years. His father, John W., was a native of Kentucky, and came to California as early as 1853, subsequently spending much time in travel through the northern part of the state. He was a blacksmith by trade, and upon removing to Ventura county settled about fifteen miles southeast of here in Pleasant valley, where he took up government land, and built a blacksmith shop which he operated for seven years. He then went to Bell county, Tex., and remained for ten months, after which he spent some time in Missouri, and upon returning to California settled at Springville, where he started the first blacksmith shop in the little village and where he eventually died in 1888. He married, in his younger days, Mary Riggs, of Arkansas, who still lives at Springville, three miles from Camarillo. Besides J. L. Sebastian, among the sons were Robert, who is a hotel-keeper at San Luis Obispo; Charles, who is a barber at Oxnard; Eugene, clerk in a store at Oxnard; and Alfred, who is living at the old home and conducting the ranch.

In quest of an independent livelihood, J. L. Sebastian started farming enterprises. In 1894 he opened a general merchandise business at Springville, which he continued until 1899. His plans were somewhat changed at that time owing to the fact that the railroad was built through Camarillo from Oxnard, thus opening up superior chances for the erstwhile obscure little hamlet. This railroad line is known as the Oxnard branch, and runs up the valley from here to Santa Susanna, twenty-five miles distant, and will eventually be the main line of the railroad.

This opening was taken advantage of by Mr. Sebastian, who rented a store building and started the first general merchandise store in the place, which has in connection a barber shop, and is in every way a worthy addition to the town. Having previously been postmaster at Springville for three years, the postmaster's mantle naturally fell to his shoulders in Camarillo, and he was therefore the first man here to handle the trusts of Uncle Sam. This is no light task, for aside from the residents of the town who apply at the office for letters and papers, about a hundred ranchers and many other people come to town for their mail. The store is a favorite meeting place for all classes, and its conveniences are enhanced by telegraph and telephone service for the accommodation of the public. A general line of goods is carried, and a general spirit of courtesy and good fellowship is apparent to all who come with wants to be supplied.

At San Luis Obispo, in 1887, Mr. Sebastian married Clara, daughter of John and Mary Newman, the former of whom was born in Illinois, and came to California at a very early day. He was a rancher and died in his adopted state; his wife, who was also a native of Illinois, still lives in this vicinity. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Sebastian, Reuben, Carl and Irene, aged respectively eleven, nine and six years. In politics Mr. Sebastian is a Democrat, but is not an office-seeker. He has been a Mason for the past year at Hueneme, and is a member and worker in the Methodist Episcopal Church.

THEODORE F. WHITE. Perhaps no service rendered by Mr. White to the county of San Bernardino has been of greater value than that in connection with the oiling of roads. When he was elected a member of the board of supervisors, in 1898, the board was just taking up the question of oiled roads. Immediately grasping the vast benefit to be derived from such a system, and fortified by a knowledge gained in visiting other points which had adopted such a plan, he threw his influence on the side of the innovation and was not discouraged by the adverse criticisms of those who feared the plan might prove a failure. In order to prove its wisdom, he experimented in his own precinct and also enlisted neighboring precincts in the work. Numerous experiments were necessary before the best method was evolved, but, finally, as a result of his study, he established a method giving a very heavy coating the first year, then lighter the next year, and he invented and patented White's Road Oiler, one of the most practical inventions of its kind now in use. The success of the plan has been published in every part of the United States and has stimulated many counties to adopt a similar method.

Mr. White was born in Montgomery county, Pa., in 1844, and grew to manhood on a farm occupied by his father, James White. After completing public-school studies he took up mining engineering and in 1862 was graduated from the Polytechnic College of Pennsylvania. During the invasion of the state by the Confederates he enlisted in the state militia. For three years he was employed as superintendent of a mine in Nevada, after which he was with the Memphis & El Paso Railroad, and came to California for the purpose of assisting in building the road through to San Diego. On finishing that work he became chief clerk and draftsman in the Surveyor-General's office in Arizona, but afterward resumed field work, following it ten years. Meantime he married Miss Annie Maxwell, of San Diego, Cal., by whom he has four children:

Frederick P., an electrical engineer with the Edison Company in Los Angeles, Cal.; Florence, a student in Claremont College; Edith and Leonard, students in the Chino schools.

In order that he might be at home with his family, Mr. White abandoned field work and returned to San Diego, after which he was temporarily interested in the cattle business. In 1891 he came to Chino to take charge of the Chino Land and Water Company for Richard Gird. Two years later he accepted a position as manager of the L. W. Blinn Lumber Company, which was established in 1891 and handles all kinds of building material, with a plant covering six lots. Since 1891 Mr. White has resided in Chino and now owns an attractive home on Seventh street. Fraternaly he is connected with the blue lodge and chapter of Masonry, and in religion is connected with the Christian Church, of which he is an elder. His interest in educational matters led to his acceptance of the position of trustee of the grammar and high schools of Chino, in which office he has been instrumental in promoting the welfare of both pupils and teachers. His service as county supervisor has also been satisfactory and has proved him to be a man of great public spirit, intensely interested in whatever plan is inaugurated for the benefit of the people.

B. S. WESTON. The chance results of a seafaring life brought Mr. Weston to Wilmington, and he has never had reason to regret his decision to settle in California, for during his residence here he has accumulated a large and valuable property and has also retained a power of endurance not always seen among men many years his junior. He was born in Salem, Mass., September 14, 1832, being a son of Cutler and Eliza (Masury) Weston, natives respectively of Hamilton and Salem, Mass. His paternal grandfather, Samuel Weston, a soldier of the Revolution, was a lifelong resident and farmer of Massachusetts; the maternal grandfather, John Masury, was a ship-joiner by trade and followed that occupation in Salem until his death. At an early age Cutler Weston began to sail the high seas and in time he rose to the position of master mariner in the West Indies and European trade. While still a young man he died on the west coast of Africa in Liberia. Of his five children all attained mature years except one.

The youngest of the family was B. S. Weston, of Wilmington. With a common-school education to aid him in the battle of life, he left home for the life of a sailor, and during ten years he served on ships that sailed to remote ports of the earth. His first voyages were to the east and west of South America, after which he made several trips between San Francisco and China. It was during 1850 that he began to mine in California, and later he secured other work in San Francisco, after which he sailed to Hong Kong and the Sandwich Islands. On one of these voyages he drifted to Catalina island, and there, in 1859, he began to raise sheep, having as his partner N. A. Narbonne. In 1868 they brought the sheep to the mainland, a distance of twenty-six miles, and placed them on a range of six thousand acres which they bought. The sheep business was disposed of in 1882, and later the partners divided the land between them. At this writing Mr. Weston has nineteen hundred acres, which is planted in corn, barley and wheat. An abundance of water is supplied by two seven-inch wells, five hundred feet deep, the motive power being a five-horse-power gas engine. All of the buildings on the place were put up under his personal oversight, and the ranch is a monument to his skillful and painstaking management. The active management of the land is now in the hands of O. S. Weston, his nephew, who was born in Georgetown, Mass., but has made his home on this property for some years. The home is presided over by Mrs. Sarah P. Weston, wife of O. S. Weston, and is brightened by the presence of their son, Benjamin P.

The extensive travels of B. S. Weston during his early life gave him a fund of information that largely atoned for the deficiencies of his early education, and by accurate habits of observation and reading he has acquired a breadth of knowledge not always secured by those whose school advantages are far superior to his. Many years ago he was made a Mason, and the blue lodge at Wilmington and chapter in Los Angeles have his name enrolled among their members. Though at no time in his life an ardent partisan, his advocacy of Republican principles is stanch and unwavering.

HON. CHARLES J. WALKER. The municipal head of Long Beach is also one of its most influential and substantial citizens, in that his varied attainments have placed him in touch with its most enterprising and developing opportunities. An easterner by birth and early training, he was born in Livonia, Livingston county, N. Y., November 8, 1869, and is the youngest in a family of five children, three of whom are living, he being the only one in California. Latter day ancestors have lived principally in New York, and in that state the father, William D. Walker, was born, and engaged in the manufacture of furniture in Livonia. During the Civil war he served in a New York regiment in the Union army, and in 1879 sought to enlarge his prospects by removal to Tulare county, Cal., where he soon after died. His wife, formerly a Miss Esterbrook, was also born in New York, and died when her son, Charles J., was a baby.

When the family fortunes were shifted to California Hon. Charles J. Walker remained in his native state, and after completing his education in the public schools attended the Alfred University. Upon removing to Portersville, Tulare county, Cal., in 1889, he was employed by a large real-estate firm, and later in the abstract office, at a later period serving as deputy auditor of the county under Mr. Jeffords. This position was resigned in 1895 to come to Long Beach, where he embarked upon a real-estate and insurance business, in which he has since achieved pronounced success. As an insurance man he represents several of the leading companies in the country, and besides maintains with credit responsibilities in many of the most substantial enterprises of the city. He is president of the Long Beach Land Improvement Association, which concern has purchased the Alamos Beach town site, and is rapidly selling off lots. He is a director in the First National and the Citizens Savings Banks, and one of the organizers of the latter. In addition he is president of the Cash Store Company, Incorporated, a retail grocery establishment, located on the corner of First and Pine streets, and the largest of its kind in the town. He is also superintendent of the John Carroll fruit ranch. From time to time valuable city holdings have passed through his hands, and he has built and sold many residences in different parts of the town. His own residence is located on the corner of Cedar and Fourth streets.

Since coming to Long Beach Mr. Walker has married Carrie D. Ziegler, who was born in Minnesota, and is a graduate of the Los Angeles State Normal. Mrs. Walker is a woman of unusual intellectual attainments, and was formerly one of the well-known educators of Southern California. To Mr. and Mrs. Walker have been born three children, Alice, Charles and Gustavus. In political affiliation Mr. Walker is a staunch Republican, and has taken a prominent part in the local undertakings of his party. In April of 1900 he was elected to the city board of trustees for four years, and upon the organization of the citizens' ticket was made president of the board and has been mayor ever since. His administration has been favorably received, his tactful adjustment of municipal complications having won unstinted praise. Mr. Walker is a member of the Board of Trade, and is fraternally connected with the Knights of Pythias and the Knights of the Maccabees. A member of the Methodist Church, he is also one of the official board, and one of the strongest supporters of the denomination. The career of Mr. Walker is worthy of emulation from whatever vantage ground viewed, for, added to an exemplary life, have been pronounced business success, an untarnished political record, and a vital interest in all that has to do with the noblest and best and most intelligent citizenship.

JAMES HANLEY. A public-spirited career of which any city might be proud is that of James Hanley, experienced railroad man and supervisor of Los Angeles county since January of 1893. The customs of other countries than our own have contributed their impressions to the formation of the inclinations of Mr. Hanley, and of these his native land of Ireland, where he was born April 14, 1847, has played the least important part. When a lad of ten years he accompanied the rest of his family to the great country of Australia, the good ship Fusilier rounding the Cape of Good Hope on its voyage of 160 days. Arriving at his destination, the boy was educated in the national schools during the slight leisure of his busy life, and while still young began to learn the railroad business. As a wiper he started in to work for the Queensland & Great Northern Railroad Company, and in time became a fireman on the road.

In the meantime his thought had been wandering to the chances to be found in the United States, and in 1866 he boarded the American barque Ethan Allen at Sydney, and on the way to San Francisco the voyage of four months was enlivened by stops at Tahiti and Honolulu. In Sacramento he found an opportunity to continue in his former occupation, and became identified with the Central Pacific Railroad at a time when there were only ninety miles of the line completed. He was soon promoted from fireman to engineer, and in this capacity came to Los Angeles. As an employe of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company he ran the first engine between Los Angeles and San Francisco, and for ten years creditably filled the positions of freight and passenger engineer. After twenty years of active work he resigned his amicable connection with this company and engaged in the real estate business, and later in the harness business. In 1888, on the Democratic ticket, he was elected to the city council for one term, and in 1892 was a candidate for supervisor, and was elected then and again in 1896. At the time there was not another Democrat elected on the ticket, a circumstance partially duplicated in 1900, when Mr. Hanley and Judge Trask were the only successful Democratic nominees. In this last election Mr. Hanley won by seventeen votes, but the matter came up in court before Judge Allen, who decided in his favor. The disputed question is now in the supreme court, but the justice of his side and the groundless cause for complaint will undoubtedly result favorably for the defendant.

A man of strong personality and fearlessness of expression, Mr. Hanley's political career has arraigned injustice and municipal corruption.

The permanent improvements in many directions date back to his first election as supervisor, when the matter of roads received the most earnest considerations of the board. At the time a change was made from the old-time method of filling from the sides of the road to filling in and piking with decomposed granite, thus creating a paved road, and one practically indestructible. The plan has also been adopted of doing away with bridges over dry gulches, and of substituting stone culverts. These improvements are in accord with the idea of permanency advocated by Mr. Hanley, who believes in the strong and substantial which in the end is always the cheapest. As councilman he has served on many important committees, and for one term was on the board of fire commissioners, also for one term was a library trustee. At present he is chairman of the finance committee. In 1898 he was a candidate for sheriff, but was defeated by W. A. Hammel.

In Blue Canon, Placer county, Cal., Mr. Hanley married Katie Dolan, a native of Wheeling, W. Va., and who came to California with her parents when sixteen years of age. Of this union there are six children: Mamie, who died at the age of six years; William, who died when four years old; James Charles, who is a graduate of the Los Angeles Business College, and is employed in the office of General Manager Muir of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company; John T., who is a graduate of the high school, and is employed in the surveying corps of the Salt Lake Railroad; Katie Gertrude and Robert Emmett. Mr. Hanley is the friend of education, and sees in the perfecting of the system a ready means for the accomplishment of all that is conceded to be substantial in municipal and social government.

EMMET DENSMORE, M. D. It is a noteworthy fact that no part of the United States has attracted to it, in so large a degree as has California, men who have gained success in varied fields of endeavor. Among these especial mention belongs to Dr. Densmore, whose life history proves the possibilities that await determination and perseverance, when coupled with ability and intelligence. Although a resident of Long Beach and a firm believer in the horticultural and commercial possibilities of California, he still retains extensive business interests in the east, where a portion of his time is spent. On acquiring property interests in this state in 1895, he began the improvement of two ranches, both of which he still owns. One of these comprises forty acres at Burnett, all of the tract being in orchard. The other ranch consists of one hundred and ten acres at Los Alamitos, three-fourths of which has been put under fruit. However, the management of these properties does not represent the limit of his activities in California, for he is president of the Densmore-Stabler Refining Company, which owns a plant on East Ninth street and the Santa Fe tracks, Los Angeles, and is engaged in the manufacture of lubricating oils. In addition, he is president of the Barnard-Densmore Company, Incorporated, which is engaged in the manufacture of distilled water and preserved fruits, and occupies a plant at No. 135 West Fourteenth street, Los Angeles.

Tracing the history of the Densmore family, we find that Joel Densmore, a native of Vermont and a soldier in the war of 1812, became a pioneer of Crawford county, Pa., and there passed his remaining years, dying at Erie. For a wife he chose Sophia Compton, who was born near Batavia, N. Y., a member of an old family of New England; her death occurred in Meadville, Pa. Five sons and two daughters were born of this union, the youngest, Emmet, having been born in Blooming Valley, Crawford county, Pa., May 19, 1837. Few advantages were given any of the children, for their parents were limited in means. In spite of their lack of advantages, they attained success that was little short of remarkable. In the school of experience they early learned lessons of even greater importance than those acquired from text-books. Being men of great ingenuity, keen mental acumen, and not a little inventive genius, they were able, backed by their indomitable determination, to become leaders of men in every community with which they were identified. Yet, in looking back over their lives, they remember the early years of struggle, the hardships they endured and the obstacles they overcame. When only ten years of age, Emmet was apprenticed to the printer's trade in the office of the Crawford Journal and serving four years in learning the printer's trade. At the age of fifteen he entered Allegheny College, where he remained until completing his sophomore year. Before he was nineteen he married, and soon afterward entered the printing office of his brother James in Elkhorn, Wis.

The first independent venture of the young man was as a manufacturer of shingles in Chatfield, Minn., but the panic of 1857 proved fatal to the industry, and he returned to Pennsylvania. After the discovery of oil on Oil Creek he induced his brother Amos to join him in its production, it being his idea to form the firm of Densmore Brothers and give their three brothers each an interest in the business. At first the company's capital was very limited, nor were they the possessors of the expedients that aid in the successful management of an oil business to-day. No pipe lines had been constructed, and it was necessary to ship the oil in barrels, an expensive method. For aid in making these shipments, they built large receptacles for the storage of oil. The bottoms of these were tamped with clay covered with a few inches of water, and as the water slowly leaked away it was replaced. The sides were of lumber, the cracks of which were pitched. The outside was supported by earth embankments. The bulk boats, which they built at Riceville, Pa., were floated down Oil Creek to their wells and filled, then transferred to pond freshets (large ponds of water let loose to make a temporary rise in Oil creek), and ran down to Oil City, the then mouth of the creek. From there they were floated or towed by steamboats down the Allegheny river to Pittsburg, where the oil was marketed. The tank previously described and also the bulk boat mentioned were chiefly the invention of Amos Densmore, who of all the brothers was perhaps the most gifted as an inventor.

Associated with his brothers James and Amos, Emmet Densmore was interested in the introduction of the Remington typewriter, and later with Amos engaged in the manufacture and introduction of the Densmore typewriter, of which Amos was the inventor. To the brother James may really be attributed the praise for the founding of the typewriter enterprise, as he furnished C. Latham Sholes the necessary capital to complete and patent the invention, and it was through his perseverance during fifteen years of experiments that ultimate success was afterward attained. It will thus be seen that in many fields of activity the brothers have been pioneers and successful workers.

August 14, 1855, Emmet Densmore married Elizabeth Heard, daughter of James Armstrong and Hannah (Floyd) Heard. The children born of this union were as follows: Darlot, who is engaged in the refining of oil in Los Angeles; Shelly, deceased; Iantha, residing at Lillydale, N. Y.; and Percy, a business man of Paris, France. Dr. Densmore was united in marriage with Mrs. Helen Barnard May 14, 1881. About that time he took up the study of medicine and in 1885 received the degree of M. D. from the New York University Medical College, after which he engaged in practice in New York City for several years. He is the author of "The Natural Food of Man," 1890; "How Nature Cures," 1890; and "Consumption and Chronic Diseases," 1899; and, in connection with Mrs. Densmore, for several years published in London a periodical entitled "Natural Food." Of late years he has devoted much time and thought to popularizing hygiene and to extending a knowledge of diet in its relation to health and disease. It is said that every man has a hobby, and if this is the case with Dr. Densmore, the subject of hygiene is probably his hobby. Believing that much sickness might be avoided by a proper observance of the laws of hygiene, he has made it his chief object of recent years to extend among the people a knowledge of the subject and to arouse them to a knowledge of the necessity of the observance of its laws. By means of the proprietary remedies which he and Mrs. Densmore manufacture at their plant in Brooklyn, he has distributed in the past ten years throughout the United States over thirty million copies of pamphlets devoted to an exposition of hygiene and health. In all of his enterprises he has had the co-operation and counsel of his wife, a woman of exceptional ability.

HELEN BARNARD DENSMORE. The successful prosecution by women of varied lines of business has been so frequently seen of recent years that it no longer awakens the surprise and curiosity it once aroused. However, within the memory of those scarcely beyond middle age, a different condition existed and scarcely any occupations, save school-teaching, domestic service and dressmaking, were open to women. During the years of the Civil war, when Mrs. Helen Barnard was a newspaper correspondent, reportorial work was almost exclusively in the hands of men, and she had the distinction of being the first woman to sit in the reporters' gallery of the House of Representatives in Washington. Wielding a fluent pen and possessing a keen insight into human nature and the motives which prompt certain lines of action, she gained a wide acquaintance and an enviable reputation in the field of journalism. Her conspicuous ability and her interest in matters of national importance led President Grant to appoint her a Commissioner of Emigration; and, in order that she might successfully and thoroughly study the condition of the emigrants, this zealous commissioner crossed the Atlantic as a steerage passenger.

In 1881 Mrs. Barnard became the wife of Dr. Densmore, and the following year they established, on Forty-fourth street, New York City, a large and lucrative medical practice for the reduction of obesity by diet and hygiene. They were the first in New York to adopt the Harvey-Banting method for the reduction of obesity. Many of their wealthy patients explained the treatment to their family physicians, and as a result in a few years substantially the same treatment as that inaugurated by Mrs. Densmore was dispensed by large numbers of orthodox physicians throughout New York and Brooklyn. In 1885 Dr. and Mrs. Densmore established the business of manufacturing and selling proprietary remedies, chief among which is Garfield Tea, of which they are sole proprietors. They have an office and plant at No. 145 Forty-first street, Brooklyn, while their Brooklyn residence stands at Eighty-fourth street and Eleventh avenue. The remarkable success of their proprietary business proves the high quality of the remedies, and Dr. Densmore ascribes much of the credit for this success to his wife, whose ability is far above the average. Notwithstanding the many enterprises in which she has been interested, she has always found leisure to keep posted concerning events of national importance, and few are better informed concerning current happenings. Believing the imprisonment of Mrs. Maybrick to be grossly unjust, she has been active in endeavoring to secure her release, and a few years ago published an account of the Maybrick case in pamphlet form. Many of these were distributed in England, during the frequent visits of herself and husband to that country. Socially she is a member of the Ebell Club of Long Beach and the Friday Morning Club of Los Angeles.

ALEXANDER GAVIN. Of sturdy Scottish birth and ancestry, Mr. Gavin was born near Ellen, Aberdeenshire, April 15, 1868, and is a son of Alexander Gavin, a native of the same locality. The paternal grandfather, James, was a blacksmith by trade, but in later life devoted himself to the more peaceful occupation of farming. Alexander Gavin began life with his father's latter-day occupation, and for many years was a successful farmer, at the present time, however, giving his attention to the insurance business in Banff, Scotland. He married Anna Diack, also a native of Scotland, and who died in Aberdeenshire, leaving six children, all of whom are living, Alexander Jr. being second.

On his father's farm Mr. Gavin was reared to maturity, and his education was acquired at the district schools. When twenty-one years of age he crossed the ocean to America and settled on a farm near Manitoba and Winnipeg. Not entirely satisfied with his selection of a place of residence, he removed to Salt Lake City in the fall of 1890, and there applied himself to learning the cement business. In 1894 he located in Los Angeles as a possible desirable field for future activity, and found employment as finisher with the firm of Chapman & Whittier. Two years later, in 1896, he began to contract for cement work, and has since laid miles of sidewalks and curbing all over the city especially in the Weisendanger and O. Day additions. He has also built himself a residence at No. 927 East Twenty-fourth street.

After coming to Los Angeles Mr. Gavin married Eugenie Lattimer, who was born in Texas, and came to Los Angeles when ten years of age. To Mr. and Mrs. Gavin have been born two children, Lawrence Gerald and Helen. Mr. Gavin is politically inclined towards the Democratic party, but entertains very liberal views. He is a member of the Cement Contractors' Association, and has done much to maintain a high order of cement work in the city of which he is an honored and well-known citizen.

E. A. FORRESTER. One of the careers interwoven with the development of Los Angeles since 1885 has been that of E. A. Forrester, whose commercial and moral worth has been consistent with the highest type of citizenship in this or any city. Of rugged Scotch ancestry, he was born in Bridgeport, Conn., December 27, 1832, his father (Lot) being a native of the same part of the state. The paternal grandfather was born in Scotland and removed to the north of Ireland, from which he immigrated to the United States and settled in Connecticut. He was a millwright by trade. The father removed at an early day to Steuben county, N. Y., and settled on a farm near Bath, where he remained until his death, in 1851, at the age of seventy-six years. He married Hannah Mead, a native of Connecticut and of English descent, and who died at Scranton, Pa., at the age of eighty-six years. There were seven sons and seven daughters in the family, and all but one daughter attained maturity. At the present time two sons only are living, Charles and E. A., both of Los Angeles.

The year after his birth Mr. Forrester was taken by his parents to the vicinity of Bath, Steuben county, N. Y., where he was reared on a farm, and during the leisure of the winter months attended the public schools. At the age of sixteen he had qualified for teaching and engaged in this work during the summer at the Rodgersville Union Seminary. At the age of nineteen he embarked upon a mercantile career at Bath and experienced a fair amount of success until his removal to Rochester, Minn., in the spring of 1857. Owing to the panic following shortly upon his arrival he decided to close up his northern interests and return to Bath, where he remained until 1863. In April of 1861, at the first tap of the drum, he tendered his services and helped to recruit a New York regiment, but physical disability kept him from being accepted for active duty at the front. After returning to Rochester, Minn., in 1863, he again enlisted for service in the Civil war, but was rejected.

A wise discernment suggested to Mr. Forrester a complete change of environment, and March 14, 1864, found him aboard the old liner, Ocean Queen, bound from New York harbor to Aspinwall, from where he shipped on the City of San Francisco for the town of that name, arriving there April 14, 1864. Failing health had overtaken him to an alarming degree, and with dim physical prospects and but $3 to his name he started out to recover and thus pave the way for the larger possibilities of his new surroundings. His first work in the west was along educational lines in the mountains, where he continued to teach until locating in San Francisco April 14, 1865. With $5,000 in money and completely restored health, he made an inventory of his surrounding chances, and decided for the present to retrace his steps to New York, where for two years he engaged in business with his brother Charles. He then removed to Scranton, Pa., and engaged in the grocery business on a wholesale scale, and with his brother located on Lackawanna avenue and under the firm name of Forrester Bros. conducted a large wholesale grocery with a provision trade all over the mining country. For eighteen years the brothers were an integral part of the industrial life of their district.

In 1885 Mr. Forrester disposed of his Pennsylvania interests and located in Los Angeles, where he became interested in the real estate business and has since made some of the most practical improvements in the city. If for no other reason than his efforts in connection with the upbuilding of Westlake Park, his services to the city are of immense importance, and reflect the ability and business sagacity of the man. He laid out the addition and got the city to accept thirty-five acres for a park, after which he raised $4,000 and prevailed upon the council to appropriate another $4,000, and he devoted three years to pushing the project. The splendid improvements are indicative of the aspirations of the promoter, who named the park, and has felt a keen and practical interest in its gradual unfolding.

The political services of Mr. Forrester are best represented by his term as supervisor of the county on the Republican ticket, to which office he was elected in the fall of 1889, taking office January, 1890, and serving until January of 1895. His administration was characterized by devotion to the best public interests. Many roads were improved and bridges built, the county farm was brought into fine condition, and the courthouse was completed and furnished Mr. Forrester having entire charge of the laying out of the grounds. Many other improvements are directly traceable to the plans of this official, who left a wholesome record in return for the confidence placed in his honor and executive ability. Owing to the strenuous demands upon his time, pressing from many directions, he was obliged to refuse a second term as supervisor, although his friends and associates felt that in thus doing the county was many times the loser.

One of the large city agencies through which Mr. Forrester has been enabled to accomplish much good is the Young Men's Christian Association, of which he was elected president in 1889, and served in this capacity for ten years. During that time this wonderfully vital organization passed through many depressing sieges of a financial nature, yet the building was completed in 1899, and the band of co-workers were thus lodged in suitable quarters. Much of the enterprise which brought about this result was due to the admirable management of the president, whose wide business experience and general knowledge made him a particularly fitting helmsman in time of emergency and doubt. Upon tendering his resignation in 1899, J. Ross Clark stepped into the place made vacant by Mr. Forrester although the latter is still a director and one of the most helpful of members. Mr. Forrester is a member of the Chamber of Commerce, and with Mrs. Forrester is associated in membership with the First Methodist Episcopal Church, of which he was a trustee for several years.

Through his marriage in Corning, N. Y., to Mary Courtright, a native of Honesdale, Pa., and a member of an old eastern family, Mr. Forrester secured a sympathetic and able assistant in fashioning his career. Mrs. Forrester is active and prominent in philanthropic and social affairs in Los Angeles, and was a director and one of the chief promoters of the Newsboys' Home, and was also formerly treasurer of the same. Three children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Forrester, viz.: Arthur W., who is a clerk in the supreme court of Los Angeles county; Fred W., who is now associated with his father in the real estate business, and Mae, whose death in 1894 removed one of the most charming and lovable of the social leaders of Los Angeles. Miss Forrester was educated in the high school and Los Angeles College, and was accomplished beyond the ordinary, possessing among other gifts a beautiful and sympathetic soprano voice. She had a sincere and beautiful character, and those attributes of tact and appreciation which not only won her a high place among the brightest and best people of the town, but drew to her and retained the love and affection of innumerable friends.

CAPT. GEORGE N. SHAW. The keeper of Point Firmen Lighthouse at San Pedro was born in Cambridgeport, a suburb of Boston, Mass., July 22, 1832, and descends from Scotch ancestors that early settled in New England. His grandfather, William F. Shaw, a native of New Hampshire, learned the shoemaker's trade in boyhood and for some years carried his kit from one town to another, working wherever he could secure anything in his line. Later he settled on a farm near Milford, N. H., and there died at seventy-three years. Six children were born to him by his union with Miss Hopkins, who was born in Massachusetts and died in New Hampshire at about eighty-one years.

The father of Captain Shaw was Benjamin F. Shaw, a native of Milford, N. H., learned the blacksmith's trade and also became an expert carriage-maker. For about three years he made his home in Cambridgeport, Mass., thence went to South Canton, and from there to Cambridge as foreman for a firm of car manufacturers. Not only was he a fine mechanic, but he also possessed inventive ability and was the original designer of the ironing of the Concord carriages. In politics he was a Jacksonian Democrat of the staunchest type. In 1847, when he was thirty-eight years of age, he disappeared and nothing was ever learned concerning his fate, but it has always been supposed that he was thrown off from the bridge between Boston and Cambridge. His wife, Sarah (Lincoln) Shaw, was born at Cohasset, Mass., and when she died at South Canton in 1870 her body was taken back to her birthplace for interment. Her father was drowned near Minot's Ledge lighthouse, where she was born; her brother, Robert, served as an assessor of Boston, and another brother served in the navy.

Capt. George Nichols Shaw represents the fourth generation of the Shaw family in the United States. In boyhood he began to learn the blacksmith's trade, but at the age of eighteen became a sailor in the whaling service, later entering the French navy, where he became master. In the Burmese war he served with the English frigate Tennassarrim, winning a Rangoon medal for gallantry in action at that time. One of the medals was given him for making the best shot of any sailor during an action at sea. While holding the position of quartermaster, tiring of the service, he led the physicians to believe that he was ill and so secured an honorable discharge. He then went to Tiger Island, where he was employed at $100 per month to shoot tigers, his employer being the commander of the fort. Among those that he killed was the largest tiger ever seen there. After a month he returned to Calcutta, and shipped as second mate on a large ship for London, England. Arriving there just as the East India dock had been opened, he received his pay and an honorable discharge. Six weeks later he went to Liverpool, where he was robbed of his savings and baggage. He then shipped as second mate to New York, and on being discharged returned to New England, after an absence of seven years. Returning to his old ship, Continent, he shipped from New York to Liverpool, and continued on the same vessel for some time, making two voyages as master. Next, for two years he engaged in the coasting trade from New York to Washington and Georgetown, D. C., first as a sailor, then as master of a ship, until the outbreak of the Civil war. Taking charge of a schooner from Philadelphia, he delivered coal at Key West and a general cargo at Pensacola, going from there to Cuba, where he chartered to take sugar to Baltimore, delivering the same and disposing without delay of the entire cargo.

From Baltimore Captain Shaw went to New York and thence to Boston, where he enlisted in the Twentieth Massachusetts Infantry, serving until September, 1865, and taking part in various engagements. At the Ball Bluff massacre a sabre cut in the head proved a troublesome though not a serious wound. In the capacity of sergeant he drilled his company, and for a short time was orderly. The command was later sent to Vicksburg, where he was taken ill and forced to return home on a furlough. As soon as health had been regained he enlisted as orderly sergeant in the Third Massachusetts Heavy Artillery, sent in defense of Washington. At the close of the war he was in command of Fort Slemmer. He was mustered out at Boston, where he remained for a time afterward. Succeeding ventures were connected with a fishing business, later with a hotel and restaurant in New York, after which he was captain of the Messenger of New York, sailing to Hong Kong, China, and during the voyage encountered a severe typhoon, in which only his resourcefulness and prompt action saved his vessel from disaster. Returning to America, he left the ship at San Francisco, and proceeded to Point Reyes, thence came to San Pedro May 13, 1882, where he has charge of the lighthouse station. While at the Goat Island station, just before coming to San Pedro, he married Carrie Merrill. Fraternally he is connected with the American Mechanics, the Knights of Pythias and the Grand Army of the Republic.

THEODORE D. KANOUSE. As a leader in an organization whose aim is the uplifting of mankind, Mr. Kanouse is not only well known throughout California, but also in South Dakota and Wisconsin. Coming west with the prestige accorded him through ten years of service as grand chief templar of the Independent Order of Good Templars in Wisconsin, and a similar service in South Dakota, it was not long after his arrival in California that he became identified with the work of the society here. In 1896 he was honored by election as grand chief templar of California, which high office he has since filled.

At the time of Mr. Kanouse's birth, which occurred at Lodi Plains, Mich., March 11, 1838, that state was sparsely settled and was considered a frontier region. It was for the purpose of engaging in missionary work among the pioneers that his father, Rev. J. G. Kanouse, had left the comforts of the east, and, fortified by an excellent education in Princeton College and by a great desire to serve the cause of Christianity, had cast in his lot with the few settlers of the then Northwestern Territory. He was the son of a German, Peter Kanouse, who came to America in young manhood and settled in New Jersey, where he engaged in milling. During the war of the Revolution he left his mill and marched to the front to aid in defending his adopted country from British oppression. Among the battles in which he participated was that at Trenton. When his death occurred he was about four score years of age. In his family there were three sons and one daughter.

The marriage of Rev. J. G. Kanouse united him with Elizabeth Dodd, a native of New Jersey, born in 1802. The day after they were married they started for the frontier, to engage in missionary work among the Choctaw Indians, being in company with Mr. and Mrs. Jewell, well-known missionaries. For three years they remained among the Choctaws, then moved to Mission Ridge, after which he preached for a time in Wayne county, N. Y., then held pastorates in Michigan and in 1843 removed to Wisconsin, where he died in 1870 at the age of seventy years. During his long ministry he was instrumental in the building of nine houses of worship in Michigan, two in Wisconsin, and one at Newark, Wayne county, N. Y. All of his work was in the Presbyterian denomination, and he preached uninterruptedly from youth until old age, never ceasing his efforts for others until he was stricken, in his pulpit, with what proved to be his last illness. Not only did he minister to the spiritual welfare of his parishioners, but he also did considerable work as a physician in communities where medical attendance could not be secured, and one of the most self-sacrificing labors of his busy life was during an epidemic of cholera, when he worked night and day, by the bedside of the sick and the dying. Vigorous health remained his through a long and active life, and that blessing also was vouchsafed his family. The first break in his family was caused by his death; his wife survived him many years, dying in 1884, at the age of eighty-two. She, too, was hale and active up to the last, and her death was the result of a fall. Their attainment of advanced years and their enjoyment of splendid health seem remarkable when their years of self-sacrificing labors, their many hardships and privations, are considered. More than once they experienced all the horrors of the prairie fires, when, to save their little home from destruction, they were compelled to "fight fire with fire." They had entered government land eight miles east of what is now Madison, Wis., and in the cultivation of that land secured enough to provide the family with the necessities of life, much of his ministerial work being done gratuitously. In those days there were no markets near by, and wheat was hauled eighty miles to Milwaukee, the returning wagons bringing supplies for the family.

In the family of this frontier missionary there were nine sons and one daughter, Theodore being the seventh son. All of these children attained maturity and seven are now living. When a boy he was sent to the Wisconsin State University, where, at the time of his senior year, a change in the office of chancellor caused the rebellion of many students. Recognizing the change as a political move, the students resented it and left the institution. Among them were Bishop Fallows and Colonel Vilas. In this way the education of Mr. Kanouse came to a sudden end. Going to New York City, he secured employment with a music house, and at the time the Civil war began he was receiving $150 per month. However, he deemed it his duty to offer his services to the country, so resigned his excellent position and returned to Wisconsin, where, June 21, 1861, he enlisted in the band of the Sixth Regiment of Volunteers. In the spring of 1862, when bands were given permission to enter the service, he enlisted in the Third Battery of Wisconsin Light Artillery, from which he was honorably discharged September 13, 1865. His first service was in the army of the Potomac, but later he was under Rosecrans in the army of the Cumberland. While engaged in duty at the battle of Chickamauga, his battery was demolished, and he was then transferred to Fort Scott, on guard duty.

Soon after his return from the army Mr. Kanouse was elected superintendent of schools for the first district of Wisconsin, which position he held for five years. The day of his discharge from the army he was initiated into the Independent Order of Good Templars, and on resigning as superintendent of schools accepted a position as grand chief templar of Wisconsin. Later he was promoted to right worthy grand templar, the highest degree. Overwork in the interests of the organization injuriously affected his health, and, hoping a change of climate would prove beneficial, in 1881 he settled at what is now Woonsocket, S. D., where he carried on a lumber and coal business. There, too, he became closely associated with Templar work and served as grand chief of the organization. For some time he was an active worker for the division of Dakota, in the interests of which movement he served as a delegate to the constitutional convention, filled the office of congressman and labored effectively for the proposed change. When the two states were formed, he resigned his place and soon afterward accepted the office of warden of the South Dakota penitentiary. The failure of his health caused him to resign this responsible post, and in 1891 he came to California, since which year he has given his attention to Good Templar work and to the improvement of his homestead, on the corner of A and Sixth streets, Glendale, where he has a ten-acre ranch in oranges and peaches.

July 11, 1869, Mr. Kanouse married Miss Amelia Adelaide Levake, who was born in Indiana, February 14, 1840, and at the age of five years was taken to Wisconsin by her parents, Oscar and Eliza (Clark) Levake, natives of Vermont. Her grandfather, John, a captain in the war of 1812, was a son of John Le Vaque, Sr., who came from France with Lafayette and assisted in securing independence for the colonies. Since that soldier settled in America the family name has been Americanized in its spelling. Mrs. Levake died at the age of seventy-four, and her husband when seventy-five. Both were earnest members of the Congregational Church. Their four children are still living. Mrs. Kanouse was educated principally in Albion Academy, of which she is a graduate, and after leaving school taught in Wisconsin and also in Chicago. In the activities of the Good Templars she is deeply interested, as she is also in the work of the Presbyterian Church, to which she and Mr. Kanouse belong. In addition to his connection with the temperance organization, he is also interested in Grand Army matters and in 1900 was elected state commander of the Southern California Veteran's Encampment. In his family there are two children, of whom the daughter, Rachel, is at home. The son, Theodore W., is now holding a responsible position with the Studebaker Company in San Francisco.

MRS. ELIZABETH HYER. The earliest recollections of Mrs. Hyer are associated with Missouri, where she was born, in Ralls county, February 13, 1842. Her parents, Henry and Sarah Jane (Carr) Couch, were natives respectively of Petersburg and Pittsburg, Pa. Mr. Couch, who was a millwright by trade, settled in Missouri when a young man and thereafter erected mills all over that section of the country. The first grist mill in Ralls county was built by him and he continued to engage in that business for some years, meantime making his home near New London. In 1862 he enlisted in Company E, Third Missouri State Militia, and continued in the service until he was killed by the enemy at Cherry Grove, Mo., July 18, 1863. In his family there were four sons and five daughters, and all of these attained mature years, Elizabeth being next to the youngest. Her education was received in the country schools of Ralls county and was exceedingly limited, but the lack of advantages has been compensated for by constant reading and habits of close observation.

In 1863 Miss Elizabeth Couch became the wife of Benjamin Robinson, and they made their home in Ralls county until the death of Mr. Robinson, which occurred there in 1878. Eight years later she was again married, becoming the wife of James P. B. Foreman, who died November 29, 1888. Early in the '90s Mrs. Foreman came to California, and, being highly pleased with the climate and advantages offered by the state as a place of residence, she returned to Missouri, disposed of her property there, and came back to the coast. October 7, 1898, she was married to C. M. Hyer, who died April 8, 1902. Her home for some years has been at Gardena, where she owns six and one-half acres. The land is rented to tenants, who have it under cultivation to strawberries and pease. One of the most noticeable improvements of the property is a well one hundred and sixty-two feet deep, operated by a wind mill. By her first marriage Mrs. Hyer has a son, who is living in Hannibal, Mo. With her, in the Gardena home, resides her step-daughter, Miss Florence Anne Hyer, who is an artist and has a studio on Eighth street and Green avenue, Los Angeles. During her residence in Missouri Mrs. Hyer was an active worker in the Women's Relief Corps and the Rathbone Sisters. Always interested in whatever makes for the prosperity of the nation, she has been a firm believer in the principles of the Republican party. In religion she is connected with the Baptist Church.

BENJAMIN W. HAHN. One of the well-known law firms of Pasadena is that of Hahn & Hahn, the senior member of which forms the subject of this article, while the junior member is his brother, E. F. The partnership dates from September 1, 1899, when the younger brother, who had previously been a law student in the office, became a member of the firm. The luxuriantly and thoroughly equipped offices are centrally located, in the Union Savings Bank building, where a general practice is carried on, with a specialty of corporation law, the firm acting as attorneys for many corporations located in all parts of California.

When a boy Henry Hahn came from Germany to the United States and settled in Philadelphia, thence going to Chicago as early as 1832 and buying one hundred and sixty acres in what is now the center of the city. Later he bought other properties, and as the village grew to be a city the possession of so much real estate made him a wealthy man. He is still an active, hearty man at ninety-seven years of age. In politics he voted with the Whigs, and later with the Republican party. His son, Samuel, father of Benjamin W., was born in Philadelphia, and from boyhood was a resident of Chicago, where he engaged in contracting and building. In May, 1887, he settled in Pasadena, where he is now retired from business pursuits. During the entire period of the Civil war he served in the Union army as a member of the First Illinois Light Artillery, Battery B., and he is now associated with the Grand Army Post in Pasadena. His wife, who bore the maiden name of Barbara Brecheisen, was born in Alsace, France, and accompanied her parents to Chicago in childhood. They and their three children reside in Pasadena, the two sons being, as before stated, law partners.

In Chicago Benjamin W. Hahn was born August 28, 1868. His ambition was toward making his own way in the world, and while still a boy he secured work in the office of the Chicago White Lead and Oil Company, remaining with them until 1887, when he resigned to come to California. Two years after arriving in Pasadena he began the study of law under Hon. F. J. Polly, and later studied with Messrs. Metcalfe and McLachlan, with whom he remained until he was admitted to the bar of the State of California in 1891. Since then he has carried on a general practice, first alone, and later with his brother, and in addition to work that is strictly professional he is serving as director in many corporations. In San Bernardino he married Miss Grace Gahr, who was born in Madison, Ind., and came to California in 1888. They have one son, Herbert L.

On the organization of the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks in Pasadena Mr. Hahn became one of its charter members. He was made a Mason in Pasadena Lodge, F. & A. M., besides which he is connected with the Maccabees, Woodmen of the World, Fraternal Brotherhood and Phil Kearney Camp, Sons of Veterans. As a member of the county central committee he is actively promoting the welfare of the Republican party in this county. In August, 1902, he was the Republican nominee for the state senate from the thirty-sixth senatorial district of California, and was elected to that office by a large majority. He is a member of the Pasadena Board of Trade and the Los Angeles County Bar Association. A believer in the doctrines of the Congregational denomination, he is connected with the work of the First Church of Pasadena and has served upon its board of trustees. Other lines of religious activity receive his warm support, particularly the Young Men's Christian Association, of which he is a director.

WASHINGTON HADLEY. During the early part of the seventeenth century the Hadley family was founded in America by two brothers who were adherents of the Quaker faith. One of them was Simon, whose son, Joshua, was a native of Pennsylvania, but spent much of his life in North Carolina, dying there at an advanced age. In his family of fourteen children, all of whom attained mature years, there was a son Jonathan, who accompanied the family from Pennsylvania to North Carolina, and there acquired farm interests, later owning and operating a mill and mercantile store. The foundation of a substantial success had been laid by him when, in 1826, his earthly life ended at forty-seven years of age. Adhering to the Society of Friends, he lived in accordance with the doctrines of that body and exemplified in his daily intercourse with others the teachings of peace and good will for which it stands.

In 1799 Jonathan Hadley married Ann Long, who was born in Virginia in 1783. When a small child she went with her father, John Long, from Virginia to North Carolina, making the trip in a wagon. Her only brother, Hon. John Long, served as congressman from North Carolina and was a statesman of great prominence in his day. The family were of the Quaker belief, and she always affiliated with that society. At the time of her death she was eighty-seven years of age. Of her twelve children, the eldest, Alfred, was born October 10, 1800, and in 1831 migrated to Morgan county, Ind., settling near Mooresville, where he not only taught school but also farmed. Three years later he went to Parke county, Ind., and embarked in mercantile pursuits. When about seventy-two years of age he was accidentally killed. The second member of the family was Mary, who died in California at ninety-seven years of age. The third child, John, was a successful stock-raiser in Iowa, where he died in 1882 at the age of seventy-four. Ruth died at Indianapolis, Ind., when forty years old. David died near Lincoln, Neb., having been during the course of his life a leading school teacher and active farmer. Hiram, who was born October, 1810, made a specialty of raising draft horses and other fine stock, and died at Monrovia, Ind., at the age of about eighty years. Matilda died in Indiana when sixty years of age. Rebecca still makes her home in Indiana; Franklin died at two years; Sidney, who was a teacher and a saddler, died in Parke county, Ind., in 1863; and Addison is now engaged in farming and the stock business near Plainfield, Ind.

In this family of eight sons and four daughters, Washington Hadley was the ninth, and was born near Greensboro, Guilford county, N. C., December 12, 1817. Longevity comes to him from both sides of the family, in spite of the fact that his father was still in life's prime when he died. At the age of fourteen he accompanied his mother to Indiana, and four years later began to teach school. In 1836 he went to Parke county, where he clerked in his brother's store and after two years was made a member of the firm. An experience of several years in merchandising and pork-packing proved of great value to him when starting out alone, as a trader on flat boats as far south as New Orleans. His election, in 1859, as treasurer of Parke county caused a change in his work, and for two terms he gave his attention closely to official duties, meantime also serving for a time as auditor.

The close of the Civil war found Mr. Hadley in Kansas, where he organized and became the first president of the National Bank of Lawrence, an institution that under his supervision became known as a safe and reliable financial concern. At the expiration of twenty years, on the expiration of the original charter, he secured a renewal and continued with the bank in an official capacity until his removal from the state. In 1889 he came to California and settled at Whittier, which continues to be his home to the present. His original connection with the town was through his position as one of the heaviest stockholders in the Pickering Land and Water Company, of which he is still the president. Largely through his efforts, in 1894 the Bank of Whittier was organized. At first connected with the same as cashier, he was soon promoted to be president, and when the concern was organized, under national laws, as the First National Bank of Whittier, October 1, 1900, he was transferred to the presidency of the new institution, in which position he remains.

In Richmond, Ind., Mr. Hadley was married, November 28, 1839, to Miss Naomi, daughter of Micajah Henley, a leading Quaker of Wayne county. Reared under the influence of that society, she continued faithful to its doctrines and a worker in its behalf, all through her long and useful life. At the time of her death, which occurred at Whittier November 21, 1901, she was eighty-two years of age. Eleven children were born of this union, namely: Gulielma, who died at six years; Albert, who is vice-president and active manager of the First National Bank of Whittier; Matilda, the widow of George Y. Johnson, of Lawrence, Kans.; Martha Ann, who died at eighteen years in Parke county, Ind.; Charles F., who died in Lawrence, Kans., in 1872, leaving a widow and one child; Almeda, wife of Albert D. Pickering, of Detroit, Mich.; Ella, who married Charles Monroe, an attorney of Los Angeles; Emilie, who is with her father, caring for him and ministering to the comfort of his declining years; Laurie, wife of T. E. Newland, vice-president of the California Bank of Los Angeles; Flora H., wife of George E. Little, cashier of the First National Bank of Whittier; and Henry, who died in Indiana in infancy.

Until the disintegration of the Whig party Mr. Hadley supported its tenets, and afterward turned his allegiance to the Republican party. His first presidential vote was cast for William Henry Harrison in 1840. During the convention of 1860, when Abraham Lincoln was first nominated for president, he acted as reporter for his home paper, receiving his credentials from E. D. Morgan. During his residence in Kansas he served as member of the city council and as mayor for two and one-half terms. During his administration as mayor the bonds were voted that were used in the erection of the State University buildings, and the location of the university at Lawrence was in no small part due to his tact, perseverance and energy. When he came into office there were thirty-three saloons in the city. Believing their influence to be deplorable, especially by reason of the presence of many young men as students at the university, he devoted himself to arousing public sentiment against them, and was so successful that he reduced their number one-half.

Wherever he has made his home Mr. Hadley has accomplished much in behalf of education and religion. Indeed, the promotion of these two causes, so indispensable to the highest culture of man, may be said to have been his principal object in life. By birthright a Quaker, he has maintained his membership in the society. In 1858 he was instrumental in securing the establishment of the Western Yearly Meeting of Friends at Plainfield, Ind. When he went to Kansas in 1866 he found his own family were the only Quakers in Lawrence, where he settled, but later others moved in, and meetings were then held for a time at the home of Mr. Hadley. Largely through his influence the Kansas yearly meeting was established and organized in Lawrence in 1872. After coming to California he assisted in securing the establishment of California yearly meeting at Whittier in 1895, and was also prominent in establishing the Whittier College, of which he has served as a trustee. His contributions to church and college have been exceptionally generous, as indeed have been his donations to all other worthy movements.

The success attained by Mr. Hadley is the fruition of his concentrated efforts. The only aid he ever received was $500 from his father's estate, and with that as a nucleus he has built up a large and gratifying success. Aside from his other interests, he owns three hundred and ninety-three acres, of which two hundred and ninety are in bearing walnuts, the whole forming what many good judges declare to be the finest English walnut ranch in California. The supervision of this, together with the oversight of his banking business, demands much of his time and attention, but although he is now eighty-four years of age, he prefers to devote his remaining years to business pursuits rather than retire from all activities, and this he is enabled to do by the remarkable retention of his mental and physical faculties.

GWALTNEY BROTHERS. In the temperaments and talents of these two brothers there is a resemblance which has found expression in the adoption of the same profession and in the selection of the same town, San Pedro, as the scene of their united and harmonious efforts. They were born in Gibson and Warrick counties, Ind., and are sons of William A. and Nancy (McDonald) Gwaltney. Primarily educated in public schools, their ambition, alert to gain every advantage that would be helpful in after life, inspired them to seek a knowledge of the higher branches. Entering Central Normal College at Danville, Ind., they pursued a regular course of study there and at graduation were awarded degrees as Bachelors of Science.

With similar tastes and ambitions, both turned toward the study of medicine. The younger brother, Sylvester, matriculated in the Marion Sims Beaumont College Hospital in St. Louis, Mo., and continued his studies there until his graduation, in March of 1893. On his return to Indiana he opened an office there, but later removed to California, settling in San Pedro in 1897. The older brother, J. Sanford, received his medical education in the College of Physicians and Surgeons and Keokuk Medical at Keokuk, Iowa, from which he received the degree of M. D. at graduation. The theoretical knowledge he had acquired in college was supplemented by his experience gained in active practice, while conducting professional work of eight years in Nebraska. Two years after his brother had settled in San Pedro he joined him here and the two have since carried on a general practice in partnership, meantime gaining an extended reputation for professional skill and knowledge. Some years ago they purchased the old Marine hospital property, and this they have since remodeled for residence purposes.

Besides their private practice the brothers act as examiners for thirteen life insurance companies, including all of the old-established organizations of the kind. In addition they have the surgeonship of the breakwater under construction, and the brothers also are surgeons for the Salt Lake Railroad at San Pedro.

FRANK A. GIBSON, Born in Pittsburg, Iowa, November 23, 1851, died in Los Angeles, Cal., October 13, 1901. To be born and to die being our common lot, the only other thing worthy of mention is his life.

Are we as much entitled to praise for our good qualities as we are to blame for our ill? If the answer is yes, to Frank A. Gibson is due a place in the front rank of humanity.

The clear mind, the power of discrimination, the ability to seize the salient point of any proposition, were coupled with a heart so sympathetic and a character so absolutely honest and unselfish as to make it seem to him the right thing to take up any mental or moral burden laid upon him, often by those who were bound to him by no tie of other blood, business affiliation, common race or interest. Spontaneously came from him the answer bearing relief to every cry for assistance. So natural was this to him that he could rarely be brought to realize that he was conferring a benefit to those to whom he freely gave of his time, his arduous labors, his experience and his unfailing sympathy. Truly it may be written of this man that he, being dead, yet speaketh. His unswerving integrity preached to every one with whom he came in contact. The dishonest and the mean approached him and, somehow, went away ashamed of their actions. The politician, pressed apparently too hard, brings for his approval an act not strictly correct, and departs cheered, strengthened, and a straight and honorable solution of his difficulty pointed out to him.

The widow and the orphan call on him and feel that there is some one in the world who will honestly and capably assist them to bear their unaccustomed burdens. All these years, when he is giving so freely, yea, lavishly of his substance, even his life, he is giving for the First National Bank, to which he devoted himself for the last seven years of his life, a work in season and out of season, as devoted and as intelligent and faithful as ever given by any man. The life of such a man does not die. The good that his high character has by contact inculcated in untold and unknown personalities descends from parent to child in a way only dimly appreciated by us and only known to Omnipotence. To say that such a man left a void not to be filled and friends without number is superfluous.

Mr. Gibson graduated from Mount Pleasant (Iowa) high school and after removal to California attended the University of the Pacific at San José. As his father's assistant at Round Valley Indian Agency, he gained an accurate idea of Indian affairs and would have studied law had not the death of his father made it necessary for him to at once assume the care of his mother and sisters. Equally well did he use the surveyor's instruments in the Sierras and his keen mind in the settlement of defective land titles. If "Frank" signed the abstract or opinion, it was accepted as final.

Mr. Gibson married in 1881 Miss Mary K. Simonds, who survives him. One child, a son, Hugh S. Gibson, born in 1883, carries alone the heritage of his father's character and life. Could I write Frank A. Gibson's epitaph in one word, I would say FAITHFUL.

CAPT. JOHN T. BRADY. The history of the National Bank of Pomona dates from 1891, when Captain Brady assisted in its organization and became its president. The bank has a capital stock of $50,000, and a present surplus of $25,000, with the following officers: John T. Brady, president; G. A. Lathrop, vice-president; Charles M. Stone, cashier; and T. W. Johnson, assistant cashier. An enlargement of the bank's interests resulted from the purchase, in 1901, of the People's Bank, which had been organized in 1887 as a state bank, with William Doyle as its first president. On the death of William Doyle, his brother, Albert, succeeded to the presidency, with Charles M. Stone as cashier. The merging of the People's into the National Bank caused an enlargement of the latter's business, and the bank is one of the most substantial in the eastern part of Los Angeles county.

For the successful management of his Pomona banking interests Captain Brady is qualified by a previous extensive experience as a banker in Kansas. He was born in Virginia, Cass county, Ill., but went to Kansas when a young man and identified himself with the landed and stock interests of the new state. While largely interested in raising cattle, he assisted in the organization of a state bank at Sabetha, Nemaha county. One year later it was merged into the Citizens National Bank, and two years later, on a consolidation with the First National Bank, the name was changed to the Sabetha State Bank, under which title it remained until five years ago, then being changed to The National Bank of Sabetha. The demands of his position as president of the bank were such that he retired from the cattle business and gave his entire attention to banking. In the midst of his prosperous management of the bank, his wife's health failed and, when they found in the course of their travels that the climate of Pomona proved helpful to her, they decided to remove here. Accordingly he disposed of his Kansas interests and settled in Pomona, where he has erected a handsome modern residence on the corner of Holt and Gerry streets. The beauty of the homestead is enhanced by walks and drives that are neatly laid out, and by an abundance of palms, fruit trees and flowers.

Not being of a disposition to welcome retirement from business activities, Captain Brady soon became as active in Pomona as he had been in Kansas. In company with A. C. Moorhead and Frederick Hewett, both now deceased, he purchased one hundred and twenty acres and set out the same in oranges and lemons. Today this is one of the most attractive ranches of the Pomona valley. On the organization of the Fruit Growers' Exchange he was chosen its president and has since filled this important position. Associated with others, in 1896 he incorporated the Consolidated Water Company of Pomona to furnish a supply of water for domestic purposes in Pomona, North Pomona and Claremont. This company succeeded the Pomona city water works and the Citizens' Water Company, whose pipe lines the Consolidated Water Company purchased and a part of which they utilized in the construction of their present extensive system of fifty-six miles of pipe lines in Pomona and four miles of pipe lines in North Pomona. The tunnel from which the water is obtained was built by the late Peter Fleming and James Becket, and by them sold to the company. It is five thousand feet long and at its upper extremity one hundred and ten feet below the surface of the ground. The idea of tunneling for water is to be credited to Mr. Fleming, and it has proved so successful that now the citizens of Pomona can boast of the purest and finest supply of water in Southern California.

The years of his service in the Union army during the Civil war are borne in mind by Captain Brady through his membership in Vicksburg Post No. 61, G. A. R., and he has always been interested in Grand Army matters. In religious belief he is of the Unitarian faith, while fraternally he is connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows.

ARTHUR I. GAMMON. Many years ago the Gammon family became established in Maine, and there was born and reared Rev. Samuel Gammon, a preacher in the Methodist Episcopal and Free-Will Baptist churches, and who died in Odell, Ill., at eighty-four years of age. Among his sons was Elijah H., a native of Maine and an early partner of William Deering, the famous manufacturer of harvesting machines. Together they brought out the first harvester ever manufactured. Somewhat later Mr. Deering bought out the interests of his partner, who thereupon established the Plano Manufacturing Company, now a part of the International Harvester Company. Aside from his large business enterprises, Elijah H. Gammon was active in religious affairs, a man of great philanthropy and always kind and helpful to the poor. He founded the Gammon Theological School at Atlanta, Ga., an institution which is doing much to elevate the colored race. His death occurred in Batavia, Ill., where he made his home.

Samuel H. Gammon, who was another of the sons of the pioneer preacher and a brother of the successful manufacturer, was born in Maine, but accompanied his parents to Illinois in boyhood and settled at Earlville. Grown to manhood, he bought one hundred and sixty acres of land near his home town and later became the owner of a farm of two hundred and forty acres. However, he did not remain on the farm long, but turned his attention to the hardware business in Odell, Ill., and in 1879 opened an agricultural implement store in Beloit, Kans. The following year he settled in Chicago, where he engaged in the lumber and planing-mill business as a member of the firm of Cook, Hallock & Gammon, conducting a very large retail and wholesale trade. After the death of his wife in that city, he came to California in 1890 and died in Pasadena four years later. Four children, Ellen, Arthur I., Mary and S. Wesley, were born of his marriage to Nancy Ingraham, a native of Augusta, Me., a woman of ability and of excellent Christian character, and a daughter of Theodore and Nancy (Church) Ingraham, also natives of Maine. Her father, who was a sea captain, came to California via the Horn at the time of the great gold excitement, but later returned to the east.

In Livingston county, Ill., Arthur I. Gammon was born May 24, 1866. His education was obtained primarily in the public schools of Odell, supplemented by attendance at the Chicago high schools, and later he was a student in Beloit College in Wisconsin and Bryant & Stratton's Commercial College of Chicago, from the latter of which he was graduated in 1887. After a short experience in bookkeeping in Chicago, in 1889 he went to Seattle, Wash., where he was employed as bookkeeper for eighteen months. In 1891 he came to Southern California to join his brother and sister, both of whom were quite low with consumption. After they had passed away, he went back to Chicago and for a year worked as accountant for the Plano Manufacturing Company, after which he again settled in Seattle, this time becoming a partner in the printing business in which he had previously been a bookkeeper. In order to care for his father, in the spring of 1894 he came to Pasadena, and remained with that parent until the end. He then took charge of various investments his father had made, and he is still identified with these, besides having made various investments for himself. With H. T. Newell he built a business block on Broadway, between First and Second streets, Los Angeles. He is a stockholder in the Merchants National Bank of Los Angeles, the First National Bank of Pasadena, the Conservative Life Insurance Company of Los Angeles, and in a number of oil and mining companies.

While making his home in Chicago, in 1892, Mr. Gammon married Miss Eleanor Ashley, who was born in Wisconsin, a daughter of J. W. and Chloe C. (Thompson) Ashley, natives of New York. During the latter years of his life Mr. Ashley was an invalid, and his death occurred in 1886. Mrs. Ashley was one of the noble types of motherhood that have blessed the world, a woman of large talent and deep thought. She died in 1890 after three years of great suffering from heart trouble. The three children of Mr. and Mrs. Gammon are Vera, Stella and Bertie Grace. The family are connected with the Lake Avenue Congregational Church of Pasadena, which Mr. Gammon assisted in organizing and of which he and his wife are charter members. Besides his warm interest in the church itself, he aids in promoting its various societies and auxiliaries, including the Christian Endeavor Society, Sunday-school and Young Men's Christian Association.

In politics he is active in the local work of the Republican party

IRA C. GOODRIDGE, the popular proprietor of the Spalding, has been a resident of Pasadena since 1900. Mr. Goodridge claims an ancestry represented in the colonial army during the Revolutionary war by his paternal great-grandfather, while his grandfather, Ira, fought with equal courage during the war of 1812. The last-named was born in Vermont and became an early settler of St. Lawrence county, N. Y., where his son, Horace, was born and reared. Taking up carpentering, Horace Goodridge became a contractor and builder, in which he engaged during his entire active life, making his home in St. Lawrence county until he died. His wife was Lavona Colby, who was born in New Hampshire and died in New York. Of the nine children born to them three are living, two sons and one daughter, Ira C. being the youngest. The older son, Dr. E. A. Goodridge, is a physician of Flushing, Long Island.

Near Massena Springs, St. Lawrence county, N. Y., Ira C. Goodridge was born in 1847. His education was obtained in the public schools of his native locality. In 1868 he moved to Saratoga Springs and clerked in a mercantile establishment, but soon afterward began to work at general decorating. In 1880 he settled in Rochester, N. Y., and established an independent decorating business, of which he made a decided success up to the time of disposing of his enterprise in 1899. As secretary and treasurer of the Puritan Manufacturing Company he held close relations with an important enterprise, and this also was disposed of before his departure for the west in January of 1900. As a guest of the Spalding, in Pasadena, he was quick to recognize a business opportunity, and by the fall of 1900 had completed negotiations for the purchase of the hotel. The wisdom of his choice has been repeatedly demonstrated, and he is now contemplating an enlargement of his present capacity to meet the demands of an increasing patronage.

While living in Saratoga, N. Y., Mr. Goodridge married Fannie W. Davison, by whom he has a daughter, Elizabeth M., who is a graduate of Miss Wheelock's classical school in Boston, class of 1902. John Davison, father of Mrs. Goodridge, is a prominent eastern man and president of the Hudson River Railroad Company. Her maternal grandfather, Chancellor Walworth, who died in 1898, was an attorney and judge in eastern New York. While living in Rochester, Mr. Goodridge was a member of the Chamber of Commerce. At present he is identified with the Pasadena Board of Trade. For fourteen years he was an active worker in St. Peter's Presbyterian Church of Rochester, and is now connected with the First Presbyterian Church of Pasadena. In national politics he is a Republican. Personally he is one of the substantial and enterprising members of his community.

WILLIAM B. CLAPP. Long and honorable connection with the interests of a community gives a man prestige and merited influence. Such is the case in the life of Mr. Clapp, who has made his home in Southern California since the fall of 1873 and has always, as civil engineer, surveyor and citizen, proved himself trustworthy and capable. He was born in Conway, Franklin county, Mass., April 11, 1861, and is one among the three children of William T. and Ophelia (Billings) Clapp, natives of Massachusetts. His father, who owned and operated a tannery in the east, removed to Texas in 1868, settling in Houston, where he engaged in the beef packing business and later traveled for a hardware firm. From Texas he came to California, since which time he has made Pasadena his home.

Without any aid from others and lacking the advantages of systematic study under capable instructors, William B. Clapp nevertheless taught himself the rudiments of civil engineering, and by practical experience has acquired a knowledge of the occupation excelled by few. In 1881 he began to do surveying for the government. Among his important surveys in California was that for the Los Angeles & San Gabriel Railroad, the first road to enter Pasadena, and with this company he was associated about four years. At one time he acted as assistant engineer of the Los Angeles Cable Railroad, and for seven months was road master and civil engineer for the San Gabriel Valley Rapid Transit line, which has since become a part of the Southern Pacific system. During 1892 he was employed as chief engineer in putting in the sewer system in Phoenix, Ariz. From 1894 until 1901 he held the office of city engineer of Pasadena, which he filled with recognized ability and wise judgment. Under his energetic supervision the sewer system for Pasadena was brought up to its present high standard, the plans, since completed under other hands, being representative of his ideas and earlier work. Almost all of the present paving in the city was put in under his supervision, and he also laid the plans for the balance. At this writing he has charge of work in the Hydrographic department of the geological survey, is laying out a sub-division known as Ford Place, and is a director in the Pasadena Mutual Building and Loan Association.

Though not a partisan in his views, he is always pronounced in his adherence to Republican principles. In religion he is of the Congregational faith. Prominent in Masonry, he is a member of Pasadena Lodge No. 272, F. & A. M., in which he is past master; Pasadena Chapter, R. A. M.; Pasadena Commandery, K. T., in which he is senior warden; and Scottish Rite.

The marriage of Mr. Clapp and Miss Velma W. Browne, a native of West Comington, Mass., was solemnized in Pasadena, Cal. Her father, Charles P. Browne, was born in Massachusetts, where he learned and followed the machinist's trade, and during the war was employed as a machinist in the Armory at Springfield, Mass. Coming to California in 1876, he built a residence at Alhambra, and also did considerable building for others. In 1881 he came to Pasadena and put up a machine shop, which he operated for a time. Later he devoted his attention principally to piano tuning. Since his death Mrs. Browne has made her home with her daughter, Mrs. Clapp. The latter was given fine advantages in girlhood, being sent east in 1895 to take a course of study in Boston. The beauty of her clear and cultivated soprano voice is constantly commented upon. For three years she had charge of the music in the Methodist Episcopal Church and for a similar period was engaged by the Presbyterians. At this writing she has a large class in vocal music, and is recognized as one of the leading and most successful teachers in her home city.

J. A. EPPINGER. The name of Eppinger indicates the Teutonic origin of the family. The grandfather of J. A. Eppinger was born in that portion of Switzerland bordering on Germany and at an early age removed across the border, later crossing the ocean to Pennsylvania and settling in Lancaster, where he engaged in the brewing business until his death. During the time that he made his home in Ulm, Wurtemberg, his son, John G., was born, and the latter was eighteen years of age when the family settled in Lancaster, Pa. For a few years he was interested in a brick manufacturing business in that city. Later he removed to the vicinity of Harrisburg and purchased a farm of one hundred and sixty-five acres at Derry Station. On that homestead his death occurred, when he was eighty-one years of age. After settling in Lancaster he had married Mary Shay, a native of that city, and a daughter of Michael Shay. The latter was born in Germany, but spent much of his life in Lancaster, where he followed the locksmith's trade.

Among seven children that attained mature years J. A. Eppinger was third in order of birth, and he is the eldest of the five sons now living. All of his brothers, Henry, James, Oscar and Charles, remain in Pennsylvania. He was born in Lancaster, March 26, 1856. His education was obtained in Palmyra Academy in Lebanon county, Pa., of which he is a graduate. For a time he engaged in the retail drug business in Harrisburg, after which, in 1870, he went to Vinton, Iowa, and was similarly occupied. His next location was La Crosse, Wis., where he conducted a drug store. Selling out that business, he entered the employ of the W. S. Merrill Chemical Company of Cincinnati, Ohio, for whom he traveled on the road more than twenty-four years. The satisfactory nature of his service is indicated by his long tenure in the position and by the many testimonials of praise he received on relinquishing his connection with the firm. February 2, 1899, he arrived in California, settling in Redondo, where he now has an attractive home on Francisco avenue and Diamond street. In the spring of 1902 he was elected a trustee of Redondo, and he is now serving as chairman of the committee on streets, in which capacity he has already accomplished much for the benefit of the city streets. Notwithstanding his activity in local affairs and his election to office, he does not affiliate with any party, but is independent in his views. In religious faith he is an Episcopalian, while fraternally he is connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and Knights of Pythias.

The first wife of Mr. Eppinger was Miss Ada M. Dodge, a relative of Wisconsin's late governor of that name. She was born in Saginaw, Mich., and died in Chicago, Ill. Some years later he was united in marriage, in Memphis, Tenn., with Mrs. Sarah E. (Lawless) Pemberton, who was born in Brooklyn, N. Y., being the daughter of an extensive and wealthy dry-goods merchant of New York City. At this writing she is the sole surviving member of the Lawless family, descendants of Lord Lawless of Ireland. Among her relatives the most distinguished was her uncle, George Stephenson, the inventor of locomotive engines. On completing her education she was united in marriage with Lord Pemberton of England, a son of Sir Richard Alexander Pemberton, and some years after his demise she became the wife of Mr. Eppinger. In their home is a daughter, Hazel D. (by Mr. Eppinger's first marriage), who is a talented musician and has been given exceptional advantages in vocal and instrumental music.

FRANCIS M. CASAL, M. D. The record of the Casal family is intimately identified with the history of the ancient city of Seville in Spain, which was the capital of the Gothic dynasty prior to the sixth century and, since the establishment of the Spanish kingdom, has been one of its most prominent and populous cities. During the turbulent times in Europe that were caused by the ambition of Napoleon, the city of Seville was seriously affected by these disturbances. However, before it had fallen into the hands of the French, many of its leading men left, among them Juan F. Casal, who settled in Philadelphia, Pa., and there died of yellow fever in 1801. Two years before his death he married an English lady, Jane Redmond, then a resident of Philadelphia. The only son of their union, John F. Casal, Jr., was born in Philadelphia, and received his education in Baltimore, where he was graduated from the University of Maryland, with the advantages to be derived from study under Nathan R. Smith. On the completion of his medical studies, he opened an office in Baltimore, where his entire professional life was passed. A careful study of the institution of slavery led him to realize its evils, and he liberated his last slave the year before the Civil war opened. Having acquired large holdings near Palmyra, Mo., he removed to that point and gave his attention to the management of his large estate, remaining there until his death, in 1870. Fraternally he was a Mason.

On the maternal side Dr. Casal traces his lineage through English progenitors to remote German ancestors. His mother, who bore the maiden name of Ann Maria Toy, was born in Philadelphia, and was the daughter of a Revolutionary soldier. Her death occurred in Missouri. Of her family of six daughters and three sons, two daughters and two sons are now living. One of the sons, John F., came to California in 1838, and at first acted as agent for the Wells-Fargo Company at Napa on the Napa river, but afterward became a superintendent of mines and finally engaged in business as a broker in San Francisco, where he died in 1893.

Dr. Casal was born in Baltimore, Md., September, 20, 1842. He was reared principally in Missouri. After his graduation from the St. Louis high school, he was prepared to enter the sophomore class of Washington University, but at the outbreak of the Civil war changed his plans and commenced the study of medicine under the guidance of his father, whose thorough knowledge of the science and long experience in treating all forms of disease admirably qualified him to lead the student in all of his researches. Later he matriculated in Rush Medical College, Chicago, from which he was graduated in 1864. With a theoretical knowledge of medicine that was thorough and broad, he was prepared to enter the field of active practice, and, with the belief that the west afforded exceptional advantages to young professional men, he settled in Austin, Nev., in 1864, having made the trip from his home in Missouri via New York and Panama. Early in the spring of 1865 he entered military service as assistant surgeon in the Second California Infantry, and was stationed for a short time at Presidio. Later he was transferred to Arizona, where he had his headquarters at San Pedro. In a short time he was transferred to Fort Grant, which point he reached by marching overland to Yuma, thence going up the Gila river. After three months he was ordered to Fort Goodwin, a military post near the present site of Solomonville, Ariz. From there, in May, 1866, he returned to Yuma, where he took a steamer down the Colorado river and up the Pacific ocean to San Francisco. The close of the Civil war bringing to an end the need for his services, he was mustered out, June 30, 1866.

In July of the same year Dr. Casal was appointed acting assistant surgeon, with headquarters first at Camp McKee, and later at Camp McGarry. From the latter point he went to Chico, Cal. At Sacramento he joined Company A, Eighth United States Cavalry, and with them proceeded over the mountains to Fort Churchill. Thence, in the fall of 1866, he proceeded to Camp Winfield Scott, and was stationed there until June, 1867, when he resigned and returned to the east, via the Nicaragua route.

With a desire to acquire a more profound knowledge of his profession, Dr. Casal took lectures in Bellevue Hospital Medical College and the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York. In 1868 he established himself in practice at Pittsfield, Ill., where he remained for nineteen years, meantime not only gaining a reputation for skill in the treatment of disease, but also winning the esteem of people by his progressive spirit. For a time he was president of the board of trustees of Pittsfield. During all of these years, however, he had not forgotten his experiences on the Pacific coast, and memory often lingered over events of the past. Finally he determined to return to the west and spend his remaining years in a region unrivalled for grandeur of scenery and equable climate. During December of 1887 he established his home in Santa Barbara, where he has since engaged in the practice of medicine and surgery. He has built two residences in this city and is a property owner. For three terms he has officiated as health officer, which position he still fills. Since 1878 he has been connected with the American Medical Association, and during his residence in Illinois he was a member of a State Medical Society, while at this writing he is actively connected with the Southern California Medical Association.

The marriage of Dr. Casal took place in Pittsfield, Ill., and united him with Miss Amelia Letitia Atkinson, who was born in that city and died in Santa Barbara, April 25, 1901, leaving three children. The older daughter, Mrs. Mary Amelia Robinson, makes her home in Dallas, Tex., where the younger children Annie H. and F. M., reside with their father.

Reared to respect the high principles of Masonry, Dr. Casal in early life was initiated into that order. Thirty-two years ago he was made a Mason, in the blue lodge at Pittsfield, of which he was master. Later he advanced to the Royal Arch Chapter, in which he was high priest. He was an officer in the Council and for nine years held office as eminent commander of the Commandery. After coming to Santa Barbara, he was one of the organizers and charter members of St. Omar Commandery No. 30, K. T., of which he was elected the first eminent commander, filling the office for three years. In 1890 he was inspector of the sixth district. As he has followed his father's example in his adherence to Masonry, so in politics he has always remained faithful to the Democratic principles in which he was reared. Identified with the Episcopal Church, he was a warden for fifteen years during his residence in Illinois and is now senior warden of the Santa Barbara Church. Before coming west he was active in Sunday-school work, and for seventeen years served as superintendent at Pittsfield.

GEORGE W. BENSON. The life of this well-known citizen of Verdugo furnishes an example of what may be accomplished by determination and industry. While he had the advantage of some in the fact that he inherited $2,000 from his father's estate, yet in the main his accumulations are the result of individual efforts. When he came to this part of Los Angeles county it was one vast sheep range, and few as yet realized its possibilities as a fruit-growing section. He was among the first to buy property and experiment with the raising of horticultural products here, and his success stimulated others to emulate his example.

In Pecatonica, Winnebago county, Ill., Mr. Benson was born June 3, 1858, a son of William and Jane (Wells) Benson, natives respectively of France and New York. His father was born while the family, who were English, were temporarily residing in France, and in childhood was taken to Toronto, Canada, where he received a fair education. When about twenty years of age he came to the States, and drove a stage from Chicago to Galena, Ill., for a number of years. Later he bought eighty acres of canal land in Seward township, Winnebago county, paying $2.50 per acre for the property. To this farm he afterward added until he was the owner of one hundred and seventy-two acres, forming a valuable homestead, on which he continued to reside until his death, of consumption, at forty-eight years of age. Had his life been spared to old age undoubtedly he would have become wealthy. He was survived by his wife, who died in 1870 at forty-eight years of age. Of their six children, all are dead except George W. and a brother in Florence, Cal. The former, who was fifth in order of birth, was six years of age when his father died, and twelve when he lost his mother, after which he remained with an elder brother on the home farm. At seventeen years of age he began working by the month on farms, and three years later came to California, for a year working in a nursery in Los Angeles.

Returning to Illinois, Mr. Benson joined a brother in the purchase of their father's old home and remained there two years, but disposed of the property and came back to California May 25, 1883. During that year he purchased a ranch of forty-two and one-half acres at Verdugo. At this writing he owns twenty-seven and one-half acres, of which fifteen are in fruit, twelve and one-half being in deciduous fruits, and two and one-half in oranges and lemons. The property is well improved and forms a valuable addition to the income-bearing estates of the district. In addition to the management of the land, since 1900 he has owned and operated a fumigating outfit; and since 1894 has been officially connected with the Verdugo Pipe and Reservoir Water Company, which distributes and divides the water on about fifty acres.

January 12, 1881, Mr. Benson married Miss Julia F. Hewett, who was born in Pecatonica township, Winnebago county, Ill., April 23, 1857, being a daughter of John L. and Philenia (Perry) Hewett, natives respectively of Massachusetts and New Hampshire, and early settlers of Winnebago county. During much of his active life Mr. Hewett followed the shoemaker's trade. At the time of death he was fifty and his wife seventy years of age. They were the parents of eight children, three of whom attained mature years. When Mrs. Benson was a child of eight years she was sent alone to Port Dover, Canada, and there spent the years of girlhood. Of her marriage to Mr. Benson, there are four children, namely: Warren Elbert, who is with his parents; Elroy H., who died at sixteen years of age; Mable and George Perry, at home. In politics Mr. Benson votes with the Republicans, but has never showed any partisanship, nor has he at any time sought office, preferring to devote himself to his private business interests.

GEORGE STECKEL. To the true lover of art, photography offers possibilities unexcelled in the domain of the beautiful. Combined with its facilities for accurate reproduction are its adaptability for harmonious and graceful effects, its opportunities for artistic posing, and its instantaneous response to a master hand. The great west occupies no secondary position in the talent of its disciples of this art, and among them George Steckel stands without a superior. Nature gave him qualities especially adapted to the work in which he engages, and these qualities have been fostered and developed by years of study and experience. Medal after medal has come to him in recognition of the unrivaled quality of his carbon and sepia pictures, which are his specialties. His first exhibit was made at Boston in 1889, at which time an award was tendered him for general portrait effects. Two years later, at Buffalo, he received a bronze medal. In 1893, when in competition with the San Francisco photographers at Mechanics' Institute, he was awarded all of the four medals offered at that time, and during the same year, at the World's Fair convention of photographers, he was given two medals; also the two highest medals offered for portrait photography, and a medal and diploma from the Liberal Arts department. Altogether, he has won eighteen medals and several diplomas at various expositions, his latest award having been two medals at the Paris Exposition of 1900.

In Allentown, Pa., where he was born December 20, 1864, Mr. Steckel spent his boyhood days. When fourteen years of age he entered the photographic gallery of E. D. Jeans of that city, where he made such rapid strides in acquiring a knowledge of the art that in two years he had completed the same. With a view to selecting a suitable location for a home, he traveled throughout the west, and in January, 1888, arrived in Los Angeles, with which he was so pleased that he immediately decided to establish himself here. Selecting a suitable building on South Spring street, he opened a studio. A few months later he formed a partnership with J. H. Lamson, but after two years bought his partner's interest, since which time he has been alone. From year to year, the increased demands of the business have necessitated the securing of additional space, and he now occupies one-half of the second floor, and all of the third floor of the building, which gives him a large space for his studio and its equipments. During much of the year he furnishes employment to a large number of assistants, but personally takes charge of all the sittings and has the entire business under his capable and constant supervision. Through his successful exhibits and also through his membership in the National Association of Photographers, he has gained a wide reputation among photographers and by them is conceded to occupy a leading position in the list of the world's photographic artists. Aside from his professional work, in which his ambitions are centered, he has only limited associations and interests, included in these being his membership in the California and Jonathan Clubs, and the lodge, commandery and shrine of the Masonic Order.

LEONADES BLY. The family whose reputation for industry and ability Mr. Bly so well sustains is of English ancestry. Early in the history of America they settled in the east. The paternal grandfather, Abraham, was a farmer in Indiana, and afterward settled on a farm two and one-half miles southeast of Des Moines, Iowa. Rev. J. T. Bly, the father of Leonades, was born in the Hoosier state, and served for a short time in an Indiana regiment during the Civil war. As a minister of the Christian Church, he underwent the hardships incident to his calling in the early days of Iowa, where he was a pioneer preacher. In his early youth he had given attention to contracting and building, and this occupation he followed, after leaving Iowa, in Kansas and Colorado, being a railroad contractor in Kansas. In 1884 he came to California and engaged in contracting at Los Angeles until he died five years later. He married Margaret Staten, who was born in Indiana and died in Iowa about 1868. In their family were four children, namely: A. B., a railroad man at Creston, Iowa; Mary M., of Topeka, Kans.; C. E. and Leonades, both of Los Angeles.

Until his eleventh year Mr. Bly lived in Iowa. After removing with his father to Central Kansas he continued his studies in the public schools, but at a comparatively early age began to work for a living. Upon locating in Pueblo, Colo., in 1879, he learned the trade of a stone mason. In 1883 he went to Shoshone, Idaho, where he followed his trade with the railroad company. The next year he came to Los Angeles, where he worked at his trade two years, and then began building and contracting. Among his contracts may be mentioned those for the stone work of the Lyman Stewart residence, the Foster, Harding, Vermillion residences on Chester Place, the Adams street entrance to Chester Place, and the Youman's block. In the fall of 1901 he materially increased his responsibilities by establishing a stone working plant on Alameda street between Seventh and Eighth streets, where all kinds of stone work are turned out. The plant is fitted with steam power machinery and is most complete in every detail. The quarry at Santa Barbara provides the celebrated buff stone, and the Sespe quarries furnish the well-known Sespe brown stone. His partners in business are his brother, C. E. Bly, and his brother-in-law, G. D. McGilliard. The enterprise as established by him is a distinct credit to his wise judgment.

In Los Angeles Mr. Bly married May Marchant, who was born in California, and by whom he had three children, two now living, Hazel and Albert Merlin. Mrs. Bly is a daughter of John and Susan (Stannage) Marchant, and was one of four children, the others being Walter S., of Honolulu; Thirza and Editha. John Marchant was a native of Canada, of English parentage. During the early mining days, in 1850, he came to California and tried his luck in the gold fields. Going to Nevada, he became a general merchant, which occupation he followed for many years. Finally, in 1889, he returned to California, where he was interested in the real-estate and insurance business until his death, in December, 1901, at seventy-five years of age. He was respected for his many exemplary qualities of head and heart. His widow is still living in Los Angeles. An active member of the Presbyterian Church, Mr. Bly is now president of its board of trustees. In politics he is a Republican.

JOHN DALLETT BLISS. Situated at the base of the mountains and sloping down into the San Fernando valley lies the attractive homestead of Mr. Bliss, that in point of scenic beauty is unrivaled among the many beautiful homes of Los Angeles county. His removal from the east to the Pacific coast resulted less from choice than from business exigencies, but he has become a convert to the climate and scenery of Southern California, and in his ideal home is living a busy and happy life. When he came here in 1893, with his brother Robert, it was for the purpose of buying one hundred and forty acres, on which his father held a mortgage. After the death of his brother the property came into his individual possession, and in addition he has bought two hundred and ten acres in the mountains adjoining his homestead. A commodious and elegantly appointed residence has been built, suitable barns and granaries have been added, and a large tract has been put under cultivation, forty acres being in navel oranges, ten acres in lemons and thirteen in apricots.

Robert Bliss, a native of England, came to America, accompanied by his family, which included William, a twelve-year-old boy. Afterward they received a large income from England, where the grandfather was an extensive and prosperous manufacturer. William Bliss married Catherine Dallett, a native of Philadelphia, where she died at thirty-five years of age, leaving three sons, John D., William and Robert. Her father, John Dallett, was the founder of the coffee importing business in Philadelphia, where he built up a large and profitable business and accumulated a fortune. Into this firm he admitted William Bliss as a partner, and later the offices of the company were removed to New York City, where the business enjoyed increasing prestige and success. At his death, when sixty-three years of age, John Dallett left a fortune, accumulated by his rare ability and judgment in the management of his importing business. In many respects he was a remarkable man, and his name is still familiar among coffee dealers in this country. He was of English extraction and reared his family in the faith of the Church of England.

In Philadelphia, Pa., John D. Bliss was born June 28, 1862. While he was still quite small his mother died. His brother, William, died at thirty-one, while Robert passed away February 13, 1900, when he was twenty-nine, leaving the eldest son as the sole representative of the family. His education was received in private schools, after which he remained a clerk in his father's New York office for eight years, and was then admitted as a partner into the Philadelphia branch house. In 1893 he disposed of his interest in the business and came to California, since which time he has made his home on his Glendale ranch. By his marriage to Miss Whiting, of Nashville, Tenn., he has a son, John. The family are connected with the Episcopal Church. In national elections Mr. Bliss casts his ballot with the Republican party, whose principles he believes to be best adapted to promote the permanent welfare of the nation. In fraternal relations he is associated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows.

GEORGE TRUMAN GOWER. The horticultural interests of Mr. Gower include the oversight of two lemon orchards at Hollywood, besides the home place. Mr. Gower is a descendant of Maine ancestry. His father, John Truman Gower, a native of New Sharon, that state, born in August, 1820, taught school in early youth and during the summer vacations shipped on whaling vessels. After a time he shipped on a cruise of two years, during the course of which he stopped at the Hawaiian Islands. Securing his discharge from the ship's service, he became a clerk in a store in Honolulu and with his earnings bought a one-half interest in a sugar plantation, subsequently the entire plant. Prospects for the future seemed so auspicious that he sent back to Maine for his sweetheart, who made the long voyage to Honolulu, and they were there married. For a time all went well, but the reaction following the boom during the middle of the nineteenth century brought all the planters to bankruptcy. On giving up his plantation he became a surveyor, later operated a small flour and saw mill and then carried on a meat business, also engaged in farming. At the time of the Civil war he was postmaster of his town. In 1869 he sold all his property on the islands and came to Los Angeles, joining his son, George T., who had preceded him a year.

In his new home John T. Gower took up a government claim of one hundred and sixty acres, seventy of which, now owned by his widow, form a part of Hollywood. Sixty acres were sold after his death for $400 an acre. He assisted in laying out National City, a suburb of San Diego, also laid out various tracts in Los Angeles county, and besides acquired a number of mining claims, being one of three to discover the Julian mines in San Diego county. In religion he was connected with the Hardshell Baptists and while on the Sandwich Islands took a very active part in church work. His death occurred at his homestead in Los Angeles county in 1880.

The marriage of John T. Gower united him with Mary G. Craswell, who was born in Maine, and now makes her home at No. 3003 Minnesota street, East Los Angeles. Seven children were born of their union, namely: Mary Q., a teacher, now in New York City; George Truman, who was born at Makawao, East Maui, Hawaiian Islands, June 25, 1854, and is a resident of Hollywood, Cal.; Henry C., who is engaged in the oil business in Los Angeles; Birney P., who died at twenty-one years; Charles W.; Hattie F., a teacher in Los Angeles; and Thomas C., a mail carrier in Los Angeles. The oldest son as well as all the other children in this family was reared on the Sandwich Islands until fourteen years of age, when he came to California and made his home with Mrs. Lucy (Norton) Crane, a cousin of Nordica, the famous singer. Previous to this he had never attended an English school, but he was now given advantages in the Alameda county schools, which he attended a part of the time for three and one-half years, the balance of the time being given to work in the orchard. After coming to Southern California he remained with his father until twenty-one years of age, when he took up a government claim in Kern county, and at the end of three years he sold his improvements and removed to the San Fernando valley. As foreman, he had charge of five thousand acres, a part of the San Fernando grant, and during the nine years he remained with the same company he accumulated considerable property through fortunate investments, although later during the reaction after the boom he suffered the losses experienced by all property-holders. On leaving the company's employ he took charge of his mother's ranch, which he has since managed.

By the marriage of Mr. Gower to Miss Mary J. Jenifer, who was born near Marysville, Cal., four children were born, namely: John Truman, Harrison Preston, Lena Jenifer and Alice Drussilla. The family are connected with the Park Congregational Church. For twelve years or more Mr. Gower has been a delegate to county conventions of the Republican party and has always been a staunch adherent of Republican principles. Interested in educational work, he has served efficiently in the position of school trustee, meantime acting as clerk of the board. Movements for the benefit of his locality receive his encouragement and aid, and his progressive plans and high citizenship have proved of the greatest help to Hollywood.

J. H. HOFFMAN. Numbered among the representative business men of Los Angeles is J. H. Hoffman, who has been a resident of this city since January, 1896. For a few years afterward he conducted the Kitchen Cafe on San Fernando Road, but in December, 1899, he purchased the Los Angeles fertilizer works, which he has since greatly enlarged and successfully conducted. At this writing the plant is the largest of its kind in Southern California. Steam is used as motive power, and a specialty is made of the manufacture of high-grade tankage fertilizer. At first only two teams were needed, but so steady has been the growth of the business that now about ten teams are kept in constant use.

When a young man, John T., father of J. H. Hoffman, crossed the ocean from his native Germany and settled in Albany, N. Y., where for years he conducted a large blacksmith shop. He died in that city in December, 1875. In politics he was a Democrat and in religion a member of the German Reformed Church. His wife was Mary Elizabeth Knodine, a native of Germany, and now living in Albany. Five sons and five daughters were born of their marriage, one of the sons, George, being now the proprietor of the blacksmith shop established by the father. J. H. and F. P. are the only members of the family in California. The former was born in Albany, N. Y., April 11, 1864, and received his education in public schools. In 1882 he became a fireman on the West Shore Railroad, his run being from Syracuse. After some time he was promoted to be engineer, which position he filled for two years. Going to Texas in 1887, he ran an engine on the Southern Pacific out from San Antonio for six years. While making his home in that city he was married there to Miss Annie Elliott, who was born in Dallas, Tex., and by whom he has one son, Leon.

During the years of his work in Texas, while he had runs all over the state from Houston to El Paso, he was fortunate in never meeting with an accident, although there were a number of such catastrophes at the time in that state. In 1893 he went to Albuquerque, N. M., where he became an engineer on the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe road between that city and The Needles. Two years later he resigned the position and for a short time carried on business in Williams, Ariz., coming from that city to Los Angeles, where he has since made his home. In politics he is independent, voting for the man and the measure rather than the party.

HENRY C. HOOKER. The ancestry of the Hooker family is traced to the illustrious Congregational clergyman, Thomas Hooker, D. D., who crossed the ocean from England in the second ship that landed at Plymouth Rock and shortly afterward went from Massachusetts to Connecticut, where, in 1635, he founded the city of Hartford. Descended from him was Judge Seth Hooker, a soldier in the war of 1812, and later a successful attorney of Hinsdale, N. H., and judge of the courts of Cheshire county. His marriage united him with a daughter of Rev. Bunker Gay, member of an English family that was represented among the pioneers of

New England. In his day Rev. Mr. Gay was a noted man and exceedingly popular. Following the example of the apostle Paul, he accepted no remuneration for his services as a preacher, but gladly and through love for the cause filled the pulpit each Sunday of his active life. Under his supervision was erected the first parsonage at Hinsdale. The possession of an able mind and a deep love for humanity breathed through all of his pulpit utterances and all of his published sermons, and his earnest labors were productive of much good in the communities where he lived.

Though born in Connecticut, Henry Hooker, who was a son of Judge Seth Hooker, spent the greater part of his life in New Hampshire, where he died at ninety-four years of age. From his father he inherited keen mental faculties that enabled him to reason logically and well; while from his grandfather he inherited fluency of speech and a sincere love for Christianity. All of his life he adhered to Congregational teachings, and, whenever his pastor was absent, he was accustomed to act as pulpit supply, although, in deference to his views concerning clergymen and laymen, he never took his place in the pulpit, but preached from the foot of the same. In politics he voted with the Whigs and became a Republican on the organization of that party. He married Mary Daggett, who was born in Chesterfield, N. H., of an old family of New England, and died at sixty years of age. They became the parents of nine children, all still living, namely: Mrs. H. N. Jones, of Hinsdale, N. H.; George P., a retired farmer of Hinsdale; Charles G., who came to California in pioneer days and is now a capitalist of San Francisco; Henry C., of Los Angeles; Mrs. Nutting, whose husband was a clergyman in Hinsdale; Mrs. Robinson, whose husband was a business man of New York City; Anson C., who occupies the old homestead of Rev. Bunker Gay in Hinsdale; J. D., of Los Angeles; and Mrs. N. T. Smith, whose husband is treasurer of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company and intimately connected with the Leland Stanford estate.

At Hinsdale, N. H., Henry C. Hooker was born January 10, 1828. When twenty years of age he went to New York City and a year later proceeded as far west as Kansas City, where for three years he clerked in an Indian trader's store. As representative of his firm, in 1852, he was sent to the Cherokee nation and was there at the time the government paid $1,500,000 for the Cherokee lands. During the same year, returning to New York City, he started for California via the isthmus, and in January, 1853, with his brother, Charles G., arrived in San Francisco. His first employment was as clerk in mines, but soon he opened a general store at Placerville, where he continued in business for some years. At the time of the Frazer river excitement, in the spring of 1858, he went to British Columbia, where he engaged in prospecting, but in the fall of the same year went back to San Francisco.

About this time began Mr. Hooker's connection with the cattle business, in which he has since gained prominence throughout the west. At first, as a speculator, he bought stock in the Pacific coast regions and shipped them to the markets. In 1866 he took a contract to supply the army in Arizona with meat and established his headquarters at Fort Goodwin on the Gila river. His work was rendered unusually difficult owing to the presence of the bloodthirsty Apaches, the fiercest and most cruel of all the Indian tribes. Time and again their depredations caused him heavy losses in stock and in his freighting trains, of which latter he had fifty ten-mule trains. However, in spite of these and other discouragements, the business proved sufficiently profitable to warrant its continuance, and he remained a government contractor until 1888. Meantime he traveled much through Arizona, and, being a man of keen and shrewd judgment, he decided that large profits could be secured from the raising of stock. With this end in view, in 1872 he started a ranch twenty-four miles from Willcox, Ariz., in Sulphur Spring valley, beginning with eleven thousand head of cattle bearing the brand of a crooked H. Thirty years have since come and gone, and have witnessed marvelous transformations in Arizona and in the stock industry, much of which may be attributed to his enterprise and progressive spirit. At this writing he has twenty thousand head of cattle on his range, which covers twenty-five by forty miles, he himself owning about five thousand acres of patent.

After he had been engaged in raising cattle for some years, Mr. Hooker decided to attempt an experiment. This was in connection with the introduction of full-blooded stock. In 1881 he brought twenty-five head of Hereford bulls to his ranch, these being the first full-blooded cattle in the entire west. These animals had been purchased from the Hereford breeder, T. L. Miller, of Beecher, Ill. Three years later he made an importation of stock at a cost of $30,000, and ever since then he has added to his herd by bringing between fifty and one hundred head from abroad. His experiment in the introduction of Herefords was watched with interest all over the west, and when it was proved beyond question to be a success, others followed the example he had set in the purchase of full-blooded stock. In this way his influence has been of a most important nature. For the hilly and mountainous regions of Arizona, the Herefords have proved to be well adapted. It is Mr. Hooker's experience that on level plains, thickly sown with alfalfa, the preference might be given to Shorthorns, but as range-feeders the Herefords are far superior. Another fact in their favor is that they produce a greater proportion of hind-quarter meat than any other breed, so that butchers are always glad to buy them. As an incentive to harmony of action among the cattle-growers of Arizona, Mr. Hooker secured the organization of a territorial association for stock-growers, but his interest in it ceased when men were admitted to membership who owned but a few head of cattle.

At the same time that he has developed a remarkable cattle business, Mr. Hooker has also become known for his fine horses, having brought to his ranch the finest in Arizona. Notable in his stud is Valbrino, son of Stamboul, 2:07½. At four years old Stamboul had a record of 2:17½, made in a race with Arab in Los Angeles. At five years this record had been lowered to 2:14½, and at six years to 2:11¾. The three first crosses in Valbrino are the finest of American trotting blood. Another stallion possessing points equal to those of Valbrino is Parisee, whose sire, Palo Alto, has a record of 2:08¾, against time, to a high-wheeled sulky; dam by General Benton (1755), the producer of many fine trotting animals. No stockman in the west has been more successful in the raising of horses than has Mr. Hooker, and he expects to continue in the business, together with the raising of cattle, as long as his life is spared. Indeed, he still continues to spend a portion of each year on his Arizona ranch, superintending details and maintaining a general supervision, although he leaves to his two sons, Edwin R. and J. M., who reside in Willcox, the general charge of the land and stock. In 1901 he built an elegant residence on West Adams street, Los Angeles, where he and his wife (whom he married in Placerville in 1856 and who was formerly Elizabeth Rockwell, of Pennsylvania) are surrounded by all the luxuries that add to the pleasure of existence. Their two sons, as previously stated, live in Arizona; their only daughter, Ida, is the wife of M. W. Stewart and resides in Los Angeles. The family attend the Episcopal Church, of which Mrs. Hooker is a member.

During his long and active identification with the cattle interests of the west, Mr. Hooker has had many interesting experiences. A man possessing only limited powers of physical endurance could not have stood the strain of frontier life, but with his fine physique and robust constitution he has been enabled to withstand all of the hardships and is as hale and hearty at seventy and more years as are many men at fifty. His interest in stock-raising is as keen now as it has ever been, and the fact that he sells annually between four and five thousand head of cattle of his brand proves that the dimensions of his business have not decreased.

It is no uncommon sight to see four train-loads of his cattle, with eighteen cars to a train, start from Arizona for the east in the spring, while in the fall he makes shipments to the coast. In 1884 he was a delegate to St. Louis, where was held the first national gathering of cattle-growers, and he still retains his membership in the National Cattle Growers' Association. Among the people of Los Angeles he is granted that respect and esteem which a successful man merits and which are especially merited by that class of men who owe their success, not to chance or to luck, but to the exercise of the qualities with which they have been endowed.

HON. ROBERT F. JONES. The history of a town is best told in the lives of its people, particularly of those who have fostered its interests and promoted its welfare. Perhaps no name is more intimately associated with Santa Monica than that of Robert F. Jones, who, as mayor of the city and as head of several important financial and industrial enterprises, has been a constant contributor to civic progress. The family of which Mr. Jones is a member originated in Wales, where were born his great-grandparents, James and Mary (Kilson) Jones. The grandfather, Thomas, was born in England in 1793 and grew to manhood upon a country estate. Accompanied by his wife, Mary (Pugh) Jones, and their six children, in 1831 he came to America and settled in Cleveland, Ohio, where he established the granite and marble business. He won the esteem of all and his death, which occurred in Cleveland in 1870, was deeply mourned. His widow, who was born in 1802, died at the summer home of her son, United States Senator John P. Jones, in Santa Monica, Cal., when she was ninety years old.

Of the thirteen children of Thomas and Mary Jones, all lived to maturity, and seven survive, namely: Hon. John P. Jones, United States Senator from Nevada, and for years intimately associated with the development of Santa Monica, where his summer home, Miramar, is one of the most beautiful residences by the sea; Samuel L., a wealthy mine owner in Gold Hill, Nev.; Frederick K., of Detroit, Mich.; James M., a member of the bar of Cleveland, Ohio, and former judge of the court of common pleas; Mrs. Caroline E. Lester and Mrs. Cornelia Gorham, both of Santa Monica, Cal.; and Mrs. Frances A. Hamilton. The eldest child of Thomas and Mary Jones was Thomas Jones, Jr., father of Robert F. Jones. He was a man of financial and executive ability, and his standing in Cleveland was the highest. In the office of internal revenue collector of the twenty-first district, to which he was appointed, he acquitted himself with scrupulous integrity and with zeal. For several years he served as president of the city council of Cleveland.

Robert F. Jones was born in Cleveland March 27, 1847. For a time he acted as cashier under his father, who was then internal revenue collector. Largely through his efforts was effected the organization of the Merchants Banking and Storage Company of Cleveland, of which he was treasurer and manager for several years. At the same time he served as a member of the Cleveland city council. With the hope that the climate of California would prove beneficial to his health, which had become impaired through the pressure of business, in 1891 Mr. Jones came to the Pacific coast, and has since been a resident of Santa Monica. In 1893 he purchased the controlling stock of the First National Bank, which he liquidated and reorganized as a state institution under the name of the Bank of Santa Monica, April 1, 1893, being the date of the reorganization. The capital stock is $50,000, and the officers are: Robert F. Jones, president, and C. L. Bundy, secretary.

The organization of the Santa Monica Land and Water Company was completed in July, 1894, at which time the concern was incorporated with a capital stock of $1,000,000, taking in twenty-eight thousand acres and the water system of Santa Monica. The North Beach Bath House Company, of which Roy Jones is president and R. F. Jones secretary, was organized with a capital of $100,000 and has erected a bathhouse, also an auditorium with a seating capacity of fifteen hundred. These two gentlemen have also erected a bowling pavilion with eight alleys, this being the first pavilion in the county. In company with R. C. Gillis, Mr. Jones purchased the original town site now known as Sawtelle, consisting of two hundred and twenty-five acres, after which they organized the Pacific Land Company, Mr. Jones being elected secretary and treasurer of the company. They laid out the town of Sawtelle, which is situated four miles from Santa Monica, and twelve miles from Los Angeles. The site is an excellent one for a town, by reason of the proximity of the Soldiers' Home. By a law of the state, liquor can never be sold within one and one-half miles of the Home, hence Sawtelle is necessarily a prohibition town, and is thus attracting a class of people who prefer residence in a town where saloons can never be opened. So rapid was the growth of the town that the company was obliged to buy additional land. The town now contains three tracts, aggregating twelve hundred acres, viz.: the Barrett Villa tract, with two hundred and twenty-five acres; Lindsay addition, one hundred acres; Pacific farms, four hundred acres, and other adjoining lands. Under the energetic supervision of the officers the town is being established upon a solid basis and its population each year shows a gratifying increase. Probably not a little of the success is due to the fact that there are no salaried officers and no dividends paid, but all of the proceeds are put into land, real-estate and improvements, thus benefiting the community rather than enriching private individuals.

The marriage of Mr. Jones and Miss Maria Tilden, a native of Ohio, was solemnized April 3, 1873. Mrs. Jones is a daughter of Josiah S. and Matilda (Kimball) Tilden, natives respectively of Herkimer county, N. Y., and Connecticut, the latter a daughter of Alvin Kimball, a native of Connecticut and an early settler of Adrian, Mich. The paternal grandfather, Mason Tilden, of New York, became a merchant in Cleveland, and also dealt in live stock and real estate. He was well known as a skillful checker player. At the time of his death he was seventy-eight, while his wife died at sixty-two years. They were the parents of two children. Mr. and Mrs. Jones have an only daughter, Matilda Tilden Jones.

The active interest maintained in public affairs while in Cleveland has been noticeable during the residence of Mr. Jones in Santa Monica, where he was elected to the city council in 1894 and to the office of mayor in 1896. Fraternally he is connected with the National Union, Royal Arcanum (of which he has been a member for twenty-four years), Independent Order of Foresters, and was made a Mason in Southern California Lodge No. 278, F. & A. M., of which he is still a member.

JOHN McARTHUR. From the time that the now antiquated stage coach brought Mr. McArthur to Los Angeles, in February of 1869, to the present year, he has had important property interests in this city. The year after his arrival he took up one hundred and sixty acres from the government, all of which was then wild and unimproved land, but now contains within its boundaries some of the most elegant homes of Los Angeles, its northern limit being what is now Adams street, the southern extremity Jefferson street, while Western avenue formed the eastern boundary. The claim was proved up on and held by him for two years, when a portion was sold, the selling price being $30 an acre. Later the balance was disposed of at $50 an acre. He then bought ten acres on what is now Washington and Figueroa streets. This tract, like the other, was wholly unimproved. Building a home, he began the task of improving the property and setting out fruit and shade trees. As the city expanded in dimensions the land was sold in lots, but he still retains for a homestead two acres, comprising one hundred and seventy-six feet on Figueroa and three hundred and fifty-two feet on Washington street.

Of Canadian birth, Mr. McArthur was born in Glengarry county, Ontario, in 1838. His father, John, was the son of Scotch parents, but was himself a native of Glengarry county, where he spent his life in the tilling of the soil. At the age of sixteen John McArthur began to serve an apprenticeship to the carriage-making trade, in which he continued for four years. Leaving Canada in September, 1856, he took passage on the steamer Illinois for Panama, and after crossing the isthmus boarded the John L. Stevens, which landed him in San Francisco at the end of an uneventful voyage of twenty-four days. Going at once to Sacramento he found work at his trade. When the fall rains came he went to the Sonora mines, where he prospected. With the return of spring he went back to Sacramento and took up his trade. In the fall he again engaged in prospecting and mining, and for many years he alternated his trade with expeditions to the mines. At Hangtown and Placerville he owned some good claims, and he was also successful in Nevada mines. He did not discontinue mining with his advent into Southern California, but has had some important interests, and is now a member of an incorporated company, just beginning to develop mines in Orange county, this state.

Quiet and retiring in manner, but whole-souled and liberal, kind to those in trouble and staunch in his friendships, it is doubtful if Mr. McArthur has ever made an enemy during all his long life. Those who have opposed him in any business matter have nevertheless given him credit for the highest sense of honor and the most unwavering integrity. Among his associates in the Southern California Historical Society are many of his warmest friends, while all pioneers of Los Angeles county are particularly loyal in their friendships. By his marriage to Catherine Durfy, of New York, he has two daughters, Viola C. and Myrtle Agnes. The family are believers in the Unitarian doctrines and contributors to general movements for the benefit of church, educational and charitable plans. In his political belief he is independent, voting for the man rather than the party.

MRS. EMMA L. MALCOLM. Among the many interesting enterprises which interest the permanent residents and casual tourists of Long Beach none is more characteristic of the time and place than is the enterprise in the Bank of Long Beach Building, devoted to shells, taxidermy, curios, and orange-wood novelties. From earliest youth devoted to investigating the marvels of natural history as found in all parts of the world, Mrs. Malcolm is admirably adapted to her occupation. A more than local reputation is attached to her work as a taxidermist, and specimens may be found not only in the United States, but also in England and on the continent. In her collection of mounted birds the range extends from the smallest humming bird to the largest swan, and she has gathered for perpetuation examples of the feathered tribe all along between the Atlantic and Pacific. With her brothers and later with her husband she has shouldered the gun in the most inaccessible parts of the country, and many of her finest exhibits have fallen before her unerring aim. She has gathered her curios with discrimination, and the charming devices suggestive of the ocean's roar, of orange wood trees, and hosts of the air, are all that could be desired for study or pleasure.

Accompanied by her husband, Mrs. Malcolm came to the Pacific coast in 1891. Harvey C. Malcolm was born and reared in Philadelphia, Pa., and became one of the most popular hotel men in the country. He seemed to possess a particular faculty for catering to the traveling public. At different times during his career some parts of the finest hostleries between the oceans were under his management, not the least important of which were the Brunswick of New York City, the Auditorium at Chicago (which opened its doors under his control), the Metropole in Denver, Colo. (which also started out under his management), the Portland Hotel of Oregon, and the Tacoma Hotel of Washington. In 1897 Mr. Malcolm was proprietor of the Terminal Inn at Terminal Island for a year, and then went to Anaheim, where he became the owner and proprietor of the Commercial Hotel. After returning to Long Beach and perfecting a two years' lease of the Terminal Inn, his death the same year put an end to his long career as an hotel man. He was popular, and his services were typical of the best that obtains in any country in the world.

Mrs. Malcolm is a native of Montgomery county, Ohio, and since her husband's death has resided in Long Beach. As evidence of her faith in the city's future, she has invested in real-estate holdings, and owns a residence on the corner of First and Elm streets. Her admirable personal attributes have won many friends.

FRANK J. PALOMARES. To be descended from a family whose members have borne an honorable and influential part in the history of their nation is an heritage by no means to be despised. Such is the inheritance of Frank J. Palomares, of Los Angeles, who traces his lineage direct to Francisco de Palomares, governor of the castle of St. Gregory, at Oran, Spain. In the family of the governor there were six children, viz.: Esteban, who was lieutenant-colonel of the Knights of the Order of Santiago; Juan, who became governor of the castle after his father's death; Antonio, who was a judge; Jose; Eugenio, who lost his life in an attempt to overthrow the Roman Catholic religion; and Francisca, who married Diego Francisco, Knight of the Order of Santiago and governor of the plaza of Oran. The second of the sons, Juan, is remembered in history as the officer who led his men in a determined but hopeless resistance against the Turkish troops at Borchá. After almost all of his men had been slain, being no longer able to defend himself and the castle, he set fire to the powder house and blew up the castle, beneath whose ruins the dead bodies of himself and his soldiers were later found.

The first of the Palomares family in California was Christopher, who came as a sergeant in the Mexican army and afterwards became a judge in Los Angeles. In his family there were the following children: Concepcion, Barta, Rosario, Francisco, Ygnacio, Louise, Dolores, Maria Jesus and Josefa. Of this family, Ygnacio married Concepcion Lopez, and their children were Louise, Tressa, Tomas, Francisco, Manuel, Josefa, Concepcion, Caroline and Maria. The second of the sons, Francisco, at an early age secured employment as assistant on a ranch, but later became a wealthy cattleman as well as the largest land owner in the Pomona valley. At his death, in 1882, he left a wife and four children, the latter being Concepcion, Christina, Frank J. and Porfirio. The wife and mother, Lugardia Alvarado, died June 14, 1896, at the age of fifty-six years. Further mention of the family will be found in the sketch of Porfirio and Jose Dolores Palomares, the former a brother of Frank J., of this sketch.

At the old homestead near Pomona, Cal., Frank J. Palomares was born July 30, 1870. As a boy, when not attending public school he assisted on the ranch, where there was always work for an active boy to engage in. On leaving the local schools he entered St. Vincent's College, where he took a full course in book-keeping and was graduated in 1886. Next he entered Santa Clara College, expecting to take the complete course, but at the end of two years his health was such as to force an abandonment of all studies, much to his disappointment, as he was within one year of graduating. In December, 1889, he returned home, and the next month accepted a position as book-keeper in the street commissioner's office of Los Angeles county, under Col. W. D. Mulford. After having held this position six and one-half years he became cashier of the Herald Publishing Company. Eight months later the paper was sold, and he then entered into the real-estate business. A short time afterward he secured a position as head bookkeeper in the city engineer's office, where he remained for two years, and then resigned in order to accept a similar position with the American Beet Sugar Manufacturing Company at Oxnard. January 1, 1901, he returned to Los Angeles, to enter upon the duties of bookkeeper in the office of the street commissioners, which position he now fills. In 1894 he was the Democratic nominee for county auditor, and was the youngest man on the entire ticket; also had the distinction of running far ahead of the ticket in the city of Los Angeles, but the county was so overwhelmingly Republican that he failed of election.

By the marriage of Mr. Palomares to Virginia, daughter of Joseph M. Miller, he has one son, Frank J., Jr. Another son, Charles A., died at the age of six months. The family are identified with the Roman Catholic Church. In fraternal relations Mr. Palomares is a member of the Woodmen of the World, Elks, Native Sons of the Golden West, and in Masonry belongs to East Gate Lodge No. 290, F. & A. M., and Los Angeles Chapter No. 33, R. A. M.

WILLIAM M. OSBORN. A noteworthy position among the pioneers of Los Angeles is held by Mr. Osborn, of No. 1345 Albany street. He was born in Chenango county, N. Y., October 30, 1834, but at the age of three years was taken to Illinois, where his father, Archibald, became a pioneer farmer near Princeton, Bureau county, remaining in that locality until his death at sixty-five years. During the existence of the Whig party he had been one of its staunch upholders, and upon its disintegration he identified himself with the newly organized Republican party. The boyhood years of William M. were uneventfully passed on the home farm, which he assisted in placing under cultivation. Desirous of seeking his livelihood in the west, where he believed opportunities to be greater than in Illinois, in 1855 he came to the Pacific coast via the isthmus. Like all newcomers during the '50s, he considered mining the only industry possible in California, and accordingly he hastened to Downeyville, where for three years he prosecuted the work of a miner. However, the results were less gratifying than he had anticipated, so he abandoned his claim and came to Los Angeles, his first visit here being in 1858. The then sleepy Spanish town did not especially attract him, so he went elsewhere, but in 1861 returned to Los Angeles. Here he bought teams and began teaming and freighting from different points in California to Arizona, conducting the business with such success that he finally acquired one hundred and twenty-one horses and twenty-four wagons, all of which were in constant use. An entire month was consumed in making a round trip between the points on his route. Not only was the journey a long one, but it was not without danger as well, for Indians were very numerous and gave frequent instances of hostility. On selling his outfit to the Sierra Gorda Freighting Company, he opened a livery and also engaged in the harness manufacturing business. His connection with the latter business was unexpected to himself. He was obliged to take, on a security debt, a harness shop on Fifth street between Broadway and Hill, and, not being able to dispose of it to advantage, took up the management of the same himself, and has continued the same to the present time. During early days he bought for $300 the lot where the Chamber of Commerce now stands, and this he later sold for $1,800, investing the proceeds in his present property on the corner of Fifth and Broadway. Here he built a livery barn and conducted business in the renting and sale of horses until September, 1901, when he sold his equipment and rented the building.

In San Bernardino county Mr. Osborn married Miss Rosetta Baldwin, who was born there April 10, 1853. The year before she was born her parents, Robert and Rosanna Baldwin, crossed the plains from the east (her father having been originally from England), and settled at San Bernardino, entering one hundred and sixty-five acres of land and engaging in the stock business, making a specialty of hogs. On that ranch Mr. Baldwin died when fifty-eight years of age, and his wife when sixty-two. The children of Mr. and Mrs. Osborn are as follows: Rose, Mrs. F. W. Putnam, of Vermont; Maude, who died in infancy; William, who was seven at the time of his death; George, a farmer near Riverside, Cal.; Arthur, a twelve-year-old boy, now attending school; and Donald, also a pupil in local schools.

Through the influence of his wife, who is an enthusiastic believer in the principles of socialism, Mr. Osborn has been converted to that political belief. During his early residence in Los Angeles he served for one term as a member of the city council, and in 1887 he was honored by election as county supervisor, which office he filled carefully and well. Like all pioneers, he has the greatest faith in the prosperity and growth of Los Angeles and believes that it is destined ultimately to be the queen of all the cities on the sunset sea.

LOUIS PHILLIPS. During the half century of his residence in Los Angeles county Mr. Phillips not only secured large landed holdings, but also gained a warm place in the esteem of the people and a wide acquaintance among the pioneers. His birth occurred in 1831, in Prussia, Germany, and there he received his early knowledge of books, at the same time receiving such home training as would fit him for a life of usefulness. In 1848 he accompanied a brother to New York, and the following year, at the time of the rush to the gold fields of California, he joined the emigrant throngs. Instead of trying his luck in the mines, as he had planned, he and his brother opened a small store in San Francisco, using for their quarters a building that boasted a board front, but was otherwise constructed of canvas. The next year they

By purchase in 1853 Louis Phillips acquired large holdings on the San Gabriel river, and there for ten years he engaged in raising cattle. On selling that property in 1863 he came to Spadra, where for a time he was engaged in cattle raising. In 1866 he purchased twelve thousand acres of the San José ranch, much of which was as fine land as could be found in the valley. Later he sold enough of the tract to clear the balance of indebtedness, and from that time onward his progress and prosperity were uninterrupted. His neighbors were few and, as a rule, of Spanish extraction, while he was a typical German in his tastes, disposition and views; yet his friendship for them was strong and unwavering, and their confidence in his honor was not misplaced. On his broad acres horses and cattle grazed, at times as many as five thousand head of cattle and three thousand head of horses bearing his brand. However, after he had sold a considerable portion of the land, it seemed best for him to give his attention to sheep rather than to the other stock, and in the raising of these he was equally successful. Aside from a small vineyard, all of the land was utilized for grazing purposes. At the time he purchased the ranch it was improved with a two-story adobe building, the largest and most elaborate in the country round about. The entire house was surrounded by a wide veranda, and, as was the custom in those days, the stairs were on the outside. For some years he made his home here, but later erected a handsome residence, which was surrounded by citrus and deciduous trees of all kinds in abundance. A new vineyard yielded large harvests of luscious grapes. In early days an abundance of water was secured from a large pond fed by springs, but eventually the boring of artesian wells in the valley dried up the springs and forced him to drill for water and build a reservoir. At the time of his death he owned six thousand acres of the San José ranch, besides business properties in the cities of Los Angeles and Pomona.

Fraternally Mr. Phillips was connected with the Odd Fellows, being a charter member of Pomona Lodge No. 246. In his political sympathies he was a Republican. Upon the establishment of the office in Spadra he was appointed postmaster in 1866 and served acceptably. In religious views he was liberal. In 1868 he was united in marriage with Miss Esther Blake, daughter of William Blake, a native of New York City, who came to California about 1875 and engaged in the real estate business, dying in 1898, when eighty-four years of age; his wife was killed in a runaway accident when she was fifty-five. Of their eight children, Mrs. Phillips is the sole survivor. She was born near Quincy, Ill., and came to California in girlhood. In all of her husband's enterprises she was a faithful helpmate and co-worker, and not a little of his success is to be attributed to her wise judgment and economical direction of household affairs. Their marriage was one of mutual helpfulness and happiness until broken by the death of Mr. Phillips, which occurred at his home March 16, 1900. One of his sons, Charles B., is deceased; the other children are living, viz.: Nellie B., who married Frank George, and has two sons, Frank C. and Ralph P.; Louis R., who married Esther E. Way; and George S., who married Irene R. Dudley, and has two children, Adelaide Louise and Louis Dudley.

SCHEE BROS. Through their several enterprises, notably those connected with horticulture and general farming, Walter S. and William F. Schee, partners under the title of Schee Bros., have become well known in the vicinity of Santa Monica and, indeed, throughout Los Angeles county. They are sons of William Fulton and Mary (Meyers) Schee, natives respectively of Delaware and Ohio. The ancestry of the Schee family is traced back to England, whence some of the name came to America at an early day and settled in Delaware. During the Revolutionary war several of the name bore arms in defense of American liberty. On settling near Uhrichsville, Ohio, William Fulton Schee turned his attention to millwrighting, and also built boats for the Ohio river and canal. Some years later he removed to Iowa and settled on a farm near Oskaloosa, where he was extensively engaged in general farming and the stock business. In 1892 he came to California and settled in Los Angeles county. Here he improved forty-seven acres, making of the tract one of the finest orange groves in the region. At this homestead he died in the fall of 1898. By his first wife, who died in Iowa, he had eight children, namely: John, who died in Iowa at the age of twenty-one years; Mrs. Isabelle Gay, of Redlands, Cal.; Mrs. Ella Elliott, of Los Angeles; Mrs. Lurana Shroyer, who died in Redlands; Walter S.; Mary Ida, Mrs. Reeves, of Santa Monica; William F., and James Everett Schee, who is a cattleman in Wyoming. The second wife of William Fulton Schee bore the maiden name of Rebecca Ross, and was born in Ohio. Two children were born of their union, namely: Mrs. Olive Copeland, of Redlands; and George, who is a horticulturist at Redlands.

The two brothers, Walter S. and William F., were natives respectively of Ohio and Iowa, and grew to manhood upon an Iowa farm, meantime receiving common-school advantages. In 1889 they came to California and for two years leased land on the Santenel. Their next venture was the leasing of a part of the San Jacinto rancho at Santa Monica, where they have since engaged in raising stock and general farm products. In addition, they lease and cultivate the Malibu rancho. It is probable that they are the largest individual farmers in Los Angeles county. The success they have achieved is merited by industry, perseverance and determination. They are progressive farmers, anxious to avail themselves of all modern machinery and improvements in farming. Among the implements on their place is a combination header and thresher, to which they hitch forty head of horses and mules. The grain is cut from the stalk, and in a very few moments runs out as grain, from the other side of the machine. With the help of this one machine they frequently gather as much as seven hundred bushels in a day. The raising of stock forms one of their main industries, and a portion of the grain produced on their land is utilized for feed, in which way it brings a larger profit to the enterprising proprietors than if sold in the market.

In 1890 the brothers became identified with the horticultural industry at Redlands. Buying an eighty-acre tract, they set it out in navel oranges, and their grove is today conceded to be one of the finest in the state. While it is under the ditch, they have developed water on the land by sinking a well which yields a flow sufficient to irrigate the entire ranch, if necessary. This they did on account of the water becoming low in the ditch during the few dry years, and, not wishing to run any chances, they deemed it best to sink the well. Besides their other enterprises, they have copper and silver interests at Chloride, Ariz. In politics both are Republicans. Fraternally Walter S. is a Mason and William F. is connected with the Royal Arcanum.

R. M. FURLONG. The genealogy of the Furlong family can be traced back to Norman ancestors who accompanied William the Conqueror to England. Later generations bore an honorable part in the subsequent history of the British Isles and aided in giving England a foremost place in the galaxy of nations. When Walter Furlong was a boy he removed with his parents to Ireland, where he became a land owner and gentleman farmer of county Wexford. His son, John, was born and reared in that country, and when a young man visited America, with which he was so pleased that he decided to locate permanently in this country. Returning to his native land, he married Mary Dalton, who was born in county Wexford, her father, John Dalton, having been the son of an Englishman who owned large estates in Wexford.

Accompanied by his wife, John Furlong came to America and settled in Illinois, buying a tract of raw land now within the city limits of Springfield. This property he broke, cleared and improved, and devoted to general farming. In later days the growth of Springfield made the land too valuable for agricultural purposes, and it was divided into building lots. Both he and his wife are deceased, and their homestead is now occupied by a son, Walter. Another son, James, is engaged in the mercantile business in Springfield, while the only daughter is also a resident of Illinois, the youngest son, R. M., being the only member of the family on the Pacific coast. He was born in Springfield December 24, 1857, and received his education in the grammar and high schools of Springfield and South Bend (Ind.) University. Before graduating from the university he discontinued studies there in order to take up law under Robbins, Knapp & Schutt, of Springfield, with whom he remained until he was admitted to the bar. His examination was creditably passed, but being under twenty-one years of age his license was withheld until he had reached the age stipulated by law. Afterwards he spent two years in Europe, traveling over the British Isles and through the continent.

Shortly after his return to the United States Mr. Furlong came to California on a pleasure trip and sight-seeing expedition, and among other towns visited Pasadena, intending merely to spend a few days here. However, the invigorating climate, cultured people and ideal surroundings proved a charm too strong to be resisted, and he at once decided that Pasadena should be his future home, nor have subsequent years changed his opinion of the place. Indeed, like other citizens, a long identification with the city's interests only adds to his fondness for his adopted home. Besides practicing law he has had various mining interests and has invested in a few companies which his conservative judgment believes will prove dividend paying. On the incorporation of Pasadena he was a member of its first board of trustees and, as chairman of the ordinance committee, had charge of the drawing up of the ordinance that was adopted by the city, and was instrumental in the passing of the prohibition ordinance still in force. He is a member of the Board of Trade. Reared under Democratic influences, he early became an adherent of that party and has continued firm in his allegiance to its principles. In local politics he has rendered good service as a member of the county central Democratic committee and the executive committee of the same. Fraternally he is connected with the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks. His marriage, in St. Louis, Mo., united him with Miss Ida B. Porter, daughter of William Porter, a Virginian by birth, but throughout active life a planter of Kentucky, where she was born and reared.

JOHN F. CONNELL. The chief engineer for the Stimson estate of Los Angeles was born July 20, 1859, in a humble cottage on the banks of Lake Michigan, in Manitowoc county, Wis. He was the fourth among the ten children of J. F. and Margaret (Ryan) Connell, natives of Ireland. His father came to America at ten years of age and settled in Wisconsin, where he engaged in farming during much of his active life, dying when sixty-five years of age. The mother, who was born in county Limerick, August 15, 1823, came to the United States in girlhood, and in 1849 was married in Milwaukee, Wis. Her death occurred at eighty-three years of age.

After receiving a common-school education, John F. Connell worked for two years on his father's farm. While packing shingles in a mill near by he first became interested in machinery. For two years he worked as fireman and assistant engineer in the mill, then entered a local machine shop to learn the machinist's trade. Two and one-half years later he entered the blacksmith's department to gain a knowledge of the working of iron and the quality of the same. After a year in that department, he was for three years first assistant engineer in a large flour mill, and at the end of that time opened a shop of his own near the old homestead for the manufacture of agricultural implements. In this he was successful, and continued until the winter of 1888, when the failure of his health caused him to dispose of his business and seek California. Here he soon regained his health and took a position as engineer in a sash and blind factory at San Jacinto. One year later he became chief engineer and master mechanic with the San Jacinto Box and Lumber Company, which position he filled until the entire plant was destroyed by fire in the fall of 1891. A few months later he was appointed superintendent to erect a new modern mill, and this position he held until the fall of 1892, when the financial affairs of the company became so involved that he tendered his resignation.

Removing to Los Angeles, Mr. Connell secured employment as engineer with the Los Angeles Lighting Company. In the spring of 1893 he resigned in order to take charge of the erecting of the machinery of the Stimson block, then under course of construction. After all of the machinery was in place and the building complete, he was engaged as regular engineer, and continued in this capacity until the spring of 1898. He was then granted leave of absence to enable him to erect the new and modern power plant in the Douglas building. On the completion of the contract he was appointed chief engineer for the entire Stimson estate to remodel the entire power plant of the various buildings and connect them with one central station. Taking up this task, he submitted plans and specifications and was directed to proceed with the work at once. The construction of a tunnel under large, heavy buildings like the Stimson and Douglas is a novel piece of engineering and requires great skill. Much has been written and published by the press from time to time concerning this work, and it has been often said that the engineer's plan could be followed to advantage by owners of hotels and office buildings.

Concerning the engine room of the Douglas we quote the following, which appeared in a daily paper soon after the erection of the building:

"The engine room was designed on the lines of the engine room of the famous battleship Oregon. The dimensions of the room are 46x60, twenty-two-foot ceiling, and it is situated in the rear of the basement. A subterranean passage one hundred feet long, six feet in the clear, extends under the cellars of the tenants to the front of the building, where it connects with the elevators and front entrance to the building. The room is equipped with two horizontal tubular boilers, manufactured by the Gem City Boiler Company of Dayton, Ohio, of one hundred horse power each, fitted with full flush fronts and ornamented with stars and shields. The safety valves on the boilers are of a new design, used almost exclusively on all new American warships.

"The most novel feature in the equipment of the room is the oil-burning system in an arrangement which makes it possible to replenish the supply of oil while the machinery is in full operation. The method was developed by Mr. Connell, the patentee, who also was the first engineer to burn crude oil successfully in office buildings, five years ago in the Stimson block, which has been in continual operation ever since, and is now used in every office building and hotel in the city."

The most recent enterprise of Mr. Connell was the installation of a cross compound Corliss pumping engine, which contains more new and modern improvements than any engine yet built for the purpose. Many of these improvements represent ideas of Mr. Connell. It is characteristic of him that he has always favored any change of working plans which he believes to be judicious and helpful. For some time he was the only local engineer who upheld the hydraulic elevator system instead of electric power, and it is now noticeable that the large plants at present have adopted hydraulic power. He is a charter member of California Stationary Engineers No. 2, of the National Association, and for several years served as its financial secretary. In 1896 he organized the employment department, of which he was secretary until 1898. Fraternally he is connected with Golden Rule Lodge No. 160, I. O. O. F., and is also a member of the Maccabees. In politics he is a free thinker and invariably casts his ballot for the candidate he believes to be best qualified for office, regardless of party ties. June 24, 1894, he was united in marriage with Miss Mamie E. Craig, a native of San Francisco.

E. S. CORDERO. One of the most worthy representatives of the old Spanish pioneers of California is E. S. Cordero, extensively engaged in the stock raising business in Santa Barbara county, and the owner of five thousand acres of country land, besides valuable possessions in the city of Santa Barbara. The family emigrant from Spain was the paternal grandfather, Mariano Cordero, who first settled in Mexico, and practiced his craft of tailoring, later removing to Santa Barbara, where he labored for the Franciscan Fathers. Joan J., the father of E. S., was born in Santa Barbara in June of 1801, and became a large land owner and rancher, his land being a portion of the Las Cruces rancho, upon which he continued until his death at the age of seventy-eight years. He married Maria Antonia Ballenzinllo, who was born in Santa Barbara, a daughter of Enosio Ballenzinllo, a native of Mexico, and an early settler in Santa Barbara county. Mrs. Cordero, who died in Santa Barbara, was the mother of thirteen children, seven of whom are living, E. S. being third of these.

Upon his father's portion of Las Cruces rancho E. S. Cordero was born December 8, 1838. He attended the schools of Santa Barbara. From his earliest youth he was familiar with ranching, and materially aided his father in the management of his large interests up to the time of the latter's death. He then bought a portion of the ranch, about two thousand acres, and he is now the owner also of the Na Jaue ranch, of over three thousand acres, making in all over five thousand acres of ranch land. Besides cattle he raises large numbers of horses and hogs, the original ranch being devoted to a dairy and hogs, and the later acquisition to cattle and horses. He raises only the best improved stock, his brand being TC. He is one of the oldest stock raisers in this part of the county, and ships large numbers to Santa Barbara and Los Angeles. He is a Democrat in politics, and is a member of the Santa Barbara Parlor, 116, Native Sons of the Golden West. Mr. Cordero is a public spirited gentleman, and has played his part in the development of the county in which he takes such justifiable pride. He is foremost among the stock men of the county, and enjoys a reputation for fairness and sterling business integrity.

The pleasant home of Mr. Cordero is presided over by his wife, formerly Miss Ortego, who was born in Santa Barbara. Four children are the result of this union: Mariana, who is the wife of James Donahue, of Highland, Cal.; E. F., who is ranching with his father; Evaristo, and Juan, who are assistants in the management and care of the ranching interests.

FRANK B. CLARK. Added to a successful career in California as an agriculturist and discerning business man, Mr. Clark has dignified and broadened his life by courageous service during the Civil war, during which period of strife he served his country for four years and four months. Although the war records designate him as captain of Company K, Twenty-first Infantry, he nevertheless served as a private in the beginning, and saw service both in infantry and artillery. Owing to impaired health from the vicissitudes of war, he sought to improve his general condition by removal to the west, which he accomplished in 1869, and the following year settled in Hyde Park. His good management and thrift may be judged of when it is known that from a purchase of eighty acres of land, his possessions have increased to two hundred and fifty acres, and from untilled inactivity to fine alfalfa and general farming land. A more ideal rural abode it were hard to find, for Mr. Clark has erected a beautiful home, and has a small village of barns and outhouses, besides varied adornment in the shape of verdure, including palms and fine shade trees, the latter having grown from small saplings to producers of grateful and spreading shade. Upon the original land was found the walls for an adobe house, and upon these was placed a roof, doors were added and windows, and here the family lived and prospered until about twelve years ago, when the present well planned and more than ordinarily convenient house was erected. The adobe house is now used as shelter for the employes who are required to carry on the different departments of the farm. About twelve years ago the Santa Fe Railroad was built through the property, and this, combined with the lumber yard erected on the place, and the manifold activities ever in operation, produce upon the visitor a business like impression remote from the general order of farming.

The average output of the farm besides general farming is two hundred acres of alfalfa, which is baled on the place and shipped in large quantities to Los Angeles and Pasadena. Mr. Clark also owns other property in the county, and has a store in Hyde Park, which is rented out. In 1888 he married Lizzie S. Leach, a native of Vermont, Mr. Clark having been born in Connecticut. The only living child of this union is Clarence, who is ably assisting his father in the management of his ranch. Mr. Clark is a Republican in politics, and is a member of the Grand Army of the Republic. His general admirable characteristics, his devotion to his home, and to all that broadens and enobles life, is best illustrated by his act in erecting the Congregational church, at Hyde Park, to the memory of his daughter, Cora Clark, who died at the age of sixteen years. This edifice is now used as a union church, and is a standing monument to a father's devotion, and a citizen's appreciation of how best to combine an interest in the past with the best good of the present.

JOHN J. BLEECKER, M. D. Descended from the sturdy old Knickerbocker stock so intimately associated with the early development of New York, Dr. Bleecker, of Pasadena, is the inheritor of mental and physical endowments that are his heritage from a colonial ancestry. For successive generations the family has given to the nation men of high patriotism and noble qualities. Among its most gifted representatives was the doctor's grandfather, Hon. John Anthony Bleecker, who was born in New York City, and became a leading attorney and prominent jurist; also served as a member of the state assembly. His last years were spent in Whippany, Morris county, N. J. He had a brother, James, who was one of the most successful of New York's bankers and brokers.

Born and reared in Morristown, N. J., John J. Bleecker, Sr., the doctor's father, became a physician of Cincinnati, Ohio, and later engaged in practice at Canton, Ill., where he died in 1879. He is survived by his widow, Rosanna, who at the age of sixty-nine years is making her home with her son in Pasadena. She was born in Preble county, Ohio, her father, Jeremiah Bader, having come there from Germany and settled upon a farm. Later he removed to Schuyler county, Ill., and from there to Fulton county, where he died. To the marriage of John J. and Rosanna Bleecker there were born three sons and two daughters who are now living. There was also a son by a former marriage, William H. Bleecker, M. D., who served in a New York regiment during the Civil war.

While his parents were living in Cincinnati, Ohio, John J. Bleecker, Jr., was born November 20, 1852. In 1859 he accompanied the family to Astoria, Ill., and later attended school in Schuyler county, Ill. To secure the necessary funds for his medical education he taught school, first in Illinois, and then at Liberty Union, Ind. As soon as he had saved sufficient to defray his expenses in school, he entered the Chicago Homeopathic Medical College and continued there until his graduation in February, 1885. Immediately afterward he opened an office in Bushnell, Ill., but two years later found him in the new town of Pasadena, Cal., where he has since engaged in the practice of medicine and surgery. Meantime he has taken two courses in his alma mater and two in the Chicago Post-Graduate College, it being his ambition to keep in touch with the latest developments in therapeutics. Discoveries are constantly being made in the science of materia medica, and these he keeps conversant with, studying them closely in order to select those which he deems practicable. He is a member of the California State Homeopathic Medical Society. In his practice, as in politics, he is inclined to be independent, selecting what is best in every school. The success with which he is meeting is merited by years of conscientious study and painstaking practice.

In Rushville, Ill., Dr. Bleecker married Miss Mary Creighton, who was born in East Liverpool, Ohio, a daughter of Ezekiel Creighton. She died in Pasadena in September, 1889, and afterward Dr. Bleecker was united with Miss Annie Boynton, a native of Worcester, Mass. He has one son, Robert Boynton, and one daughter, Averick Eveanna. While in Astoria, Ill., he was made a Mason, and is now connected with Corona Lodge, F. & A. M. In the Pasadena lodge of Odd Fellows he is past noble grand. Another organization in which he holds membership is the Ancient Order of United Workmen. Through his service as a member of the board of health he has done good service in behalf of his home city. However, his preference is for private practice rather than positions of public prominence that are the gift of his party. In religion he is connected with the Presbyterian Church.

B. O. SPRAGUE. At an early period in the history of America the Sprague family became identified with its growth, and during the colonial period various representatives were influential among the citizens of Boston. The services of Richard T. Sprague in public life were recognized in his appointment as United States consul to Gibraltar, and while living there his son, Richard Tucker Sprague, was born. Returning to America, the family resumed residence in Boston, where Richard T. was reared, educated and married, and where also his son, B. O., was born and passed the years of childhood. In 1890 the family came to California, where the son had the advantage of three years of study in Leland Stanford University. He possessed an eager and ambitious disposition, less inclined for professional career than for business activities. On leaving school he entered the refinery of the American Sugar Refining Company in San Francisco, securing a position as assistant chemist and sugar boiler. Ambitious to acquire a thorough knowledge of the business, he worked in every department, and each position he filled with intelligence and energy.

After two years in San Francisco, Mr. Sprague entered the employ of the American Beet Sugar Company, and in July, 1899, came to Oxnard, where he has since made his home.

For a time he was foreman of the sugar house, from which position he was promoted to be assistant superintendent, assuming charge of the night work. In addition, he acts as general assistant of the day watches, if duty renders it necessary. His thorough knowledge of the sugar business in all of its details makes his services of the greatest value to the company, and without doubt future years will bring him increasing successes along the line of his chosen occupation. He is not active in politics and has shown no desire to enter official life, but gives his allegiance to the Republican party and sustains its principles as they concern national affairs. He is a member of the college fraternity Sigma Nu.

AVERY BELCHER. Long Beach is singularly fortunate in being the home of a number of women whose business capacity is not surpassed by the opposite sex, and who also possess culture and refinement. Such an one is Mrs. Theresa Belcher, widow of Avery Belcher, and one of the most enthusiastic residents of this promising town. Avery Belcher, a man of leading characteristics, pioneer of Montana, and the possessor of wealth acquired in mining, cattle-raising and banking, inherited his sterling traits from a worthy English ancestry, whose connection with the historical events of their country was by no means immaterial. He was born in Berkshire, England, November 6, 1829, and when twenty years of age came to America with his parents and settled in Michigan, where the father died the following year. From Michigan the son went to Illinois and engaged in farming, and continued the same occupation after removing to Audubon county, Iowa, in 1855. When the gold craze was at its height in 1861 he went to Pike's Peak overland with horse teams, and experienced the average failure and success while mining in Black Hawk and Central and Russell gulches. After his marriage in 1863 he removed to Montana, which state was to prove the field of his greatest activity and most substantial accomplishment. The journey was undertaken from Denver with ox-teams and wagons, via Fort Bridge, Soda Springs and Alder Gulch, and in 1864 he engaged in ranching and stock-raising on the Ruby river, near Virginia City, Mont. He had a fine range and large numbers of cattle, but in time sold out his interest and removed to near Helena, the same state, and later to Milk River and Bear Paw. He was also somewhat interested in mining in Montana, and out of his abundance acquired from cattle investments organized the Bank of Boulder, of which he was president as long as he remained in the state. He was also one of those who organized the Bear Paw Pool, in which about a dozen large cattlemen were interested, formed for the purpose of mutual assistance in the handling of their cattle. The remainder of these men are still in the cattle business.

In 1881 Mr. Belcher took a trip from Fort Benton down the river to Iowa, and in 1893-4 first familiarized himself with the great chances existing in Southern California. From then on he made several trips back to this part of the state, and in 1898 so arranged his affairs in Montana as to enable him to take up his residence in Long Beach. He soon became interested in the affairs of the town, invested heavily in real estate and general property, and was keenly alive to the advantages awaiting the investor. His death, July 5, 1901, terminated a career of immense vitality. He was a typical westerner in thought, heart and enterprise, and his struggles and victories in the heart of the desolate and wild Montana regions bespeak an enormous amount of courage and shrewd common sense. In politics he was a Democrat, but was by no means radical, and his affairs were always too numerous to permit of his participating to any great extent in local political affairs.

The marriage of Avery Belcher and Theresa Earley occurred in Exira, Audubon county, Iowa, March 14, 1863. Mrs. Belcher was born in New Hope, Ohio, and is a daughter of Leonard Earley, born near Georgetown, Ohio, and a merchant and manufacturer at New Hope. In 1855 Mr. Earley removed to Henry county, Iowa, and engaged in farming, but in 1895 located in Exira, which is still his home. He is at present retired from active business or farming life, and is greatly interested in promoting the cause of education. He is fraternally an Odd Fellow. His father, Thomas Earley, was born in Maryland, became a stock raiser in Ohio, and met a tragic death in Texas, where he was murdered by the son of Governor Isaac Desha of Kentucky. He had gone to Texas from New Orleans with the proceeds of a flatboat load of farm products, from Brown county, Ohio. While in Texas he was murdered by Desha, whose father had just pardoned his wayward son for a wilful murder. The wife of Thomas Earley, formerly Mary Stephens, died in Highland county, Ohio, in 1848. The mother of Mrs. Belcher, Catherine (Fiscus) Earley, was born in Ohio, and was a daughter of Abraham Fiscus, who, with his wife, was a native of Pennsylvania. Mrs. Earley, who died in Ohio, was the mother of one son and four daughters, of whom Mrs. Belcher is the oldest. Mrs. Mary McConnell died in March of 1901; William Worth is a miner in the Big Horn Basin in Wyoming, and Sarah Ann lives in Harrison county, Iowa.

Mrs. Belcher was reared in Iowa and was educated in the public schools, and since her husband's death has carried out his plans in regard to the management of his numerous affairs. She is an enthusiastic resident of this city, where she has many friends, and where her standing is an enviable one. She is a member of various clubs in the town, and her experience with human nature has developed an innate tact peculiarly her own, and of immense value to her in the conduct of her affairs. It is doubtful if any private individual in the state has a finer collection of shells than has Mrs. Belcher, and she has made a curtain of snail shells, and also one of clam shells, which have elicited great admiration from all who have been permitted to see them. Mrs. Belcher has one daughter, Clara Nevada, who was educated at Hillsdale College, Michigan, and who is now living with her mother.

LEWIS WILLIAM STEVENS. As president of the Santa Monica Surf and Ocean Boat-house Company, which he incorporated in 1896, Mr. Stevens is well known to the thousands of visitors whom the fame of this ocean resort annually draws hither. In the sale of fish to Los Angeles, Riverside and San Francisco, he has also built up an important business. Not only does he manufacture his nets and tackle, but even his boats, and he is the inventor of the Stevens surf and lifeboat, patented in 1898. The first boat of this kind proved so successful that he has since made a second and larger one. The plan of operating the boat is on the cable system, which enables the boatman to control the boat as a man controls the movements of a horse. In 1900 he took the boat to Nome, Alaska, and engaged in the transfer business, taking baggage and passengers from the ship to the shore through the surf. He remained during the season and then returned home. Besides these boats, he has various pleasure and fish boats which he rents.

In Monroe, Mich., L. W. Stevens was born February 4, 1844, and was the fourth among six children (four sons and two daughters), four of whom are now living. His father, O. P. Stevens, a native of New York, and a pioneer of Monroe, Mich., built the first saw and grist mill in Monroe, for which work he was fitted by a previous experience in building and operating a mill on Swan creek, the present site of Toledo, Ohio. Returning to Ohio, he settled in Cleveland and engaged in the milling business until his retirement. He died there when seventy-six years old. His wife, Sally R., was born in Bangor, Me., and went with her father to Toledo, Ohio, later to Monroe, Mich., where her father and husband were partners in milling.

When four years of age L. W. Stevens was taken by his parents to Cleveland, Ohio, and there his education was obtained. At the age of fourteen he began sailing on the lake's as a cabin boy, from which he rose to the rank of seaman. In August, 1862, he enlisted in Company E, One Hundred and Third Ohio Infantry, and was sent to Kentucky, where he was transferred to the Mississippi squadron, U. S. N., as seaman on the Petrel. He bore a part in the siege of Vicksburg, and afterward was transferred to the Juliet, same squadron, engaged in patrolling the river. After being honorably discharged at Vicksburg he went to Chicago and became mate on a lake boat. Later he was captain and then owner of the Franklin, a schooner in the coasting trade, continuing with the same until the boat was lost by its mate. His next venture was in the fishing business at Put-in-Bay Island. About 1884 he came to California, and after a year in Los Angeles came to Santa Monica, where he took up the fishing business. During 1886 he went to San Diego, where he carried on a confectionery business, and also owned and operated a ranch of one hundred and sixty acres on Bernardo creek. Returning to Santa Monica in 1894, he has continued here in the fishing business ever since, and was the first to introduce gill net fishing for halibut, a scheme that has proved very successful. He is married, his wife having formerly been Miss M. J. Stebbins, of Cincinnati, Ohio. Fraternally he is connected with the Ancient Order of United Workmen and the Grand Army Post in San Diego.

JULIUS H. ARDIS. Remotely of Scotch-Irish and German extraction, the more recent representatives of the Ardis family have been allied with the history of the south. The leading attorney of Downey, whose name introduces this article, is of southern birth, having been born at Eldorado, Ark., May 11, 1863. His father, John C., born in Germany in 1823, was reared in that state and Alabama, where in early manhood he engaged in the profession of law, but later entered the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal Church South. Removing to Arkansas, he took up teaching, which he followed some years. However, the confinement of the occupation proved injurious to his health, and having learned that California was a health-restoring region he came to the Pacific coast July 28, 1868. There was little to attract a permanent settler save the charm of scenery and climate. No improvements had been attempted in the vicinity of Downey. Great stretches of land seemed worthless except as pastures for stock. Neither grass nor trees relieved the monotony of the landscape. With a keen intuition as to the possibilities of the soil, he was not discouraged by its appearance, but at once bought twenty-five acres one-half mile west of Downey and set about the improvement of the land, which is now in walnuts. A later purchase comprised thirty acres, but this was soon sold, subsequent to which he bought another forty-acre tract at El Monte. Nine years passed busily and happily in his new home, where his life ended, December 24, 1877. Though not spared to old age, he yet accomplished more than some men to whom longer life is granted. As a practicing attorney, as a member of the Arkansas state legislature for two years, as preacher and teacher, he lived a helpful, useful, active life, and rendered many services in behalf of his fellowmen. His education had been obtained in Emory College at Oxford, Ga., added to which he had a broad mind, fluent command of language and the ready resources of a public speaker, all combined with the high character and deep devotion of a Christian preacher and educator.

The wife of John C. Ardis was Fannie A. Harris, who was born in Alabama, received an excellent education in the Female College at LaGrange, Ga., and still makes her home on the property they purchased in 1868. Like her husband, she has been consistent in her devotion to the church. Of her eleven children, the following survive: John D., a rancher at Downey; Isaac L., who lives at Downey, and cultivates an orchard at Banning; Sallie A., wife of A. S. Gray, a rancher at Downey; Lida T., the widow of William T. Crawford, and who has taught in the public schools of Downey for fourteen years; Julius H., attorney-at-law, of Downey; William M., who is with a wholesale leather house in Los Angeles; and Julia, wife of J. H. McCullough, a blacksmith and dealer in implements at Downey.

When the family came to California, Julius H. was four years of age. In 1884 he was sent back to the south, entering Emory College, of which his father had been a student years before. From that institution he was graduated in 1888, with the degree of A. B., under Dr. Isaac Hopkins. Instead of returning to California, he entered a law office in Atlanta, Ga., where he studied Blackstone for a year. Going thence to Sheffield, Ala., in 1890, he remained for a year in professional work, and then came to Downey, where he has since built up a growing and important practice in all of the courts. In addition to the management of an extensive clientele, he has been prominent in the Democratic party, and in 1901 served as chairman of the county convention. Chosen as his party's nominee for the legislature in 1896, he made a splendid run, but a split in the party caused the success of the opponents. Besides his private practice, he acts as attorney for the Arroyo Ditch and Water Company, and also for the Los Nietos Valley Bank of Downey. Fraternally he is connected with the Foresters, Masons, Eastern Star, Knights of Pythias, Fraternal Brotherhood, and Maccabees.

Through his marriage to Miss Mamie Haygood, Mr. Ardis became connected with one of the leading families of the south. Mrs. Ardis is a daughter of the late Bishop Atticus G. Haygood, who was born at Watkinsville, Ga., November 19, 1839, and at twenty years of age was graduated from Emory College at Oxford, Ga. Immediately after graduating he was licensed to preach in the Methodist Episcopal denomination, and entered upon ministerial work, in which he achieved noteworthy success. In 1876 he was called to the presidency of Emory College. He found his alma mater, which was an old Methodist institution, established in 1838, suffering from the effects of the Civil war, with only one hundred and ten students, and carrying the burden of a heavy debt. With an energy characteristic of the man he at once began the task of reducing the work to a systematic basis, and so notable was his success that, when he resigned in 1884, the institution had three hundred and fourteen students, all of the burdensome debts had been lifted, many improvements had been made and a large endowment fund had been raised. Meantime from 1878 to 1882, he also acted as editor of the Wesleyan Christian Advocate, a leading denominational paper. In 1882 he was raised to the office of bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, in the general conference at Nashville, Tenn., but not wishing at that time to leave the college, he declined the honor. Again, in 1890, at the conference held in St. Louis, Mo., the same honor was tendered him, and he accepted, serving as bishop until his death, in January, 1896. In 1885 he was appointed general manager of the John F. Slater fund of $1,000,000 for the education of the colored youth of the southern states. In spite of his varied duties as editor, educator, manager of trust funds, bishop, etc., he still found time to write for the press and also to prepare numerous works for publication. Wielding a ready pen and having a message for the people, some of his happiest moments were spent in his study, in literary work. Among the works of which he was the author may be mentioned "Our Brothers in Black," "The Monk and Prince," "Sermons and Speeches," "Jack Knife and Brambles," "Our Children," "Pleas for Progress" and "The Man of Galilee," which latter has been translated into Spanish and Japanese and is used extensively by missionaries as an aid to Gospel teaching. During much of his life he made Oxford, Ga., his headquarters, and always considered it his home, although the duties of his work often called him away for long periods, and from 1891 to 1893 he was a resident of Los Angeles county, Cal., having come here for his wife's health. Without any doubt he was one of the brightest lights the south has ever produced, and the amount of good he accomplished for that portion of the country cannot be overestimated.

In addition to receiving the advantages of a collegiate education, Mrs. Ardis was given a thorough education in music and became an accomplished vocalist. Born of her marriage to Mr. Ardis are five children, namely: Ethel, Ruth, Dorothy, Atticus Haygood and Lida Crawford.

R. D. ADAMS, M. D. The inducements of climate that brought Dr. Adams to Monrovia in 1893 have made him a permanent resident of the town, where he owns an attractive home on the corner of White Oak and Primrose streets. Dr. Adams is of eastern lineage, his parents having been born in New York. At one time his maternal grandfather, Jonathan Russell, owned all of the land now occupied by the city of Auburn; by trade a jeweler, he engaged in the manufacturing business and also carried on a retail trade. About 1826 W. R. Adams, father of Dr. Adams, removed to Michigan, where in the midst of the then pioneer surroundings and in a locality but sparsely settled he carried on a general store, of the type belonging to the past generation. In 1868 he retired from business and removed to Illinois, where he died the following year. His son, R. D., was born at Walled Lake, Oakland county, Mich. Being given better opportunities than fell to the lot of many boys in Michigan about the middle of the nineteenth century, he was sent to New York, where he took the regular course in the Syracuse high school. His studies were interrupted by a service of two years as hospital steward in the United States navy, after which he took a course in the Michigan State University at Ann Arbor. His medical education was acquired in the Long Island College Hospital, of which he is a graduate.

The first practical experience in professional work which Dr. Adams gained was in Skiddy, Morris county, Kans., where he opened an office in 1873. After a short time he secured a foothold in the profession and his services came into demand for many miles around. From there in 1885 he went to Council Grove, Kans., but the climate proved in many respects objectionable, and in 1888 he came to California, establishing himself at Alhambra, from which town he came to Monrovia. Dr. Adams was married in Bloomington, Ill., to Miss Ellis, a native of Ohio. The children born of their union are as follows: Jennie; Charles, a telegraph operator; Alice; and Frank, a graduate of the Monrovia high school in 1902. The family attend the Baptist Church and are identified with its work. The Republican party has secured the allegiance of Dr. Adams ever since it was organized, and his faith in its principles is unwavering. Before coming to California he was active in politics and at one time was elected to the Kansas state legislature, where his service won the approval of his constituents.

EDITH WHITE. Among the artistic temperaments which have reached their highest development in the inspiring atmosphere of California, and whose reproductions have found their way into homes and cities in different parts of the country, none is regarded as worthier of the appreciation bestowed upon extraordinary talent than is Edith White, flower and landscape painter. Especially as a delineator of flowers, Miss White is noted for the fidelity with which she immortalizes these transient delights of man; for her exquisite understanding of effective arrangement, and her wonderful production of transparent color effects. Her landscapes have atmosphere, ideality and truth, but her rarely beautiful rose productions have been handled not only masterfully, but with reverence.

Years of patient toil in her delightful field of effort have preceded the present unchallenged position of Miss White in the art world. Her ancestors were among the original settlers of Massachusetts, and afterwards settled in Connecticut, where her great-grandfather was born in 1769. When he was nine years old he moved with his father's family to Newport, N. H., where occurred the birth of her paternal grandfather, Nathan, a merchant and traveler. Her father, Elon, was born at Newport, N. H., and when nineteen years of age started west to Iowa, where he engaged in the hardware business, and where his daughter was born near Decorah, Winneshiek county. The father in 1859 took his family across the plains with ox-teams and wagons, encountering many dangers on the way to the far west, fording rivers and streams, and otherwise suffering from the deprivations and hardships incident to the four months' trip to Nevada county, Cal. For a time he engaged in mining, with indifferent success, and finally went into the hardware business in Nevada county. In 1884 he came to Los Angeles, Cal., and in 1885 settled in Pasadena. In 1901 he removed to San Diego, Cal., where he still lives. His wife, formerly Mary Stanton, is a native of Indiana, and a daughter of Thomas Elwood Stanton. Mr. Stanton came of old Virginia stock, which claimed also Secretary Stanton, of Civil war fame, and which were one and all members of the Society of Friends. He settled in Indiana, and then removed to Winneshiek county, Iowa, from which state he crossed the plains in 1849, returning east later. In 1859 he again came west, and later died in Montecito. In politics he was a Republican. Besides their daughter, Edith, there was born to Elon White and his wife a son, Nathan, who is at present a business man and inventor in Pasadena.

From earliest youth Edith White studied flowers and skies and colors, and as a little child used to draw and paint. She was educated primarily in Nevada county, Cal., and later graduated from Mills College, Alameda county. For a year she studied at the old School of Design in San Francisco, under Virgil Williams, and in 1882 she came to Los Angeles, where she opened a studio and worked with success. In 1892 she went to New York, and visited her father's old birthplace in Newport, N. H., during her visit in the east making many sketches of interesting places in New England, and studying for a year at the Art Students' League in New York City. In 1893 she opened a studio in Pasadena, and from this city have gone forth many gems in color, not only to the remotest corners of the United States, but to different parts of Europe. Miss White is a member of the Universal Brotherhood, and is intensely interested in all that elevates, brightens and develops.

T. J. ROYER, chief engineer of the United Electric Gas and Power Company, was born in Ashland county, Ohio, July 22, 1872, a son of A. J. Royer, a native of the same county. The great-grandfather, Christian, was born in Pennsylvania, where he also died, his career made noteworthy by service in the war of the Revolution. The grandfather, Samuel, was born near Reading, Pa., and settled in Ashland county, Ohio, where he built a fine mill on the Mohican river, and successfully managed the same until his removal to near Oshkosh, Wis., where his death occurred. A. J. Royer was a farmer in Ohio for twenty years, and then crossed the plains with ox-teams to Santa Fe, and from there came to Los Angeles, Santa Barbara and Ventura, settling in San Francisco in 1849. After engaging in mining for five years, he returned to Ohio; via the Nicaragua route, and bought a farm in Ashland county, upon which he lived until 1897. He then sold his property and came to Los Angeles, where he is now living. He is a member of the Masonic fraternity. He married Martha Peterson, a native of Ashland county, and daughter of Thomas Peterson, a native of Maryland, and an early settler of Ashland county. Mrs. Royer, who was the mother of nine children, died in Ohio.

F. J. Royer was reared on his father's farms in Ashland and Richland counties, and in 1883 accompanied the family to Newton, Kans., from where they returned to Ohio after three years. He was educated in the public schools, and in 1892 began to shift for himself. About the time of the World's Fair he remained in Chicago for eighteen months, and meanwhile managed to pick up the machinist's trade. In 1894 he came to Los Angeles and engaged in oil well drilling. In 1898 he was placed in charge of the pipe line of the Pacific Oil Refinery & Supply Company, in Los Angeles, and attended to the pumping and general management for eighteen months, when he resigned to accept a position with the United Electric Gas & Power Company at Long Beach. The plant was in the worst possible shape, but Mr. Royer entered heartily into the plan of keeping it in order until more power could be gotten from Santa Monica. In 1900 he was transferred to Santa Barbara as chief engineer for the company, and was given charge of both of the old plants, at the same time superintending the erection of the new plant of one thousand horse power. Mr. Royer has a fine library of technical and mechanical books, which he has thoroughly studied. He married, in Los Angeles, Sarah Rogers, a native of Texas. Mr. Royer is a member of the National Association of Stationary Engineers.

O. D. WILLIAMS. Although a comparative newcomer to Pasadena, Mr. Williams has demonstrated, to the satisfaction of all concerned, his ability to run a first-class hotel, and tactfully cater to the migrating public. Upon coming here in October of 1901 he purchased the Los Angeles House, since changed to the Williams Hotel, an excellently managed and popular hostelry.

As the name suggests, the cradle of the Williams family was in the prosperous little country of Wales, and the ancestor, in search of larger opportunities in a new land, settled presumably in Virginia. In the Old Dominion state the paternal great-grandfather, William, was born, and during the Revolutionary war served in the colonial army. He became one of the pioneer settlers of Kentucky, removing thither with Daniel Boone. His son, Oliver, the paternal grandfather, who was born in Virginia and became a large land owner in his native state, later removing to Kentucky, where his son, Oliver, the father of O. D., was born. The second Oliver became an extensive stockman in Kentucky and Indiana, and died in Ladoga, Ind., when his son, O. D., was twenty-one years of age. He married Maria Allen, a native of Kentucky, and daughter of William Allen, born in Virginia, and an early settler in Kentucky, where he owned large landed possessions. Of the nine children born of this union, six are now living, O. D. being the youngest in the family.

Until his twelfth year O. D. Williams lived in Kentucky, whither his family had taken him as a baby from his native town of Ladoga, Montgomery county, Ind., where he was born August 2, 1853. When the family fortunes were again shifted to Indiana, he continued to live on the paternal farm near Greencastle until the death of his father. He was educated in the public schools and at Bainbridge Academy, and at the age of eighteen began teaching during the winter season in his home district. When nineteen years old he still continued to make the home stock farm his headquarters, but at the same time engaged as traveling salesman for Adams, Osgood & Williamson, of Indianapolis, for two or three years. He then removed to Emporia, Kans., and embarked in business as an exporter of walnut lumber and logs, shipping his goods to many foreign ports, including London and Hamburg. He continued to be thus employed until 1901, although in 1893 he took up his residence in Chicago, Ill., and bought, through his nephew, the lumber coming from Kansas, Missouri, Indian Territory, Oklahoma, Texas and Arkansas. Upon disposing of his walnut business he came to Los Angeles in 1901, and from the first became interested in mining, in time assisted in the incorporation of the Black Horse Copper Company, of which he is vice-president, and which operates in Acton, Los Angeles county. In the fall of 1901 he came to Pasadena to engage in the hotel business, in which he has since been successful. He is a Democrat in politics, and is a member of the Universalist Church. While living in Emporia, Kans., he was made a Mason, raised to the Chapter, and to Commandery No. 8.

The marriage of Mr. Williams and Joanna Dickerson was solemnized in Indiana, and of this union there are three children: Mamie, who is now Mrs. Higby, of Chicago; Blanche, who received her musical education in the Chicago Conservatory and is considered one of the finest pianists in Southern California; and Geraldine. Mr. Williams is possessed of a genial and optimistic disposition, and of those forceful and reliable characteristics which not only win friends but success.

ROBERT H. GAYLORD. Pasadena is fortunate in the citizenship of a large number of cultured young men, who may be looked upon as the leaders of her advancement and hopeful future. Prominent in this class stands Robert H. Gaylord, a resident of this city since boyhood, and the owner and occupant of an attractive modern residence at No. 96 North Los Robles avenue. Though so much of his life has been passed within the charming environments of Southern California, he is of eastern birth, and was born at New London, Conn., March 9, 1876, being the only child of Dr. Charles H. and Marie (Palmer) Gaylord, natives respectively of Connecticut and Georgia. The Gaylords are an old-established family of New England, and Dr. Gaylord engaged in practice there during all of his active life.

Excellent advantages for obtaining an education were given Robert H. Gaylord, and of these he availed himself studiously, though he realized then far less than he does now that knowledge is power, and that they achieve the most in life who bring to their work the most careful training and preparation of mind and body. For a time he studied in private schools, and later took a course in electrical engineering in the Throop Polytechnic Institute. Since leaving college he has devoted his attention wholly to the care of his large estate, with its many attendant and important responsibilities. Included in his possessions are real-estate interests in Connecticut which he inherited from his parents; also stocks and bonds in New York City; and a brick block, with a frontage of twenty-six feet on Colorado street, Pasadena.

The marriage of Mr. Gaylord and Miss Elizabeth Emory was solemnized in Pasadena and has been blessed by a son, Emory Stafford. Mrs. Gaylord is a daughter of Hiram A. Emory, who spent his entire life in Bay City, Mich., and was for years one of the leading and most successful lumbermen of that region. Both Mr. and Mrs. Gaylord are members of and contributors to the First Presbyterian Church of Pasadena. Fraternally he is a Knight Templar and Mason of the thirty-second degree, while in politics he is a staunch Republican.

FREDERICK MULL. During his eventful life Mr. Mull has invaded many avenues of activity, has traveled in many lands, and has stored up a fund of information which renders him one of the most companionable of men. His career offers vast encouragement to the youth who deplores a lack of opportunity, for it has been his good fortune to create chances where none was supposed to exist. Of conservative Teutonic ancestry, he was born near Chambersburg, Franklin county, Pa., February 3, 1827, a son of Paul and Catherine (Everett) Mull, natives of the vicinity of Manheim, Wurtemberg, Germany. His father settled in Franklin county, Pa., upon immigrating to America, where he engaged in gardening, and where he died in 1883, his wife surviving him until 1885. They were the parents of seven sons and one daughter, of whom four sons are now living. Adam and Oliver served in the Civil war in a Pennsylvania regiment.

The early days of Frederick Mull were passed on the paternal farm near Three Brother mountains in the western part of Franklin county, Pa., and a more dreary place it were hard to find. The children were obliged to go to work when very young, and they lived in a log cabin, surrounded by wild animals and few of the civilizing influences of life. November 23, 1833, the night stars fell, and they saw the wolves and bears around the house, and the ground covered with black, rattle and copperhead snakes. They afterwards removed to Path Valley, and improved the new farm, rendering it more habitable and pleasant than the other. As may be imagined, the children had but meager opportunities for schooling, and Frederick received in all but a year's training at the subscription school in the neighborhood. The family finally removed to Huntingdon county, Pa., where the father had one hundred and sixty acres of land, which Frederick helped to improve during the summer time, and worked in the woods in the winters.

In 1850 Mr. Mull removed to Canton, Ohio, and drove a team for a year, thereafter engaging in farming in the vicinity of Cleveland for nearly five years. He then engaged in the livery and omnibus business for five years, and for the following sixteen years conducted a profitable grocery, feed and flour business. In 1873 he went to Europe with Prof. James Strong, and during his year's absence from America visited Liverpool, London, Paris and the principal cities in Europe; going thence to Africa, and up the Nile in Egypt; over the Arabian desert to Palestine, Assyria, Asia Minor; then to Greece and Turkey, including also in his return trip the Adriatic, Hungary-Austria, and Bavaria, Germany. Upon returning to his former home in Cleveland, Ohio, he again engaged in the grocery business, but eventually disposed of the same on account of the trouble with strikers. As a traveling salesman for the Cleveland Electric Company and the Cincinnati Safe & Lock Company, he covered the territory including Kansas, Missouri, Michigan, Illinois and western Ohio, and at the same time dealt in real-estate in Cleveland with considerable success.

In 1891 Mr. Mull located in Pasadena, later taking a trip all over the north, but since practically retiring from active business life. He has dealt extensively in real-estate; has built up several residences in the city, and owns four residences, his home being at No. 727 North Fair Oaks street. In Springfield, Mass., he married Laura E. Livingston, and of this union there were four children: Ella Porter, now Mrs. R. B. Morehead, of Los Angeles, Cal.; Mrs. Stella Porter Smith, deceased; Fred, an electrician of Cleveland, who served in the Spanish-American war; and Mrs. Jessie A. Reed, of Cleveland. Mr. Mull is fraternally associated with the Masons and the Odd Fellows, and in political affiliation is a Republican. He is a member of the Universalist Church, of which he is a trustee.

LOUIS HLAVIN. One of the enterprising meat market men of Southern California is Louis Hlavin, who came to this state in 1891, and to Pasadena in 1894. For the first year of his residence in the state he traveled, and in 1892 went into the meat business in Los Angeles with S. Mayer. This association continued for two years, and after coming to Pasadena he entered the employ of John Bremer, in time becoming foreman of his meat establishment. In June of 1901 he resigned from his seven years' association with Mr. Bremer to enter upon an independent business, and bought out the old market of R. B. Newby, at No. 130 Colorado street. More recently he has embarked in business at Ocean Park.

In Pasadena Mr. Hlavin was united in marriage with Leah Wood, a native of Portland, Ore., and daughter of New York parents, who crossed the plains in the early days and settled in Oregon. Of this union there is one child. Mr. Hlavin is a member of the Journeyman Butchers' Association, of which he was recording secretary for four terms; the Merchants' Protective Association and the Board of Trade. Fraternally he is associated with the Lodge No. 222, F. & A. M., at Pasadena; Knights of the Maccabees No. 2, Los Angeles; the Fraternal Brotherhood; and the Woodmen of the World, of which he is a charter member in Pasadena.

F. X. LINCK. After various experiments of a more or less uncertain character, Mr. Linck engaged in the milling business, and in 1895 bought the site of the Washington street planing mill, Los Angeles, upon which had stood another mill, eventually devoured by flames. After rebuilding, he put in modern machinery, also engines with a capacity of sixty horsepower, and began to manufacture all manner of mill commodities, including sash-doors, mouldings and general building necessities, as well as furniture of all kinds.

A native of Milwaukee county, Wis., Mr. Linck was born August 31, 1854, and is the youngest of nine children, of whom four sons and two daughters attained maturity, three surviving at the present time. One son, Anthony, served in the Twenty-fourth Illinois Infantry during the Civil war, and is now a resident of Claremont, Los Angeles county, Cal., himself and brother, F. X., being the only members of the family in California. The father, Anthony F. Linck, was born in Alsace-Lorraine, France, as was also his father before him, and came of an old family of that part of the country now under German rule. The father was an officer in the French army, but resigned his post to come to America, and located on a farm in Milwaukee county, Wis., where he reared his family and eventually died. He married Mary Seitz, also a native of Alsace-Lorraine, and whose father died in New York City. Mrs. Linck died in Milwaukee county.

In his youth Mr. Linck received the home training and common school education accorded the average farm-reared youth in the middle west, and when eighteen years old was apprenticed to a carpenter for two and a half years. He then began contracting and building in Bay View, Wis., now a suburb of Milwaukee, and at the end of a year and a half accepted employment with the Milwaukee Iron Company, whose mills were located in Bay View. For six years he was engaged in the roller department and was principally employed at rolling rails. In 1882 he removed to Millbank, Grant county, S. D., where he engaged in contracting and building. In Millbank he was appointed fire warden and building inspector, and took an important part in the county-seat fight which resulted in Millbank being the gainer. He erected the bank building and most of the fine residences of the town.

In May of 1888 Mr. Linck removed to California, and upon locating in North Ontario engaged in building and contracting for eighteen months. He invested heavily in real estate, his first assessment being for $10,000. In the end the other parties had the money and Mr. Linck had the experience, a fate all too common with the subsiding of booms. With available assets amounting to grit and determination he started out to again forge his way to the front, and for a couple of weeks swung a pick at a dollar a day. He finally succeeded in getting carpenter work, and at the end of a couple of years began to contract. In 1892 he rented a planing mill on the site of his present business and ran the same for three years, after which he disposed of his interests and built the Los Angeles Ferris wheel. This mammoth novelty was sixty feet in diameter and was first set up at Santa Monica, and after its sale in 1895, Mr. Linck, as heretofore stated, bought the site of the burned mill.

The first marriage of Mr. Linck occurred in Milwaukee, Wis., and united him with Mathilda Ewald, who was born in Wisconsin and died in Los Angeles. Of this union there were three children, two of whom are living: Mrs. Josephine Passmore, of Los Angeles, and Grace. In Los Angeles Mr. Linck married Mary Passmore, a native of San Bernardino, Cal., and member of an old family in that town. To Mr. and Mrs. Linck has been born one child, Alexander Jerome. Mr. Linck is a director of the Hartford White Oil Company. He is a charter-member and vice president of the Los Angeles Planing Mill Association, a member of the Builders' Exchange, and of the Chamber of Commerce. He is a Republican and a member of the Fraternal Brotherhood.

HENRY NEWBY, cashier of the Pasadena National Bank, is not only one of the most successful bankers and financiers of Pasadena, but is also one of the city's most honored and upright citizens. He was born in Spiceland, Henry county, Ind., May 4, 1868, and comes of Quaker ancestry. His father, Albert, was born in North Carolina, as was also his paternal grandfather, the latter being one of the very early settlers of Henry county, Ind. The Newby family came originally from England, and the emigrating members settled in North Carolina.

The mother of Mr. Newby was formerly Caroline Hubbard, who was born in Milton, Ind., and was a daughter of Richard Hubbard, a minister in the Society of Friends. Richard Hubbard departed somewhat from the time-honored traditions of his church, and courageously lifted his voice in song at a meeting of Friends at Milton, Ind. Being the first to start the innovation, he found himself in disrepute with the higher powers of the church, who considered his case and misdemeanor at the yearly meeting, and almost disowned him for his tolerance of vocal praise. His example was, however, soon followed by others, and in time the practice ceased to be regarded as other than orthodox. Richard Hubbard was a man of cast-iron habits and unyielding disposition, stern as granite, yet honorable in all his acts. His father, Jeremiah, claimed the distinction of being the largest Quaker minister in the history of the church. He was seven feet high, and stood head and shoulders above everyone else at the yearly meeting. He was a half Cherokee Indian. His father, Joseph Hubbard, was a civil engineer, and while on a government commission to Virginia married Anna Crews, daughter of a chief of the Cherokees. The interest centering around the Hubbard family is thus of two-fold moment, for its members were not only among the greatest and most influential of the Quakers, but have coursing through their veins the blood of the bravest and most enlightened of the red men of the plains. The Hubbards were early pioneers of Indiana, and were prominent in state as well as church. Mrs. Newby, who is now the wife of Mr. Painter, of Spiceland, Ind., had eight children by her first marriage, two sons and two daughters now living, of whom Henry Newby is the second youngest.

After completing the course at the Academy at Spiceland, Ind., Henry Newby spent a year at the Maryville (Tenn.) College, thereafter returning to his former home in Indiana. He came to California in 1887, and soon after entered the First National Bank of Pasadena in an humble capacity. By perseverance and application he soon worked his way to the front of the bank's interests as assistant cashier, which position he maintained with distinct credit for three years. August 31, 1900, after being with the bank thirteen years to a day, he resigned his responsibility to accept the position of cashier and manager of the Pasadena National Bank. When he came to the bank the deposits amounted to $120,000, and at the present time they are over $600,000.

Many additional interests in Pasadena have claimed the attention of Mr. Newby, prominent among these being the East Pasadena Land & Water Company, of which he is one of the organizers and a director. This company is devoting its energies and funds to the development of water, and to the general improvement of the eastern part of the city. Mr. Newby is also one of the organizers, and was a member of the first board of directors, and the first treasurer of the Los Angeles County Mutual Building & Loan Association. He is a member of the Pasadena Board of Trade, and of the Twilight Club, and in political preference is a Republican. He is a member of the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks; and with his wife is devoted to the church of the Society of Friends. He is treasurer of the Corona Masonic Lodge; a member of the Pasadena Chapter; Pasadena Commandery No. 21; and Al Malakiah Temple, N. M. S., of Los Angeles.

In Pasadena Mr. Newby married Minnie Pearl Berry, born in Cadiz, Ind., a daughter of A. J. Berry, a native of Kentucky. Mr. Berry settled in Cadiz, Ind., at an early day, and there reared fine horses and thoroughbred stock. He came of an old Kentucky family, and married Mary Bond, also a Kentuckian by birth. Mr. Berry was accidentally killed in Knightstown. To Mr. and Mrs. Newby has been born one daughter, Marjorie Berry.

A. L. PHILLIPS. A business experience covering many years has converted Mr. Phillips into one of the sound financiers and successful business men of Chatsworth. He was born in Marshall county, Iowa, in 1860, a son of Alpheus Phillips, a native of Vermont, and by occupation a farmer. He has five brothers living and two sisters. His education was acquired in the public schools of Iowa, and terminated with his graduation from the high school, after which he engaged in educational work for two years. His first business venture was undertaken in partnership with his brother at Vancleve, Iowa, at which time each bought a half interest in a mercantile establishment, which was later removed to St. Anthony, where they continued to do business for six years. The brothers then separated their interests, A. L. conducting the business alone for three years, and then sold out, after which he lived on a farm for two years; meantime the brother removed to Omaha, Neb.

In the spring of 1890 Mr. Phillips came to California and lived for two and a half years at Pasadena, and a part of that time was employed as a bookkeeper for Breiner & Crosby. While thus employed he traded off his Iowa property for property here. He and his family attended the World's Fair at Chicago, and upon his return he attended to the management of his orchard at Chatsworth, where he put up a small store building and laid in a stock of general merchandise. From this insignificant beginning he was enabled to branch out to meet the growing demands of the population, until at the present time he has a very large store, with a complete stock, reaching to all possible requirements in a general way, and including agricultural implements. The business is conducted in partnership with his brother-in-law, M. H. Pierce, and so successful has been the management of their concern that branch stores at Norwalk and Lancaster have proved satisfactory investments and additional sources of revenue. Mr. Phillips oversees all three of the stores, buys the goods, checks up the stock, and is general overseer. In addition, he manages his orchard of deciduous fruits, and attends to the multitudinous obligations incurred by reason of his ability. For the past five years he has been postmaster at Chatsworth, and has attended to the affairs of the office in a highly creditable manner. Before coming to the town he was for five years cashier of the St. Anthony Bank, and during the latter part of that time was manager as well as cashier. He also served as township clerk two terms and was candidate for county recorder, but was defeated at the primary.

At St. Anthony, in 1885, Mr. Phillips married Phoebe A. Pierce, daughter of Anthony R. and Charlotte (Bivins) Pierce. Mrs. Phillips, who died in December of 1899, was the mother of three boys and one girl. The ages of her sons at her death were: Clifford M., nine years; Anthony Leo, five years, and Earnest J., ten and one-half months; Gracie C. died with diphtheria at the age of four years, just after their arrival in California. Mr. Phillips has been able to keep his children together, having a woman to help him care for them. In national politics Mr. Phillips is a Republican, and cast his first presidential vote for James G. Blaine. The parents of Mr. Phillips died in 1897, his mother, formerly Miranda Kelly, living but five days longer than his father, and he was called from California to administer the estate. Mr. Phillips is entitled to great credit for his success in life, for many obstacles have come his way and have been met with fortitude, not the least of his troubles being the inconvenience caused by a crippled limb, the result of a severe illness in childhood.

JAMES J. JEFFRIES. The champion heavyweight of the world was born near Carroll, Franklin county, Ohio, April 17, 1875, and is a son of Alexis C. Jeffries, mentioned elsewhere in this volume. When six years of age he was brought to Los Angeles by his parents and settled on the ninety-acre ranch which has since continued to be the family home. In the development of this ranch he assisted during boyhood, and also attended the public schools and Los Angeles Business College. At an early age he was apprenticed to the boiler-maker's trade with the Lacy Manufacturing Company and on completing his time engaged at the occupation as a salaried assistant. For about six months of the year, however, he devoted himself to hunting, and spent his time in the mountains of Southern California, a mode of living which he especially enjoyed. It was through the outdoor life, the long walks in the open air and the bracing effects of the mountain atmosphere that he developed a physique remarkable for power and endurance. He stands six feet and two inches in height and is a Hercules in build, training down to two hundred and twelve and two hundred and eight pounds. Yet, though he is as strong as an ox, he is as light of foot as a schoolboy, and it is this combination of strength and agility which has won him pre-eminence in the ring.

While Mr. Jeffries was still a boy, his friend, Charles Murray, induced him to enter the ring and arranged a match between him and an old fighter, Griffin. Though the younger man lacked the skill of the older one and had not been in training at all, yet he came out the winner, and, indeed, his record is the remarkable one of never having suffered defeat. In a contest with Van Buskirk he won in two rounds, and this victory brought him local notice, for Van Buskirk was considered the heavy weight champion of the Pacific coast. In his next experience he was pitted against Henry Baker, of Chicago, and won in about the ninth round. Later contests were with Gus Ruhlin and Joe Choynski, the latter of whom was then at the top notch of his fighting skill. Tom Sharkey was his next logical opponent and a match was arranged between them, but was called off by the authorities. In a match with Joe Goddard, the Barrier champion, he won in four rounds. This was February 28, 1898. During the same year Jeffries fought with Peter Jackson, Peter Everett, Tom Sharkey and Bob Armstrong. The three-round bouts with Jackson and Everett came in March and April, and that with Sharkey followed in May, giving Jeffries the victory after twenty hard rounds. During the same year he spent some time in New York, with "Billy" Delany, his manager. On his return to Los Angeles he took up boiler-making again, but the next year found him back in New York, with William T. Brady as manager.

June 9, 1899, Jeffries won the championship of the world from Robert Fitzsimmons, getting in his knockout blow on the eleventh round. Contrary to precedent, the champion did not rest long on his laurels after winning them. November found him fighting with Sharkey once more. The twenty-five rounds of that fight are said by many to have put their mark on the sailor for the rest of his career, but Jeffries was none the worse for the encounter. April 6, 1900, he won in the first round with Jack Finnegan at Detroit. His next battle was with Jim Corbett at Coney Island, and the former champion made a valiant struggle to regain the honors, but was defeated in the twenty-third round, falling before the same blow that had vanquished Fitzsimmons. The Lewis law putting a stop to fighting in the east, Jeffries returned to California. During the next year, September 17, he won from Hank Griffin in four rounds, and a week later won from Joe Kennedy, after which, November 15, he vanquished Gus Ruhlin in the fifth round. His latest achievement was the match with Robert Fitzsimmons July 25, 1902, at San Francisco, when he won from his opponent in eight rounds, thus once more proving his right to rank as the champion heavyweight of the world.

ANDREW O. PORTER. Referring to the life record of this pioneer of Pasadena, we find that he was born in Lawrenceburg, Ind., being a son of Capt. Thomas Porter, who was an officer in the war of 1812. The latter was a native of Kentucky, his father having gone there from Pennsylvania. In early manhood he became a farmer of Indiana, where he settled in the midst of a raw and unimproved farming region. After having for some years engaged in forwarding and shipping merchandise between Cincinnati and New Orleans, in 1852 he came via Panama to California and engaged in mining on the North Fork of the American river. In 1858 he returned to Indiana via Panama and became proprietor of a flour mill at Shelbyville on the Blue. Many years were quietly spent in the pursuits of a business career. Through all of this time, however, he never forgot his years in California, nor did his love for the far west languish.

The year 1873 found Mr. Porter in Los Angeles, where he was one of the organizers of the San Gabriel Orange Growers' Association. Buying property in Pasadena, in 1874 he erected a cottage on Columbia, opposite the south end of Orange Grove avenue. The fifteen acres of his home place were put under fruit culture and carefully superintended, besides which he improved several ranches. One of his most important enterprises was the buying and selling of real estate. During the boom days he laid out fifteen acres as A. O. Porter's subdivision. In the founding of the State Bank (which subsequently was merged into the First National Bank) he took an interested part. He was among the organizers of other companies and business concerns associated with the development of the resources of the region.

Until 1884 Mr. Porter voted with the Republicans, but he then joined the Democratic party and afterward adhered to its principles. On the organization of the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Pasadena he was a charter member and afterward assisted in its upbuilding. His death occurred January 18, 1888, before much of his work had borne fruit in the development of this ideal western city. In the home which he built in 1874 his widow now resides. She was formerly Anna Green, and was a native of Rush county, Ind. With her is her only surviving son, Don Carlos, the older son, William, having died when ten years of age. Don Carlos Porter was born in Shelbyville, Ind., December 6, 1870. His early education was acquired in Parker's Academy, after which he carried on the studies of the University of Southern California until the senior year. In December, 1893, he took up the study of law in the office of A. R. Metcalfe, and in 1895 was admitted to the bar. In 1899 he formed a partnership with Mr. Sutton, under the firm name of Porter & Sutton. For a time they had their office in the Stowell block, but are now located in Mr. Porter's former quarters in the First National Bank building, where a general practice is conducted. Ever since he was admitted to the bar he has held the office of city attorney of South Pasadena. In politics he is a Republican. His membership is in the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Pasadena, of which his father and mother were early members. In addition to his professional work he superintends his five-acre ranch on Columbia avenue and Orange Grove Drive. He aided in the organization of the Pasadena Savings Trust and Safety Deposit Company and the Los Angeles County Building and Loan Association, and has since been a director in both concerns.

JOHN F. SCHWARTZ, county treasurer of San Diego county and a resident of the city of San Diego since 1887, was born in Prague, Austria, in 1860, being a son of Frank and Mary (Bech) Schwartz, natives of the same locality and of German descent. In 1861 the family came to the United States and settled in Chicago, where the father died in 1874. The mother is now living in San Diego. There are two sons in the family, John F., of San Diego, and A. D., of Chicago. The earliest recollections of John F. Schwartz are associated with Chicago. At nineteen years of age he entered the employ of the Fort Wayne Railroad (now the Pennsylvania line) as a clerk in the freight department at Chicago. During 1883 he went to Flagstaff, Ariz., as assistant agent, and later held a similar position at Williams, where he also managed an eating house for the company. On his return to the north he was made assistant agent at South Chicago.

Coming to San Diego in 1887, Mr. Schwartz two years later became agent here for the National City & Otai Railroad, continuing in the same capacity until he entered public life. His nomination in the fall of 1898 for the office of county treasurer was followed by an election with a majority of eight hundred votes. The duties of his office he assumed in January, 1899, for a term of four years. While living in Chicago he married Anna Kuceoa, of that city, and a native of Peoria, Ill. They have three sons, Edmund, Richard and Joseph. In his fraternal relations Mr. Schwartz is connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the Knights of Pythias, Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, Order of Foresters and Ancient Order of United Workmen, in several of which he is a trustee.

RUFUS FISLER. Eighteen miles from San Diego and two miles from the village of El Cajon lies the Chase ranch, which is one of the most thriving and productive of all the estates in the El Cajon valley. Ever since 1883 it has been under the efficient management of Mr. Fisler, to whose perseverance and enterprise may be attributed its neat appearance and increasing revenues. In the ranch there are seventeen hundred and fifty acres, all in one body. Of this vast tract one hundred and forty acres are under cultivation to various kinds of fruit, fifty acres being in raisin grapes, twenty-five in oranges, besides an abundance of pears, peaches, apples and prunes, also two hundred and seventy-five lemon trees and three hundred olive trees. The remaining acres are utilized for stock-raising purposes, a specialty being made of cattle, although in past years many horses were also raised.

A son of S. F. Fisler, M. D., the subject of this article was born at Clayton, N. J., in 1855. His education was such as the local schools afforded. At an early age he began to take charge of lands owned by his father, and in this way he acquired knowledge that has since proved of inestimable value to him. In 1876 he went to Boulder, Colo., where for a year he engaged in prospecting and mining. On leaving Colorado for California, he settled in San Diego county and engaged in ranching for a year near the city of that name, after which he spent a year on the Sweetwater Frisbie ranch, then returned to San Diego, and soon afterward accepted the oversight of the ranch owned by Major Chase. Since then the entire ranch has been under his supervision, and he has given his time wholly to its management, taking no part in politics except to vote the Republican ticket. In fraternal relations he is connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Modern Woodmen of America.

JOSEPH GABRIEL, proprietor of the Sunflower poultry and pet stock farm, located on New York street and Maiden Lane, Pasadena, represents one of the largest poultry enterprises in Southern California, and by far the largest in Los Angeles county. Mr. Gabriel has made a scientific study of poultry raising, and no more perfect arrangements can be found anywhere for the successful raising of all kinds of domestic, fancy and game fowls. Much space is required for the maintaining of the thousands of chickens raised every year, and four incubators are used the year round. Last year over four thousand were hatched, while this year (1902) the number has increased more than a thousand. Mr. Gabriel has about one thousand laying hens, and representatives of thirteen fine breeds, including Buff Cochins, Silver and White Wyandottes, white, brown and buff Leghorns, Plymouth Rocks, black, spotted and white, black Langshangs, and many other varieties. He makes a specialty of Cornish Indian game cocks, and also has on hand numerous mammoth Pekin ducks and brown turkeys. His fowls are in demand all over the United States, and it is thought that he has shipped to every state in the Union.

In his younger days Mr. Gabriel lived on the paternal farm in Germany, where he was born March 1, 1860, a son of Joseph and Caroline (Drauske) Gabriel. When thirteen years of age he lost his mother, and that same year was apprenticed to a carpenter, under whose instruction he remained for two years. In 1877 he came to America and located in Chicago, Ill., where he worked at his trade until 1885. He then came to San Francisco and worked as a foreman of construction for a couple of years, and in 1894 located in Pasadena, where he was similarly employed. Although successful in the application of his trade, he gradually became interested in the poultry business, and, starting with a few fowls of good breed, worked up to his present large business. In Chicago, Ill., Mr. Gabriel married Christine Miller, a native of Germany, and of this union there are six children: Annie, William, Carrie, Rosa, Josephine and Fritz. Mr. Gabriel is a Republican in political affiliation, and he is regarded as an enterprising and worthy member of the community of Pasadena.

WILLIAM H. EVANS. Through the medium of various enterprises Mr. Evans has been enabled to promote the prosperity of his home town, Monrovia, where he has resided since December of 1888. Perhaps in no way has he been more helpful than in the interesting of eastern people and capitalists in this ideal residence portion of the west, and the investments made by parties have proved not only advantageous to the investors themselves, but have reacted favorably upon the town and its interests.

In Philadelphia, Pa., Mr. Evans was born in 1849. The educational advantages given him included attendance at the common schools, supplemented by a course of study in Newark College. On taking up an occupation he selected the trade of merchant tailoring, which he learned in all of its departments. When he selected a location for business, he chose Sandy Valley, Ohio, and there, in addition to working at his trade, he was interested in coal mines and the manufacturing business, remaining in the town until ill health rendered a change of climate advisable. He then came to California and visited different towns, deciding soon that Monrovia offered exceptional and unsurpassed advantages from a climatic standpoint. The merchant tailoring establishment that he opened was the first shop of the kind here. After a short time he became interested in buying and selling real estate, which he continues to the present.

The marriage of Mr. Evans united him with Miss Herbert, of Columbiana county, Ohio, who now has charge of the office of the Sunset Telephone Exchange. They have two children, Antoinette and Harry, the former being the wife of George O. Monroe, and the mother of a son, Merton K. Monroe. Fraternally Mr. Evans is connected with the Royal Arcanum, Independent Order of Odd Fellows and Woodmen of the World, in which latter he has for four years served as an officer in the grand lodge of the state. More than once his fellow-citizens have showed their appreciation of his ability by selecting him to serve in offices of trust and responsibility, and these various positions he has filled with energy, faithfulness and a high sense of honor. Included among these offices are those of city recorder and city clerk, which latter he held for two and one-half years. The position of notary public he has also filled for eight years.

J. R. COOK. As proof of the long association of Mr. Cook with the delightful surroundings of Long Beach, there stands at No. 327 Pine avenue a landmark interesting to all who enjoy the present advantages of the place, and which is none other than the first house erected on the site of the town by Mr. Cook, and for which he drew the lumber and plans. When he arrived here in 1882 little had been accomplished save the surveying of the town, and its present popularity and charm were undoubtedly but vaguely speculative. At first purchasing land for general farming purposes, a portion of which was set out in orchard, he devoted about four years to teaming, and in this capacity was instrumental in securing most of the early lumber for the erection of the first home and buildings, which he brought from Wilmington and San Pedro. In connection therewith he successfully managed his farming and horticultural interests, and in time purchased a walnut orchard near San Juan, which he still owns, and which contains a walnut grove of ten acres ten years old. He also owns Long Beach property, for his faith in the future of his adopted town has inspired investments in some of its valuable holdings.

Not alone in California but in other parts of the country Mr. Cook has been brought in close proximity with pioneer conditions. Of English descent, he was born in Richland county, Ohio, November 12, 1829, and is one of two sons still living in a family of seven children, five daughters being deceased. His father, Jacob, was born in Pennsylvania, as was also the paternal grandfather, Noah, although the latter eventually removed to Ohio, where his death occurred. Jacob Cook was one of the very early settlers of Richland county, Ohio, and he lived upon the farm cleared from the heart of the forest until his death at the age of sixty-five years. He married Mary Lee, a native of the vicinity of Richmond, Va., and daughter of Solomon Lee, representative of a famous southern family. Mr. Lee was also an early settler of Richland county, Ohio, and died there when eighty-two years of age. While living on the paternal farm in Ohio, J. R. Cook attended the public schools and graduated from the high school at Lexington. At the age of seventeen he began teaching, and followed this occupation for three terms, and after his marriage, September 26, 1848, began farming near Shelby, Ohio. In 1852 he removed by ox-teams to Whitley county, Ind., where he bought crude land and improved it from timber, and in 1857 again traveled over the country with teams and wagons, landing in Brown county, Kans., near Padonia, and five miles from Hiawatha. So well pleased was he with the west that he determined to still further penetrate its possibilities, so in 1860 he went with mule teams to Pike's Peak and then to Fairplay, in which locality he engaged in mining for a year. He then returned to Kansas via the Santa Fe route, and established a trading post at what is now Fort Leonard, but was then Pawnee Rock, and here encountered the various interesting phases of pioneer life, at the same time working up a big business in general merchandise and general trading. At the time the Indian was an ever present menace to life and property, and the surrounding plains resounded to the tramping hoofs of innumerable buffalo herds. Mr. Cook went on many hunts after the buffalo, and he managed to keep on friendly terms with the Indians until the time of the final massacre. Even then his hitherto fair and considerate treatment of the red men was prolific of good returns, for a friendly savage warned him of the impending danger, and he was thus enabled not only to get out of the country with his family and goods, but could also aid others in making their escape from a terrible fate. Upon settling in eastern Kansas he farmed for some time, but eventually removed to Grand Island, now Buffalo county, Neb., where he improved a farm from the rough and established a postoffice called White Cloud, and was himself the postmaster. He materially aided in the building up of this section of the country, which happened to be on the great Mormon trail, and was extensively used by the disciples coming and going from the Mecca in Salt Lake City. He started the first school district of the place, and invested with his enthusiasm and enterprise many different outlets of activity.

In the spring of 1867 Mr. Cook fitted out an expedition and started over the plains with his family and worldly possessions, via Salt Lake City and the Humboldt route, and spent nearly three months in reaching Santa Cruz county, Cal. Here he put in his time farming, teaming and freighting, and in 1868 removed to Monterey county, and settled on a farm near Salinas, for three years also engaging as foreman of a large warehouse. In 1878 he removed to Southern California, locating near Capistrano, in what is now Orange county, and farmed for three and a half years, and, as heretofore stated, came to Long Beach in 1882.

Mrs. Cook was formerly Harriett A. Kinney, a native of Cayuga county, N. Y., and daughter of George Rix Kinney, a native of Bennington, Vt. Mr. Kinney settled in Cayuga county, N. Y., and later in Lexington county, Ohio, although his death occurred after his removal to Huron county, Ohio. He married Sylvia Graves, who was born in Vermont and died in Ohio, and who was a granddaughter of Rev. Increase Graves, a clergyman of the Presbyterian Church. To Mr. and Mrs. Graves were born thirteen children, ten of whom attained maturity, and three are now living. One of the sons served in the Civil war. Six children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Cook, viz.: James Adelbert, who is a builder in Clearwater, Cal.; Rudolphus B., who is a horticulturist and owns thirty acres of land at Capistrano; Amy Jane, whose marriage to Joseph Rowse, of Capistrano, occurred February 12, 1884, being the first wedding that occurred in Long Beach (then known as Willmore City); Elmer Ellsworth, who is a horticulturist in Tustin; Ozias B., a horticulturist of Capistrano; and Frank Emerson, who represents the Shepherd Fruit Company in Los Angeles. In political affiliation Mr. Cook is a Republican, and the Prohibition cause has found in him a stanch and uncompromising supporter. He has exerted his influence in this direction in Long Beach, and has in many other ways contributed to the best development of this part of the county.

THOMAS E. CLELAND, one of the successful ranchers of the vicinity of Florence, was born in Washington county, Me., in 1853. At the common schools he received a practical education, and under his father's instruction became a model farmer and stock-raiser. At the age of eighteen he started out to earn his living, and in Boston, Mass., engaged as a clerk in a mercantile establishment, changing his location in 1876 to California, and to the vicinity of Florence, which has since been the scene of his untiring efforts. In 1881 he purchased the ranch on Florence avenue upon which he now lives, and which has been transformed from wild mustard land to as fine a property as there is in this part of the county. Unimproved, the land was worth $300 per acre. It is at present fitted with all modern devices, among which is a private water plant, with an electric pumping apparatus.

Beginning in 1898, Mr. Cleland engaged in the dairy business, and he now has forty cows, and delivers milk and cream by wagon in Los Angeles. His stock consists of Jersey, Holstein and Durham cattle, and the dairy is conducted on model lines, with due regard for neatness and the welfare of customers. In 1883 Mr. Cleland married Leafy A. Stever, and of this union there are four children: Thomas E., Jr., Mary E., Paul O. and Fred W. The children are at home, and are receiving the benefits of a common-school education. In national politics Mr. Cleland is a staunch Republican, having cast his first presidential vote for James A. Garfield. Ever since he arrived in this part of the state he has served on the school committee, and the graded school is located at the corner of his place. Fraternally he is well known, and is associated with the Independent Order of Foresters, Lodge No. 966, at Los Angeles. He is one of the well-known upbuilders of Los Angeles county, and has taken a part in all public matters, being esteemed for his uprightness of character and common sense business methods.

NATHANIEL C. CARTER. At least two conclusions may be arrived at from the experience of Mr. Carter in Southern California, first: that the climate affords remarkable advantages for the restoration to health of those whose lives have been despaired of elsewhere; second: that the soil affords opportunities for the attainment of ample means by men possessing perseverance and force of will. When Mr. Carter came to the state, in 1871, the physicians of Lowell, Mass., had rendered their professional opinion to the effect that he could not live until spring. Nature, aided by climate, however, accomplished what other remedial agencies could not do, and he has since become one of the most energetic and prosperous horticulturists in his adopted home.

As the founder of the Sierra Madre colony Mr. Carter is best known, for it was largely through his judicious advertising that immigrants were attracted hither from the east, thus furnishing a colony that for intelligence and moral standing has no superior. In February, 1881, he purchased from E. J. Baldwin one thousand and one hundred acres of Santa Anita rancho, commencing at the base of the Sierra Madre mountains and gently sloping toward the valley. The tract was then in the primeval condition of nature, its sole use having been as a pasture for stock. Foreseeing, however, its susceptibility to cultivation, he divided the land into twenty and forty acre tracts, which he sold at low prices to permanent settlers. In order to render fruit-raising possible, he secured a water supply from numerous spring and streams in the mountains, and thus the problem of irrigation was easily solved. People began to buy homes here. Orchards and vineyards were planted, avenues laid out, schools and churches erected, and the community established upon a permanent and substantial basis, which makes of it to-day one of the best portions of the county in which to establish a home.

In Lowell, Mass., N. C. Carter was born in 1840, being a son of William and Julia (Coburn) Carter, lifelong residents of Lowell. The grandfather, Nathaniel Coburn, held the rank of captain in the Revolutionary war, later dying in New York state. In connection with a brother, in 1862 N. C. Carter opened a grocery in Lowell, but later sold his interest to the brother and turned his attention to the sewing machine business, also engaged in the manufacture of ready-made clothing and United States flags. The first flag made by machine work for the United States government was made by his wife in 1866. This lady, whom he married in February, 1864, was Annetta M. Pierce, of Lowell. They are the parents of five children, namely: Florence, wife of W. H. Mead, of Los Angeles; Arthur N., of Sierra Madre; Julia F. and Anita E., at home; and Philip C., a student in the Throop Polytechnic Institute at Pasadena.

Obliged to relinquish all his interests in the east by reason of failing health, Mr. Carter came to California. For a few years he owned and occupied the Flores ranch near San Gabriel. Few of the pioneers spent more time than he in making known to eastern people the virtues of the great west, and it was he who in 1872 organized the Carter excursions, the first of the thousands of excursions that have since been conducted for the purpose of bringing prospective settlers to the coast. For some years, and until 1881, he conducted these excursions, but his subsequent interests became so important that he could no longer take the time to go east as frequently as before. He was among the first to lay out lots in Pomona, and also laid out Sierra Madre, and a subdivision of the city of Monrovia. In the organization of the Sierra Madre Water Company he was an active factor, and is still its largest stockholder and a director. Politically a Republican, he has served his party both on the county and state central committees. In religious views he is a believer in Christian Science. Fraternally he is connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. For years he was a member of the Sixth District Agricultural Board, and in many other ways he has aimed to promote the general welfare.

The home of Mr. Carter, known as Carterhia, occupies one of the most picturesque locations in the San Gabriel valley. Its elevation of almost fifteen hundred feet renders possible an excellent view of the Pacific ocean, thirty miles distant; also the towns of Pasadena, San Gabriel and Monrovia. Adjoining it is Santa Anita, the celebrated ranch of E. J. Baldwin. Los Angeles, fifteen miles away, is within easy access by means of an excellent steam-car service, thus giving the residents of Sierra Madre all the advantages of proximity to a metropolis, while at the same time they have the peace and plenitude of an ideal country home. With the greatest degree of truth it may be asserted that Mr. Carter made the most fortunate move of his life when he selected Sierra Madre as the scene of his future activities, and that decision, made about twenty years ago, he has since had no cause to regret.

G. W. SHIPLEY. The San Fernando Shetland ranch, which was started by Mr. Shipley in 1900, is the only place in California where these ponies are bred and raised. In addition to the management of the ranch, he had charge of a saddle, livery and riding school at No. 145 North Raymond avenue, Pasadena, where he had about forty saddle horses for rent. His riding school proved an original plan, and during 1901 instruction was furnished to three hundred and sixty-three pupils.

In St. Thomas, Canada, G. W. Shipley was born September 30, 1851, a son of John and Agnes (Sanders) Shipley, natives respectively of St. Thomas and Nova Scotia. His father, who was the son of a Scotchman, devoted his active years to farming pursuits, first in Canada, and later in the United States. In 1861 he settled on a farm in Lesueur county, Minn., and later made Sioux City, Iowa, his home, but is now living in Pasadena, Cal., where his wife died in 1901. In their family of five children, all but one are in this western state. The eldest, G. W., grew to manhood in the parental home, and learned the car-builder's trade at Sioux City in the shops of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad. Coming to Southern California in 1873, he spent a year at Westminster and two years in Anaheim, where he engaged in the horse business. In 1876 he returned east with a herd of wild horses, comprising six hundred and forty head, which he drove over the old Mormon trail east and sold in Columbus, Ohio. Next he went to Texas and bought wild horses, large herds of which he drove north each year for four years, his route usually lying along the old Chisholm trail and up to Dakota and Minnesota. Altogether he engaged in buying horses in Texas about eight years, meantime making his headquarters at Fort Worth and San Antonio, and shipping fourteen different herds into the northern states. A later location was in the Black Hills, at Rapid City, S. D., thirty miles from which town he had a ranch on Elk creek, and engaged in raising horses for sale to street-car companies. He was also manager of the South Dakota horse ranch, which owned four thousand acres under fence and had unlimited range for the pasturage of its herd of over one thousand horses.

Almost twenty years after his first trip to California, Mr. Shipley again came to the west, locating at Encinitas in 1892 and continuing there in the livery business for three years. Later he made Pasadena his home. Of late years he has made a specialty of Shetland ponies, and has had many fine mares of this breed. Among them is Midget, perhaps the smallest pony in the country. Another is Major, weighing four hundred pounds. At the head of his herd are two fine imported stallions, weighing respectively two hundred and thirty and four hundred pounds. The ranch on which the animals are kept is situated in the San Fernando valley, near Calabasas, and comprises three hundred acres. In politics Mr. Shipley is a Republican, and fraternally is connected with the Woodmen of the World. His marriage, in Sioux City, Iowa, united him with Miss Mary Strange, who was born in England, and by whom he has one son, Fred.

ABBOTT J. BENT. The Bent family was established in America by one Abbott Bent, an Englishman and a farmer, who settled in New York and gave loyal service to his adopted country during the war of 1812. William, a son of this immigrant, was born in Amsterdam, N. Y., in 1807, and spent much of his active life at Medina, that state, where he died at eighty-four years. Farming was his principal occupation in early manhood, but later he gave much attention to promoting gas companies. He married Betsey H. Jackson, daughter of Philip Burr Jackson, a native of New York and a soldier in the second war with England. Of the two children born of their union, Abbott J., of Monrovia, Cal., was the elder, and was born in Orleans county, N. Y., March 13, 1839. He studied in Medina Academy, Wesley Seminary at Genesee, and graduated from Eastman's Commercial College in Poughkeepsie. Very soon after the Civil war opened he enlisted in defense of the Union, his name being enrolled June 17, 1861, as a private in Company A, Third New York Cavalry, each man in which owned his own horse. Before the close of the war physical disability caused him to be honorably discharged.

Entering the railroad service, Mr. Bent was for a time brakeman on the Erie road and was later promoted to be conductor, holding this position in the government employ at the close of the war. From that time until 1871 he was with the Louisville & Nashville road and the Canada Southern. In the latter year he went to Medina, N. Y., and organized the first gas company there, the stock of which he afterward sold. In 1874 he secured employment as conductor with the Canada Southern Railway Company. Four years later he settled in Shelbyville, Ill., where he carried on a jobbing and retail business in books, stationery and music. In 1878 he ran the first train into the National Park over the Northern Pacific Railway from Livingston, Mont., and afterward was a conductor on the St. Paul road, with headquarters at Wabasha, Minn. His residence in California dates from 1888, when he settled at Monrovia, afterward working with the Santa Fe for six months and the Southern Pacific for a similar period. Since 1891 he has engaged in the real-estate and insurance business, is also promoting the mining stock of the Big Five Mining Company of Colorado, and is a director in the Edgar Union Consolidated Mining and Mill Company.

While living in Shelbyville, Ill., Mr. Bent married Miss Isabel V. Sampson, who was born in New York. Their daughter, Leila E., is the wife of Prof. G. Walter Monroe, principal of the high school and superintendent of the city schools of Whittier, Cal. Fraternally Mr. Bent is connected with the Grand Army of the Republic, Lodge No. 308, F. & A. M., at Monrovia, of which he is a charter member, Lake City Commandery No. 6, K. T., and has also been raised to the Scottish Rite degree. While in Shelbyville he became a charter member of Lodge No. 92, A. O. U. W. He is also connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Improved Order of Red Men. In political belief he adheres to the principles of the old Jacksonian Democracy, and always votes for the men and measures of his party. In religion he is connected with the Congregational Church.

The Big Five, already alluded to as forming one of the chief interests of Mr. Bent, is a co-operative mining association, in which five thousand people in various states are interested. Although in existence only since 1895, the association now controls and operates mines in three of the important gold centers of Colorado, and is extending its work into Mexico. Among its properties are the Dewdrop mine and mill, and the Adit, NiWot, Columbia and Timberline mines in Ward district of Colorado; Wilcox and Central tunnels, Miami, Edgar-Union, Belman and Dove's Nest mines at Idaho Springs; the Union tunnel in the San Juan country, Colorado, and old Spanish mines in

G. A. STARKWEATHER. Descended from an old family of New England, Mr. Starkweather of Ventura was born near Concord, N. H., April 19, 1852, and was left an orphan at the age of five years. Two years later he went to Baltimore, Md. While in that city he made the acquaintance of some members of the Thirty-eighth Massachusetts Regiment, on their way to the front at the opening of the Civil war. Through this chance acquaintanceship he was appointed sutler's clerk and accompanied the regiment to Louisiana and Mississippi, witnessing the siege of Vicksburg and accompanying Bank's expedition up the Red river. During the latter part of the war he was with the First Delaware Light Artillery. On his return from war he went to Wilmington, Del., and soon was taken as a protegee by a physician of Centerville, that state, with whom he made his home and for four years had the privilege of attending school. Later he entered the Pennsylvania Military Academy at Chester, Pa., from which he was graduated in 1873 as a civil engineer and with the rank of first lieutenant. During a portion of his college course he was enabled to pay his expenses by serving as an instructor and officer in charge.

In the fall of 1873 Mr. Starkweather secured employment as a civil engineer with the Pennsylvania Railroad at Altoona and was sent to different localities and different divisions of the road, working as draughtsman and assistant engineer and rising to the rank of supervisor of work. In 1887, by reason of impaired health, he relinquished his position, intending to abandon railroad work entirely. On coming west he spent a year in the mercantile business at Pasadena, but in 1889 took up railroading once more, this time in the employ of the Southern Pacific Railroad, as general foreman of the Yuma district, then at Santa Ana and later at Los Angeles. In 1891 he was appointed to the Yuma district, and a year later sent to Benson, Ariz., on the Tucson district, from which point in a year he was transferred to Deming, N. M. In 1895 he was sent to the Fresno district as roadmaster. March 1, 1898, he was appointed roadmaster of the Ventura district.

The marriage of Mr. Starkweather united him with Mary J. Ehrenfeldt, a sister of Fred and George Ehrenfeldt, who are connected with the Pennsylvania Railroad system. The six children born of their union are as follows: Rose A., who is married and lives in Fresno, Cal.; George Albert, Jr., an agent with the Southern Pacific Railroad; Susie P., Annie, Essie and Frank. Mr. Starkweather was made a Mason in Ventura Lodge No. 214, F. & A. M., and is connected with Chapter No. 50, Commandery No. 18, the Council, R. & S. M., and Al Malakiah Temple, N. M. S., of Los Angeles. Other organizations which number him among their members are the Ancient Order of United Workmen of Fresno, the Fraternal Aid and Fraternal Brotherhood. He is a believer in the doctrine of the Methodist Episcopal Church and politically upholds Republican principles.

CHARLES BECKWITH. While undoubtedly the success so far gained by Charles Beckwith of Ventura county may be ascribed in part to the excellent start given him by his father, the late Francis J. Beckwith, yet he possesses qualities so energetic and manly that, without any assistance, it is safe to say he would still have achieved commendable success. It was in 1874 that he came to California with his parents, Francis J. and Sarah (Gruenemyer) Beckwith, natives respectively of New York and Pennsylvania, the former of English descent, the latter of German extraction. As a pioneer of Indiana, F. J. Beckwith for some years tilled the soil of Steuben county, where he was well known and honored. In that county were born his children, Carrie, Charles, Adelbert and Emma, all of whom now reside in California.

On settling in Ventura county, F. J. Beckwith bought property near Santa Paula, the increase in value of which added not a little to his income. With a brother, Addison, he inherited seven hundred and sixty acres of valuable land, a portion of the old Briggs grant. This came to them from the estate of another brother, Appleton W. Beckwith, who had long been one of Ventura county's most honored citizens and had served acceptably as supervisor and in other positions of trust. Some years after his death, F. J. Beckwith purchased the interest of the brother, Addison, in the estate, thus acquiring all of the valuable land, and this he bequeathed to his wife, at his death, December 27, 1901, when sixty-seven years of age. It was his desire above all things else to assist his children in getting a start in the world, and to this end he presented each of them with a ranch of forty acres. His daughter Carrie, wife of George Jones, is living three miles east of Ventura, on the land given her by Mr. Beckwith, while the other daughter, Emma, wife of Milton Baker, resides six miles east of Ventura. The sons, Charles and Adelbert, reside with their mother on the home ranch.

The education of Charles Beckwith was mainly received in the schools of Ventura county. It was a part of his father's creed that children should never be reared in idleness, so he was early put to work and given his duties on the home farm. He scarcely remembers when he was not helping with the work, so young was he when initiated into the labor of the ranch.

Having acquired a thorough knowledge of agriculture at an early age and being pleased with the occupation, he determined to make it his life calling, and therefore has continued to follow it uninterruptedly to the present time. He is a member of the Fraternal Brotherhood of America, and in politics votes with the Republican party. His marriage united him with Llewella Oar, who was born in Sonoma county, Cal., and is a daughter of Edwin and Mary Oar. The three children born of their union are Ada, Ralph and Myrtle.

REV. CHARLES B. SUMNER. There is no one whose name is more closely associated with the history of Pomona College than Rev. Charles Burt Sumner, who holds the position of secretary of the executive committee of the board of trustees and has also occupied the chair of Biblical literature since 1888. Indeed, ever since the founding of the institution, his own personal history has run parallel with that of the college. He has fostered its welfare, has advanced its interests, and by his literary and business ability has been a powerful factor in its growth. No record of the college in future generations will be complete which omits the name of this scholarly gentleman and firm champion of advanced education.

Briefly narrated, the history of the founding of Pomona College is as follows: In 1867 three Congregational churches were formed in Southern California; these united to organize the Southern California District Association, and the constitution provided for a committee on education. In 1882 they took action looking to the establishment of a Congregational school. Five years later it was decided to form a general association of Southern California, and this general association, consisting at that time of twenty-one churches with twelve hundred members, immediately gave full power to its committee on education not only to select the college site, but also to appoint trustees, requiring them to take final action within thirty days. It was then decided to establish the college near Pomona, and soon afterward the committee on education appointed the first board of trustees. Rooms were rented and work was begun at Pomona in September, 1888. In January of the next year Claremont (now Sumner) Hall, together with considerable valuable property, was given to the college, and the work was transferred to Claremont. The first president was appointed in July, 1890, and the first class was graduated in June, 1894. It is the aim of the college to give a complete and thorough college training, but it also endeavors to develop physical health, moral sturdiness and Christian principles. Its teachers are chosen, not merely with reference to scholarship, but also with regard to their personal influence in the formation of character. In accordance with the state statute, the college is a self-perpetuating body with powers of a corporation. It is managed by a board of trustees that reports to the churches from time to time, and the general association has a board of visitors which keeps the churches in touch with the college. The three courses of study, classical, literary and scientific, each require four years of strictly preparatory work. Special courses are permitted, but lead to no degree, while to other graduates are given the degrees of A. B., B. L. and B. S. respectively. Diplomas are also given to graduates of the School of Music and the School of Art and Design.

Taking up the personal history of Rev. C. B. Sumner, it may be stated that he was born at Southbridge, Mass., received a common-school education, supplemented by the splendid advantages afforded by Yale College, of which he is a graduate, class of 1862. He then took a theological course in the seminary. For five years he taught in Monson Academy, after which he was pastor of the Monson Congregational Church twelve years, and for three years ministered to the church at West Somerville. The condition of his wife's health rendered a more favorable climate necessary, and he removed to Tucson, Ariz., where he served as superintendent of home missions for three years. Overwork caused the failure of his health, and in 1887 he came to Pomona, where he organized a Congregational Church. At the same time he became interested in establishing a Christian college of the best New England type, and soon resigned his pastorate in order to devote himself to the founding of such an institution. The trustees having the selection of a site in charge considered various propositions, and the result finally was that the college was at Claremont, four miles northeast of Pomona. The college was incorporated October 14, 1887, and in January, 1888, Mr. Sumner, one of the original trustees, was selected financial agent. Eighty acres were donated by H. A. Palmer and forty acres by the Misses Wheeler. On this site plans were made for building. The corner stone was duly laid September 26, 1888. The first term was begun in a rented building, corner of Fifth street and White avenue, Pomona.

However, before much had been done on the building, Messrs. G. H. Fullerton, E. F. Kingman, F. A. Miller and H. A. Palmer, who owned the beautiful building erected for a hotel at Claremont, presented the same, with three hundred town lots, to the trustees for the use of the college. The original site was then abandoned, and January 1, 1889, removal was made to Claremont, where the building now known as Sumner Hall was at once utilized. It was admirably adapted for the purpose and was wholly new, never having been used for hotel purposes, although constructed with that object in view. Holmes Hall was erected in memory of Cyrus W. Holmes, Jr., of Monson, Mass., by his widow and daughter, and is a large building, heated with steam. It contains faculty rooms, art rooms, society halls, chapel and recitation rooms, and a reading room with the better class of daily and weekly papers. The donors of this building, which cost $25,000, were members of the church in Massachusetts to which Mr. Sumner at one time ministered.

The Pearsons Hall of Science is the gift of Dr. D. K. Pearsons, of Chicago, and cost $25,000. It is of cream pressed brick, two stories in height with basement, 90x60 feet in dimensions, lighted by gas, heated by steam, and practically fireproof. In this hall are the office and president's room, the physical department (first floor), chemical department (basement), and biological department (upper floor). In 1900 a gymnasium was built at a cost of $5,500, one-half its cost being contributed by Mrs. Helen Goodwin Renwick in memory of her husband, whose name has been given to it by action of the trustees.

The first president of the college, Rev. C. G. Baldwin, was elected in July, 1890, and served until 1897. The following year Rev. F. L. Ferguson assumed the presidency, and in 1902 he was succeeded by Dr. George A. Gates. Administration of affairs is in the hands of fifteen trustees, the majority of them must (by articles of incorporation) be Congregational, but it is especially specified that the college shall not be sectarian, and the instruction given in religion is broad and comprehensive, with no tinge of denominational spirit. This department has been constantly under the oversight and in the charge of Mr. Sumner, who has filled it with tact and ability. He also fills the chair of moral philosophy.

Among the local positions filled by Mr. Sumner are those of director of the Indian Hill Citrus Union, trustee and member of the board of managers of the Claremont Congregational Church, director of the San Antonio Fruit Exchange and of the San Dimas Lemon Association. He has a beautiful home which commands a broad view of the Pomona valley, and in it he has spent many happy and contented years. His heaviest loss was the death of his wife, Mrs. Mary L. Sumner, in whose honor Sumner Hall is named. They became the parents of two children. The daughter is the wife of Rev. Eugene H. Benson, an Episcopalian rector. The son, George Stedman Sumner, Ph. D., was graduated from Pomona College in 1894 and received the Ph. D. degree from Yale College. Ever since completing his education he has been connected with the faculty of Pomona College, where he is now professor of history, and instructor in economics.

A. J. AMESTOY. The estate managed by Mr. Amestoy consists of six hundred acres of land and lies near Rosecrans, where he makes his home. In order to promote the interests of the heirs of his father, Domingo Amestoy, the estate has been incorporated, and he owns an equal share with the others. A visitor to the ranch is impressed by the unusual number of buildings, and also by the large collection of birds, representing many unusual kinds. A glance over the land shows that it is under the care of a careful and painstaking manager, who delights in maintaining a high order of cultivation.

By virtue of his birth in this state, Mr. Amestoy is entitled to membership in the Order of Native Sons of the Golden West. He was born July 20, 1868, and is a son of Domingo and Marie (Aycagues) Amestoy, natives of the south of France. When seventeen years of age his father left his native land and went to South America, where he was employed in the manufacture of shoes at Buenos Ayres and later at Montevideo. After seven years in that country, in 1851 he became a pioneer of California, settling at Colegrove, Los Angeles county, where he embarked in the sheep business. From a small beginning he built up a large business, and at times had on his ranch as many as fifty thousand head of sheep. The industry proved a very profitable one until the advent of settlers in ever increasing numbers rendered it difficult to secure large ranges for his flocks, and he then sought new fields of activity. In 1875 he came to Gardena and bought six hundred and eighty-five acres of the Rosecrans tract. On this ranch was located a half way house, where the stage coach running between Los Angeles and San Pedro was accustomed to secure relays of horses. In addition to this property he acquired El Encino ranch of four thousand four hundred and forty-four acres, situated in the wheat belt of the San Fernando valley, and the improvement of this tract occupied not a little of his time in later years. When he died, March 17, 1891, he left a large estate, representing the fruits of a lifetime of toil and judicious management. Besides the large tracts mentioned, his estate owns the following Los Angeles property: No. 202 North Main street, sixty feet; west side of Spring, between Temple and Franklin streets, two hundred feet; North Los Angeles street near Plaza, forty feet; Los Angeles street, between Commercial and Requena streets, one hundred and fifty feet; corner of Aliso and Alameda streets, two hundred feet; and Aliso street, fifty feet; also five lots near East Side park. Through the constant growth of Los Angeles, much of this property has acquired a high value, and represents investments of the utmost importance.

In the family of Domingo Amestoy there are five sons and three daughters, namely: A. J., J. B., P. D., M. F. and J. P.; Mrs. J. A. Gless, of Boyle avenue, Los Angeles; Mrs. L. Sentous, of Girard street, Los Angeles; and Mrs. C. W. Wells, of Los Angeles street, same city. Of these sons the first-named, A. J., received his education in Santa Clara College, supplemented by two years of study in an institution in France. Since his return home and his entrance into business affairs, he has made his home in Gardena, and is judiciously managing the Rosecrans tract. He is loyal to his native land, a typical Californian, interested in all that contributes to the welfare of the state. Like his parents and the other members of the family, he adheres to the Roman Catholic faith. His marriage united him with Miss Therese Hiriart, who was born in France. Her father, Frank Hiriart, likewise a native of the south of France, came to the United States and settled in California, engaging in the fruit business in Los Angeles, where he built up a considerable wholesale and retail trade.

CALVIN W. ABBOTT. Among the architects and builders whose attainments have redounded to the credit of Southern California, none is more securely launched in the public esteem than Calvin W. Abbott, formerly one of the principal upbuilders of Pasadena, and now one of the creative forces of Long Beach. Preceded by his well earned reputation he came to this town in March of 1901, and although the intervening time has been comparatively short, has abundantly substantiated prevailing expectations, as evinced particularly in the Friends' Church and the Bowyer Hotel.

In his ancestral affiliations Mr. Abbott is fortunate, for among those bearing his name patriotism has played a conspicuous part, as well as the high moral courage and devotion to principle as lived and taught by the Society of Friends. The emigrating forefathers came from England, and evidently settled in the south, and some of their number carried muskets upon the gory battlefields of the Revolution. The paternal grandfather, John, was born in Georgia, and settled near West Milton, Miami county, Ohio, in 1817. He was a farmer by occupation, and in 1854 removed to Marshall county, Iowa, where terminated his useful and industrious life. While in Ohio he joined the Society of Friends, a faith to which his children and grandchildren have since adhered. On the farm developed by the grandfather near West Milton, Miami county, Ohio, Calvin W. Abbott was born January 21, 1840, and there also his father, Samuel, was born. The elder Abbott was reared in Ohio, and in 1852 removed to West Branch, Cedar county, Iowa, near Springdale, where he lived until his retirement. In 1884 he came to Pasadena, Cal., and died while on a visit to his son in Trinidad, Colo., three years ago. He also was a member of the Society of Friends. He married Rebecca Miles, a native of Miami county, Ohio, and daughter of William Miles, born in South Carolina. Mr. Miles was a member of the Society of Friends, and an early settler near West Union, Ohio, where he conducted a farm, and where he died in 1852. Mrs. Abbott, who died in Colorado shortly after her husband, was the mother of three children, of whom Calvin W. is the oldest, and all of whom have developed into capable members of society. One of the sons, Judge A. J., is an ex-judge of Kansas, and the father of Clarence Abbott, attorney-general of New Mexico. J. M. Abbott is chief engineer of the Walter Morgan System of Heating and Ventilating, in San Francisco.

Though reared on the paternal farms in Ohio and Iowa, Calvin W. Abbott was favored with excellent educational advantages, due largely to his studious habits and ability to earn the money for his advanced tuition. When seventeen years old he entered the University of Iowa, at Iowa City, and later taught school for a few years. During 1857 and 1858 he was one of those selected to run the underground railroad in Iowa, ten miles being the extent of his run. In this capacity he had many exciting adventures vastly pleasing to a boy between seventeen and twenty years of age, and he retains vivid recollections of an acquaintanceship with John Brown, J. H. Keage, and many others belonging to that notable following. In 1857 he began to learn the rudiments of architecture and building at West Branch, Iowa, and in 1860 started out on his own responsibility as a contracting architect and builder. In 1874 he embarked upon an ambitious planing mill enterprise at Muscatine, Iowa, and for five years did a large business in cutting lumber, making sash, doors and other acquisitions to buildings. In 1879 he began farming near Osage City, Kans., and at the same time he contracted and built, combining the occupations with considerable success. In 1884 the Kansas farm was disposed of and he came to Pasadena, Cal., where he was identified with the upbuilding of the town. During the first three years of his residence there he devoted himself to the sale of lots in the C. W. Abbott subdivision, for which he had purchased ten acres of land, and after that he devoted his time to building and contracting, and in all drew the plans and put up sixty or more residences in the city, besides numerous public buildings. Owing to impaired health he decided upon a change of occupation in 1892, and traveled for three years along the coast in the interest of the Smead Heating and Ventilating Company of Denver, Colo. Upon returning to Pasadena he continued his former occupation of architect and builder, and in March, 1901, located in Long Beach.

In West Branch, Iowa, Mr. Abbott married Harriett Kirk, a native of Randolph county, Ind., and of this union there have been four children, three of whom are living. Everetta is now the wife of Mr. Keys, of Los Angeles, manager for the Westinghouse Electric system; Lenwood is agent of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company at Bakersfield; and Lillian is the wife of Albert Smith, of Berkeley, Cal. Albert Francis was a shoe merchant, and died in Pasadena at the age of twenty-five years. Mr. Abbott is a member of the Society of Friends, and is nationally and locally a Prohibitionist.

ALBERT C. WILLIAMS. There is no enterprise of its kind better known throughout Santa Barbara county than El Monte dairy, of which Mr. Williams is the proprietor. In 1895 he purchased a ranch of two hundred and twelve acres adjoining Santa Barbara, and on it engaged in general farm pursuits until 1899, when he started the dairy that is now the object of his care and attention. The success of the venture soon justified him in increasing the size of the dairy, and he now has one hundred head of cows, of which the majority are Jerseys, with a few Durhams in the bunch. He makes a specialty of furnishing the best grades of milk and cream to the Santa Barbara trade. His dairy is noted for the excellence of its products, and his business is therefore large and growing. In 1901 he built a three-story residence on El Monte ranch. The house stands on an elevation and overlooks Channel Island, Goleta valley and parts of Santa Barbara, thus affording a picturesque view and an attractive environment. In addition to this property he owns a farm of six hundred and forty acres, of which three hundred and forty acres are under cultivation.

On La Mesa, Santa Barbara county, Mr. Williams was born March 24, 1864, his parents being A. J. and Julia Williams, the former deceased and the latter well known as the lighthouse keeper at Santa Barbara Point. When he was a boy he spent much of his time at the lighthouse. In 1881 he graduated from the Santa Barbara high school, after which he engaged in farming in El Cajon valley near San Diego, having as a partner in the venture his brother-in-law, Mr. Maxfield. In 1883 he went to Olympia, Wash., where he was employed by Robert Frost in the hardware business. Two years later he went to Los Angeles, where he opened a fruit and general commission business, continuing in that city for four years, and then removing to San Francisco, where he had an office on Front street, and carried on a general commission business. In 1891, as traveling salesman, he went to Mexico, and for a year traveled through that country for a San Francisco firm, his services in this capacity being especially valuable on account of his familiarity with the Spanish language. Returning to San Francisco, he remained there until 1895, and then established his ranch near Santa Barbara, where he has since made his home. His interest in politics is limited to casting a vote for Republican candidates, but he has always been too engrossed in business matters to participate in public affairs.

The marriage of Mr. Williams took place in Oakland, Cal., and united him with Miss Lily Le Noir, who was born in that city. Her father, Nathaniel Le Noir, was a member of a Philadelphia family that descended from French ancestors, and was a pioneer of Oakland, where he engaged in business many years. Mrs. Williams is a member of the Congregational Church and a participant in much of its work, as well as in other movements of an uplifting and philanthropic nature. One child was born of her marriage, a daughter named Leonora Frances.

GEN. PHINEAS BANNING. This noted pioneer of California was born in Newcastle county, Del., September 19, 1831, and descended from one Phineas Banning, of England, who in colonial days settled in what is now Kent county, Del. His son, John, a merchant of Dover, was a member of the council of safety during the Revolutionary war, and, as a member of the first electoral college, was one of the three from Delaware to cast the electoral vote which made George Washington the first president of the United States. John A., son of this revolutionary patriot, graduated from Princeton College, and was a man of scholarly attainments. By his marriage to Elizabeth Lowber he had eleven children, Phineas being the ninth. When he was a boy of twelve years he left home, and with fifty cents as his entire capital, started for Philadelphia. Arriving at that city, he secured work in his brother William's law office, but afterward was employed in a wholesale store. In 1851 he left Philadelphia for California, via the Isthmus of Panama. Landing in San Diego, he proceeded to Los Angeles. In November, 1852, he began freighting between this city and San Pedro. From that time forward he was prominently identified with the history of California. He founded the town of Wilmington, which he named in honor of a city in his native state. For some years he had the sole management of the Los Angeles & Wilmington Railroad.

Realizing the incalculable advantages to be derived from a good harbor on the coast here, he twice went to Washington to secure appropriations from congress for the improvement of San Pedro harbor. Besides attending to his business interests he bought and improved six hundred acres in Wilmington. On this property he had the largest well in the country, attaching thereto steam pumps, by which water was raised into several reservoirs, thus furnishing the water supply for Wilmington and San Pedro, also for irrigating purposes and for vessels in the harbor. He made large sums of money through his various enterprises, and, had it not been for his great generosity, he might have become a millionaire. In politics he was a Republican. His military title was earned in the command of the first brigade of the California state militia, of which he was appointed brigadier-general. He died in San Francisco, March 8, 1885, leaving to his family a fine estate, which was the accumulation of the later years of his life.

TRUMAN BERRY was the second permanent settler in Whittier, having located here in 1891, when a barley field covered the ground on which now stands the prosperous town. He is a native of far off Somerset county, Me., where he was born December 18, 1852. His parents, William and Lucy (Andrews) Berry, were also natives of Maine, as were many of his ancestors. He passed his youth on his father's farm in Maine, and was of valuable assistance in the management of the farm. He also studied with zest at the public schools, which opportunity was supplemented by a course at the Concord (Me.) high school. Having thus fitted himself for an active, independent life, he decided to start out for himself, and in 1889 undertook the journey to Socorro, N. M., where he engaged with marked success in the transfer and livery business. Not being satisfied with the future prospects of his surroundings, he next moved to California, and located in East Whittier, where he became interested in the upbuilding and improvement of the crude conditions then existing here. At the present time he has a fine ranch given over to the cultivation of oranges, lemons and English walnuts and covering ten and one-half acres. In addition he owns a ranch of fourteen and one-half acres in English walnuts.

P. J. BOLIN. A builder to whose skill Los Angeles is indebted for many constructions is P. J. Bolin, a native of Brockville, Ontario, born January 11, 1858. His paternal grandfather, Frank Bolin, was born in Ireland, and crossed in a sailing vessel to Canada, where he settled on a farm near Brockville. The country was wild and unpromising, and might have offered slight inducement to an indolent man, but this earnest pioneer cleared off the timber and created a home for those dependent on him. He lived to be ninety years old. His son, John Bolin, the father of P. J., lived to be eighty-six years old, and he also was a farmer in Ontario, and a promoter of the agricultural prosperity of his neighborhood. Long life is further insured to Mr. Bolin on the maternal side, for his mother, formerly Catharine Dean, a native of Kittly, Ontario, and daughter of Anthony Dean, a farmer of Ontario, is now nearly eighty years old, and her father lived to the age of ninety. To John Bolin and his wife were born nine children, of whom P. J. is fourth, another son, Thomas, is also a resident of Los Angeles.

The preliminary education of Mr. Bolin was acquired in the district schools of Ontario, and from earliest youth he was taught to assist in the work around the farm. At the age of fifteen his somewhat circumscribed life broadened perceptibly when he started out to learn the trade of carpentering, at which he applied himself until 1880. He then located in Chicago, Ill., and after a time started west gradually making his way to McPherson, Kans., then to Trinidad, Colo., and later to Las Vegas, N. M., tarrying for a time in Deming and Silver City. He then found employment in the building department of the Santa Fe Railroad Company at El Paso, afterwards returning to Trinidad, Colo., in 1882. In May of the same year he located in Los Angeles, and from that time until 1892, found positions as foreman for different contractors. Since 1892 he has engaged in independent building and contracting with success, and has put up many residences, flats and public buildings in different parts of the city. Among his undertakings may be mentioned the Goss flats on South Hope street, the Morgan flats on the corner of Eleventh and Los Angeles streets, the Campbell residence on Rampart street, the E. A. Warner residence on Vermont avenue, the F. X. Fields residence on East Los Angeles avenue, and Dr. Murphy's home on Boyle Heights.

In Los Angeles Mr. Bolin married Anna Rudesill, a native of California, and of this union there are three children, Leland, Lela and Mabel. Mr. Bolin is fraternally associated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the Ancient Order of United Workmen, and the Ancient Order of Hibernians. Politically he is a Republican in national elections, but in local matters votes for the best man irrespective of political ties.

GUSTAV A. BOMAN. Before associating himself with the cement contracting industry of Los Angeles in 1892, Mr. Boman acquired an extended knowledge of the conditions prevailing in the extremity of the middle north states, and especially was he made familiar with the perils and experiences which befell the freighter among the heavy timberlands of the pineries. He was born in Westrejtlan, Sweden, near Falkoping, December 27, 1865, his parents, John and Johanna (Larsen) Boman, being natives of the same part of the country. His father was a stockman and farmer, and the possessor of several large ranches, making his headquarters for the greater part at Karsgaarden. The paternal grandfather, Andrew, was a soldier in the Swedish army up to the time of his death. The parents, who died in Sweden, reared six of their eight children to maturity, and the three living are in America, Gustav A., however, being the only one in California.

At comparatively an early age Mr Boman was obliged to shoulder responsibility, for at the age of fourteen he was left an orphan, and thereafter went to live on an adjoining large farm with his guardian. He attended the public schools and learned to be a farmer after the best known methods. In 1882 he came to America, remaining for a year at Rockford, Ill., and then went to Minneapolis, and on to British Columbia. There he was employed by the Canadian Pacific Railroad Company in the construction of their line from Calgary west to Cariboo Creek. With four horse teams he freighted for the railroad for three years, and in 1886 participated in the Indian war in the northwest territory as freighter for the Canadian government. At the expiration of hostilities he returned to Minneapolis, but was soon back on Cascade Range as a freighter for the Canadian Pacific. At the end of six months he again located in Minneapolis, but a year later tried his luck in the Gogebic Region of northern Michigan.

In 1890 Mr. Boman became identified with the Pacific coast, and for a couple of years mined in different parts of Oregon, and in November of 1892 located in Los Angeles. He became interested in the cement business with Mr. McCombs, and afterwards was foreman for Clark & Neimann for four years. In 1897 he began to do business on his own responsibility, and has since built up a large trade in the cement contracting line. His skill has not only been exercised in Los Angeles, but he has received commissions from Soldiers' Home, Pasadena, and many adjoining towns, and has constructed miles of curbing and sidewalks. He built a residence at Gladys avenue and Seventh street, but this was eventually sold, and he now owns a home at No. 532 Beaudry avenue.

While living in Portland, Ore., Mr. Boman married Tina Swenson, a native of Norway, and of this union there are five children: Ellerly Sigrida, Gladys Juliette, Stella, Esther Maria and Florence Elevera. Mr. Boman is a member of the Cement Contractors' Association. With his wife he is a member of the Swedish Christian Mission, and is one of the board of trustees. He has a large acquaintance in Los Angeles, where he is regarded as one of the reliable and substantial members of a prosperous community.

COL. J. A. DRIFILL. One of the most enterprising men of Oxnard is Col. J. A. Drifill, manager of the American Beet Sugar Company. He was born at Rochester, N. Y., September 24, 1859, a son of William H. and Elizabeth Drifill, and received his education in the high school of his native town, supplemented by a course at a business college. Upon starting out in the world to earn his own living, he engaged in the wholesale boot and shoe business at Rochester for a few years and came to California in 1883, settling at Pomona. For about ten years he was interested in the cultivation of oranges, and then entered the employ of the American Beet Sugar Company at Chino. When the factory was erected at Oxnard, in 1897, he was the first man on the ground, and has since looked after the interests of the company with unflagging zeal and remarkable executive and financial ability. His capabilities are recognized by all the community, and he is ever brought forward to lend the benefit of his counsel and judgment in all matters of important public moment. His responsibility in connection with the Beet Sugar Company is of such a nature as to demand the time and undivided attention of any two ordinary men, but so great is his capacity for application that no smallest detail is neglected, nor any duty, however slight, left undone.

In 1883 Mr. Drifill married Miss Emma Gordon of Rochester, N. Y., daughter of Alexander Gordon of that city. Of this union there are two daughters, Mary Edith and Emma Mabel. Mr. Drifill has an additional responsibility in connection with the presidency and management of the Colonial Improvement Company and with the vice presidency of the Bank of Oxnard. He is variously associated with the social and other organizations in which the town abounds, and he has been a member of the Los Angeles lodge of Masons since 1887. He was connected with the same organization in Pomona, and is president of the Masonic club at Oxnard, which built the Masonic Temple, generally conceded to be the largest in a town of this size in the United States. He is also a member of the Elks at Santa Barbara and the Knights of Pythias at Chino.

H. NOTTHOFF, the chief engineer of the United Electric Gas and Power Company at Santa Monica, is of German ancestry and a member of a family which has for generations given evidence of exceptional mechanical ability. His father, William, was a son of John Notthoff, an expert machinist, and at an early age entered the government employ as a locomotive engineer, continuing as such for forty-eight years, when, June 1, 1901, he was retired on a pension. His wife, Katie, was born in Nassau, Germany, a daughter of Jacob Miller, who engaged in the freighting business. To their union were born four sons and two daughters, all living. The two who are in America reside in Santa Monica, where W. G. is his brother's assistant engineer.

In Essen, Rhine province, Germany, H. Notthoff was born June 27, 1863. His education was obtained in public and private schools of Essen. At the age of fourteen he was apprenticed as a machinist in the government locomotive works at Essen, where he served for four years. On completing his trade, in 1881, he came to America and settled in Racine, Wis., where he was employed as erecting engineer with the J. I. Case Threshing Machine Company for eighteen months. In the fall of 1883 he came to California and for four years was chief engineer of Maier & Zobelein's brewery at Los Angeles. When the Los Angeles cable street railway was introduced he became a machinist in the company's shops. After a year he went to Fillmore, Cal., as erecting and operating engineer and superintendent of the quarries owned by D. Kilpatrick, whose plant he completed and then operated for a year. Returning to the east, he was for two and one-half years chief engineer of the Loebe Foundry Company at Decatur, Ill., whose shop he erected, introduced the machinery, put the plant in running order, and then operated for a time.

On his return to California Mr. Notthoff was for three years foreman of the Eureka Oil Company of Los Angeles. For several years, as erecting engineer for Levi Booth & Sons of Los Angeles, he traveled through this state and Arizona, putting up engines for them. May 10, 1899, he became superintendent and erecting engineer of the United Electric Gas and Power Company at Santa Monica, which plant he started and has since operated, having an engine of fifteen hundred horse-power, which supplies light and power for Santa Monica, Ocean Park, Long Branch and Redondo, also for San Pedro, Soldiers' Home and Sawtelle. To aid him in his work he utilizes various inventions that are the product of his fertile brain and skillful hands. All of the appliances are the most modern and the plant is first-class in every detail. Along the line of his chosen occupation he holds membership in No. 2, National Association of Stationary Engineers, in which he served as secretary for two terms. He is connected with the Fraternal Brotherhood No. 133, at Santa Monica. In politics he votes with the Republicans. His marriage took place in Peoria, Ill., and united him with Miss Annie Henzel, who was born in Decatur, that state. They have six children, Harry, William, Arthur, Raymond, Hannah and Mary.

PHILIP EICHHOLZ. In his capacity as an expert slater and tiler Mr. Eichholz has been identified with building interests in Los Angeles since the summer of 1885. He is a native of the Rhine province, Germany, and was born at Mulheim, June 12, 1857. His father, William, was a native of the same province, where his active life was devoted to slate contracting at Mulheim, on the Ruhr, and his grandfather, Eichholz, was a boat owner and extensive shipper on the Rhine, and he also served in the German army. The mother of Philip Eichholz was formerly Gertrude Hueser, a native of the Rhine province; her father, a shipper on the Rhine, lived to be ninety-three years of age and his father lived to be a century old. Mrs. Eichholz, who is still living in Germany and is eighty-five years of age, is the mother of thirteen children, all of whom are living, Philip being the fourth in order of birth and the only one in America.

In accordance with the long-established custom, Philip Eichholz left the public schools when about fourteen, and was apprenticed to a slater in Mulheim, his term of service covering three years. After completing his trade he started out as a journeyman slater, and in his wanderings visited Austria, Bohemia, Germany, Italy, France and Switzerland, and picked up a great deal of useful information as well as considerable financial remuneration for services rendered. In 1877 he enlisted in the German army as a soldier in the Seventeenth Mulhausen Regiment, and served in Alsace for three years after which he was honorably discharged. In 1880 he came to America, and in New York City he worked at his trade for three years, later finding employment in Newark, Jersey City and Brooklyn. In 1883 he crossed the ocean and visited amid the scenes of his youth in the Rhine province, and upon returning to America came immediately to California, which he reached in the fall of 1884. In San Francisco he worked at his trade until the summer of 1885, when he located in Los Angeles and engaged in general building and contracting, but made a specialty of slating and tiling. He has been variously employed by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, and did the work for the Methodist Episcopal Church, the Stewart building, the United States Postoffice building and the Sisters' Hospital, besides numerous residences and general buildings throughout the city. On his own responsibility he has built three different residences besides the fine and substantial Eichholz block, which is two stories high and 110x50 feet in ground dimensions.

In New York City Mr. Eichholz married Emma Preusser, who was born in Elberfeldt, Germany. Of this union there was one child, Anna, who died when one year old. Mr. Eichholz is a Republican in national politics, and has taken a great interest in the undertakings of his party. He is connected with the Masonic order, Maccabees and Foresters.

JOHN M. EVANS. As his name implies, Mr. Evans is a Welshman. He was born in Merionethshire, Wales, May 11, 1862, and his father, David, his mother, Jane Evans, and his grandfather, Evans, were natives of the same shire. The father was a farmer in his native land, where his death occurred. The mother, who is now a resident of Montgomeryshire, Wales, had nine children, six of whom are living, J. M. being the oldest and the only one in California.

J. M. Evans was reared among the hills of his native land, and was educated in the public schools of Dolgelly. When sixteen years of age he began to work in the state stone quarries at Festioniog, in the northern part of the shire. At nineteen years of age he immigrated to America, reaching Winnipeg, Manitoba, in 1881, where he worked at bridge building until 1883. He came to California from the northern city and engaged in horticulture and grain raising in Anaheim. Not entirely satisfied with this occupation as a permanent means of livelihood, he located in Pasadena in 1886 and engaged in teaming and general contracting for three years, after which he remained on a farm in the northwestern part of Los Angeles county until 1896. This land was homesteaded and consisted of one hundred and sixty acres, and to the improvement of the same Mr. Evans devoted his best efforts, putting in all manner of modern and labor-saving innovations, developing water and making his property a paying and congenial home. In March, 1902, he sold his farm. After he located in Los Angeles in 1896 he engaged in the feed and coal business at No. 2806 South Main street, but in April of 1891 changed his place of business to his present location at No. 2910 South Main street. Here he has worked up a large trade—in fact, the largest in this part of the city. He carries a large and complete stock of all kinds of feed, grain and fuel, and his upright business methods and desire to please have resulted in more than realized expectations.

February 23, 1887, Mr. Evans married Elizabeth Roberts, who was born at St. Asaph, Wales, a daughter of Rev. Richard Roberts, a native of the same place, and granddaughter of John Roberts, representative of a fine old Welsh family. Rev. Mr. Roberts was a merchant before entering the ministry of the Congregational Church, and his useful career was cut short at the age of forty-eight years. To Mr. and Mrs. Evans have been born three children, David Meredith, Gwendoline, and Gladys, the latter of whom died at the age of three years. While living on his farm Mr. Evans took considerable interest in the politics of the Republican party and served as school trustee and was president of the board of trustees when the school was built. He is associated with the Ancient Order of United Workmen and the Fraternal Brotherhood. He is an excellent business man and public-spirited citizen, and has not only commercial standing but has as well made many friends in Los Angeles.

WILLIAM E. THORNTON. Among the master stone cutters and contractors of Los Angeles Mr. Thornton occupies a conspicuous place, his largest opportunity for usefulness being indicated by his position as president of the Master Builders' Association, of which he is also one of the organizers, and the representative in the Chamber of Commerce. He was born in New York City, September 30, 1854, and to an extent inherits the aptitude for his chosen occupation, his grandfather, Thomas, having been a contractor in England, while his father, another Thomas, was for many years a builder and contractor in different parts of the east. Thomas Thornton, Jr., was born in Cheshire, England, and died near Newark, N. J., in 1875. He married Mary Johnson, also a native of Cheshire, and who is at present living at Newark, N. J. There were eleven children in the family, seven of whom are living, W. E. being the second of those living and the only one on the Pacific coast.

Until 1862 Mr. Thornton lived in New York City, after which he went to England and lived in the vicinity of Liverpool, where he attended school. When fourteen he was apprenticed to learn the trade of stone-cutter under his uncle, William Thornton, who was one of the best known and most successful in his line in England. After two years he returned to America with his parents, and settled in Newark, N. J., entering the employ of Spurr & Co., stone men, as a contractor, and remained with the firm until engaging in business for himself in 1874. He established stone-cutting works in Newark, which turned out ornamental stone sculpture and carving, and when his father died, in 1875, took as a partner his brother, the firm name being S. & W. E. Thornton. Soon after, owing to the death of the brother, Mr. Thornton succeeded to the entire business. He had a large business in Newark, and was one of the prominent business men of the place, dealing in Bellville, Dorchester, Ohio and all kinds of free stone, with large warehouses at Nos. 20-24 High street. In 1882 he came to California and engaged in building on a large scale, and in San Francisco built up the Sharon estate, the Children's play house at Golden Gate Park, the Crocker building on Bush street, the building of the Pacific Life Insurance Company on the corner of Sacramento and Montgomery streets, the Kern Land Company's building at Bakerfield, and many other structures of equal importance in the northern part of the state. In 1892 he removed to Los Angeles and built the Southern California Hospital, and has, since his residence here began, taken an active part in all building and contracting matters. Nor have his efforts been confined to the city of Los Angeles, but have extended to San Bernardino, where he built the court house, and to Riverside, where the county hospital is the result of his ability. He also constructed the Fleming building at Phoenix, Ariz. He is a member of the Builders' Exchange, and one of the board of directors, and is connected with the foremost building associations in the city. The Master Builders' Association, of which he was one of the organizers and is the president, has been in existence since 1890, and is one of the most influential associations in Southern California. Mr. Thornton is prominent in fraternal circles, and is a member of the Masons at Newark, Lodge No. 27; Damascus Commandery, K. T.; and Al Malaikah Temple, N. M. S.; also the Ancient Order of United Workmen. Politically he is a Republican. Mrs. Thornton was formerly Emma Fitzpatrick, a native of Fall River, Mass., and of English ancestry.

MORITZ WEBER. Ever since the fall of 1887 Mr. Weber has been identified with building interests in the city of Los Angeles. He came here with plenty of previous experience as a cabinet-maker and general carpenter, and has since put up many important buildings in different parts of the city. He was born in Switzerland, near Lauffenburg, April 9, 1863, his father, Tobias, and his mother, Catherine (Oberist) Weber, being natives of the same locality, as was also the paternal grandfather, John.

Tobias Weber was a blacksmith and nail manufacturer at Sulz Switzerland, with which city he was prominently identified for many years and where he is now living with his wife in comparative retirement. Among the offices of trust maintained by him with dignity and satisfaction was that of mayor, or burgomaster, which he held for over twelve years. His wife's father, Orban Oberist, was a farmer of the vicinity, and came of one of the old Swiss families of that part of the country. She was the mother of thirteen children, who reached maturity, all of whom are living, and eight are in America, M. Weber being the oldest of all.

It was but natural that M. Weber should early acquire a knowledge of nailmaking, in which he was quite proficient before leaving school. However, this particular method of making a living did not appeal to him as being the most desirable, and he therefore turned his attention to learning the trade of cabinet-making, his apprenticeship being served in Basel and lasting three and a half years. In 1883 he came to America via Havre and New York and located in St. Paul, Minn., where he found employment as a cabinet-maker in a furniture factory. In the fall of 1887 he came to California and located in Los Angeles and worked at carpentering until 1890. He then began to build and contract on his own responsibility, and has since erected many important buildings in different parts of the city. He has built a residence for himself and family at No. 1203 West Twenty-fifth street, and also owns a residence on Magnolia avenue, near Adams street.

In Los Angeles Mr. Weber married Adilia Hunzicker, who was born in Alsace, and of this union there are five children, Louisa, Maria, Anton, Leonea and Alfred. Fraternaly Mr. Weber is associated with the Independent Order of Foresters and the Schweitzer Verein, and he has been a member of the Modern Builders' Association since its organization. He has a thorough understanding of his interesting and useful occupation, and is one of the substantial men who have sought a home and livelihood in America, where his enterprise reflects credit upon his picturesque country.

REV. W. O. WOOD. Ohio, the mother of countless splendidly equipped men, who, by virtue of special attainments have indelibly impressed their personality upon the localities in which they have elected to reside, has not neglected Southern California in the distribution of her noble sons, as evidenced particularly by him of whom we write—Rev. W. O. Wood. Of impressive appearance and losing in his face many of the years to which he is by nature heir, he is a typical American gentleman of the old school, and combines a strong intellectuality and widely assimilated knowledge, with a splendid humanitarianism and practical business ability. It is not an exaggeration to say that Mr. Wood has few equals in the extent of his services to the state of his adoption, and whether viewed in fragments or as a whole, his life is worthy of emulation on the part of all who would accomplish much solely upon their own merits.

That adverse conditions build up the strong and break down the weak is a truism emphasized in the life of Mr. Wood. He was born in Scioto county, Ohio, and at the age of seventeen was deprived of the affectionate guidance of his parents. The years had been spent to the best possible advantage, and he had availed himself to the utmost of the privileges of the public schools. Possessing a naturally strong and self-reliant nature, he was not found wanting when the care of the family devolved upon himself and elder brother, and courageously applied himself to caring for those dependent upon him. The family removed from Ohio to Clark county, Ill., in 1840, and with the breaking out of the Mexican war Mr. Wood offered his services to the cause, but owing to the regiment being filled, his services were not needed. When the gold fever swept inland from the Pacific coast in 1849 he sought to tempt fortune in the far west, and with a company of ninety-nine men and his oldest brother crossed the plains with ox teams, leaving St. Joe, Mo., May 7, and arriving at their destination October 8, 1849. The journey was not without its disasters, chief among them being the cholera, which visited the pilgrims with special violence and deprived them of many of their trusted comrades. Mr. Wood himself was not exempt from the ravages of the disease, but eventually regained health and strength. For several years he experienced the spasmodic losses and gains that follow the trail of the miner. Upon returning to his home in Illinois he came by way of the isthmus, and his life afterward settled down into its accustomed grooves.

January 2, 1852, Mr. Wood married Sarah Jane Marrs, daughter of Representative Marrs of Kentucky, and of this union there are four living children: Mary, who is now the widow of J. K. Newman, and has two children, Clara and Willie; Sarah who is the wife of A. L. Gordon, a rancher, and has two children, Anita and Fred; William F., who is a rancher and a deacon in the Baptist Church in San Louis Obispo county, Cal., and Ben, who is living at home with his father. Mrs. Wood died February 1, 1896, and at Springville, in the churchyard of the First Baptist churchhouse in Ventura county, which was organized and built by her and her husband, a fitting monument to her exemplary life and womanly nature marks her last resting place. In 1868 Mr. Wood returned to California with his family and spent the first two years in Sutter county and one year at Kings river, after which he came to his present home near Springville, which was then in Santa Barbara county. His first purchase of land was eighty acres of the old colonial ranch, around which he built the first board fence in the county, which, considering the fact that it was erected twenty-five years ago and is still a good and useful fence, must have been exceedingly well made. Since the first purchase he has added 160 acres near Oxnard to his possessions, and has bought still more from time to time, so that he owns in all 2,000 acres of land in Ventura county, which, with the exception of ten acres, is as level as the Kansas prairies. In addition he owns 160 acres in the celery district of Orange county, near Newport. Not content with the opportunities at hand, his investments have extended into Mexico, where, in the state of Durango, he owns 30,000 acres of land. The home place of Mr. Wood is a truly ideal Southern California retreat, the large and comfortable house being surrounded with a forest of trees and flowers which do credit to the landscape's gardener's art, every tree and shrub that thrives in the sunlight owing its origin to the beneficent forethought and planting of its owner. Fruits also abound, oranges, lemons, berries and the general varieties dear to the heart of the horticulturist, but in quantities sufficient only for home consumption and the delight of friends.

The dominant note in the life of Mr. Wood is undoubtedly his ministry in the Baptist Church, for, permeating his coming and going, his large successes and general claims for recognition, has been the desire to do good in the world, to make life happier and better and broader in opportunity for those by whom he has been surrounded. While a resident of Illinois he was ordained in November of 1863, and during his remaining years in the middle western state he filled several different pulpits in the church. In 1871 he held religious meetings where Santa Paula now stands, and in 1878 he organized a congregation at Springville and was instrumental in securing the erection of the first Baptist house of worship in Ventura county. Senator Bard gave four acres for the church property, and in January of 1880 the building was dedicated free of debt, Mr. Wood having met the last $600 out of his own pocket. This little church has been since under his leadership, his connection therewith dating from 1878, and in 1882 a Sunday school was organized, and has since been successfully conducted.

A staunch Democrat in national politics, Mr. Wood voted for Stephen A. Douglas, and before coming to California was prominent in political affairs, holding offices of trust and responsibility. In California, however, his entire time has been devoted to the management of his large estates and to the work of his church and to the multitudinous demands inseparably connected with the life of a man so admirably fitted to grapple with the problems of life.

THADDEUS S. C. LOWE. Of the many men of gifted attainments whom California proudly claims as citizens there are few who have attained a fame greater than that which Prof. Lowe enjoys. His name is perpetuated in the nomenclature of this state, and in the annals of Southern California he is accorded the distinctive place which his talents deserve. While he is a man of varied talents and achievements, perhaps the crowning feat of his whole life has been the building of the railroad from Pasadena to the top of Mount Lowe, a feat of engineering which stands unsurpassed in the world's history. The road is operated by electricity, and is visited by almost every tourist from the east, by all of whom it is regarded as one of the greatest attractions offered by the Pacific coast region.

T. S. C. Lowe was born in 1832 in New Hampshire, in the village of Jefferson. Boyhood was uneventfully passed, with little to distinguish it from the lives of those around him. His education was begun in the common schools, but the broad information he now possesses is the result of self-culture. He came into national prominence during the Civil war, at which time he originated a plan of signaling with balloons and of generating gas in the field. His ability was recognized and he was placed in charge of the balloon corps in the army of the Potomac. Some years later he invented water gas and the ice and refrigerator process. In 1867, by artificial means invented by him some years before, he refrigerated the first steamship (the William Taber of New York) for the transportation of meats and other foods, which system since then has revolutionized the food supply of the world. In 1888 he came to California and established his home in Pasadena, where he built, on Orange Grove drive, one of the most beautiful residences of this city. Since then he has given much of his time and thought to the consummation of his plan to build a road to the top of the mountain named in his honor—a plan, the successful consummation of which may well be a source of gratification to him. He has also for some years past been president and general manager of the Los Angeles City Gas Company, and at the same time has been identified with other measures, which he has assisted in bringing to a successful issue.

HON. WALDO M. YORK. Identified since 1889 with the legal life of this part of California, Judge York has in the mean time gained a large acquaintance among the people here. From boyhood his tastes were in the direction of the law. With this object in view he devoted every leisure moment to study, and in 1863, when seventeen years of age, he began to teach school. For several years he engaged in that occupation, and in the mean time gave considerable attention to the study of law. In 1868 he was admitted to practice in the supreme court of Maine. Believing that the far west afforded opportunities not possible in the east, in 1871 he crossed the continent and opened a law office in Seattle, Wash. The following year he was elected judge of the probate court of Kings county, of which Seattle is the county seat. In 1873 he married a daughter of Rev. George F. Whitworth, D. D., a Presbyterian clergyman of that city. On the expiration of his term as probate judge he was re-elected, but two years later, in 1876, he resigned the office and removed to San Francisco, where he soon built up an excellent practice. For several years he served as town attorney of Berkeley, where he had his residence. In 1889 he came to Los Angeles to engage in practice, at the same time establishing his home in Pasadena, where he has since resided. From 1891 to 1893 he held office as chief deputy in the office of the district attorney of Los Angeles county. He received from Governor Markham in January, 1894, the appointment of judge of the superior court of Los Angeles county, to which position, in the fall of the same year, he was elected for a term of six years.

HON. THOMAS D. MOTT. Coming to California during the stirring days of the discovery of gold, in 1852, Mr. Mott settled in Los Angeles, where he afterward became an influential citizen. In 1855 he identified himself with the Democratic party, to which he adhered until 1896, when he voted for McKinley. In 1863 he was elected clerk of Los Angeles county, and re-elected in 1865, 1867 and 1869. In 1871 he was elected to the legislature, where his most important service was in the interests of the new railroad to Los Angeles. The road was completed September 8, 1877, when a golden spike was driven in the Soledad Canon, in the presence of the mayors of Los Angeles and San Francisco and a multitude of people. Fifteen hundred men were employed a year on the San Fernando tunnel, which is almost seven thousand feet long.

WALTER LINDLEY, M. D., came to Los Angeles in 1875, was city health officer during 1879-80, officiated as president of the California State Medical Society in 1890, in 1882 was president of the Los Angeles County Medical Association, many years ago became president of the Los Angeles Orphans' Home (of which he is still a trustee), served as president of the Los Angeles Humane Society in 1895, and in 1886-87 was superintendent of the Los Angeles county hospital. From 1885 for several years he served as secretary of the faculty of the College of Medicine, University of Southern California, for six years was instructor in the chair of obstetrics, and for years has been professor of gynecology in the same institution. In 1897, with others, he organized the California Hospital Association, which erected the California Hospital at No. 1414 South Hope street. During a trip to the summit of Mount San Jacinto, in 1886, he was impressed with Idyllwild, a valley of pine forests at an altitude of five thousand feet. In 1899 he again visited the locality, at which time his first impressions were so deepened that, with others, he organized the California Health Resort Company, composed of forty medical men, who have since engaged in developing Idyllwild.

PROF. JAMES A. FOSHAY. The appreciation in which Dr. Foshay is held as an educator is shown by his election as president of the Southern California Teachers' Association, also his election as member of the California Council of Education and the National Council of Education, and as second vice-president of the National Educational Association. In 1898 he went east to the National Educational Association's convention, where he succeeded, in spite of considerable opposition, in securing a decision to hold the next meeting of the association in Los Angeles. Of the success of this gathering, held in 1899, there is no question; it is universally admitted to have been one of the most profitable and pleasant conventions ever held by the organization, and this fact is largely due to the unwearied efforts of the one who from the first championed the selection of this city for the convention.

Dr. Foshay is a director of the Southern California Academy of Sciences, and has taken an active part in musical culture and in literary societies. The addresses he has made upon important educational topics are preserved and studied as affording thought for mental development. Among these addresses are: "School Supervision," "The Teacher's Work," "School Discipline," "Vocal Music as an Educational Factor," "Some Additions to the Three Rs," "Public School Methods in Sunday School Work" and "Some Tendencies in Modern Education." Dr. Foshay is interested in politics only as an educator, but votes the Republican ticket. He is an enthusiastic Mason and is at present deputy grand master of the Grand Lodge of California and eminent commander of Los Angeles Commandery No. 9, K. T. He and his wife are active members of the Baptist Church and are prominent in social functions of a high-class.

MILTON D. PAINTER, proprietor and owner of La Pintoresca, the well-known winter resort situated between Pasadena and the base of the Sierra Madre mountains, was born in Springdale, Iowa, graduated from the Muscatine high school, for five years was employed by a wholesale grocery, and for five years acted as bookkeeper in a store and mills in Marshall county, Iowa. In 1883 he came to Pasadena, and was a partner of his father, John H. Painter, and a brother, Alonzo J., until they died. On the incorporation of the Pasadena Water Company in 1885 he was made secretary and later was chosen president. In 1887, with his brother and father, he founded the Painter Hotel, which in 1897 was enlarged and rechristened La Pintoresca.

HON. ABBOT KINNEY. Among the writings of which Mr. Kinney is the author are "The Conquest of Death," "Money," "Under the Shadow of the Dragon," "Protection vs. Free Trade," "Australian Ballot," "Forestry," and "Eucalyptus." In addition to his literary work he has given time to state legislation. For two years he labored in the interests of the Australian ballot law. Another measure in which he was deeply interested was the movement to break up Indian reservations and allot the lands necessary in severalty to heads of families, with time limit, to insure the preparation of Indians for civilized life and its conditions. Another movement which he has favored is that for opening a way for Californians to own ocean ships by removing the prohibition handicap of local and state taxes, which have been unjust and fatal, because the state taxes property on open ocean, where it does not and cannot protect.

JOHN SCHEERER. Bereft of his parents when young, John Scheerer left his native Germany and crossed the ocean to Springfield, Ohio, where he learned the cabinet-maker's trade. About 1858 he removed to Platte county, Mo., where he carried on a furniture and undertaking establishment, also owned a farm, engaged in raising Shorthorn cattle, and made a specialty of raising bees and selling honey. In that county, October 20, 1861, he married Anga Blankenship, a native of Kentucky. In 1882 they sold out their Missouri property and came to Los Angeles, where they made numerous investments, including the purchase of the old Bryson building. For years Mr. Scheerer was an official member of the First Christian Church of Los Angeles. He died March 27, 1893, and was buried in Evergreen cemetery.

WILLIAM WOLFSKILL was born near Richmond, Ky., March 20, 1798, and in childhood accompanied the family to Howard county, Mo., returning to Kentucky in 1815 to attend school. Two years later he went back to Missouri. At the age of twenty-four he went to New Mexico, where he spent a year in Santa Fe, and then proceeded to Paso del Norte, returning to Santa Fe, and thence going to Taos and undertaking an expedition to the Colorado river and as far south as Chihuahua. Afterward he engaged in buying cattle and driving them east. In the spring of 1828 he took a load of goods to New Mexico and after selling them pursued his way to California, arriving in Los Angeles in February of 1831. At San Pedro he built El Refugio, probably the first schooner in California. Later he engaged in raising stock, grapes and citrus fruit. In November, 1838, he purchased the place in Los Angeles now occupied by his son, Joseph W. In 1841 he planted the first orange grove in this section. In 1856 he planted two thousand trees southwest of what is now the Arcade depot, this being the largest orchard in Southern California at the time. The property proved profitable and large shipments of oranges were made to the east, but the rapid growth of the city caused the destruction of the orchard. Mr. Wolfskill imported sweet almonds from Italy to experiment with planting them here, but the result was not satisfactory. Other nuts and fruits, however, in the planting of which he was a pioneer, proved profitable. In many lines of activity he was a pioneer, and his work did much to prove to strangers the fertility of California soil.

ALFRED P. GRIFFITH. During the past decade no name has been more intimately connected with the development of the Azusa valley and its water interests than that of Mr. Griffith, a well-known horticulturist. The improvement of his fruit farm by no means represents the limits of his energies. For a number of years he served as vice-president and a director of the Azusa Valley Bank and he is now vice-president and a director of the Azusa Irrigating Company. He also holds the responsible offices of president of the Glendora-Azusa Water Company and the Azusa Valley Lemon Curing Company. At the time he became connected with the Azusa Irrigating Company it comprised less than one-half of its present acreage. In 1892 he assisted actively in the reorganization of the company, which, under his leadership, increased its acreage to nearly four thousand acres within the district. During his early connection with the company as director he boldly championed what, in his judgment, was right, against any opposition that appeared, and by his indomitable energy succeeded in the plans he laid for the development of the company's conduit, which during the term was changed from thirty-five miles of mud ditches to an equal length of cement or vitrified conduit. With the subsequent development of the water interests he has been closely connected. The question of irrigation, which has been one of the most vexing problems confronting the horticulturists of California, he has grasped in all its details, and by his keen foresight and sound judgment he has been a leader in the solution of this problem in his own neighborhood.

HON. ALONZO E. DAVIS. As early as 1871 Mr. Davis purchased land in Los Angeles and since that time he has been more or less closely identified with the city. He has made more than one hundred trips by wagon across the plains between Arizona and Los Angeles and his wife has made the same trip sixteen times. For several years he resided at Downey and in 1888 was elected supervisor from that place, -serving for four years. During that time the new court house was built on the superb site that commands the admiration of all visitors to the city. The original plan was for a three-story building, but this was changed to a four-story building, and he also worked indefatigably to secure the fine tunnel and elevator, which has proved remarkably convenient, saving the fatigue of climbing the steep stone steps. In 1897 he was again elected supervisor for a term of four years and was made chairman of the board, which recently, in token of regard for him, presented him with a gold-headed cane and gavel. The Republican party has always received his vote since he cast his first ballot for Abraham Lincoln. He is a progressive citizen and, as an officer, favors all enterprises whereby the city and county may be benefited.

HON. JOHN BRYSON, Sr. It was late in the year 1879 that John Bryson, Sr., came to Los Angeles and stamped the impress of his individuality upon the marvelous present and also the glorious future of this city. He brought with him ample means to back him in any enterprise that his ripened judgment and keen foresight might recommend as being feasible. The city had not, as yet, had even a taste of a genuine boom. The completion of the Southern Pacific Railway from San Francisco two years previous had given it a little jolt in that direction, but the boomer had not arrived, and the peaceable and leisure-loving people were entirely innocent of anything so monstrous as the boom that followed Mr. Bryson's arrival proved to be, and with which he is credited as being the chief promoter.

A brief glance back to the days of 1879 (the date of Mr. Bryson's arrival) will reveal to the reader the rapid, the marvelous strides the city has made as a direct result of the wonderful impetus given by the boom of 1885 to 1887. In 1879 Los Angeles had barely eleven thousand inhabitants. There was not a business block of any pretensions south of First street, except the Nadeau. Adjoining the Nadeau on the south was the wagon shop of Louis Roeder, and south of it stood the Scoville planing mill, and next adjoining that, on the corner where now stands the Bryson block, a lasting monument to Mr. Bryson's great business genius, was the old brick school house, built in 1854, and across the street where the Hollenbeck Hotel stands was a horse corral. Just below Third street on Main stood the old round house. The city had but two parks, the old Plaza, in a wretched condition, and the Sixth street (now Central) park, then surrounded by a dilapidated picket fence and watered by a ragged, open ditch. The city had two bobtail street car lines operated by mule power. Electric cars and electric lights had not been dreamed of. There was not a telephone in the city, no mail delivery, not a paved street, and the city hall was a straggling old adobe at the corner of North Spring and Franklin streets, where the Phillips block now stands. The change that has since been wrought in Los Angeles is due not a little to Mr. Bryson's energy. He has been connected with various banks in an official capacity, has assisted in building up the city and has been active in local politics. On the Democratic ticket he was elected mayor, and his administration was conducted upon a business basis.

JOHN P. ENGELHARDT. The occupation which Mr. Engelhardt has followed for years is that of horticulture, in which so many residents of Southern California have gained prosperity and success. During 1882 he came to the upper San Gabriel valley and settled on the ranch which is still his home. Under his energetic supervision thirty acres have been placed under cultivation and planted to various fruits, and, in addition to this tract, he has one hundred and twenty acres of mountain land. His original purchase was only fourteen acres, but he subsequently homesteaded one hundred and sixty acres of land in a primitive condition, from which he has, by constant and judicious labors, evolved a fine horticultural ranch. His place is known as "Engelwile."

H. BERT ELLIS, A. B., M. D. The birth of Dr. H. Bert Ellis took place in Lincoln, Me., May 17, 1863. His education was obtained in the public schools of Fredericton and in the University of New Brunswick, where he spent a year. During the following three years he attended Acadia University, Wolfville, Nova Scotia, from which institution he was graduated in 1884. In July of that year he came to Los Angeles, and for a year was engaged in agricultural pursuits and in business enterprises in this city and Pasadena. In 1887 he matriculated in the medical department of the University of Southern California, and was graduated there in April, 1888. During a portion of this time he was interne at the Los Angeles County Hospital. Subsequent to his graduation here he went to Europe in order to perfect himself in special branches, and there pursued studies at the universities of Göttingen, Germany, and Vienna, Austria. April 1, 1889, he opened an office in Los Angeles, and entered upon a professional career which has been exceptionally successful. Since 1893 he has devoted himself exclusively to the treatment of diseases of the eye, ear, nose and throat, and has won wide distinction in this important and difficult field of labor. In October, 1889, he was honored by being chosen as a lecturer on physiology in the College of Medicine of the University of Southern California. In October, 1890, he was elected professor of the same department, and continued to act in that capacity until January, 1896, when he was elected to the chair of ophthalmology, and in November, 1898, was further honored by being made treasurer of the college of medicine.

That Dr. Ellis stands especially high among his professional brethren is shown by the fact that he has so often been called upon to serve in official positions in the numerous medical organizations to which he belongs. In 1899 and 1900 he was president of the Southern California Medical Society. He was senior vice-president of the American Medical College Association, and has been either the secretary or assistant secretary of the Los Angeles County, Southern California, State and American Medical Associations, the American Medical Editors' Association and of the Doctors' Social Club of Los Angeles.

FREDERICK W. SHERWOOD. Within the limits of Covina valley there are few fruit-packers and shippers so well known as the Fay Fruit Company, with which Mr. Sherwood has been identified since 1898, having had the contract for the packing of their fruit at Covina. This company, during the orange season of 1900, shipped two hundred and ninety cars from Covina to the eastern markets, making the largest shipment of oranges from this point during the season, with the exception of the shipment made by the Covina Citrus Association. Besides his work in this connection, Mr. Sherwood has for ten years engaged in horticulture in Covina, owning an orange orchard of eight acres, which is in a high state of cultivation. He is also a director of the Covina Mutual Building Association and a member of the loan committee of the same.

HON. GUILFORD WILEY WELLS. After an honorable official and military career, Colonel Wells was in June, 1877, appointed consul-general to Shanghai, China, by President Hayes. He accepted and sailed from San Francisco for China on the 8th of August. His first work was, in obedience to orders, to investigate charges against O. B. Bradford, vice-consul at Shanghai, whom he found guilty of grave offenses, such as embezzlement of government fees, removal of official papers from the consul-general's office, violation of treaty rights, robbing of the United States mails, etc. On being convinced of Mr. Bradford's guilt, Colonel Wells had him arrested, and reported the same by telegraph and letter to the state department at Washington. The inexcusable delay in replying, and other matters, convinced him that Mr. Bradford and his colleague, George H. Seward, were being shielded, and he therefore tendered his resignation, and sailed for home, January 10, 1878. A committee of congressmen subsequently investigated the charges, found them correct, and the affair caused the retirement of both Bradford and Seward to private life. Colonel Wells was subsequently twice offered the consulate at Hong Kong, but refused.

While on their way home from China, Colonel and Mrs. Wells visited Los Angeles and were so delighted with the climate that they resolved to settle here. Accordingly, in 1879, they returned and Colonel Wells opened a law office, with Judge Brunson as a partner, this relation continuing until the latter's election to the superior bench. Afterward the firm of Wells, Van Dyke & Lee carried on a law practice until Mr. Van Dyke was elected superior judge, when he was succeeded in the firm by Mr. Guthrie. In 1886 that partnership was dissolved and the firm of Wells, Monroe & Lee was organized. In January, 1891, J. P. Works succeeded Mr. Monroe and the title became Wells, Works & Lee, continuing as such until the illness of Mr. Wells compelled his retirement. As attorney, he was connected with many of the notable cases in California, among them a number of murder trials that attracted attention throughout the entire country.

FREDERICK K. ADAMS, secretary and manager of the Pomona Fruit Growers' Exchange, is a native of Monroe county, N. Y., born February 18, 1854. His parents, Caleb K. and Laura (Keeler) Adams, were natives of New Hampshire and Connecticut respectively. Although he was the youngest of six children, at the death of his father, in 1869, he virtually assumed charge of the household. For two years thereafter he not only bore its responsibilities, but continued his studies in the neighborhood schools. The family then removed to Rochester, N. Y., the farm having been sold, and there he pursued a course in the Williams Business College. For several years he was employed as a bookkeeper in Rochester, and later he operated a steam laundry for about a decade.

Owing to ill health, Mr. Adams was obliged to relinquish his business interests in the east and seek a more congenial climate and a different occupation. In 1889 he came to Pomona and purchased an orange grove of twelve acres, of which he is still the proprietor and manager. At the same time he at once evinced an active interest in the public and educational affairs of this city. For two years he served as president of the board of education, and for four years was its secretary. Since settling in Pomona he has been identified with the Pilgrim Congregational Church, of whose board of trustees he is now president. For some two years Mr. Adams was in the employ of the Pomona Fruit Exchange, and was its secretary most of the time. In 1898 the name was changed to the Pomona Fruit Growers' Exchange, since which year he has not only been secretary, but manager as well.

WESLEY WILBUR BECKETT, M. D. The date of the birth of Dr. Beckett is May 31, 1857, and the place of his nativity was Forest Grove, Washington county, Ore. His boyhood was chiefly spent in California. Having determined to devote his life to the medical profession, he took up studies along that line and attended Cooper Medical College and the University of Southern California, from which institution he was graduated April 11, 1888. In New York City he pursued a complete course of special studies in the New York Post-Graduate School and Hospital. Returning to California, he opened an office in Los Angeles in February, 1889, met with success, and gained the friendship of patients and acquaintances. From time to time he has contributed valuable articles to the Southern California Medical Journal and to eastern publications.

HON. THOMAS E. GIBBON. Thomas E. Gibbon was born May 28, 1860, in Monroe county, Ark., to which state his father, Dr. W. R. Gibbon, had recently removed from Virginia. When twenty-two years of age he went to Little Rock, where, by application and hard work, he mastered the intricacies of the law, at the same time meeting his own expenses by teaching in the public schools. In 1883 he was associated with W. L. Terry, and for a period of four years he worked indefatigably to build up his practice and serve the interests of his clients. In 1884 he was elected to represent Pulaski county in the state legislature of Arkansas, where he enjoyed the honor of being the youngest member of that body.

Mr. Gibbon arrived in Southern California July 17, 1888. He opened an office in Los Angeles, and has been engaged chiefly in corporation law. He is retained as attorney by the Los Angeles Lighting Company, the Los Angeles Electric Company and is not only counsel but also vice-president of the Los Angeles Terminal Railway Company, and vice-president of the Herald Publishing Company.

As a member of the Free Harbor League, he accomplished grand results for the deep-sea harbor at San Pedro, and, having been honored by being made chairman of the committee which was to attend to the matter of setting the subject of the new harbor in the proper light before congress, he has gone to Washington seven or eight times, and has battled for the rights of San Pedro. He is a member of one of the committees of the Chamber of Commerce, and in the summer of 1897 he was sent as a delegate from Southern California to the Trans-Mississippi Commercial Congress at Salt Lake City, where he urged upon that body, chiefly repre-

WILL A. HARRIS. For eighteen years after his arrival in California Mr. Harris was busily engaged in the practice of law in San Bernardino, and in 1877 was elected to the position of district attorney of his county, in which office he served to the entire satisfaction of all concerned. For some years he has been a resident of Los Angeles and has built up a large and remunerative practice among our representative citizens. His field of endeavor has been larger than that of most lawyers of the day, as he has not confined his talents to any particular branch of professional work. While for the most part he has devoted his time to civil law, there have been a few notable exceptions, and he has proved his superior ability in the criminal courts no less than in others. When in San Bernardino, as previously mentioned, he was the public prosecutor, and later he defended those charged with crime, in a few notable instances, winning fresh laurels for himself in every case. He has given special attention to the law as applied to mining property, and among others conducted the famous Silver King case. He was connected with the litigation growing out of the first location in Randsburg, and is counsel in the very important litigation growing out of the recent discoveries of oil in California. In a number of very important cases where the interstate commerce act was involved he displayed remarkable knowledge of constitutional law, going to the very root of the subject.

HENRY GREEN BRAINERD, M. D. Dr. Brainerd was born in Londonderry, N. H., May 23, 1852, a son of Rev. Timothy G. and Lucinda R. (Dewey) Brainerd. He was reared upon a farm. When he was in his fifteenth year he removed to Iowa with his parents. At the age of eighteen he entered the freshman class of Iowa College, at Grinnell. Later he went to Dartmouth College, where, in 1874, he graduated with the degree of A. B. During the years of his preparation for and actual work in college, he taught several terms of school in Iowa, Vermont and Massachusetts. In 1874-75 he was principal of the Independence (Iowa) city schools. The following winter he attended lectures in the medical department of the Iowa State University. From April, 1876, to April, 1877, he was interne at the state hospital for the insane, in Mount Pleasant, Iowa. After having the degree of M. D. bestowed upon him by Rush Medical College, in Chicago, in 1878, he became assistant to his preceptor, Dr. C. M. Fitch, of that city. In the summer of the same year he was appointed assistant physician in the Iowa hospital for the insane, at Independence, Iowa, and subsequently became assistant superintendent of that well-known institution. He remained there for eight years, rendering valuable aid in the management of the hospital, and in the mean time went to New York City and pursued a post-graduate course in the winter of 1882-83.

About 1887 Dr. Brainerd came to Los Angeles. In 1888 he was elected to the chair of mental and nervous diseases in the College of Medicine, University of Southern California, a position which he still occupies. In 1897 he was further honored by election as dean of this justly celebrated institution. From 1889 to 1893 he was superintendent of the Los Angeles County Hospital, and during the same period served as surgeon of the Los Angeles Cable Railway Company. He is a member of the American Medical Association, the State, Southern California and Los Angeles County Medical Societies, and is a medical director in the Conservative Life Insurance Company. In 1896 he officiated as president of the county medical society. For some time he has been a member of the Doctors' Social Club and the University Club of Los Angeles.

JOHN F. FRANCIS is a director of the Farmers and Merchants' Bank, vice-president of the Chamber of Commerce, vice-president of the Free Harbor League, vice-president of the Associated Charities, and a prominent member of the California, Sunset and Jonathan clubs. In 1897 he was president of La Fiesta de Los Angeles, and as such was largely instrumental in securing the success of that function, which forms so important a part of the social life of the city.

Born in Clinton, Iowa, Mr. Francis was the son of a shipbuilder who was employed on the Clyde and Mersey rivers in England, but came from there to America and lost his life in the mines of California in 1853. On leaving school Mr. Francis started on a voyage around the world, but with a devotion which leads one to seek the land of his birth he sought his native country. Possessing a love for military affairs, at the age of sixteen he enlisted in the Kansas Volunteer Cavalry under the command of Capt. David L. Payne, with whom he had many thrilling experiences in the noted Indian campaign on the western Kansas frontier in 1867. Afterward he spent several years adventuring over the plains and mountains of Wyoming, Colorado and California, obtaining a rich fund of information, so that by the time he came of age he was in possession of valuable ideas regarding this great country. He next visited all the great places and points of interest in Europe, returning to California in 1888. After a short time here the death of a friend took him back to Europe, where he remained until 1891.

The marriage of Mr. Francis in 1892 united him with Doña Maria de Los Reyes Dominguez, youngest daughter of Don Manuel Dominguez, whose father, Don Cristobal Dominguez, was an officer of the Spanish army at the time California came into the possession of the United States.

GRIFFITH J. GRIFFITH. A notable example of wise, clear-headed philanthropy occupied the columns of the Los Angeles newspapers in 1897-98. Among the many wealthy men in this city is one who has acquired an honorable fame by donating from his private property adjoining the Angel City the largest single tract of land ever acquired for park purposes by any city in the world, and the only city park in existence possessing a lofty mountain peak within its borders.

The donor of this park is Col. Griffith Jenkins Griffith, whose genial presence is manifest in a well-knit frame, cordial manner, pleasant countenance and hearty salutation. He was born January 4, 1852, on a farm near Bridge-End, in Glamorganshire, Wales, about thirty miles from the seaport of Cardiff. At an early age he came to America with an uncle. He spent his boyhood in the state of Pennsylvania, where he received the elements of an education. Striking out for an independent career, he first went to Pittsburg and entered the employ of the Columbus West Carriage Company. From there he went to Philadelphia. A year later, in 1873, he came to the Pacific coast and in San Francisco joined the editorial staff of the Alta California, and became the reporter of its mining department, at that time a very important feature of San Francisco journalism. In 1880 he became superintendent of a group of fifteen mines in Prospect Mountain, Nevada. He was also largely interested in mining properties in the state of Chihuahua, Mexico.

Having acquired a competency through a judicious use of his opportunities in Mexico and elsewhere, and having, in one of his southern trips, become enamored of Southern California, Colonel Griffith in 1882 transferred some of his interests to Los Angeles, and made considerable investments in landed property. Among his acquisitions was the purchase of the princely domain known as the Rancho de los Feliz, embracing rich alluvial bottoms bordering on the Los Angeles river for a distance of five miles, and also a valuable belt of the frostless Ca-huenga foothills.

During the rapid growth of Los Angeles in recent years and the consequent enlargement of the city limits, the subject of providing additional parks to meet the future needs of a modern civilized community has been considered and earnestly discussed by those who have the welfare of the city at heart. This was Colonel Griffith's opportunity to serve the public and execute a purpose which he had cherished for years. From the extensive Los Feliz Rancho he carved out a tract embracing three thousand and fifteen acres (nearly five square miles) of mountain and valley, sloping hillside and sheltered dale, rock and forest and stream, full of picturesque beauty, and susceptible of wonderful arboreal and botanical development, and this magnificent domain he presented to the city of Los Angeles, to be forever devoted to the public use of the people for park purposes.

MARY J. GREEN, M. D., of Los Angeles, is deserving of credit for the success which she has achieved. Being the eldest of twelve children, seven of whom are daughters, she early felt the responsibilities of life weighing upon her. She was born August 9, 1857, upon a farm near Chillicothe, Mo., her parents being Preston Hemingway and Lydia (Pace) Minor. Reared upon her father's farm in Missouri, she received her elementary education in the public schools. Later she entered Professor Long's seminary, and completed her literary studies under his supervision. December 30, 1875, she became the wife of William A. Green, of Scott county, Ky. Two children were born to them: Rita Lydia and Buel Herndon. In 1890 Mrs. Green was graduated with honors from the Kansas City (Mo.) Homeopathic Medical College, and was chosen to be the valedictorian of the class. The following year she served as house physician in the hospital connected with the college.

In 1892 Dr. Green established an office in Salt Lake City. On account of the poor health of her son, however, she decided to locate permanently in a sunnier and more equable clime, and in December, 1893, she came to California, and spent several months in the state prior to her arrival in Los Angeles. Since April, 1894, she has resided on South Flower street, having her office and home at the same place. She is a specialist in diseases of the nervous system and surgical diseases of women and children, and is rapidly extending the lists of her patrons. Though the major portion of her time is devoted to her professional duties and to studies along the line of her chosen work, she is very patriotic and progressive, taking great interest in the welfare of her country and community, and doing everything within her power to promote the good of the majority. Religiously she is a member of the Broadway Church of Christ, and socially she is identified with the Friday Morning Club. Formerly she was a member of the Kansas, the Missouri and the Utah State Homeopathic Medical Societies, and at present she is connected with the Southern California Homeopathic Medical Society.

AURELIUS WINFIELD HUTTON. In Abbeville district, South Carolina, April 8, 1805, was born Aquila D. Hutton, and in Edgefield district of the same state, in 1812, was born Elizabeth H. Tutt, the parents of A. W. Hutton, who was born near Hopewell, Greene county, Ala., July 23, 1847. About January, 1866, he entered the law office of Bliss & Snedecor, at Gainesville. Remaining with them about one year and a half, he then entered the law department of the University of Virginia, from which he was graduated in June, 1868. On his return home he determined to locate in the then little known state of California. Sailing from New York, January 23, 1869, he arrived via the isthmus in San Francisco, February 15, 1869. There he remained until April of that year, and then came to Los Angeles. Immediately upon his arrival he entered the office of Glassell & Chapman, but in a short time began practicing law. He was one of the original stockholders in the San Gabriel Orange Grove Association, the corporation which purchased and laid out the lands upon which Pasadena was originally founded. He acted as attorney for the company. In December, 1872, he was elected city attorney of Los Angeles. In December, 1874, he was re-elected, being the first person chosen twice in succession. As city attorney he drafted the first special charter (that of 1874) for Los Angeles. The city had been incorporated under a general law, and various special acts had been passed by the legislature down to that period. In 1876 the charter was revised by him and the city council. There have been other city charters since then, but in these may be found many of the wise provisions laid down in that of 1874. As city attorney he assisted in drafting the ordinance granting the first franchise for a street railway, and conducted the legal proceedings for the condemnation of lands donated by the city to the Southern Pacific Railway Company, in pursuance of the vote of the people for rights of way into the city. Prior to his incumbency, so far as can be learned, there had never been used in the mayor's or municipal court any complaints, warrants or commitments. After some efforts he succeeded in convincing the proper officials that the law required such formalities.

In February, 1887, the number of superior judges of the county was increased from two to four, and a full meeting of the bar was held to select two attorneys for recommendation to the governor. There were six applicants. On the first ballot, two being voted for at once, Mr. Hutton received a four-fifths vote. Governor Bartlett appointed him to one of the positions. On the distribution of the business of the courts, recommended by a committee of prominent attorneys, assisted by the late Judge Brunson, who had resigned as superior judge, there were assigned to Judge Hutton's department three-fourths of all the common law and equity cases tried without juries, and nearly all the law and motion calendar. He presided for some of the other judges and tried a few cases with juries, but never in his own department did he have a jury. He gave general satisfaction, as was evidenced by the support given him in the election of 1888. In the celebrated issue between the Southern Pacific Railway Company and one Coble, with reference to the overlapping land grants, Judge Hutton, in a case involving one hundred and sixty acres, found for the defendant, thus declaring the land grants forfeited, and opening them to settlement. This was the first decision by any court of this important question. Subsequent cases involving the same question were instituted in the United States circuit court, and Judges Ross and Sawyer decided them in favor of the railroad company and against the government and the settlers. An appeal to the United States supreme court was next had, and this court reversed the rulings of Judges Ross and Sawyer (See 146, U. S. R., pp. 570-615) and laid down the law as Judge Hutton had done in the Coble case.

DANIEL FREEMAN. The most trivial incidents sometimes change one's destiny. Had the newsboy, on the train running from Macon to New Orleans, in February, 1873, placed on the seat occupied by Mr. Freeman any other book than "Nordhoff's California," his whole future and that of his family would have been different. He had been traveling through the south with his wife, who was suffering from consumption, and it was his plan to take her by steamer to Jamaica, but the casual reading of the description of California awakened his interest. The book was bought, its contents eagerly scanned, and the result was that they started for the Pacific coast the next morning. Arriving in San Francisco, he visited different portions of California, investigating various ranchos. Among other places visited was the Centinela rancho, over which he rode in April, 1873, with the owner, Sir Robert Burnett, now of Scotland. He was attracted by the wealth of grasses and bright flowers, and decided that, with cultivation, the place might be made a bower of beauty. However, as to its value for agriculture, the baronet did not give an encouraging report, for he stated the land was too dry for farming and valuable only for grazing purposes. On leaving this ranch, Mr. Freeman visited many other properties, but none attracted him as did the Centinela. In September he leased the ranch for five years, with the privilege of buying it within that time, for $6 an acre, the total acreage being twenty-five thousand. Besides the Centinela, he acquired the Sausal Redondo, so that his property extended from Ballona to

In purchasing the land Mr. Freeman also acquired sheep, and afterward engaged largely in the sheep-raising business. The loss of twenty-two thousand head, owing to a drought in the winter of 1875-76, led him to seek another industry to which to devote himself. During that season he experimented with barley, and, on a rain-fall of only four and one-half inches, raised an average of twenty-five bushels per acre, on a section of land. Since then wheat and barley have been among the staple products of the ranch. In 1880 he sent a shipload of wheat to Liverpool and another of barley to New York, and every year large shipments have been made to various points.

El Rancho Aguaje de la Centinela (for such is the name of the estate as given by early Spanish settlers), when Anglicized, becomes the Ranch of the Spring of the Sentinel. The name was taken in part from the splendid natural water supply, which was known to exist although wholly undeveloped prior to Mr. Freeman's acquisition of the land. The artesian wells now give one hundred and fifty miners' inches of water. Water can be found at any point on the ranch at ninety feet, and a splendid supply at one hundred and fifty feet. An orchard bore as fine seedlings as could be found anywhere, but these are now being budded over to Washington navels and Valencia lates. The original ranch house, which is perhaps one hundred and fifty years old, is the home of A. C. Freeman, the oldest son of Daniel Freeman, while the latter, with his daughter, Mrs. Charles H. Howland, and her husband, Captain Howland, occupy a new residence that is one of the most beautiful in the west, standing in a parklike enclosure of about sixty acres, acre after acre studded with rare shrubs, exotic plants and choice trees. The grounds were laid out by Captain Howland, who also planted the orchard of twenty-five acres that is now in fine bearing condition.

Of Canadian birth, Daniel Freeman was born in Norfolk county, June 30, 1837. His ancestry is traced to Edward Freeman, who came from England to America in 1658, and settled in Woodbridge, N. J. Born in 1670, he was married at Woodbridge in 1696, and his son, William, was a native of that city. The latter had a son, Andrew, who was the great-grandfather of Daniel Freeman. The latter, on his mother's side, was of Scotch-Irish lineage. When a young man he studied and practiced law, while at the same time he owned a large shipyard at Port Burwell, on Lake Erie. In 1866 he married Miss Christie, by whom he had two sons and one daughter, and whose death occurred in California in 1874. Personally he is a man of remarkable business capacity, with the shrewd foresight and force of character that almost invariably bring success to their possessor.

JOHN EDWARD HOLLENBECK was for years one of the most influential men of Los Angeles, to whose development he was a large and progressive contributor. His interests were varied and important; his career was one of unusual activity. Arriving in Los Angeles in the spring of 1876, he settled permanently in the city which he had visited two years before and of whose future he had from the first cherished the greatest hope. He purchased land on the east side of the Los Angeles river and erected what was at that time one of the most valuable residences in the entire state. This continued to be his home until his death. To the improvement of the place he gave much time and thought, and expended thousands in the embellishment of the several acres of grounds.

In 1878 Mr. Hollenbeck became a stockholder in the Commercial Bank of Los Angeles, and was elected its president, holding the position three years. He then, with others, organized the First National Bank, of which he was chosen president, and he held the position until ill-health obliged him to retire from heavy business responsibilities. After his resignation as president he and his wife spent many months in travel in this country and abroad. Before and after his return from Europe he bought large tracts of property, and at one time owned six hundred acres four miles south of the city limits. On this property he planted a vineyard of three hundred acres. He also owned land in the San Gabriel valley, on which he raised oranges, lemons and grapes. Among his other possessions was a grain and stock ranch, comprising thirty-five hundred acres of La Puente rancho. In 1884 he built the Hollenbeck block, one hundred and twenty feet on Spring and two hundred and forty feet on Second street. At one time he was the principal owner of the East Los Angeles and Main and Sixth street horse-car line, and was also interested in the line to Boyle Heights.

After five months of gradually increasing weakness, Mr. Hollenbeck died September 2, 1885. His forethought was shown in the fact that he had made provision out of his estate for all of his relatives. In his passing from earth Los Angeles lost one of its prominent and successful pioneers.

GEN. MARSHALL C. WENTWORTH, known from the Atlantic to the Pacific coasts, through the numerous guests that he has entertained at his White Mountain and California hotels, as one of the most genial and attentive of hosts, spends his summers at Wentworth Hall, Jackson, N. H., and his winters at the Raymond, Pasadena, Cal. A son of William H.

H. and Mary (Clark) Wentworth, he was born August 16, 1844, in Jackson, N. H., of good English ancestry, being a direct descendant in the eighth generation from Elder William Wentworth, the immigrant, the lineage being: William, Ephraim, Ephraim, Ephraim, Spencer, Charles B., William H. H., Marshall C. Elder William Wentworth was baptized in 1615 at Alford, England, where also he was reared and educated. Accompanying Rev. John Wheelwright to America in 1636, he settled at Exeter, N. H., where he was for many years pastor of the Congregational Church.

Spencer Wentworth, the great-grandfather of General Wentworth, was the first of the name to locate at Jackson, coming here with his wife, whose maiden name was Eunice Smith, at an early day. Charles B. Wentworth, son of Spencer, was born in Meredith, N. H., and there spent his early life. Coming to Jackson with his parents in 1816, he located two miles above Jackson Falls, on the road to Carter Notch, where he was engaged in farming until his death in 1845. He served as deputy sheriff for Coos county for a number of years.

William H. H. Wentworth, son of Charles B. and father of the General, was born in 1818, and was a lifelong resident of Jackson. Succeeding to the homestead cleared by his father from the wilderness, he carried on general farming throughout his active career. His death occurred in 1864. A man of sterling worth and integrity, he was highly esteemed as a citizen, and exerted a beneficial influence in the community. He was a Democrat in politics and a member of the Free Will Baptist Church. He married Mary Clark, who was born in Maine, of Welsh ancestors. Having received a good education, she taught school prior to her marriage, being a most successful teacher.

Marshall Clark Wentworth inherited a love of knowledge and books from his mother, and toiled hard to obtain an education, walking eight miles every day that he might attend the district school, at the same time doing such work on the homestead as usually falls to the lot of a farmer's boy. Although but sixteen years old when the war that threatened the dissolution of the Union broke out, he was among the first to offer his services to his country, wringing a reluctant consent from his parents. He enlisted April 27, 1861, at Bethel, Me., as a private in Company I, Fifth Maine Volunteer Infantry, for a term of three years, during which time he was never absent from duty for a day, but took part in every engagement participated in by his regiment. Returning home at the expiration of his term of enlistment, he found his father ill, and remained to care for him. His father died a few months later; and he re-enlisted in January, 1865, in the First New Jersey Cavalry, in which he served until the close of the war. During the war he participated in twenty-seven engagements, including the first and second battles of Bull Run; the Seven Days' fight; the battle of South Mountain; the first and second battles of Fredericksburg; the engagement at Salem Church; the battles of Spottsylvania, May 10 and 12, 1864, when his regiment broke the rebel lines and captured many prisoners; and those of Gettysburg, Mine Run, and Five Forks. He had many hairbreadth escapes while in the army, at one time, while on picket duty with three companions, being attacked by twenty rebels, who killed one of his companions and captured two, he alone escaping, although wounded. At Five Forks he received a wound in the foot, from which he still suffers. He refused offers of promotion, preferring to stay in the ranks with his comrades, who said of him, "A braver soldier never fired a gun!"

Returning to Jackson at the close of the war, he remained there for a short time, and then served for a while as conductor on a passenger train running between New York and Elizabeth, N. J. He has since been constantly engaged in the hotel business, winning fame and friends, his active career in this line commencing with his marriage. May 30, 1869, he married Georgia A. Trickey, daughter of Captain Joshua and Martha P. (Meserve) Trickey, and very soon after the young couple took possession of the Thorn Mountain House, which Captain Trickey built especially for them. In its care and management they put forth their best efforts, making it one of the most attractive of the many summer resorts in the White mountain region, giving their personal attention to their guests.

Meeting with great success, General Wentworth has since erected other houses of entertainment, building Arden Cottage in 1881, Wentworth Hall and cottages in 1883, Thornycroft in 1885, Glenthorne the same year, and Elmwood in 1886. In 1892 he added a handsome building called "The Casino," which contains a theater, ball-room and other amusement rooms. In 1891 he erected "Wentworth Castle." It is built of rough field stones and contains fifteen handsome rooms, nearly all of them with open fireplaces. This is the private residence of General and Mrs. Wentworth and is occupied by them from May until November each year. It is situated on a slightly eminence, two hundred feet above Wentworth Hall and Cottages, and opposite Jackson Falls. It is, perhaps, one of the finest private houses in the state. Since then he has done what an artist would do in finishing or completing a picture, and has made it the most ideal place in America.

During the winter seasons the General has continued his work in warmer climates, in 1884, 1885 and 1886 having charge of the Laurel House, at Lakewood, N. J., and from 1891 to 1895 being manager of the Raymond, at Pasadena, Cal. In the year last named the Raymond was burned; and General Wentworth assumed the control of La Pintoresca, Pasadena, retaining it throughout the winter seasons until the completion of the new Raymond, a larger and more magnificent hotel than the former one, of which he has the entire management. In 1899 he planned and equipped the magnificent hotel, the New Frontenac, in the Thousand Islands, St. Lawrence River, N. Y., and subsequently managed it for two years. During the winter of 1899 and 1900 he also assumed the management of the mammoth hotel, the Lakewood, at Lakewood, N. J., in connection with his California hotel, La Pintoresca. Two winters were also spent traveling extensively abroad, much time being devoted to the study of the science of hotel keeping as exemplified in European countries.

General Wentworth is a Republican in his political affiliations, and served from 1881 until 1882 as quartermaster-general on the staff of Governor Charles H. Bell, and in 1884 was a member of the Republican electoral college. Fraternally he is a member of Mount Washington Lodge, F. & A. M., of North Conway; of Greenleaf Chapter, R. A. M., of Portland, Me.; and of the Saco Valley Lodge, No. 77, I. O. O. F., of North Conway.

It is safe to say that General and Mrs. Wentworth are wider and more favorably known to the guests that frequent the leading summer and winter resorts of our country than any other persons connected with the hotel business, which they have so ably assisted in raising to a very high standard by the introduction of agreeable and esthetic features, giving to each guest the pleasures and comforts of home life.

GEN. JOHNSTONE JONES. Gen. Johnstone Jones, of Los Angeles, was born in Hillsboro, Orange county, N. C., September 26, 1848, and is a son of Col. Cadwallader Jones, formerly a resident of Columbia, S. C. In 1872 he became editor of the Daily Observer at Charlotte, N. C., but sold his interest in the paper in 1874. During that year he was elected secretary of the state senate; in 1875 was secretary of the constitutional convention of North Carolina; in 1876-77 edited the Daily News at Raleigh, N. C.; and January 8, 1877, was appointed adjutant-general of North Carolina, with the rank of brigadier-general, by Governor Zebulon B. Vance, who was afterward United States senator. To this office he was reappointed by Governor Thomas J. Jarvis in 1881 and by Governor Alfred M. Scales in 1885, his third term expiring in January, 1889. In 1884, while a resident of Asheville, N. C., and adjutant-general of the state, he was elected a representative of the county of Buncombe in the general assembly of the state.

On account of the ill health of Mrs. Jones the family came to California in August, 1889. In San Diego General Jones entered into partnership with James E. Wadham and engaged in the practice of the law. In September, 1890, he was nominated by the Democratic party of San Diego for district attorney, and received eighteen majority in the November election, out of a total vote of seven thousand and thirty-four, he being the only Democrat on the ticket elected in the county that year. He filled the office for two years. In March, 1893, he formed a co-partnership with James L. Copeland, ex-district attorney of San Diego, and Frank W. Goodbody, ex-deputy district attorney.

The partnership was dissolved in October, 1893, and on the 1st of November of that year General Jones removed to Los Angeles and entered upon the practice of the law in this city. In 1896 he was nominated for the state senate in the thirty-seventh senatorial district, comprising the larger part of the city of Los Angeles, being the Democratic nominee, with the endorsement of the Populists, Silver Republicans and Labor party, and was defeated by Hon. R. N. Bulla, the Republican nominee. January 1, 1899, he was appointed assistant district attorney by James C. Rieves. In the Spanish-American war he raised a cavalry regiment of twelve troops in ten days after the declaration of war and tendered their services to the president and governor. The companies were located in the city of Los Angeles, and in Pasadena, Los Nietos valley, Norwalk, Whittier, Santa Ana and San Bernardino. The organization was complete and numbered twelve hundred men. He was elected colonel of the regiment.

J. P. SPENCE. Overlooking the San Gabriel valley and occupying an attractive and picturesque location high up in the foot hills near Monrovia stands the home of Mr. Spence. This California pioneer of 1851 was born in County Fermanagh, Ireland, December 15, 1829, being a son of Gabriel and Jane (Porteus) Spence, lifelong residents of the Emerald Isle. His paternal grandfather, James Spence, crossed the ocean to America and settled in Ohio, where he gave his attention to the improvement of a farm, remaining there until he died. The maternal grandfather, David Porteus, was a farmer of Ireland. In a family of three children J. P. Spence was the youngest. He was given a fair education in private schools and from an early age assisted in tilling the soil of a homestead. Starting out for himself in 1850, he sought the greater opportunities of the United States, and for a time remained in Ohio. However, a year later he joined the throng of gold-seekers in the west, and for eight years engaged in mining in Nevada county, Cal.

Turning his attention to another form of activity Mr. Spence in 1850 settled in Santa Clara county, where he bought seventy-five acres adjoining the city of San Jose. This he improved and afterward sold at a fair profit. A later purchase consisted of two hundred and thirty-six and one-half acres adjoining the town of Milpitas, in the same county, and this property he also improved and sold. The year 1887 found him in Southern California. Coming direct to Monrovia, he bought a ten-acre tract, which he has improved with oranges. In addition he is the owner of twenty-six acres at Burbank, both of which properties have been increased in value through his judicious improvements and constant cultivation.

Though at no time active in public affairs nor solicitous for official recognition, Mr. Spence is not unmindful of every duty which he owes as a citizen, and we find him a contributor to movements for the public welfare. In politics he always votes with the Republican party. Some years after coming to California he established domestic ties through his marriage, in 1856, to Miss Annie White Parker, who was born at Southampton, Long Island, daughter of a sea captain. The second wife of Mr. Spence, whom he married in 1892, was formerly Fannie Leach and was a native of New York. In his family there are four sons and one daughter, namely: Willie P.; Dollie, wife of William R. Olinder, of San Francisco; Edward, Frank and George. The family are identified with the Methodist Episcopal Church.

G. A. STEVENS. This pioneer of 1874 in California, who is now engaged in business in Long Beach, was born in Gillhall, Vt., a son of Rev. Henry Reginald and Henrietta (Hodgekin) Stevens, also natives of Vermont. He was the only son among five children, all of whom are living. His father, when a young man, entered the Methodist Episcopal ministry and during the Civil war served as a chaplain in a Vermont regiment. Not long after the war closed he removed to Michigan and settled in Hillsdale, Mich., where his uncle, Rev. Ransom Dunn, D. D., had in 1855 established the Hillsdale College, under the auspices of the Free Baptist Church. On account of failing health in 1874 he came to California, where the genial climate soon restored him to his former strength and usefulness. He continued to live in the west until his earth life ended, in February, 1894.

Of the Vermont town where he was born December 3, 1866, G. A. Stevens entertains no recollections, as he was taken to Michigan in infancy. When he was about five years of age he accompanied the family to California, and after a year in San Francisco went with them to Berkeley, next to Oakland, from there to Fresno, later to Pine Ridge, thence to Hanford, and finally to Santa Barbara county and from there to Kings county, in each of which places his father held pastorates. About 1885 the family came to Los Angeles. Meantime he had attended public and high schools, and after coming to this city was a student in the University of Southern California. Later he entered the employ of the Southern Pacific, and then was with the Santa Fe Railroad Company, for a time as baggageman and then as conductor between Los Angeles and San Bernardino. After ten years of experience in railroading he abandoned that occupation in 1894 and has since been especially interested in buying and selling horses. He can scarcely remember the time when he did not make a "hobby" of the subject of horses. His friendliness toward the animals is reciprocated by them, and even the most unruly specimen of equine flesh easily becomes tractable under his control. In 1898 he opened the Bay View stables at Long Beach, of which, and of the Bay View Transfer Company, he has since been proprietor and manager. The stable on Ocean avenue is the largest building of its kind in the city and is equipped with vehicles of every kind, including the popular tally-ho.

By the marriage of Mr. Stevens to Miss Veve Wilcox, who was born in Sacramento and reared in San Bernardino, there are three children, Ruth, Fern and Bert. The family attend the Methodist Episcopal Church, of which Mrs. Stevens is a member. In fraternal relations Mr. Stevens is identified with the Woodmen of the World and the Uniform Rank, K. of P., while in politics he is a Republican, and commercially holds membership in the Long Beach Board of Trade.

J. CARVASSO FRASER, M. D. The genealogy of the Fraser family is traced back to Sir Simon Fraser, a daring and gallant Scotchman, who was given a coat of arms by Robert Bruce in recognition of his courage in saving the life of that distinguished leader when hard pressed on the field of battle. From Scotland the family became transplanted in New England. Hon. Allen Fraser, a native of Connecticut, removed to Oneida county, N. Y., where he cleared a farm out of the primitive woods. A man of worth and intelligence, his fellow-citizens several times elected him a member of the state legislature. By birthright he was a member of the Society of Friends. On the farm that he cleared from the forest was born his son, Westel W., who succeeded to the possession of the homestead and there died at fifty-four years of age. In early manhood he married Hannah Whitaker, who was born in Steuben, Oneida county, N. Y., and was a daughter of Joseph Whitaker, a native of Connecticut, of Puritan stock, a farmer by occupation, and during the war of 1812 a soldier in the American army. The homestead near Westernville is still occupied by Mrs. Fraser. Of her two sons and two daughters, J. Carvasso, the oldest, is the only one in California. He was born on the farm near Westernville November 24, 1850, and received his education in public schools and Whitesboro Academy. By reason of delicate health in boyhood he first became interested in medicine, and in that way decided to make the profession his life work. In order to secure the means necessary for his medical education he taught school between the ages of eighteen and twenty-one, and then took up the study of medicine under Dr. Wolcott of Holland Patent. In 1872 he matriculated in the medical department, University of Michigan. A year later he entered Bellevue Hospital Medical College of New York, and while there acted as assistant to Dr. Keyes, professor of skin diseases and surgery. March 1, 1875, he was graduated from this institution, after which he returned to Oneida county and opened an office at Ava. Gradually he built up a practice that extended through all of the surrounding country. The constant demand for his services, by night and by day, gave him no opportunity for needed rest and undermined his constitution. Just about this time an epidemic of diphtheria broke out among adults, and he was among his patients night and day. Finally, when the disease had about been stamped out, he himself fell a victim, and, being worn out with constant service among his patients, he was not in condition to easily conquer the trouble. When the diphtheria passed away, paralysis set in, and for three months he was practically helpless. When that disease had been successfully treated, a weakness still remained in the throat that rendered necessary removal to a less trying climate.

With the hope that California might prove beneficial, Dr. Fraser came west in November, 1885. Within two months his throat was well again, and he then went back east and resumed his practice. In July, 1887, he decided to settle in California permanently and came to Pasadena, soon, however, removing to San Diego, and from there coming back to Pasadena in June, 1888. During the summer seasons of 1892, 1893, 1894 and 1895, he acted as physician at Wentworth Hall in the White mountains, while in the winter months he was physician at the Raymond hotel, but the burning of this building not only forced him to change these arrangements, but also caused a total loss of his books and surgical instruments. In 1896 he visited Honolulu. An attack of pleurisy, in June, 1899, caused him to relinquish professional work, and, although he has since regained his health, he has retired from active practice.

In October, 1900, he accepted the presidency of the Pasadena National Bank, but, finding the confinement taxing his strength, he resigned in February, 1901, and returned to his old home for the summer. From 1897 to 1901 he was a director of the bank, and is still one of its stockholders. Other local interests are the ownership of residence property in Pasadena and two ranches near the city. In common with many Californians, he has mining interests. Included among these are his interests at Randsburg, also in Sierra county, Cal., and he is president of the Success, Piute and Al Medico Mining Companies, also vice-president and a director of the Electro-Geodetic Mining Company. The Pasadena Board of Trade numbers him among its members. In political views he votes with the Republicans. In the east he married Miss Edith A. Brown, a native of Ohio. He was made a Mason in Baron Steuben Lodge No. 165, A. F. & A. M., of Booneville, N. Y., and is now connected with Pasadena Lodge, No. 272, F. & A. M.; was raised to the chapter, commandery and thirty-second degree in this city, and is a member of Al Malaikah Temple in Los Angeles.

REV. A. C. JEFFRIES. The original stock of the Jeffries family was Scandinavian or Horse-Vikings, and the genealogy is traced back to the year 900 in Normandy, from which country they accompanied William the Conqueror to England in 1066. In early periods the name had various spellings, viz.: Godfridus, Godfrey, Godefroy, Godefrey and Geofferoy, gradually changing in later times to Jefferoy, Jefferrey, Jefferey, Jefferies, Jeffrey, Jeffris and Jeffries. The ancestor in America was Robert Jeffries (whose name, according to his Norman-English ancestors, would, in the year 1106, have been spelled Rolf Godefroy.) He was born in Wiltshire, England, in 1656, and came to America in 1681, settling at Uplands, now Chester, Pa., where he died in 1739, leaving a large family to inherit his name. In 1688 he had married Jane Chandler, who was born in England in 1670 and died in East Bradford, Pa., in 1726. She was the mother of seven sons and five daughters, all of whom survived her, namely: George, John, William, James, Robert, Thomas, Benjamin, Patience, Charity, Jane, Anne and Mary. Three years after the death of his first wife, Robert Jeffries, at the age of seventy-three, married his second wife, Anne Archer, who bore him a son, Richard, born at East Bradford, Chester county, Pa., February 24, 1730. The latter, like his father, was twice married. In his family there were twenty-nine children, twenty-one of whom attained years of maturity. His first wife was Jane Logue, whose surviving children were: Jesse, Samuel, Caleb, John, George, Joseph, James, Hannah and Abigail.

In 1785 Richard removed from Chester county to Huntingdon county, Pa., where his wife died the same year and was buried in a graveyard on the home farm, on the north bank of the Tuscarora river. A year thereafter he married Nancy Davis, who was born May 5, 1765. She was the mother of twelve surviving children, namely: Mark, Armor, David, Nesbit, Richard, Robert, Isaiah, Mary, Rachel, Nancy, Elizabeth and Sarah. Her death occurred in 1841 at Piqua, Ohio, where she had lived with her son Robert and her daughter Elizabeth, Mrs. James Thompson.

In the early days the son and namesake of the original ancestor, Robert Jeffries, settled in the south; various sons of Richard and Jane (Logue) Jeffries, also went south, including Samuel and Caleb, who settled in Virginia; James, a sea captain, who went to Baltimore; and George, who settled in Frederick, Md. In appearance the founder of the family in America was a man of fine physique, about six feet tall, of dignified bearing and cordial manner, and one who enjoyed the pleasures of social life. He was noted for his energy, industry and business capacity, and his advice was often sought in private and public affairs. He was a son of John Jeffries, of Wiltshire, England, a respected country gentleman and landed proprietor, whose family line is traced back to the tenth century; and a cousin of Judge George Jeffries, baron of Wem, chief justice under King Charles II and Lord Chancellor of England under King James II, and who died a prisoner in the tower of London in 1689. The motto of the family, which is still used in England and America is Post Nubila Phoebus (freely translated, "The sun shines forth after the clouds have passed").

From the southern branch of the family Rev. A. C. Jeffries of Los Angeles is descended. He was born near Columbus, in Fairfield county, Ohio, February 17, 1839. His father, James, of Virginian birth, accompanied his parents to Ohio at nine years of age and spent the remainder of his life there, engaging first in freighting and later exclusively in farming. In religion he was connected with the United Brethren Church. Though his life was prolonged to the age of seventy-nine years, he was quite active and strong until his last illness. He was a son of William Jeffries, a Virginian, and an overseer of slaves there, but from 1818 until his death a resident of Fairfield county, Ohio, where he engaged in teaming and farming.

The marriage of James Jeffries united him with Mary Benadun, who was born in Fairfield county, Ohio, and died there at eighty-seven years of age. Like her husband, she was connected with the United Brethren Church. Her father, George Benadun, was a Pennsylvanian, of German extraction. In her family of six sons and eight daughters, all but two attained maturity, and of these A. C. was the fourth in order of birth. His boyhood days were passed in Ohio, where he began to operate a rented farm at twenty-two years of age. The following year he married, February 20, 1862, Miss Rebecca Boyer, a native of Fairfield county, her father, Jonathan Boyer, having settled there from Pennsylvania. The Boyer family is of German descent. Born of this marriage were six sons and four daughters, two of whom died in childhood. The following survive: Alameda, wife of Louis Boyer, of Los Angeles; C. C., in Arizona; Lydia, Mrs. J. H. Southworth, of Los Angeles; Willis E., (known as Tom), and John, at home; James J., who as the world's champion has brought renown to the family name; Charles, (known as Jack), who is with his brother; and Lillie, at home.

In 1882 Rev. A. C. Jeffries removed from Ohio and bought a sheep ranch near Los Angeles, the place consisting of ninety-seven and one-half acres, of which he still owns sixty acres. The balance has been sold off in lots in East Los Angeles. The family have continued to make their home on the ranch, the superintendence of which is given over to the son John. The house at No. 591 Arroyo Seco avenue, East Los Angeles, was, at the time of building, in 1882, one of the best in the city. Since 1887 Mr. Jeffries has devoted himself to preaching, which he follows after apostolic plan, accepting no remuneration for his labors, and preaching on the street or in such buildings as are available. Recently he returned from a long evangelistic tour in Europe. Constant traveling and preaching do not impair his rugged and strong vitality, and he is unusually active for a man of sixty-three, carrying easily the burden of his years. Possessing a unique personality, with long hair and beard and a face whose lines show determination, he is a conspicuous figure in any throng, and the interest which his appearance attracts is heightened by a conversation with this self-sacrificing and faithful preacher of the Gospel.

GEORGE F. JENNINGS. The discovery of gold in 1849 brought many adventurous spirits to California, numbered among whom was George F. Jennings, a native of Lockport, N. Y. Those were times of peril by sea and perils by land, of hunger and thirst, of dangers from savages and from wild animals, and only a man of great bravery could pursue his way undaunted and undiscouraged. In his struggle to discover gold in the mines, he labored early and late, glad if, when pay day came, there was enough gold to pay the miners and other laborers. When it is considered that his father was wealthy and the necessity for this struggle not apparent, it will be recognized at once that he was a man of great determination and pride, who wished to secure an income independent of family aid. His father, John D. Jennings, was a native of Vermont, and throughout much of his active career engaged in the real-estate business in Chicago, where he bought large tracts of land at an early day and, reaping the benefit of the vast increase in price, accumulated an estate valued at $4,000,000. To him belongs the credit for originating the system of the ninety-nine year lease, which has been everywhere adopted.

The marriage of George F. Jennings united him with Mrs. Lovell, a native of Burlington, Vt., and a daughter of Warren and Hannah (Rockwood) Gibbs, also born in Vermont. Her maternal grandfather, Reuben Rockwood, was a farmer of Vermont, but died in middle age before his daughter was born. During many years Warren Gibbs held a leading position in Vermont by virtue of his position as editor of St. Albans Messenger, a leading paper of the state. For some twelve years he was president of the Vermont Life Insurance Company. An active politician and able statesman, he filled numerous offices, chief among which was that of state senator. Later he removed to Chicago, Ill., and there he died in 1895, at the age of sixty-four years.

Shortly after leaving school Miss Gibbs became the wife of E. W. Lovell, M. D., who was born in Vermont and engaged in the practice of medicine from early manhood until his death. One child was born to this union, John G. Lovell, president of the Hodge Bros. Company, of Pasadena, and now in charge of the automobile department of the same. At this writing a brick block is building on the corner of Union and DeLacy streets, which on completion will be occupied by the company. In 1893 Mrs. Lovell was married to Mr. Jennings, who, as previously intimated, had large mining interests in the west, included among these being an interest in a gold mine in Nevada, of which General Page was part owner. After his retirement from active cares Mr. Jennings indulged his fondness for horses and fishing, and was often to be seen driving behind a fine span of horses, or seeking some quiet spot, with an abundant supply of fishing tackle and bait. In politics he was a Republican, but not active. In religion both he and his wife affiliated with the Congregationalists. His death occurred in Pasadena. Mrs. Jennings makes her home at No. 537 South Orange Grove avenue, and also owns a residence in Chicago on the corner of Thirty-fourth street and Michigan avenue. Included among her other possessions is a ranch of one hundred acres, adjoining the Country Club on the east, and beautified by a grove of live oaks. Water has been introduced by pipe line and every improvement has been made preparatory to planting. In her travels around our own and other countries, Mrs. Jennings has exercised her fondness for kodaking and has secured some pictures that are artistic souvenirs of various incidents and experiences. Doubtless her enjoyment of travel has been greatly enhanced by her disposition, which is sunny and cheerful, with a happy knack of looking at the humorous side of things; and it is the possession of this and other admirable traits that has won friends for her in every place she has visited.

J. W. JOHNSON. In addition to following the occupation of a contractor and builder in Gardena, Mr. Johnson is the owner of a small fruit farm and devotes a portion of his time to its cultivation. The tract comprises four and one-half acres, of which one acre is in alfalfa and the balance divided equally between raspberries and Logan berries. In the supervision of his garden and in filling contracts for building, he finds his time well occupied, and thus has never had occasion to regret the decision which led him to remove to California in December of 1892.

Near Lexington, Mo., Mr. Johnson was born January 3, 1865, being a son of G. W. and Mary (Pennington) Johnson, natives of Frankfort, Ky. He was the younger of two sons and the youngest among the six children that comprised the family. On removing to Missouri, his father settled near Lexington, where he bought eighty acres, and the remaining years of his life were devoted to the improvement and cultivation of this tract. The son, J. W., received his education in district schools in Missouri, supplemented by a course of study in the high school of Omaha, Neb., where later for six years he was engaged in the photographic business. From there he went to Kenosha, Wis., where he was similarly occupied for six months. The same occupation was subsequently followed in Salt Lake, Utah, for thirteen months, after which he came to California and followed photography in Los Angeles for a year or more. From that business he turned his attention to contracting and building, in which he is still engaged. December 7, 1899, he came to Gardena, where he now makes his home. Though never a partisan in political views, he is nevertheless a staunch Republican. He is connected with the Fraternal Brotherhood, the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and the Independent Order of Foresters, in which latter organization he served as chief ranger for one year.

In Garden Grove, Cal., occurred the marriage of J. W. Johnson and Miss Frankie Holt, and they are the parents of two sons, Claude and Carl, who are respectively eight and five years of age. Mrs. Johnson was born in Nova Scotia, and in 1867 was brought to California by her father, J. W. Holt, who settled at Hollister and took up general farming pursuits. From there in 1890 he removed to Garden Grove and bought a ranch of forty acres, which he has since occupied and cultivated.

M. W. RAIBLEY. Although spending a portion of the '80s in California, Mr. Raibley did not become a permanent resident of the state until 1895, at which time he settled in Moneta, his present home. The first purchase that he made here consisted of ten acres, partly improved, and afterward he bought a tract of similar size, but destitute of improvements. On the land he has erected a ranch house, planted an orchard, and secured an abundance of water from a seven-inch well, two hundred and eight feet deep. He has ten acres in barley, two acres in Logan berries, four acres in peas, and a small tract in alfalfa. In addition to this property, he has one hundred acres in barley, the land being leased from the German-American Savings Bank.

On the night that Abraham Lincoln fell a victim of the assassin's bullet, April 15, 1865, M. W. Raibley was born in Spencer county, Ind., being the fourth in a family of four sons and two daughters. His father, John, a native of Germany, was brought to the United States by his parents at seven years of age and settled near Batavia, Ohio, where he grew to youth on a farm. When sixteen years of age he went to Indiana and settled in Spencer county, buying and improving a farm of one hundred and thirty acres. The remaining and active period of his life was spent in the improvement and cultivation of this tract, and on it his death occurred in 1901, when he was sixty-four years of age. He married Caroline Wilhelmus, who was born in Germany, but was brought to America by her parents when three years of age, and hence entertained no recollection of the land of her birth.

When Mr. Raibley was a boy there was no school nearer his home than a primitive building one and one-half miles distant, and often it was not convenient to send him there, for his services were needed on the farm. Hence he had little or no educational advantages, yet by study in the great school of experience he has acquired much valuable knowledge, chief among which is his ability to hold his own even under trying and adverse circumstances, and against the schemes of dishonest adventurers. When a young man he operated a sawmill in Indiana. During 1886 he came to California and secured employment in a vineyard at Florence, later working in a winery. Returning to Indiana in 1888, he bought a farm and devoted himself to its cultivation. But, after an experience with California climate, he was dissatisfied in Indiana, and accordingly returned to the far west, where he hopes to spend the balance of his life. By his marriage of Miss Fannie Taylor, of Indiana, he has three children, John, Charles and Margie. Fraternally he is a member of the Independent Order of Foresters.

HENRY KOEPKE. The success which has rewarded the efforts of Mr. Koepke proves him to be a man of more than ordinary ability. If he had been to the "manor born," so that as a native American citizen he could have risen from poverty to his present position, it would be saying much; but when it is remembered that twenty-seven years of his life were passed upon a foreign soil, and that in America he began with less than nothing, his success is praiseworthy. To-day he is a thoroughgoing American, in sympathy with everything that bears the mark of progress and independence, and no resident of Tropicico is a more loyal citizen than he.

In Mecklenburg-Schwerin, Germany, Mr. Koepke was born February 18, 1844. In youth he served an apprenticeship of three years to the wagon-maker's trade, paying $40 for the privilege of learning the trade under an employer who gave him long hours of toil and little recreation. As a journeyman he was employed at Hamburg for three years, also in other cities. In June, 1871, he arrived in New York City, and from there went to Waterloo, Iowa, thence to a small town, Denver, twelve miles distant. Buying a few tools with which to begin work, he found himself $15 in debt, in a strange locality, without means or friends. However, a young man of energy is not easily discouraged, and Mr. Koepke did not allow himself to be daunted by adverse circumstances. For two years he worked at his trade there, and then started a wagon shop of his own in Tripoli, Iowa. There he was united in marriage with Miss Mary Reimers, who was born in Holstein, Germany, and died in Oregon November 26, 1895, leaving three children, namely: Ernest, who is engaged in the grocery business at Ellensburg, Wash.; Minnie, at home; and Frederick, a student in the Cooper Medical College at San Francisco, Cal. The second marriage of Mr. Koepke took place in 1897 and united him with Miss Melinda Schultz, of Columbus, Ohio, by whom he has two sons, Arnold and Henry.

Selling out his shop at Tripoli in 1880, Mr. Koepke moved to Oregon and bought one-half section of prairie land in Umatilla county. On this land, as soon as he had cleared it, he began to raise wheat. From time to time he added to his possessions until now his property aggregates fifteen hundred acres in one body, which is rented, his rental for 1901 being over ten thousand bushels of wheat. In addition he is the owner of two hundred acres of valley land near Ellensburg, Wash., valued at $10,000, and a store building valued at $15,000 in the city of Ellensburg. Since 1897 he has made his home in Tropicico, where he owns a homestead of six and one-half acres, planted in citrus and deciduous fruits. Being to a large extent retired from business cares, he devotes himself to the oversight of his homestead, the care of the trees and the cultivation of the fruit, this work being done, less for a hope of profit, than for the attainment of his ambition to possess a thrifty bearing orchard, that will compare favorably with the best in the neighborhood. With his family he attends the Presbyterian Church. His life has been one of busy industry, but in his large estates he is fully repaid for the self-sacrificing labors of previous years. Passing his life in business and agriculture, he has paid little attention to politics, further than supporting good men for office. He is a man of warm heart and generous impulses, and one who deserves and receives credit for what he has accomplished in the world.

MRS. JENNIE A. REEVE. Long Beach is happily the gainer by the presence in the midst of its manifold advantages of women with many claims to distinction, and whose ideals and endowments reach beyond the boundaries of the purely social and ethical to participation in vital business enterprises. Among the women whose force of character and ability to cope with the strenuous activities of life have won for them an honored place in this community, none more emphatically realized their many-sided expectations than has Mrs. Jennie A. Reeve, a resident of this seaside town since 1896.

A descendant of old Dutchess county, N. Y., stock, the earlier members of which gloried in the beauties of the historic Hudson, and industriously tilled the productive acres along its picturesque banks, Mrs. Reeve was born in Poughkeepsie, and is a daughter of James H. Allen, and granddaughter of Joseph Allen, who owned a farm one and a half miles south of Poughkeepsie, on the Hudson. The family is of English descent, and the emigrating ancestor is supposed to have settled in New York. James H. Allen was a farmer in earlier life, and later engaged in the hardware business in Poughkeepsie. On the maternal side Mrs. Reeve is descended from French-Huguenot exiles. Her mother was formerly Ann Eliza Frere, a native of Poughkeepsie, and whose forefathers were among the first settlers of Ulster county, N. Y. Her father, Jacobus Frere, was born at New Paltz, where he engaged in farming, and where he passed the greater part of his life. Frere is the French for brother. Mrs. Allen, who died in New York, was the mother of six children, one of whom is deceased, Mrs. Reeve being the only one on the coast. One of the sons, Henry C., served in the United States army during the Civil war, and fought at the battle of Mobile under Farragut. He is now a resident of New York City.

Mrs. Reeve was educated in Poughkeepsie, and there spent her youth and young womanhood. June 15, 1859, she married Erastus R. Reeve, who was born near Kingston, N. Y. His father, Benjamin Strong Reeve, was born in Newburgh on the Hudson, October 17, 1824, and was a farmer during his active life. The family is of Welsh descent, and for many years has been identified with the city of Newburgh. The mother of Mr. Reeve was, before her marriage, Mary Van Kleeck, a native of Kingston on Hudson, and of Dutch descent. The youngest in his father's family, Mr. Reeve received a practical education, and at a comparatively early age embarked in business in Poughkeepsie with Mr. Vassar, under the firm name of Vassar & Co. He died in the surroundings of his youth and later life, October 17, 1874. He was a member of the Episcopal Church, and was a man of leading characteristics and business ability. But one child was born to Mr. and Mrs. Reeve, Mary Reeve, a graduate of Vassar College, and now the wife of Henry A. Darling, of Long Beach.

Mrs. Reeve first came to California in 1885, and after a trip through the state returned to her former home in the east. In 1893 she renewed her former delightful experience here, and in 1896 located permanently in Long Beach. Her ability has drawn her into many channels of usefulness and activity, and she is accounted one of the most practical business women in the town. She is interested in the Long Beach Land Improvement Association, of which she is a member of the board of directors, and she was one of the organizers of the First National and the Citizens' Savings Bank. In religion she is a member of the Episcopal Church. Her philanthropic and other interests are, in their extent and usefulness, worthy so cultured and exemplary a member of the community.

ANDREW GLASSELL. Lying in the San Fernando valley and in close proximity to Tropic is the well-appointed home of Andrew Glassell, a member of a pioneer family of Los Angeles county and a son of a prominent lawyer of pioneer days. His property possessions aggregate between four and five hundred acres, the major portion of which is devoted to general farm products, while there are ten acres in deciduous fruits. The land affords excellent facilities for grazing and stock-raising forms one of the industries of the owner. In addition to these various interests he is a director in a gold and copper company which owns and is developing mining property in Providence mountains.

In San Francisco, Cal., Andrew Glassell was born October 20, 1860, being a son of Andrew and Lucy (Toland) Glassell, natives respectively of Culpeper county, Va., and South Carolina. Extended mention of his father's life and the family ancestry appears elsewhere in this volume; but it may be added here that the father was a man of such remarkable ability that, although coming to California without means, his intelligence, keen mental faculties and great energy enabled him to accumulate a large property, which represented his unaided earnings. At his death he left an estate valued at $760,000, which is now in charge of the executors, preparatory to division among the eight children. Many of his qualities came as an inheritance from worthy Scotch progenitors. His father, Andrew, enlisted in the war of 1812 from Virginia, but peace was declared before he had an opportunity to engage in any battles. During the Civil war he lost all of his property and about 1867 came to Los Angeles, joining his son and namesake. At that time he was seventy-five years of age, and his death occurred six years later. His grandfather, Andrew, a native of Scotland, born in 1738, founded the family in America, where he settled about 1756 in Virginia. There is a family tradition that his ancestors had gone from France to Scotland with Mary Queen of Scots.

When the Glassell family came to Los Angeles at the close of the Civil war the subject of this article was five years of age. His education was received in the city's grammar and high school, after which he read law with his father for a time. However, his time and attention have been devoted principally to horticulture, general farming, the assisting in superintending his father's estate, and a real-estate business in Los Angeles. His judgment of the values of properties in his home county is excellent and seldom at fault. While he is not active in politics and cares little for partisan matters, yet he has been prevailed upon by his party (the Democratic) to serve as delegate to county conventions and to aid its affairs by his wise counsel and influence. In Los Angeles he was united in marriage with Miss Rietta M. Ring, who was born in Louisiana, being a daughter of his father's second wife, Mrs. Virginia Micon Ring. Three children have been born of their union, namely: Andrietta and William M., at home; and Virgie, who died at twelve years of age.

G. G. GLOWNER. The first trip that Mr. Glowner made across the plains was during the gold-mining days of 1850, when he braved the perils of the desert and wilderness, and the hostility of the Indians, in order to reach the land of promise in the far west. Often now, in these opening years of the twentieth century, as he sits in his comfortable home at Gardena, he contrasts those days with the present, and notes with gratification the splendid advance which California has made in every line of activity.

In Richland county, Ohio, Mr. Glowner was born October 2, 1828, being a son of Godlip and Polly (Barker) Glowner, natives respectively of Germany and Pennsylvania. His father crossed the ocean at eighteen years of age and settled in Pennsylvania, but soon removed to a farm in Richland county, Ohio, and as early as 1835 traveled westward to Missouri, where he homesteaded one hundred and sixty acres. The transformation of this unimproved tract into a profitable farm occupied the remaining years of his life, and on the old homestead he died when fifty-five years of age. Of his seven children G. G. was next to the oldest. The family being poor, he had no advantages whatever. Indeed, his whole schooling consisted of only two months' attendance at district schools, where the mode of instruction was as crude as the building itself.

When twenty-two years of age Mr. Glowner crossed the plains with an ox-team, making the journey in four months. The journey was not without its dangers, although the Indians committed no further depredations besides the stealing of his horse and one cow. Arriving in California, he sought and secured employment in the mines above Sacramento. Finding less profit in the mining industry than he had anticipated, he turned his attention to agriculture, and for three years cultivated a farm in Mendocino county. He then went back to Missouri, but in 1865 again crossed the plains to the Pacific coast. In 1869 he bought one hundred and sixty acres in Ventura county, where he turned his attention to ranching. From there in 1877 he removed to Los Angeles county and bought eighty acres, where he engaged in general farming for eight years. The year 1885 found him a resident of Los Angeles, where he bought four cottages and rented these, superintending the same personally. On selling out these houses, in 1898, he came to Gardena and bought ten acres of partially improved land, of which he now has six acres in alfalfa, and the balance in peaches and plums. Since coming here he has rebuilt the house, making it better adapted to the needs and comfort of his family. At no time has he been active in politics, in which, indeed, he takes no part aside from voting the Democratic ticket. In religious views he is a believer in the Baptist faith.

While living in Missouri Mr. Glowner married Miss Mary Neece, who was born in that state. Her father, George Neece, who was a native of Tennessee, devoted all of his active life to agriculture. For years he operated a farm in Missouri, but about 1859 came to California and settled in Mendocino county, where his death occurred. Four children comprise the family of Mr. and Mrs. Glowner, namely:

Catherine, who is married and resides in Gardena; George; Mary, who married Charles Dunn, of Norwalk; and Lee, at home.

HON. H. H. MARKHAM. During the eighteenth century the family represented by ex-Governor Markham of Pasadena was identified with the growth and development of New England. Brazilla Markham, who was born at Brookfield, Conn., March 2, 1738, became a business man in Pittsford, Vt., but later settled in Essex county, N. Y., where he died in the village of Jay, June 1, 1824. His wife, who bore the maiden name of Anna Whittaker, was born September 1, 1758, and died at Jay in 1804. Among their children was a son, Nathan B., who was born at Pittsford, Vt., April 27, 1796, and during a long and active business career engaged in iron manufacturing at Wilmington, N. Y. While still a mere boy he enlisted in the war of 1812, and among the engagements in which he bore a part was that at Plattsburg. The old musket which he carried is now one of the prized possessions of his son at Pasadena. In an early day he was initiated into Masonry and afterward raised to the Royal Arch degree. During the existence of the Whig party he was true to its principles, and after its disintegration he became a Republican. His death occurred at Manitowoc, Wis., January 22, 1882.

The wife of Nathan B. Markham was Susan McLeod, who was born at Sullivan, N. H., September 22, 1801, a daughter of Deacon Thomas and Patty (Wilder) McLeod, natives respectively of Boston, Mass., and Sullivan, N. H. Her father, whose birth took place about 1790, became a resident of New Hampshire and from there removed to a farm in Essex county, N. Y. For a long period he served as a deacon in the Presbyterian Church. His wife, who was born in 1794, was a member of a colonial family of New England. At Wilmington, N. Y., Susan McLeod became the wife of N. B. Markham May 10, 1827. Their married life covered a long period of years and was one of mutual happiness and helpfulness. Nor were they long separated in death, for she followed him to the grave October 15, 1882, less than a year after his demise.

Ten children comprised the family of N. B. and Susan Markham. The eldest, John D., was born April 23, 1828, and is a resident of Manitowoc, Wis., where for years he has been a practicing attorney. Alice, born March 30, 1829, married John Killen, and died in Manitowoc, Wis. Byron, born April 26, 1830, is a retired business man of New Lisbon, Wis. Perley, born August 13, 1834, is married and resides in Benzoni, Mich. Elisha Alden, born March 7, 1836, resides at Groton, Mass. Clarissa, born July 17, 1837, married Nelson Darling and died in New Lisbon. Delia, born December 1, 1838, died in New York. Henry Harrison, born in Wilmington, Essex county, N. Y., November 16, 1840, is a citizen of Pasadena, Cal. David Earl, born February 21, 1842, became an attorney and died in Neenah, Wis. George C., the youngest of the children, was born May 7, 1843; he became an attorney and is also now the third vice-president of the Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Company of Milwaukee.

The studies of the public schools were supplemented by a course at Wheeler's Academy in Vermont. After graduating, in the spring of 1862, Henry Harrison Markham went to Manitowoc, Wis. In August of the same year he enlisted in Company G, Thirty-second Wisconsin Infantry, and was mustered in as a private at Madison, thence went into camp in Tennessee. With Sherman he marched through Georgia to the sea, thence north through the Carolinas. At River's Bridge, S. C., February 3, 1865, he was severely wounded. From there he was sent to Beaufort, S. C., and on recovering from the wound was sent north and mustered out at Milwaukee, July 23, 1865, as second lieutenant, having held that rank since the first year of his service. Having decided to take up the study of law, he entered the law office of Waldo, Ody & Van in Milwaukee. In 1867 he was admitted to all the courts of the state and the United States supreme court, and at once began to practice in Milwaukee, where two years later he took his brother, G. C., into partnership.

February 22, 1879, when Pasadena was a village with about seventy-eight houses, Mr. Markham cast in his fortunes with the infant colony and shortly afterward he purchased twenty-two and one-half acres between Fair Oaks and California avenues, which property has since been his home. In 1887 he erected on Pasadena avenue a residence that architects and builders pronounce the most elegant and conveniently-equipped of any in the city. This charming home is presided over with gracious dignity by Mrs. Markham, formerly Mary A. Dana, who was born in Wyoming, Ill., educated in the Rockford Female Seminary, of which she is a graduate, and married in Chicago. Her father, Giles C. Dana, who was a business man of Waukesha, Wis., traced his ancestry to an old eastern family, connected with Israel Putnam and other colonial statesmen. Four children comprise the family of Mr. and Mrs. Markham, namely: Marie, who was graduated from Leland Stanford University in 1900; Alice, a student in Throop Institute; Gertrude and Hildreth. Another daughter, Genevieve, died in Sacramento in 1891 when seven years old.

The public career of ex-Governor Markham may be said to date from 1884, when he was elected a member of congress to represent the sixth congressional district, including all of the state from the city of San Diego to the vicinity of San Francisco, and comprising fourteen (now seventeen) counties. It will be readily understood that the candidate found himself busy in canvassing his district, and, in fact, though he labored in season and out of season, there were three of the counties which he found it impossible to visit. However, his campaign work was so well done that he was elected by a majority of five hundred, although his predecessor, a Democrat, had received thirty-two hundred majority. At the expiration of his term, not only his own party, the Republican, but the Democrats as well, telegraphed him that the nomination for re-election was his, without opposition. However, he declined the honor. Perhaps the most important feature of his work as congressman was the recognition he received for Southern California. In those days Northern California was well known throughout the entire country, but little was known of the southern part of the state, and its magnificent possibilities were unappreciated. As a result of his intelligent and arduous labors, he secured the establishment of a United States court in Southern California, started a movement in favor of a harbor, won the measure for the founding of a Soldiers' Home, now known as the Pacific Branch of the National Home for Disabled Soldiers, and secured the transfer of the department of Arizona of the regular army to Los Angeles, where it remained until the second administration of Cleveland, meantime bringing into this part of the state about $3,500,000 annually. In order to assist old soldiers who desired pensions he employed an assistant, who gave his entire time to these matters, paying him $75 per month out of his own salary. The successful work he had done in connection with the starting of the Soldiers' Home made his selection as a member of its board of managers a wise choice, and he continued in that capacity until he was nominated for governor of California, when he resigned. Meantime, finding the appropriation for the home to be insufficient, he went to Washington at his own expense and by his personal efforts secured an appropriation of $187,000 with which to complete the home.

As the Republican candidate, in opposition to ex-Mayor Pond of San Francisco (Democratic), he was elected governor in 1890, receiving a majority of about eight thousand. He took the oath of office January 7, 1891, and served in the executive chair until January, 1895, when he retired, not having been a candidate for re-election. During his term he secured an appropriation of $300,000 for California's exhibit at the World's Fair, which was the largest fund appropriated by any state except Illinois. Appointing a board whom he had selected with the greatest care, he turned the entire management over to them, without recommending any particular policy or any special employes. Every one is familiar with the success of the movement. The exhibit attracted thousands, and no state building on the entire grounds won the praise that was on all sides given to California's unique and remarkable collection of products. Not a few who have since become citizens of the state were first attracted hither by a study of the exhibits of fruits and other products at the fair. Another feat accomplished by Governor Markham was that of compelling the Southern Pacific road to pay back taxes amounting to $1,300,000. Largely due to his efforts was the adoption of the Australian system of voting, which has proved of great benefit to the state, and is now a part of the party platforms. An important pledge made by him was successfully carried out, viz.: that the state tax should not exceed fifty cents on a valuation of a hundred dollars.

Referring more especially to local matters, Governor Markham assisted in the organization of the First National Bank of Pasadena, and assisted in securing the building of street railroads and the bringing in of the Santa Fe. Indeed, no movement has ever been formulated for the benefit of the city which has failed to receive his support and co-operation. From the first he has been one of those progressive men to whom due credit belongs for the advance made by the city along every line of human activity. Though no longer in the public service, his interest in all that stands for the welfare of the state remains unchanged. Realizing the necessity of a good harbor, he has never once ceased to interest himself in the harbor bill, and there are probably few who realize all that he has accomplished in its behalf. His family are identified with the Congregational Church and he is a contributor to the same, as well as to other religious movements. His service in the Civil war is borne in mind through his membership in the John A. Godfrey Post, G. A. R., and the California Commandery, Loyal Legion. In Masonry he holds membership in Corona Lodge, F. & A. M., Pasadena Chapter, R. A. M., Pasadena Consistory, thirty-second degree, Pasadena Commandery, K. T., and Al Malaikah Temple, N. M. S., of Los Angeles.

PHILIP H. BULLIS. The family represented by Mr. Bullis of Redondo Beach traces its genealogy to France, where the name was spelled Bollice. Joseph R. Bullis, who was born near Albany, N. Y., January 25, 1800, had few advantages in youth, and was always hard-working, industrious and energetic. At the time of discovery of gold in California, in 1849, he went to New York City and with nine others bought a steamboat, in which he sailed around Cape Horn and up to San Francisco.

Impelled by the general excitement of those days, the men abandoned the steamer in the bay and rushed at once to the mines at Hangtown, near Placerville. The success which rewarded his efforts in that locality was not duplicated in his Frazer river experiences in 1852. Later for some years he conducted a wood and coal business in San Francisco. A subsequent venture was the purchase of twenty-six hundred acres of land in Marin county, Cal., where he engaged in the dairy business. Coming to Southern California about 1867, he bought several thousand acres of the Luigo tract near Linwood, where he successfully engaged in general farming and stock-raising. On that place his death occurred in July, 1889. In the same locality as himself his wife, Hannah Harder, was born and reared, and her death occurred on their California homestead when she was eighty-three. Both were earnest members of the Methodist Episcopal Church. In their family were seven sons and one daughter. During the early days in California the father was an active member of the vigilance committee of San Francisco and endeavored to the utmost of his ability to preserve the peace and establish a stable local government.

Near Albany, N. Y., Philip H. Bullis was born April 25, 1840. In 1861 he came to California and for eight years engaged in dairying in Marin county. On coming to Linwood in 1869, his father presented him with a deed for one hundred acres of land, and on this property he conducted farm pursuits. In 1880 he came to Tropic and secured his present tract of land by putting out a vineyard and caring for it for four years. On his thirty-eight acres he planted twenty-two hundred and fifty trees in 1885. About the same time he sold twenty acres and gave to his daughter five acres. The balance of thirteen acres he still owns, and this was planted in 1895 to deciduous fruits. In February, 1866, he married Henrietta Payne, of New York. They have five children, namely: Joseph; Wesley, a contractor and horticulturist; Tessa, wife of Jesse Stine, of Tropic; Georgiana, who married Frank Francis, and lives at Redondo; and James A., who is with his parents at Redondo.

Aside from voting the Republican ticket, Mr. Bullis has taken no part in politics and has at no time sought office. From 1867 until 1896 he was identified with the Methodist Episcopal Church, but in the latter year he transferred his membership to the Burbank Holiness Church, in which he is an active worker. At the time of the incorporation of Fairview cemetery, he was chosen vice-president of the company and for five years also served as a director. While great financial success has not come to him, his life has been a useful, honorable and helpful one, and he has the satisfaction of still retaining his strength, so that he can accomplish as much in a day as many men far younger than he. The confidence of his associates is justly merited by his long and honorable career.

CHARLES B. DENISON. As one of those whose interests cluster around Pomona Mr. Denison is especially interested in the development and prosperity of this portion of Southern California. He is a member of a pioneer family of this locality. The first to remove to this state was his grandfather Denison, who was born near Somers, Conn., and who in 1874 established his home at the foot of the mountains north of Pomona. Taking up eighty acres of government land, he set about securing a revenue from his property. Settlers being few and conditions favorable for bee culture, he entered upon that occupation, and in time became a successful apiarist, having about one hundred and forty stands. During his latter years he was the owner of real estate in Pomona, and here his death occurred in 1894, when he was seventy-two years of age. His children were John G., of Pomona; Andrew, Ella and Lorenzo J. The last-named was born in Connecticut and at an early age became connected with the business of buying and selling tobacco. So successful was he in this work that no inducements could be made to prevail upon him to relinquish it for the scenic and climatic charms of Southern California, although he visited the state and was pleased with its attractions.

Near Hartford, Conn., Charles B. Denison was born in 1871. Upon completing his education in the Hartford high school, he took up the study of music and soon became proficient in the use of the pipe organ. However, he did not limit his attention to this art. Realizing the need of business knowledge, he took a course in bookkeeping and other commercial studies. On account of a lack of robustness in his health, he decided to come to California, and immediately after his arrival began to receive more than he had anticipated in renewed health. He dates his residence here from 1892. Shortly after his arrival he bought ninety stands of bees, which amount he increased to six hundred and seventy-five. For some years he was a large shipper of honey, in one year sending twenty-eight tons to the markets. As the seasons became constantly more dry, the business proved less profitable, and he then sold many of his stands.

Through the purchase of ten acres of the Packard tract, Mr. Denison has acquired an orange and lemon grove that he still owns and superintends, giving especial attention to his oranges, which he finds to be more profitable than lemon-raising. In 1900 he bought the Cunningham property, known as the Fifth Avenue Hotel, which he has since remodeled and enlarged and now rents. The building contains eighteen rooms, arranged in suites, and provided with all modern conveniences for the comfort of the many tourists visiting Pomona. Besides these properties he has other real-estate in Pomona and a number of business interests, the management of which requires considerable attention on his part, not to the exclusion, however, of participation in municipal affairs and a thorough knowledge of current events of national importance.

CASSIUS EDMUNDS. In point of years of business activity Mr. Edmunds is the oldest merchant of Burbank, Los Angeles county. When he came here in the spring of 1888 the village was an insignificant hamlet with a scanty population and no commercial activity. Since then it has grown to a population of little less than one thousand, while surrounding the town is a fine farming and fruit-growing section whose products find a ready market in Los Angeles, eleven miles distant. Besides the store which he owns, he has ten acres at Englewood and unimproved property in Los Angeles, also a home in Burbank.

Near Cleveland, Ohio, Mr. Edmunds was born September 25, 1846, a son of Stephen and Pauline (Darby) Edmunds. His father, who was a native of Vermont and a cousin of Senator Edmunds, grew to manhood in the Genesee valley of New York and in youth learned the moulder's trade, which he followed some years. For five years he served in the regular army, being stationed principally at Fort Monroe. An industry in which he engaged during early life was the running of a canal boat, and he built and owned the Evening Star, a canal boat on which Garfield was employed in boyhood. While following the business some eight years, he became the owner of six boats. On moving to Portsmouth, Ohio, he engaged in the mercantile business. Shortly after the outbreak of the Civil war he enlisted in the Union service, becoming a member of the First Ohio Light Artillery in November, 1861, when he was forty-six years of age. In January, 1862, his son Cassius enlisted in the same company, but, being only fifteen years of age and weighing less than one hundred pounds, the medical authorities refused to accept him. However, notwithstanding this, he accompanied his father when the company started to West Virginia and remained with them for two years, fighting in their battles and receiving his pay the same as other privates. At Chancellorsville he was wounded in the right leg below the knee, and he also fought at Winchester, Port Republic, Bull Run, Antietam, etc., while his father participated in every engagement of the company until Fredericksburg, being then discharged on account of physical disability.

Returning to Portsmouth, Stephen Edmunds resumed mercantile pursuits, being proprietor of a grocery and also carrying on the manufacture of brooms. An active Republican, his party several times elected him street commissioner and also to the office of justice of the peace. In religion he was connected with the Methodist Episcopal Church. While he did not become wealthy and at his death, when sixty-eight years of age, did not leave a large estate, yet, considering the disadvantages under which he labored in youth, he gained a success that was worthy of high praise. His wife was born near Cleveland and died in Portsmouth when fifty years of age. Like him, she was a faithful adherent of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Of their five children one died at six years of age and four are still living.

Until he went to war Cassius Edmunds attended school and assisted his father in the store. The wound to which allusion has previously been made proved so serious that amputation of the limb was necessary, after which he remained in Howard hospital, Washington, D. C., until he was able to return home. For a time he aided in the store as before, but subsequently turned his attention to the cultivation of a ninety-acre farm twelve miles from Portsmouth, where he remained seven years. On trading the land for a store at Scioto Mills, Ohio, he settled in that town, and continued there until the spring of 1888, when he came to California. Meantime he served for four years as township treasurer and also held office as justice of the peace. By his marriage to Susan Shafer, of Portsmouth, Ohio, he had six children, one of whom died at five and another at twenty-one years of age. Those now living are Emma; William, a broom maker in Los Angeles; Sarah, at home; and Urania, who is living in Santa Monica. Both Mr. and Mrs. Edmunds are members of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Fraternally he is connected with N. P. Banks Post, G. A. R., at Tropic. Three times he has represented this district on the county Republican central committee, and for nine years he has been the efficient clerk of the school board.

LLOYD H. ESTERLY. Now a resident of Pomona, Mr. Esterly was born in Middletown, Mahoning county, Ohio, in 1867, and spent his early years upon a farm. His father, B. J. Esterly, was an agriculturist in early life, but after he went to Colorado he followed mining principally, and remained in that state until his death. When a boy L. H. Esterly learned the trade of a tinsmith and cornice-maker, which he followed in Ohio and later in Ottawa, Kans. From the latter city he went to El Paso, Tex., where he met with a great misfortune in being poisoned, in his entire system, by the zinc and lead which he used in his work. His health failed rapidly and serious results would undoubtedly have followed had not he accepted the advice of acquaintances to try the climate of California. When he arrived in Pomona he weighed one hundred and twelve pounds. From the first the climate benefited him, but a cure was not wholly effected until he had entered upon a diet of milk, which is an absorbent of poison. From that time on he rapidly gained, and now tips the beam at two hundred and nineteen pounds, enjoys excellent health and is a fine specimen of physical manhood and robustness. It is not necessary to add that Mr. Esterly is a firm believer in the beneficial results accruing from plentiful doses of that unsurpassed tonic, the climate of Southern California.

In 1891 Mr. Esterly purchased two acres on Hamilton avenue from B. E. Street. A fine grove of eucalyptus trees stood on the land, but there was no building except a barn. One of his first tasks was the erection of a house, and in this he has since made his home. Another early effort was the planting of fruit trees of various kinds. In 1894 he started a dairy delivery of milk and cream, and now has one hundred and fifty patrons around Pomona. To supply his dairy he keeps thirty fine cows of the Jersey grade. Since coming to Pomona he has served for two years as city marshal, filling the position with credit to himself. He married Mrs. Mabel G. Marsh, widow of H. G. Marsh. They have two children (twins) Everett E. and Evelyn A., who are the pride of the home. The family are identified with the Baptist Church, and he is chorister in the same, filling this office with satisfaction to all; indeed, he is said to be one of the finest tenor singers in the whole valley. Fraternally he is connected with the Knights of Pythias and the Woodmen of the World.

J. ELY JANES, M. D. In tracing the genealogy of this well-known physician of Pasadena, the records go back to William Janes, who came from England to Massachusetts in 1638 and later removed to New Haven, Conn., thence to Northampton, Mass. His life work was that of teacher and preacher. He was one of the first educators in New Haven, and preached the first sermon in the town of Northfield, Mass., addressing his hearers from beneath the shadow of a wide-spreading oak tree. From him descended Obediah Janes, a native of East Hampton, Mass., an officer in the war of 1812, and by occupation a merchant, following the same until his death. Justus Lyman, son of Obediah, was born in East Hampton, and after graduating from Amherst College entered the ministry of the Congregational Church, filling pastorates successively in New York, Ohio and Iowa, and remaining in the work until he died in Floyd county, Iowa. In early manhood he married Abigail Ely, who was born in West Springfield, Mass., and died in Iowa. Her father, John Ely, likewise a native of West Springfield, traced his lineage back to an Englishman who, in 1634, crossed the ocean to Massachusetts and settled in Saybrook, Conn., later removing further north.

In the family of Rev. Justus Lyman Janes there were two children, namely: J. Ely, who was born in Guilford, N. Y., February 7, 1842; and Mrs. Amelia Champlain, who died in Cresco, Iowa. In 1855 the family removed to Chester, Gauga county, Ohio, where the son attended the Gauga Seminary. In 1861 he entered the Western Reserve College, at Hudson, Ohio. While in that institution the war broke out between north and south. With sympathies ardently enlisted on the side of the Union, he desired to serve his country at the front. During the spring of 1862 he became a member of Company B, Eighty-fifth Ohio Infantry, his captain being C. A. Young, who is now professor of astronomy in Princeton University. On the expiration of his term of service he returned to college, remaining until he was graduated in 1865 with the degree of A. B. Three years later the degree of A. M. was conferred upon him. His earlier work, before taking up medicine, was as instructor in schools and academies, and by the careful economy that he practiced he saved sufficient money to defray the expenses of his professional studies. In 1873 he took up the study of materia medica under Dr. William A. Smith of Newark and later was with Dr. Joseph D. Bryant of New York. In 1876 he was graduated from Bellevue Hospital Medical College with the degree of M. D., after which he opened an office in Newark and built up an excellent practice in that community. Meantime his studies were not neglected, but by post-graduate work in New York City he kept in touch with the many lines of advance made in the profession. Besides his private practice he acted as surgeon of the eastern division of the Erie railroad, was connected with the New Jersey Academy of Medicine, an active participant in the meetings of the Essex District Medical Society, and a member of the Newark board of school trustees.

In Hillsdale, Mich., in 1867, occurred the marriage of Dr. Janes to Miss Sarah C. Reynolds, who was born and reared in that city. Two children were born of their union. The older, Jennie June, who died in 1898, was a talented artist, a pioneer in the kindergarten movement and the possessor of abilities far above the ordinary. The younger, Mina Louise, is the wife of Hubert Ives, of Pasadena.

On account of trouble with asthma Dr. Janes decided it was advisable to leave Newark and seek a more healthful location. Accordingly in 1893 he came to Pasadena and opened an office, erected a residence, and became identified with the city's activities. On the organization of the Pasadena Medical Association he was a charter member and since 1896 has served as its secretary and treasurer. Other organizations with which he is connected are the American Medical Association, Southern California Medical Society, and Alumni Society of the Western Reserve College. At one time he was a director of the Pasadena Board of Trade and a member of the board of library trustees. The days of the Civil war are kept in mind through his membership in the John A. Godfrey Post, of which he is surgeon. The First Congregational Church has the benefit of his counsel as deacon and he formerly served as one of its trustees, besides which he is deeply interested in one of its missions for the benefit of the Chinese and acts as superintendent of the Sunday-school.

HON. RUSSELL JUDSON WATERS, whose service as member of congress from the sixth district of California entitles him to rank among the influential men of the state, was born in Halifax, Vt., June 6, 1843. When he was four years of age the family, upon his father's death, removed to Colerain, Mass. After his father's estate was settled it was found that there was only enough money remaining to purchase a small cottage and lot, leaving the support of the family to the exertions of the widow and children. He attended the village school until his eighth year, after which he was self-supporting. May 12, 1868, he was admitted to the bar, after which he successfully practiced in Chicago until impaired health rendered a change necessary. In 1886 he came to California and settled at what is now East Redlands. In 1894 he removed to Los Angeles and built a residence on Adams street, where he has since made his home. He is vice-president of the Citizens Bank, a director of the Columbia Savings Bank, and has been treasurer of the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce and president of the Los Angeles Directory Company. Besides his city interests he is connected with outside enterprises, notably the Pasadena Consolidated Gas Company, of which he is president. In 1897 the council chose him to serve on the board of park commissioners. At the congressional convention in Sacramento, Mr. Waters was nominated for congress by acclamation, without one dissenting vote. The nominating speech was made by his old friend, ex-Governor John L. Beveridge, of Illinois. He was elected by a plurality of three thousand five hundred and forty-two, this being the first time fusion was defeated in the district. As congressman he introduced important bills, secured the establishment of many rural free delivery routes in his district, and fostered movements of benefit to his constituents.

HON. FRED M. SMITH. The city of Los Angeles is notable for the high character of the statesmen it has given to the commonwealth. Nor is Senator Smith unworthy of the high prestige established by his predecessors. Since coming to this city he has not only been identified with local business interests, but has also been a participant in public affairs and a promoter of Republican success. In 1900 he was elected to the senate from the thirty-seventh senatorial district, embracing the city of Los Angeles. His popularity is proved by the fact that he received a plurality of twenty-five hundred and twenty-four over the two other candidates, this being the largest plurality received by any member of the thirty-fourth general assembly. After assuming the duties of his office he was appointed chairman of the reformatory committee, in which position he was entrusted with many responsibilities. One of his bills that passed both upper and lower house empowered boards of supervisors to levy a special tax, at their option, in order to display the products and industries of the respective counties at all foreign and domestic expositions.

In Ledyard, Cayuga county, N. Y., Mr. Smith was born, April 12, 1858, a son of Frederick O. and Sophronia (Maltby) Smith, natives of the same county as himself, the former of German, the latter of English descent. His maternal grandfather, Watson Maltby, a native of Yorkshire, England, came to the United States at eighteen years of age and afterward engaged in farming; he married Phoebe, daughter of Joseph and Sarah (Baker) Wright, the former a Revolutionary soldier and the latter the daughter of a hero of that conflict. The Wrights were an old New England family, but settled in New York at an early day. At this writing Mrs. Sophronia Smith is living in Indianapolis, Ind., having gone there after the death of her husband in New York. She had but two children, and of these Fred M. is the elder and the only son. His early childhood years were passed upon a farm, but at twelve years of age he went to Elmira and began to clerk in a store. For a few years his life passed very uneventfully. Habits of industry and enterprise became implanted in his nature and he laid the foundation for subsequent success.

Leaving New York in 1880, Mr. Smith went to Topeka, Kans., and for eighteen months was in the employ of the Santa Fe Railroad. In the fall of 1882 he went to Deming, N. M., where he was employed as ticket agent for the Southern Pacific road. At that time the Santa Fe had not been completed to Deming. Resigning his position in 1885, he established the mercantile house of Fred M. Smith & Co., which became one of the largest wholesale and retail mercantile establishments in the southwest and built up a large trade through Old and New Mexico and the eastern part of Arizona. It was while in charge of this large enterprise that Mr. Smith proved himself to be admirably adapted for mercantile pursuits, possessing the wise judgment, the energy in action and promptness in decision that characterize a successful merchant. On selling out that business in 1893, he opened a wholesale house in Trinidad, Colo., where the firm of Fred M. Smith & Co. met with the same success as before. Selling out in February, 1895, he came to Los Angeles, which he rightly judged offered better opportunities than the mountain towns of the interior. His first commercial connection in this city was as treasurer and a director of the Keystone Milling Company, in which business he engaged until the fall of 1896. He then established the Electric feed mill, which is one of the largest plants of its kind in the city and is located on East Third street.

In Elmira, N. Y., Mr. Smith married Miss Hattie Shepherd, who was born in Steuben county, that state, and descends from a New England family that had representatives in the Revolutionary war. Her father, George S. Shepherd, was the general freight agent of the Erie Railroad, while her brother, A. D., is now general freight agent for the Southern Pacific at San Francisco. Prominent in the career of Mr. Smith is his connection with Masonry. He was initiated into the order in Deming Lodge, and is now connected with Southern California Lodge, No. 278, F. & A. M. In Deming he was also raised to the chapter degree and now has his membership in Signet Chapter at Los Angeles; was raised to the commandery at Deming and is now connected with Los Angeles Commandery, No. 9, K. T.; while in Al Malakiah Temple, A. A. O. N. M. S., he has the office of illustrious potentate. The Benevolent Protective Order of Elks and the Woodmen of the World number him among their members. Since coming to Los Angeles he has been identified with the Chamber of Commerce and one of its active workers. His political views, as previously intimated, are of no uncertain nature. The spirit of the Republican party, its honorable history, its platform based upon a knowledge of the needs of the common people and its sturdy principles alike appeal to him and he gives his stanch support to the men and measures which the party advocates. While in New Mexico he served on the territorial and county central committees, and for a time after coming to Los Angeles he was a member of the county central committee and one of its leading workers.
