

School of Theology at Claremont

1001 1420014

The Library

SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY
AT CLAREMONT

WEST FOOTHILL AT COLLEGE AVENUE
CLAREMONT, CALIFORNIA 91711

Ref.
F
867
G96
1902

HISTORICAL AND BIOGRAPHICAL RECORD

OF

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

CONTAINING A HISTORY OF SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA FROM ITS EARLIEST SETTLEMENT TO THE OPENING YEAR OF THE TWENTIETH CENTURY

BY

J. M. GUINN, A. M.

Secretary of the Historical Society of Southern California. Member of the American Historical Association of Washington, D. C.

ALSO CONTAINING BIOGRAPHIES OF WELL-KNOWN CITIZENS OF THE PAST AND PRESENT

CHAPMAN PUBLISHING COMPANY
CHICAGO
1902

Theology Library
SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY
AT CLAREMONT
California

COPYRIGHT, 1902
BY
CHAPMAN PUBLISHING CO.

PREFACE.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA is neither a geographical nor a political subdivision of the state of California. Generally speaking, it refers to the seven southern counties, viz.: San Diego, Orange, Riverside, San Bernardino, Los Angeles, Ventura and Santa Barbara; yet there is no good reason why it might not take in two or three more counties. In the so-called Pico Law of 1859, "granting the consent of the legislature to the formation of a different government for the southern counties of the state," San Luis Obispo and all the territory now comprising Kern were included within the boundaries of the proposed new state of Southern California.

The plan of the historical part of this work includes—first a general history of what is usually designated as Southern California, beginning with its discovery and continuing through the Spanish and Mexican eras into the American period to the subdivision of the state into counties;—second a history of each county of Southern California from the date of its organization to the present time.

The author has endeavored to give a clear, concise and accurate account of the most important events in the history of the section covered. The reader will find in it, no laudations of climate, no advertisements of the resources and productions of certain sections, no puffs of individuals or of private enterprises. However interesting these might be to the individuals and the localities praised, they are not history and therefore have been left out.

In compiling the history of the Spanish and Mexican eras I have taken Bancroft's History of California as the most reliable authority.

I have obtained much original historical material from the Proceedings of the Ayuntamiento or Municipal Council of Los Angeles (1828 to 1846). The jurisdiction of that Ayuntamiento extended over the area now included in four of the seven counties of Southern California. Consequently the history of Los Angeles in the Mexican era is virtually the history of all the section under the jurisdiction of its ayuntamiento. This accounts for the prominence of Los Angeles in the earlier portions of this volume.

The names of the persons interviewed and the lists of books, periodicals, newspapers and manuscripts consulted in the preparation of this work would be altogether too long for insertion here. To the authors from whom I have quoted, credit has been given either in the body of the work or in foot notes. To the persons who have given me verbal or written information I return my sincere thanks.

J. M. GUINN.

Los Angeles, October 12, 1901.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

PART FIRST.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA.

CHAPTER I

SPANISH DISCOVERIES ON THE PACIFIC COAST OF NORTH AMERICA.....	33
Spanish Enterprise and Adventure—Scurvy, the Scourge of the Seas—Hernan Cortés—Fortuno Ximenez discovers Baja California—Origin of the name California—Discovery of the Rio Colorado—Ulloa's Voyage—Coronado's Return dispels the Myths of Quivera and the Seven Cities of Cibola—Mendoza sends Cabrillo on a Voyage of Discovery to the Northwest Coast.

CHAPTER II

THE DISCOVERY OF NUEVA OR ALTA CALIFORNIA.....	35
Cabrillo's Voyage—Discovery of the Bay of San Diego—Islands of San Salvador and Vitoria, now Santa Catalina and San Clemente—Bay of San Pedro—Santa Barbara Islands—Death of Cabrillo—Return of his Ships—Drake's Voyage through the Straits of Magellan—Plunders Spanish Settlements on the South Pacific Coast—Search for the Straits of Anian—Refits his Ship in a California Harbor—Takes possession of the Country for the English Sovereign—Names it New Albion—Return to England—Sebastian Viscaino's Voyage—Changes the names of the bays and islands discovered by Cabrillo—First Boom Literature—Failure of Viscaino's Colonization Scheme. His death—Las Californias still believed to be an island—Father Kino's Explorations in 1700 dispels this fallacy.

CHAPTER III

MISSION COLONIZATION.....	39
Spain's System of Colonizing—Fear of English and Russian Aggression—Four Expeditions sent to Nueva California—Settlement at San Diego—Portola's Expedition sets out for Monterey—Discoveries—General Plan of the Missionary Establishments, Location and Government—Industrial Training of the Neophytes—San Gabriel under Zalvidea—What was accomplished there.

CHAPTER IV

THE INDIANS OF SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA.....	41
Inferiority of the California Indian—Indian Towns—Yang-na—Indians of the Los Angeles Valley—Hugo Reid's Description of their Government—Religion—Marriage—Burials—Feuds—Song Fights—Utensils—Mythology—Myths—Indians of the Santa Barbara Channel—Chupu the Channel god—A Revelation.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

CHAPTER V

THE FRANCISCAN MISSIONS IN SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA. 46

Location of the Missions—Condition of the Buildings now—Founding of San Diego de Alcalá—Destruction of the Mission Buildings by Indians—Murder of Father Jaume—Mission Statistics—San Gabriel Arcángel—Disreputable Soldiers—Mission Moved to a new Site—Statistics—San Juan Capistrano—Failure of the first attempt—Mission re-established—Earthquake of 1812—Destruction of the Church and Loss of Life—Mission Secularized. San Buenaventura—Channel Missions Damaged by Earthquake—Mission Garden—Santa Barbara—Delay in Founding—Damages by Earthquake—Mission rebuilt—Statistics—La Purisima—New Plan of Mission Management—Church Destroyed by Earthquake—Revolt of the Indians—Statistics—San Fernando—Large death rate—Treaty of Cahuenga—San Luis Rey—Flourishing Mission—Father Peyri—The Asistencia of Pala—Santa Inéz—Effects of the Earthquake—Indian Revolt—Chiefs Shot.

CHAPTER VI

THE PRESIDIOS OF SAN DIEGO AND SANTA BARBARA. 52

The Presidio in Colonization—The founding of the Presidio of San Diego—Monotony of Soldier Life—The Fur Traders—The Lelia Byrd—The Hide Droghers—San Diego in 1829—Don Juan Bandini's Mansion—The Old Presidio in 1836—Dana's visit in 1859—The Channel Missions and Presidio of Santa Barbara—Founding of Santa Barbara—Quarrel between the Padres and the Comandante—Vancouver's Description of the Presidio in 1793—Completion of the Presidio—A Boston Boy—Don Jose de La Guerra y Noriega—Change of Flags—Santa Barbara in 1829—As Dana saw it in 1836—Farnham describes it in 1840—Population and Appearance of the Pueblo when Fremont's Battalion took possession of it in 1846.

CHAPTER VII

FOUNDING OF THE PUEBLO OF LOS ANGELES. 56

Pueblo plan of Colonization—Governor de Neve selects Pueblo sites—Regulations and Supplies for the Colonists—Recruiting Pobladores in Sonora and Sinaloa—Arrival of the Colonists at San Gabriel—Founding of the Pueblo de Los Angeles—Names of the eleven heads of Families—Derivation of the name of the Town and River—The Indian Town of Yang-na.

CHAPTER VIII

LOS ANGELES IN THE SPANISH ERA. 60

The Old Plaza—Area of a Pueblo—Subdivision of Pueblo Lands—Location of the Old Plaza—Deportation of three worthless Colonists—Final Distribution of Lands to the Colonists in 1786—Government of the Pueblo—Census of 1790—Population in 1810—The "pirate Buchar"—End of Spain's domination in California.

CHAPTER IX

TRANSITION PERIOD—FROM MONARCHY TO REPUBLIC. 64

Governor Sola a Royalist—Californians Loyal to Spain during the Revolution—Beginnings of a Government by the People—Population and Resources of the Pueblo of Los Angeles—Arrival of Foreigners—Life in California in 1829—Slow Growth and Little Progress.

CHAPTER X

MISSION SECULARIZATION AND THE PASSING OF THE NEOPHYTE..... 66

Sentiment not History—Spain's purpose in Founding the Missions—Mission Land Monopoly—Decrees of Secularization humane—Regulations Governing Secularization—Slaughter of Cattle—Reckless Destruction—Ruin of the Missions—Fall of the Neophyte—The Pueblito—Indian Slaves—The Monday Auction—What became of the Mission Estates—Mortality among Neophytes under Mission rule—Extinction of the Indian inevitable.

CHAPTER XI

A DECADE OF REVOLUTIONS..... 70

The Storm Centre of Revolutions—Expulsion of Governor Victoria—Death of Avila and Pacheco—Pio Pico, Governor—Rival Governors, Echeandia and Zamorano—California Split in two—Governor Figueroa appointed—The Hajar Colony—A Cobbler and a Cigar Maker head a Revolution—Hajar and Padres arrested and shipped to Mexico—Death of Governor Figueroa—Los Angeles made the Capital of Alta California—Castro becomes "gefe politico"—Chico, Governor—Deposed and sent back to Mexico.

CHAPTER XII

EL ESTADO LIBRE Y SOBERANO DE ALTA CALIFORNIA..... 74

(The Free and Sovereign State of Alta California)

Causes that led to Revolution—No Offices for the "Hijos del Pais" (native sons)—Revolt against Governor Gutierrez—Declaration of Independence—Alvarado, Governor of the Free State—Monterey Plan—Los Angeles opposes it—War between the North and the South—Battle of San Buenaventura—Los Angeles Subjugated—Peace in the Free State—Carlos Carrillo appointed Governor by the Supreme Government—Los Angeles the Capital of the South—Carrillo inaugurated with imposing ceremonies—War again—Capture of Los Angeles—Flight of Carrillo to San Diego—Battle of Las Flores—Surrender of Carrillo—Alvarado recognized as Governor by the Supreme Government—End of the Free State.

CHAPTER XIII

CLOSING YEARS OF MEXICAN RULE..... 79

The Government in the hands of the Native Sons—Arrival of Trappers from the United States—The Graham Affair—Arrival of Governor Micheltorena and his Cholo Army—Capture of Monterey by Commodore Jones—Micheltorena and Jones meet at Los Angeles—Extravagant demands of the Governor—An Army of Chicken Thieves—Revolt against Micheltorena and his Cholos—Sutter and Graham join forces with Micheltorena—The Picos unite with Castro and Alvarado—Americans favor Pico—Battle of Cahuenga—Defeat and Abdication of Micheltorena—Deportation of the Governor and his Army—Pio Pico, Governor—Looking Backward.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

CHAPTER XIV

MUNICIPAL GOVERNMENT—MUY ILUSTRE AYUNTAMIENTO..... 84

But Little Crime in California under Spanish and Mexican Rule—Pueblo Government—The Most Illustrious Ayuntamiento—That of Los Angeles the best Illustration of a Mexican Municipal Council—Officers of the Ayuntamiento—Taking the Oath of Office—When Office Sought the Man—The Public Alarm—Blue Laws of Old Los Angeles—Hygienic rules—The Pueblito—Municipal revenues—Salaries—Elections—Judges of the Plains.

CHAPTER XV

THE HOMES AND HOME LIFE OF CALIFORNIANS IN THE ADOBE AGE..... 89

The Indian Brick-maker—An Architecture without Freaks or Fads—The Adobe Age not Aesthetic—Leonardo Cota's Plea for Urban Beauty—Reconstruction and Rehabilitation—Style of Dress in 1829—No Chimneys for Santa Claus—Filial Respect—Economical Government—Dog Days—No Fire Department and no Police.

CHAPTER XVI

ACQUISITION OF CALIFORNIA BY THE UNITED STATES—CAPTURE OF LOS ANGELES..... 93

Territorial Expansion—Fremont and Castro—The Bear Flag Revolt—Commodore Sloat takes possession of California—Castro's Retreat Southward—Review of Affairs at Los Angeles—The Old Feud between the Uppers and the Lower—Pico's Humane Proclamation—Stockton at San Pedro and Fremont at San Diego—Their United Forces enter Los Angeles—Historical Myths.

CHAPTER XVII

SIEGE OF LOS ANGELES..... 98

Stockton and Fremont Leave Los Angeles—Captain Gillespie in Command of the Southern Department—Revolt of the Californians—Gillespie's Men Besieged on Fort Hill—Juan Flaco's Ride—Battle of Chino—Americans Evacuate the City—Retreat to San Pedro—Cannon thrown into the Bay.

CHAPTER XVIII

BATTLE OF DOMINGUEZ RANCH—FLORES, GOVERNOR..... 101

Authentic account of the Battle by Lieutenant Duvall—Arrival of the Savannah at San Pedro, Capt. William Mervine, Commanding—Landing of the Troops—Gillespie's Men join Mervine—March to Dominguez Ranch—Battle—Retreat of Mervine's Force—Names of the Killed and Wounded—Dead Buried on Deadman's Island—Names of the Officers in Command—The Old Woman's Gun—Flores made Governor and Comandante-General—Jealousy of the Hijos del Pais—Arrest of Flores—He is Released and Rico Imprisoned.

CHAPTER XIX

THE SECOND CONQUEST OF CALIFORNIA.....104

Stockton Arrives at San Pedro—Carrillo's Ruse—A Remarkable Battle—Fremont Recruits a Battalion—Californians Capture Santa Barbara and San Diego—Recapture of San Diego—Building of a Fort—The Flag Episode—Arrival of General Kearny at Warner's Pass—Battle of San Pasqual—Commodore Stockton Sends a Force to Relieve General Kearny—Preparations for an Attack upon Los Angeles—The March—Battle of Paso de Bartolo, or San Gabriel River—Battle of La Mesa—Small Losses.

CHAPTER XX

OCCUPATION OF LOS ANGELES—BUILDING OF FORT MOORE.....109

Burial of the Dead—Surrender of Los Angeles—The Americans Occupy the City—Unwelcome Visitors—A Famous Scold—How Stockton Obtained Headquarters—Building of Fort Moore—Two Forts—Fears of an Invasion—The Mormon Battalion—Colonel Stevenson takes Command—A Flagstaff for the Fort—The First Fourth of July—Historical Fictions—Fremont's Headquarters.

CHAPTER XXI

TREATY OF CAHUENGA—TRANSITION.....114

Fremont's Battalion Arrives at San Fernando—Negotiations—Treaty Signed—Fremont's Battalion enters Los Angeles—Colonel Fremont appointed Governor—Quarrel between Stockton and Kearny—Colonel Mason succeeds General Kearny—Colonel Stevenson in Command of the Southern Department—Ayuntamiento Elected—Civil and Military Authorities Clash—Stephen C. Foster, Alcalde—The Guard House blown up—Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo—Pio Pico Returns to California—The Second Ayuntamiento.

PART SECOND.

COUNTIES OF SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA.

CHAPTER XXII

SAN DIEGO COUNTY..... 119

Organization of the County—Boundaries—Population in 1850—Indian War of 1851—Early History of the County and City Identical—The Old Pueblo—First Survey of the Pueblo Lands—Area of the Pueblo in 1850—Origin of New Town—Puerta de Los Muertos—The First Buildings in New San Diego—The First Wharf—Its Tragic Fate—The Pioneer Newspaper—Disasters that Befell the Plant—John Phoenix, Editor—A Political Somersault—The Famous Mill between Ames and Phoenix—The San Diego Herald Dies—Early Steamers—The First Overland Mail Route—Old Town and New Town in Statu Quo—Dry Years and the Civil War.

CHAPTER XXIII

SAN DIEGO COUNTY (CONTINUED)..... 124

THE NEW ERA

Arrival of Alonzo E. Horton—He Buys a Town Site—The Rush to San Diego—Rapid Growth of New Town—The Horton House—The Texas Pacific Railroad—The Railroad Act Passed, Great Rejoicing—Boom of 1871—Some Boom Poetry—Branch Railroads—Failure of the Railroad—Bursting of the Boom—Gloom—A New Trans-Continental Railroad Scheme—Its Success—The Boom of 1887—Inflation of Values—New Towns—Collapse of the Real Estate Bubble—The Boom a Blessing—Development of the Back Country—Substantial Improvements Made—A Year of Disasters—Recuperation—Riverside County takes a Slice—Annals of the Closing Years of the Century—Public Schools—The Free Public Library—The Chamber of Commerce.

OTHER CITIES AND TOWNS

Old Town—National City—Coronado Beach—Oceanside—Escondido—Fall Brook—Pala—Julian—Banner.

CHAPTER XXIV

LOS ANGELES COUNTY..... 131

AREA AND ORGANIZATION

Extent of the Original County—Boundaries—Organization of San Bernardino County—A Slice taken off Los Angeles to Make Kern—Orange County Created—No More County Division—Organization of the Los Angeles County Government—First election—Officers Elected—Court of Sessions—A County Interpreter—County Prisoners Hired to the City

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

Council—First Public Building, a Jail—Jueces del Campo—Patriots of the Pocket—Some Charges—The First Fee Bill—The Office of Supervisor Created—First Board.

THE FIRST DECADE OF THE COUNTY'S HISTORY, 1850 TO 1860

Early Land Grants—Litigation over Grants—Township Boundaries—Immigrants and Overland Routes—Sonorese Migration—A Job Lot of Immigrants—A Tricky Alcalde—The Mexican Route—The Gila Route—The Santa Fe Trail—The Salt Lake Route—Immigration by Southern Routes—Commerce and Conveyances—The Mustang Saddle Train—The Carreta Freight Train—First Stages—The First Steamer at San Pedro—High Fare and Freight Charges—Bucking Sailors—Imports and Exports—High Price of Grapes—First State Census—Small Area under Cultivation—Slow Growth of the County in the 50's.

CHAPTER XXV

LOS ANGELES COUNTY (CONTINUED).....137

THE SECOND DECADE, 1860 TO 1870

A Gold Rush and Gold Placers—Hard Times—The Great Flood of 1861-62—After the Deluge—Drought—The Famine Years of 1863-64—Death of Cattle—Financial Depression—The Civil War—Decadence of the Cattle Industry—The Stearns Ranchos—From Cattle Raising to Grain Production.

THE THIRD DECADE, 1870 TO 1880

Railroads—Los Angeles and San Pedro Railroad—The Southern Pacific—Bond Election—The Great Tunnel—Completion of the Road between Los Angeles and San Francisco—First train—Los Angeles and Independence Road—Fate of the Santa Monica Wharf—Colonies—San Pasqual Plantation Scheme—The Indiana Colony—It becomes Pasadena—Rapid Growth—Pomona—First Auction Sale of Land and Lots—Santa Monica—"The Zenith City by the Sunset Sea"—Disasters.

THE FOURTH DECADE, 1880 TO 1890

Depression Continues—First Trans-Continental Railroad—Immigration—A New Railroad Coming—Beginning of the Boom—Town-Making—Homberg's Twin Cities—Unprincipled Boomers—Magnitude of the Boom—Great Booms of Former Times—Collapse.

FIFTH DECADE, 1890 TO 1900

From Boom to Gloom—Increase in Population—Reaction—Bank Panic of 1893—Spanish War—The Harbor War—Three Dry Years—Prosperity—Population of Cities and Towns in 1900.

CHAPTER XXVI

THE CITY OF LOS ANGELES.....144

SHAPING THE CITY

A City Without Form—Urban Expansion—The First Boom—No Written Titles—Land Commissioner's Report—"Monstrous Irregularity of the Streets"—Area of the Pueblo, "Two Leagues to each Wind from the Plaza Church"—An Amazed Commission—Wide Streets Offend the Sense of the Beautiful—Squaring the Plaza—Ord's Survey—Area of the City, Sixteen Square Leagues—Street Names in Ord's Plan—Charity Street—Adjusting Street Lines and Property Lines.

AMERICANIZING THE CITY

Incorporated by the Legislature of 1849-50—Reduced Area—Twice Made a City and not Much of a City Then—The First Election Under American Law—City Officers—Patriotic

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

Councilmen—The Indian Question—Auction Sale of Prisoners—A City Ordinance that Favored Poor Lo—The Whipping Post—The Indian Question Settled.

THE POST OFFICE AND POSTAL SERVICE

Postal Service in the Spanish Era—In the Mexican Era—First American Mail Service—A Tub Post Office—Irregular Mails—The Butterfield Stage Route—Los Angeles Postmasters.

SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL MASTERS

The First School—Mexican Schools and School Masters—First American School—The First School Ordinance—The Pioneer School House of the City—Prejudice against the Public Schools—The First High School in Southern California—City School Superintendents—The Normal School.

CHAPTER XXVII

THE CITY OF LOS ANGELES (CONTINUED).....	152
--	-----

CRIMES AND VIGILANCE COMMITTEES

Turbulence, but few Capital Crimes under Spanish and Mexican Rule—The Defenders of Public Safety—The First Executions by a Vigilance Committee—Gold and Crime—People's Tribunals—Executions by Vigilance Committees in Los Angeles—The Murder of Sheriff Barton and Four of His Posse—Extermination of the Flores Gang—The Vasquez Gang—The Chinese Massacre—The Last Vigilance Committee.

PIONEER NEWSPAPERS

La Estrella de Los Angeles (The Star of Los Angeles)—The Southern Californian—El Clamor Publico—The Southern Vineyard—The Los Angeles Daily News.

ANNALS OF THE CITY'S GROWTH AND PROGRESS

Adobe gives Place to Wood and Brick in Building—First Building Boom—Population in 1860—Camel Caravans—The Telegraph—Salt Lake Trade—Union Demonstration—The Great Flood—A Year of Disasters—Union and Secession—The War Ends and Peace Reigns—The First Protestant Church—The Great Flood of 1868 Makes a New River—New Growth—The First Railroad—City Lighted with Gas—First Bank—Population of the City, 1870—The Railroad Bond Question—Bank Panic—Hard Times—Population in 1880—Reaction—A Rate War—Good Times—The Boom Comes—The Cable Railway—Electric Railways—Oil Discovery—Oil Boom—City's Expansion by Annexation—Population in 1900.

CHAPTER XXVIII

SANTA BARBARA COUNTY.....	158
---------------------------	-----

ORIGIN OF THE NAME

First use of the Name in Connection with the Mainland—Santa Barbara, Virgin and Martyr.

ORGANIZATION OF THE COUNTY

Boundaries—Transition from Mexican to American Forms of Government—Election of County Officers—County Seal—Sheriff Killed—First County Assessment—Mixing City and County Offices—Ruling Families—Townships—Board of Supervisors—The County Solidly Democratic in Politics—The First Court House.

CRIME AND CRIMINALS

Bands of Outlaws—Jack Powers—Ned McGowan—His escape from the Vigilantes—A Grand Jury Report.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

21

DOWNFALL OF THE CATTLE KINGS

The Feudal Lords of the Land—Stock Ranges Equal to Gold Mines—Overstocked Ranges—Starvation of Cattle—The Shepherd Kings—Kings no More—The Famine Years end their Rule—Fatalism—Subdivision of the Great Ranchos—Transition Period—Prosperity—The Southern Pacific Railroad—The Boom—Railroad Gap Closed—Lompoc—Guadalupe—Bettera via—Santa Maria—Santa Ynez—Goleta—El Montecito—Summerland—Carpinteria Valley—The Channel Islands.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS

First School—Long Vacations—Schools under Mexican Rule—Schools after the Conquest—Little Progress at First—Rapid Advance—High Schools

CHAPTER XXIX

THE CITY OF SANTA BARBARA.....165

ORGANIZATION OF THE CITY GOVERNMENT

Incorporation—First Meeting of the Common Council—City Officials—Lost Records—Haley's Survey—Wrackenrueder's Map—The Second Council—The Indian Question—An Ethnic Question—Economical City Government—"A Wide Open Town"—A California Treat—A Spasm of Virtue—Careless Councils—Pueblo Lands—Street Names—Cañon Perdido Street—The Lost Cannon Found—Squatter Troubles—The Arroyo Burro Affair—The Pioneer Newspaper of Santa Barbara—The Gazette a Live Paper—The Gazette Starved to Death—A Poco Tiempo Town—Tip or Dip.

THE NEW ERA

Feudalism—Dry Years and Hard Times—Awakening—Coast Stage Line—Gas Introduced—Rise in Real Estate—First Bank—Natural History Society—The Public Library—A Decade of Transition—Population in 1870; in 1880—Population in 1890 gain of 70 per cent.—Railroad Building and Projecting—Arrival of the First Passenger Train—A Boom—Substantial Improvements—Street Paving—Southern Pacific Coast Line Completed—St. Anthony's College—A Tragedy—The New High School.

CHAPTER XXX

VENTURA COUNTY.....171

BEFORE THE COUNTY WAS CREATED

Absenteeisms—The Old Mission—Battle of San Buenaventura—No American Settlers at the Time of the Conquest—A Township of Santa Barbara—First Attempt to Form a New County—State Division—First Survey of a Town Site—Flood of 1861—Famine Years of 1863 and 1864—Flood of 1868—Immigration Drifting Southward—The Coast Stage Line—San Buenaventura in 1870—Those Americans are Coming—A Night Ride over the Mountains—The First Wharf—The Ventura Signal—The Pioneer Newspaper.

ORGANIZATION OF THE NEW COUNTY

Reasons for County Division—No Offices for the Venturians—Election Frauds—The Population of the Proposed New County Mostly American—Failure of the Second Attempt to Create a New County—The Third Succeeds—Boundaries of Ventura County—The First Election and the County Officers Elected—The First Court House—Business Activity.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

CHAPTER XXXI

VENTURA COUNTY (CONTINUED).....	176
---------------------------------	-----

ANNALS OF VENTURA TOWN AND COUNTY

School Bonds and New School House—The First Murder in the New County—Library Association—Another Newspaper—Fire Company—Wreck of the Kalorama—Murder of T. Wallace More—A Year of Disasters—Wealth and Products of the County in 1879—Flood of 1884—Railroad and the Boom Arrive—Brilliant Outlook—Census of 1890—Pioneer Society—Annals of the Past Decade.

CITIES AND TOWNS

Hueneme—Nordhoff—Santa Paula—Oxnard—El Rio—Montalvo—Saticoy—Fillmore—Bardsdale—Camulos Rancho—The Oil Industry—Theodosia B. Shepherd Plant and Seed Company—Islands of Ventura—Anacapa—San Nicolas—The Lone Woman of San Nicolas.

CHAPTER XXXII

ORANGE COUNTY.....	184
--------------------	-----

COUNTY DIVISION

Act Creating the County Passed—Twenty Years of County Division—Anaheim County—Major Max Strobel's Scheme and Its Failure—Strobel, a Soldier of Fortune and a Victim of Misfortune—The First Orange County—A County Division Candidate—Wiseman, the "Broadaxe"—Santa Ana County—Orange County Again—Success.

ORGANIZATION OF THE NEW COUNTY

First Officers—Boundaries and Area—Spanish Ranchos—The Rancho Santiago de Santa Ana—Squatter War—Judge Field's Decision—Schools—High Schools—Court House—Population of the County—History of the Celery Industry—Cienegas or Peat Lands—Regarded by the Early Settlers as Waste Lands—Their Drainage and Cultivation—Wild Celery and Wild Hogs—First Experiment in Celery Culture—Persecution of the Chinese Laborers—Extent of the Business—The Oil Industry—First Experiments in Well Boring—Rise in Real Estate.

CHAPTER XXXIII

ORANGE COUNTY (CONTINUED).....	189
--------------------------------	-----

CITIES AND TOWNS—Anaheim—The Vineyard Colony—Selection of a Site—Officers of the Los Angeles Vineyard Company—Colony Named Anaheim—Improvements Made—Living Fences—Division of the Land Among the Stockholders—Cost of Land and Improvements—Anaheim Becomes a City—School House—Newspapers—From Vineyards to Orange Groves and Walnut Orchards—Churches—Fraternal Societies—City of Santa Ana—William H. Spurgeon's Purchase—The First House—The First School—Change of the Stage Route—Post-office Established—Railroad Reaches the Town—Pioneer Newspaper—Pioneer Church Organizations—Fraternal Societies—Banks—The Press—Dennis Kearney's Waterloo—Orange Originally Richland—Post-office Established—First Church—Tustin—Fullerton—Youngest Town of the County—Important Shipping Point—Westminster Colony—Garden Grove—Los Alamitos—Buena Park—Newport Beach—Capistrano.

CHAPTER XXXIV

RIVERSIDE COUNTY.....196

FIRST SETTLEMENTS

The Youngest County of Southern California—Formed from San Bernardino and San Diego—First Settlement in San Bernardino County—The Rancho San Bernardino—Granted to the Lugos and Sepulveda—The Jurupa Rancho—Agua Mansa—The Mormon Trail—Mormon Colony in San Bernardino—The Mormon Leaders Buy the Rancho San Bernardino—Subdivision of the Rancho—Flourishing Settlement—Recall of the Mormons to Salt Lake—Sale of the Rancho to Gentiles—A “Stake” of Zion No More—The Colony Era of the Early '70s.

FORMATION OF RIVERSIDE COUNTY

First Attempt to Form Riverside County—Second Attempt Succeeds—Area and Boundaries—Diversity of Contour, Climate and Productions—Era of Agricultural Experiments—The Silk Culture Fad—A Sericulture Colony Contemplated—A Colony Site Purchased on the Jurupa Rancho—Subsidence of the Silk Culture Craze.

THE SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA COLONY ASSOCIATION

The Silk Colony Lands Sold to the Southern California Colony Association—Names of the Members of the Colony Association—The Town of Jurupa—Riverside—First Arrivals on the Colony Site—Irrigation—Experiments—The Washington Navel Orange—The Arlington Tract—Magnolia Avenue—Riverside in 1875—First Railroad Meeting—First Citrus Fair—Other First Events.

CHAPTER XXXV

RIVERSIDE COUNTY (CONTINUED).....201

RIVERSIDE WATER SYSTEMS

The Riverside Water Company—The Gage Canal—The Jurupa Canal—The Riverside Highland Water Company—Population and Wealth.

THE PRESS

The Pioneer Newspaper, The Riverside Weekly News—The Riverside Press—The Press and Horticulturist—The Daily Press—The Daily Enterprise.

CITIES AND TOWNS

Corona—Temécula—Murrietta—Elsinore—Perris—Winchester—Lake View—Hemet — San Jacinto City—Strawberry Valley—Beaumont—Banning—Conchilla Valley.

SOME TWENTIETH CENTURY EVENTS

A New High School—Purchase of a Court House Site—A New Jail—Carnegie's Library Donation—The Sherman Institute.

INDEX.

	Page.		Page.		Page.
A
Abbott, Calvin W.....	1263	Baxter, William	734	Brooks, Stephen G.....	800
Abbott, Frank E.....	1198	Baxter, William A.....	734	Broughton, G. A., M. D.....	357
Abbott, G. E., M. D.....	954	Bayha, C. F.....	919	Broughton, Hon. H. A.....	662
Adams, George B.....	810	Beach, Eliza J., M. D.....	800	Broughton, W. W.....	1147
Adams, Frederick K.....	1275	Beach, Fitz E.....	739	Browne, Capt. A. W.....	414
Adams, Hon. John.....	719	Bean, John H.....	1046	Bruce, William N.....	436
Adams, John L.....	1039	Beck, Edwin A.....	370	Brundage, Hiram	436
Adams, R. D., M. D.....	1248	Beckett, W. W., M. D.....	1276	Bruner, F. M., M. D.....	1198
Adams, William L.....	1207	Beckwith, Charles	1261	Bryant, E. T.....	439
Akers, W. H.....	554	Beckwith, Francis	738	Bryant, William	1142
Akey, James V.....	564	Beckwith, Francis J.....	275	Bryson, Hon. John, Sr.....	1274
Alexander, George	559	Begg, James.....	812	Buckingham, Joseph A.....	1010
Alexander, William	560	Belcher, Avery	1245	Buckmaster, Thomas H.....	526
Allen, A. A.....	558	Bell, Hon. A. J.....	665	Buell, A. W.....	331
Allen, Harry C.....	648	Bell, Robert	517	Buell, H. J.....	523
Allen, Hon. M. T.....	1097	Bell, Robert L.....	938	Buell, Percy O.....	523
Allen, Russell C.....	954	Bell, Thomas	491	Buffington, A. C.....	447
Allen, William	806	Benedict, William G.....	804	Bulla, Hon. R. N.....	1206
Allgeyer, Charles.....	1180	Benson, George W.....	1230	Bullard, F. D., M. D.....	1015
Althouse, J. A.....	1040	Bent, Abbott J.....	1259	Bullis, Philip H.....	1291
Ames, Henry M.....	565	Bentzoni, Col. Charles.....	836	Bullis, William H.....	839
Amestoy, A. J.....	1263	Berry, Truman	1265	Burch, Nelson C.....	740
Anderson, Matthew H.....	595	Bettner, Robert Lee.....	1184	Burke, David L.....	1064
Andrews, Rev. J. B.....	564	Beveridge, Hon. J. L.....	1165	Burke, Hon. E. M.....	393
Androus, Hon. S. N.....	548	Beyrle, Robert	1052	Burke, Miguel F.....	393
Ardis, Julius H.....	1246	Bingham, H. A.....	1011	Burns, Robert W.....	1200
Arenz, Richard	1040	Bishop, F. D., M. D.....	1143	Burton, Capt. H. G., M. D.....	571
Armstrong, A. T.....	1032	Bither, B. Frank D.....	570	Butcher, W. P.....	1054
Armstrong, A. W.....	835	Bixby, A. S.....	740	Butler, John T.....	875
Arnold, Matt H.....	569	Bixby, Jotham	1009	Butler, Mrs. Mary.....	875
Arnold, Seth C.....	835	Blackburn, Capt. D. S.....	289	C
Asbridge, Thomas A.....	1041	Blackstock, Judge N.....	373	Cadwell, O. N.....	614
Ashley, Mrs. Mary A.....	451	Blatz, Herman	732	Caldwell, Hon. A. A.....	1010
Atchison, J. A.....	1042	Bleecker, J. J., M. D.....	1244	Callahan, Neal	620
Atchison, James R.....	647	Bliss, John D.....	1232	Camarillo, Adolfo	444
Atkinson, J. W.....	1208	Blochman, L. E.....	428	Camarillo, Juan E.....	840
Aufdemkamp, Henry	1042	Blood, James A.....	920	Campbell, J. A.....	1060
B
Bacon, A. J., M. D.....	955	Blosser, Garrett L.....	1208	Carder, G. H., M. D.....	1142
Bagnard, Gustavus	667	Blumberg, Wheeler C.....	1208	Carpenter, Frank J.....	1187
Bailey, Isaac	738	Bly, Leonades	1231	Carpenter, John T.....	1187
Bailey, Jonathan	532	Blythe, B. M.....	1136	Carpenter, Stephen F.....	1065
Bainbridge, J. C., M. D.....	409	Bolin, P. J.....	1265	Carrion, Julian.....	918
Baird, J. G., M. D.....	1036	Boman, Gustav A.....	1266	Carter, Arthur F.....	426
Bakewell, Thomas	1191	Bonebrake, Major G. H.....	532	Carter, Nathaniel C.....	1258
Balch, E. T., M. D.....	395	Bones, Thomas	613	Casal, F. M., M. D.....	1229
Balcom, B. G.....	1190	Bonestel, C. D.....	701	Cawston, Edwin.....	722
Ball, C. D., M. D.....	925	Bonestel, W. A.....	428	Chaffee, Arthur L.....	842
Ballard, Hon. J. W.....	1184	Bonham, Perry P.....	806	Chaffee, J. D., M. D.....	1159
Ballou, George H.....	956	Bosshard, Jacob	887	Chaffin, John P.....	744
Balsley, B. L.....	653	Bothwell, James	1048	Chambers, Hon. J. C.....	959
Bandini, Juan B.....	358	Bouton, Gen. Edward	949	Chambers, John T.....	1059
Banning, Gen. Phineas.....	1265	Bowker, Harrison M.....	427	Chapman, A. B.....	327
Banta-Jones, Mrs. Mary G.....	721	Boyd, David C.....	1197	Chapman, Charles C.....	1033
Barber, Hon. P. J.....	361	Bradford, Albert S.....	757	Chapman, Frank M.....	535
Bard, Cephas L., M. D.....	243	Bradley, Knowlton R.....	1048	Charlebois, Paul	414
Bard, Hon. Thomas R.....	213	Brady, Capt. J. T.....	1225	Child, E.....	1066
Barker, Frederic I.....	374	Bragdon, John R.....	809	Chippendale, W.....	884
Barker, James.....	834	Brainerd, H. G., M. D.....	1276	Churchill, John W.....	593
Barnes, W. P.....	830	Braley, Edgar R.....	1137	Clapp, James D.....	613
Barretto, Maxwell K.....	614	Brandes, H. L.....	1112	Clapp, William B.....	1228
Barrows, Frank P.....	416	Breiner, John	1052	Clapp, William T.....	828
Barrows, James A.....	1045	Brennan, John	798	Clark, Frank B.....	1243
Bartle, J. H.....	228	Brewster, J. C.....	792	Clark, George E.....	938
Bartlett, William S.....	882	Brian, David	1053	Clark, Isaac M.....	620
Bauer, Otmar	1046	Brigden, Albert	804	Clark, J. Ross.....	1012
		Bristol, Rev. Sherlock.....	415	Clarke, Charles S.....	444
		Brodrick, William J.....	595

INDEX.

Page.		Page.
744	Clarke, J. F.....
1143	Clarke, Robert M.....
1257	Cleland, Thomas E.....
960	Clifford, A. M.....
881	Cobb, Asa.....
674	Coffin, Hon. W. H.....
619	Coffman, H. L., M. D.....
884	Coleman, S. J.....
410	Collins, Hon. J. S.....
547	Collins, W. S.....
497	Conaway, Joshua A.....
799	Congdon, A. Maria, M. D.....
1058	Conger, Rev. E. L., D. D.....
572	Conklin, Lombard.....
1242	Connell, John F.....
881	Conrey, Hon. N. P.....
955	Cook, Prof. A. J.....
1112	Cook, George.....
1069	Cook, James.....
1256	Cook, J. R.....
887	Cook, J. W.....
448	Cook, O. P.....
713	Cook, R. D.....
745	Cooke, Hon. C. F.....
545	Cool, Mrs. Sarah M.....
545	Cool, Rev. P. Y.....
1138	Coons, Benjamin F.....
219	Cooper, Ellwood.....
912	Cooper, Harvey.....
466	Cooper, Joseph W.....
1209	Corbett, J. F.....
1243	Cordero, E. S.....
453	Corey, Franklin A.....
1029	Coronel, Don A. F.....
1030	Coronel, Mrs. M. W. de.....
1098	Corson, J. B.....
1071	Cowan, W. K.....
923	Cowles, N. E.....
453	Cox, A. M.....
728	Cox, Hon. J. S.....
863	Craig, R. J.....
959	Crain, William L.....
1108	Crane, Emmett C.....
961	Crane, George G.....
576	Crane, James H.....
1108	Crane, Jefferson L.....
666	Crank, F. DeWitt, M. D.....
576	Cravens, Thomas A.....
1012	Crawford, Daniel P.....
375	Crawford, J. H., M. D.....
302	Cregier, A. V.....
373	Cross, A. P.....
454	Cross, Hon. John.....
354	Crowell, Caleb T.....
487	Crowell, Weymouth.....
839	Crowell, William C.....
1182	Crowther, William.....
794	Cummings, John B.....
477	Cummings, John F.....
1070	Cummings, M. S.....
389	Cunnane, J. B.....
390	Cunnane, T. E., M. D.....
389	Cunnane, W. B., M. D.....
1012	Currier, Hon. A. T.....
425	Curtis, Charles.....
1138	Cushman, E. B.....
745	Cutting, J. R.....
D
1072	Daggett, Charles D.....
1135	Daily, Charles J.....
1009	Dakin, Henry M.....
369	Dandy, Charles P.....
853	Daniels, Capt. M. J.....
971	Darby, John H.....
540	Davenport, D. L.....
671	Davidson, Stephen M.....
1075	Davies, E. W.....
1273	Davis, Hon. Alonzo E.....
1111	Davis, Frank E.....
1093	Davis, R. W.....
667	Davis, S. F., M. D.....
841	Dawson, John B.....
335	Day, Hon. William S.....
328	Dean, John J.....
1076	Deane, John L.....
668	De Huff, Thomas J.....
220	De La Guerra Family.....
222	De Longpré, Paul.....
413	del Valle, U. F.....
221	Den, Alfonso L.....
471	Den, Augustus H.....
1292	Denison, Charles B.....
1216	Densmore, Emmet, M. D.....
1217	Densmore, Helen B.....
457	De Rudio, Capt. C. C.....
1183	Des Granges, Otto.....
577	Devine, Robert.....
1200	Dickey, Ambrose.....
596	Dieterich, Jacob.....
725	Dilworth, W. D., M. D.....
842	Dobbings, J. H.....
471	Dobie, W. G., D. M.....
462	Dodge, Col. R. V.....
720	Dodworth, A. R.....
869	Dolge, Alfred.....
870	Dolge, Ernst.....
948	Donnell, T. C., M. D.....
749	Doty, R.....
997	Dovey, James H.....
906	Dow, R. D.....
623	Drake, Capt. A. C.....
1210	Dreer, Mrs. Mary.....
1077	Dreher, Peter J.....
1156	Drews, L. W.....
1267	Driffill, Col. J. A.....
1141	Driskill, Jesse.....
572	Dudley, Benjamin W.....
462	Dudley, Thomas H.....
472	Duffy, James.....
894	Dunlap, A. H.....
1191	Dunlap, John N.....
280	Dunn, James T.....
473	Dunn, Robert.....
750	Dunshee, Rollin.....
746	Dutton, George F.....
E
715	Eason, J. B.....
733	Eason, R.....
547	Edgar, W. F., M. D.....
1292	Edmunds, Cassius.....
716	Edwards, S. J.....
716	Edwards, William B.....
1268	Eichholz, Philip.....
858	Eldridge, S. Tuston.....
727	Elliot, Walter.....
728	Elliott, J. Vincent.....
848	Elliott, Robert P.....
578	Elliott, Thomas H.....
1078	Ellis, Capt. G. F.....
1274	Ellis, H. B., M. D.....
536	Ellis, William D.....
1051	Elton, Charles.....
941	Emery, Frederick B.....
941	Emery, Mrs. Sarah B.....
1274	Engelhardt, John P.....
1047	Engstrum, F. O.....
1228	Eppinger, J. A.....
1072	Erickson, John.....
1293	Esterly, Lloyd H.....
751	Evans, Miss Elizabeth P.....
1268	Evans, John M.....
1256	Evans, William H.....
341	Ewing, Felix W.....
F
1105	Fagan, Michael.....
935	Farr, Mrs. E. B.....
961	Farrington, George W.....
509	Faulkner, George W.....
1018	Fern, Henry.....
283	Fernald, Charles.....
1165	Fessenden, William H.....
1091	Fetterman, I. L.....
1189	Filkins, C. W.....
1088	Finger, H. J.....
1129	Finley, T. R.....
847	Fischer, Frederick J.....
1255	Fisler, Rufus.....
249	Fithian, Major Joel A.....
249	Fithian, R. Barrett.....
249	Fithian, J. R.....
1161	Fitzgerald, G. P.....
1106	Fleet, W. H.....
931	Fleming, Edward J.....
791	Fleming, Peter.....
962	Forester, G. W., M. D.....
1218	Forrester, E. A.....
1272	Foshay, Prof. J. A.....
1179	Foster, Edmund B.....
1063	Foy, Samuel C.....
1277	Francis, John F.....
848	Frankland, John G.....
715	Franklin, Mrs. Peddie.....
344	Frary, Frank P.....
310	Fraser, Allan.....
1283	Fraser, J. C., M. D.....
1197	Fraser, William G.....
878	Frazier, Charles H.....
1279	Freeman, Daniel.....
743	Freeman, Capt. W. W.....
530	Fremont, John C.....
1036	French, Charles E.....
1016	Frost, George.....
854	Fry, A.....
815	Fry, William C.....
794	Frye, Mrs. Mary S.....
853	Fuqua, Rev. Isham.....
1241	Furlong, R. M.....
G
461	Gabbert, Thomas G.....
1255	Gabriel, Joseph.....
727	Gally, Mary M.....
1226	Gammon, Arthur I.....
858	Garcelon, Frank, M. D.....
589	Garcelon, George W.....
852	Gardiner, F. I.....
1117	Garland, A. A.....
477	Garretson, Joseph M.....
714	Gates, Lucius D.....
1218	Gavin, Alexander.....
828	Gaylord, John D.....
1250	Gaylord, Robert H.....
1276	Gibbon, Hon. T. E.....
726	Gibbs, James R.....
526	Gibler, Daniel.....
1004	Gibson, Hon. James A.....
1225	Gibson, Frank A.....
714	Gidney, C. M.....
854	Gilbert, Charles S.....
1288	Glassell, Andrew.....
237	Glassell, Andrew, Sr.....
704	Glassell, Hugh.....
751	Glassell, William T.....
710	Glauber, Rev. Ludger.....
1288	Glowner, G. G.....
1113	Gochenauer & Fiset, M. D.....
859	Goetz, Henry X.....

INDEX.

	Page.		Page.
Golish, T. A.	1045	Hazzard, Augustus C.	323
Golter, Edward	846	Heartwell, James F.	578
Goodale, O. E.	677	Heath, Col. Russel.	1005
Goode, George W.	704	Hebbard, Arthur H.	968
Goodridge, Ira C.	1227	Heim, Ferdinand A.	979
Gower, George T.	1233	Hein, J.	465
Granger, Charles H.	1114	Heiss, William A.	683
Grant, Alexander	1201	Hellman, Herman W.	1188
Grant, William R.	708	Helmer, Mrs. H. G.	697
Graves, Frank	297	Henderson, Edward, M. D.	317
Gray, William M.	907	Henderson, William	311
Greeley, John P.	1010	Hennion, Frank R.	680
Green, Elisha K.	703	Herring, G. W.	1163
Green, Mary J., M. D.	1278	Hess, William J.	1120
Green, Hon. P. M.	226	Hetebrink, Henry	1183
Greenwell, A. C.	709	Hewitt, John J.	781
Greenwell, Hon. C. B.	1088	Hill, George W.	846
Greenwell, Capt. W. E.	473	Hill, James A.	240
Gregg, Robert J., M. D.	966	Hill, John G.	737
Gregory, Albert	752	Hill, Samuel.	833
Griffith, Alfred P.	1273	Hinman, Elliott	883
Griffith, Rev. E. P.	540	Hirsch, George F.	944
Griffith, Griffith J.	1277	Hlavin, Louis	1251
Grimes, Charles	617	Hoar, C. E.	696
Grinnell, Fordyce, M. D.	697	Hockett, L. D., M. D.	893
Guinn, James M.	279	Hoepfner, Herman	756
Guthridge, C. F.	710	Hoffman, Abel P.	1211
Gwaltney, Sylvester, M. D.	1224	Hoffman, J. H.	1233
Gwaltney, J. S., M. D.	1224	Hohl, Lawrence	317
H		Holcomb, Rev. F. R.	1199
Haase, Hermann	303	Holland, L. T., M. D.	383
Hache, L.	443	Hollenbeck, Edward H.	764
Hadacheck, J. C.	1201	Hollenbeck, Francis A.	354
Hadley, Washington.	1223	Hollenbeck, John E.	1280
Hagadorn, J. Lee, M. D.	394	Hollister, Edgar A.	480
Hahn, Benjamin W.	1222	Hollister, Col. W. W.	402
Hall, Duane F.	966	Holmes, J. H.	972
Hall, Julius F.	302	Holmes, Thomas	757
Halladay, Daniel	565	Hooker, Henry C.	1234
Halsted, S. Hazard.	672	Horton, Alonzo E.	335
Hamilton, Horace G.	298	Horton, James M.	680
Hamilton, William	686	Hosmer, N. H.	834
Hammond, Mrs. N. E., M. D.	947	Hostetter, Moses	582
Hammons, John W.	691	Houghton, S. O.	548
Hancock, D. R., M. D.	925	Howard, Joseph	1200
Hanckley, James	1215	Howard, Perry A.	318
Hannon, J. Vincent.	950	Howes, Felix C.	557
Hannum, Luther C.	953	Howland, Capt. C. H.	1124
Hansen, C. M.	303	Hughes, George W.	684
Hansen, Col. L. P.	239	Hughes, James B.	968
Hansen, W. G.	1118	Hugus, John W.	479
Hardacre, Mrs. Emma C.	581	Hunter, John M.	679
Hardy, Capt. Isaac B.	692	Hutton, A. W.	1278
Harnett, Ernest T.	967	Hyer, Mrs. Elizabeth.	1222
Harris, David	1155	I
Harris, Capt. Emil.	1090	Imler, David H.	599
Harris, Rev. John H.	752	Ingersoll, C. K.	756
Harris, Will A.	1276	Ingvaldsen, Thorvald	683
Hart, Reuben	690	Irwin, John	689
Hartman, Fridolin	1144	Isbell, James F.	323
Hartman, Simon.	686	Ivins, Hon. C. H.	349
Hartwell, Calvin	1082	J
Harwood, Thomas	1069	Jackson, William O.	758
Hasse, Col. H. E., M. D.	384	Jacobi, Louis	318
Hassinger, J. H.	1156	Janes, J. Ely, M. D.	1293
Hasson, D. W., M. D.	1199	Jaques, Charles M.	768
Haugherty, Charles S.	315	Jardine, John E.	1162
Haupt, Paul	312	Jeffries, Rev. A. C.	1284
Hawe, Rev. Patrick.	399	Jeffries, James J.	1253
Hayden, B. T.	321	Jenness, A. L.	246
Hayes, John.	304	Jennings, George F.	1285
Hayes, Rev. M. C.	289	Jensen, Ernest.	322
Hayes, Orrin H.	1083	Jensen, Henry C.	1202
Hayne, Col. W. A.	911	John, J. S.	975
Hazard, Willet B.	824	Johnson, Capt. A. H.	803
Hazeltine, Herbert S.	1190	Johnson, Hon. C. F. A.	315
		Johnson, J. W.	1286
		Jones, Mrs. A. W.	1084
		Jones, B. E.	906
		Jones, Gen. Johnstone.	1281
		Jones, Mrs. M. G. B.	721
		Jones, Otho M.	1148
		Jones, Hon. Robert F.	1236
		Judkins, George W.	250
		Judson, Homer W.	540
		Julian, William B.	942
		Juvinall, D. E.	768
		K
		Kahles, Frank	529
		Kahn, Lazard	259
		Kanouse, Theodore D.	1220
		Kelsey, Theodore A.	695
		Kiler, J. P.	488
		Kimball, Warren C.	342
		Kimmell, W. E.	859
		King, C. E.	1107
		King, Charles L., M. D.	691
		Kinney, Hon. Abbot.	1273
		Kitchen, George	1202
		Klamroth, Hon. H. H.	707
		Klasgye, J. W.	1082
		Klassen, Michael	324
		Keopke, Henry	1287
		Koopman, William H.	260
		L
		Lacy, Theo.	1183
		La Grange, Gen. O. H.	253
		Lallich, Peter.	982
		Lancaster, E. F.	823
		Lane, John	531
		Langenberger, August.	1071
		Lataillade, C. E.	525
		Lawton, John Percy.	379
		Layne, W. H.	526
		Lee, Bradner W.	553
		Legrand, Louis J.	641
		Lehmann, Leon	1106
		Lewis, Clayton	324
		Lewis, Henry	295
		Lewis, James C.	524
		Lewis, W. H., M. D.	400
		Linck, F. X.	1251
		Lindenfeld, Frank	257
		Lindenfeld, Nicholas, M. D.	551
		Lindholm, E. E.	975
		Lindley, Walter, M. D.	1272
		Linquest, A. L.	514
		Linville, J. T.	920
		Lisk, Byron	725
		Lloyd, Thomas	258
		Longacre, J. E.	883
		Longawa, John	524
		Loughery, W. B.	1164
		Love, J. H., M. D.	1102
		Lowe, Thaddeus S. C.	1271
		Loynes, Richard	972
		Lucas, W. T., M. D.	457
		Luce, Hon. M. A.	483
		Lukens, Hon. T. P.	678
		Lutz, William F.	1190
		Lyon, Robert B.	1144
		M
		McAler, Owen	864
		McArthur, John	1237
		McCay, Charles B.	1151
		McCoy, A. D. S., M. D.	976
		McCutcheon, Joseph E.	810
		McDivitt, Frank P.	1097
		McDonald, Duncan	419

INDEX.

	Page.		Page.		Page.
McDonell, Hon. A. A.	1101	Niemeyer, Henry	583	Procter, John B.	266
McFadden, Archie	1182	Nofziger, F. U.	265	Pulver, Cyrus B.	1186
McFadden, James	637	North, Judge J. W.	1192	Pyles, John B.	908
McFadden, Robert	531	Notthoff, H.	1267	R
McFadden, William M.	685	Noyes, Hon. J. S.	1163	Radebaugh, J. M., M. D.	216
McKee, James R.	506	Nunan, Rev. Joseph.	584	Rademacher, Frank	601
McKeveatt, Charles H.	513	O
McLain, George P.	405	O'Donnell, John	913	Raibley, M. W.	1286
McNeil, Archibald.	845	Oldendorf, J. M.	1010	Ramsaur, William P.	887
McPherson, Robert	860	Oliver, T.	918	Ramsey, William M.	1094
Mackinlay, Robert, M. D.	222	Oliver, William J.	872	Randall, W. T., A. M.	233
Macomber, A. K.	291	Olney, E. W.	1153	Rankin, Hon. J. H.	420
Maddock, J. A.	976	Ord, Robert B.	253	Rapp, John B.	773
Magee, Mrs. Jean K.	877	Orella, Antonio J.	1164	Rasey, C. W.	588
Malcolm, Mrs. Emma L.	1237	Orena, Don Gaspar.	452	Reber, Capt. S. F.	271
Mallgren, John N.	902	Orr, Hon. Orestes.	215	Rebman, John	913
Manning, C. D.	673	Orton, Robert	584	Reed, John Henry.	1195
March, D. W.	811	Osborn, William M.	1239	Reeve, Mrs. Jennie A.	1287
Marchant, Samuel A.	864	O'Sullivan, John	761	Reilly, Edward F.	590
Markham, Hon. H. H.	1289	Ozmun, Aaron M.	1205	Reynolds, Belle L., M. D.	606
Marsh, M. Ella W., M. D.	260	P
Martin, Capt. D. W.	1059	Paddison, John	901	Reynolds, Dr. P. R.	1197
Martin, W. W.	1111	Page, B. M., M. D.	264	Rice, Hon. Thomas A.	569
Mason, Charles C.	900	Paine, Frederick H.	937	Richards, Jarrett T.	492
Mathis, J. A.	600	Painter, Milton D.	1272	Richards, W. D. F.	773
Mattison, F. C. E., M. D.	611	Palmer, Noah.	1193	Richardson, C. M.	770
Maulhardt, Albert F.	503	Palomares, Frank J.	1238	Richardson, Henry C.	513
May, John A.	923	Palomares, José D.	271	Rives, James C.	348
Meier, Fred	865	Palomares, Porfirio	270	Rizer, E. A.	344
Meigs, Peveril	379	Park, James M.	1017	Roberts, John	1154
Mendenhall, J. F.	520	Parks, Heber C.	1186	Roberts, L. S.	993
Mermilliod, J. A.	865	Parks, I. W.	815	Roberts, Capt. W. C.	994
Merwin, Rev. A. M.	980	Parks, William S.	893	Roberts, William L.	1109
Meserve, A. F.	981	Parsons, John D.	1182	Robertson, R. F.	484
Metcalf, W. B.	492	Paterson, John G.	870	Robinson, Richard O.	821
Miller, C. F., M. D.	905	Patterson, Charles E.	888	Robinson, W. D.	488
Miller, Isaac	559	Patterson, Wilson C.	1035	Roblee, W. W., M. D.	901
Miller, J. C. F.	554	Peabody, Henry A.	1186	Rodgers, R. J.	917
Miller, Joseph M.	1017	Pearson, Charles H.	588	Roeder, Louis	1015
Mills, Alexander F.	234	Pearson, George M.	882	Rogers, William M.	817
Mills, Col. John H.	605	Peck, George H., Jr.	228	Rommel, William	276
Mitchell, Henry M.	421	Peck, George H., Sr.	901	Rose, Leonard J. Jr.	594
Mitchell, Newel H.	986	Peck, W. H.	590	Rose, Martin W.	1194
Montgomery, Harrison L.	1196	Peed, John T.	1018	Rothrock, A. B.	953
Moore, B. A.	925	Pemberton, L. B.	763	Rowland, John	536
Moore, Capt. William.	347	Penney, William A.	993	Royal, A. B., M. D.	817
More, John F.	225	Perce, L. A., M. D.	943	Royer, T. J.	1249
Morgan, J. E.	811	Perrin, Leonard	987	Ruggles, H. C.	851
Morgan, William	755	Perry, Belmont	1181	Rundell, Eli	201
Morrill, Frank E.	553	Petit, Justin	625	Rush, Abner	618
Morrison, J. W.	866	Pettibone, William H.	1103	Rust, J. C.	272
Morse, Bradford	1191	Pettis, Benjamin F.	625	Rutherford, George, Sr.	1075
Morse, Oscar	552	Phelos, Hiram	872	Rutherford, Stephen	257
Morton, Albert	881	Phillips, A. L.	1253	Ryan, Henry N.	529
Mosbaugh, George J.	1188	Phillips, Louis	1239	S
Mott, Stephen H.	1006	Pico, Don Pio.	1187	Saffell, Z. C.	1166
Mott, Hon. T. D.	1272	Pierce, Anthony R.	769	Sale, F. M.	233
Mull, Frederick	1250	Pierce, Prof. E. T.	435	Salisbury, Mitchell H.	673
Muller, H. R.	624	Pierce, W. H.	600	Salter, J.	659
Myers, W. S.	907	Pinney, R. H.	493	Sams, Eaton T.	987
N
Nadeau, Remi	1203	Pitzer, S. C.	1167	Sanborn, Arthur N.	1021
Neighbours, Allen W.	323	Plant, Marcus S.	816	Sanderson, J. L.	1168
Neisser, Edward	871	Platt, George E.	901	Saunders, Z. W., M. D.	376
Nelson, H. A.	749	Pollard, Thomas	760	Save, Juan	626
Nelson, John	965	Pope, Hon. J. D.	1206	Sawtelle, W. E.	353
Newby, Henry	1252	Pope, W. F.	920	Sawyer, W. B., M. D.	1194
Newcomb, A. T., M. D.	635	Porter, Andrew O.	1254	Saxby, J. Bert, D. D. S.	499
Newlin, W. L., M. D.	982	Porter, Don C.	1254	Schee Brothers	1240
Newton, W. Stanton.	668	Potter, Milo M.	1006	Scheerer, Conrad	997
Ney, Miss Marie A.	793	Power, George C.	1212	Scheerer, John	1273
Nichols, B. S.	931	Powers, Hon. P. W.	338	Schiappa Pietra, Cav. L.	367
Nicolaus, Henry	762	Prell, John G.	535	Schilling, William	949
Nidever, John M.	583	Preter, Joseph	860	Schmidt, Theodore E.	820
Niemann, Ferdinand	310
Niemeyer, A.	866

INDEX.

	Page.		Page.
Scott, Henry A.....	889	Stanton, E. J.....	1172
Scott, John.....	770	Starkweather, G. A.....	1260
Scott, William H. H.....	966	State Normal School.....	431
Seabert, Frank A.....	1126	Stead, J. M., M. D.....	390
Seaman, W. W.....	1034	Stearns, George L.....	797
Sebastian, J. L.....	1213	Stebbins, Charles L.....	924
Sebelius, C.....	924	Steckel, George.....	1231
Selph, Edgar E.....	290	Stengel, Louis J.....	1173
Sepulveda, A. W.....	1207	Stepan, M.....	1174
Sessions, C. H.....	383	Stephens, Roy B.....	285
Severance, Mrs. C. M.....	309	Stephenson, G. F.....	1023
Severance, T. C.....	309	Stevens, G. A.....	1282
Sexton, Joseph.....	263	Stevens, Frank D.....	1153
Shafer, Smith J.....	818	Stevens, James H.....	905
Shaffer, E. E.....	276	Stevens, Lewis W.....	1246
Shaw, Capt. George N.....	1219	Stevens, Wesley L.....	1152
Shaw, James B., M. D.....	631	Stevenson, Henry H.....	899
Shaw, James E.....	480	Steward, Leland B.....	1196
Shaw, S. L.....	631	Stewart, John M.....	785
Sheldon, Gen. L. A.....	244	Stewart, Nathaniel.....	400
Shelton, Rice B.....	767	Stewart, Walter O.....	638
Shepherd, William E.....	1130	Stickney, Mrs. Jeannie E.....	775
Sherman, Charles E.....	498	Stimson, Thomas D.....	231
Sherriff, W. J.....	626	Stine, Jesse S.....	1160
Sherwood, Frederick W.....	1275	Stockton, T. C., M. D.....	296
Shibley, William.....	822	Storke, Hon. C. A.....	500
Shiels, John.....	322	Story, Thomas.....	1125
Shipley, G. W.....	1259	Stoutenburgh, J. B.....	286
Shorb, J. De Barth.....	1197	Strahan, D. W.....	1015
Simmons, A. B., M. D.....	888	Stratton, Samuel.....	1135
Simms, J. A.....	1190	Streeter, Hon. H. M.....	709
Simpson, Thomas F.....	895	Streets, J. J.....	643
Skidmore, S. S.....	1024	Strohm, Capt. Thomas.....	1057
Skillen, Charles M.....	731	Stromee, Gustaf.....	607
Slanker, Frank O.....	912	Strong, Robert.....	1132
Sloan, James E.....	1022	Stuntz, Rev. J. H.....	629
Slosson, C. E.....	821	Sudden, Robert C.....	1081
Smith, C. B.....	1160	Sudden, W. H.....	1083
Smith, Charles W.....	779	Suess, John.....	917
Smith, Hon. Fred M.....	1295	Sullivan, David.....	776
Smith, George A.....	1170	Sullivan, P. T.....	1175
Smith, Ira O.....	494	Sumner, Rev. C. B.....	1261
Smith, Joseph.....	890	Swensen, A.....	1093
Smith, Rufus D., Jr.....	1023	T
Smith, Rufus D., Sr.....	1022	Taggart, J. W.....	301
Smith, Samuel L.....	632	Talbott, Hon. W. L.....	1092
Smith, Sanford S.....	979	Tallant, E. C.....	504
Smith, Solon.....	632	Taylor, G. B.....	539
Smith, Judge Welcome.....	1031	Taylor, Mrs. Nannie A. D.....	539
Smith, Willis H.....	774	Taylor, Peter, Sr.....	1175
Smith, W. R.....	636	Teague, Crawford P.....	531
Snodgrass, Larkin.....	1205	Teague, Robert M.....	1199
Snow, Hiram K., Jr.....	998	Tenhaeff, William.....	722
Snow, Hiram K., Sr.....	1195	Thayer, George R.....	883
Snyder, F. A.....	1092	Thomas, Benjamin F.....	1123
Snyder, George D.....	988	Thomas, Milton.....	425
Snyder, Hon. M. P.....	608	Thompson, W. A.....	617
Snyder, William P.....	1171	Thornburgh, Madison.....	642
Soto, Juan S.....	914	Thornton, William E.....	1269
Southmayd, N. S.....	1032	Thrall, Timothy L.....	938
Spader, Louis.....	636	Thurman, Reason M.....	908
Spaulding, Frank L.....	1039	Tibbals, Barnabas.....	876
Spaulding, O. L.....	1172	Tietzen, Paul O.....	401
Spence, J. P.....	1282	Titus, Luther H.....	781
Spencer, B. F.....	587	Todd, M. De L.....	1117
Spencer, Thomas, M. D.....	1185	Todd, Robert A.....	647
Sprague, B. O.....	1244	Toland, M. R., M. D.....	930
Spring, William F.....	563	Toland, Thomas O.....	505
Sproul, Atwood.....	896	Toms, Silas.....	822
Sproul, Gilbert H.....	295	Towle, Charles H.....	875
Sproul, William.....	830	Townsend, Stephen.....	1131
Spurgeon, Granville.....	805	Trask, Hon. D. K.....	552
Spurgeon, William H.....	661	Traster, William H.....	1094
St. Anthony's College.....	517	Trotter, J. P.....	809
Staats, William R.....	998	Truax, R. C.....	1124
Stambach, H. L., M. D.....	637	Turner, Elbert B.....	1091
Stanley, C. N.....	1026	Turner, L. C.....	824
		Tyler, Eckford D.....	776
		U
		University of Southern Cali- fornia.....	232
		Ussher, Paul E.....	932
		Utterback, Mrs. M. J.....	876
		V
		Vail, Hugh D.....	226
		Vail, W. B.....	1024
		Van Dompelaar, S. W.....	1176
		Vejar, Abraham H.....	992
		Venable, P. S.....	929
		Vernon, Charles J.....	536
		Vesper, A. E.....	827
		Viriden, Benjamin S.....	649
		Vivian, Robert P.....	1178
		Von Der Lohe, D. H. P.....	1203
		Von Der Lohe, J. H. C.....	985
		Vredenburg, Levi.....	936
		W
		Wagner, Edward M.....	644
		Waite, George W.....	1204
		Waite, L. C.....	1189
		Wakeham, Hubert H.....	1181
		Waldie, Alexander.....	483
		Walker, Hon. C. J.....	1214
		Walker, Frank.....	602
		Walker, S. M.....	1119
		Wallischeck, Rev. Peter.....	514
		Ward, James F.....	1004
		Warring, Benjamin F.....	641
		Warring, Hugh.....	638
		Waterman, W. M.....	1089
		Waters, George H.....	536
		Waters, Hon. R. J.....	1294
		Waters, Capt. William G.....	649
		Waters, W. Lacy.....	650
		Way, E. Henry, M. D.....	1180
		Weales, Thomas.....	650
		Weber, Moritz.....	1269
		Weber, William P.....	1089
		Webster, L. F.....	611
		Weldon, Rev. S. R.....	653
		Weldon, W. A., M. D.....	328
		Wells, Hon. G. W.....	1275
		Wentworth, Col. M. C.....	1280
		Werner, Marie B., M. D.....	877
		Weston, B. S.....	1214
		Westover, Prof. O. S.....	519
		Wetzel, Martin.....	1177
		Weyse, Hon. H. G.....	406
		Weyse, Julius G.....	406
		Wheelan, Miss Naomi.....	654
		Whipp, Benjamin F.....	1000
		Whitaker, James A.....	1198
		White, Albert S.....	1185
		White, Caleb E.....	552
		White, Miss Edith.....	1248
		White, James H.....	1118
		White, John A.....	857
		White, Hon. S. M.....	214
		White, Theodore F.....	1213
		White, Ulysses E.....	936
		Whiting, Perry.....	999
		Whitted, Dr. Charles.....	1181
		Wickenden, W. F.....	575
		Wiley, William H.....	1034
		Wilkinson, Clark G.....	786
		Wilkinson, John B.....	1000
		Willett, Hon. C. J.....	1087
		Williams, Albert C.....	1264
		Williams, Hon. B. T.....	655
		Williams, George M.....	659

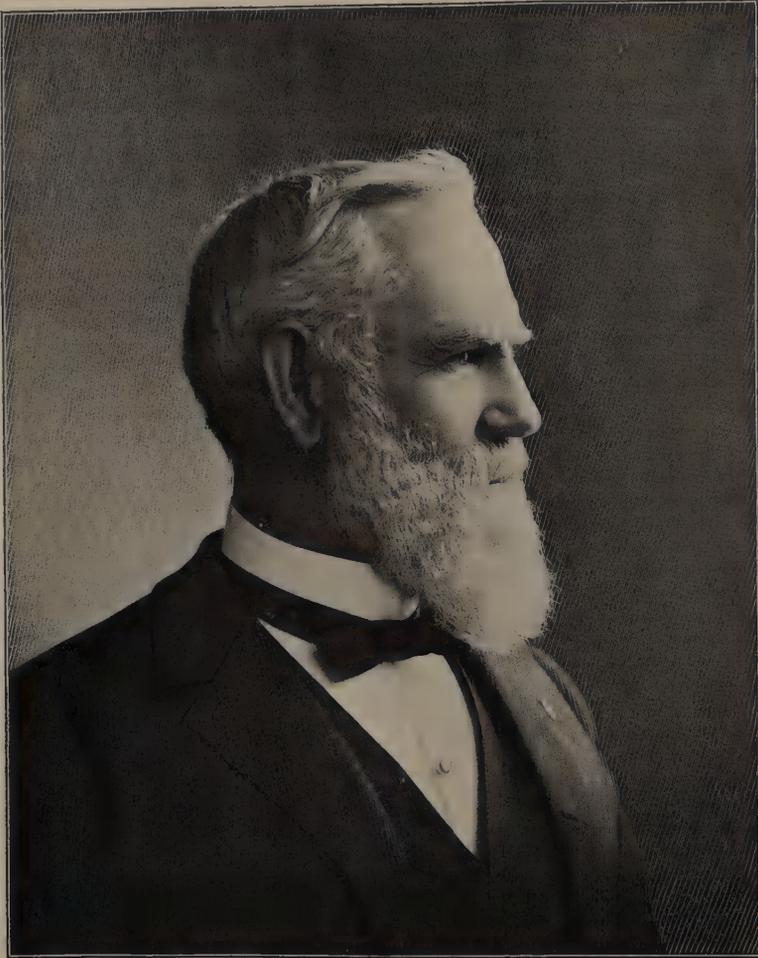

INDEX.

	Page.		Page.		Page.
Williams, Mrs. Julia F.....	510	Wing, William A.....	1178	Woodbury, George B.....	788
Williams, John H.....	396	Wiswell, Royal.....	659	Woods, Alvin M.....	1179
Williams, J. McCoy.....	439	Witherspoon, Isaac A.....	733	Woodward, S. K.....	926
Williams, O. D.....	1249	Wolfskill, William.....	1273	Woodworth, J. H.....	788
Willoughby, James R.....	269	Wood, Harry.....	660	Woolley, L. J.....	926
Willson, John A.....	1188	Wood, Henry P.....	343	Workman, William H.....	1021
Wilson, A. C. J.....	387	Wood, John W.....	876	Works, Hon. J. D.....	1206
Wilson, Allen J.....	895	Wood, Joshua.....	787	Worthley, F. A.....	882
Wilson, Jerome C.....	1151	Wood, J. W., M. D.....	1003
Wilson, P. J.....	656	Wood, Thomas D.....	661	Y
Wilson, R. H.....	786	Wood, Rev. W. O.....	1270	York, Hon. W. M.....	1271

HISTORICAL:

(HISTORIAN.)

J. M. Guinn

CHAPTER I.

SPANISH DISCOVERIES ON THE PACIFIC COAST OF NORTH AMERICA.

THE unparalleled success of our army and navy in our recent war with Spain has bred in us a contempt for the Spanish soldier and sailor; and, in our overmastering Anglo-Saxon conceit, we are inclined to consider our race the conservator of enterprise, adventure and martial valor; while on the other hand we regard the Spanish Celt a prototype of indolence, and as lacking in energy and courage.

And yet there was a time when these race conditions were seemingly reversed. There was a time when Spain, to-day moribund, dying of political conservatism, ignorance and bigotry, was the most energetic, the most enterprising and the most adventurous nation of Europe.

A hundred years before our Pilgrim Fathers landed on Plymouth Rock, Spain had flourishing colonies in America. Eighty-five years before the first cabin was built in Jamestown, Cortés had conquered and made tributary to the Spanish crown the empire of Mexico—a country more populous and many times larger than Spain herself. Ninety years before the Dutch had planted the germ of a settlement on Manhattan Island—the site of the future metropolis of the new world—Pizarro, the swineherd of Truxillo, with a handful of adventurers, had conquered Peru, the richest, most populous and most civilized empire of America.

In less than fifty years after the discovery of America by Columbus, Balboa had discovered the Pacific Ocean; Magellan, sailing through the straits that still bear his name and crossing the wide Pacific, had discovered the Islands of the Setting Sun (now the Philippines) and his ship had circumnavigated the globe; Alvar Nuñez (better known as Cabeza de Vaca), with three companions, the only survivors of three hundred men Narvaez landed in Florida, after years of wandering among the Indians, had crossed the continent overland from the Atlantic to the Pacific; Coronado had penetrated the interior of the North American continent to the plains of Kansas; Alárcon had reached the head of the Gulf of California and sailed up the Rio Colorado; and Cabrillo, the discoverer of Alta California, had explored the Pacific Coast of America to the 44th parallel of North Latitude.

While the English were cautiously feeling their way along the North Atlantic Coast of America and taking possession of a few bays and harbors, the Spaniards had possessed themselves of nearly all of the South American continent and more than one-third of the North American. When we consider the imperfect arms with which the Spaniards made their conquests, and the lumbering and unseaworthy craft in which they explored unknown and uncharted seas, we are surprised at their success and astonished at their enterprise and daring.

The ships of Cabrillo were but little better than floating tubs, square rigged, high decked, broad bottomed—they sailed almost equally well with broadside as with keel to the wave. Even the boasted galleons of Spain were but little better than caricatures of maritime architecture—huge, clumsy, round-stemmed vessels, with sides from the water's edge upward sloping inward, and built up at stem and stern like castles—they rocked and rolled their way across the ocean. Nor were storms and shipwreck on unknown seas the mariner's greatest dread nor his deadliest enemies. That fearful scourge of the high seas, the dreaded escorbuto, or scurvy, always made its appearance on long voyages and sometimes exterminated the entire ship's crew. Sebastian Viscaïno, in 1602, with three ships and two hundred men, sailed out of Acapulco to explore the Coast of California. At the end of a voyage of eleven months the San Tomas returned with nine men alive. Of the crew of the Tres Reyes (Three Kings) only five returned; and his flag ship, the San Diego, lost more than half her men.

A hundred and sixty-seven years later Galvez fitted out an expedition for the colonization of California. He despatched the San Antonio and the San Carlos as a complement of the land expeditions under Portolá and Serra. The San Antonio, after a prosperous voyage of fifty-seven days from Cape San Lucas, anchored in San Diego harbor. The San Carlos, after a tedious voyage of one hundred and ten days from La Paz, drifted into San Diego Bay, her crew prostrated with scurvy, not enough able-bodied men to man a boat to reach the shore. When the plague had run its course, of the crew of the San Carlos one sailor and a cook were all that were alive. The San José, despatched several months later from San José del Cabo with mission supplies and a double crew to supply the loss of men on the other vessels, was never heard of after the day of her sailing. Her fate was doubtless that of many a gallant ship before her time. Her crew, prostrated by the scurvy, none able to man the ship, not one able to wait upon another, dying, dying, day by day until all are dead—then the vessel, a floating charnel house, tossed by the winds and buffeted by the waves, sinks at last into the ocean's depths and her ghastly tale of horrors forever remains untold.

It is to the energy and adventurous spirit of Hernan Cortés, the conqueror of Mexico, that we owe the discovery of California at so early a period in the age of discoveries. Scarcely had he completed the conquest of Mexico before he began preparations for new conquests. The vast unknown regions to the north and northwest of Mexico proper held within them possibilities of illimitable wealth and spoils. To the exploration and conquest of these he bent his energies.

In 1522, but three years after his landing in Mexico, he had established a shipyard at Zacatula, on the Pacific Coast of Mexico, and began building an exploring fleet. But from the very beginning of his enterprise "unmerciful disaster followed him fast and followed him faster." His warehouse at Zacatula, filled with ship-building material, carried at great expense overland from Vera Cruz, was burned. Shipwreck and mutiny at sea; disasters and defeat of his forces on land; treachery of his subordinates and jealousy of royal officials thwarted his plans and wasted his substance. After expending nearly a million dollars in explorations and attempts at colonization, disappointed, impoverished, fretted and worried by the ingratitude of a monarch for whom he had sacrificed so much, he died in 1547, at a little village near Seville, in Spain.

It was through a mutiny on one of Cortés' ships that the peninsula of California was discovered. In 1533, Cortes had fitted out two new ships for exploration and discoveries. On one of these, commanded by Becerra de Mendoza, a mutiny broke out headed by Fortuño Ximenez, the chief pilot. Mendoza was killed and his friends forced to go ashore on the coast of Jalisco, where they were abandoned. Ximenez and his mutinous crew sailed directly away from the coast and after being at sea for a number of days discovered what they supposed to be an island. They landed at a place now known as La Paz, in Lower California. Here Ximenez and twenty of his companions were reported to have been killed by the Indians. The remainder of the crew navigated the ship back to Jalisco, where they reported the discovery. In 1535 Cortés landed at the same port where Ximenez had been killed. Here he attempted to plant a colony, but the colony scheme was a failure and the colonists returned to Mexico.

The last voyage of exploration made under the auspices of Cortés was that of Francisco de Ulloa in 1539-40. He sailed up the Gulf of California to its head, skirting the coast of the main land, then turning he sailed down the eastern shore of the peninsula, doubled Cape San Lucas and sailed up the Pacific Coast of Lower California to Cedros Island, where, on account of head winds, and his provisions being nearly exhausted, he was forced to return. His voyage proved that what hitherto had been considered an island was a peninsula. The name California had been applied to the peninsula when it was supposed to be an island, some time between 1535 and 1539. The name was undoubtedly taken from an old Spanish romance, "The Sergas de Esplandian," written by Ordoñez de Montalvo, and published in Seville about 1510. This novel was quite popular in the times of Cortés and ran through several editions. This romance describes an island "on the right hand of the Indies, very near the Terrestrial Paradise, which was peopled with black women without any men among them, because they were accustomed to live after the fashion of Amazons." The supposition that the Indies lay at no great distance to the left of the supposed island no doubt suggested the fitness of the name, but who first applied it is uncertain.

So far the explorations of the North Pacific had not extended to what in later years was known as Alta California. It is true Alárcon, the discoverer of the Colorado River in 1540, may possibly have set foot on Californian soil, and Melchoir Díaz later in the same year may have done so when he led an expedition to the mouth of the Colorado, or Buena Guía, as it was then called, but there were no interior boundary lines, and the whole country around the Colorado was called Pimeria. Alárcon had returned from his voyage up the Gulf of California without accomplishing any of the objects for which he had been sent by Viceroy Mendoza. Coronado was still absent in search of Quivera and the fabulous seven cities of Cibola. Mendoza was anxious to prosecute the search for Quivera still further. Pedro de Alvarado had arrived at Navidad from Guatemala with a fleet of 12 ships and a license from the crown for the discovery and conquest of islands in the South Seas. Mendoza, by sharp practice, had obtained a half interest in the projected discoveries. It was proposed before beginning the voyage to the South Seas to employ Alvarado's fleet and men in exploring the Gulf of California and the country to the north of it, but before the expedition was ready to sail an insurrection broke out among the natives of Nueva Galacia and Jalisco. Alvarado was sent with a large part of his force to suppress it. In an attack upon a fortified stronghold he was killed by the insurgents. In the meantime Coronado's return dispelled the myths of Quivera and the seven cities of Cibola; disapproved Padre Niza's stories of their fabulous wealth and dissipated Mendoza's hopes of finding a second Mexico or Peru in the desolate regions of Pimeria. The death of Alvarado had left the fleet at Navidad without a commander, and Mendoza having obtained full possession of the fleet it became necessary for him to find something for it to do. Five of the ships were despatched under command of Ruy Lopez de Villalobos to the Islas de Poniente or the Islands of the Setting Sun (on this voyage Villalobos changed the name of these islands to the Philippines) to establish trade with the islanders, and two of the ships under Cabrillo were sent to explore the northwest coast of the mainland of North America.

CHAPTER II.

THE DISCOVERY OF NUEVA OR ALTA CALIFORNIA.

JUAN RODRIGUEZ CABRILLO (generally reputed to be a Portuguese by birth, but of this there is no positive evidence) sailed from Navidad, June 27, 1542, with two ships, the San Salvador and Vitoria. On the 20th of August he reached Cabo del Engaño, the Cape of Deceit, the highest point reached by Ulloa. From there he sailed on unknown seas. On the 28th of September he discovered "a land locked and very good harbor," which he named San Miguel, now supposed to be San Diego. Leaving there October 3, he sailed along the coast eighteen leagues to the islands some seven leagues from the mainland. These he named after his ships, San Salvador and Vitoria, now Santa Catalina and San Clemente. On the 8th of October he crossed the channel between the islands and the mainland and sailed into a port which he named Bahia de Los Fumos, the Bay of Smokes. The bay and the headlands were shrouded in a dense cloud of smoke, hence the name.

The Bahia de Los Fumos, or Fuegos, is now known as the Bay of San Pedro. Sixty-seven years before Hendrick Hudson entered the Bay of New York, Cabrillo had dropped anchor in the Bay of San Pedro, the future port of Los Angeles. After sailing six leagues farther, on October 9, Cabrillo anchored in a large ensenada or bight, which is supposed to be what is now the Bay of Santa Monica. It is uncertain whether he landed at either place. The next day he sailed eight leagues to an Indian town, which he named the Pueblo de Las Canoas (the town of canoes), this was probably located near the present site of San Buenaventura. Continuing his voyage up the coast he passed through the Santa Barbara Channel, discovering the Islands of Santa Cruz, Santa Rosa and San Miguel. He discovered and entered Monterey Bay and reached the latitude of San Francisco Bay, when he was forced by severe storms to return to the island now known as San Miguel, in the Santa Barbara Channel. There he died, January 3, 1543, from the effects of a fall, and was buried on the island.

The discoverer of California sleeps in an unknown grave in the land he discovered. No monument commemorates his virtues or his deeds. His fellow voyagers named the island where he was buried Juan Rodriguez after their brave commander, but subsequent navigators robbed him of even this slight honor. Bartolomé Ferrelo, his chief pilot, continued the exploration of the coast and on March 1, 1543, discovered Cape Blanco, in the southern part of what is now Oregon. His provisions being nearly exhausted he was compelled to turn back. He ran down the coast, his ships having become separated in a storm at San Clemente Island, they came together again at Cerros Island and both safely reached Navidad, April 18, 1543, after an absence of nearly a year. Cabrillo's voyage was the last one undertaken as a private enterprise by the Viceroy of New Spain. The law giving licenses to subjects to make explorations and discoveries was changed. Subsequent explorations were made under the auspices of the kings of Spain.

For nearly seventy years the Spaniards had held undisputed sway on the Pacific Coast of America. Their isolation had protected the cities and towns of the coast from the plundering raids of the buccaneers and other sea rovers. Immunity from danger had permitted the building up of a flourishing trade along the coast and wealth had flowed into the Spanish coffers. But their dream of security was to be rudely broken.

Francis Drake, the bravest and most daring of the sea kings of the 16th century, had early won wealth and fame by his successful raids in the Spanish West Indies. When he proposed to fit out an expedition against the Spanish settlements on the Pacific, although England and Spain was at peace with each other, he found plenty of wealthy patrons to aid him, even Queen Elizabeth herself taking a share in his venture. He sailed from Plymouth, England, December 13, 1577, with five small vessels. When he reached the Pacific Ocean by way of the Straits of Magellan he had but one "the Golden Hind" a ship of one hundred tons. All the others had turned back or been left behind. Sailing up the Coast of South America he spread terror among the Spanish settlements, robbing towns and capturing ships, until, in the quaint language of a chronicler of the expedition, he "had loaded his vessel with a fabulous amount of fine wares from Asia, precious stones, church ornaments, gold plate and so mooch silver as did ballas the Goulden Hinde." With treasure amounting to "eight hundred, sixty sixe thousand pezos (dollars) of silver * * * a hundred thousand pezos of gold * * * and other things of great worth he thought it not good to returne by the (Magellan) streights * * * least the Spaniards should there waite, and attend for him in great numbers and strength whose hands, he being left but one ship, he could not possibly escape."

By the first week in March, 1579, he had reached the entrance to the Bay of Panama. Surfeited with spoils and loaded with plunder it became necessary for him to find as speedy a passage homeward as possible. To return by the way he had come was to invite certain destruction. So he resolved to seek for the fabled Straits of Anian, which were believed to connect the Atlantic and Pacific. Striking boldly out on the trackless ocean he sailed more than a thousand leagues northward. Encountering contrary winds and cold weather, he gave up his search for the straits and turning he ran down the coast to latitude 38°, where "hee found a harborow for his ship." He anchored in it June 17, 1579. This harbor is now known as Drake's Bay and is situated about half a degree north of San Francisco under Point Reyes.

Fletcher, the chronicler of Drake's voyage, in his narrative "The World Encompassed," says: "The 3d day following, viz. the 21st, our ship having received a leake at sea was brought to anchor neerer the shoare that her goods being landed she might be repaired; but for that we were to prevent any danger that might chance against our safety our Generall first of all landed his men with all necessary provision to build tents and make a fort for the defense of ourselves and goods; and that we might under the shelter of it with more safety (whatever should befall) end our businesse."

The ship was drawn upon the beach, careened on its side, caulked and refitted. While the crew were repairing the ship the natives visited them in great numbers. From some of their actions Drake inferred that the natives regarded himself and his men as gods; to disabuse their minds of such a false impression he had his chaplain, Francis Fletcher, perform divine service according to the English Episcopal ritual. After the service they sang psalms. The Indians enjoyed the singing, but their opinion of Fletcher's sermon is not known. From certain ceremonial performances of the Indians, Drake imagined that they were offering him the sovereignty of their country; he accepted the gift and took formal possession of it in the name of Queen Elizabeth. He named it New Albion "for two causes; the one in respect of the white bankes and cliffes which ly towards the sea; and the other because it might have some affinitie with our own countrey in name which sometimes was so called."*

After the necessary repairs to the ship were made, "our Generall, with his company, made a journey up into the land." "The inland we found to be farre different from the shoare, a goodly country and fruitful soyle, stored with many blessings fit for the use of man; infinite was the company of very large and fat deere which there we saw by thousands as we supposed in a heard."* They saw also great numbers of small burrowing animals which they called conies, but which were probably ground squirrels, although the narrator describes the animal's tail as "like the tayle of a rat eceeding long." Before departing, Drake caused to be set up a monument to show that he had taken possession of the country. His monument was a post sunk in the ground to which was nailed a brass plate engraved with the name of the English Queen, the day and year of his arrival and that the king and people of the country had voluntarily become vassals of the English crown. A new sixpence was also nailed to the post to show her highness' picture and arms. On the 23rd of July, 1579, Drake sailed away, much to the regret of the Indians, who "took a sorrowful farewell of us but being loathe to leave us they presently runne to the top of the hills to keepe us in sight as long as they could, making fires before and behind and on each side of them burning therein sacrifices at our departure."*

* World Encompassed.

He crossed the Pacific Ocean and by way of the Cape of Good Hope reached England, September 26, 1580, after an absence of nearly three years, having encompassed the world. He believed himself to be the first discoverer of the country he called New Albion. "The Spaniards," says Drake's chaplain, Fletcher, in his World Encompassed, "never had any dealings or so much as set a foot in this country, the utmost of their discoveries reaching only to many degrees southward of this place." The English had not yet begun planting colonies in the new world, so no further attention was paid to Drake's discovery of New Albion, and California remained a Spanish possession.

Sixty years have passed since Cabrillo's visit to California, and in all these years Spain has made no effort to colonize it. Only the Indian canoe has cleft the waters of its southern bays and harbors. Far out to the westward beyond the islands the yearly galleon from Manila, freighted with the treasures of "Ormus and of Ind," sailed down the coast of California to Acapulco. These ships kept well out from the southern coast to escape those wolves of the high seas—the buccaneers; for, lurking near the coast of Las Californias, these ocean robbers watched for the white sails of the galleon, and woe to the proud ship if they sighted her. She was chased down by the robber pack and plundered of her treasures. Sixty years have passed but the Indians of the Coast still keep alive the tradition of bearded men floating in from the sea on the backs of monster white winged birds, and they still watch for the return of their strange visitors. Sixty years pass and again the Indian watchers by the sea discern mysterious white winged objects floating in upon the waters of the bays and harbors of California. These are the ships of Sebastian Viscaïno's fleet.

Whether the faulty reckoning of Cabrillo left Viscaïno in doubt of the points named by the first discoverer or whether it was that he might receive the credit of their discovery—Viscaïno changed the names given by Cabrillo to the islands, bays and headlands along the coast: San Miguel of Cabrillo became San Diego, so named for Viscaïno's flag ship; San Salvador and La Vitoria became Santa Catalina and San Clemente; and Cabrillo's Bahia de Los Fumos appears on Viscaïno's map as the Ensenada de San Andres—the bight or cove of St. Andrew; but in a description of the voyage compiled by the cosmographer, Cabrera Bueno, it is named San Pedro. It is not named for the apostle St. Peter, as is generally supposed, but for St. Peter, Bishop of Alexandria, whose day in the Catholic calendar is November 26, the day of the month that Viscaïno anchored in the bay. St. Peter, Bishop of Alexandria, lived in the third century after Christ. He was beheaded by order of the African proconsul Galerius Maximus, during the persecution of the Christians under the Roman Emperor Valerian. The day of his death was November 26, A. D. 258.

Viscaïno found clouds of smoke hanging over the headlands and bays of the coast just as Cabrillo had sixty years before, and for centuries preceding, no doubt, the same phenomenon might have been seen in the autumn days of each year. The smoky condition of the atmosphere was caused by the Indians burning the dry grass of the plains. The California Indian of the coast was not like Nimrod of old, a mighty hunter. He seldom attacked any fiercer animal than the festive jack rabbit. Nor were his futile weapons always sure to bring down the fleet-footed conejo. So, to supply his larder, he was compelled to resort to strategy. When the summer heat had dried the long grass of the plains and rendered it exceedingly inflammable the hunters of the Indian villages set out on hunting expeditions. Marking out a circle on the plains where the dried vegetation was the thickest they fired the grass at several points in the circle. The fire eating inward drove the rabbits and other small game back and forth across the narrowing area until, blinded with heat and scorched by the flames, they perished. When the flames had subsided the Indian secured the spoils of the chase, slaughtered and ready cooked. The scorched and blackened carcasses of the rabbits might not be a tempting tidbit to an epicure, but the Indian was not an epicure.

Viscaïno sailed up the coast, following very nearly the same route as Cabrillo. Passing through the Santa Barbara Channel, he found many populous Indian rancherías on the mainland and the islands. The inhabitants were expert seal hunters and fishermen, and were possessed of a number of large, finely constructed canoes. From one of the villages on the coast near Point Reyes the chief visited him on his ship and among other inducements to remain in the country he offered to give to each Spaniard ten wives. Viscaïno declined the chief's proffered hospitality and the wives. Viscaïno's explorations did not extend further north than those of Cabrillo and Drake. The principal object of his explorations was to find a harbor of refuge for the Manila galleons. These vessels on their outward voyage to the Philippine Islands kept within the tropics, but on their return, they sailed up the Asiatic coast to the latitude of Japan, where, taking advantage of the westerly winds and the Japan current, they crossed over to about Cape Mendocino and then ran down the coast of California and Mexico to Acapulco. Viscaino, in the port he named Monterey after Conde de Monterey, the then Viceroy of New Spain (Mexico), claimed to have discovered the desired harbor.

In a letter to the King of Spain written by Viscaino from the city of Mexico, May 23, 1603, he gives a glowing description of California. As it is the earliest known specimen of California boom literature I transcribe a portion of it: "Among the ports of greater consideration which I discovered was one in thirty-seven degrees of latitude which I called Monterey. As I wrote to Your Majesty from that port on the 28th of December (1602) it is all that can be desired for commodiousness and as a station for ships making the voyage to the Philippines, sailing whence they make a landfall on this coast. This port is sheltered from all winds, while on the immediate coast there are pines, from which masts of any desired size can be obtained, as well as live oaks and white oaks, rosemary, the vine, the rose of Alexandria, a great variety of game, such as rabbits, hares, partridges and other sorts and species found in Spain and in greater abundance than in the Sierra Morena (Mts. of Spain) and flying birds, of kinds differing from those to be found there. This land has a genial climate, its waters are good, and it is very fertile, judging from the varied and luxuriant growth of trees and plants; for I saw some of the fruits, particularly chestnuts and acorns, which are larger than those of Spain. And it is thickly settled with people, whom I found to be of gentle disposition, peaceable and docile, and who can be brought readily within the fold of the holy gospel and into subjection to the Crown of Your Majesty. Their food consists of seeds, which they have in abundance and variety, and of the flesh of game, such as deer, which are larger than cows, and bear, and of neat cattle and bisons and many other animals. The Indians are of good stature and fair complexion, the women being somewhat less in size than the men and of pleasing countenance. The clothing of the people of the coast lands consists of the skins of the sea wolves (otter), abounding there, which they tan and dress better than is done in Castile; they possess also in great quantity, flax like that of Castile, hemp and cotton, from which they make fishing lines and nets for rabbits and hares. They have vessels of pine-wood very well made, in which they go to sea with fourteen paddle men of a side with great dexterity, even in very stormy weather. I was informed by them and by many others I met with in great numbers along more than eight hundred leagues of a thickly settled coast that inland there are great communities, which they invited me to visit with them. They manifested great friendship for us, and a desire for intercourse; were well affected towards the image of Our Lady which I showed to them, and very attentive to the sacrifice of the mass. They worship different idols, for an account of which I refer to said report of your viceroy, and they are well acquainted with silver and gold and said that these were found in the interior."

When Sebastian Viscaino took his pen in hand to describe a country he allowed his imagination full play. He was a veritable Munchausen for exaggeration. Many of the plants and animals he describes were not found in California at the time of his visit. The natives were not clothed in well tanned sea otter skins, but in their own sun tanned skins, with an occasional smear of paint to give variety to the dress nature had provided them. The hint about the existence of gold in California is very ingeniously thrown in to excite the cupidity of the king. The object of Viscaino's boom literature of three hundred years ago was similar to that sent in modern times. He was agitating a scheme for the colonization of the country he was describing. He visited Spain to obtain permission and means from the king to plant colonies in California. After many delays Philip III. ordered the Viceroy of New Spain in 1606 to immediately fit out an expedition to be commanded by Viscaino for the occupation and settlement of the port of Monterey. Before the expedition could be gotten ready Viscaino died and the colonization scheme died with him. Had it not been for his untimely death the settlement of California would have antedated that of Jamestown, Va.

Although Ulloa and Alarcón had reached the head of the Gulf of California and the latter, in 1540, had discovered the Colorado river; and despite the fact that Domingo del Castillo, a Spanish pilot, had made a correct map showing Lower California to be a peninsula, so strong was the belief in the existence of the Straits of Anian that one hundred and sixty years after the discoveries of these explorers, "Las Californias" were still believed to be islands; and were sometimes called Islas Carolinas or Charles' Islands (named for Charles II., of Spain). To the German Jesuit Missionary, Father Kuhn, better known by his Spanish appellation, Father Kino, belongs the credit of finally dissipating the fallacy, that California was an island or several islands. Between 1694 and 1701 he made five explorations to the country around the head of the Gulf of California and the junction of the Gila and Colorado. In 1701 he crossed the Colorado to the California side and learned from the natives that the ocean was only ten days' journey to the westward, but unable to take his pack animals across the river, he was compelled to give up a journey to the sea coast. He had planned a chain of missions to extend up the peninsula into Alta or Nueva California, but died before he could carry out his scheme.

CHAPTER III.

MISSION COLONIZATION.

THE aggrandizement of Spain's empire, whether by conquest or colonization, was alike the work of state and church. The sword and the cross were equally the emblems of the conquistador (conqueror) and the poblador (colonist). The king sent his soldiers to conquer and hold, the church its well-trained servants to proselyte and colonize. Spain's policy of exclusion, which prohibited foreigners from settling in Spanish-American countries, retarded the growth and development of her colonial possessions. Under a decree of Philip II. it was death to any foreigner who should enter the Gulf of Mexico or any of the lands bordering thereon. It was—as the Kings of Spain found to their cost—one thing to utter a decree, but quite another to enforce it. Under such a policy the only means left to Spain to hold her vast colonial possessions was to proselyte the natives of the countries conquered and to transform them into citizens. This had proved effective with the semi-civilized natives of Mexico and Peru, but with the degraded Indians of California it was a failure.

After the abandonment of Viscaino's colonization scheme of 1606, a hundred and sixty-two years passed before the Spanish crown made another attempt to utilize its vast possessions in Upper California. Every year of this long interval, the Manila ships had sailed down the coast, but none of them, so far as we know, with one exception (the San Augustin which was wrecked in Sir Francis Drake's Bay), had ever entered its bays or its harbors. Spain was no longer a first-class power on land or sea. Those brave old sea kings—Drake, Hawkins and Frobisher—had destroyed her invincible Armada and burned her ships in her very harbors, the English and Dutch privateers had preyed upon her commerce on the high seas, and the buccanniers had robbed her treasure ships and devastated her settlements on the islands and the Spanish main, while the freebooters of many nations had time and again captured her Manila galleons and ravished her colonies on the Pacific Coast. The profligacy and duplicity of her kings, the avarice and intrigues of her nobles, the atrocities and inhuman barbarities of her holy inquisition had sapped the vitality of the nation and subverted the character of her people. Although Spain had lost prestige and her power was steadily declining she still held to her colonial possessions. But these were in danger. England, her old-time enemy, was aggressive and grasping; and Russia, a nation almost unknown when Spain was in her prime, was threatening her possessions on the northwest coast of the Pacific. The scheme to provide ports of refuge for the Manila ships on their return voyages, which had been held in abeyance for a hundred and sixty years, was again revived, and to it was added the project of colonizing California to resist Russian aggression.

The sparsely inhabited colonial dominions of Spain can furnish but few immigrants. California, to be held, must be colonized. So again church and state act in concert for the physical and spiritual conquest of the country. The sword will convert where the cross fails. The natives who prove tractable are to be instructed in the faith and kept under control of the clergy until they are trained for citizenship; those who resist, the soldiers convert with the sword and the bullet.

The missions established by the Jesuits on the peninsula of Lower California between 1697 and 1766 had, by royal decree, been given to the Franciscans and the Jesuits expelled from all Spanish countries. To the Franciscans was entrusted the conversion of the gentiles of the north. In 1768 the visitador-general of New Spain, José de Galvez, began the preparation of an expedition to colonize Upper or New California. The state, in this colonization scheme, was represented by Governor Gaspar de Portolá, and the church by Father Junipero Serra. Two expeditions were to be sent by land and two by sea. On the 9th of January, 1769, the San Carlos was despatched from La Paz, and the San Antonio from San Lucas on the 15th of February. The first vessel reached the port of San Diego in 110 days, and the second in 57 days. Such were the uncertainties of ocean travel before the age of steam. On the 14th of May, the first land expedition reached San Diego and found the San Antonio and San Carlos anchored there. On the 1st of July the last land expedition, with which came Governor Portolá and Father Junipero Serra, arrived. On the 16th of July the mission of San Diego was founded, and thus, two hundred and twenty-seven years after its discovery, the first effort at the colonization of California was made.

The ravages of the scurvy had destroyed the crew of one of the vessels and crippled that of the other, so it was impossible to proceed by sea to Monterey, the chief objective point of the expedition. A land force, composed of seventy-five officers and soldiers and two friars, was organized under Governor Gaspar de Portolá and on the 14th of July set out for Monterey Bay. On the 2d of August, 1769, the explorers discovered a river which they named the Porciuncula (now the Los Angeles). That night they encamped within the present limits of the city of Los Angeles. Their camp was named Neustra Señora de Los Angeles. They proceeded northward, following the coast, but failed to find Monterey Bay; Viscaino's exaggerated description deceived them. They failed to recognize in the open ensenada his land-locked harbor. Passing on they discovered the Bay of San Francisco. On their return, in January, they came down the San Fernando Valley, crossed the Arroyo Seco, near the present site of Garvanza, passed over into the San Gabriel Valley and followed down a river they called the San Miguel, and crossing it at the Paso de Bartolo and thence by their former trail, they returned to San Diego. In 1770, Governor Portolá, with another expedition, again set out from San Diego by his former route to search for the Bay of Monterey. There, on the 3d of June, 1770, Father Junipero Serra, who had come by sea from San Diego, founded the mission of San Carlos Borromeo de Monterey, the second mission founded in California, and Portolá took possession of the country in the name of the king of Spain. The founding of new missions progressed steadily. At the close of the century eighteen had been founded, and a chain of these missionary establishments extended from San Diego to the Bay of San Francisco. The neophyte population of these, in 1800, numbered fourteen thousand souls.

The buildings of the different missions of California were constructed after the same general plan; the principal variation being in the architecture of the church. Col. J. J. Warner, a pioneer of 1831, who saw the missions in their prime, thus describes the missionary establishments: "As soon after the founding of a mission as its circumstances would permit, a large pile of buildings in the form of a quadrangle, composed in part of burnt brick but chiefly of sun-dried ones, was erected around a spacious court. A large and capacious church which usually occupied one of the outer corners of the quadrangle, was a necessary and conspicuous part of the pile. In these massive buildings covered with red tile, were the habitation of the friars, rooms for guests, and for the major-domos and their families, hospital wards, store houses and granaries, rooms for the carding, spinning and weaving of woolen fabrics, shops for blacksmiths, joiners and carpenters, saddlers, shoemakers, soap boilers, and cellars for storing the products (wine and brandy) of the vineyards. Near the habitation of the friars and in front of the large building, another building of similar materials was placed and used as quarters for a small number—about a corporal's guard of soldiers, under command of a non-commissioned officer, to hold the Indian neophytes in check, as well as to protect the mission from the attacks of the hostile Indians. The soldiers at each mission also acted as couriers, carrying from mission to mission the correspondence of the government officers and the friars. These small detachments of soldiers which were stationed at each mission were furnished by one or the other of the military posts at San Diego or Santa Barbara both of which were military garrisons."

The location of a mission was decided by the number of Indians in the immediate neighborhood who could be brought into the fold. As the Indian rancherias were located near a stream and in the most fertile part of the valley, the missionary establishments with but very few exceptions occupied the best agricultural lands of California. It was not so much the padres as the Indians who decided the location. These establishments were separated far enough so that their jurisdiction did not conflict. Their distance apart varied from twenty to sixty miles. Each mission was directed by two friars. One of these superintended the mission buildings and conducted the religious instruction of the Indians. The other supervised the business affairs of the mission, but it frequently happened that where one of the padres was a man of great force of character, like Zalvidea at San Gabriel and Péryri at San Luis Rey, he ruled supreme in all capacities, and there was no division of administration.

It is useless to discuss what the missions might have accomplished for the Indian had not the "blight of secularization" struck them. From their own statistics it becomes evident that at the large death rate which prevailed in them and their rapid decline in population during the fifteen to twenty years previous to secularization, the neophytes would in two or three decades at most have become practically extinct and the missions tenantless.

What under most favorable conditions and the ablest management they did accomplish for the Indian was perhaps best shown at San Gabriel under the rule of Zalvidea.

Under him San Gabriel became the most perfect type of the missionary establishments of Alta California and the best illustration of what the mission system under the most favorable circumstances could and did accomplish for the Indian.

Padre Zalvidea came to the mission in 1806 and was removed to Capistrano in 1826. He was a clerical Napoleon—a man born to rule in any sphere of life into which he might be thrown. Hugo Reid says, "He possessed a powerful mind, which was as ambitious as it was powerful, and as cruel as it was ambitious. He remodeled the general system of government at the mission, putting everything in order and placing every person in his proper station. Everything under him was organized and that organization kept up with the lash."

"The neophytes were taught trades; there were soap makers, tanners, shoemakers, carpenters, blacksmiths, bakers, fishermen, brick and tile makers, cart makers, weavers, deer hunters, saddle makers, shepherds and vaqueros. Large soap works were erected, tannery yards established, tallow works, cooper, blacksmith, carpenter and other shops, all in operation. Large spinning rooms, where might be seen 50 or 60 women turning their spindles merrily; and there were looms for weaving wool, cotton and flax. Storehouses filled with grain, and warehouses of manufactured products testified to the industry of the Indians."

The Mission San Gabriel became the largest manufacturing center in California. Zalvidea in a short time mastered the language of the natives and preached to them every Sunday in their own tongue. He looked closely after their morals and instilled industry into them with the lash. Reid says, "He seemed to consider whipping as meat and drink to them, for they had it night and morning." The mission furnished besides its own workmen laborers for the rancheros and the pueblo of Los Angeles. The old Church of Our Lady of the Angeles was built by neophyte laborers and mechanics from the mission, hired out at the compensation of one real (12½ cents) a day.

It would seem, from the industrial training the natives had received through the three generations that came on the stage of action in mission life between 1770 and 1835, that they might have become self-dependent and self supporting; that they might have become capable of self-government and fitted for citizenship under Spain, which was the purpose for which the missions were established; and yet we find them, at San Gabriel in little more than a decade from the time when Zalvidea had raised this mission to such industrial eminence, helpless and incapable—the serf and the slave of the white man, or savage renegades in the mountains.

The causes that brought about the secularization of the missions, the defects in the mission system, and the decline and fall of the neophyte will be discussed in a subsequent chapter.

CHAPTER IV.

THE INDIANS OF SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA.

TO THEORIZE upon the origin of the California Indians would be as unprofitable as to attempt the solution of the ethnological problem of why, living in a country with a genial climate, a productive soil and all the requisites necessary to develop a superior race, the aborigines of California should have been among the most degraded specimens of the North American Indians.

In 1542, when Cabrillo sailed along the coast of California, he found villages of half-naked savages subsisting by fishing and on the natural products of the soil. Two hundred and twenty-seven years later, when Portolá led his expedition from San Diego to Monterey, he found the natives existing under the same conditions. Two centuries had wrought no change in them for the better; nor is it probable that ten centuries would have made any material improvement in their condition. They seemed incapable of evolution.

The Indians of the interior valleys and those of the coast belonged to the same general family. There were no great tribal divisions like those that existed among the Indians east of the Rocky Mountains. Each rancheria was to a certain extent independent of all others, although at times they were known to combine for war or plunder. Although not warlike, they sometimes resisted the whites in battle with bravery and intelligence.

Each village had its own territory in which to hunt and fish and its own section in which to gather nuts, seeds and herbs. While their mode of living was somewhat nomadic, they seem to have had a fixed location for their rancherias. Some of these rancherias, or towns, were quite large. Hugo Reid places the number of their towns within the limits of what was Los Angeles County in 1851 at forty. "Their huts," he says "were made of sticks covered in around with flag mats worked or plaited, and each village generally contained from 500 to 1,500 huts. Suanga (near what is now the site of Wilmington) was the largest and most populous village, being of great extent." If these huts were all occupied by families Reid's estimate of the size of the Indian towns is evidently too large. Portolá's expedition found no very populous towns when it passed through this section in 1769.

The Indian village of Yang-na was located within the present limits of Los Angeles City. It was a large town, as Indian towns go. Its location was between what is now Aliso and First Street, in the neighborhood of Alameda Street. Father Crespi, one of the two Franciscan friars who accompanied Portolá's expedition, in his diary thus describes the first meeting of the white men and the Indian inhabitants of Yang-na: "Immediately at our arrival about eight Indians came to visit us from a large rancheria situated pleasantly among the woods on the river's bank. The gentiles made us presents of trays heaped with pinales, chia* and other herbs. The captain carried a string of shell beads and they threw us three handfuls. Some of the old men smoked from well-made clay bowls, blowing three times, smoke in our faces. We gave them some tobacco and a few beads and they retired well satisfied."

On the evening of August 2, the expedition had encamped on the east side of the river near the point where the Downey Avenue bridge now crosses it.

Father Crespi continues, "Thursday (August 3, 1769), at half past six, we set out and forded the Porciuncula River, where it leaves the mountains to enter the plain." (This would be about where the Buena Vista Street bridge now spans the river.) "After crossing the river we found ourselves in a vineyard among wild grape vines and numerous rose bushes in full bloom. The ground is of a rich, black, clayish soil, and will produce whatever kind of grain one may desire to cultivate. We kept on our road to the west, passing over like excellent pastures. After one-half league's march we approached the rancheria of this locality. Its Indians came out to meet us howling like wolves. We also greeted them, and they wanted to make us a gift of seeds, but not having at hand wherein to carry it we did not accept their present. The Gentiles, seeing our refusal, threw a few handfuls on the ground and scattered the rest to the winds."

The aborigines of Los Angeles seem to have been a hospitable race. From their throwing away their gifts when the Spaniards refused them it would seem that it was a violation of the rules of Indian etiquette to take back a present. Throughout their march Portolá's explorers were treated hospitably by the savages. The Indians lived to regret their kindness to the Spaniards.

After the founding of San Gabriel the Indian dwellers of Yang-na were gathered into the mission fold, and no doubt many a time they howled louder under the lash of the Mission major-domos than they did when with their tribal yell they welcomed the Spaniards to their rancheria in the woods by the river called Porciuncula.

Hugo Reid, in the series of letters referred to in a previous chapter of this volume, has left us an account of the mode of life, the religion, the manners, customs, myths and traditions of the aborigines who once inhabited what at the time he wrote (1851) was Los Angeles county. Los Angeles then included, besides its present area, all of the territory now in Orange and San Bernardino and part of that in Kern and Riverside counties. Reid was married to an Indian woman and had exceptional facilities for studying them. I regard his account as the best of any published. The Indians of San Diego differed but little from those of Los Angeles. From these letters I briefly collate some of the leading characteristics of the Indians of Southern California.

GOVERNMENT.

"Before the Indians belonging to the greater part of this county were known to the whites they comprised, as it were, one great family under distinct chiefs; they spoke nearly the same language, with the exception of a few words, and were more to be distinguished by a local intonation of the voice than anything else. Being related by blood and marriage, war was never carried on between them. When war was consequently waged against neighboring tribes of no affinity it was a common cause. * * *

* Chia, which Father Crespi frequently mentions in his diary, is a small, gray, oblong seed, procured from a plant having a number of seed vessels on a straight stalk, one above another, like wild sage. This, roasted and ground into meal, was eaten with cold water, being of a glutinous consistency and very cooling. It was a favorite article of food with the Indians.

"The government of the people was invested in the hands of their chiefs, each captain commanding his own lodge. The command was hereditary in a family. If the right line of descent ran out they elected one of the same kin nearest in blood. Laws in general were made as required, with some few standing ones. Robbery was never known among them. Murder was of rare occurrence and punished with death. Incest was likewise punished with death, being held in such abhorrence that marriages between kinsfolk were not allowed. The manner of putting to death was by shooting the delinquent with arrows. If a quarrel ensued between two parties the chief of the lodge took cognizance in the case and decided according to the testimony produced. But if a quarrel occurred between parties of distinct lodges each chief heard the witnesses produced by his own people, and then, associated with the chief of the opposite side, they passed sentence. In case they could not agree an impartial chief was called in, who heard the statements made by both and he alone decided. There was no appeal from his decision. Whipping was never resorted to as a punishment. All fines and sentences consisted in delivering shell money, food and skins."

RELIGION.

"They believed in one God, the Maker and Creator of all things, whose name was and is held so sacred among them as hardly ever to be used, and when used only in a low voice. That name is Qua-o-âr. When they have to use the name of the Supreme Being on an ordinary occasion they substitute in its stead the word Y-yo-ha-ring-nain, or 'the Giver of Life.' They have only one word to designate life and soul."

"The world was at one time in a state of chaos, until God gave it its present formation, fixing it on the shoulders of seven giants, made expressly for this end. They have their names, and when they move themselves an earthquake is the consequence. Animals were then formed, and lastly man and woman were formed, separately from earth, and ordered to live together. The man's name was Tobohar and the woman's Pobavit. God ascended to Heaven immediately afterwards, where he receives the souls of all who die. They had no bad spirits connected with their creed, and never heard of a 'devil' or a 'hell' until the coming of the Spaniards. They believed in no resurrection whatever. Having nothing to care about their souls it made them stoical in regard to death."

MARRIAGE.

"Chiefs had one, two or three wives, as their inclination dictated, the subjects only one. When a person wished to marry and had selected a suitable partner, he advertised the same to all his relatives, even to the nineteenth cousin. On a day appointed the male portion of the lodge brought in a collection of money beads. All the relations having come in with their share, they (the males) proceeded in a body to the residence of the bride, to whom timely notice had been given. All of the bride's female relations had been assembled and the money was equally divided among them, the bride receiving nothing, as it was a sort of purchase. After a few days the bride's female relations returned the compliment by taking to the bridegroom's dwelling baskets of meal made of chia, which was distributed among the male relatives. These preliminaries over, a day was fixed for the ceremony, which consisted in decking out the bride in innumerable strings of beads, paint, feathers and skins. On being ready she was taken up in the arms of one of her strongest male relatives, who carried her dancing, toward her lover's habitation. All of her family, friends and neighbors accompanied, dancing around, throwing food and edible seeds at her feet every step, which were collected in a scramble as best they could by the spectators. The relations of the man met them half way, and, taking the bride, carried her themselves, joining in the ceremonious walking dance. On arriving at the bridegroom's (who was sitting within his hut) she was inducted into her new residence by being placed alongside of her husband, while baskets of seeds were liberally emptied on their heads to denote blessing and plenty. This was likewise scrambled for by the spectators, who, on gathering up all of the bride's seed cake, departed leaving them to enjoy their honeymoon according to usage. A grand dance was given on the occasion, the warriors doing the dancing; the young women doing the singing. The wife never visited her relations from that day forth, although they were at liberty to visit her."

BURIALS.

"When a person died all the kin collected to mourn his or her loss. Each one had his own peculiar mode of crying or howling, as easily distinguished the one from the other as one song is from another. After lamenting awhile a mourning dirge was sung in a low, whining tone, accompanied by a shrill whistle produced by blowing into the tube of a deer's leg bone. Dancing can hardly be said to have formed a part of the rites, as it was merely a monotonous action of the foot on the ground. This was continued alternately until the body showed signs of decay, when it was wrapped up in the covering used in life. The hands were crossed upon the breast and the body tied from head to foot. A grave having been dug in their burial ground, the body was deposited with seeds, etc., according to the means of the family. If the deceased were the head of a family or a favorite son, the hut in which he lived was burned up, as likewise all his personal effects."

FEUDS—THE SONG FIGHTS.

"Animosity between persons or families was of long duration, particularly between those of different tribes. These feuds descended from father to son, until it was impossible to tell for how many generations. They were, however, harmless in themselves, being merely a war of songs, composed and sung against the conflicting party, and they were all of the most obscene and indecent language imaginable. There are two families at this day (1851) whose feud commenced before Spaniards were even dreamed of, and they still continue yearly singing and dancing against each other. The one resides at the Mission of San Gabriel and the other at San Juan Capistrano; they both lived at San Bernardino when the quarrel commenced. During the singing they continue stamping on the ground to express the pleasure they would derive from tramping on the graves of their foes. Eight days was the duration of the song fight."

UTENSILS.

"From the bark of nettles was manufactured thread for nets, fishing lines, etc. Needles, fish-hooks, awls and many other articles were made of either bone or shell; for cutting up meat a knife of cone was invariably used. Mortars and pestles were made of granite. Sharp stones and perseverance were the only things used in their manufacture, and so skillfully did they combine the two that their work was always remarkably uniform. Their pots to cook in were made of soapstone of about an inch in thickness, and procured from the Indians of Santa Catalina. Their baskets, made out of a certain species of rush, were used only for dry purposes, although they were waterproof. The vessels in use for liquids were roughly made of rushes and plastered outside and in with bitumen or pitch, called by them 'sanot.'"

MYTHOLOGY.

"The Indians of the Los Angeles valley had an elaborate mythology. The Cahuilla tribes have a tradition of their creation. According to this tradition the primeval Adam and Eve were created by the Supreme Being in the waters of a northern sea. They came up out of the water upon the land, which they found to be soft and miry. They traveled southward in search of land suitable for their sustenance and residence, which they found at last upon the mountain ridges of Southern California."

Of their myths and traditions, Hugo Reid says: "They were of incredible length and contained more metamorphoses than Ovid could have engendered in his brain had he lived a thousand years."

Some of these Indian myths, when divested of their crudities and the ideas clothed in fitting language, are as beautiful and as poetical as those of Greece or Scandinavia.

In the myth given below there is, in the moral, a marked similarity to the Grecian fable of Orpheus and Eurydice. The central thought in each is the impossibility of the dead returning to earth. To more clearly illustrate the parallelism of ideas, I give a brief outline of the Grecian myth:

Eurydice, stung by an adder, dies, and her spirit is borne to the Plutonian realms. Orpheus, her husband, seeking her, enters the dread abode of the god of the lower world. He strikes his wonderful lyre, and the sweet music charms the denizens of hades. They forget their sorrows and cease from their endless tasks. Pluto, charmed, allows Eurydice to depart with her lover on one condition, Orpheus is not to look upon her until they reach the upper world. He disobeys and she is snatched from him. Disconsolate, he wanders over the earth till death unites him to his loved one.

Ages ago, so runs the Indian myth, a powerful people dwelt on the banks of the Arroyo Seco, and hunted over the hills and plains of what are now our modern Pasadena and the Valley of San Fernando. They committed a grievous crime against the Great Spirit. A pestilence destroyed them, all save a boy and a girl, who were saved by a foster mother possessed of supernatural powers. They grew to manhood and womanhood, and became husband and wife. Their devotion to each other angered the foster mother, who fancied herself neglected. She plotted to destroy the wife. The young woman, divining her fate, told her husband that should he at any time feel a tear drop on his shoulder, he might know that she was dead. While he was away hunting the dread signal came. He hastened back to destroy the hag who had brought death to his wife, but the sorceress escaped. Disconsolate, he threw himself on the grave of his wife. For three days he neither ate nor drank. On the third day a whirlwind arose from the grave and moved toward the south. Perceiving in it the form of his wife, he hastened on until he overtook it. Then a voice came out the cloud saying: "Whither I go thou canst not come. Thou art of earth, but I am dead to the world. Return, my husband, return!" He plead piteously to be taken with her. She consenting, he was wrapt in the cloud with her and borne across the illimitable sea that separates the abode of the living from that of the dead. When they reached the realms of ghosts a spirit voice said: "Sister, thou comest to us with an order of earth; what dost thou bring?" Then she confessed that she had brought her living husband. "Take him away!" said a voice, stern and commanding. She plead that he might remain, and recounted his many virtues. To test his virtues, the spirits gave him four labors. First, to bring a feather from the top of a pole so high that its summit was invisible. Next, to split a hair of great length and exceeding fineness; third, to make on the ground a map of the Constellation of the Lesser Bear, and locate the North Star, and last, to slay the celestial deer that had the form of black beetles and were exceedingly swift. With the aid of his wife he accomplished all the tasks. But no mortal was allowed to dwell in the abodes of death. "Take thou thy wife and return with her to the earth," said the spirit. "Yet remember, thou shalt not speak to her; thou shalt not touch her until three suns have passed. A penalty awaits thy disobedience." He promised. They pass from the spirit land and travel to the confines of matter. By day she is invisible, but by the flickering light of his campfire he sees the dim outline of her form. Three days pass. As the sun sinks behind the western hills he builds his campfire. She appears before him in all the beauty of life. He stretches forth his arms to embrace her. She is snatched from his grasp. Although invisible to him, yet the upper rim of the great orb of day hung above the western verge. He had broken his promise. Like Orpheus, disconsolate, he wandered over the earth, until, relenting, the spirits sent their servant Death, to bring him to Tecupar (heaven).

The following bears a resemblance to the Norse myth* of Gyoll, the River of Death and its glittering bridge, over which the spirits of the dead pass to Hel or the land of the spirits. The Indian, however, had no idea of any kind of a bridge except a foot log across a stream. The myth in a crude form was narrated to me many years ago by an old pioneer.

According to this myth when an Indian died his spirit form was conducted by an unseen guide over a mountain trail unknown and inaccessible to mortals to a rapidly flowing river that separated the abode of the living from that of the dead. As the trail descended to the river it branched to the right and the left. The right hand path led to a foot bridge made of the massive trunk of a rough-barked pine which spanned the Indian Styx; the left led to a slender, fresh-pealed birch pole that hung high above the roaring torrent. At the parting of the trail an inexorable fate forced the bad to the left, while the spirit form of the good passed on to the right and over the rough-barked pine to the happy hunting grounds, the Indian heaven. The bad, reaching the river's brink and gazing longingly upon the delights beyond, essayed to cross the slippery pole—a slip, a slide, a clutch at empty space, and the ghostly spirit form was hurled into the mad torrent below, and was borne by the rushing waters into a vast Lethean lake, where it sank beneath the waves and was blotted from existence forever.

The Indians of the Santa Barbara Channel, according to the reports of the early explorers of that region, were somewhat superior in appearance and intelligence to those of the country further south. The mainland bordering on the channel and the Channel Islands seem to have been more densely populated than any other portion of California. These natives had a different religious belief, or at least a different god from those further south. The god of the Channel Indians was named Chupu. He was the deification of good and Nunaxus the personification of evil. Chupu created Nunaxus, who rebelled against his creator and tried to overthrow him, but Chupu was all-powerful, and to punish this Indian Satan, he created man who, devouring the animal and vegetable products of the earth, checked the physical growth of Nunaxus, who had hoped by liberal feeding to become like unto a mountain. Foiled in his ambition, Nunaxus ever afterwards sought to injure mankind.

To secure the protection of Chupu, offerings were made to him and dances were instituted in his honor. Flutes and other instruments were played to attract his attention. When Nunaxus brought calamity upon the Indians in the shape of dry years which caused a dearth of animal and vegetable products or sent sickness to afflict them, their old men interceded with Chupu to protect them; and to exorcise their Satan they shot arrows and threw stones in the direction in which he was supposed to be. While Chupu was the god of good he could punish an apostate or a renegade with calamity and death. In 1801, a pulmonary epidemic destroyed great numbers of the Indians in the Channel Missions. Chupu revealed to a neophyte in a dream that the plague was sent upon the Indians for their apostasy, and all who had been baptized would die unless they renounced Christianity. The story of the revelation spread among the neophytes of the different missions and they hastened to propitiate Chupu with offerings and to divest themselves of their Christianity. The plague abated and the Indians returned to their allegiance. When the padres learned what had been going on they were greatly disturbed for they knew the old superstition was still prevalent and had Chupu decreed their deaths the natives would have executed his will.

CHAPTER V.

THE FRANCISCAN MISSIONS OF SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA.

OF THE twenty-one Franciscan Missions founded in California from 1769 to 1823, nine were in the territory now designated as Southern California. Two of these, San Diego and San Luis Rey, were located in what is now San Diego County; one, San Juan Capistrano, in Orange; two, San Gabriel and San Fernando, in Los Angeles; one, San Buenaventura, in Ventura; and three, Santa Barbara, La Purisima and Santa Inez, are in Santa Barbara County. The asistencia, or auxiliary, of San Antonia de Pala is in San Diego County. The mission buildings of San Diego, San Juan Capistrano, San Fernando, La Purisima and Santa Inez are in ruins. The church buildings of San Luis Rey, San Gabriel, San Buenaventura and Santa Barbara are in a fairly good state of preservation and services are still held in them.

SAN DIEGO DE ALCALA.

The four expeditions fitted out by José de Galvez under the instructions from the Viceroy of New Spain for the physical and spiritual conquest of Nueva California were all united at San Diego July 1st, 1769. The leaders, Governor Gaspar de Portolá and President Junipero Serra, lost no time in beginning their work. On the 14th of July, Governor Portolá set out on his exploration of a land route to the Bay of Monterey and two days later Father Junipero Serra founded the first mission in California for the conversion of the Indians.

The Mission of San Diego de Alcalá was founded July 16, 1769, by the president of the Lower California Missions, Father Junipero Serra. The original site was at a place called by the Indians "Cosoy," near the presidio, now Old Town.

Temporary buildings were erected here, but the location proved unsuitable and in August, 1774, the mission was removed about two leagues up the San Diego River to a place called by the natives "Nipauay." Here a dwelling for the padres, a storehouse, a smithy and a wooden church 18x57 feet were erected.

The mission buildings at Cosoy were given up to the presidio except two rooms, one for the visiting priests and the other for a temporary store room for mission supplies coming by sea. The missionaries had been fairly successful in the conversions of the natives and some progress had been made in teaching them to labor. On the night of November 4, 1775, without any previous warning, the gentiles or unconverted Indians in great numbers attacked the mission. One of the friars, Fray Funster, escaped to the soldiers' quarters; the other, Father Jaume, was killed by the savages. The blacksmith also was killed; the carpenter succeeded in reaching the soldiers. The Indians set fire to the buildings, which were nearly all of wood. The soldiers, the priest and carpenter were driven into a small adobe building that had been used as a kitchen. Two of the soldiers were wounded. The corporal, one soldier and the carpenter were all that were left to hold at bay a thousand howling fiends. The corporal, who was a sharpshooter, did deadly execution on the savages. Father Funster saved the defenders from being blown to pieces by the explosion of a fifty-pound sack of gunpowder. He spread his cloak over the sack and sat on it, thus preventing the power from igniting by the sparks from the burning buildings. The fight lasted till daylight, when the hostiles fled. The Christian Indians who professed to have been coerced by the savages then appeared and made many protestations of sorrow at what had happened. The military commander was not satisfied that they were innocent, but the padres believed them. New buildings were erected at the same place, the soldiers of the presidio for a time assisting the Indians in their erection.

For years the mission was fairly prosperous. In 1800 the cattle numbered 6,960 and the agricultural products amounted to 2,600 bushels. From 1769 to 1834 there were 6,638 persons baptized and 4,428 buried. The largest number of cattle possessed by the mission at one time was 9,245 head in 1822. The total number of domestic animals belonging to the mission that year was 30,325. The old building standing on the mission site at the head of the valley is the third church erected there. The first, built of wood and roofed with tiles, was erected in 1774; the second, built of adobe, was completed in 1780 and the walls of this were badly cracked by an earthquake in 1803; the third was begun in 1808 and dedicated November 12, 1813. The mission was secularized in 1834.

SAN GABRIEL ARCANGEL.

San Gabriel Arcángel was the second mission founded in Southern California and the fourth in the territory. Father Junipero Serra had gone north in 1770 and founded the mission of San Carlos Borromeo on Monterey Bay and the following year he established the mission of San Antonio de Padua on the Salinas River about twenty leagues south of Monterey.

On the 6th of August, 1771, a cavalcade of soldiers and muleteers escorting Padres Somera and Cambon set out from San Diego over the trail made by Portolá's expedition in 1769 (when it went north in search of Monterey Bay) to found a new mission on the River Jesus de Los Temblores or to give it its full name—El Rio del Dulcísimo Nombre de Jesus de Los Temblores—The River of the Sweetest Name of Jesus of the Earthquakes. Not finding a suitable location on this river (now the Santa Ana) they pushed on to the Rio San Miguel, also known as the Rio de Los Temblores.

Here they selected a site where wood and water were abundant. A stockade of poles was built, enclosing a square within which a church was erected, covered with boughs.

September 8, 1771, the mission was formally founded and dedicated to the Archangel Gabriel. The Indians who at the coming of the Spaniards were docile and friendly, a few days after the founding of the mission suddenly attacked two soldiers who were guarding the horses. One of these soldiers had outraged the wife of the chief who led the attack. The soldier who committed the crime killed the chieftain with a musket ball and the other Indians fled. The soldiers then cut off the chief's head and fastened it to a pole at the presidio gate. From all accounts the soldiers at this mission were more brutal and barbarous than the Indians and more in need of missionaries to convert them than were the savages. The progress of the mission was slow. At the end of the second year only 73 children and adults had been baptized. Father Serra attributed the lack of conversions to the bad conduct of the soldiers.

The first buildings at the Mission Vieja were all of wood. The church was 45x18 feet, built of logs and covered with tule thatch. The church and the other wooden buildings used by the padres stood within a square inclosed by pointed stakes. In 1776, five years after its founding, the mission was moved from its first location to a new site about a league distant from the old. The old site was subject to overflow by the river. The adobe ruins pointed out to tourists as the foundations of the old mission are the debris of a building erected for a ranch house between fifty and sixty years ago. The buildings at the Mission Vieja were all of wood and no trace of them remains. A chapel was first built at the new site. It was replaced by a church built of adobes 108 feet long by 21 feet wide. The present stone church begun about 1794, and completed about 1806, is the fourth church erected.

The mission attained the acme of its importance in 1817, when there were 1701 neophytes in the mission fold.

The largest grain crop raised at any mission was that harvested at San Gabriel in 1821, which amounted to 29,400 bushels. The number of cattle belonging to the mission in 1830 was 25,725. During the whole period of the mission's existence, i. e. from 1771 to 1834, according to statistics compiled by Bancroft from mission records, the total number of baptisms was 7,854: of which 4,355 were Indian adults and 2,459 were Indian children and the remainder gente de razon, or people of reason. The deaths were 5,656, of which 2,916 were Indian adults and 2,363 Indian children. If all the Indian children born were baptized it would seem (if the statistics are correct) that but very few ever grew up to manhood and womanhood. In 1834, the year of its secularization, its neophyte population was 1,320.

The missionaries of San Gabriel established a station at old San Bernardino about 1820. It was not an asistencia like Pala but merely an agricultural station or ranch headquarters. The buildings were destroyed by the Indians in 1834.

SAN JUAN CAPISTRANO.

The first attempt to found the Mission of San Juan Capistrano was made October 30, 1775. A cross was erected and a mass said in a hut constructed for the purpose. The revolt of the Indians at San Diego on the night of November 5th, and the massacre of Father Jaime and others, news of which reached San Juan on the 7th, called away the soldiers. The bells which had been hung on the branch of a tree were taken down and buried and the soldiers and padres hastened to San Diego. November 1, 1776, President Serra and Fathers Mugartegui and Amurro with an escort of soldiers re-established the mission. The bells were dug up and hung upon a tree. Their ringing assembled a number of the natives. Anenramada of boughs was constructed and Father Serra said mass.

The first location of the mission was several miles northeast of the present site, and at the foot of the mountain. The former location is still known as La Mission Vieja. Whether the change of location was made at the time of the re-establishment or later is not known. The erection of a stone church was begun in February, 1797, and completed in 1806. A master builder had been brought from Mexico, and under his superintendence the neophytes did the mechanical labor. It was the largest and handsomest church in California and was the pride of mission architecture. The year 1812 was known in California as el año de los temblores—the year of earthquakes. For months the seismic disturbance was almost continuous. On Sunday, December 8, 1812, a severe shock threw down the lofty church tower, which crashed through the vaulted roof on the congregation below. The padre who was celebrating mass escaped through the sacristy. Of the fifty persons present only five or six escaped. The church was never rebuilt. "There is not much doubt," says Bancroft, "that the disaster was due rather to faulty construction than to the violence of the temblor. The edifice was of the usual cruciform shape, about 90x180 feet on the ground, with very thick walls and arched dome-like roof all constructed of stones imbedded in mortar or cement. The stones were not hewn but of irregular size and shape, a kind of structure evidently requiring great skill to ensure solidity." The mission reached its maximum in 1819; from that on till the date of its secularization there was a rapid decline in the numbers of its live stock and of its neophytes.

This was one of the missions in which Governor Figueroa tried his experiment of forming Indian pueblos of the neophytes. For a time the experiment was a partial success, but eventually it went the way of all the other missions. Its lands were granted to private individuals and the neophytes scattered. Its picturesque ruins are a great attraction to tourists.

SAN BUENAVENTURA.

The founding of San Buenaventura had been long delayed. It was to have been among the first missions founded by Father Serra; it proved to be his last. On the 26th of March, 1782, Governor de Neve accompanied by Father Serra (who had come down afoot from San Carlos) and Father Cambon with a convoy of soldiers and a number of neophytes set out from San Gabriel to found the mission. At the first camping place, Governor de Neve was recalled to San Gabriel by a message from Col. Pedro

Fages informing him of the orders of the council of war to proceed against the Yumas, who had the previous year destroyed the two missions on the Colorado river and massacred the missionaries.

On the 29th the remainder of the company reached a place on the coast named by Portolá in 1769, Asuncion de Nuestra Señora, which had for some time been selected for a mission site. Near it was a large Indian rancheria.

On the 31st of March, which was Easter Sunday, the mission was formally founded with the usual ceremonies and dedicated to San Buenaventura, Giovanni di Fidenza of Tuscany, born in 1221. It is said that St. Francis of Assisi (founder of the Franciscan Order), meeting him one day and foreseeing his future greatness, exclaimed, "O buona ventura!" and the name Buenaventura in Spanish clung to him.* He was also called the "Seraphic Doctor" from his knowledge of theology.

The progress of the mission was slow at first. Only two adults were baptized in 1782. The first building built of wood was destroyed by fire. The church still standing, built of brick and adobe, was completed and dedicated September 9, 1809. The earthquake of December 8, 1812, damaged the church to such an extent that the tower and part of the facade had to be rebuilt. "The whole mission site appeared to settle and the fear of being engulfed by the sea drove all away to San Joaquin y Santa Ana where they remained until April, 1813."†

The mission reached its greatest prosperity in 1816, when it had a neophyte population of 1,330, and owned 23,400 cattle. Vancouver, the English explorer, who visited the mission in November, 1793, says, "The garden of Buenaventura far exceeded anything I had before met in these regions, both in respect of the quantity, quality and variety of its excellent productions, not only indigenous to the country, but appertaining to the temperate as well as torrid zone; not one species having yet been sown or planted that had not flourished. These have principally consisted of apples, pears, plums, figs, oranges, grapes, peaches and pomegranates, together with the plantain, banana, cocoanut, sugar cane, indigo and a great variety of the necessary and useful kitchen herbs, plants and roots. All these were flourishing in the greatest health and perfection, though separated from the seaside only by two or three fields of corn that were cultivated within a few yards of the surf." The mission was secularized in 1837. The church, greatly modernized, is still used for holding services.

*Bancroft, Vol. 1, 376.

†Franciscans in California.

SANTA BARBARA.

Governor Felipe de Neve in his report of June, 1777, urged the establishing of three missions and a central presidio on the Santa Barbara Channel. His report was approved by General Croix, and Rivera was sent to recruit settlers in Sinaloa and Sonora for the Channel establishments, and also for the pueblos of San José and Los Angeles. The pueblos were founded, but the founding of the missions and presidio from one cause or another had been delayed. After the founding of the mission of San Buenaventura, March 31, 1782, about the middle of the April following Governor de Neve, who had come up from San Gabriel, Father Serra, who was still at San Buenaventura, and a force of sixty soldiers with their officers, proceeded up the coast to found the presidio. After marching about nine leagues the Governor called a halt in a beautiful valley near the coast. Having found a suitable location where wood and water could easily be procured, the presidio of Santa Barbara was founded. Father Serra had hoped that the mission would be founded at the same time. Disappointed in this, he left for Monterey, where he expected to meet six new missionaries, who were reported coming by ship. In this, too, he was disappointed; the missionaries did not come at that time.

The death of Serra in 1784 still further delayed the founding, and it was not till the latter part of 1786 that everything was in readiness for the establishing of the new mission. On the 22d of November, Father Lasuen, who had succeeded Father Serra as president of the California missions, arrived in Santa Barbara, accompanied by two missionaries recently arrived from Mexico. After a careful survey of different locations he selected a site about a mile distant from the presidio. The place was called by the Indians Tay-nay-an ("rocky hill"). It was selected by the padres on account of the abundance of stone for building and also for the plentiful supply of water for irrigation.

On the 15th of December, 1786, Father Lasuen, in a hut of boughs, celebrated the first mass; but December 4th, the day that the fiesta of Santa Barbara is commemorated, is considered the date of its founding. Part of the services were held on that day. A chapel built of adobes and roofed with thatch was erected in 1787. Several other buildings of adobe were erected the same year. In 1788 tile took the place of thatch. In 1789 a second church much larger than the first was built. A third church of adobe was commenced in 1793 and finished in 1794. A brick portico was added in 1795 and the walls plastered.

The great earthquake of December, 1812, demolished the Mission Church and destroyed nearly all the buildings. The years 1813 and 1814 were spent in removing the debris of the ruined buildings and in preparing for the erection of new ones. The erection of the present Mission Church was begun in 1815. It was completed and dedicated September 10, 1820.

Father Gaballeria, in his History of Santa Barbara, gives the dimensions of the church as follows: "Length (including walls), 60 varas; width, 14 varas; height, 10 varas (a vara is 34½ inches)." The walls are of stone and rest on a foundation of rock and cement. They are six feet thick and are further strengthened by buttresses. Notwithstanding the building has withstood the storms of four score years, it is still in an excellent state of preservation. Its exterior has not been disfigured by attempts at modernizing.

The highest neophyte population was reached at Santa Barbara in 1803, when it numbered 1,792. The largest number of cattle was 5,200, in 1809. In 1834, the year of secularization, the neophytes numbered 556, which was a decrease of 155 from the number in 1830. At such a rate of decrease it would not, even if mission rule had continued, have taken more than a dozen years to depopulate the mission.

LA PURISIMA CONCEPCION.

Two missions, San Buenaventura and Santa Barbara, had been founded on the Santa Barbara Channel in accordance with Neve's report of 1777, in which he recommended the founding of three missions and a presidio in that district. It was the intention of General La Croix to conduct these on a different plan from that prevailing in the older missions. The natives were not to be gathered into a missionary establishment but were to remain in their rancherías which were to be converted into mission pueblos. The Indians were to receive instruction in religion, industrial arts and self-government while comparatively free from restraint. The plan which no doubt originated with Governor de Neve was a good one theoretically and possibly might have been practically. The missionaries were bitterly opposed to it. Unfortunately it was tried first in the Colorado River Missions among the fierce and treacherous Yumas. The massacre of the padres and soldiers of these missions was attributed to this innovation.

In establishing the Channel Mission the missionaries opposed the inauguration of this plan and by their persistence succeeded in setting it aside; and the old system was adopted, La Purisima Concepcion or the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin. The third of the Channel Missions was founded, December 8, 1787, by Father Lasuen at a place called by the natives Algsacupi. Its location is about twelve miles from the ocean on the Santa Inez River. Three years after its founding 300 converts had been baptized but not all of them lived at the mission. The first church was a temporary structure. The second church, built of adobe and roofed with tile, was completed in 1802. December 21, 1812, an earthquake demolished the church and also about one hundred adobe houses of the neophytes. A site across the river and about four miles distant from the former one, was selected for new buildings. A temporary building for a church was erected then. A new church, built of adobes and roofed with tile, was completed and dedicated in 1818.

The Indians revolted in 1824 and damaged the building. They took possession of it and a battle lasting four hours was fought between 130 soldiers and 400 Indians. The neophytes cut loop holes in the church and used two old rusty cannon and a few guns they possessed; but, unused to firearms, they were routed with the loss of several killed. During the revolt which lasted several months, four white men and fifteen or twenty Indians were killed. The hostiles, most of whom fled to the Tulares, were finally subdued. The leaders were punished with imprisonment and the others returned to their missions.

This mission's population was largest in 1804, when it numbered 1,520; in 1834, there were but 407 neophytes connected with it. It was secularized in February, 1835. During mission rule from 1787 to 1834 the total number of Indian children baptized was 1,492; died 902, which was a lower death rate than at most of the southern missions.

SAN FERNANDO REY DE ESPANA.

In the closing years of the century, explorations were made for new mission sites in California. These were to be located between missions already founded. Among those selected at that time was the site of the Mission San Fernando on the Encino rancho, then occupied by Francisco Reyes. Reyes surrendered whatever right he had to the land and the padres occupied his house for a dwelling while new buildings were in the course of erection.

September 8, 1797, with the usual ceremonies, the mission was founded by President Lasuen assisted by Father Dumetz. According to instructions from Mexico it was dedicated to San Fernando Rey de España (Fernando III. King of Spain, 1217-1251). At the end of the year 1797, fifty-five converts had been gathered into the mission fold and at the end of the century 352 had been baptized.

The adobe church, begun before the close of the century, was completed and dedicated in December, 1806. It had a tiled roof. It was but slightly injured by the great earthquakes of December, 1812, which were so destructive to the mission buildings at San Juan Capistrano, Santa Barbara, La Purisima and Santa Inez. This mission reached its greatest prosperity in 1819, when its neophyte population numbered 1,080. The largest number of cattle owned by it at one time was 12,800 in 1819.

Its decline was not so rapid as that of some of the other missions, but the death rate especially among the children was fully as high. Of the 1,367 Indian children baptized at it during the existence of mission rule 965 or over seventy per cent died in childhood. It was not strange that the fearful death rate both of children and adults at the missions sometimes frightened the neophytes into running away.

San Fernando figured frequently in the California revolutions. It was a sort of a frontier post to both parties in the civil war of 1837 and 1838. Negotiations between Fremont and General Andres Pico which resulted in the treaty of Cahuenga were begun at the mission. June 17, 1846, Governor Pio Pico sold the ex-mission to Enlologio de Celis for $14,000. The money, or at least a part of it, was used by Pico in fitting out an army to suppress Castro who was supposed to be fomenting a revolution to overthrow Pico. The seizure of California by Commodore Sloat, July 7, 1846, put an end to Castro's revolution and to Pico's governorship as well.

Father Blas, the last of the Franciscan missionaries of California, remained at the mission until May, 1847. He died at San Gabriel in 1850.

SAN LUIS REY DE FRANCIA.

Several explorations had been made for a mission site between San Diego and San Juan Capistrano. There was quite a large Indian population that had not been brought into the folds of either mission. In October, 1797, a new exploration of this territory was ordered and a site was finally selected although the agricultural advantages were regarded as not satisfactory.

Governor Barica, February 28, 1798, issued orders to the comandante at San Diego to furnish a detail of soldiers to aid in erecting the necessary buildings. June 13, 1798, President Lasuen, the successor of President Serra, assisted by Fathers Peyri and Santiago, with the usual services, founded the new mission. It was named San Luis Rey de Francia (St. Louis

SAN LUIS REY MISSION, FOUNDED IN 1798

King of France). Its location was near a river on which was bestowed the name of the mission. The mission flourished from its very beginning. Its controlling power was Padre Antonio Peyri. He remained in charge of it from its founding almost to its downfall, in all thirty-three years. He was a man of great executive abilities and under his administration it became one of the largest and most prosperous missions in California. It reached its maximum in 1826, when its neophyte population numbered 2,869 the largest number at one time connected with any mission in the territory.

The Asistencia or Auxiliary Mission of San Antonio was established at Pala, seven leagues easterly from the parent mission. A chapel was erected here and regular services held. One of the padres connected with San Luis Rey was in charge of this station. Father Peyri left California in 1831, with the exiled Governor Victoria. He went to Mexico and from there to Spain and lastly to Rome where he died. The mission was converted into an Indian pueblo in 1834, but the pueblo was not a success. Most of the neophytes drifted to Los Angeles and San Gabriel. During the Mexican Conquest American troops were stationed at it. It has recently been partially repaired and is now used for a Franciscan school under charge of Father J. J. O'Keefe.

SANTA INEZ.

Santa Inez was the last mission founded in Southern California. It was established September 17, 1804. Its location is about forty miles northwesterly from Santa Barbara on the easterly side of the Santa Inez mountains and eighteen miles southeasterly from La Purisima. Father Tapis, president of the mission from 1803 to 1812, preached the sermon and was assisted in the ceremonies by Fathers Ciprés, Calzada and Gutierrez. Carrillo, the comandante at the presidio, was present, as were also a number of neophytes from Santa Barbara and La Purisima. Some of these were transferred to the new mission.

The earthquake of December, 1812, shook down a portion of the church and destroyed a number of the neophytes' houses. In 1815, the erection of a new church was begun. It was built of adobes lined with brick and was completed and dedicated July 4, 1817.

The Indian revolt of 1824, described in the sketch of La Purisima, broke out first at this mission. The neophytes took possession of the church. The mission guard defended themselves and the padre. A portion of the mission buildings were burned. At the approach of troops from Santa Barbara the Indians fled to Purisima.

Stephen C. Foster, in one of his reminiscences, gives the following version of the fight, which was told him by an old Californian: "The Indians were destitute of firearms, but their overwhelming numbers and showers of arrows they directed against the portholes had quite demoralized the garrison, when the priest appeared and took command (he had been a soldier before he became a priest). It must have been a singular scene. The burly friar, with shaven crown and sandaled feet, clad in the gray gown, girt with the cord of St. Francis, wielding carnal weapons; now encouraging the little garrison; now shouting defiance to the swarming assailants."

"Ho father," cried a young Indian acolyte, "is that the way to say mass?" "Yes, I am saying mass, my son. Here (holding up his cartridge box) is the chalice; here (holding up his carbine) is the crucifix, and here goes my benediction to you," as he leveled his carbine and laid the scoffer low. "A large force was finally collected from the different towns, the Indian converts were followed into the Tulare valley and captured; the ring-leaders were shot and the others brought back to their missions." The revolting Indians of Santa Inez and La Purisima had been joined by hondas or deserters from some of the other missions. The real cause of the revolt is unknown.

Santa Inez attained its maximum population, 770, 1816. In 1834 its population was 334. During its mission period, from 1804 to 1834, 757 Indian children were baptized and 519 died, leaving only 238 or about thirty per cent to grow up. This mission was not completely secularized until 1836.

CHAPTER VI.

THE PRESIDIOS OF SAN DIEGO AND SANTA BARBARA.

SAN DIEGO.

THE Roman præsidium and the Spanish presidio were similar in form and purpose. The præsidium was a fort or fortified square centrally located, where a garrison was stationed to protect the colonists and keep in subjection the aborigines. From its settlements radiated and around it usually in course of time a city was built. The presidio in Spanish colonization subserved the same purpose and became the nucleus of a town or city.

In the mission colonization of California there were four presidios founded, viz.: San Diego, Monterey, San Francisco and Santa Barbara. These furnished the mission guards for their individual districts and after the founding of the pueblos of San José and Los Angeles supplied a small pueblo guard. The first presidio founded in California as well as the first mission was located at San Diego.

Rivera y Moncada, who was commander of the first land expedition for the colonization of California, arrived at San Diego on the 14th of May. The two vessels of the expedition, the San Carlos and San Antonio, with their scurvy-afflicted crews, had already arrived and had established a hospital on shore.

Bancroft says: "The old camp or pest house on the bay shore is probably within the limits of what is now the city of San Diego, locally known as New Town; but the day after his arrival Rivera, so say the chroniclers, although according to the instructions of Galvez, Fages was chief in command, selects a new site some miles north, at what is now Old, or North San Diego, at the foot of a hill on which are still to be seen the remains of the old presidio. Here camp is pitched and fortified, a corral for the animals and a few rude huts are built, and hither on the 17th are transported the sick and their tents. The immediate purpose is that the camp may be near the river which at this point flows into the north end of the bay."

The Indians of San Diego were a thievish and murderous lot of savages. Before the little settlement was three months old, they made an attack upon it in which they killed a Spanish youth and wounded Padre Viscaino, the blacksmith, a soldier and a Lower California Indian.

It became necessary to surround the mission with a stockade to protect it from their depredations. In 1782 the presidial force besides the commissioned officers "consisted of five corporals and forty-six soldiers. Six men were constantly on duty at each of the three missions of the district, San Diego, San Juan Capistrano and San Gabriel; while four served at the pueblo of Los Angeles, thus leaving a sergeant, two corporals and about twenty-five men to garrison the fort, care for the horses and a small herd of cattle, and to carry the mails, which latter duty was the hardest connected with the presidio service in time of peace. There were a carpenter and blacksmith constantly employed, besides a few servants, mostly natives. The population of the district in 1790, not including Indians, was 220."*

It was a monotonous existence the soldiers and their families led at the presidio. Most if not all resided inside the presidial square, which now had an adobe wall around it instead of palisades. Once a month the soldier couriers brought up from Loreta a budget of mail made up of official bandos and a few letters that contained all the items of news that came from their home land, Mexico. The mission was two leagues up the river and there most of the Indians were congregated. The padres had little use for the soldiers except when the natives rebelled, but in the closing years of the century the fierce Dieguños had become subjugated to mission rules. Once a year the mission ship landed the year's supplies at the embarcadero down the bay and this was about the only ripple of excitement that broke the weary monotony of their lives.

In the first years of the nineteenth century, the Yankee fur trading vessels discovered the port of San Diego and occasionally broke the monotony of the soldiers' lives. They came to trade for sea otter skins, the most valued peltry of the coast. There was a heavy export duty on these, and to avoid this the captains resorted to any expedient that promised success. The people were not averse to illicit trading if they could get a better price for their furs.

*Bancroft, Vol. I.

In March, 1803, the Lelia Byrd, a Yankee fur-trading vessel, put into San Diego bay, ostensibly to secure supplies but really to trade for otter skins. The commander of the presidio had about a thousand skins, part of which he had secured by confiscation from Captain John Brown of the ship Alexander. Shaler, captain of the Byrd, tried to buy the skins from the comandante but was unsuccessful. Then he attempted to trade with the soldiers who had a few. He was detected at this, and one boatload of his men sent out at night to secure the skins was made prisoners. He sent an armed force ashore and rescued his men and, getting them aboard, hoisted sail and put to sea with the guards that had been put aboard to hold the ship. As he passed the fort at what is now Ballast Point the Spaniards fired a broadside at the vessel. The captain returned the fire and then placed the Spanish sergeant and his guard in an exposed situation where their friends would be pretty sure to hit them when they fired. The sergeant frantically besought his compatriots of the fort to cease firing, which they did. The guards were put ashore further along, greatly to their relief.

During the long years of the Mexican Revolution the old presidio fell into decay and the old guns in the fort at Point Guijarros grew rusty from disuse. This fort or battery had been built in 1797 to defend the entrance to the bay.

Only once during the long contest for Mexican independence did war's wrinkled front affright the soldiers of the fort, and that was in 1818, when Bouchard, the privateer, from the black hull of his piratical craft looked into the bay to see whether there was anything to plunder, but, seeing nothing, passed by without entering. Comandante Ruiz was prepared for him and awaited his attempt to enter with red hot cannon balls to burn his ships. Little did the soldiers of the old presidio know of the internecine struggle in Mexico that was transforming them from subjects of a monarchy to free citizens of a republic. They knew that there was trouble, but what it was about they were ignorant, nor did their officers and the padres who were loyalist attempt to enlighten them.

But there came a day when the flag of Spain, that for fifty years had floated from the presidio flagstaff, was lowered, never again to rise, and in its stead was unfurled the tri-color of the Mexican empire. A few months pass and that goes down before the banner of the Republic. His transfer of allegiance from monarchy to republicanism brings no change for the better in the soldier's condition. He is poorly paid, poorly fed, and the old presidio with its cracked adobe walls that have sheltered him so long is fast crumbling to ruins.

Mexico, more liberal than Spain, lifted from commerce some of the restrictions that had oppressed it and trade began to seek California ports. First came the hide droghers with their department-store cargoes.

San Diego was well located to secure that trade. Robinson in "Life in California" tells us what the town looked like in 1829, when hides and tallow were the only exports—and when it was the capital of the two Californias: "After dinner we called upon the General Don José Maria de Echeandia, a tall gaunt personage, who received us with true Spanish dignity and politeness. His house was located in the center of a large square of buildings occupied by his officers, and so elevated as to overlook them all and command a view of the sea. On the right hand was a small Gothic chapel with its cemetery and immediately in front, close to the principal entrance, was a guardroom where the soldiers were amusing themselves; some seated on the ground playing cards, and smoking, while others were dancing to the music of the guitar; the whole was surrounded by a high wall originally intended as a defence against the Indians. At the gate stood a sentinel, with slouched hat and blanket thrown over one shoulder, his old Spanish musket resting on the other; his pantaloons were buttoned and ornamented at the knee, below which his legs were protected by leggins of dressed deer skin, secured with spangled garters.

"On the lawn beneath the hill on which the presidio is built stood about thirty houses of rude appearance, mostly occupied by retired veterans, not so well constructed in respect either to beauty or stability as the houses at Monterey, with the exception of that belonging to our Administrator, Don Juan Bandini, whose mansion, then in an unfinished state, bade fair, when completed, to surpass any other in the country."

A few months later, Robinson on his return to San Diego attended a house warming at Don Juan Bandini's. "Señor Don Juan Bandini had his house bendecida or blessed during our stay here, and Gale and myself were invited to attend. The ceremony took place at noon, when the chaplain proceeded through the different apartments, sprinkling holy water on the walls and uttering verses in Latin. This concluded, we sat down to an excellent dinner consisting of all the luxuries the place afforded provided in Don Juan's best style." After dinner came a dance and in the evening a fandango. Such was San Diego in 1829.

Seven years pass and then another employe of the "hide droghers"—R. H. Dana—draws this picture of the old presidio and the town as he saw them in 1836: "The first place we went to was the old ruinous presidio, which stands on a rising ground near the village which it overlooks. It is built in the form of an open square, like all the other presidios, and was in a most ruinous state, with the exception of one side, in which the commandant lived with his family. There were only two guns, one of which was spiked and the other had no carriage. Twelve half clothed and half starved looking fellows composed the garrison; and they, it was said, had not a musket apiece. The small settlement lay directly below the fort composed of about forty dark brown looking huts or houses and three or four larger ones whitewashed, which belonged to the "gente de razon."

One more picture and the last: The old presidio is in ruins. The ragged soldiers are gone. The cannon spiked and unspiked have disappeared. The hide droghers are only a memory. Another nation controls the destinies of California, but through the changing years San Diego remains unchanged. "Twenty-four years after" (1859) Dana revisited the town and thus describes it: "The little town of San Diego has undergone no change whatever that I can see. It certainly has not grown. It is still like Santa Barbara, a Mexican town. The four principal houses of the gente de razon—of the Bandinis, Estudillos, Argüellos, and Picos—are the chief houses now; but all the gentlemen—and their families, too, I believe—are gone. The big, vulgar shop keeper and trader Fitch is long since dead; Tom Wrightington, who kept the rival pulperia, fell from his horse when drunk and was found nearly eaten up by coyotes; and I can scarce find a person whom I remember."

SANTA BARBARA.

Cabrillo, in 1542, found a large Indian population inhabiting the main land of the Santa Barbara Channel. Two hundred and twenty-seven years later, when Portolá made his exploration, apparently there had been no decrease in the number of inhabitants. No portion of the coast offered a better field for missionary labor and Father Serra was anxious to enter it. In accordance with Governor Felipe de Neve's report of 1777, it had been decided to found three missions and a presidio on the channel. Various causes had delayed the founding and it was not until April 17, 1782, that Governor de Neve arrived at the point where he had decided to locate the presidio of Santa Barbara. The troops that were to man the fort reached San Gabriel in the fall of 1781. It was thought best for them to remain there until the rainy season was over. March 26, 1782, the Governor and Father Serra, accompanied by the largest body of troops that had ever before been collected in California, set out to found the mission of San Buenaventura and the presidio. The Governor, as has been stated in a former chapter, was recalled to San Gabriel. The mission was founded and the Governor having rejoined the cavalcade a few weeks later proceeded to find a location for the presidio.

"On reaching a point nine leagues from San Buenaventura, the Governor called a halt and in company with Father Serra at once proceeded to select a site for the presidio. The choice resulted in the adoption of the square now formed by city blocks 139, 140, 155 and 156, and bounded in common by the following streets: Figueroa, Cañon Perdido, Garden and Anacapa. A large community of Indians were residing there, but orders were given to leave them undisturbed. The soldiers were at once directed to hew timbers and gather brush to erect temporary barracks, which when completed were also used as a chapel. A large wooden cross was made that it might be planted in the center of the square and possession of the country was taken in the name of the cross—the emblem of Christianity.

"April 21, 1782, the soldiers formed a square and with edifying solemnity raised the cross and secured it in the earth. Father Serra blessed and consecrated the district and preached a sermon. The royal standard of Spain was unfurled."*

An inclosure, sixty varas square, was made of palisades. The Indians were friendly and through their Chief Yanoalit, who controlled thirteen rancherias, details of them were secured to assist the soldiers in the work of building. The natives were paid in food and clothing for their labor.

Irrigation works were constructed consisting of a large reservoir made of stone and cement, with a zanja for conducting water to the presidio. The soldiers, who had families, cultivated small gardens, which aided in their support. Lieutenant Ortega was in command of the presidio for two years after its founding. He was succeeded by Lieutenant Felipe de Goycochea. After the founding of the mission, in 1786, a bitter feud broke out between the padres and the comandante of the presidio. Goycochea claimed the right to employ the Indians in the building of the presidio, as he had done before the coming of the friars. This they denied. After an acrimonious controversy the dispute was finally compromised by dividing the

*Father Gabelleria's History of Santa Barbara.

Indians into two bands—a mission band and a presidio band.

Gradually the palisades were replaced by an adobe wall twelve feet high. It had a stone foundation and was strongly built. The plaza or inclosed square was 330 feet on each side. On two sides of this inclosure were ranged the family houses of the soldiers, averaging in size 15x25 feet. On one side stood the officers' quarters and the church. On the remaining side were the main entrance four varas wide, the store rooms, soldiers' quarters and guard room; and adjoining these outside the walls were the corrals for cattle and horses. A force of from fifty to sixty soldiers was kept at the post. There were bastions at two of the corners for cannon.

The presidio was completed about 1790, with the exception of the chapel, which was not finished until 1797. Many of the soldiers when they had served out their time desired to remain in the country. These were given permission to build houses outside the walls of the presidio and in course of time a village grew up around it.

At the close of the century the population of the gente de razon of the district numbered 370. The presidio when completed was the best in California. Vancouver, the English navigator, who visited it in November, 1793, says of it: "The buildings appeared to be regular and well constructed, the walls clean and white and the roofs of the houses were covered with a bright red tile. The presidio excels all the others in neatness, cleanliness and other smaller though essential comforts; it is placed on an elevated part of the plain and is raised some feet from the ground by a basement story which adds much to its pleasantness."

During the Spanish regime the settlement at the presidio grew in the leisurely way that all Spanish towns grew in California. There was but little immigration from Mexico and about the only source of increase was from invalid soldiers and the children of the soldiers growing up to manhood and womanhood.

Foreigners were not allowed to remain in the country. In 1795, an English merchant ship, the "Phoenix," touched at Santa Barbara for supplies and left a Boston boy who wanted to remain, "become a Christian" and grow up with the country. This Boston boy's name was Joseph O'Cain and he is described as "an Englishman, a native of Ireland, whose parents now reside in Boston." Whether O'Cain "became a Christian" the records do not state, but he did not become a citizen of California. A few months after his arrival they shipped him to San Blas.

The presidio furnished guards for the missions in its district, namely: San Gabriel, San Fernando, San Buenaventura, Santa Barbara, La Purisima and Santa Inez; and also the pueblo guard of Los Angeles. Lieutenant José de la Guerra y Noriega took command of it in 1815. In 1818 he was promoted to be captain and for twenty-four years was the comandante of the district. During his administration, April, 1822, the oath of allegiance to the imperial regency, Augustin I., emperor of Mexico, was taken by the officers, soldiers and citizens and the rule of Spain was at an end. Next year they swore allegiance to the Republic. Father Gabellera in his history says: "On receiving intelligence that the cause of independence had triumphed, they immediately took up the cry recognizing the then Mexican government, and although they were Spanish soldiers shouted with one accord, 'Abajo España' (down with Spain)."

It was at this time that direct trade was opened up between Boston and California and the "hide droghers" that afterward became such a prominent feature in California commerce came to the coast. To William A. Gale, who in the early years of the century had been a fur trader on the coast, belongs the credit of inaugurating this trade. With him, in 1829, in the ship "Brookline," came Alfred Robinson, whose "Life in California" gives us the best description of manners, usages and customs in California during the early years of the last century. Robinson, who visited Santa Barbara in 1829, thus describes it:

"Seen from the ship the 'presidio' or town, its charming vicinity, and neat little mission in the background, all situated on an inclined plane, rising gradually from the sea to a range of verdant hills, three miles from the beach, have a striking and beautiful effect. Distance, however, in this case, 'lends enchantment to the view' which a nearer approach somewhat dispels; for we found the houses of the town, of which there were some two hundred, in not very good condition. They are built in the Spanish mode, with adobe walls, and roofs of tile, and are scattered about outside of the military department; showing a total disregard of order on the part of the authorities. On the left of the town in an elevated position stands the Castillo or fortress. * * * The most stately house in the place at this time was that of the diputado to Mexico, Don José de la Guerra y Noriega."

Dana, in "Two Years Before the Mast," describes the town as it was in 1836: "The town is composed of one-story houses, built of sun-baked clay, or adobe, some of them white-washed, with red tiles on the roofs. I should judge that there were about a hundred of them; and in the midst of them stands the Presidio, or fort, built of the same material, and apparently but little stronger. The town is finely situated with a bay in front and an amphitheater of hills behind. The only thing which diminishes its beauty is, that the hills have no large trees upon them, they having been all burnt by a great fire which swept them off about a dozen years ago, and they had not yet grown again. The fire was described to me by an inhabitant as having been a very terrible and magnificent sight. The air of the whole valley was so heated that the people were obliged to leave the town and take up their quarters for several days on the beach."

Farnham, who visited the town in 1840, gives this description of it in his "Early Days of California:" "The houses are chiefly built in the Spanish mode—adobe walls and roofs of tile. These tiles are made of clay fashioned into half cylinders, and burned like brick. In using them, the first layer is placed hollow side up; the second inversely, so as to lock over the first. Their ends overlap each other as common shingles do. This roofing serves very well in dry weather. But when the southeasters of the winter season come on, it affords a poor shelter. Very few of the houses have glass windows. Open spaces in the walls protected with bars of wood and plank shutters, serve instead. A. B. Thompson, a wealthy and hospitable American merchant, has erected a residence in the center of the town, which bears very striking testimony to his being a civilized man."

Fremont's battalion took possession of Santa Barbara, December 27, 1846. Next day the United States flag was raised on the flag staff in the plaza, from which had floated the banner of Spain, the imperial standard of the empire and the cactus-perched eagle flag of the Republic of Mexico.

Lieut. Bryant, of Fremont's battalion, describes the town as it appeared at the time of the American conquest: "The town of Santa Barbara is beautifully situated for the picturesque, about one mile from the shore of a roadstead, which affords anchorage for vessels of any size, and a landing for boats in calm weather. The population of the town, I should judge from the number of houses to be about 1,200 souls. Most of the houses are constructed of adobes, in the usual architectural style of Mexican buildings. Some of them, however, are more Americanized, and have some pretensions to tasteful architecture, and comfortable and convenient interior arrangement.

For intelligence, refinement and civilization the population, it is said, will compare advantageously with any in California. Some old and influential Spanish families are residents of this place; but their casas, with the exception of that of Señor Don José Noriega, the largest house in the place, are now closed and deserted. It is a peculiarity of the Mexicans that they allow no shade or ornamental trees to grow near their houses. In none of the streets of the towns or missions through which I have passed has there been a solitary tree standing. I noticed very few horticultural attempts in Santa Barbara."

In 1834, the diputacion granted the pueblo a regular ayuntamiento, but what the municipal council did, no one knows. The records have been lost. The legislature of 1849-50 incorporated the City of Santa Barbara, April 9, 1850.

CHAPTER VII.

FOUNDING OF THE PUEBLO DE LOS ANGELES.

THE history of the founding of our American cities shows that the location of a city, as well as its plan, is as often the result of accident as of design. Neither chance nor accident entered into the selection of the site, the plan or the name of Los Angeles. All these had been determined upon years before a colonist had been enlisted to make the settlement. The Spanish colonist, unlike the American backwoodsman, was not free to locate on the public domain wherever his caprice or his convenience dictated.

The Spanish poblador (founder or colonist) went where he was sent by his government. He built his pueblo after a plan designated by royal reglamento. His planting and his sowing, the size of his fields and the shape of his house lot were fixed by royal decree. He was a dependent of the crown. The land he cultivated was not his own, except to use. If he failed to till it, it was taken from him and he was deported from the colony. He could not buy the land he lived on nor could he even exercise that privilege so dear to the Anglo-Californian—the right to mortgage it. Once located by royal order he could not change his location without permission nor could he visit his native land without a passport. He could not change his political opinions—that is if he had any to change. He could not change his religion and survive the operation. Environed and circumscribed by limitations and restrictions on all sides, it is not strange that the Spanish colonists were non-progressive.

The pueblo plan of colonization so common in Spanish-American countries did not originate with the Spanish-American colonists. It was older even than Spain itself. In early European colonization, the pueblo plan, the common square in the center of the town, the house lots grouped round it, the arable fields and the common pasture lands beyond, appears in the Aryan village, in the ancient German mark and in the old Roman præsidium. The Puritans adopted this form in their first settlements in New England. Around the public square or common where stood the meeting house and the town house, they laid off their home lots and beyond these were their cultivated fields and their common pasture lands. This form of colonization was a combination of communal interests and individual ownership. Primarily, no doubt, it was adopted for protection against the hostile aborigines of the country, and secondly for social advantage. It reversed the order of our own western colonization. The town came first, it was the initial point from which the settlement radiated; while with our western pioneers the town was an afterthought—a center point for the convenience of trade.

When it had been decided to send colonists to colonize California the settlements naturally took the pueblo form. The difficulty of obtaining regular supplies for the presidios from Mexico, added to the great expense of shipping such a long distance, was the principal cause that influenced the government to establish pueblos de gente de razon. The presidios received their shipments of grain for breadstuff from San Blas by sailing vessels. The arrival of these was uncertain. Once when the vessels were unusually long in coming, the padres and the soldiers at the presidios and missions were reduced to living on milk, bear meat and what provisions they could obtain from the Indians. When Felipe de Neve was made governor of Alta or Nueva California in 1776, he was instructed by the viceroy to make observations on the agricultural possibilities of the country and the feasibility of founding pueblos where grain could be produced to supply the military establishments.

On his journey from San Diego to San Francisco in 1777, he carefully examined the country; and as a result of his observations recommended the founding of two pueblos: one on the Rio de Porciuncula in the south, and the other on the Rio de Guadalupe in the north. On the 29th day of November, 1777, the Pueblo of San José de Guadalupe was founded. The colonists were nine of the presidio soldiers from San Francisco and Monterey, who had some knowledge of farming, and five of Anza's pobladores, who had come with his expedition the previous year to found the presidio of San Francisco. From the fact that the founders, in part, of the first pueblo in California were soldiers has originated the fiction that the founders of the second pueblo, Los Angeles, were soldiers also; although this fiction has been contradicted repeatedly, it reappears in nearly every newspaper write-up of the early history of Los Angeles.

From various causes the founding of the second pueblo had been delayed. In the latter part of 1779, active preparations were begun for carrying out the plan of founding a presidio and three missions on the Santa Barbara Channel and a pueblo on the Rio Porciuncula to be named "Reyna de Los Angeles." The Comandante-General of the Four Interior Provinces of the West (which embraced the Californias, Sonora, New Mexico and Viscaya), Don Teodoro de Croix or "El Cavallero de Croix," "The Knight of the Cross," as he usually styled himself, gave instructions to Don Fernando de Rivera y Moncada to recruit soldiers and settlers for the proposed presidio and pueblo in Nueva California. He, Rivera, crossed the Gulf and began recruiting in Sonora and Sinaloa. His instructions were to secure twenty-four settlers, who were heads of families. They must be robust and well behaved, so that they might set a good example to the natives. Their families must accompany them and unmarried female relatives must be encouraged to go, with the view of marrying them to bachelor soldiers.

According to the Regulations drafted by Gov. Felipe de Neve June 1, 1779, for the Government of the Province of California and approved by the King, in a royal order of the 24th of October, 1781, settlers in California from the older provinces were each to be granted a house lot and a tract of land for cultivation. Each poblador in addition was to receive $116.50 a year for the first two years, "the rations to be understood as comprehended in this amount, and in lieu of rations for the next three years they will receive sixty dollars yearly."

Section 3 of Title 14 of the Reglamento provided that "To each poblador and to the community of the Pueblo there shall be given under condition of repayment in horses and mules fit to be given and received, and in the payment of the other large and small cattle at the just prices, which are to be fixed by tariff, and of the tools and implements at cost, as it is ordained, two mares, two cows and one calf, two sheep and two goats, all breeding animals, and one yoke of oxen or steers, one plow point, one hoe, one spade, one axe, one sickle, one wood knife, one musket and one leather shield, two horses and one cargo mule. To the community there shall likewise be given the males corresponding to the total number of cattle of different kinds distributed amongst all the inhabitants, one forge and anvil, six crowbars, six iron spades or shovels and the necessary tools for carpenter and cast work." For the government's assistance to the pobladores in starting their colony the settlers were required to sell to the presidios the surplus products of their lands and herds at fair prices, which were to be fixed by the government.

The terms offered to the settler were certainly liberal, and by our own hardy pioneers, who in the closing years of the last century were making their way over the Alleghany mountains into Ohio, Kentucky and Tennessee, they would have been considered munificent; but to the indolent and energyless mixed breeds of Sonora and Sinaloa they were no inducement. After spending nearly nine months in recruiting, Rivera was able to obtain only fourteen pobladores, but little over half the number required, and two of these deserted before reaching California. The soldiers that Rivera had recruited for California, forty-two in number, with their families, were ordered to proceed overland from Alamos, in Sonora, by way of Tucson and the Colorado River to San Gabriel Mission. These were commanded by Rivera in person.

Leaving Alamos in April, 1781, they arrived in the latter part of June at the junction of the Gila and Colorado rivers. After a short delay to rest the main company was sent on to San Gabriel Mission. Rivera, with ten or twelve soldiers, remained to recruit his live stock before crossing the desert. Two missions had been established on the California side of the Colorado the previous year. Before the arrival of Rivera the Indians had been behaving badly. Rivera's large herd of cattle and horses destroyed the mesquite trees and intruded upon the Indians' melon patches. This, with their previous quarrel with the padres, provoked the savages to an uprising. They, on July 17, attacked the two missions, massacred the padres and the Spanish settlers attached to the missions and killed Rivera and his soldiers—forty-six persons in all. The Indians burned the mission buildings. These were never rebuilt nor was there any other attempt made to convert the Yumas. The hostility of the Yumas practically closed the Colorado route to California for many years.

The pobladores who had been recruited for the founding of the new pueblo, with their families and a military escort, all under the command of Lieutenant José Zuñiga, crossed the gulf from Guaymas to Loreto, in Lower California, and by the 16th of May were ready for their long journey northward. In the meantime two of the recruits had deserted and one was left behind at Loreto. On the 18th of August the eleven who had remained faithful to their contract, with their families, arrived at San Gabriel. On account of smallpox among some of the children the company was placed in quarantine about a league from the mission.

On the 26th of August, 1781, from San Gabriel, Governor de Neve issued his instructions for the founding of Los Angeles, which gave some additional rules in regard to the distribution of lots not found in the royal reglamento previously mentioned.

On the 4th of September, 1781, the colonists, with a military escort headed by Governor Felipe de Neve, took up their line of march from the Mission San Gabriel to the site selected for their pueblo on the Rio de Porciuncula. There, with religious ceremonies, the Pueblo de Nuestra Señora La Reina de Los Angeles was formally founded. A mass was said by a priest from the Mission San Gabriel, assisted by the choristers and musicians of that mission. There were salvos of musketry and a procession with a cross, candlesticks, etc. At the head of the procession the soldiers bore the standard of Spain and the women followed bearing a banner with the image of Our Lady the Queen of the Angels. This procession made a circuit of the plaza, the priest blessing it and the building lots. At the close of the services Governor de Neve made an address full of good advice to the colonists. Then the Governor, his military escort and the priests returned to San Gabriel and the colonists were left to work out their destiny.

Few of the great cities of the land have had such humble founders as Los Angeles. Of the eleven pobladores who built their huts of poles and tule thatch around the plaza vieja one hundred and twenty years ago, not one could read or write. Not one could boast of an unmixed ancestry. They were mongrels in race—Caucasian, Indian and Negro mixed. Poor in purse, poor in blood, poor in all the sterner qualities of character that our own hardy pioneers of the west possessed, they left no impress on the city they founded; and the conquering race that possesses the land they colonized has forgotten them. No street or landmark in the city bears the name of any one of them. No monument or tablet marks the spot where they planted the germ of their settlement. No Forefathers' day preserves the memory of their services and sacrifices. Their names, race and the number of persons in each family have been preserved in the archives of California. They are as follows:

1. Jose de Lara, a Spaniard (or reputed to be one, although it is doubtful whether he was of pure blood); had an Indian wife and three children.

2. Jose Antonio Navarro, a Mestizo, forty-two years old; wife a mulatress; three children.

3. Basilio Rosas, an Indian, sixty-eight years old; had a mulatto wife and two children.

5. Antonio Felix Villavicencio, a Spaniard, thirty years old; had an Indian wife and one child.

6. Jose Vanegas, an Indian, twenty-eight years old; had an Indian wife and one child.

7. Alejandro Rosas, an Indian, nineteen years old and had an Indian wife. (In the records, "wife Coyote-Indian.")*

8. Pablo Rodriguez, an Indian, twenty-five years old; had an Indian wife and one child.

9. Manuel Camero, a mulatto, thirty years old; had a mulatto wife.

10. Luis Quintero, a negro, fifty-five years old, and had a mulatto wife and five children.

11. José Morena, a mulatto, twenty-two years old, and had a mulatto wife.

Antonio Miranda, the twelfth person described in the padron (list) as a Chino, fifty years old, and having one child, was left at Loreto when the expedition marched northward. It would have been impossible for him to have rejoined the colonists before the founding. Presumably his child remained with him, consequently there were but forty-four instead of "forty-six persons in all." Col. J. J. Warner, in his "Historical Sketch of Los Angeles," originated the fiction that one of the founders (Miranda, the Chino) was born in China. Chino, while it does mean a Chinaman, is also applied in Spanish-American countries to persons or animals having curly hair. Miranda was probably of mixed Spanish and Negro blood, and curly haired. There is no record to show that Miranda ever came to Alta California.

Another fiction that frequently appears in newspaper "write-ups" of Los Angeles is the statement that the founders were "discharged soldiers from the Mission San Gabriel." None of them had ever seen San Gabriel before they arrived there with Zuñiga's expedition on the 18th of August, 1781, nor is there a probability that any one of them ever was a soldier. When José de Galvez was fitting out the expedition for occupying San Diego and Monterey, he issued a proclamation naming St. Joseph as the patron saint of his California colonization scheme. Bearing this fact in mind, no doubt, Governor de Neve, when he founded San José, named St. Joseph its patron saint. Having named one of the two pueblos for San José it naturally followed that the other should be named for Santa Maria, the Queen of the Angels, wife of San José.

On the 1st of August, 1769, Portolá's expedition, on its journey northward in search of Monterey Bay, had halted in the San Gabriel Valley near where the Mission Vieja was afterwards located, to reconnoiter the country and "above all," as Father Crespi observes, "for the purpose of celebrating the jubilee of Our Lady of the Angels of Porciuncula." Next day, August 2, after traveling about three leagues (nine miles), Father Crespi, in his diary, says: "We came to a rather wide cañada having a great many cottonwood and alder trees. Through it ran a beautiful river toward the north-northeast and curving around the point of a cliff it takes a direction to the south. Toward the north-northeast we saw another river bed which must have been a great overflow, but we found it dry. This arm unites with the river and its great floods during the rainy season are clearly demonstrated by the many uprooted trees scattered along the banks." (This dry river is the Arroyo Seco.) "We stopped not very far from the river, to which we gave the name of Porciuncula." Porciuncula is the name of a hamlet in Italy near which was located the little church of Our Lady of the Angels, in which St. Francis of Assisi was praying when the jubilee was granted him. Father Crespi, speaking of the plain through which the river flows says: "This is the best locality of all those we have yet seen for a mission, besides having all the resources required for a large town." Padre Crespi was evidently somewhat of a prophet.

The fact that this locality had for a number of years borne the name of "Our Lady of the Angels of Porciuncula" may have influenced Governor de Neve to locate his pueblo here. The full name of the town, El Pueblo de Nuestra Señora La Reina de Los Angeles, was seldom used. It was too long for everyday use. In the earlier years of the town's history it seems to have had a variety of names. It appears in the records as El Pueblo de Nuestra Señora de Los Angeles, as El Pueblo de La Reina de Los Angeles and as El Pueblo de Santa Maria de Los Angeles. Sometimes it was abbreviated to Santa Maria, but it was most commonly spoken of as El Pueblo—the town. At what time the name of Rio Porciuncula was changed to Rio Los Angeles is uncertain. The change no doubt was gradual.

The site selected for the pueblo of Los Angeles was picturesque and romantic. From where Alameda street now is to the eastern bank of the river the land was covered with a dense growth of willows, cottonwoods and alders; while here and there, rising above the swampy copse, towered a giant aliso (sycamore). Wild grape vines festooned the branches of the trees and wild roses bloomed in profusion. Behind the narrow shelf of mesa land where the pueblo was located rose the brown hills, and in the distance towered the lofty Sierra Madre mountains.

*The term coyote was applied to Indians who were natives of Lower California.

For ages the Indians had roamed up and down the valley, but the Indian is so ardent a lover of nature that he never defaces her face by attempting to make improvements—particularly if it requires exertion to make the changes. For centuries within the limits that Neve had marked out for his pueblo had stood the Indian village of Yang-na or rather a succession of villages of that name. When the accretions of filth encroached upon the red man's dwelling and the increase of certain kinds of live stock, of name offensive to ears polite, had become so great and their appetites so keen that even the phlegmatic Digger could no longer endure their aggressive attacks, then the poor Indian resorted to a heroic method of house-cleaning. On an appointed day the portable property was removed from the wickeups, the village was set on fire and myriads on myriads of piojos and pulgas were cremated in the conflagration. After purification by fire poor Lo built a new village on the old site—a new town with the same old name, Yang-na. Probably all of the Indians of Yang-na had been gathered into the mission fold at San Gabriel before Neve's pobladores built their huts on the banks of the Rio Porciuncula, still there seems to have been fears of an attack by hostile Indians, for the colonists built a guard house and barracks and a guard of soldiers was stationed at the pueblo for many years after the founding.

CHAPTER VIII.

LOS ANGELES IN THE SPANISH ERA.

IN THE previous chapter we had a description of the founding of the pueblo and the dedication of the house lots and the plaza. The plaza is an essential feature in the plan of Spanish-America towns. It is usually the geographical center of the pueblo lands. The old plaza of El Pueblo de Nuestra Señora La Reina de Los Angeles, as designated by Gov. Felipe de Neve, in his "Instruccion para La Fundacion de Los Angeles," was a parallelogram one hundred varas in length by seventy-five in breadth. It was laid out with its corners facing the cardinal points of the compass, and with three streets running perpendicularly to each of its four sides, so that no street would be swept by the winds. The Governor evidently supposed that the winds would always blow from the orthodox four corners of the earth; therefore, he cut out his town on the bias, so as to outwit old Boreas.

The usual area of a pueblo in California was four square leagues, or about 17,770 acres (a Spanish square league contains 4,444 4-9 acres). The pueblo lands were divided into solares, or house lots, *suertes—planting fields, dehesas, outside pasture lands; ejidos, or commons, lands nearest the town where the mustangs were tethered and the goats roamed at pleasure (from the ejidos, solares or house lots may be granted to new comers); propios—public lands that may be rented or leased, and the proceeds used to defray municipal expenses; realanges, or royal lands, also used for raising revenue, and from these lands grants were made to new settlers. In addition there was also certain communal property known as Biènes Concejiles, which term has been defined as "that which, in respect of ownership, belongs to the public or council of a city, village or town, and in respect of its use belongs to every one of its inhabitants, such as fountains, woods, the pastures, waters of rivers for irrigation, etc."

After the pobladores had built their rude huts they turned their attention to the preparation of their fields for cultivation. A toma, or dam, and an irrigating ditch were constructed. This ditch passed along the east side and close to those lots on the southeastern corner of the square. It not only supplied the settlers with water for irrigating their fields, but also for drinking and household purposes. It was the first water system of Los Angeles. According to Neve's "Instructions," the suertes, or planting fields, were to be located at least 200 varas from the house lots that surrounded the square. This instruction, if complied with, located the western line of these fields about where Alameda street now is.

The following description of the colonists' planting fields is taken from the first Los Angeles directory, published in 1872 by A. J. King and A. Waite:

Suerte*—chance or lot. The fields were called suertes because assigned by lot.

"Thirty fields for cultivation were also laid out. Twenty-six of these fields contained each 40,000 square varas (equal to about eight acres). They were, with the exception of four (which were 300 by 100 varas) 200 varas square, and separated by lanes three varas wide. The fields were located between the irrigating ditch and the river, and mostly above a line running direct and nearly east from the town site to the river. (The fields covered the present site of Chinatown and that of the lumber yards, and possibly extended up to the San Fernando, or river station depot.) The distance from the irrigating ditch to the river across these fields was upwards of 1,200 varas. At that time the river ran along where now (1872) stand the houses of Julian Chavez and Elijah Moulton. It was evident that when the town was laid out the bluff bank, which in modern times extended from Aliso street up by the Stearns (now Capitol) mill to the toma, did not exist, but was made when the river ran near the town."

The streets of the pueblo were each ten varas (about twenty-eight feet) wide. The boundaries of the Plaza Vieja, or old plaza, as nearly as it is possible to locate them now, are as follows: "The southeast corner of Upper Main and Marchessault streets for the southern or southeastern corner of the square; the east line of Upper Main street from the above-named corner, 100 varas, in a northerly direction for the east line of the square; the eastern line of new High street for the western line of the square; and the northern line of Marchessault street for the southern line of the square."* Upon three sides of this parallelogram were the house lots, each 40x20 varas, except the two corner lots, which, fronting in part on two sides of the square, were L-shaped.

The eastern half of the southwestern side was left vacant; the western half of this side was designed for the public buildings—a guard-house, a town-house and a public granary.

While the house lots, the tilling-fields and a certain part of the live stock belonged in severalty to each head of a family, and to the care and cultivation of which he was supposed to devote his time and attention, there were also certain community interests of which each was required to perform his part, such as building the guard-house, the public granaries and the irrigating works, standing guard and herding the village flocks. It was discovered before long that there were shirks among the colonists—men who would not do their part of the community labor.

Early in 1782, José de Lara, one of the two Spaniards, Antonio Mesa and Luis Quintero, the two negroes, were deported from the colony and their property taken from them by order of the Governor, they being "useless to the pueblo and to themselves." As their families went with them, by their deportation the population of the pueblo was reduced to twenty-eight persons. The remaining colonists went to work. Before the close of 1784 they had replaced most of their tule-thatched and mud-daubed huts of poles with adobe houses. They had built the public buildings required and had begun the erection of a chapel. All of these were built of adobe and covered with thatch.

In 1785 José Francisco Sinova, a laborer, who for a number of years had lived in California, applied for admission into the pueblo and was admitted on the same terms as the original pobladores.

In 1786 Alferes (Lieut.) José Argüello, who had been detailed for that purpose by Governor Fages, the successor of de Neve, put the nine settlers who had been faithful to their trust in legal possession of their house, lots and sowing fields. Corporal Vicente Felix and Private Roque de Cota acted as legal witnesses. Each colonist in the presence of the others received a grant of a house, lot and three sowing fields, and he was given a branding-iron to distinguish his live stock from that of his neighbors.

It is probable that there had from the beginning been some understanding of what was the individual property of each one. Each of the nine settlers signed his grant or agreement with a cross; not one of them could write. Lieut. Argüello spent but little time over surveys, and probably set up no landmarks to define boundaries. The propios were said to extend southerly 2,200 varas from the toma or dam (which was located near the point where the Buena Vista street bridge now crosses the river) to the limit of the distributed lands. The realenges, or royal lands, were located on the eastern side of the river.

The exterior boundaries of the pueblo were not fixed then, nor were they ever defined while the town was under the domination of Spain. As we shall find later on, this occasioned controversies between the missionaries of San Gabriel and the settlers of Los Angeles.

The local government of the pueblo was a combination of the military and the civil forms. The civil authority was vested in an alcalde and two regidores (councilmen); the military in a corporal of the guard. There was another office, that of comisionado, which was quasi-military. The principal duty of this officer was to apporportion the pueblo lands to new settlers.

*J. J. Warner's Historical sketch of Los Angeles Co.

The corporal of the pueblo guard seems to have been the ranking officer in the town government, and, in addition to his military command, had supervision over the acts of the regidores and the alcalde.

The civil authorities were at first appointed by the governor; later on they were elected by the people. The territory of California was divided into military districts, corresponding in number to the presidios. Each military district was under the command of a military officer (captain or lieutenant), who reported to the governor, who was also an army officer, usually a lieutenant-colonel or colonel.

At the time of the founding of Los Angeles there were three presidios, viz.: San Diego, Monterey and San Francisco. Los Angeles was at first attached to San Diego. After the founding of Santa Barbara presidio it was placed in that military district.

The corporal of the pueblo guard reported to the commander of his district, and the commander to the comandante-general or governor. Vicente Felix, who assisted Lieut. Argüello in the distribution of the pueblo lands to the settlers in 1786, was the first corporal of the pueblo guard, which was furnished from the presidio of San Diego, and consisted of four or five soldiers of the regular army. All the male inhabitants of the pueblo over eighteen years were subject to military service, both at home in keeping order, and in the field in case of foreign invasion or an Indian outbreak. These civilian soldiers reported to the corporal of the guard for duty. Each was required to provide himself with a horse, a musket and a cuera or shield of bull hide.

For fifty years after the founding of the pueblo a guard was kept on duty at the cuartel or guard-house that stood just above the church of Our Lady of the Angels, on what is now the north-west corner of Upper Main and Marchessault streets; and nightly armed sentinels patrolled the town.

Los Angeles, like all pioneer settlements of America, had her Indian question to settle. There are no records of Indian massacres, but Indian scares occurred occasionally. In 1785 we find from the provincial records that 35 pounds of powder and 800 bullets were sent to Los Angeles as a reserve supply of ammunition for the settlers in case of an attack. There was not much danger from the valley Indians, who had been tamed by mission training and subjugated by the lash, but the mountain Indians were predatory and hostile. At one time the Mojaves made an incursion into the valley with the design of sacking the mission and attacking Los Angeles. They penetrated within two leagues of the mission, where they killed a neophyte, but, hearing that there was a company of soldiers at Los Angeles prepared to attack them, they fled back to the mountains.

Between 1786 and 1790 the number of families increased from 9 to 30. An estado, or census of the pueblo, taken August 17, 1790, gives its total population 141, divided as follows: Males, 75; females, 66; unmarried, 91; married, 44; widowed, 6; under 7 years, 47; 7 to 16 years, 33; 16 to 29 years, 12; 29 to 40 years, 27; 40 to 90 years, 13; over 90 years, 9; Europeans, 1; Spanish (this probably means Spanish-Americans), 72; Indians, 7; Mulattoes, 22; Mestizos, 39. The large percentage of the population over 90 years of age is rather remarkable. The mixed races still constituted a large proportion of the pueblo population. The increase of inhabitants came largely from discharged soldiers of the presidios.

It was the policy of the government to encourage marriages between the bachelor soldiers and neophyte women, and thus increase the population of the territory without the expense of importing colonists from Mexico. Spain evidently looked more to the quantity of her colonists than to the quality.

Of the social life of the pueblo we know but little. The inhabitants were not noted for good behavior; they were turbulent and quarrelsome. The mixture of races was not conducive of harmony and good citizenship.

Corporal Felix seems to have been moderately successful in controlling the discordant elements. The settlers complained of his severity, but the governor sustained him, and he retained his position to the close of the century. If padre Salazar's opinions of the colonists of California were correct, they were a hard lot; but the padres were opposed to all efforts at the colonization of California by gente de razon, and the priest's picture of pueblo life may be overdrawn. He asserted that "the inhabitants of the pueblos were idlers and paid more attention to gambling and playing the guitar than to tilling their lands and educating their children. The pagans did most of the work, took a large part of the crop, and were so well supplied thereby that they did not care to be converted and live at the missions. The friars attended to the spiritual needs of the settlers free of charge, and their tithes did California no good. Young men grew up without restraint and wandered among the rancherias, setting the Indians a bad example and indulging in excesses that were sure sooner or later to result in disaster."

Notwithstanding Salazar's doleful picture of the pueblos, that of Los Angeles had made fair progress. In 1790 the earlier settlers had all replaced their huts of poles with adobe houses. There were twenty-nine dwellings, a town hall, barrack, cuartel and granaries built of adobe, and around these was a wall of the same material. Whether the wall was built as a defense against hostile Indians or to prevent incursions of their herds into the village does not appear. In 1790 their crop of grain amounted to 4,500 bushels, and their cattle had increased to 3,000 head. During the decade between 1790 and 1800 the population increased from 141 to 315. The increase came chiefly from the growing up of children and from the discharged soldiers of the presidios. Horses and cattle increased from 3,000 to 12,500 head, and the production of grain reached 7,800 bushels in 1796. In 1800 they offered to enter into an agreement to supply 3,400 bushels of wheat per year, at $1.66 per bushel, for the San Blas market. Taxes were low and were payable in grain. Each settler was required to give annually two fanegas of maize or wheat for a public fund to be expended for the good of the community.

The decade between 1800 and 1810 was as devoid of noteworthy events as the preceding one. Life in the pueblo was a monotonous round of commonplace occurrences. The inhabitants had but little communication with the world beyond their own narrow limits. There was a mail between Mexico and California but once a month. As not more than half a dozen of the inhabitants could read or write, the pueblo mail added little weight to the budget of the soldiers' correras (mail carriers).

The settlers tilled their little fields, herded their cattle and sheep, and quarreled among themselves. During the decade drunkenness and other excesses were reported as alarmingly on the increase, and, despite the efforts of the comisionado, the pobladores could not be controlled. The jail and the stocks were usually well filled. Vicente Felix was no longer comisioner. Javier Alvarado, a sergeant of the army, was comisionado in 1809, and probably had filled the office the preceding years of the decade. Population increased slowly during the decade. In 1810 there were 365 persons in the pueblo; fifty had been recruited from the town for military service in the presidios. This would make a total of 415, or an increase of 100 in ten years.

The decade between 1810 and 1820 was marked by a greater increase in population than the preceding one. In 1820 the population of the pueblo, including the few ranchos surrounding it which were under its jurisdiction, was 650. The rule of Spain in Mexico was drawing to an end. The revolutionary war begun by Hidalgo at the pueblo of Dolores in 1810 was carried on with varying success throughout this decade. About all that was known of it in California was that some disturbance in New Spain prevented supplies being sent to the missions and the presidios. The officers and soldiers received no pay. There was no money at the presidios to buy the products of the pueblos, and there were hard times all along the line. The common people knew little or nothing of what was going on in Mexico, and probably cared less. They had no aspirations for independence and were unfit for any better government than they had. The friars were strong adherents of the Spanish crown and bitterly opposed to a republican form of government. If the revolution succeeded it would be the downfall of their power in California.

The most exciting event of the decade was the appearance on the coast of California, in November, 1818, of the "pirate Buchar," as he was commonly called by the Californians. Bouchard was a Frenchman, in the service of the revolutionists of Buenos Ayres, and carried letters of marque, which authorized him to prey on Spanish commerce. Bouchard, with two ships, carrying 66 guns and 350 men, attacked Monterey, and after an obstinate resistance by the Californians, it was captured and burned. He next pillaged Ortega's ranch and burned the buildings; then, sailing down the coast, he scared the Santa Barbarans, looked into San Pedro Bay, but finding nothing there to tempt him, he kept on to San Juan Capistrano. Here he landed and robbed the mission of a few articles and drank the padres' wine; then he sailed away and disappeared from the coast. Los Angeles sent a company of soldiers to Santa Barbara to fight the insurgents. The Santa Barbara and Los Angeles troops reached San Juan the day after Bouchard pillaged the mission. Los Angeles lost nothing by the insurgents, but on the contrary gained two citizens—Joseph Chapman, of Massachusetts, and an American negro, named Fisher. Joseph Chapman was the first English-speaking resident of Los Angeles. He and Fisher were captured at Monterey, and not at Ortega's rancho, as stated by Stephen C. Foster. Chapman married and located at the Mission San Gabriel, where he became Padre Sanchez' man of all work, and built the first mill in Southern California.

The first year of the third decade of the century witnessed the downfall of Spanish domination in Mexico. The patriot priest Hidalgo had, on the 15th of September, 1810, struck the first blow for independence. For eleven years a fratricidal war was waged—cruel, bloody and devastating. Hidalgo, Allende, Miña, Morelos, Aldama, Rayon, and other patriot leaders sacrificed their lives for the liberty of their country. Under Iturbide, in September, 1821, the independence of Mexico was finally achieved. It was not until September, 1822, that the flag of Spain was supplanted by that of Mexico in California, although the oath of allegiance to the imperial government of Mexico was taken in April by Sola and others.

CHAPTER IX.

TRANSITION PERIOD—FROM MONARCHY TO REPUBLIC.

PABLO VICENTE DE SOLA was governor of Alta California when the transition came from the rule of Spain to that of Mexico. He had received his appointment from Viceroy Calleja in 1814. Calleja, the butcher of Guanajuato, was the cruelest and the most bloodthirsty of the vice-regal governors of New Spain during the Mexican revolution. Sola was thoroughly in sympathy with the loyalists and bitterly opposed to the revolutionary party of Mexico. To his influence and that of the friars was due the adherence of California to the cause of Spain. Throughout the eleven years of internecine war that deluged the soil of Mexico with blood, the sympathies of the Californians were not with those who were struggling for freedom.

Of the political upheavals that shook Spain in the first decades of the century only the faintest rumblings reached far-distant California. Notwithstanding the many changes of rulers that political revolutions and Napoleonic wars gave the mother country, the people of California remained loyal to the Spanish crown, although at times they must have been in doubt who wore the crown. The success of the revolutionary movement in Mexico was no doubt bitterly disappointing to Sola, but he gracefully submitted to the inevitable.

For half a century the Spanish flag had floated in California. It was lowered and in its place was hoisted the imperial standard of the Mexican Empire. A few months pass and the flag of the empire is supplanted by the tricolor of the Republic of Mexico. Thus the Californians, in little more than one year, have passed under three different forms of government—that of a kingdom, an empire and a republic, and Sola, from a loyal Spanish governor, has been transformed into a Mexican republican.

The transition from one form of government to another was not marked by any radical changes. Under the empire a beginning was made towards a representative government. California was given a "diputacion provincial" or provincial legislature, composed of a president and six vocales or members. This territorial legislature met at Monterey November 9, 1822. Los Angeles, was represented in it by José Palomares and José Antonio Carrillo. The diputacion authorized the organization of ayuntamientos or town councils for the pueblos of Los Angeles and San José, and the election of regidores or councilmen to office by the votes of the people.

Under the empire, California also was entitled to send a diputado or delegate to the imperial cortes, to be selected by the people. Upon the overthrow of his "Most Serene Majesty, Augustin I. by Divine Providence and by the Congress of the Nation, First Constitutional Emperor of Mexico," and the downfall of his short-lived empire, the republic of Mexico was established and went into effect November 19, 1823, by the adoption of a constitution similar to that of the United States. The federation was composed of nineteen states and four territories. Alta California was one of the territories. The territories were each allowed a diputado in the Mexican congress. The governors of the territories were appointed by the president of the republic. The ayuntamiento of Los Angeles, which had been formed in November, 1822, under the empire, was continued under the republic, with the addition of a secretary and a sindico (treasurer). The quasi-military office of comisionado, which had existed almost from the founding of the pueblo, was abolished, but the old soldiers, who composed a considerable portion of the town's population, did not take kindly to this innovation. The military comandante of the district, with the approval of Governor Argüello, who had succeeded Sola, appointed Sergeant Guillermo Cota to control the unruly element of the pueblo, his authority being similar to that formerly exercised by the comisionados. Then there was a clash between the civil and military authorities. The alcalde and the ayuntamiento refused to recognize Cota's authority. They had progressed so rapidly in republican ideas that they denied the right of any military officer to exercise his power over the free citizens of Angeles. The town had a bad reputation in the territory. There was an unruly element in it. The people generally had a poor opinion of their rulers, both civil and military, and the ruler reciprocated in kind. The town had a large crop of aspiring politicians, and it was noted for its production of wine and brandy. The result of mixing these two was disorder, dissensions and brawls. Rotation in office seems to have been the rule. No one could hold the office of alcalde two years in succession, nor could he vote for himself. In 1826, José Antonio Carrillo was elected alcalde, but nine citizens protested that his election was illegal because as an elector he had voted for himself and that he could not hold the office twice within two years. A new election was ordered. At another election Vicente Sanchez reported to Governor Echeandia that the election was void because the candidates were "vagabonds, drunkards and worse."

The population of the pueblo in 1822, when it passed from under the domination of Spain, was 770. It was exclusively an agricultural community. The only manufacturing was the converting of grapes into wine and brandy. The tax on wine and brandy retailed in 1829, was $339; and the fines collected were $158. These, the liquor tax and the fines, constituted the principal sources of municipal revenue.

The cattle owned by the citizens of the pueblo in 1821 amounted to 10,000 head. There was a great increase in live stock during the decade between 1820 and 1830. The increased demand for hides and tallow stimulated the raising of cattle. In 1830, the cattle of the pueblo had increased to 42,000 head, horses and mules numbered 3,000 head and sheep 2,400. A few foreigners had settled in Los Angeles. The first English-speaking person to locate here was José Chapman, captured at Monterey when the town was attacked and burned by Bouchard, as previously mentioned. He arrived at Los Angeles in 1818. Chapman was the only foreign-born resident of the pueblo under Spanish rule. Mexico, although jealous of foreigners, was not so proscriptive in her policy toward them as Spain. As opportunity for trade opened up foreigners began to locate in the town. Between 1822 and 1830 came Santiago McKinley, John Temple, George Rice, J. D. Leandry, Jesse Ferguson, Richard Laughlin, Nathaniel Pryor, Abel Stearns, Louis Bouchette and Juan Domingo. These adopted the customs of the country, married and became permanent residents of the town. Of these McKinley, Temple, Stearns and Rice were engaged in trade and kept stores. Their principal business was the purchase of hides for exchange with the hide droghers. The hide droghers were vessels fitted out in Boston and freighted with assorted cargoes to exchange for hides and tallow. The embarcadero of San Pedro became the principal entrepot of this trade. It was the port of Los Angeles and of the three missions, San Gabriel, San Fernando and San Juan Capistrano.

Alfred Robinson in his "Life in California" thus describes the methods of doing business at San Pedro in 1829: "After the arrival of our trading vessel our friends came in the morning flocking on board from all quarters; and soon a busy scene commenced, afloat and ashore. Boats were passing to the beach, and men, women and children partaking in the general excitement. On shore all was confusion, cattle and carts laden with hides and tallow, gente de razon and Indians busily employed in the delivery of their produce and receiving in return its value in goods. Groups of individuals seated around little bonfires upon the ground, and horsemen racing over the plains in every direction." "Thus the day passed, some arriving, some departing—till long after sunset, the low white road, leading across the plains to the town, appeared a living panorama." Next to a revolution there was no other event that so stirred up the social elements of the old pueblo as the arrival of a hide drogher at San Pedro. "On the arrival of a new vessel from the United States," says Robinson, "every man, woman, boy and girl took a proportionate share of interest as to the qualities of her cargo. If the first inquired for rice, sugar or tobacco, the latter asked for prints, silks and satins; and if the boy wanted a Wilson's jack-knife the girl hoped that there might be some satin ribbons for her. Thus the whole population hailed with eagerness an arrival. Even the Indian in his unsophisticated style asked for Panas Colorodos and Abalaris—red handkerchiefs and beads."

Robinson describes the pueblo as he saw it in 1829: "The town of Los Angeles consisted at this time of about twenty or thirty houses scattered about without any regularity or any particular attraction, excepting the numbers of vineyards located along the lowlands on the borders of the Los Angeles River. There were but two foreigners in the town at that time, natives of New England, namely: George Rice and John Temple, who were engaged in merchandising in a small way, under the firm name of Rice & Temple." The following description, taken from Robinson's "Life in California," while written of Monterey, applies equally well to Los Angeles and vicinity: "Scarce two houses in the town had fireplaces; then (1829) the method of heating the houses was by placing coals in a roof tile, which was placed in the center of the room." "This method we found common throughout the country. There were no windows; and in place of the ordinary wooden door a dried bullock hide was substituted, which was the case as a general thing in nearly all the ranches on the coast, as there was no fear of intrusion excepting from bears that now and then prowled about and were easily frightened away when they ventured too near. The bullock hide was used almost universally in lieu of the old-fashioned bed ticking, being nailed to the bedstead frame, and served every purpose for which it was intended and was very comfortable to sleep upon." At the close of the third decade of the century we find but little change in the manners and customs of the colonists from those of the pobladores who nearly fifty years before built their primitive habitations around the plaza vieja. In the half century the town had slowly increased in population, but there had been no material improvement in the manner of living and but little advancement in intelligence. The population of the pueblo was largely made up of descendants of the founders who had grown to manhood and womanhood in the place of their birth. Isolated from contact with the world's activities they were content to follow the antiquated customs and to adopt the non-progressive ideas of their fathers. They had passed from under the domination of a monarchy and become the citizens of a republic, but the transition was due to no effort of theirs nor was it of their own choosing. With the assistance of the missions they had erected a new church, but neither by the help of the missions nor by their own exertions had they built a schoolhouse. In the first half century of the pueblo's existence, if the records are correct, there were but three terms of school. Generations grew to manhood during the vacations. "A little learning is a dangerous thing." The learning obtained at the pueblo school in the brief term that it was open never reached the danger point. The limited foreign immigration that had come to the country after it had passed from the rule of Spain had as yet made no change in its customs.

CHAPTER X.

MISSION SECULARIZATION AND THE PASSING OF THE NEOPHYTE.

IT IS not my purpose in this volume to devote much space to the subject of the Secularization of the Missions. Any extended discussion of that theme would be out of place in a local history.

Much has been written in recent years on the subject of the Franciscan Missions of Alta California, but the writers have added nothing to our knowledge of these establishments beyond what can be obtained from the works of Bancroft, Hittell, Forbes and Robinson. Some of the later writers, carried away by sentiment, are very misleading in their statements. Such expressions as "The Robber Hand of Secularization" and "the brutal and thievish dis-establishment of the missions" emanate from writers who look at the question from its sentimental side only, and who know little or nothing of the causes which brought about the secularization of the mission.

It is an historical fact known to all acquainted with California history that these establishments were not intended by the Crown of Spain to become permanent institutions. The purpose for which the Spanish government fostered and protected them was to christianize the Indians and make of them self-supporting citizens. Very early in its history Governor Borica, Fages and other intelligent Spanish officers in California discovered the weakness of the mission system. Governor Borica, writing in 1796, said: "Ac-ording to the laws the natives are to be free from tutelage at the end of ten years, the Missions then becoming doctrinaires, but those of New California at the rate they are advancing will not reach the goal in ten centuries; the reason, God knows, and men, too, know something about it." Spain, early in the present century, had formulated a plan for their secularization, but the war of Mexican Independence prevented the enforcement of it.

With the downfall of Spanish domination in Mexico came the beginning of the end of missionary rule in California. The majority of the mission padres were Spanish born. In the war of Mexican independence their sympathies were with their mother country, Spain. After Mexico attained her independence, some of them refused to acknowledge allegiance to the Republic. The Mexican authorities feared and distrusted them. In this, in part, they found a pretext for the dis-establishment of the missions and the confiscation of the mission estates. There was another cause or reason for secularization more potent than the loyalty of the padres to Spain. Few forms of land monopoly have ever exceeded that in vogue under the mission system of California. From San Diego to San Francisco bay the twenty missions established under Spanish rule monopolized the greater part of the fertile land between the Coast Range and the sea. There was but little left for other settlers. A settler could not obtain a grant of land if the padres of the nearest mission objected.

The twenty-four ranchos owned by the Mission San Gabriel contained about a million and a half acres and extended from the sea to the San Bernardino mountains. The greatest neophyte population of San Gabriel was in 1817, when it reached 1701. Its yearly average for the first three decades of the present century did not exceed 1,500. It took a thousand acres of fertile land under the mission system to support an Indian, even the smallest papoose of the mission flock. It is not strange that the people clamored for a subdivision of the mission estates; and secularization became a public necessity. The most enthusiastic admirer of the missions to-day, had he lived in California seventy years ago, would no doubt have been among the loudest in his wail against the mission system. The Reglamento governing the secularization of the missions published by Governor Echeandia in 1830, but not enforced, and that formulated by the diputacion under Governor Figueroa in 1834, approved by the Mexican congress and finally enforced in 1834-35-36, were humane measures. The regulations provided for the colonizations of the neophytes into pueblos or villages. A portion of the personal property and a part of the lands held by the missions were to be distributed among the Indians as follows: "Article 5—To each head of a family and all who are more than twenty years old, although without families, will be given from the lands of the mission, whether temporal (lands dependent on the seasons) or watered, a lot of ground not to contain more than four hundred varas (yards) in length, and as many in breadth, nor less than one hundred. Sufficient land for watering the cattle will be given in common. The outlets or roads shall be marked out by each village, and at the proper time the corporation lands shall be designated." This colonization of the neophytes into pueblos would have thrown large bodies of the land held by the missions open to settlement by white settlers. The personal property of missionary establishments was to have been divided among their neophyte retainers thus: "Rule 6. Among the said individuals will be distributed, ratably and justly, according to the discretion of the political chief, the half of the movable property, taking as a basis the last inventory which the missionaries have presented of all descriptions of cattle. Rule 7. One-half or less of the implements and seeds indispensable for agriculture shall be allotted to them."

The political government of the Indian pueblos was to be organized in accordance with existing laws of the territory governing other towns. The neophyte could not sell, mortgage or dispose of the land granted him; nor could he sell his cattle. The regulations provided that "Religious missionaries shall be relieved from the administration of temporalities and shall only exercise the duties of their ministry so far as they relate to spiritual matters." The nunneries or the houses where the Indian girls were kept under charge of a dueña until they were of marriageable age were to be abolished and the children restored to their parents. Rule seven provided that "What is called the 'priesthood' shall immediately cease, female children whom they have in charge being handed over to their fathers explaining to them the care they should take of them, and pointing out their obligations as parents. The same shall be done with the male children."

Commissioners were to be appointed to take charge of the mission property and superintend its subdivision among the neophytes. The conversion of ten of the missionary establishments into pueblos was to begin in August, 1835. That of the others was to follow as soon as possible. San Gabriel, San Fernando and San Juan Capistrano were among the ten that were to be secularized first. For years secularization had threatened the missions, but hitherto something had occurred at the critical time to avert it. The missionaries had used their influence against it, had urged that the neophytes were unfitted for self-support, had argued that the emancipation of the natives from mission rule would result in disaster to them. Through all the agitation of the question in previous years the padres had labored on in the preservation and upbuilding of their establishments; but the issuing of the secularization decree by the Mexican Congress, August 17, 1833, the organization of the Hajar Colony in Mexico and the instructions of acting President Frarias to Hajar to occupy all the property of the missions and subdivide it among the colonists on their arrival in California, convinced the missionaries that the blow could no longer be averted. The revocation of Hajar's appointment as governor and the controversy which followed between him and Governor Figueroa and the diputacion for a time delayed the enforcement of the decree.

In the meantime, with the energy born of despair, eager at any cost to outwit those who sought to profit by their ruin, the mission fathers hastened to destroy that which through more than half a century thousands of human beings had spent their lives to accumulate.

"Hitherto, cattle had been killed only as their meat was needed for use, or, at intervals perhaps, for the hides and tallow alone, when an overplus of stock rendered such action necessary. Now they were slaughtered in herds by contract on equal shares, with any who would undertake the task. It is claimed by some writers that not less than 100,000 head of cattle were thus slain from the herds of San Gabriel Mission alone. The same work of destruction was in progress at every other mission throughout the territory and this vast country, from end to end, was become a mighty shambles, drenched in blood and reeking with the odor of decaying carcasses. There was no market for the meat and this was considered worthless. The creature was lassoed, thrown, its throat cut, and while yet writhing in death agony its hide was stripped and pegged upon the ground to dry. There were no vessels to contain the tallow and this was run into great pits dug for that purpose, to be spaded out anon, and shipped with the hides to market—all was haste."

"Whites and natives alike revelled in gore, and vied with each other in destruction. So many cattle were there to kill, it seemed as though this profitable and pleasant work must last forever. The white settlers were especially pleased with the turn affairs had taken, and many of them did not scruple unceremoniously to appropriate herds of young cattle wherewith to stock their ranches."* So great was the stench from the rotting carcasses of the cattle on the plains that a pestilence was threatened. The ayuntamiento of Los Angeles, November 15, 1833, passed an ordinance compelling all persons slaughtering cattle for the hides and tallow to cremate the carcasses.

Hugo Reid in the "Letters" (previously referred to in this volume) says of this period at San Gabriel: "These facts (the decree of secularization and the distribution of the mission property) being known to Padre Tomas (Estenaga), he, in all probability by order of his superior, commenced a work of destruction. The back buildings were unroofed and the timber converted into fire wood. Cattle were killed on the halves by people who took a lion's share. Utensils were disposed of, and goods and other articles distributed in profusion among the neophytes. The vineyards were ordered to be cut down, which, however, the Indians refused to do." After the mission was placed in charge of an administrator, Padre Tomas remained as minister of the church at a stipend of $1,500 per annum, derived from the Pious Fund.

Hugo Reid says of him, "As a wrong impression of his character may be produced from the preceding remarks, in justice to his memory be it stated that he was a truly good man, a sincere Christian and a despiser of hypocrisy. He had a kind, unsophisticated heart, so that he believed every word told him. There has never been a purer priest in California. Reduced in circumstances, annoyed on many occasions by the petulance of administrators, he fulfilled his duties according to his conscience, with benevolence and good humor. The nuns, who when the secular movement came into operation, had been set free, were again gathered together under his supervision and maintained at his expense, as were also a number of old men and women."

The experiment of colonizing the Indians in pueblos was a failure and they were gathered back into the mission, or as many of them as could be got back, and placed in charge of administrators. "The Indians," says Reid, "were made happy at this time in being permitted to enjoy once more the luxury of a tule dwelling, from which the greater part had been debarred for so long; they could now breathe freely again." (The close adobe buildings in which they had been housed in mission days were no doubt one of the causes of the great mortality among them.)

"Administrator followed administrator until the mission could support no more, when the system was broken up." * * * "The Indians during this period were continually running off. Scantily clothed and still more scantily supplied with food, it was not to be wondered at. Nearly all the Gabrielinos went north, while those of San Diego, San Luis and San Juan overrun this country, filling the Angeles and surrounding ranchos with more servants than were required. Labor, in consequence, was very cheap. The different missions, however, had alcaldes continually on the move hunting them up and carrying them back, but to no purpose; it was labor in vain."

"Even under the dominion of the church in mission days," Reid says, "the neophytes were addicted both to drinking and gaming, with an inclination to steal;" but after their emancipation they went from bad to worse. Those attached to the ranchos and those located in the town were virtually slaves. They had bosses or owners and when they ran away were captured and returned to their master. The sindico's account book for 1840 contains this item "For delivery of two Indians to their boss, $12.00."

At Los Angeles the Indian village on the river between what is now Aliso and First streets was a sink hole of crime. It was known as the "pueblo" or little town. Time and again the neighboring citizens petitioned for its removal. In 1846 it was demolished and the Indians removed to the "Spring of the Abilas" across the river, but their removal did not improve their morals.

*History of Los Angeles County, by J. Albert Wilson.

In 1847, when the American soldiers were stationed at Los Angeles, the new pueblito became so vile that Col. Stevenson ordered the city authorities either to keep the dissolute characters out of it or destroy it. The authorities decided to allot land to the families on the outskirts of the city, keeping them dispersed as much as possible. Those employing Indian servants were required to keep them on their premises; but even these precautions did not prevent the Indians from drunkenness and debauchery. Vicente Guerrero, the sindico, discussing the Indian question before the ayuntamiento said: "The Indians are so utterly depraved that no matter where they may settle down their conduct would be the same, since they look upon death even with indifference, provided they can indulge in their pleasures and vices."

After the downfall of the missions some of the more daring of the neophytes escaped to the mountains. Joining the wild tribes there, they became leaders in frequent predatory excursions on the horses and cattle of the settlers in the valleys. They were hunted and shot down like wild beasts.

After the discovery of gold and American immigration began to pour into California the neophyte sunk to lower depths. The vineyards of Los Angeles became immensely profitable, grapes retailing at twenty-five cents a pound in San Francisco. The Indians constituted the labor element of Los Angeles, and many of them were skillful vineyardists. Unprincipled employers paid them off in aguardiente, a fiery liquid distilled from grapes. Even when paid in money there were unscrupulous wretches ready to sell them strong drink; the consequences were that on Saturday night after they received their pay they assembled at their rancherías and all, young and old, men and women, spent the night in drunkenness, gambling and debauchery. On Sunday afternoon the marshal with his Indian alcaldes, who had been kept sober by being locked up in jail, proceeded to gather the drunken wretches into a big corral in the rear of the Downey block. On Monday morning they were put up at auction and sold for a week to the vineyardists at prices ranging from one to three dollars, one third of which was paid to the slave at the end of the week, usually in aguardiente. Then another Saturday night of debauchery, followed by the Monday auction and in two or three years at most the Indian was dead. In less than a quarter of a century after the American occupation, dissipation and epidemics of smallpox had settled the Indian question in Los Angeles—settled it by the extinction of the Indian.

What became of the vast mission estates? As the cattle were killed off the different ranchos of the mission domains, settlers petitioned the ayuntamiento for grants. If upon investigation it was found that the land asked for was vacant the petition was referred to the Governor for his approval. In this way the vast mission domains passed into private hands. The country improved more in wealth and population between 1836 and 1846 than in the previous fifty years. Secularization was destruction to the missions and death to the Indian, but it was beneficial to the country at large. The passing of the neophyte had begun long before the decrees of secularization were enforced. Nearly all the missions passed their zenith in population during the second decade of the century. Even had the missionary establishments not been secularized they would eventually have been depopulated. At no time during mission rule were the number of births equal to the number of deaths. When recruits could no longer be obtained from the Gentiles or wild Indians the decline became more rapid. The mission annals show that from 1769 to 1834, when secularization was enforced—an interval of 65 years—79,000 converts were baptized and 62,000 deaths recorded. The death rate among the neophytes was about twice that of the negro in this country and four times that of the white race. The extinction of the neophyte or mission Indian was due to the enforcement of that inexorable law or decree of nature, the Survival of the Fittest. Where a stronger race comes in contact with a weaker there can be but one ending to the contest—the extermination of the weaker.

CHAPTER XI.

A DECADE OF REVOLUTIONS.

THE decade between 1830 and 1840 was the era of California revolutions. Los Angeles was the storm center of the political disturbances that agitated the territory. Most of them originated there, and those that had their origin in some other quarter veered to the town before their fury was spent. The town produced prolific crops of statesmen in the '30s, and it must be said that it still maintains its reputation in that line. The Angeleños of that day seemed to consider that the safety of the territory and the liberty of its inhabitants rested on them. The patriots of the south were hostile to the office-holders of the north and yearned to tear the state in two, as they do to-day, in order that there might be more offices to fill.

From the downfall of Spanish domination in California in 1822 to the close of that decade there had been but few disturbances. The only political outbreak of any consequence had been Solis' and Herrera's attempt to revolutionize the territory in the interest of Spain. Argüello, who had succeeded Sola as governor, and Echeandia, who filled the office from 1825 to the close of the decade, were men of liberal ideas. They had to contend against the Spanish-born missionaries, who were bitterly opposed to republican ideas. Serrià, the president of the missions, and a number of the priests under him, refused to swear allegiance to the Republic. Serrià was suspended from office and one or two of the friars deported from the country. Their disloyalty brought about the beginning of the movement for secularization of the missions, as narrated in the previous chapter. Echeandia, in 1829, had elaborated a plan for their secularization, but was superseded by Victoria before he could put it in operation.

Manuel Victoria was appointed governor in March, 1830, but did not reach California until the last month of the year. Victoria very soon became unpopular. He undertook to overturn the civil authority and substitute military rule. He recommended the abolition of the ayuntamientos and refused to call together the territorial diputacion. He exiled Don Abel Stearns and José Antonio Carrillo; and at different times, on trumped-up charges, had half a hundred of the leading citizens of Los Angeles incarcerated in the pueblo jail. Alcalde Vicente Sanchez was the petty despot of the pueblo who carried out the tyrannical decrees of his master, Victoria. Among others who were imprisoned in the cuartel was José Maria Avila. Avila was proud, haughty and overbearing. He had incurred the hatred of both Victoria and Sanchez. Sanchez, under orders from Victoria, placed Avila in prison, and to humiliate him put him in irons. Avila brooded over the indignities inflicted upon him and vowed to be revenged.

Victoria's persecutions became so unbearable that Pio Pico, Juan Bandini and José Antonio Carrillo raised the standard of revolt at San Diego and issued a pronunciamiento, in which they set forth the reasons why they felt themselves obliged to rise against the tyrant, Victoria. Pablo de Portilla, comandante of the presidio of San Diego, and his officers, with a force of fifty soldiers, joined the revolutionists and marched to Los Angeles. Sanchez' prisoners were released and he was chained up in the pueblo jail. Here Portilla's force was recruited to two hundred men. Avila and a number of the other released prisoners joined the revolutionists, and all marched forth to meet Victoria, who was moving southward with an armed force to suppress the insurrection. The two forces met on the plains of Cahuenga, west of the pueblo, at a place known as the Lomitas de la Cañada de Breita. The sight of his persecutor so infuriated Avila that alone he rushed upon him to run him through with his lance. Captain Pacheco, of Victoria's staff, parried the lance thrust. Avila shot him dead with one of his pistols and again attacked the governor and succeeded in wounding him, when he himself received a pistol ball that unhorsed him. After a desperate struggle (in which he seized Victoria by the foot and dragged him from his horse) he was shot by one of Victoria's soldiers. Portilla's army fell back in a panic to Los Angeles and Victoria's men carried the wounded governor to the Mission San Gabriel, where his wounds were dressed by Joseph Chapman, who to his many other accomplishments added that of amateur surgeon. Some citizens who had taken no part in the fight brought the bodies of Avila and Pacheco to the town. "They were taken to the same house, the same hands rendered them the last sad rites, and they were laid side by side.

Side by side knelt their widows and mingled their tears, while sympathizing countrymen chanted the solemn prayers of the church for the repose of the souls of these untimely dead. Side by side beneath the orange and the olive in the little churchyard upon the plaza sleep the slayer and the slain.*

Next day, Victoria, supposing himself mortally wounded, abdicated and turned over the governorship of the territory to Echeandia. He resigned the office December 9, 1831, having been governor a little over ten months. When Victoria was able to travel he was sent to San Diego, from where he was deported to Mexico, San Diego borrowing $125 from the ayuntamiento of Los Angeles to pay the expense of shipping him out of the country. Several years afterwards the money had not been repaid, and the town council began proceedings to recover it, but there is no record in the archives to show that it was ever paid. And thus it was that California got rid of a bad governor and Los Angeles incurred a bad debt.

January 10, 1832, the territorial legislature met at Los Angeles to choose a "gefe politico," or governor, for the territory. Echeandia was invited to preside, but replied from San Juan Capistrano that he was busy getting Victoria out of the country. The diputacion, after waiting some time and receiving no satisfaction from Echeandia whether he wanted the office or not, declared Pio Pico, by virtue of his office of senior vocal, "gefe politico."

No sooner had Pico been sworn into office than Echeandia discovered that he wanted the office and wanted it badly. He came to Los Angeles from San Diego. He protested against the action of the diputacion and intrigued against Pico. Another revolution was threatened. Los Angeles favored Echeandia, although all the other towns in the territory had accepted Pico. (Pico at that time was a resident of San Diego.) A mass-meeting was called on February 12, 1832, at Los Angeles to discuss the question whether it should be Pico or Echeandia. I give the report of the meeting in the quaint language of the pueblo archives:

"The town, acting in accord with the Most Illustrious Ayuntamiento, answered in a loud voice, saying they would not admit Citizen Pio Pico as 'gefe politico,' but desired that Lieut. Col. Citizen José Maria Echeandia be retained in office until the supreme government appoint. Then the president of the meeting, seeing the determination of the people, asked the motive or reason of refusing Citizen Pio Pico, who was of unblemished character. To this the people responded that while it was true that Citizen Pio Pico was to some extent qualified, yet they preferred Lieut.-Col. Citizen José Ma. Echeandia. The president of the meeting then asked the people whether they had been bribed, or was it merely insubordination that they opposed the resolution of the Most Excellent Diputacion? Whereupon the people answered that they had not been bribed nor were they insubordinate, but that they opposed the proposed 'gefe politico' because he had not been named by the supreme government."

At a public meeting, February 19, the matter was again brought up. Again the people cried out, "they would not recognize or obey any other gefe politico than Echeandia." The Most Illustrious Ayuntamiento opposed Pio Pico for two reasons: "First, because his name appeared first on the plan to oust Gefe Politico Citizen Manuel Victoria," and "Second, because he, Pico, had not sufficient capacity to fulfil the duties of the office." Then José Perez and José Antonio Carrillo withdrew from the meeting, saying they would not recognize Echeandia as "gefe politico." Pico, after holding the office for twenty days, resigned for the sake of peace. And this was the length of Pico's first term as governor.

Echeandia, by obstinacy and intrigue, had obtained the coveted office of "gefe politico," but he did not long enjoy it in peace. News came from Monterey that Captain Augustin V. Zamorano had declared himself governor and was gathering a force to invade the south and enforce his authority. Echeandia began at once marshaling his forces to oppose him. Ybarra, Zamorano's military chief, with a force of one hundred men, by a forced march reached Paso de Bartolo, on the San Gabriel River, where fifteen years later Stockton fought the Mexican troops under Flores. Here Ybarra found Captain Borroso posted with a piece of artillery and fourteen men. He did not dare to attack him. Echeandia and Borroso gathered a force of a thousand neophytes at Paso de Bartolo, where they drilled them in military evolutions. Ybarra's troops had fallen back to Santa Barbara, where he was joined by Zamorano with reinforcements. Ybarra's force was largely made up of ex-convicts and other undesirable characters, who took what they needed, asking no questions of the owners. The Angeleños, fearing those marauders, gave their adhesion to Zamorano's plan and recognized him as military chief of the territory. Captain Borroso, Echeandia's faithful adherent, disgusted with the fickleness of the Angeleños, at the head of a thousand mounted Indians, threatened to invade the recalcitrant pueblo, but at the intercession of the frightened inhabitants this modern Coriolanus turned aside and regaled his neophyte retainers on the fat bullocks of the Mission San Gabriel, much to the disgust of the mission padres. The neophyte warriors were disbanded and sent to their respective missions.

*Stephen C. Foster.

A peace was patched up between Zamorano and Echeandia. Alta California was divided into two territories. Echeandia was given jurisdiction over all south of San Gabriel and Zamorano all north of San Fernando. This division apparently left a neutral district, or "no man's land," between. Whether Los Angeles was in this neutral territory the records do not show. If it was, it is probable that neither of the governors wanted the job of governing the recalcitrant pueblo.

In January, 1833, Governor Figueroa arrived in California. Echeandia and Zamorano each surrendered his half of the divided territory to the newly appointed governor, and California was united and at peace. Figueroa proved to be the right man for the times. He conciliated the factions and brought order out of chaos. The two most important events in Figueroa's term of office were the arrival of the Hajar Colony in California and the secularization of the missions. These events were most potent factors in the evolution of the territory.

In 1833, the first California colonization scheme was inaugurated in Mexico. At the head of this was José Maria Hajar, a Mexican gentleman of wealth and influence. He was assisted in its promulgation by José M. Padres, an adventurer, who had been banished from California by Governor Victoria. Padres, like some of our modern real estate boomers, pictured the country as an earthly paradise—an improved and enlarged Garden of Eden. Among other inducements held out to the colonists, it is said, was the promise of a division among them of the mission property and a distribution of the neophytes for servants.

Headquarters were established at the city of Mexico and two hundred and fifty colonists enlisted. Each family received a bonus of $10, and all were to receive free transportation to California and rations while on the journey. Each head of a family was promised a farm from the public domain, live stock and farming implements; these advances to be paid for on the installment plan. The original plan was to found a colony somewhere north of San Francisco bay, but this was not carried out. Two vessels were dispatched with the colonists—the Morelos and the Natalia. The latter was compelled to put into San Diego on account of sickness on board. She reached that port, September 1, 1834. A part of the colonists on board her were sent to San Pedro and from there they were taken to Los Angeles and San Gabriel. The Morelos reached Monterey, September 25. Hajar had been appointed governor of California by President Farias, but after the sailing of the expedition Santa Anna, who had succeeded Farias, dispatched a courier overland with a countermanding order. By one of the famous rides of history, Amador, the courier, made the journey from the city of Mexico to Monterey in forty days and delivered his message to Governor Figueroa. When Hajar arrived he found to his dismay that he was only a private citizen of the territory instead of its governor. The colonization scheme was abandoned and the immigrants distributed themselves throughout the territory. Generally they were a good class of citizens, and many of them became prominent in California affairs. Of those who located in Southern California may be named Ignacio Coronel and his son, Antonio F. Coronel, Augustin Olvera, the first county judge of Los Angeles; Victor Prudon, José M. Covarrubias, Charles Baric, Jesus Noe and Juan N. Ayala.

That storm center of political disturbances, Los Angeles, produced but one small revolution during Figueroa's term as governor. A party of fifty or sixty Sonorans, some of whom were Hajar colonists who were living either in the town or its immediate neighborhood, assembled at Los Nietos on the night of March 7, 1835. They formulated a pronunciamiento against Don José Figueroa, in which they first vigorously arraigned him for sins of omission and commission and then laid down their plan for the government of the territory. Armed with this formidable document and a few muskets and lances, these patriots, headed by Juan Gallado, a cobbler, and Felipe Castillo, a cigar-maker, in the gray light of the morning rode into the pueblo, took possession of the town hall and the big cannon and the ammunition that had been stored there when the Indians of San Luis Rey had threatened hostilities. The slumbering inhabitants were aroused from their dreams of peace by the drum beat of war. The terrified citizens rallied to the juzgado, the ayuntamiento met, the cobbler statesmen, Gallado, presented his plan; it was discussed and rejected. The revolutionists, after holding possession of the pueblo throughout the day, tired, hungry and disappointed in not receiving their pay for saving the country, surrendered to the legal authorities the real leaders of the revolution and disbanded. The leaders proved to be Torres, a clerk, and Apalategui, a doctor, both supposed to be emissaries of Hajar. They were imprisoned at San Gabriel. When news of the revolt reached Figueroa he had Hajar and Padres arrested for complicity in the outbreak. Hajar, with half a dozen of his adherents, was shipped back to Mexico. And thus the man who the year before had landed in California with a commission as governor and authority to take possession of all the property belonging to the missions, returned to his native land an exile. His grand colonization scheme and his "Compañía Cosmopolitana" that was to revolutionize California commerce were both disastrous failures.

Governor José Figueroa died at Monterey September 29, 1835. He is generally regarded as the best of the Mexican governors sent to California. He was of Aztec extraction and was proud of his Indian blood. Governor Figueroa during his last sickness turned over the political command of the territory to José Castro, senior vocal, who then became "gefe politico." Los Angeles refused to recognize his authority. By a decree of the Mexican congress (of which the following is a copy) it had just been declared a city and the capital of Alta California:

"His excellency, the president ad interim of the United States of Mexico, Miguel Barragan. The president ad interim of the United States of Mexico, to the inhabitants of the republic, Let it be known: That the general congress has decreed the following: That the town of Los Angeles, Upper California, is erected to a city and shall be for the future the capital of that territory.

BASILO ARRILLAGA,

President House of Deputies.

ANTONIO PACHECO LEAL,

President of the Senate.

DEMETRIO DEL CASTILLO,

Secretary House of Deputies.

MANUEL MIRANDA,

Secretary of the Senate.

I therefore order it to be printed and circulated and duly complied with.

Palace of the federal government in Mexico,
May 23, 1835. MIGUEL BARRAGAN."

The ayuntamiento claimed that as Los Angeles was the capital the governor should remove his office and archives to that city. Monterey opposed the removal, and considerable bitterness was engendered. This was the beginning of the "capital war," which disturbed the peace of the territory for ten years, and increased in bitterness as it increased in age.

Castro held the office of gefe politico four months and then passed it on to Colonel Gutierrez, military chief of the territory, who held it about the same length of time. The supreme government, December 16, 1835, appointed Mariano Chico governor. Thus the territory had four governors within nine months. They changed so rapidly that there was not time to foment a revolution.

Chico reached California in April, 1836, and began his administration by a series of petty tyrannies. Just before his arrival in California a vigilance committee at Los Angeles shot to death Gervacio Alispaz and his paramour, Maria del Rosario Villa, for the murder of the woman's husband, Domingo Feliz. Chico had the leaders arrested and came down to Los Angeles with the avowed purpose of executing Prudon, Arzaga and Arango, the president, secretary and military commander, respectively, of the Defenders of Public Security, as the vigilantes called themselves. He summoned Don Abel Stearns to Monterey and threatened to have him shot for some unknown or imaginary offense. He fulminated a fierce pronunciamiento against foreigners, and, in an address before the diputacion, proved to his own satisfaction that the country was going to the "demnition how-wows." Exasperated beyond endurance, the people of Monterey rose en masse against him, and so terrified him that he took passage on board a brig that was lying in the harbor and sailed for Mexico.

CHAPTER XII.

EL ESTADO LIBRE Y SOBERANO DE ALTA CALIFORNIA.

(The Free and Sovereign State of Alta California.)

THE effort to free California from the domination of Mexico and make her an independent government is an almost unknown chapter of her history. Los Angeles and San Diego played a very important part in California's war for Independence, but unfortunately their efforts were wrongly directed and they received neither honor nor profit out of the part they played. The story of the part they played in the revolution is told in the Los Angeles Archives. From these I derive much of the matter given in this chapter.

The origin of the movement to make California independent and the causes that led to an outbreak against the governing power were very similar to those which led to our separation from our own mother country of England, namely, bad governors. Between 1830 and 1836 the territory had had six Mexican-born governors. The best of these, Figueroa, died in office. Of the others the Californians deposed and deported two; and a third was made so uncomfortable that he exiled himself. Many of the acts of these governors were as despotic as those of the royal governors of the colonies before our Revolution. California was a fertile field for Mexican adventurers of broken fortunes. Mexican officers commanded the provincial troops; Mexican officials looked after the revenues and embezzled them, and Mexican governors ruled the territory. There was no outlet for the ambitious native-born sons of California. There was no chance for the hijos del pais (Sons of the Country) to obtain office, and one of the most treasured prerogatives of the free-born citizen of any republic is the privilege of holding office.

We closed the previous chapter of the revolutionary decade with the departure of Governor Marino Chico, who was deposed and virtually exiled by the people of Monterey. On his departure Colonel Gutierrez for the second time became governor. He very soon made himself unpopular by attempting to enforce the Centralist decrees of the Mexican Congress and by other arbitrary measures. He quarreled with Juan Bautista Alvarado, the ablest of the native Californians. Alvarado and José Castro raised the standard of revolt. They gathered together a small army of rancheros and an auxiliary force of twenty-five American hunters and trappers under Graham, a backwoodsman from Tennessee. By a strategic movement they captured the castillo or fort which commanded the presidio where Gutierrez and the Mexican army officials were stationed. The patriots demanded the surrender of the presidio and the arms. The governor refused. The revolutionists had been able to find but a single cannon ball in the castillo, but this was sufficient to do the business. A well-directed shot tore through the roof of the governor's house, covering him and his staff with the debris of broken tiles; this, and the desertion of most of his soldiers to the patriots, brought him to terms. On the 5th of November, 1836, he surrendered the presidio and his authority as governor. He and about seventy of his adherents were sent aboard a vessel lying in the harbor and shipped out of the country.

With the Mexican governor and his officers out of the country the next move of Castro and Alvarado was to call a meeting of the diputacion or territorial congress. A plan for the independence of California was adopted. This, which was known afterwards as the Monterey plan, consisted of six sections, the most important of which are as follows: "First, Alta California hereby declares itself independent from Mexico until the Federal System of 1824 is restored. Second, The same California is hereby declared a Free and Sovereign State; establishing a congress to enact the special laws of the country and the other necessary supreme powers. Third, The Roman Apostolic Catholic Religion shall prevail, no other creed shall be allowed, but the government shall not molest anyone on account of his private opinions." The diputacion issued a Declaration of Independence that arraigned the Mother Country, Mexico, and her officials very much in the style that our own Declaration gives it to King George III. and England.

Castro issued a pronunciamiento ending with Viva La Federacion! Viva La Libertad! Viva el Estado Libre y Soberano de Alta California!

Thus amid vivas and proclamations, with the beating of drums and the booming of cannon, El Estado Libre de Alta California (The Free State of Alta California) was launched on the political sea. But it was rough sailing for the little craft. Her ship of state struck a rock and for a time shipwreck was threatened.

For years there had been a growing jealousy between Northern and Southern California. Los Angeles, as has been stated in the previous chapter, had by a decree of the Mexican Congress been made the capital of the territory. Monterey had persistently refused to give up the governor and the archives. In the movement to make Alta California a free and independent state, the Angeleños recognized an attempt on the part of the people of the North to deprive them of the capital. Although as bitterly opposed to Mexican governors, and as active in fomenting revolutions against them as the people of Monterey the Angeleños chose to profess loyalty to the Mother Country. They opposed the plan of government adopted by the Congress at Monterey and promulgated a plan of their own, in which they declared California was not free; that the "Roman Catholic Apostolic Religion shall prevail in this jurisdiction, and any person publicly professing any other shall be prosecuted by law as heretofore." A mass meeting was called to take measures "to prevent the spreading of the Monterey Revolution, so that the progress of the Nation may not be paralyzed," and to appoint a person to take military command of the department.

San Diego and San Luis Rey took the part of Los Angeles in the quarrel, Sonoma and San José joined Monterey, while Santa Barbara, always conservative, was undecided, but finally issued a plan of her own. Alvarado and Castro determined to suppress the revolutionary Angeleños. They collected a force of one hundred men made up of natives and Graham's contingent of twenty-five American riflemen. With this army they prepared to move against the recalcitrant sureños (southerners).

The ayuntamiento of Los Angeles began preparations to resist the invaders. An army of 270 men was enrolled, a part of which was made up of neophytes. To secure the sinews of war José Sepulveda, second alcalde, was sent to the Mission San Fernando to secure what money there was in the hands of the mayor domo. He returned with two packages which when counted were found to contain $2,000.

Scouts patrolled the Santa Barbara road as far as San Buenaventura to give warning of the approach of the enemy, and pickets guarded the Pass of Cahuenga and the Rodeo de Las Aguas to prevent northern spies from entering and southern traitors from getting out of the pueblo.

The southern army was stationed at San Fernando under the command of Alferez (Lieut.) Rocha. Alvarado and Castro pushing rapidly down the coast reached Santa Barbara, where they were kindly received and their force recruited to 120 men with two pieces of artillery. José Sepulveda at San Fernando sent to Los Angeles for the cannon at the town house and $200 of the mission money to pay his men.

On the 16th of January, 1837, Alvarado from San Buenaventura dispatched a communication to the ayuntamiento of Los Angeles and the citizens, telling them what military resources he had, which he would use against them if it became necessary, but he was willing to confer upon a plan of settlement. Sepulveda and A. M. Osio were appointed commissioners and sent to confer with the governor, armed with several propositions, the substance of which was that California shall not be free and the Catholic religion must prevail with the privilege to prosecute any other religion "according to law as heretofore." The commissioners met Alvarado on "neutral ground," between San Fernando and San Buenaventura. A long discussion followed without either coming to the point. Alvarado, by a coup d'état, brought it to an end. In the language of the commissioners' report to the ayuntamiento: "While we were a certain distance from our own forces with only four unarmed men and were on the point of coming to an agreement with Juan B. Alvarado we saw the Monterey division advancing upon us and we were forced to deliver up the instructions of this Illustrious Body through fear of being attacked." They delivered up not only the instructions but the Mission San Fernando. The southern army was compelled to surrender it and fall back on the pueblo, Rocha swearing worse than "our army in Flanders" because he was not allowed to fight. The southern soldiers had a wholesome dread of Graham's riflemen. These fellows, armed with long Kentucky rifles, shot to kill, and a battle once begun somebody would have died for his country and it would not have been Alvarado's riflemen.

The day after the surrender of the mission, January 21, 1837, the ayuntamiento held a session and the members were as obdurate and belligerent as ever. They resolved that it was only in the interests of humanity that the mission had been surrendered and their army forced to retire. "This ayuntamiento, considering the commissioners were forced to comply, annuls all action of the commissioners and does not recognize this territory as a free and sovereign state nor Juan B. Alvarado as its governor, and declares itself in favor of the Supreme Government of Mexico." A few days later Alvarado entered the city without opposition, the Angeleñian soldiers retiring to San Gabriel and from there scattering to their homes.

On the 26th of January, an extraordinary session of the most illustrious ayuntamiento was held. Alvarado was present and made a lengthy speech, in which he said, "the native sons were subjected to ridicule by the Mexican mandarins sent here, and, knowing our rights, we ought to shake off the ominous yoke of bondage." Then he produced and read the six articles of the Monterey plan; the Council also produced a plan and a treaty of amity was effected. Alvarado was recognized as governor pro tem. and peace reigned. The belligerent sureños vied with each other in expressing their admiration for the new order of things. Pio Pico wished to express the pleasure it gave him to see a "hijo del país" in office, and Antonio Osio, the most belligerent of the sureños, declared "that sooner than again submit to a Mexican dictator as governor, he would flee to the forest and be devoured by wild beasts." The ayuntamiento was asked to provide a building for the government, "this being the capital of the State." The hatchet apparently was buried. Peace reigned in El Estado Libre.

At the meeting of the town council on the 30th of January, Alvarado made another speech, but it was neither conciliatory nor complimentary. He arraigned the "traitors who were working against the peace of the country" and urged the members to take measures "to liberate the city from the hidden hands that will tangle them in their own ruin." The pay of his troops who were ordered here for the welfare of California is due "and it is an honorable and preferred debt, therefore the ayuntamiento will deliver to the government the San Fernando money," said he. With a wry face, very much such as a boy wears when he is told that he has been spanked for his own good, the alcalde turned over the balance of the mission money to Juan Bautista, and the governor took his departure for Monterey, leaving, however, Col. José Castro with part of his army stationed at Mission San Gabriel, ostensibly "to support the city's authority," but in reality to keep a close watch on the city authorities.

Los Angeles was subjugated, peace reigned and El Estado Libre de Alta California took her place among the nations of the earth. But peace's reign was brief. At the meeting of the ayuntamiento May 27, 1838, Juan Bandini and Santiago E. Argüello of San Diego, appeared with a pronunciamiento and a plan—San Diego's plan of government. Monterey, Santa Barbara and Los Angeles had each formulated a plan of government for the territory and now it was San Diego's turn. Augustin V. Zamorano, who was exiled with Governor Gutierrez, had crossed the frontier and was made comandante-general and territorial political chief ad interim by the San Diego revolutionists. The plan restored California to obedience to the supreme government; all acts of the diputacion and the Monterey plan were annulled and the northern rebels were to be arraigned and tried for their part in the revolution; and so on through twenty articles.

On the plea of an Indian outbreak near San Diego, in which the red men, it was said, "were to make an end of the white race," the big cannon and a number of men were secured at Los Angeles to assist in suppressing the Indians, but in reality to reinforce the army of the San Diego revolutionists. With a force of 125 men under Zamorano and Portilla, "the army of the Supreme Government" moved against Castro at Los Angeles. Castro retreated to Santa Barbara and Portilla's army took position at San Fernando.

The civil and military officials of Los Angeles took the oath to support the Mexican constitution of 1836 and, in their opinion, this absolved them from all allegiance to Juan Bautista and his Monterey plan. Alvarado hurried reinforcements to Castro at Santa Barbara, and Portilla called loudly for "men, arms and horses," to march against the northern rebels. But neither military chieftain advanced, and the summer wore away without a battle. There were rumors that Mexico was preparing to send an army of 1,000 men to subjugate the rebellious Californians. In October came the news that José Antonio Carrillo, the Machiavelli of California politics, had persuaded President Bustamente to appoint Carlos Carrillo, José's brother, governor of Alta California.

Then consternation seized the arribañas (uppers) of the north, and the abajaños (lowers) of the south went wild with joy. It was not that they loved Carlos Carrillo, for he was a Santa Barbara man and had opposed them in the late unpleasantness, but they saw in his appointment an opportunity to get revenge on Juan Bautista for the way he had humiliated them. They sent congratulatory messages to Carrillo and invited him to make Los Angeles the seat of his government. Carrillo was flattered by their attentions and consented. The 6th of December, 1837, was set for his inauguration, and great preparations were made for the event. The big cannon was brought over from San Gabriel to fire salutes and the city was ordered illuminated on the nights of the 6th, 7th and 8th of December. Cards of invitation were issued and the people from the city and country were invited to attend the inauguration ceremonies, "dressed as decent as possible," so read the invitations.

The widow Josefa Alvarado's house, the finest in the city, was secured for the governor's palacio (palace). The largest hall in the city was secured for the services and decorated as well as it was possible. The city treasury, being in its usual state of collapse, a subscription for defraying the expenses was opened and horses, hides and tallow, the current coin of the pueblo, were liberally contributed.

On the appointed day, "The Most Illustrious Ayuntamiento and the citizens of the neighborhood (so the old archives read) met his Excellency, the Governor, Don Carlos Carrillo, who made his appearance with a magnificent accompaniment." The secretary, Narciso Botello, "read in a loud, clear and intelligible voice, the oath, and the governor repeated it after him." At the moment the oath was completed, the artillery thundered forth a salute and the bells rang out a merry peal. The governor made a speech, when all adjourned to the church, where a mass was said and a solemn Te Deum sung; after which all repaired to the house of His Excellency, where the southern patriots drank his health in bumpers of wine and shouted themselves hoarse in vivas to the new government. An inauguration ball was held—the "beauty and the chivalry of the south were gathered there." The lamps shone o'er fair women and brave men. And it was:

"On with the dance! Let joy be unconfined;
No sleep till morn, when youth and pleasure meet
To chase the glowing hours with flying feet."

Outside the tallow dips flared and flickered from the porticos of the houses, bonfires blazed in the streets and cannon boomed salvos from the old plaza. Los Angeles was the capital at last and had a governor all to herself, for Santa Barbara refused to recognize Carrillo, although he belonged within its jurisdiction.

The Angeleños determined to subjugate the Barbareños. An army of 200 men, under Casteñada, was sent to capture the city. After a few futile demonstrations, Casteñada's forces fell back to San Buenaventura.

Then Alvarado determined to subjugate the Angeleños. He and Castro, gathering together an army of 200 men, by forced marches they reached San Buenaventura, and by a strategic movement captured all of Casteñada's horses and drove his army into the Mission Church. For two days the battle raged and, "cannon to the right of them," and "cannon in front of them volleyed and thundered." One man was killed on the northern side and the blood of several mustangs watered the soil of their native land—died for their country. The southerners slipped out of the church at night and fled up the valley on foot. Castro's caballeros captured about 70 prisoners. Pio Pico, with reinforcements from San Diego, met the demoralized remnants of Casteñada's army at the Santa Clara river, and together all fell back to Los Angeles. Then there was wailing in the old pueblo, where so lately there had been rejoicing. Gov. Carlos Carrillo gathered together what men he could get to go with him and retreated to San Diego. Alvarado's army took possession of the southern capital and some of the leading conspirators were sent as prisoners to Vallejo's bastille at Sonoma.

Carrillo, at San Diego, received a small reinforcement from Mexico, under a Captain Tobar. Tobar was made general and given command of the southern army. Carrillo, having recovered from his fright, sent an order to the northern rebels to surrender within fifteen days under penalty of being shot as traitors if they refused. In the meantime Los Angeles was held by the enemy. The second alcalde (the first, Louis Aranas, was a prisoner) called a meeting to devise some means "to have his excellency, Don Carlos Carrillo, return to this capital, as his presence is very much desired by the citizens to protect their lives and property." A committee was appointed to find Don Carlos.

Instead of surrendering, Castro and Alvarado, with a force of 200 men, advanced against Carrillo. The two armies met at Campo de Las Flores. General Tobar had fortified a cattle corral with rawhides, carretas and cottonwood poles. A few shots from Alvarado's artillery scattered Tobar's rawhide fortifications. Carrillo surrendered. Tobar and a few of the leaders escaped to Mexico. Alvarado ordered the misguided Angeleñan soldiers to go home and behave themselves. He brought the captive governor back with him and left him with his (Carrillo's) wife at Santa Barbara, who became surety for the deposed ruler. Not content with his unfortunate attempts to rule, he again claimed the governorship on the plea that he had been appointed by the supreme government. But the Angeleños had had enough of him. Disgusted with his incompetency, Juan Gallardo, at the session of May 14, 1838, presented a petition praying that this ayuntamiento do not recognize Carlos Carrillo as governor, and setting forth the reasons why we, the petitioners, "should declare ourselves subject to the northern governor" and why they opposed Carrillo.

"First. In having compromised the people from San Buenaventura south into a declaration of war, the incalculable calamities of which will never be forgotten, not even by the most ignorant."

"Second. Not satisfied with the unfortunate event at San Buenaventura, he repeated the same at Campo de Las Flores, which, only through a divine dispensation, California is not to-day in mourning." Seventy citizens signed the petition, but the city attorney, who had done time in Vallejo's bastille, decided the petition illegal because it was written on common paper when paper with the proper seal could be obtained.

Next day Gallardo returned with his petition on legal paper. The ayuntamiento decided to sound the "public alarm" and call the people together to give them "public speech." The public alarm was sounded. The people assembled at the city hall; speeches were made on both sides; and when the vote was taken 22 were in favor of the northern governor, 5 in favor of whatever the ayuntamiento decides, and Serbulo Vareles alone voted for Don Carlos Carrillo. So the council decided to recognize Don Juan Bautista Alvarado as governor and leave the supreme government to settle the contest between him and Carrillo.

Notwithstanding this apparent burying of the hatchet, there were rumors of plots and intrigues in Los Angeles and San Diego against Alvarado. At length, aggravated beyond endurance, the governor sent word to the sureños that if they did not behave themselves he would shoot ten of the leading men of the south. As he had about that number locked up in the Castillo at Sonoma, his was no idle threat.

One by one Alvarado's prisoners of state were released from Vallejo's bastille at Sonoma and returned to Los Angeles, sadder if not wiser men. At the session of the ayuntamiento October 20, 1838, the president announced that Senior Regidor José Palomares had returned from Sonoma, where he had been compelled to go by reason of "political differences," and that he should be allowed his seat in the council. The request was granted unanimously.

At the next meeting Narciso Botello, its former secretary, after five and a half months' imprisonment at Sonoma, put in an appearance and claimed his office and his pay. Although others had filled the office in the interim the illustrious ayuntamiento, "ignoring for what offense he was incarcerated, could not suspend his salary." But his salary was suspended. The treasury was empty. The last horse and the last hide had been paid out to defray the expenses of the inauguration festivities of Carlos, the Pretender, and the civil war that followed. Indeed, there was a treasury deficit of whole caballadas of horses and bales of hides. Narciso's back pay was a preferred claim that outlasted El Estado Libre.

The sureños of Los Angeles and San Diego, finding that in Alvarado they had a man of courage and determination to deal with, ceased from troubling him and submitted to the inevitable.

At the meeting of the ayuntamiento, October 5, 1839, a notification was received stating that the supreme government of Mexico had appointed Juan Bautista Alvarado "Governor of the Department." There was no grumbling or dissent. On the contrary the records say, "This Illustrious Body acknowledges receipt of the communication and congratulates His Excellency. It will announce the same to the citizens to-morrow (Sunday), will raise the national colors, salute the same with the required number of volleys, and will invite the people to illuminate their houses for a better display in rejoicing at such a happy appointment." With his appointment by the supreme government the "Free and sovereign state of Alta California" became a dream of the past—a dead nation. Indeed, months before Alvarado had abandoned his idea of founding an independent state and had taken the oath of allegiance to the constitution of 1836. The loyal sureños received no thanks from the supreme government for all their professions of loyalty, whilst the rebellious arribañas of the north obtained all the rewards—the governor, the capital and the offices. The supreme government gave the deposed governor, Carlos Carrillo, a grant of the island of Santa Rosa, in the Santa Barbara Channel, but whether it was given him as a salve to his wounded dignity or as an Elba or St. Helena, where, in the event of his stirring up another revolution, he might be banished a la Napoleon, the records do not inform us.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE CLOSING YEARS OF MEXICAN RULE.

THE decade of revolutions closed with Alvarado firmly established as Governor of the Department of the Californias. (By the constitution of 1836 Upper and Lower California had been united into a department.) The hijos del pais had triumphed. A native son was governor of the department; another native son was comandante of its military forces. The membership of the departmental junta, which had taken the place of the diputacion, was largely made up of sons of the soil, and natives filled the minor offices. In their zeal to rid themselves of Mexican office-holders they had invoked the assistance of another element that was ultimately to be their undoing.

During the revolutionary era just passed the foreign population had largely increased. Not only had the foreigners come by sea, but they had come by land. Capt. Jedediah S. Smith, a New England-born trapper and hunter, was the first man to enter California by the overland route. He came in 1826 by the way of Great Salt Lake and the Rio Virgin, then across the desert through the Cajon Pass to San Gabriel and Los Angeles. On his return he crossed the Sierra Nevadas, and, following up the Humboldt river, returned to Great Salt Lake. He was the first white man to cross the Sierra Nevadas. A number of trappers and hunters came in the early '30s from New Mexico by way of the old Mexican trail. This immigration was largely American, and was made up of a bold, adventurous class of men, some of them not the most desirable immigrants. Of this latter class were some of Graham's followers.

By invoking Graham's aid to place him in power, Alvarado had fastened upon his shoulders an Old Man of the Sea. It was easy enough to enlist the services of Graham's riflemen, but altogether another matter to get rid of them. Now that he was firmly established in power, Alvarado would, no doubt, have been glad to be rid entirely of his recent allies, but Graham and his adherents were not backward in giving him to understand that he owed his position to them, and they were inclined to put themselves on an equality with him. This did not comport with his ideas of the dignity of his office. To be hailed by some rough buckskin-clad trapper with "Ho! Bautista; come here, I want to speak with you," was an affront to his pride that the governor of the two Californias could not quietly pass over, and besides, like all of his countrymen, he disliked foreigners.

There were rumors of another revolution, and it was not difficult to persuade Alvarado that the foreigners were plotting to revolutionize California. Mexico had recently lost Texas, and the same class of "malditos extranjeros" (wicked strangers) were invading California, and would ultimately possess themselves of the country. Accordingly, secret orders were sent throughout the department to arrest and imprison all foreigners. Over one hundred men of different nationalities were arrested, principally American and English. Of these forty-seven were shipped to San Blas, and from there marched overland to Tepic, where they were imprisoned for several months. Through the efforts of the British consul, Barron, they were released. Castro, who had accompanied the prisoners to Mexico to prefer charges against them, was placed under arrest and afterwards tried by court-martial, but was acquitted. He had been acting under orders from his superiors. After an absence of over a year twenty of the exiles landed at Monterey on their return from Mexico. Robinson, who saw them land, says: "They returned neatly dressed, armed with rifles and swords, and looking in much better condition than when they were sent away, or probably than they had ever looked in their lives before." The Mexican government had been compelled to pay them damages for their arrest and imprisonment and to return them to California. Graham, the reputed leader of the foreigners, was the owner of a distillery near Santa Cruz, and had gathered a number of hard characters around him. It would have been no loss had he never returned.

The only other event of importance during Alvarado's term as governor was the capture of Monterey by Commodore Ap Catesby Jones, of the United States navy. This event happened after Alvarado's successor, Micheltorena, had landed in California, but before the government had been formally turned over to him.

The following extract from the diary of a pioneer and former resident of Los Angeles who was an eye-witness of the affair, gives a good description of the capture:

"Monterey, Oct. 19, 1842.—At 2 p. m. the United States man-of-war 'United States,' Commodore Ap Catesby Jones, came to anchor close alongside and inshore of all the ships in port. About 3 p. m. Captain Armstrong came ashore, accompanied by an interpreter, and went direct to the governor's house, where he had a private conversation with him, which proved to be a demand for the surrender of the entire coast of California, Upper and Lower, to the United States government. When he was about to go on board he gave three or four copies of a proclamation to the inhabitants of the two Californias, assuring them of the protection of their lives, persons and property. In his notice to the governor (Alvarado) he gave him only until the following morning at 9 a. m. to decide. If he received no answer, then he would fire upon the town."

"I remained on shore that night and went down to the governor's, with Mr. Larkin and Mr. Eagle. The governor had had some idea of running away and leaving Monterey to its fate, but was told by Mr. Spence that he should not go, and finally he resolved to await the result. At 12 at night some persons were sent on board the "United States" who had been appointed by the governor to meet the commodore and arrange the terms of the surrender. Next morning at half-past ten o'clock about 100 sailors and 50 marines disembarked. The sailors marched up from the shore and took possession of the fort. The American colors were hoisted. The "United States" fired a salute of thirteen guns; it was returned by the fort, which fired twenty-six guns. The marines in the mean time had marched up to the government house. The officers and soldiers of the California government were discharged and their guns and other arms taken possession of and carried to the fort. The stars and stripes now wave over us. Long may they wave here in California!"

"Oct. 21st, 4 p. m.—Flags were again changed, the vessels were released, and all was quiet again. The commodore had received later news by some Mexican newspapers."

Commodore Jones had been stationed at Cal-lao with a squadron of four vessels. An English fleet was also there, and a French fleet was cruising in the Pacific. Both these were supposed to have designs on California. Jones learned that the English admiral had received orders to sail next day. Surmising that his destination might be California, he slipped out of the harbor the night before and crowded all sail to reach California before the English admiral.

The loss of Texas, and the constant influx of immigrants and adventurers from the United States into California, had embittered the Mexican government more and more against foreigners. Manuel Micheltorena, who had served under Santa Anna in the Texan war, was appointed, January 19, 1842, comandante-general inspector and gobernador propietario of the Californias.

Santa Anna was president of the Mexican Republic. His experience with Americans in Texas during the Texan war of independence, in 1836-37, had determined him to use every effort to prevent California from sharing the fate of Texas.

Micheltorena, the newly-appointed governor, was instructed to take with him sufficient force to check the ingress of Americans. He recruited a force of 350 men, principally convicts enlisted from the prisons of Mexico. His army of thieves and ragamuffins landed at San Diego in August, 1842.

Robinson, who was at San Diego when one of the vessels conveying Micheltorena's cholos (convicts) landed, thus describes them: "Five days afterward the brig Chato arrived with ninety soldiers and their families. I saw them land, and to me they presented a state of wretchedness and misery unequalled. Not one individual among them possessed a jacket or pantaloons, but, naked, and like the savage Indians, they concealed their nudity with dirty, miserable blankets. The females were not much better off, for the scantiness of their mean apparel was too apparent for modest observers. They appeared like convicts, and, indeed, the greater portion of them had been charged with crime, either of murder or theft."

Micheltorena drilled his Falstaffian army at San Diego for several weeks and then began his march northward. Los Angeles made great preparations to receive the new governor. Seven years had passed since she had been decreed the capital of the territory, and in all these years she had been denied her rights by Monterey. A favorable impression on the new governor might induce him to make the ciudad his capital. The national fiesta of September 16 was postponed until the arrival of the governor. The best house in the town was secured for him and his staff. A grand ball was projected and the city illuminated the night of his arrival. A camp was established down by the river and the cholos, who in the mean time had been given white linen uniforms, were put through the drill and the manual of arms. They were incorrigible thieves, and stole for the very pleasure of stealing. They robbed the hen roosts, the orchards, the vineyards and the vegetable gardens of the citizens. To the Angeleños the glory of their city as the capital of the territory faded in the presence of their empty chicken coops and plundered orchards. They longed to speed the departure of their now unwelcome guests. After a stay of a month in the city, Micheltorena and his army took up their line of march northward. He had reached a point about twenty miles north of San Fernando, when, on the night of the 24th of October, a messenger aroused him from his slumbers with the news that the capital had been captured by the Americans. Micheltorena seized the occasion to make political capital for himself with the home government. He spent the remainder of the night in fulminating proclamations against the invaders fiercer than the thunderbolts of Jove, copies of which were dispatched post haste to Mexico. He even wished himself a thunderbolt "that he might fly over intervening space and annihilate the invaders." Then, with his own courage and doubtless that of his brave cholos aroused to the highest pitch, instead of rushing on the invaders he and his army fled back to San Fernando, where, afraid to advance or retreat, he halted until news reached him that Commodore Jones had restored Monterey to the Californians. Then his valor reached the boiling point. He boldly marched to Los Angeles, established his headquarters in the city and awaited the coming of Commodore Jones and his officers from Monterey.

On the 19th of January, 1843, Commodore Jones and his staff came to Los Angeles to meet the governor. At the famous conference in the Palacio de Don Abel, Micheltorena presented his Articles of Convention. Among other ridiculous demands were the following: "Article VI. Mr. Thomas Ap C. Jones will deliver 1,500 complete infantry uniforms to replace those of nearly one-half of the Mexican force, which have been ruined in the violent march and the continued rains while they were on their way to recover the port thus invaded." "Article VII. Jones to pay $15,000 into the national treasury for expenses incurred from the general alarm; also a complete set of musical instruments in place of those ruined on this occasion."* Judging from Robinson's description of the dress of Micheltorena's cholos it is doubtful whether there was an entire uniform among them.

"The commodore's first impulse," writes a member of his staff, "was to return the papers without comment and to refuse further communication with a man who could have the effrontery to trump up such charges as those for which indemnification was claimed." The commodore on reflection put aside his personal feelings, and met the governor at the grand ball in Sanchez Hall held in honor of the occasion. The ball was a brilliant affair, "the dancing ceased only with the rising of the sun next morning." The commodore returned the articles without his signature. The governor did not again refer to his demands. Next morning, January 21, 1843, Jones and his officers took their departure from the city "amidst the beating of drums, the firing of cannon and the ringing of bells, saluted by the general and his wife from the door of their quarters." On the 31st of December Micheltorena had taken the oath of office in Sanchez Hall, which stood on the east side of the plaza. Salutes were fired, the bells were rung and the city was illuminated for three evenings. For the second time a governor had been inaugurated in Los Angeles.

Micheltorena and his cholo army remained in Los Angeles about eight months. The Angeleños had all the capital they cared for. They were perfectly willing to have the governor and his army take up their residence in Monterey. The cholos had devoured the country like an army of chapules (locusts) and were willing to move on. Monterey would no doubt have gladly transferred what right she had to the capital if at the same time she could have transferred to her old rival, Los Angeles, Micheltorena's cholos. Their pilfering was largely enforced by their necessities. They received little or no pay, and they often had to steal or starve. The leading native Californians still entertained their old dislike to "Mexican dictators" and the retinue of 300 chicken thieves that accompanied the last dictator intensified their hatred.

Micheltorena, while not a model governor, had many good qualities and was generally liked by the better class of foreign residents. He made an earnest effort to establish a system of public education in the territory. Schools were established in all the principal towns, and territorial aid from the public funds to the amount of $500 each was given them. The school at Los Angeles had over one hundred pupils in attendance. His worst fault was a disposition to meddle in local affairs. He was unreliable and not careful to keep his agreements. He might have succeeded in giving California a stable government had it not been for the antipathy to his cholo soldiers and the old feud between the "hijos del pais" and the Mexican dictators.

These two proved his undoing. The native sons under Alvarado and Castro rose in rebellion. In November, 1844, a revolution was inaugurated at Santa Clara. The governor marched with an army of 150 men against the rebel forces numbering about 200. They met at a place called the Laguna de Alvires. A treaty was signed in which Micheltorena agreed to ship his cholos back to Mexico.

*Bancroft History of California Vol. IV.

This treaty the governor deliberately broke. He then intrigued with Capt. John A. Sutter of New Helvetia and Isaac Graham to obtain assistance to crush the rebels. January 9, 1845, Micheltorena and Sutter formed a junction of their forces at Salinas—their united commands numbering about 500 men. They marched against the rebels to crush them. But the rebels did not wait to be crushed. Alvarado and Castro, with about 90 men, started for Los Angeles, and those left behind scattered to their homes. Alvarado and his men reached Los Angeles on the night of January 20, 1845. The garrison stationed at the curate's house was surprised and captured. One man was killed and several wounded. Lieut. Medina, of Micheltorena's army, was the commander of the pueblo troops. Alvarado's army encamped on the plaza and he and Castro set to work to revolutionize the old pueblo. The leading Angeleños had no great love for Juan Bautista, and did not readily fall into his schemes. They had not forgotten their enforced detention in Vallejo's Bastille during the Civil war. An extraordinary session of the ayuntamiento was called January 21. Alvarado and Castro were present and made eloquent appeals. The records say: "The Ayuntamiento listened, and after a short interval of silence and meditation decided to notify the senior member of the Departmental Assembly of Don Alvarado and Castro's wishes."

They were more successful with the Pico Brothers. Pio Pico was senior vocal, and in case Micheltorena was deposed, he, by virtue of his office, would become governor. Through the influence of the Picos the revolution gained ground. The most potent influence in spreading the revolt was the fear of Micheltorena's cholos. Should the town be captured by them it certainly would be looted. The departmental assembly was called together. A peace commission was sent to meet Micheltorena, who was leisurely marching southward, and intercede with him to give up his proposed invasion of the south. He refused. Then the assembly pronounced him a traitor, deposed him by vote and appointed Pio Pico governor. Recruiting went on rapidly. Hundreds of saddle horses were contributed, "old rusty guns were repaired, hacked swords sharpened, rude lances manufactured" and cartridges made for the old iron cannon, that now stand guard at the courthouse. Some fifty foreigners of the south joined Alvarado's army; not that they had much interest in the revolution, but to protect their property against the rapacious invaders—the cholos, and Sutter's Indians,* who were as much dreaded as the cholos. On the 19th of February, Micheltorena reached the Encinos, and the Angeleñian army marched out through Cahuenga Pass to meet him. On the 20th the two armies met on the southern edge of the San Fernando valley, about 15 miles from Los Angeles. Each army numbered about 400 men. Micheltorena had three pieces of artillery, and Castro two. They opened on each other at long range and seem to have fought the battle throughout at very long range. A mustang or a mule—authorities differ—was killed.

Wilson, Workman and McKinley, of Castro's army, decided to induce the Americans on the other side, many of whom were their personal friends, to abandon Micheltorena. Passing up a ravine they succeeded in attracting the attention of some of them by means of a white flag. Gantt, Hensley and Bidwell joined them in the ravine. The situation was discussed and the Americans of Micheltorena's army agreed to desert him if Pico would protect them in their land grants. Wilson, in his account of the battle,† says: "I knew, and so did Pico, that these land questions were the point with those young Americans. Before I started on my journey or embassy, Pico was sent for; on his arrival among us I, in a few words, explained to him what the party had advanced." "Gentlemen," said he, "are any of you citizens of Mexico?" They answered "No." "Then your title deeds given you by Micheltorena are not worth the paper they are written on, and he knew it well when he gave them to you; but if you will abandon his cause I will give you my word of honor as a gentleman and Don Benito Wilson and Don Juan Workman to carry out what I promise—that I will protect each one of you in the land that you now hold, and when you become citizens of Mexico I will issue you the proper titles." They said that was all they asked, and promised not to fire a gun against us. They also asked not to be required to fight on our side, which was agreed to.

"Micheltorena discovered (how I do not know) that his Americans had abandoned him. About an hour afterwards he raised his camp and flanked us by going further into the valley towards San Fernando, then marching as though he intended to come around the bend of the river to the city. The Californians and we foreigners at once broke up our camp and came back through the Cahuenga Pass, marched through the gap into the Feliz ranch, on the Los Angeles river, till we came into close proximity to Micheltorena's camp. It was now night, as it was dark when we broke up our camp. Here we waited for daylight, and some of our men commenced maneuvering for a fight with the enemy. A few cannon shots were fired, when a white flag was discovered flying from Micheltorena's front. The whole matter then went into the hands of negotiators appointed by both parties and the terms of surrender were agreed upon, one of which was that Micheltorena and his obnoxious officers and men were to march back up the river to the Cahuenga Pass, then down to the plain to the west of Los Angeles, the most direct line to San Pedro, and embark at that point on a vessel then anchored there to carry them back to Mexico." Sutter was taken prisoner, and his Indians, after being corralled for a time, were sent back to the Sacramento.

*Sutter had under his command a company of Indians. He had drilled these in the use of firearms. The employing of these savages by Micheltorena was bitterly resented by the Californians.

†Pub. Historical Society of Southern California, Vol. 3.

The roar of the battle of Cahuenga or "The Alamo," as it is sometimes called, could be distinctly heard in Los Angeles, and the people remaining in the city were greatly alarmed. William Heath Davis, in his "Sixty Years in California," thus describes the alarm in the town: "Directly to the north of the town was a high hill" (now known as Mt. Lookout). "As soon as firing was heard all the people remaining in the town—men, women and children—ran to the top of this hill. As the wind was blowing from the north the firing was distinctly heard, five leagues away, on the battlefield, throughout the day. All business places in town were closed. The scene on the hill was a remarkable one—women and children, with crosses in their hands, kneeling and praying to the saints for the safety of their fathers, brothers, sons, husbands, lovers, cousins—that they might not be killed in the battle; indifferent to their personal appearance, tears streaming from their eyes, and their hair blown about by the wind, which had increased to quite a breeze. Don Abel Stearns, myself and others tried to calm and pacify them, assuring them that there was probably no danger; somewhat against our convictions, it is true, judging from what we heard of the firing and from our knowledge of Micheltorena's disciplined force, his battery, and the riflemen he had with him. During the day the scene on the hill continued. The night that followed was a gloomy one, caused by the lamentations of the women and children."

Davis, who was supercargo on the "Don Quixote," the vessel on which Micheltorena and his soldiers were shipped to Mexico, claims that the general "had ordered his command not to injure the Californians in the force opposed to him, but to fire over their heads, as he had no desire to kill them."

Another Mexican-born governor had been deposed and deported—gone to join his fellows—Victoria, Chico and Gutierrez. In accordance with the treaty of Cahuenga and by virtue of his rank as senior member of the Departmental Assembly, Pio Pico became governor. The hijos del pais were once more in the ascendancy. José Castro was made comandante-general. Alvarado was given charge of the custom house at Monterey, and José Antonio Carrillo was appointed commander of the military district of the south. Los Angeles was made the capital, although the archives and the treasury remained in Monterey. The revolution apparently had been a success. In the proceedings of the Los Angeles ayuntamiento, March 1, 1845, appears this record: "The agreements entered into at Cahuenga between General Emanuel Micheltorena and Lieut.-Col. José Castro were then read and as they contain a happy termination of affairs in favor of the government this Illustrious Body listened with satisfaction and so answered the communication."

The people joined with the ayuntamiento in expressing their "satisfaction" that a "happy termination" had been reached of the political disturbances that had distracted the country. But the end was not yet. Pico did his best to conciliate the conflicting elements, but the old sectional jealousies that had divided the people of the territory would crop out. José Antonio Carrillo, the Machiaveli of the south, hated Castro and Alvarado, and was jealous of Pico's good fortune. He was the superior of any of them in ability, but made himself unpopular by his intrigues and his sarcastic speech. When Castro and Alvarado came south to raise the standard of revolt they tried to win him over. He did assist them. He was willing enough to plot against Micheltorena, but after the overthrow of the Mexican he was equally ready to plot against Pico and Castro. In the summer of 1845 he was implicated in a plot to depose Pico, who, by the way, was his brother-in-law. Pico placed him and two of his fellow conspirators, Serbulo and Hilario Varela, under arrest. Carrillo and Hilario Varela were shipped to Mazatlan to be tried for their misdeeds. Serbulo Varela made his escape from prison. The two exiles returned early in 1846 unpunished and ready for new plots.

Pico was appointed "Gobernador Propietario," or Constitutional Governor of California, September 3, 1845, by President Herrera. The Supreme Government of Mexico never seemed to take offense or harbor resentment against the Californians for deposing and sending home a governor. As the officials of the Supreme Government usually obtained office by revolution, they no doubt had a fellow feeling for the revolting Californians. When Micheltorena returned to Mexico he was coldly received and a commissioner was sent to Pico with dispatches virtually approving all that had been done.

Castro, too, gave Pico a great deal of uneasiness. He ignored the governor and managed the military affairs of the territory to suit himself. His headquarters were at Monterey and doubtless he had the sympathy if not the encouragement of the people of the north in his course. But the cause of the greatest uneasiness was the increasing immigration from the United States. A stream of immigrants from the western states, increasing each year, poured down the Sierra Nevadas and spread over the rich valleys of California. The Californians recognized that through the advent of these "foreign adventurers," as they were called, the "manifest destiny" of California was to be absorbed by the United States. Alvarado had appealed to Mexico for men and arms and had been answered by the arrival of Micheltorena and his cholos. Pico appealed and for a time the Californians were cheered by the prospect of aid. In the summer of 1845 a force of 600 veteran soldiers, under command of Colonel Iniestra, reached Acapulco, where ships were lying to take them to California, but a revolution broke out in Mexico and the troops destined for the defense of California were used to overthrow President Herrera and to seat Paredes. California was left to work out her own destiny unaided or drift with the tide—and she drifted.

In the early months of 1846 there was a rapid succession of important events in her history, each in passing bearing her near and nearer to a manifest destiny—the downfall of Mexican domination in California. These will be presented fully in the chapter on the Acquisition of California by the United States. But before taking up these we will turn aside to review life in California in the olden time under Spanish and Mexican rule.

CHAPTER XIV.

MUNICIPAL GOVERNMENT—MUY ILUSTRE AYUNTAMIENTO.

HOW were the municipalities or town corporations in California governed under Spanish and Mexican rule? Very few, I presume, of its present inhabitants have examined into the local governmental systems prevailing before it became a possession of the United States; and yet this is an important question. The original titles to many a broad acre of our fertile valleys and to many a league of the pueblo lands of some of our cities date away back to the time when Spanish kings or Mexican presidents swayed the destinies of California.

There is a vague impression in the minds of many, derived, perhaps, from Dana's "Two Years Before the Mast" and kindred works or from tales and reminiscences of pioneers who came here after the discovery of gold, that California had very little government in the olden days; that it was largely given over to anarchy and revolution; that life was unsafe in it and murder a common occurrence. Such impressions are as false as they are unjust. There were but comparatively few capital crimes committed in California under Spanish domination or under Mexican rule.

The era of crime in California began with the discovery of gold. There were no Joaquin Murretas or Tiburcio Vasquezes before the "days of gold," the days of "49." It is true, there were a number of revolutions during the Mexican régime, and California had a surplus of governors at times, but these revolutions were for the most part bloodless affairs. In the half a dozen or more political uprisings occurring in the fifteen years preceding the American conquest and resulting in four so-called battles, there were in all but three men killed and five or six wounded.

While there were political disturbances in the territory and several governors were deposed by force and shipped back to Mexico whence they came, the municipal governments were well administered. I doubt whether the municipalities of Los Angeles, San Diego and Santa Barbara have ever been governed better or more economically under American rule than they were during the years that their Most Illustrious Ayuntamientos controlled the civil affairs of these towns.

There were three ayuntamientos or municipal councils in Southern California at the time of the American conquest—those of Los Angeles, San Diego and Santa Barbara. The latter two were of recent origin. The records of the Los Angeles ayuntamiento from 1828 down to the American occupation of California have been preserved. They furnish us the best illustration that we have of the workings of a municipal government under Mexican rule. Therefore in giving a sketch of local government in California under Spain and Mexico I shall draw my information largely from them.

Los Angeles had an ayuntamiento, under Spanish rule, organized in the first years of her existence, but it had very little power. The ayuntamiento at first consisted of an alcalde (mayor) and two regidores (councilmen). Over them was a quasi-military officer, called a comisionado, a sort of petty dictator or military despot, who, when occasion required, or his inclination moved him, embodied within himself all three departments of the government—judiciary, legislative and executive. After Mexico became a republic the office of comisionado was abolished. The membership of the Most Illustrious Ayuntamiento of Los Angeles was gradually increased, until, at the height of its power in the '30s, it consisted of a first alcalde, a second alcalde, six regidores (councilmen), a secretary and a sindico, or syndic, as the pueblo archives have it. The sindico seems to have been a general utility man. He acted as city attorney, tax and license collector and treasurer. The alcalde was president of the council, and acted as judge of the first instance and as mayor. The second alcalde took the place of the first when that officer was ill or absent; or, as sometimes happened, when he was a political prisoner in durance vile. The regidores were numbered from one to six and took rank according to number. The secretary was an important officer; he kept the records and was the only paid member except the sindico, who received a commission on his collections.

At the beginning of the year 1840 the ayuntamientos in California were abolished by a decree of the Mexican congress, none of the towns having the population required by the decree. In January, 1844, the ayuntamiento of Los Angeles was re-established. During the abolition of the municipal councils the towns were governed by prefects and justices of the peace, and the special laws, or ordinances, were enacted by the departmental assembly. Much valuable local history was lost by the discontinuance of the ayuntamientos from 1840 to 1844. The records of the ayuntamientos are rich in historical material.

The jurisdiction of the ayuntamiento of Los Angeles, after the secularization of the missions, extended from the southern limits of San Juan Capistrano to and including San Fernando on the north and eastward to the San Bernardino mountains, extending over an area now comprised in four counties and covering a territory as large as the state of Massachusetts. Its authority was as extensive as its jurisdiction. It granted town lots and recommended to the governor grants of lands from the public domain. In addition to passing ordinances for the government of the pueblo, its members sometimes acted as executive officers to enforce them. It contained within itself the powers of a board of health, a board of education, a police commission and a street department. During the Civil war between Northern and Southern California in 1837-38, it raised and equipped an army and assumed the right to govern the southern half of the territory. The members served without pay, but if a member was absent from a meeting without a good excuse he was fined $3. The sessions were conducted with great dignity and decorum. The members were required to attend their public functions "attired in black apparel so as to add solemnity to the meetings."

The ayuntamiento was spoken of as "Most Illustrious," in the same sense that we speak of the Honorable City Council, but it was a much more dignified body than a city council. Taking the oath of office was a solemn and impressive affair. The junior regidor and the secretary introduced the member to be sworn. "When," the rules say, "he shall kneel before a crucifix placed on a table or dais, with his right hand on the Holy Bible, then all the members of the ayuntamiento shall rise and remain standing with bowed heads while the secretary reads the form of oath prescribed by law, and on the member saying, 'I swear to do,' etc., the president will answer, 'If thou so doest God will reward thee; if thou dost not, may He call thee to account.'"

As there was no pay in the office, and its duties were numerous and onerous, there was not a large crop of aspirants for councilmen in those days, and the office usually sought the man. It might be added, that when it caught the right man it was loath to let go of him.

The tribulations that befell Francisco Pantoja well illustrate the difficulty of resigning in the days when office sought the man; not the man the office. Pantoja was elected fourth regidor of the ayuntamiento of 1837. In those days wild horses were very numerous; when the pasture in the foothills was exhausted they came down into the valleys and ate up the feed needed for the cattle. On this account, and because most of these wild horses were worthless, the rancheros slaughtered them. A large and strong corral was built, with wings extending out on the right and left from the main entrance. When the corral was completed a day was set for a wild horse drive. The bands were rounded up and driven into the corral. The pick of the ca-balladas were lassoed and taken out to be broken to the saddle and the refuse of the bands killed. The Vejars had obtained permission from the ayuntamiento to build a corral between the Ceritos and the Salinas for the purpose of corralling wild horses for slaughter; and Tomas Talamantes made a similar request to build a corral on the Sierra San Pedro. Permission was granted, the corrals were built, and a time was appointed for a wild horse rodeo.

Pantoja, being something of a sport, petitioned his fellow regidores for a twenty days' leave of absence to join in the wild horse chase. After considerable debate leave was granted him. A wild horse chase was wild sport and dangerous, too. Somebody was sure to get hurt, and Pantoja, in this one, was one of the unfortunates. When his twenty days' leave of absence was up Pantoja did not return to his duties of regidor, but, instead, sent his resignation on the plea of illness. The president of the ayuntamiento refused to accept his resignation and appointed a committee to hold an investigation on his physical condition. There were no physicians in Los Angeles then, so the committee took along Santiago McKinley, a canny Scotch merchant, who was reputed to have some knowledge of surgery. The committee and the improvised surgeon held an ante-mortem inquest on what remained of Pantoja. The committee reported to the council that he was a physical wreck; that he could not mount a horse, nor ride one when mounted. A native Californian who had reached such a state of physical dilapidation that he could not mount a horse might well be excused from official duties. But there was danger of establishing a precedent. The ayuntamiento heard the report, pondered over it, and then sent it and the resignation to the governor. He took them under advisement, and, after a long delay, accepted the resignation. In the meantime Pantoja's term had expired by limitation and he had recovered from his fall.

Notwithstanding the great dignity and formality of the old-time regidores, they were not like some of our modern councilmen—above seeking advice of their constituents; nor did they assume superior airs as some of our parvenu statesmen do. There was, in their legislative system, an upper house, or court of last appeal, and that was the people themselves. When there was a deadlock in their council, or when some question of great importance to the community came before them and they were divided as to what was best to do, or when some crafty politician was attempting to sway their decision so as to obtain personal gain at the expense of the community, then the alarma pública, or the "public alarm," was sounded by the beating of the long roll on the drum, and the citizens were summoned to the hall of sessions, and anyone hearing the alarm and not heeding it was fined $3. When the citizens were convened the president of the ayuntamiento, speaking in a loud voice, stated the question and the people were given "public speech." Everyone had an opportunity to make a speech. Rivers of eloquence flowed, and, when all who wished to speak had had their say, the question was decided by a show of hands. The majority ruled, and all went home happy to think the country was safe and they had helped save it.

Some of the ordinances for the government of Los Angeles, passed by the old regidores, were quaint and amusing, and illustrate the primitive modes of life and thought sixty and seventy years ago.

The regidores were particularly severe on the idle and improvident. The "Weary Willies" of that day were compelled to tramp very much as they are to-day. Ordinance No. 4, adopted January 28, 1838, reads: "Every person not having any apparent occupation in this city, or its jurisdiction, is hereby ordered to look for work within three days, counting from the day this ordinance is published; if not complied with he will be fined $2 for the first offense, $4 for the second offense, and will be given compulsory work for the third."

If the tramp only kept looking for work, but was careful not to find it, it seems, from the reading of the ordinance, there could be no offense, and consequently no fines nor compulsory work for the "Weary Willie."

The ayuntamiento of 1844 passed this ordinance: "Article 2. All persons without occupation or known manner of living, shall be deemed to come under the law of vagabonds, and shall be punished as the law dictates."

The ayuntamiento ordered a census of the vagabonds. The census report showed 22 vagabonds—eight genuine vags and fourteen ordinary ones. It is to be regretted that regidores did not define the difference between a genuine and an ordinary vagabond.

The regidores regulated the social conditions of the people. "Article 19. A license of $2 shall be paid for all dances except marriage dances, for which permission shall be obtained from the judges of the city."

Here is a trades union regulation more than a half century old:

"Article 7. All grocery, clothing and liquor houses are prohibited from employing any class of servants foreign to the business without previous verbal or written stipulations from their former employers. Anyone acting contrary to the above shall forfeit all right to claim reimbursement."

Occasionally the regidores had lists of impetunious debtors and dead beats made out and published, and the merchants were warned not to give these fellows credit.

Sometimes the ayuntamiento promulgated legal restrictions against the pastime and pleasures of the people that seem to be almost as austere as were the old blue laws of Connecticut.

Ordinance 5 (passed January 20, 1838): "All individuals serenading promiscuously around the streets of the city at night without first having obtained permission from the alcalde, will be fined $1.50 for the first offense, $3 for the second, and for the third punished according to law."

Ordinance 6 (same date): "Every individual giving a dance at his house, or at any other house, without first having obtained permission from the alcalde, will be fined $5 for the first offense, and for the second and third punished according to law."

What the penalty of "punished according to law" was the ordinances do not define. It is safe to say that any serenader who had suffered for a first and second offense without law, was not anxious to experience a punishment "according to law" for the third.

The old pueblo had its periodical smallpox scares. Then the regidores had to act as a board of health and enforce their hygienic regulations; there were no physicians in the town then. In 1844 the disease became epidemic and the ayuntamiento issued a proclamation to the people and formulated a long list of hygienic rules to be observed. The object of the proclamation seemed to be to paint the horrors of the plague in such vivid colors that the people would be frightened into observing the council's rules. The proclamation and the rules were ordered read by guards at the door of each house and before the Indian huts. I give a portion of the proclamation and a few of the rules:

"That destructive power of the Almighty, which occasionally punishes man for his numerous faults, destroys not only kingdoms, cities and towns, leaving many persons in orphanage and devoid of protection, but goes forth with an exterminating hand and preys upon science, art and agriculture—this terrible plague threatens this unfortunate department of the grand Mexican nation, and seems more fearful by reason of the small population, which cannot fill one-twentieth part of its territory. What would become of her if this eminently philanthropic ayuntamiento had not provided a remedy partly to counteract these ills? It would bereave the town of the arms dedicated to agriculture (the only industry of the country), which would cease to be useful, and, in consequence, misery would prevail among the rest. The present ayuntamiento is deserving of praise, as it is the first to take steps beneficial to the community and the country."

Among the hygienic rules were orders to the people to refrain from "eating peppers and spices which stimulate the blood;" "to wash all salted meats before using;" "all residents in good health to bathe and cleanse themselves once in eight days;" "to burn sulphur on a hot iron in their houses for fumigation." "Saloon-keepers shall not allow gatherings of inebriates in their saloons, and all travelers on inland roads must halt at the distance of four leagues from the towns and wash their clothes."

The alcaldes' powers were as unlimited as those of the ayuntamiento. They judged all kinds of cases and settled all manner of disputes. There were no lawyers to worry the judges and no juries to subvert justice and common sense by anomalous verdicts. Sometimes the alcalde was judge, jury and executioner, all in one. In the proceedings of the ayuntamiento of Los Angeles, March 6, 1837, José Sepulveda, second alcalde, informed the members "That the prisoners, Juliano and Timoteo, had confessed to the murder of Ygnacio Ortega, which was deliberated and premeditated." "He had decided to sentence them to capital punishment and also to execute them to-morrow, it being a holiday when the neighborhood assembles in town. He asked the members of the Illustrious Ayuntamiento to express their opinion in the matter, which they did, and all were of the same opinion. Señor Sepulveda said he had already solicited the services of the Rev. Father at San Gabriel, so that he may come to-day and administer spiritual consolation to the prisoners."

At the meeting of the ayuntamiento two weeks later, March 20, 1837, the record reads: "Second alcalde, José Sepulveda, thanked the members for acquiescing in his decision to shoot the prisoners, Juliano and Timoteo, but after sending his decision to the governor, he was ordered to send the prisoners to the general government to be tried according to law by a council of war, and he had complied with the order." The bluff old alcalde could see no necessity for trying prisoners who had confessed to a deliberate murder; therefore he proposed to execute them without a trial.

The prisoners, I infer, were Indians. While the Indians of the pueblo were virtually slaves to the rancheros and vineyardists, they were allowed certain rights and privileges by the ayuntamiento, and white men were compelled to respect them. The Indians had been granted a portion of the pueblo lands near the river for a rancheria. They presented a petition at one time to the ayuntamiento, stating that the foreigner, Juan Domingo (John Sunday), had fenced in part of their land. The members of the council examined into the case. They found that John Sunday was guilty as charged, so they fined Juan $12 and compelled him to set back his fence to the line. The Indians were a source of trouble to the regidores, and there was always a number of them under sentence for petty misdemeanors. They formed the chain gang of the pueblo. Each regidor had to take his weekly turn as captain of the chain gang and superintend the work of the prisoners.

The Indian village, down by the river between what are now First street and Aliso, was the plague spot of the body politic. Petition after petition came to the council for the removal of the Indians. Finally, in 1846, the ayuntamiento ordered their removal across the river to the Aguage de Los Avilas (the Spring of the Avilas) and the site of their former village was sold to their old-time enemy and persecutor, John Sunday, the foreigner, for $200, which was to be expended for the benefit of the Indians. Gov. Pio Pico borrowed the $200 from the council to pay the expenses of raising troops to suppress Castro, who, from his headquarters at Monterey, was supposed to be fomenting another revolution, with the design of making himself governor. If Castro had such designs the Americans frustrated them by promptly taking possession of the country. Pico and his army returned to Los Angeles, but the Indians' money never came back any more.

The last recorded meeting of the ayuntamiento of Los Angeles under Mexican rule was held July 4, 1846, and the last recorded act was to give Juan Domingo a title to the pueblito—the lands on which the Indian village stood. Could the irony of fate have a sharper sting? The Mexican, on the birthday of American liberty, robbed the Indian of the last acre of his ancestral lands, and the American robbed the Mexican that robbed the Indian.

The ayuntamiento was revived in 1847, after the conquest, but it was not the "Most Illustrious" of former days. The heel of the conqueror was on the neck of the native, and it is not strange that the old-time motto, Dios y Libertad (God and liberty), was sometimes abbreviated in the later records to "God and etc." The secretary was sure of Dios, but uncertain about libertad.

The revenues of Los Angeles were small during the Mexican era. There was no tax on land, and the municipal funds were derived principally from taxes on wine and brandy, from fines and from licenses of saloons and business houses. The pueblo lands were sold at the rate of 25 cents per front vara, or about eight cents per front foot, for house lots. The city treasury was usually in a state of financial collapse. Various expedients for inflating were agitated, but the people were opposed to taxation and the plans never matured.

In 1837, the financial stringency was so pressing that the alcalde reported to the ayuntamiento that he was compelled to take country produce for fines. He had already received eight colts, six fanegas (about nine bushels) of corn and 35 hides. The syndic immediately laid claim to the colts on his back salary. The alcalde put in a preferred claim of his own for money advanced to pay the salary of the secretary, and besides, he said, he had "boarded the colts." After considerable discussion the alcalde was ordered to turn over the colts to the city treasurer to be appraised and paid out on claims against the city. In the meantime it was found that two of the colts had run away and the remaining six had demonetized the corn by eating it up—a contraction of the currency that exceeded in heinousness the "crime of '73."

The municipal revenue between 1835 and 1845 never exceeded $1,000 in any one year, and some years it fell as low as $500 a year. There were but few salaried offices, and the pay of the officials was small. The secretary of the ayuntamiento received from $30 to $40 a month; the schoolmaster was paid $15 a month while school kept, but as the vacations greatly exceeded in length the school terms, his compensation was not munificent. The alcaldes, regidores and jueces del campos (judges of the plains) took their pay in honors, and honors, it might be said, were not always easy. The church expenses were paid out of the municipal funds, and these usually exceeded the amount paid out for schools. The people were more spiritually inclined than intellectually.

The form of electing city officers was similar to our plan of electing a president and vice-president. A primary election was held to choose electors; these electors met and elected the city officials. No elector could vote for himself. As but few of the voters could read or write, the voting at the primary election was by viva voce, and at the secondary election by ballot. The district was divided into blocks or precincts, and a commissioner or judge of election appointed for each block. The polls were usually held under the portico or porch of some centrally located house. Judge of the election was not a coveted office, and those eligible to the office (persons who could read and write) often tried to be excused from serving; but, as in Pantoja's case, the office usually refused to let go of the man.

Don Manuel Requena was appointed judge of a certain district. He sent in his resignation on the plea of sickness. The ayuntamiento was about to accept it when some one reported that Don Manuel was engaged in pruning his vineyard, whereupon a committee of investigation was appointed, with Juan Temple, merchant, as medical expert. The committee and the improvised doctor examined Don Manuel, and reported that his indisposition did not prevent him from pruning, but would incapacitate him from serving as judge of the election. The mental strain of a primary was more debilitating than the physical strain of pruning. The right of elective franchise was not very highly prized by the common people. In December, 1844, the primary election went by default because no one voted.

The office of jueces del campos, or judges of the plains, outlived the Mexican era and was continued for a dozen years at least after the American conquest, and was abolished, or rather fell into decadence, when cattle-raising ceased to be the prevailing industry. The duties of the judges were to hold rodeos (cattle gatherings) and recojedas (horse gatherings) throughout the district; to settle all disputes and see that justice was done between owners of stock.

From 1839 to 1846 the office of prefect existed. There were two in the territory, one for northern California and one for the southern district. The prefect was a sort of sub or assistant governor. He was appointed by the governor with the approbation of the departmental assembly. All petitions for land and all appeals from the decisions of the alcaldes were passed upon by him before they were submitted to the governor for final decisions. He had no authority to make a final decision, but his opinions had weight with the governor in determining the disposal of a question. The residence of the prefect for the southern district was Los Angeles.

CHAPTER XV.

THE HOMES AND HOME LIFE OF CALIFORNIANS IN THE ADOBE AGE.

CITIES in their growth and development pass through distinctive ages in the kind of material of which they are built. Most of the cities of the United States began their existence in the wooden age, and have progressed successively through the brick and stone age, the iron age and are now entering upon the steel age. The cities of the extreme southwest—those of New Mexico, Arizona, Utah and Southern California—like ancient Babylon and imperial Rome—began their existence in the clay or adobe age. It took California three-quarters of a century to emerge from the adobe age. At the time of its final conquest by the United States troops (January 10, 1847) there was not within its limits (if I am rightly informed) a building built of any other material than adobe, or sun dried brick.

In the adobe age every man was his own architect and master builder. He had no choice of material, or, rather, with his ease-loving disposition, he chose that which was most easily obtained, and that was the tough black clay out of which the sun dried bricks called "adobes" were made.

The Indian was the brick-maker and he toiled for his task-masters like the Hebrew of old for the Egyptian, making bricks without straw—and without pay. There were no labor strikes in the building trades then. The Indian was the builder as well as the brick-maker and he did not know how to strike for higher wages, for the very good reason that he received no wages. He took his pittance in food and aguardiente, the latter of which often brought him to enforced service in the chain gang. The adobe bricks were molded into form and set up to dry. Through the long summer days they baked in the hot sun, first on one side, then on the other; and when dried through they were laid in the wall with mud mortar. Then the walls had to dry, and dry perhaps through another summer before the house was habitable.

When a new house was needed—and a house was not built in the adobe age until there was urgent need for it—the builder selected a site and applied to the ayuntamiento, if a resident of a town, for a grant of a piece of the pueblo lands. If no one had a prior claim to the lot he asked for, he was granted it. If he did not build a house on it within a given time—usually a year from the time the grant was made—any citizen could denounce or file on the property and with permission of the ayuntamiento take possession of it; but the council was lenient and almost any excuse secured an extension.

In the adobe age every man owned his own house. No houses were built for rent nor for sale on speculation. The real estate agent was unknown. There were no hotels nor lodging houses. When travelers or strangers paid a visit to one of the old pueblos they were entertained at private houses, or if no one opened his doors to them they camped out or moved on to the nearest mission, where they were sure of a night's lodging.

The architecture of the adobe age had no freaks or fads in it. Like the laws of the Medes and Persians it altered not. There was, with but very few exceptions, but one style of house—the square walled, flat roofed, one story structure—looking, as a writer of early times says: "Like so many brick kilns ready for the burning." Although there were picturesque homes in California under the Mexican régime, and the quaint mission buildings of the Spanish era were massive and imposing, yet the average town house of the native Californian, with its clay-colored adobe walls, its flat asphaltum-covered roof, its ground floor, its rawhide door and its wooden or iron barred windows, was as devoid of beauty without as it was of comfort and convenience within.

The adobe age was not an æsthetic age. The old pueblos were homely almost to ugliness. The clay-colored houses that marked the lines of the crooked and irregular streets were, without, gloomy and uninviting. There was no glass in the windows. There were no lawns in front, no sidewalks, and no shade trees. The streets were ungraded and unsprinkled and when the dashing caballeros used them for race courses, dense clouds of yellow dust enveloped the houses.

There were no slaughter houses, and each family had its own matanza in close proximity to the kitchen, and in time the ghastly skulls of the slaughtered bovines formed veritable golgothas in back yards. The crows acted as scavengers and, when not employed in the street department removing garbage, sat on the roofs of the houses and cawed dismally. They increased and multiplied until the "Plague of the Crows" compelled the ayuntamiento of Los Angeles to offer a bounty for their destruction.

But even amid these homely surroundings there were æsthetic souls that dreamed dreams of beauty and saw visions of better and brighter things for at least one of the old pueblos. The famous speech of Regidor Leonardo Cota, delivered before the ayuntamiento of Los Angeles nearly sixty years ago, has been preserved to us in the old pueblo archives. It stamps the author as a man in advance of the age in which he lived. It has in it the hopefulness of boom literature, although somewhat saddened by the gloom of uncongenial surroundings. "The time has arrived," said he, "when the city of Los Angeles begins to figure in the political world, as it now finds itself the capital of the department. Now, to complete the necessary work that, although it is but a small town, it should proceed to show its beauty, its splendor and its magnificence in such a manner that when the traveler visits us he may say, 'I have seen the City of the Angels; I have seen the work of its street commission, and all these demonstrate that it is a Mexican paradise.' It is not so under the present conditions, for the majority of its buildings present a gloomy, a melancholy aspect, a dark and forbidding aspect that resembles the catacombs of Ancient Rome more than the habitations of a free people. I present these propositions:

"First, that the government be requested to enact measures so that within four months all house fronts shall be plastered and whitewashed.

"Second, that all owners be requested to repair the same or open the door for the denunciator. If you adopt and enforce these measures, I shall feel that I have done something for my city and my country."

Don Leonardo's eloquent appeal moved the departmental assembly to enact a law requiring the plastering and whitewashing of the house fronts under a penalty of fines, ranging from $5 to $25, if the work was not done within a given time. For awhile there was a plastering of cracked walls, a whitening of house fronts and a brightening of interiors. The sindaco's account book, in the old archives, contains a charge of twelve reals for a fanega (one and one-half bushels) of lime, "to whitewash the court."*

Don Leonardo's dream of transforming the "City of the Angels" into a Mexican paradise was never realized. The fines were never collected. The cracks in the walls widened and were not filled. The whitewash faded from the house fronts and was not renewed. The old pueblo again took on the gloom of the catacombs.

The manners and customs of the people in the adobe age were in keeping with its architecture. There were no freaks and fads in their social life. The fashions in dress and living did not change suddenly. The few wealthy people in the town and country dressed well, even extravagantly, while the many poor people dressed sparingly—if indeed some were dressed at all. Robinson describes the dress of Tomas Yorba, a wealthy ranchero of the upper Santa Ana, as he saw him in 1829: "Upon his head he wore a black silk handkerchief, the four corners of which hung down his neck behind. An embroidered shirt; a cravat of white jaconet tastefully tied; a blue damask vest; short clothes of crimson velvet; a bright green cloth jacket, with large silver buttons, and shoes of embroidered deerskin composed his dress. I was afterwards informed by Don Manuel (Dominguez) that on some occasions, such as some particular feast day or festival, his entire display often exceeded in value a thousand dollars."

*The court room.

The same authority (Robinson) says of the women's dress at that time (1829): "The dress worn by the middle class of females is a chemise, with short embroidered sleeves, richly trimmed with lace; a muslin petticoat, flounced with scarlet and secured at the waist by a silk band of the same color; shoes of velvet or blue satin; a cotton reboso or scarf; pearl necklace and earrings, with hair falling in broad plaits down the back."

Of the dress of the men in 1829, Robinson says: "Very few of the men have adopted our mode of dress, the greater part adhering to the ancient costume of the past century. Short clothes and a jacket trimmed with scarlet; a silk sash about the waist; botas of ornamented deer-skin and embroidered shoes; the hair long, braided and fastened behind with ribbons; a black silk handkerchief around the head, surmounted by an oval and broad brimmed hat is the dress usually worn by the men of California."

After the coming of the Hajar colony, in 1834, there was a change in the fashions. The colonists brought with them the latest fashions from the city of Mexico. The men generally adopted calzoneras instead of the knee breeches or short clothes of the last century. "The calzoneras were pantaloons with the exterior seam open throughout its length. On the upper edge was a strip of cloth, red, blue or black, in which were the button-holes. On the other edge were eyelet holes for the buttons. In some cases the calzonera was sewn from the hip to the middle of the thigh; in others, buttoned. From the middle of the thigh downward the leg was covered by the bota or leggings, used by every one, whatever his dress." The short jacket, with silver or bronze buttons, and the silken sash that served as a connecting link between the calzoneras and the jacket, and also supplied the place of what the Californians did not wear—suspenders, this constituted a picturesque costume, that continued in vogue until the conquest, and with many of the natives for several years after it. After 1834 the fashionable women of California "exchanged their narrow skirts for more flowing garments and abandoned the braided hair for the coil, and the large combs till then in use, for smaller combs."* For outer wraps the serapa for men and the reboza for women were universally worn. The texture of these marked the social standing of the wearer. It ranged from cheap cotton and coarse serge to the costliest silk and the finest of French broad-cloth.

The legendary of the hearthstone and the fire-side, which fills so large a place in the home life of the Anglo Saxon, had no part in the domestic system of the Californian, he had no hearthstone and no fireside; nor could that pleasing fiction of Santa Claus' descent through the chimney on Christmas eve, that so delights the young children of to-day, have had any meaning to the youthful Californian of the old pueblo days. There were no chimneys in the old pueblos. The only means of warming the houses by artificial heat was a pan of coals set on the floor. The people lived out of doors in the open air and invigorating sunshine. The houses were places to sleep in or shelters from the rain. The kitchens were detached from the living rooms. The better class of dwellings usually had out of doors or in an open shed, a beehive shaped earthen oven, in which the family baking was done. The poorer class of the pueblanos cooked over a campfire, with a flat stone (on which the tortillas were baked) and a few pieces of pottery. The culinary outfit was not extensive, even in the best appointed kitchens.

Before the mission mill was built near San Gabriel, the first mill constructed in Southern California, the hand mill and the metete, or grinding stone, were the only means of grinding wheat or corn. To obtain a supply of flour or meal for a family by such a process was slow and laborious, so the family very often dispensed with bread in the bill of fare. Bread was not the staff of life in the old pueblo days. Beef was the staple article of diet.

As lumber was scarce and hard to procure most of the houses had earthen floors. The furniture was meager, a few benches, a rawhide bottomed chair to sit on, a rough table, a chest or two to keep the family finery in, a few cheap prints of saints on the walls formed the decorations and furnishings of the living rooms of the common people. The bed was the pride and ambition of the housewife and, even in humble dwellings, sometimes a snowy counterpane and lace trimmed pillows decorated a couch, whose base was a bullock's hide stretched on a rough frame of wood. A shrine dedicated to the patron saint of the household was a very essential part of a well-ordered home.

Filial obedience and respect for parental authority were early impressed upon the minds of the children. A child was never too old or too large to be exempt from punishment. Stephen C. Foster used to relate an amusing case of parental disciplining he once saw: An old lady of 60, a grandmother, was belaboring with a barrel stave, her son, a man of 30 years of age. The boy had done something that his mother did not approve of. She sent for him to come over to the maternal home, to receive his punishment. He came. She took him out to the metaphorical wood shed, which in this case was the portico of her house, where she stood him up and proceeded to administer corporal punishment. With the resounding thwacks of the barrel-stave she would exclaim, "I'll teach you to behave yourself! I'll mend your manners, sir! Now, you will be good, won't you?" The big man took his punishment without a thought of resenting or rebelling; in fact, he rather seemed to enjoy it. It was, no doubt, a feeling and forcible reminder of his boyhood days.

*Bancroft's Pastoral California.

In the earlier days of California, before revolutionary ideas had perverted the usages of the people, great respect was shown to those in authority and the authorities were strict in requiring deference from their constituents. In the Los Angeles archives of 1828 are the records of an impeachment trial of Don Antonio M. Lugo, held to depose him from the office of Judge of the Plains. The principal duty of such a judge was to decide cases of disputed ownership of stray cattle and horses. Lugo seems to have had a very exalted idea of the dignity of his office. Among the complaints was one from young Pedro Sanchez, who testified that Lugo had tried to ride his horse over him in the street, because he, Sanchez, would not take off his hat to the judge and remain standing uncovered while Lugo rode past.

Under Mexican domination there was no tax levied on land and improvements. The municipal funds of the pueblos were obtained from the revenue on wine and brandy; from the licenses of saloons and other business houses, from the tariff on imports, from permits to give balls or dances, from the fines of transgressors and from the tax on bull rings and cock pits. Then men's pleasures and vices paid the cost of governing. Although in the early '40s the city of Los Angeles had a population of 2,000 the revenues did not exceed $1,000 a year; yet with this small amount the municipal authorities ran a city government and kept out of debt. It did not cost much then to run a city government. There was no army of high salaried officials then, with a horde of political heelers, quartered on the municipality and fed from the public crib at the expense of the taxpayer. Politicians may have been no more honest then than now, but where there was nothing to steal there was no stealing. The old alcaldes and regidores were wise enough not to put temptation in the way of the politicians, and thus they kept them reasonably honest, or at least they kept them from plundering the taxpayers, by the simple expedient of having no taxpayers. The only salaried officers in the days when the Most Illustrious Ayuntamiento was the ruling power in the city, were the secretary of that body, the sindico or revenue collector and the schoolmaster (that is when there was one). The highest monthly salary paid the secretary, who was also ex-officio clerk of the alcalde's court, was $40; the sindico received a commission on collections and the schoolmaster was paid $15 per month. If like Oliver Twist he cried for more he was dismissed for evident unfitness for his duties; his unfitness appearing in his inability to live on his meager salary.

The functions of the various departments of the city government were most economically performed. Street cleaning and the lighting of the city were provided for on a sort of automatic principle. There was an ordinance that required each owner of a house, every Saturday, to sweep and clean in front of his premises to the middle of the street. His neighbor on the opposite side met him half way and the street was swept without expense to the city. There was another ordinance that required each owner of a house of more than two rooms on a principal street to hang a lighted lantern in front of his door from twilight to eight o'clock in winter and to nine in summer. So the city was at no expense for lighting. There were fines for neglect of these duties. The crows had a contract for removing the garbage. No garbage wagon with its aroma of decay scented the atmosphere of the brown adobe fronts in the days of long ago. There were no fines imposed upon the crows for neglect of duty. Evidently they were efficient city officials. Similar ordinances for lighting and street sweeping were in force at Santa Barbara and San Diego. At Santa Barbara they were continued for at least a decade after the American occupation.

It is said "that every dog has his day." There was one day each week that the dogs of Los Angeles did not have on which to roam about; and that was Monday. Every Monday was dog catcher's day, and was set apart by ordinance for the killing of tramp dogs. Woe betide the unfortunate canine which on that day escaped from his kennel, or broke loose from his tether. A swift flying lasso encircled his neck and the breath was quickly choked out of his body. Monday was a "dies irae," an evil day to the youthful Angeleno with a dog, and the dog catcher was abhorred and despised then as now by every boy who possessed a canine pet.

There was no fire department in the old pueblos. The adobe houses with their clay walls, earthen floors and rawhide doors were as nearly fireproof as any human habitation could be made. I doubt whether any muchacho of the old régime ever saw a house on fire. The boys of that day never experienced the thrilling pleasure of running to a fire. What boys sometimes miss by being born too soon! There were no paid police departments. Every able-bodied young man was subject to military duty. A volunteer guard or patrol was kept on duty at the cuartél, or guard house. These guards policed the pueblos, but they were not paid. Each young man had to take his turn at guard duty.

Viewed from our standpoint of high civilization, life in the old pueblo days was a monotonous round of wearying sameness—uneventful and uninteresting. The people of that day, however, managed to extract a great deal of pleasure from it. Undoubtedly they missed—by living so long ago—many things that we in this highly enlightened age have come to regard as necessities of our existence; but they also missed the harrowing cares, the vexations and the excessive taxation, both mental and municipal, that prematurely furrow our brows and whiten our locks.

CHAPTER XVI.

ACQUISITION OF CALIFORNIA BY THE UNITED STATES—CAPTURE OF LOS ANGELES.

THE acquisition of California by the United States was the result of one of those spasms of territorial expansion that seem at certain periods to take hold of the body politic. It had been for several years a foregone conclusion in the minds of the leading politicians of the then dominant party that the manifest destiny of California was to become United States territory. The United States must have a Pacific boundary, and those restless nomads, the pioneers of the west, must have new country to colonize. England or France might at any time seize the country; and, as Mexico must eventually lose California, it were better that the United States should possess it than some European power. All that was wanting for the United States to seize and appropriate it was a sufficient provocation by the Mexican government. The provocation came, but not from Mexico.

Capt. John C. Fremont, an engineer and explorer in the services of the United States, appeared at Monterey in January, 1846, and applied to Gen. Castro, the military comandante, for permission to buy supplies for his party of sixty-two men who were encamped in the San Joaquin Valley, in what is now Kern County. Permission was given him. There seems to have been a tacit agreement between Castro and Fremont that the exploring party should not enter the settlements, but early in March the whole force was encamped in the Salinas valley. Castro regarded the marching of a body of armed men through the country as an act of hostility, and ordered them out of the country. Instead of leaving, Fremont intrenched himself on an eminence known as Gabilan Peak (about thirty miles from Monterey), raised the stars and stripes over his barricade and defied Castro. Castro maneuvered his troops on the plain below, but did not attack Fremont. After two days' waiting Fremont abandoned his position and began his march northward. On May 9, when near the Oregon line, he was overtaken by Lieut. Gillespie, of the United States navy, with a dispatch from the president. Gillespie had left the United States in November, 1845, and, disguised, had crossed Mexico from Vera Cruz to Mazatlan, and from there had reached Monterey. The exact nature of the dispatches to Fremont is not known, but presumably they related to the impending war between Mexico and the United States, and the necessity for a prompt seizure of the country to prevent it from falling into the hands of England. Fremont returned to the Sacramento, where he encamped.

On the 14th of June, 1846, a body of American settlers from the Napa and Sacramento valleys, thirty-three in number, of which Ide, Semple, Grigsby and Merritt seem to have been the leaders, after a night's march, took possession of the old castillo or fort at Sonoma, with its rusty muskets and unused cannon, and made Gen. M. G. Vallejo, Lieut.-Col. Prudon, Capt. Salvador Vallejo and Jacob P. Leese, a brother-in-law of the Vallejos, prisoners. There seems to have been no privates at the castillo—all officers. Exactly what was the object of the American settlers in taking Gen. Vallejo prisoner is not evident. Gen. Vallejo was one of the few eminent Californians who favored the annexation of California to the United States. He is said to have made a speech favoring such a movement in the junta at Monterey a few months before. Castro regarded him with suspicion. The prisoners were sent under an armed escort to Fremont's camp. William B. Ide was elected captain of the revolutionists who remained at Sonoma, to "hold the fort." He issued a pronunciamiento full of bombast, bad English and worse orthography. He declared California a free and independent state, under the name of the California Republic. A nation must have a flag of its own, so one was improvised. It was made of a piece of cotton cloth, or manta, a yard wide and five feet long. Strips of red flannel torn from an old petticoat that had crossed the plains were stitched on the manta for stripes. With a blacking brush, or, as another authority says, the end of a chewed stick for a brush, and red-berry juice for paint, William L. Todd painted the figure of a grizzly bear rampant on the field of the flag. The natives called Todd's bear "cochino"—a pig; it resembled that animal more than a bear. A five-pointed star in the left upper corner, painted with the same coloring matter, and the words, "California Republic," printed on it in ink, completed the famous bear-flag.

The California Republic was ushered into existence June 14, 1846, attained the acme of its power July 4, when Ide and his fellow-patriots burnt a quantity of powder in salutes, and fired off oratorical pyrotechnics in honor of the new republic. It utterly collapsed on the 9th of July, after an existence of twenty-five days, when news reached Sonoma that Commodore Sloat had raised the stars and stripes at Monterey and taken possession of California in the name of the United States.

Commodore Sloat, who had anchored in Monterey Bay July 2, 1846, was for a time undecided whether to take possession of the country. He had no official information that war had been declared between the United States and Mexico; but, acting on the supposition that Capt. Fremont had received definite instructions, on the 7th of July he raised the flag and took possession of the custom-house and government buildings at Monterey. Capt. Montgomery, on the 9th, raised it at San Francisco, and on the same day the Bear flag gave place to the stars and stripes at Sonoma.

Gen. Castro was holding Santa Clara and San José when he received Commodore Sloat's proclamation informing him that the commodore had taken possession of Monterey. Castro, after reading the proclamation, which was written in Spanish, formed his men in line, and, addressing them, said: "Monterey is taken by the Americans. What can I do with a handful of men against the United States? I am going to Mexico. All of you who wish to follow me, 'About face!' All that wish to remain can go to their homes"* A very small part of his force followed him.

Commodore Sloat was superseded by Commodore Stockton, who set about organizing an expedition to subjugate the southern part of the territory which still remained loyal to Mexico. Fremont's exploring party, recruited to a battalion of 160 men, had marched to Monterey, and from there was sent by vessel to San Diego to procure horses and prepare to act as cavalry.

* * * *

Let us now return to Los Angeles, and learn how affairs had progressed at the capital.

Pío Pico had entered upon the duties of the governorship with a desire to bring peace and harmony to the distracted country. He appointed Juan Bandini, one of the ablest statesmen of the south, his secretary. After Bandini resigned he chose J. M. Covarrubias, and later José M. Moreno filled the office.

The principal offices of the territory had been divided equally between the politicians of the north and the south. While Los Angeles became the capital, and the departmental assembly met there, the military headquarters, the archives and the treasury remained at Monterey. But notwithstanding this division of the spoils of office, the old feud between the arribaños and the abajeños would not down, and soon the old-time quarrel was on with all its bitterness. Castro, as military comandante, ignored the governor, and Alvarado was regarded by the sureños as an emissary of Castro's. The departmental assembly met at Los Angeles in March, 1846. Pico presided, and in his opening message set forth the unfortunate condition of affairs in the department. Education was neglected; justice was not administered; the missions were so burdened by debt that but few of them could be rented; the army was disorganized and the treasury empty.

Not even the danger of war with the Americans could make the warring factions forget their fratricidal strife. Castro's proclamation against Fremont was construed by the sureños into a scheme to inveigle the governor to the north so that the comandante-general could depose him and seize the office for himself. Castro's preparations to resist by force the encroachments of the Americans were believed, by Pico and the Angeleñians, to be the fitting out of an army to attack Los Angeles and overthrow the government.

* Hall's History of San Jose.

On the 16th of June, Pico left Los Angeles for Monterey with a military force of a hundred men. The object of the expedition was to oppose, and, if possible, to depose Castro. He left the capital under the care of the ayuntamiento. On the 20th of June, Alcalde Gallardo reported to the ayuntamiento that he had positive information "that Don Castro had left Monterey and would arrive here in three days with a military force for the purpose of capturing the city." (Castro had left Monterey with a force of 70 men, but he had gone north to San José.) The sub-prefect, Don Abel Stearns, was authorized to enlist troops to preserve order. On the 23d of June, three companies were organized—an artillery company under Miguel Pryor, a company of riflemen under Benito Wilson, and a cavalry company under Gorgé Palomares. Pico called for re-inforcements, but just as he was preparing to march against Monterey the news reached him of the capture of Sonoma by the Americans, and next day, June 24, the news reached Los Angeles just as the council had decided on a plan of defense against Castro, who was 500 miles away. Pico, on the impulse of the moment, issued a proclamation, in which he arraigned the United States for perfidy and treachery, and the gang of "North American adventurers," who had captured Sonoma "with the blackest treason the spirit of evil can invent." His arraignment of the "North American Nation" was so severe that some of his American friends in Los Angeles took umbrage at his pronunciamiento. He afterwards tried to recall it, but it was too late; it had been published.

Castro, finding the "foreign adventurers" too numerous and too aggressive in the northern part of the territory, determined, with what men he could induce to go with him, to retreat to the south; but before so doing he sent a mediator to Pico to negotiate a treaty of peace and amity between the factions. On the 12th of July the two armies met at Santa Margarita, near San Luis Obispo. Castro brought the news that Commodore Sloat had hoisted the United States flag at Monterey and taken possession of the country for his government. The meeting of the governor and the comandante-general was not very cordial, but in the presence of the impending danger to the territory they concealed their mutual dislike and decided to do their best to defend the country they both loved.

Sorrowfully they began their retreat to the capital; but even threatened disaster to their common country could not wholly unite the north and the south. The respective armies—Castro's numbering about 150 men and Pico's 120—kept about a day's march apart. They reached Los Angeles, and preparations were begun to resist the invasion of the Americans. Pico issued a proclamation ordering all able-bodied men between 15 and 60 years of age, native and naturalized, to take up arms to defend the country; any able-bodied Mexican refusing was to be treated as a traitor. There was no enthusiasm for the cause. The old factional jealousy and distrust was as potent as ever. The militia of the south would obey none but their own officers; Castro's troops, who considered themselves regulars, ridiculed the raw recruits of the sureños, while the naturalized foreigners of American extraction secretly sympathized with their own people.

Pico, to counteract the malign influence of his Santa Barbara proclamation and enlist the sympathy and more ready adhesion of the foreign element of Los Angeles, issued the following circular: (This circular or proclamation has never before found its way into print. I find no allusion to it in Bancroft's or Hittell's Histories. A copy, probably the only one in existence, was donated some years since to the Historical Society of Southern California. I am indebted to Prof. Carlos Bransby for a most excellent translation.)

Gobierno del Dep. de Californias.

"CIRCULAR.—As owing to the unfortunate condition of things that now prevail in this department in consequence of the war into which the United States has provoked the Mexican Nation, some ill feeling might spring up between the citizens of the two countries out of which unfortunate occurrences might grow, and as this government desires to remove every cause of friction, it has seen fit, in the use of its power, to issue the present circular.

"The Government of the department of California declares in the most solemn manner that all the citizens of the United States that have come lawfully into its territory, relying upon the honest administration of the laws and the observance of the prevailing treaties, shall not be molested in the least, and their lives and property shall remain in perfect safety under the protection of the Mexican laws and authorities legally constituted.

"Therefore, in the name of the Supreme Government of the Nation, and by virtue of the authority vested upon me, I enjoin upon all the inhabitants of California to observe towards the citizens of the United States that have lawfully come among us, the kindest and most cordial conduct, and to abstain from all acts of violence against their persons or property; provided they remain neutral, as heretofore, and take no part in the invasion effected by the armies of their nation.

"The authorities of the various municipalities and corporations will be held strictly responsible for the faithful fulfillment of this order, and shall, as soon as possible, take the necessary measures to bring it to the knowledge of the people. God and Liberty. Angeles, July 27, 1846.

"PIO PICO.

"JOSÉ MATIAS MARENO,

"Secretary pro tem."

When we consider the conditions existing in California at the time this circular was issued, its sentiments reflect great credit on Pico for his humanity and forbearance. A little over a month before, a mob of Americans, many of them in the country contrary to its laws, had without cause or provocation seized Gen. Vallejo and several other prominent Californians in their homes and incarcerated them in prison at Sutter's Fort. Nor was this outrage mitigated when the stars and stripes were raised. The perpetrators of the outrage were not punished. These native Californians were kept in prison nearly two months without any charge against them. Besides, Governor Pico and the leading Californians very well knew that the Americans whose lives and property this proclamation was designed to protect would not remain neutral when their countrymen invaded the territory. Pio Pico deserved better treatment from the Americans than he received. He was robbed of his landed possessions by unscrupulous land sharks, and his character defamed by irresponsible historical scribes.

Pico made strenuous efforts to raise men and means to resist the threatened invasion. He had mortgaged the government house to de Celis for $2,000, the mortgage to be paid "as soon as order shall be established in the department." This loan was really negotiated to fit out the expedition against Castro, but a part of it was expended after his return to Los Angeles in procuring supplies while preparing to meet the American army. The government had but little credit. The moneyed men of the pueblo were averse to putting money into what was almost sure to prove a lost cause. The bickerings and jealousies between the factions neutralized to a considerable degree the efforts of Pico and Castro to mobilize the army.

Castro established his camp on the mesa across the river, near where Mrs. Hollenbeck's residence now is. Here he and Andres Pico undertook to drill the somewhat incongruous collection of hombres in military maneuvering. Their entire force at no time exceeded 300 men. These were poorly armed and lacking in discipline.

* * * *

We left Stockton at Monterey preparing an expedition against Castro at Los Angeles. On taking command of the Pacific squadron July 29, he issued a proclamation. It was as bombastic as the pronunciamiento of a Mexican governor. Bancroft says: "The paper was made up of falsehood, of irrelevant issues and bombastic ranting in about equal parts, the tone being offensive and impolitic even in those inconsiderable portions which were true and legitimate." His only object in taking possession of the country was "to save from destruction the lives and property of the foreign residents and citizens of the territory who had invoked his protection." In view of Pico's humane circular and the uniform kind treatment that the Californians accorded the American residents, there was very little need of Stockton's interference on that score.

Commodore Sloat did not approve of Stockton's proclamation or his policy.

On the 6th of August Stockton reached San Pedro and landed 360 sailors and marines. These were drilled in military movements on land and prepared for the march to Los Angeles.

Castro sent two commissioners—Pablo de La Guerra and José M. Flores—to Stockton, asking for a conference and a cessation of hostilities while negotiations were pending. They asked that the United States forces remain at San Pedro while the terms of the treaty were under discussion. These requests Commodore Stockton peremptorily refused and the commissioners returned to Los Angeles without stating the terms on which they proposed to treat.

In several so-called histories, I find a very dramatic account of this interview. "On the arrival of the commissioners they were marched up to the mouth of an immense mortar shrouded in skins save its huge aperture. Their terror and discomfort were plainly discernible. Stockton received them with a stern and forbidding countenance, harshly demanding their mission, which they disclosed in great confusion. They bore a letter from Castro proposing a truce, each party to hold its own possessions until a general pacification could be had. This proposal Stockton rejected with contempt, and dismissed the commissioners with the assurance that only an immediate disbandment of his forces and an unconditional surrender would shield Castro from the vengeance of an incensed foe. The messengers remounted their horses in dismay and fled back to Castro." The mortar story, it is needless to say, is a pure fabrication, yet it runs through a number of so-called histories of California. Castro, on the 9th of August, held a council of war with his officers at the Campo en La Mesa. He announced his intention of leaving the country for the purpose of reporting to the supreme government, and of returning at some future day to punish the usurpers. He wrote to Pico: "I can count on only 100 men, badly armed, worse supplied and discontented by reason of the miseries they suffer; so that I have reason to fear that not even these few men will fight when the necessity arises." And this is the force that some imaginative historians estimate at 800 to 1,000 men.

Pico and Castro left Los Angeles on the night of August 10 for Mexico; Castro going by the Colorado river route to Sonora, and Pico, after being concealed for a time by his brother-in-law, Juan Froster, at the Santa Margarita and narrowly escaping capture by Fremont's men, finally reached Lower California and later on crossed the gulf to Sonora.

Stockton began his march on Los Angeles, August 11. He took with him a battery of four guns. The guns were mounted on carretas, and each gun drawn by four oxen. He had with him a good brass band.

Major Fremont, who had been sent to San Diego with his battalion of 160 men, had, after considerable skirmishing among the ranchos, secured enough horses to move, and on the 8th of August had begun his march to join Stockton. He took with him 120 men, leaving about 40 to garrison San Diego.

Stockton consumed three days on the march. Fremont's troops joined him just south of the city, and at 4 P. M. of the 13th the combined force, numbering nearly 500 men, entered the town without opposition, "our entry," says Major Fremont, "having more the effect of a parade of home guards than of an enemy taking possession of a conquered town." Stockton reported finding at Castro's abandoned camp ten pieces of artillery, four of them spiked. Fremont says he (Castro) "had buried part of his guns." Castro's troops that he had brought down with him took their departure for their northern homes soon after their general left, breaking up into small squads as they advanced. The southern troops that Pico had recruited dispersed to their homes before the arrival of the Americans. Squads of Fremont's battalion were sent out to scour the country and bring in any of the Californian officers or leading men whom they could find. These, when found, were paroled. The American troops encamped on the flat near where the Southern Pacific Railroad now crosses the river.

Another of those historical myths like the mortar story named above, which is palmed off on credulous readers as genuine history, runs as follows: "Stockton, while en route from San Pedro to Los Angeles, was informed by a courier from Castro 'that if he marched upon the town he would find it the grave of himself and men.' 'Then,' answered the commodore, 'tell the general to have the bells ready to toll at eight o'clock, as I shall be there by that time.'" As Castro left Los Angeles the day before Stockton began his march from San Pedro, and when the commodore entered the city the Mexican general was probably 200 miles away, the bell tolling myth goes to join its kindred myths in the category of history, as it should not be written.

On the 17th of August, Stockton issued a second proclamation, in which he signs himself commander-in-chief and governor of the territory of California. It was milder in tone and more dignified than his first. He informed the people that their country now belonged to the United States. For the present it would be governed by martial law. They were invited to elect their local officers if those now in office refused to serve.

Four days after the capture of Los Angeles the "Warren," Capt. Hull commander, anchored at San Pedro. She brought official notice of the declaration of war between the United States and Mexico. Then for the first time Stockton learned that there had been an official declaration of war between the two countries. United States officers had waged war and taken possession of California upon the strength of a rumor that hostilities existed between the countries.

The conquest, if conquest it can be called, was accomplished without the loss of a life, if we except the two Americans, Fowler and Cowie, of the Bear Flag party, who were brutally murdered by a band of Californians under Padillo, and the equally brutal shooting of Beryessa and the two de Haro boys by the Americans at San Rafael. These three men were shot as spies, but there was no proof that they were such, and they were not tried. These murders occurred before Commodore Sloat raised the stars and stripes at Monterey.

CHAPTER XVII.

SIEGE OF LOS ANGELES.

WITH California in his possession and the official information that war had been declared by the United States against Mexico, Stockton set about organizing a government for the conquered territory. Fremont was to be appointed military governor. Detachments from his battalion were to be detailed to garrison towns, while Stockton, with what recruits he could gather in California and his sailors and marines, was to undertake a naval expedition against the west coast of Mexico, land his forces at Mazatlan or Acapulco and march overland to "shake hands with General Taylor at the gates of Mexico." Regarding the conquest of California as complete, Commodore Stockton appointed Capt. Gillespie military commandant of the southern department, with headquarters at Los Angeles, and assigned him a garrison of fifty men. He left Los Angeles for the north, September 2. Fremont, with the remainder of his battalion, took up his line of march for Monterey a few days later. Gillespie's orders were to place the city under martial law, but to remove the more burdensome restrictions to quiet and well-disposed citizens at his discretion, and a conciliatory policy in accordance with instructions of the secretary of the navy was to be adopted and the people were to be encouraged to "neutrality, self-government and friendship."

Nearly all historians who have written upon this subject lay the blame for the subsequent uprising of the Californians and their revolt against the rule of the military commandant, Gillespie, to his petty tyrannies. Col. J. J. Warner, in his Historical Sketch of Los Angeles County, says: "Gillespie attempted by a coercive system to effect a moral and social change in the habits, diversions and pastimes of the people and to reduce them to his standard of propriety." Warner was not an impartial judge. He had a grievance against Gillespie which embittered him against the captain. Gillespie may have been lacking in tact, and his schooling in the navy under the tyrannical régime of the quarter-deck of fifty years ago was not the best training to fit him for governing a people unused to strict government, but it is hardly probable that in two weeks' time he could enforce any "coercive system" looking toward an entire change in the moral and social habits of the people. Los Angeles, as we have learned in a previous chapter, was a hotbed of revolutions. It had a turbulent and restless element among its inhabitants that was never happier than when fomenting strife and conspiring to overthrow those in power. Of this class Colton, writing in 1846, says: "They drift about like Arabs. If the tide of fortune turns against them they disband and scatter to the four winds. They never become martyrs to any cause. They are too numerous to be brought to punishment by any of their governors and thus escape justice." There was a conservative class in the territory made up principally of the large landed proprietors, both native and foreign-born, but these exerted small influence in controlling the turbulent. While Los Angeles had a monopoly of this turbulent and revolutionary element other settlements in the territory furnished their full quota of that class of political knights errant, whose chief pastime was revolution, and whose capital consisted of a gaily caparisoned steed, a riata, a lance, a dagger and possibly a pair of horse pistols. These were the fellows whose "habits, diversions and pastimes" Gillespie undertook to reduce "to his standard of propriety."

That Commodore Stockton should have left Gillespie so small a garrison to hold the city and surrounding country in subjection shows that either he was ignorant of the character of the people, or that he placed too great reliance in the completeness of their subjection. With Castro's men in the city or dispersed among the neighboring ranchos, many of them still retaining their arms and all of them ready to rally at a moment's notice to the call of their leaders; with no reinforcements nearer than five hundred miles to come to the aid of Gillespie in case of an uprising, it was foolhardiness in Stockton to entrust the holding of the most important place in California to a mere handful of men, half disciplined and poorly equipped, without fortifications for defense or supplies to hold out in case of a siege.

Scarcely had Stockton and Fremont, with their men, left the city before trouble began. The turbulent element of the city fomented strife and seized every occasion to annoy and harass the military commandant and his men. While his "petty tyrannies" so called, which were probably nothing more than the enforcement of martial law, may have been somewhat provocative, the real cause was more deep-seated. The Californians, without provocation on their part and without really knowing the cause why, found their country invaded, their property taken from them and their government in the hands of an alien race, foreign to them in customs and religion. They would have been a tame and spiritless people, indeed, had they neglected the opportunity that Stockton's blundering gave them to regain their liberties. They did not waste much time. Within two weeks from the time Stockton sailed from San Pedro hostilities had begun and the city was in a state of siege.

Gillespie, writing in the Sacramento Statesman in 1858, thus describes the first attack: "On the 22d of September, at three o'clock in the morning, a party of sixty-five Californians and Sonoreños made an attack upon my small command quartered in the government house. We were not wholly surprised, and with twenty-one rifles we beat them back without loss to ourselves, killing and wounding three of their number. When daylight came Lieut. Hensley, with a few men, took several prisoners and drove the Californians from the town. This party was merely the nucleus of a revolution commenced and known to Colonel Fremont before he left Los Angeles. In twenty-four hours 600 well-mounted horsemen, and armed with escopetas (shotguns), lances and one fine brass piece of light artillery, surrounded Los Angeles and summoned me to surrender. There were three old honeycombed iron guns (spiked) in the corral of my quarters, which we at once cleared and mounted upon the axles of carts."

Serbulo Varela, a young man of some ability, but of a turbulent and reckless character, had been the leader at first, but as the uprising assumed the character of a revolution, Castro's old officers came to the front. Capt. José Maria Flores was chosen as comandante-general; José Antonio Carrillo, major-general; and Andres Pico, comandante de escuadron. The main camp of the insurgents was located on the mesa, east of the river, at a place called Paredon Blanco (White Bluff), near the present residence of Mrs. Hollenbeck.

On the 24th of September, from the camp at White Bluff, was issued the famous Pronunciamiento de Barelás y otros Californios contra Los Americanos (The Proclamation of Barelás and other Californians against the Americans). It was signed by Serbulo Varela (spelled Barelás), Leonardo Cota and over three hundred others. Although this proclamation is generally credited to Florés, there is no evidence to show that he had anything to do with framing it. He promulgated it over his signature October 1. It is probable that it was written by Varela and Cota. It has been the custom of American writers to sneer at this production as florid and bombastic. In fiery invective and fierce denunciation it is the equal of Patrick Henry's famous "Give me liberty or give me death!" Its recital of wrongs is brief, but to the point: "And shall we be capable of permitting ourselves to be subjugated and to accept in silence the heavy chains of slavery? Shall we lose the soil inherited from our fathers, which cost them so much blood? Shall we leave our families victims of the most barbarous servitude? Shall we wait to see our wives outraged, our innocent children beaten by American whips, our property sacked, our temples profaned—to drag out a life full of shame and disgrace? No! a thousand times no! Compatriots, death rather than that! Who of you does not feel his heart beat and his blood boil on contemplating our situation? Who will be the Mexican that will not be indignant and rise in arms to destroy our oppressors? We believe there will be not one so vile and cowardly!"

Gillespie had left the government house (located on what is now the site of the St. Charles Hotel) and taken a position on Fort Hill, where he had erected a temporary barricade of sacks filled with earth and had mounted his cannon there. The Americans had been summoned to surrender, but had refused. They were besieged by the Californians. There was but little firing between the combatants—an occasional sortie and a volley of rifle balls by the Americans when the Californians approached too near. The Californians were well mounted, but poorly armed, their weapons being principally muskets, shotguns, pistols, lances and riatas; while the Americans were armed with long range rifles, of which the Californians had a wholesome dread. The fear of these arms and his cannon doubtless saved Gillespie and his men from capture.

On the 24th Gillespie dispatched a messenger to find Stockton at Monterey, or at San Francisco if he had left Monterey, and apprise him of the perilous situation of the Americans at Los Angeles. Gillespie's dispatch bearer, John Brown, better known by his Californian nickname, Juan Flaco or Lean John, made one of the most wonderful rides in history. Gillespie furnished Juan Flaco with a package of cigarettes, the paper of each bearing the inscription, "Believe the bearer;" these were stamped with Gillespie's seal. Brown started from Los Angeles at 8 P. M., September 24, and claimed to have reached Yerba Buena at 8 P. M. of the 28th, a ride of 630 miles in four days. This is incorrect. Colton, who was alcalde of Monterey at that time, notes Brown's arrival at that place on the evening of the 29th. Colton, in his "Three Years in California," says that Brown rode the whole distance (Los Angeles to Monterey) of 460 miles in fifty-two hours, during which time he had not slept. His intelligence was for Commodore Stockton, and, in the nature of the case, was not committed to paper, except a few words rolled in a cigar fastened in his hair. But the Commodore had sailed for San Francisco, and it was necessary he should go 140 miles further. He was quite exhausted and was allowed to sleep three hours. Before day he was up and away on his journey. Gillespie, in a letter published in the Los Angeles Star, May 28, 1858, describing Juan Flaco's ride, says: "Before sunrise of the 29th he was lying in the bushes at San Francisco, in front of the Congress frigate, waiting for the early market boat to come on shore, and he delivered my dispatches to Commodore Stockton before 7 o'clock."

In trying to steal through the picket line of the Mexicans at Los Angeles he was discovered and pursued by a squad of them. A hot race ensued. Finding the enemy gaining on him he forced his horse to leap a wide ravine. A shot from one of his pursuers mortally wounded his horse, which after running a short distance fell dead. Flaco, carrying his spurs and riata, made his way on foot in the darkness to Los Virgines, a distance of twenty-seven miles. Here he secured another mount and again set off on his perilous journey. The trail over which Flaco held his way was not like "the road from Winchester town, a good, broad highway leading down," but instead a camino de heradura—a bridle path—now winding up through rocky cañons, skirting along the edge of precipitous cliffs, then zigzagging down chaparral-covered mountains; now over the sands of the sea beach and again across long stretches of brown mesa, winding through narrow valleys and out onto the rolling hills—a trail as nature made it unchanged by the hand of man. Such was the highway over which Flaco's steeds "stretched away with utmost speed." Harassed and pursued by the enemy, facing death night and day, with scarcely a stop or a stay to eat or sleep, Juan Flaco rode 600 miles.

"Of all the rides since the birth of time,
Told in story or sung in rhyme,
The fleetest ride that ever was sped," was Juan Flaco's ride from Los Angeles to San Francisco. Longfellow has immortalized the "Ride of Paul Revere," Robert Browning tells in stirring verse of the riders who brought the good news from Ghent to Aix, and Buchanan Read thrills us with the heroic measures of Sheridan's Ride. No poet has sung of Juan Flaco's wonderful ride, fleeter, longer and more perilous than any of these. Flaco rode 600 miles through the enemy's country, to bring aid to a besieged garrison, while Revere and Jorris and Sheridan were in the country of friends or protected by an army from enemies.

Gillespie's situation was growing more and more desperate each day. B. D. Wilson, who with a company of riflemen had been on an expedition against the Indians, had been ordered by Gillespie to join him. They reached the Chino ranch, where a fight took place between them and the Californians. Wilson's men being out of ammunition were compelled to surrender. In the charge upon the adobe, where Wilson and his men had taken refuge, Carlos Ballestaros had been killed and several Californians wounded. This and Gillespie's stubborn resistance had embittered the Californians against him and his men. The Chino prisoners had been saved from massacre after their surrender by the firmness and bravery of Varela. If Gillespie continued to hold the town his obstinacy might bring down the vengeance of the Californians not only upon him and his men, but upon many of the American residents of the south, who had favored their countrymen.

Finally Florés issued his ultimatum to the Americans—surrender within twenty-four hours or take the consequence of an onslaught by the Californians, which might result in the massacre of the entire garrison. In the meantime he kept his cavalry deployed on the hills, completely investing the Americans. Despairing of assistance from Stockton, on the advice of Wilson, who had been permitted by Flores to intercede with Gillespie, articles of capitulation were drawn up and signed by Gillespie and the leaders of the Californians. On the 30th of September the Americans marched out of the city with all the honors of war—drums beating, colors flying and two pieces of artillery mounted on carts drawn by oxen. They arrived at San Pedro without molestation, and four or five days later embarked on the merchant ship Vandalia, which remained at anchor in the bay. Gillespie in his march was accompanied by a few of the American residents and probably a dozen of the Chino prisoners, who had been exchanged for the same number of Californians, whom he had held under arrest most likely as hostages.

Gillespie took two cannon with him when he evacuated the city and left two spiked and broken on Fort Hill. There seems to have been a proviso in the articles of capitulation requiring him to deliver the guns to Florés on reaching the embarcadero. If there was such a stipulation Gillespie violated it. He spiked the guns, broke off the trunnions and rolled one of them into the bay.

CHAPTER XVIII.

BATTLE OF DOMINGUEZ RANCH—FLORES GOVERNOR.

OF THE notable events occurring during the conquest of California there are few others of which there are so contradictory accounts as of that known as the battle of Dominguez ranch. Capt. William Mervine, who commanded the American forces in the fight, made no official report, or if he did it was not published. Historians, in their accounts of the battle, have collected their data from hearsay and not from written reports of officers engaged in it. In regard to the number engaged and the number killed and wounded, even Bancroft, usually the most reliable of California historians, has no accurate report. The number engaged on the American side varies with different authors from 250 to 400; and the number killed from four to fifteen. It has been my good fortune, through the kindness of Dr. J. E. Cowles of this city, to obtain a log book of the U. S. frigate Savannah, kept by his uncle, Robert C. Duvall, who was an officer on that vessel. Midshipman and Acting Lieut. Duvall had command of a company of Colt's Riflemen in the battle. After his return to the ship he wrote a full, clear and accurate report of the march, battle and retreat. I transcribe the greater portion of his account. It is undoubtedly the best report of that affair in existence. It will be recollected, as stated in a previous chapter, that Lieut. Gillespie had been left by Commodore Stockton with a force of fifty men to garrison Los Angeles. An insurrection, headed by Flores and Valera, broke out. After a siege of five or six days Gillespie and his men evacuated the city and retreated to San Pedro. Lieut. Gillespie, during the siege, sent a messenger to Stockton at San Francisco asking for reinforcements. Juan Flaco, the courier, reached San Francisco after a ride of 600 miles in five days. Commodore Stockton received the dispatches, or rather the message, of Gillespie's courier on the 30th of September. Early on the morning of October 1 the "Savannah," Capt. William Mervine, was ordered to get under way for San Pedro with a force to relieve Capt. Gillespie.

"At 9:30 A. M.," says Lieut. Duvall, "we commenced working out of the harbor of San Francisco on the ebb tide. The ship anchored at Saucelito, where, on account of a dense fog, it remained until the 4th, when it put to sea. On the 7th the ship entered the harbor of San Pedro. At 6:30 P. M., as we were standing in for anchorage, we made out the American merchant ship Vandalia, having on her decks a body of men. On passing she saluted with two guns, which was repeated with three cheers, which we returned. * * * Brevet Capt. Archibald Gillespie came on board and reported that he had evacuated the Pueblo de Los Angeles on account of the overpowering force of the enemy and had retired with his men on board the "Vandalia" after having spiked his guns, one of which he threw into the water. He also reported that the whole of California below the pueblo had risen in arms against our authorities, headed by Flores, a Mexican captain on furlough in this country, who had but a few days ago given his parole of honor not to take up arms against the United States. We made preparations to land a force to march to the pueblo at daylight.

"October 8 (1846), at 6 A. M., all the boats left the ship for the purpose of landing the forces, numbering in all 299 men, including the volunteers, under command of Capt. Gillespie. At 6:30 all were landed without opposition, the enemy in small detachments retreating toward the pueblo. From their movements we apprehended that their whole force was near. Capt. Mervine sent on board ship for a reinforcement of eighty men, under command of Lieut. R. B. Hitchcock. At 8 A. M. the several companies, all under command of Capt. William Mervine, took up the line of march for the purpose of retaking the pueblo. The enemy retreated as our forces advanced. (On landing, William A. Smith, first cabin boy, was killed by the accidental discharge of a Colt's pistol.) The reinforcements under the command of Lieut. R. B. Hitchcock returned on board ship. For the first four miles our march was through hills and ravines, which the enemy might have taken advantage of, but preferred to occupy as spectators only, until our approach. A few shots from our flankers (who were the volunteer riflemen) would start them off; they returning the compliment before going. The remainder of our march was performed over a continuous plain overgrown with wild mustard, rising in places to six or eight feet in height. The ground was excessively dry, the clouds of dust were suffocating and there was not a breath of wind in motion. There was no water on our line of march for ten or twelve miles and we suffered greatly from thirst.

"At 2:30 P. M. we reached our camping ground. The enemy appeared in considerable numbers. Their numbers continued to increase until towards sundown, when they formed on a hill near us, gradually inclining towards our camp. They were admirably formed for a cavalry charge. We drew up our forces to meet them, but finding they were disposed to remain stationary, the marines, under command of Capt. Marston, the Colt's riflemen, under command of Lieut. I. B. Carter and myself, and the volunteers, under command of Capt. A. Gillespie, were ordered to charge on them, which we did. They stood their ground until our shots commenced 'telling' on them, when they took to flight in every direction. They continued to annoy us by firing into our camp through the night. About 2 A. M. they brought a piece of artillery and fired into our camp, the shot striking the ground near us. The marines, riflemen and volunteers were sent in pursuit of the gun, but could see or hear nothing of it.

"We left our camp the next morning at 6 o'clock. Our plan of march was in column by platoon. We had not proceeded far before the enemy appeared before us drawn up on each side of the road, mounted on fine horses, each man armed with a lance and carbine. They also had a field piece (a four-pounder), to which were hitched eight or ten horses, placed on the road ahead of us.

"Capt. Mervine, thinking it was the enemy's intention to throw us into confusion by using their gun on us loaded with round shot and copper grape shot and then charge us with their cavalry, ordered us to form a square—which was the order of march throughout the battle. When within about four hundred yards of them the enemy opened on us with their artillery. We made frequent charges, driving them before us, and at one time causing them to leave some of their cannon balls and cartridges; but owing to the rapidity with which they could carry off the gun, using their lassos on every part, enabled them to choose their own distance, entirely out of all range of our muskets. Their horsemen kept out of danger, apparently content to let the gun do the fighting. They kept up a constant fire with their carbines, but these did no harm. The enemy numbered between 175 and 200 strong.

"Finding it impossible to capture the gun, the retreat was sounded. The captain consulted with his officers on the best steps to be taken. It was decided unanimously to return on board ship. To continue the march would sacrifice a number of lives to no purpose, for, admitting we could have reached the pueblo, all communications would be cut off with the ship, and we would further be constantly annoyed by their artillery without the least chance of capturing it. It was reported that the enemy were between five and six hundred strong at the city and it was thought he had more artillery. On retreating they got the gun planted on a hill ahead of us.

"The captain made us an address, saying to the troops that it was his intention to march straight ahead in the same orderly manner in which we had advanced, and that sooner than he would surrender to such an enemy, he would sacrifice himself and every other man in his command. The enemy fired into us four times on the retreat, the fourth shot falling short, the report of the gun indicating a small quantity of powder, after which they remained stationary and manifested no further disposition to molest us. We proceeded quietly on our march to the landing, where we found a body of men under command of Lieut. Hitchcock with two nine-pounder cannon got from the Vandalia to render us assistance in case we should need it.

"We presented truly a pitiable condition, many being barely able to drag one foot after the other from excessive fatigue, having gone through the exertions and excitement in battle and afterwards performing a march of eighteen or twenty miles without rest.

"This is the first battle I have ever been engaged in, and, having taken particular notice of those around me, I can assert that no men could have acted more bravely. Even when their shipmates were falling by their sides, I saw but one impulse and that was to push forward, and when the retreat was ordered I noticed a general reluctance to turn their backs to the enemy.

"The following is a list of the killed and wounded:

"Michael Hoey (ordinary seaman), killed; David Johnson (o. s.), killed; Wm. H. Berry (o. s.), mortally wounded; Charles Sommers (musician), mortally wounded; John Tyre (seaman), severely wounded; John Anderson (seaman), severely wounded; recovery doubtful. The following-named were slightly wounded: William Conland (marine); Hiram Rockvill (mar.); H. Linland (mar.); James Smith (mar.).

"On the following morning we buried the bodies of William A. Smith, Charles Sommers, David Johnson and Michael Hoey on an island in the harbor.

"At 11 A. M. the captain called a council of commissioned officers regarding the proper course to adopt in the present crisis, which decided that no force should be landed, and that the ship remain here until further orders from the commodore, who is daily expected."

Entry in the log for Sunday, 11th: "William H. Berry (ordinary seaman) departed this life from the effect of wounds received in battle. Sent his body for interment to Dead Man's Island, so named by us. Mustered the command at quarters, after which performed divine service."

From this account it will be seen that the number killed and died of wounds received in battle was four; number wounded, six; and one accidentally killed before the battle. On October 22 Henry Lewis died and was buried on the island. Lewis' name does not appear in the list of the wounded. It is presumable that he died of disease. Six of the crew of the Savannah were buried on Dead Man's Island, four of whom were killed in battle. Lieut. Duvall gives the following list of the officers in the "Expedition on the march to retake Pueblo de Los Angeles":

Capt. William Mervine, commanding.
 Capt. Ward Marston, commanding marines.
 Brevet Capt. A. H. Gillespie, commanding volunteers.
 Lieut. Henry W. Queen, adjutant.
 Lieut. B. F. Pinckney, commanding first company.
 Lieut. W. Rinckindoff, commanding second company.
 Lieut. I. B. Carter, Colt's riflemen.
 Midshipman R. D. Minor, acting lieutenant second company.
 Midshipman S. P. Griffin, acting lieutenant first company.
 Midshipman P. G. Walmough, acting lieutenant second company.
 Midshipman R. C. Duvall, acting lieutenant Colt's riflemen.
 Capt. Clark and Capt. Goodsall, commanding pikemen.
 Lieut. Hensley, first lieutenant volunteers.
 Lieut. Russeau, second lieutenant volunteers.

The piece of artillery that did such deadly execution on the Americans was the famous Old Woman's gun. It was a bronze four-pounder, or pedréro (swivel-gun) that for a number of years has stood on the plaza in front of the church, and was used for firing salutes on feast days and other occasions.

When on the approach of Stockton's and Fremont's forces Castro abandoned his artillery and fled, an old lady, Doña Clara Cota de Reyes, declared that the gringos should not have the church's gun; so, with the assistance of her daughters, she buried it in a cane patch near her residence, which stood on the east side of Alameda street, near First.

When the Californians revolted against Gillespie's rule the gun was unearthed and used against him. The Historical Society of Southern California has in its possession a brass grape-shot, one of a charge that was fired into the face of Fort Hill at Gillespie's men when they were posted on the hill. This old gun was in the exhibit of trophies at the New Orleans Exposition in 1885. The label on it read: "Trophy 53, No. 63, Class 7. Used by Mexico against the United States at the battle of Dominguez' Ranch, October 9, 1846; at San Gabriel and the Mesa, January 8 and 9, 1847; used by the United States forces against Mexico at Mazatlan, November 11, 1847; Urios (crew all killed or wounded), Palos Prietos, December 13, 1847, and Lower California, at San José, February 15, 1848." It should be obtained from the government and brought back to Los Angeles. Before the battle the old gun had been mounted on forward axle of a Jersey wagon, which a man by the name of Hunt had brought across the plains the year before. It was lashed to the axle by means of rawhide thongs, and was drawn by riatas, as described by Lieut. Duvall. The range was obtained by raising or lowering the pole of the wagon. Ignacio Aguilar acted as gunner, and having neither lanyard or pent-stock to fire it, he touched off the gun with the lighted end of a cigarette. Never before or since, perhaps, was a battle won with such crude artillery. José Antonio Carrillo was in command of the Californians. During the skirmishing of the first day he had between 80 and 90 men. During the night of the 8th Flores joined him with a force of 60 men. Next morning Flores returned to Los Angeles, taking with him 20 men. Carrillo's force in the battle numbered about 120 men.

Had Mervine known that the Californians had fired their last shot—their powder being exhausted—he could have pushed on and captured the pueblo.

The expulsion of Gillespie's garrison from Los Angeles and the defeat of Mervine's force raised the spirits of the Californians, and there was great rejoicing at the pueblo. Detachments of Flores' army were kept at Sepulvedo's Rancho, the Palos Verdes, and at Temple's Rancho of the Cerritos, to watch the Savannah and report any attempt at landing. The leaders of the revolt were not so sanguine of success as the rank and file. They were without means to procure arms and supplies. There was a scarcity of ammunition, too. An inferior article of gunpowder was manufactured in limited quantities at San Gabriel. The only uniformity in weapons was in lances. These were rough, home-made affairs, the blade beaten out of a rasp or file, and the shaft a willow pole about eight feet long. These weapons were formidable in a charge against infantry, but easily parried by a swordsman in a cavalry charge.

After the defeat of Mervine, Flores set about reorganizing the territorial government. He called together the departmental assembly. It met in the capital (Los Angeles) October 26th. The members present—Figueroa, Botello, Guerra and Olvera—were all from the south. The assembly decided to fill the place of governor, vacated by Pico, and that of comandante-general, left vacant by the flight of Castro.

José Maria Flores, who was now recognized as the leader of the revolt against American rule, was chosen to fill both offices, and the two offices, as had formerly been the custom, were united in one person. He chose Narciso Botello for his secretary. Flores, who was Mexican born, was an intelligent and patriotic officer. He used every means in his power to prepare his forces for the coming conflict with the Americans, but with little success. The old jealousy of the hijos del pais against the Mexican would crop out, and it neutralized his efforts. There were bickerings and complaints in the ranks and among the officers. The natives claimed that a Californian ought to be chief in command.

The feeling of jealousy against Flores at length culminated in open revolt. Flores had decided to send the prisoners taken at the Chino fight to Mexico. His object was twofold—first, to enhance his own glory with the Mexican government, and, secondly, by showing what the Californians had already accomplished to obtain aid in the coming conflict. As most of these men were married to California wives, and by marriage related to many of the leading California families of the south, there was at once a family uproar and fierce denunciations of Flores. But as the Chino prisoners were foreigners, and had been taken while fighting against the Mexican government, it was necessary to disguise the hostility to Flores under some other pretext. He was charged with the design of running away to Sonora with the public funds. On the night of December 3, Francisco Rico, at the head of a party of Californians, took possession of the cuartél, or guard-house, and arrested Flores. A special session of the assembly was called to investigate the charges.

Flores expressed his willingness to give up his purpose of sending the Chino prisoners to Mexico, and the assembly found no foundation to the charge of his design of running away with the public funds, nor did they find any funds to run away with. Flores was liberated, and Rico imprisoned in turn.

Flores was really the last Mexican governor of California. Like Pico, he was elected by the territorial legislature, but he was not confirmed by the Mexican congress. Generals Scott and Taylor were keeping President Santa Anna and his congress on the move so rapidly they had no time to spare for California affairs.

Flores was governor from October 26, 1846, to January 8, 1847.

CHAPTER XIX.

THE SECOND CONQUEST OF CALIFORNIA.

STOCKTON with his flag ship, the Congress, arrived at San Pedro on the 23d of October, 1846. The Savannah was still lying at anchor in the harbor. The commodore had now at San Pedro a force of about 800 men; but notwithstanding the contemptuous opinion he held of the Californian soldiers, he did not march against the pueblo. Stockton in his report says: "Elated by this transient success (Mervine's defeat), which the enemy with his usual want of veracity magnified into a great victory, they collected in large bodies on all the adjacent hills and would not permit a hoof except their own horses to be within fifty miles of San Pedro." But "in the face of their boasting insolence" Stockton landed and again hoisted "the glorious stars in the presence of their horse-covered hills." "The enemy had driven off every animal, man and beast, from that section of the country; and it was not possible by any means in our power to carry provisions for our march to the city." The city was only 30 miles away and American soldiers have been known to carry rations in their haversacks for a march of 100 miles. The "transient success" of the insolent enemy had evidently made an impression on Stockton. He estimated the Californian force in the vicinity of the landing at 800 men, which was just about 700 too high. He determined to approach Los Angeles by way of San Diego, and on the last day of October he sailed for that port. B. D. Wilson, Stephen C. Foster and others attribute Stockton's abandonment of an attack on Los Angeles from San Pedro to a trick played on him by José Antonio Carrillo. Carrillo was in command of a detachment stationed at the Ceritos and the Palos Verdes. Carrillo was anxious to obtain an interview with Stockton and if possible secure a cessation of hostilities until the war then progressing in Mexico should be decided, thus settling the fate of California.

B. D. Wilson, one of the Chino prisoners, was sent with a Mexican sergeant to raise a white flag as the boats of the Congress approached the landing and present Carrillo's proposition for a truce. Carrillo, with the intention of giving Stockton an exaggerated idea of the number of his troops and thus obtaining more favorable terms in the proposed treaty, collected droves of wild horses from the plains; these his caballeros kept in motion passing and repassing through a gap in the hills, which was in plain view from Stockton's vessel. Owing to the dust raised by the cavalcade it was impossible to discover that most of the horses were riderless. The troops were signaled to return to the vessel, and the commodore shortly afterward sailed to San Diego. Carrillo always regretted that he made too much demonstration.

As an illustration of the literary trash that has been palmed off for California history, I give an extract from Frost's Pictorial History of California, a book written the year after the close of the Mexican war, by Prof. John Frost, a noted compiler of histories, who writes LL. D after his name. It relates to Stockton's exploits at San Pedro: "At the Rancho Sepulvida (The Palos Verdes) a large force of Californians were posted. Commodore Stockton sent one hundred men forward to receive the fire of the enemy and then fall back on the main body without returning it. The main body of Stockton's army was formed in a triangle with the guns hid by the men. By the retreat of the advance party the enemy were decoyed close to the main force, when the wings (of the triangle) were extended and a deadly fire from the artillery opened upon the astonished Californians. More than one hundred were killed, the same number wounded and one hundred prisoners taken." The mathematical accuracy of Stockton's artilleryists was truly astonishing. They killed a man for every one wounded and took a prisoner for every man they killed. As Flores' army never amounted to more than three hundred, if we are to believe Frost, Stockton had all the enemy "present or accounted for." This silly fabrication of Frost's runs through a number of so-called histories of California. Stockton was a brave man and a very energetic commander, but he would boast of his achievements, and his reports were unreliable.

Fremont, who had sailed for the south in the Sterling with 160 men to co-operate with Stockton against Los Angeles, learned from the Vandalia on its voyage northward of Mervine's defeat and also that no horses could be obtained in the south. He returned to Monterey and proceeded to recruit a force to move against Los Angeles by land from Monterey. His recruits were principally obtained from the recently arrived immigrants. Each man was furnished with a horse and was to receive $25 a month. A force of about 450 was obtained. Fremont, now raised to the rank of a lieutenant colonel, left Monterey, November 17, and rendezvoused at San Juan Bautista, where he remained to the 29th of the month organizing his battalion. On the 29th of November he began his march southward to co-operate with Stockton against Flores.

After the expulsion of Gillespie and his men from Los Angeles, detachments from Flores' army were sent to Santa Barbara and San Diego to recapture these places. At Santa Barbara Fremont had left nine men of his battalion under Lieut. Theodore Talbot to garrison the town. A demand was made on the garrison to surrender by Col. Garfias of Flores' army. Two hours were given the Americans to decide. Instead of surrendering they fell back into the hills, where they remained three or four days, hoping that reinforcements might be sent them from Monterey. Their only subsistence was the flesh of an old gray mare of Daniel Hill's that they captured, brought into camp and killed. They secured one of Micheltorena's soldiers who had remained in the country and was living in a cañon among the hills for a guide. He furnished them a horse to carry their blankets and conducted them through the mountains to the San Joaquin valley. Here the guide left them with the Indians, he returning to Santa Barbara. The Indians fed them on chia (wild flaxseed), mush and acorn bread. They traveled down the San Joaquin valley. On their journey they lived on the flesh of wild horses, 17 of which they killed. After many hardships they reached Monterey on the 8th of November, where they joined Fremont's battalion. Elijah Moulton of East Los Angeles is the only survivor of that heroic band. He has been a resident of Los Angeles for fifty-five years. I am indebted to him for the above account.

Captain Merritt, of Fremont's battalion, had been left at San Diego with 40 men to hold the town when the battalion marched north to co-operate with Stockton against Los Angeles. Immediately after Gillespie's retreat, Francisco Rico was sent with 50 men to capture the place. He was joined by recruits at San Diego. Merritt, being in no condition to stand a siege, took refuge on board the American whale ship Stonington, which was lying at anchor. After remaining on board the Stonington ten days, taking advantage of the laxity of discipline among the Californians, he stole a march on them, recapturing the town and one piece of their artillery. He sent Don Miguel de Pedrona, who was one of his allies, in a whale boat with four sailors to San Pedro to obtain supplies and assistance. Pedronera arrived at San Pedro on the 13th of October with Merritt's dispatches. Captain Mervine chartered the whale ship Magnolia, which was lying in the San Pedro harbor, and dispatched Lieut. Minor and Midshipmen Duvall and Morgan with 35 sailors and 15 of Gillespie's volunteers to reinforce Merritt. They reached San Diego on the 16th. The combined forces of Minor and Merritt, numbering about 90 men, put in the greater part of the next two weeks in dragging cannon from the old fort and mounting them at their barracks, which were located on the hill at the edge of the plain on the west side of the town, convenient to water. They succeeded in mounting six brass 9-pounders and building two bastions of adobes, taken from an old house. There was constant skirmishing between the hostile parties, but few fatalities. The Americans claimed to have killed three of the enemy, and one American was ambushed and killed.

The Californians kept well out of range, but prevented the Americans from obtaining supplies. Their provisions were nearly exhausted, and when reduced to almost the last extreme they made a successful foraging expedition and procured a supply of mutton. Midshipman Duvall thus describes the adventure: "We had with us an Indian (chief of a numerous tribe) who, from his knowledge of the country, we thought could avoid the enemy; and getting news of a number of sheep about thirty-five miles to the south on the coast, we determined to send him with his companion to drive them onto an island which at low tide connected with the mainland. In a few days a signal was made on the island, and the boats of the whale ship Stonington, stationed off the island, were sent to it. Our good old Indian had managed, through his cunning and by keeping concealed in ravines, to drive onto the island about 600 sheep, but his companion had been caught and killed by the enemy. I shall never forget his famished appearance, but pride in his Indian triumph could be seen playing in his dark eyes.

"For thirty or forty days we were constantly expecting, from the movements of the enemy, an attack, soldiers and officers sleeping on their arms and ready for action. About the 1st of November Commodore Stockton arrived, and, after landing Capt. Gillespie with his company and about 43 marines, he suddenly disappeared, leaving Lieut. Minor governor of the place and Capt. Gillespie commandant."*

Foraging continued, the whale ship Stonington, which had been impressed into the government service, being used to take parties down the coast, who made raids inland and brought back with them cattle and horses.

It was probably on one of these excursions that the flag-making episode occurred, of which there are more versions than Homer had birthplaces. The correct version of the story is as follows: A party had been sent under command of Lieut. Hensley to Juan Bandini's rancho in Lower California to bring up bands of cattle and horses. Bandini was an adherent of the American cause. He and his family returned with the cavalcade to San Diego. At their last camping place before reaching the town Hensley, in a conversation with Bandini, regretted they had no flag with them to display on their entry into the town. Señora Bandini volunteered to make one, which she did from red, white and blue dresses of her children. This flag, fastened to a staff, was carried at the head of the cavalcade when it made its triumphal entry into San Diego. The Mexican government confiscated Bandini's ranchos in Lower California on account of his friendship to the Americans during the war.

Skirmishing continued almost daily. José Antonio Carrillo was now in command of the Californians, their force numbering about 100 men. Commodore Stockton returned and decided to fortify. Midshipman Duvall, in the Log Book referred to in the previous chapter, thus describes the fort: "The commodore now commenced to fortify the hill which overlooked the town by building a fort constructed by placing 300 gallon casks full of sand close together. The inclosure was twenty by thirty yards. A bank of earth and small gravel was thrown up in front as high as the top of the casks and a ditch dug around on the outside. Inside a ball-proof vault or ketch was built out of plank and lined on the inside with adobes, on top of which a swivel was mounted. The entrance was guarded by a strong gate, with a drawbridge in front across the ditch or moat. The whole fortification was completed and the guns mounted on it in about three weeks. Our men working on the fort were on short allowance of beef and wheat, and for a time without bread, tea, sugar or coffee, many of them being destitute of shoes, but there were few complaints.

"About the first of December, information having been received that Gen. Kearny was at Warner's Pass, about 80 miles distant, with 100 dragoons on his march to San Diego, Commodore Stockton immediately sent an escort of 50 men under command of Capt. Gillespie, accompanied by Past Midshipmen Beale and Duncan, having with them one piece of artillery. They reached Gen. Kearny without molestation. On the march the combined force was surprised by about 93 Californians at San Pasqual, under command of Andrés Pico, who had been sent to that part of the country to drive off all the cattle and horses to prevent us from getting them. In the battle that ensued Gen. Kearny lost in killed Captains Johnston and Moore and Lieutenant Hammond and 15 dragoons. Seventeen dragoons were severely wounded. The enemy captured one piece of artillery. Gen. Kearny and Captains Gillespie and Gibson were severely wounded; also one of the engineer officers. Some of the dragoons have since died."

*Log Book of Acting Lieutenant Duvall.

* * * * *

"After the engagement, Gen. Kearny took position on a hill covered with large rocks. It was well suited for defense. Lieut. Godey, of Gillespie's volunteers, the night after the battle, escaped through the enemy's line of sentries and came in with a letter from Capt. Turner to the commodore. Whilst among the rocks, Past Midshipman Beale and Kit Carson managed, under cover of night, to pass out through the enemy's ranks, and after three days' and nights' hard marching through the mountains without water, succeeded in getting safely into San Diego, completely famished. Soon after arriving, Lieut. Beale fainted away, and for some days entirely lost his reason."

On the night of Beale's arrival, December 9, about 9 P. M., detachments of 200 sailors and marines from the Congress and Portsmouth, under the immediate command of Capt. Zeilin, assisted by Lieutenants Gray, Hunter, Renshaw, Parrish, Thompson and Tilghman, and Midshipmen Duvall and Morgan, each man carrying a blanket, three pounds of jerked beef and the same of hardtack, began their march to relieve Gen. Kearny. They marched all night and camped on a chaparral-covered mountain during the day. At 4 A. M. of the second night's march they reached Kearny's camp, surprising him. Godey, who had been sent ahead to inform Kearny that assistance was coming, had been captured by the enemy. Gen. Kearny had burnt and destroyed all his baggage and camp equipment, saddles, bridles, clothing, etc., preparatory to forcing his way through the enemy's line. Burdened with his wounded, it is doubtful whether he could have escaped. Midshipman Duvall says: "It would not be a hazard of opinion to say he would have been overpowered and compelled to surrender." The enemy disappeared on the arrival of reinforcements. The relief expedition, with Kearny's men, reached San Diego after two days' march.

A brief explanation of why Kearny was at San Pasqual may be necessary. In June, 1846, Gen. Stephen W. Kearny, commander of the army of the west, as his command was designated, left Fort Leavenworth with a force of regulars to take possession of New Mexico. The conquest of that territory was accomplished without a battle. Under orders from the war department Kearny began his march to California with a part of his force to co-operate with the naval forces there. October 6, near Socorro, N. M., he met Kit Carson with an escort of 15 men, en route from Los Angeles to Washington, bearing dispatches from Stockton, giving the report of the conquest of California. Kearny required Carson to turn back and act as his guide. Carson was very unwilling to do so, as he was within a few days' journey of his home and family, from whom he had been separated for nearly two years. He had been guide for Fremont on his exploring expedition. He, however, obeyed Kearny's orders.

General Kearny sent back about 300 of his men, taking with him 120. After a toilsome march by way of the Pima villages, Tucson, the Gila and across the Colorado desert, they reached the Indian village of San Pasqual, (about 40 miles from San Diego), where the battle was fought. It was the bloodiest battle of the conquest; Kearny's men, at daybreak, riding on broken-down mules and half-broken horses, in an irregular and disorderly line, charged the Californians. While the American line was stretched out over the plain Capt. Andrés Pico, who was in command, wheeled his column and charged the Americans. A fierce hand-to-hand fight ensued, the Californians using their lances and lariats, the Americans clubbed guns and sabers. Of Kearny's command 18 men were killed and 19 wounded; three of the wounded died. Only one, Capt. Abraham R. Johnston (a relative of the author's), was killed by a gunshot; all the others were lanced. The mules to one of the howitzers became unmanageable and ran into the enemy's lines. The driver was killed and the gun captured. One Californian was captured and several slightly wounded; none was killed. Less than half of Kearny's 160 men took part in the battle. His loss in killed and wounded was fifty per cent of those engaged. Dr. John S. Griffin, for many years a leading physician of Los Angeles, was the surgeon of the command.

The foraging expeditions in Lower California having been quite successful in bringing in cattle, horses and mules, Commodore Stockton hastened his preparation for marching against Los Angeles. The enemy obtained information of the projected movement and left for the pueblo.

"The Cyane having arrived," says Duvall, "our force was increased to about 600 men, most of whom, understanding the drill, performed the evolutions like regular soldiers. Everything being ready for our departure, the commodore left Capt. Montgomery and officers in command of the town, and on the 29th of December took up his line of march for Angeles. Gen. Kearny was second in command and having the immediate arrangement of the forces, reserving for himself the prerogative which his rank necessarily imposed upon him. Owing to the weak state of our oxen we had not crossed the dry bed of the river San Diego before they began breaking down, and the carts, which were 30 or 40 in number, had to be dragged by the men. The general urged on the commodore that it was useless to commence such a march as was before us with our present means of transportation, but the commodore insisted on performing at least one day's march even if we should have to return the next. We succeeded in reaching the valley of the Soledad that night by dragging our carts. Next day the commodore proposed to go six miles farther, which we accomplished, and then continued six miles farther. Having obtained some fresh oxen, by assisting the carts up hill, we made ten to twelve miles a day. At San Luis Rey we secured men, carts and oxen, and after that our day's marches ranged from 15 to 22 miles a day.

"The third day out from San Luis Rey a white flag was seen ahead, the bearer of which had a communication from Flores, signing himself 'Commander-in-Chief and Governor of California,' asking for a conference for the purpose of coming to terms, which would be alike 'honorable to both countries.' The commodore refused to answer him in writing, saying to the bearer of the truce that his answer was, 'he knew no such person as Governor Flores, that he himself was the only governor in California; that he knew a rebel by that name, a man who had given his parole of honor not to take up arms against the government of the United States, who, if the people of California now in arms against the forces of the United States would deliver up, he (Stockton) would treat with them on condition that they surrender their arms and retire peaceably to their homes and he would grant them, as citizens of the United States, protection from further molestation.' This the embassy refused to entertain, saying 'they would prefer to die with Flores than to surrender on such terms.'

* * * * *

"On the 8th of January, 1847, they met us on the banks of the river San Gabriel with between five and six hundred men mounted on good horses and armed with lances and carbines, having also four pieces of artillery planted on the heights about 350 yards distant from the river. Owing to circumstances which have occurred since the surrender of the enemy, I prefer not mentioning the particulars of this day's battle and also that of the day following, or of referring to individuals concerned in the successful management of our forces." (The circumstance to which Lieut. Duvall refers was undoubtedly the quarrel between Stockton and Kearny after the capture of Los Angeles.) "It is sufficient to say that on the 8th of January we succeeded in crossing the river and driving the enemy from the heights. Having resisted all their charges, dismounted one of their pieces and put them to flight in every direction, we encamped on the ground they had occupied during the fight.

"The next day the Californians met us on the Plains of the Mesa. For a time the fighting was carried on by both sides with artillery, but that proving too hot for them they concentrated their whole force in a line ahead of us, and at a given signal divided from the center and came down on us like a tornado, charging us on all sides at the same time; but they were effectually defeated and fled in every direction in the utmost confusion. Many of their horses were left dead on the field. Their loss in the two battles, as given by Andrés Pico, second in command, was 83 killed and wounded; our loss, three killed (one accidentally) and 15 or 20 wounded, none dangerously. The enemy abandoned two pieces of artillery in an Indian village near by."

I have given at considerable length Midshipman Duvall's account of Stockton's march from San Diego and of the two battles fought, not because it is the fullest account of those events, but because it is original historical matter—never having appeared in print before—and also because it is the observations of a participant written at the time the events occurred. In it the losses of the enemy are greatly exaggerated, but that was a fault of his superior officers as well. Commodore Stockton, in his official reports of the two battles, gives the enemy's loss in killed and wounded "between seventy and eighty." And Gen. Kearny, in his report of the battle of San Pasqual, claimed it as a victory, and states that the enemy left six dead on the field. The actual loss of the Californians in the two battles (San Gabriel River and La Mesa) was three killed and ten or twelve wounded.*

While the events recorded in this chapter were transpiring at San Diego and its vicinity, what was the state of affairs in the capital, Los Angeles? After the exultation and rejoicing over the expulsion of Gillespie's garrison, Mervine's defeat and the victory over Kearny at San Pasqual there came a reaction. Dissensions continued between the leaders. There was lack of arms and laxity of discipline. The army was but little better than a mob. Obedience to orders of a superior was foreign to the nature of a Californian. His wild, free life in the saddle made him impatient of all restraint. Then the impossibility of successful resistance against the Americans became more and more apparent as the final conflict approached. Fremont's army was moving down on the doomed city from the north and Stockton's was coming up from the south. Either one of these, in numbers, exceeded the force that Flores could bring into action; combined they would crush him out of existence. The Californian troops were greatly discouraged, and it was with great difficulty that the officers kept their men together. There was another and more potent element of disintegration. Many of the wealthier natives and all the foreigners, regarding the contest as hopeless, secretly favored the American cause, and it was only through fear of loss of property that they furnished Flores and his officers any supplies for the army.

*The killed were Ignacio Sepulveda, Francisco Rubio, and El Guaymeño, a Yaqui Indian.

During the latter part of December and the first days of January Flores' army was stationed at San Fernando Mission, on the lookout for Fremont's battalion; but the more rapid advance of Stockton's army compelled a change of base. On the 6th and 7th of January, Flores moved his army back secretly through the Caluenga Pass, and, passing to the southward of the city, took position where La Jabonéria (the soap factory) road crosses the San Gabriel river. Here his men were stationed in the thick willows to give Stockton a surprise. Stockton received information of the trap set for him, and after leaving the Los Coyotes swung off to the right until he struck the Upper Santa Ana road. The Californians had barely time to effect a change of base and get their cannon planted when the Americans arrived at the crossing.

Stockton called the engagement there the battle of the San Gabriel river; the Californians call it the battle of Paso de Bartolo, which is the better name. The place where the battle was fought is on the bluff just south of the Upper Santa Ana road, near where the Southern California Railroad crosses the Old San Gabriel river. (The ford or crossing was formerly known as Pico's Crossing.) There was, at the time of the battle, but one San Gabriel river. The new river channel was made in the great flood of 1868. What Stockton, Emory, Duvall and other American officers call the battle of the "Plains of the Mesa" the Californians call the battle of La Mesa, which is most decidedly a better name than the "Plains of the Plain." It was fought at a ravine, The Cañada de Los Alisos, near the southeastern corner of the city's boundary. In these battles the Californians had four pieces of artillery, two iron nine-pounders, the Old Woman's gun and the howitzer captured from Kearny. Their powder was very poor. It was made at San Gabriel. It was owing to this that they did so little execution in the fight. That the Californians escaped with so little punishment was probably due to the wretched marksmanship of Stockton's sailors and marines.

CHAPTER XX.

OCCUPATION OF LOS ANGELES—BUILDING OF FORT MOORE.

AFTER the battle of La Mesa, the Americans, keeping to the south, crossed the river at about the point where the south boundary line of the city crosses it, and encamped on the right bank. Here, under a willow tree, those killed in battle were buried. Lieut. Emory, in his "Notes of a Military Reconnoissance," says: "The town, known to contain great quantities of wine and aguardiente, was four miles distant (four miles from the battlefield). From previous experience of the difficulty of controlling men when entering towns, it was determined to cross the river San Fernando (Los Angeles), halt there for the night and enter the town in the morning, with the whole day before us.

"After we had pitched our camp, the enemy came down from the hills, and 400 horsemen with four pieces of artillery drew off towards the town, in order and regularity, whilst about sixty made a movement down the river on our rear and left flank. This led us to suppose they were not yet whipped, as we thought, and that we should have a night attack.

"January 10.—Just as we had raised our camp, a flag of truce borne by Mr. Celis, a Castilian, Mr. Workman, an Englishman, and Alvarado, the owner of the rancho at the Alisos, was brought into camp. They proposed, on behalf of the Californians, to surrender their dear City of the Angels, provided we would respect property and persons. This was agreed to, but not altogether trusting to the honesty of Gen. Flores, who had once broken his parole, we moved into the town in the same order we should have done if expecting an attack.

"It was a wise precaution, for the streets were full of desperate and drunken fellows, who brandished their arms and saluted us with every term of reproach. The crest, overlooking the town, in rifle range, was covered with horsemen engaged in the same hospitable manner.

"Our men marched steadily on, until crossing the ravine leading into the public square (plaza), when a fight took place amongst the Californians on the hill; one became disarmed, and to avoid death rolled down the hill towards us, his adversary pursuing and lancing him in the most cold-blooded manner. The man tumbling down the hill was supposed to be one of our vaqueros, and the cry of 'rescue him!' was raised. The crew of the Cyane, nearest the scene, at once and without any orders, halted and gave the man that was lancing him a volley; strange to say, he did not fall. The general gave the jack tars a cursing, not so much for the firing without orders, as for their bad marksmanship."

Shortly after the above episode, the Californians did open fire from the hill on the vaqueros in charge of the cattle. (These vaqueros were Californians in the employ of the Americans and were regarded by their countrymen as traitors.) A company of riflemen was ordered to clear the hill. A single volley effected this—killing two of the enemy. This was the last bloodshed in the war; and the second conquest of California was completed as the first had been by the capture of Los Angeles. Two hundred men, with two pieces of artillery, were stationed on the hill.

The Angeleños did not exactly welcome the invaders with "bloody hands to inhospitable graves," but they did their best to let them know they were not wanted. The better class of the native inhabitants closed their houses and took refuge with foreign residents or went to the ranchos of their friends in the country. The fellows of the baser sort, who were in possession of the city, exhausted their vocabularies of abuse on the invading gringos.

There was one paisano who excelled all his countrymen in this species of warfare. It is a pity his name has not been preserved in history with that of other famous scolds and kickers. He rode by the side of the advancing column up Main street, firing volleys of invectives and denunciation at the hated gringos. At certain points of his tirade he worked himself up to such a pitch of indignation that language failed him; then he would solemnly go through the motions of "make ready, take aim!" with an old shotgun he carried, but when it came to the order, "fire!" discretion got the better of his valor; he lowered his gun and began again, firing invective at the gringo soldiers; his mouth would go off if his gun would not.

Commodore Stockton's headquarters were in the Abila House, the second house on Olvera street, north of the plaza. The building is still standing, but has undergone many changes in fifty years. A rather amusing account was recently given me by an old pioneer of the manner in which Commodore Stockton got possession of the house. The widow Abila and her daughters, at the approach of the American army, had abandoned their home and taken refuge with Don Luis Vignes of the Aliso. Vignes was a Frenchman and friendly to both sides. The widow left a young Californian in charge of her house (which was finely furnished), with strict orders to keep it closed. Stockton had with him a fine brass band—something new in California. When the troops halted on the plaza, the band began to play. The boyish guardian of the Abila casa could not resist the temptation to open the door and look out. The enchanting music drew him to the plaza. Stockton and his staff, hunting for a place suitable for headquarters, passing by, found the door invitingly open, entered, and, finding the house deserted, took possession. The recreant guardian returned to find himself dispossessed and the house in possession of the enemy. "And the band played on."

THE BUILDING OF FORT MOORE.

It is a fact not generally known that there were two forts planned and partially built on Fort Hill during the war for the conquest of California. The first was planned by Lieut. William H. Emory, topographical engineer of Gen. Kearny's staff, and work begun on it by Commodore Stockton's sailors and marines. The second was planned by Lieut. J. W. Davidson, of the First United States Dragoons, and built by the Mormon Battalion. The first was not completed and not named. The second was named Fort Moore. Their location seems to have been identical. The first was designed to hold 100 men. The second was much larger. Flores' army was supposed to be in the neighborhood of the city ready to make a dash into it, so Stockton decided to fortify.

"On January 11," Lieut. Emory writes, "I was ordered to select a site and place a fort capable of containing a hundred men. With this in view a rapid reconnoissance of the town was made and the plan of a fort sketched, so placed as to enable a small garrison to command the town and the principal avenues to it. The plan was approved."

"January 12.—I laid off the work and before night broke the first ground. The population of the town and its dependencies is about 3,000; that of the town itself about 1,500. * * * Here all the revolutions have had their origin, and it is the point upon which any Mexican force from Sonora would be directed. It was therefore desirable to establish a fort which, in case of trouble, should enable a small garrison to hold out till aid might come from San Diego, San Francisco or Monterey, places which are destined to become centers of American settlements."

"January 13.—It rained steadily all day and nothing was done on the work. At night I worked on the details of the fort."

"January 15.—The details to work on the fort were by companies. I sent to Capt. Tilghman, who commanded on the hill, to detach one of the companies under his command to commence the work. He furnished, on the 16th, a company of artillery (seamen from the Congress) for the day's work, which they performed bravely, and gave me great hopes of success."

On the 14th of January, Fremont, with his battalion of 450 men, arrived from Cahuenga. There were then about 1,100 troops in the city, and the old ciudad put on military airs. On the 18th Kearny, having quarreled with Stockton about who should be governor of the conquered territory, left for San Diego, taking with him Lieut. Emory and the other members of his staff, and the dragoons. Emory was sent east by way of Panama with dispatches. Stockton appointed Col. Fremont governor, and Col. Russell, of the battalion, secretary of state of the newly acquired territory; and then took his departure to San Diego, where his ship, the Congress, was lying. The sailors and marines, on the 20th, took up their line of march for San Pedro to rejoin their ships, and work on the fort was abandoned.

Lieut. Emory says: "Subsequent to my leaving the Ciudad de Los Angeles, the entire plan of the fort was changed, and I am not the projector of the work finally adopted for defense of that town." So far as I know, no plan of the first fort exists. One company of Fremont's battalion was left in charge of the city; the command of the battalion was turned over to Capt. Owens, and the other companies marched to San Gabriel. Fremont, as governor, established his headquarters in the Bell block, corner of Aliso and Los Angeles streets, that being the finest building in the city. The quarrel for superiority between Stockton, Kearny, Mason and Fremont continued and waxed hotter. Kearny had removed to Monterey. Col. Cooke, with his Mormon battalion, having crossed the plains by the southern route, had arrived and been stationed at San Luis Rey. He was an adherent of Kearny's. On the 17th of March Cooke's Mormon battalion arrived in Los Angeles. Capt. Owens, in command of Fremont's battalion, had moved all the artillery—ten pieces—to the Mission San Gabriel.

Col. Cooke was placed in command of the southern district, Fremont's battalion was mustered out of service and the artillery brought back to Los Angeles.

On the 20th of April rumors reached Los Angeles that the Mexican general, Bustamente, was advancing on California with a force of 1,500 men. "Positive information," writes Col. Cooke, "has been received that the Mexican government has appropriated $600,000 towards fitting out this force." It was also reported that cannon and military stores had been landed at San Vicente, in Lower California, on the coast below San Diego. Rumors of an approaching army came thick and fast. War's wrinkled front once more affrighted the Angeleños, or rather, the gringo portion. The natives were supposed to be in league with Bustamente and to be preparing for an insurrection. Precautions were taken against a surprise. A troop of cavalry was sent to Warner's ranch to patrol the Soñora road as far as the desert. The construction of a fort on the hill fully commanding the town, which had previously been determined upon, was begun and a company of infantry posted on the hill.

On the 23d of April, three months after work had ceased on Emory's fort, the construction of the second fort was begun and pushed vigorously. Rumors continued to come of the approach of the enemy. On May 3, Col. Cooke writes: "A report was received through the most available sources of information that Gen. Bustamente had crossed the gulf near the head in boats of the pearl fishers, and at last information was at a rancho on the western road 70 leagues below San Diego." Col. Stevenson's regiment of New York volunteers had arrived in California, and two companies of the volunteers had been sent to Los Angeles. The report that Col. Cooke had received large reinforcements and that the place was being fortified, was supposed to have frightened Bustamente into abandoning the recapture of Los Angeles. Bustamente's invading army was largely the creation of somebody's fertile imagination. The scare, however, had the effect of hurrying up work on the fort.

On the 13th of May Col. Cooke resigned and Col. J. B. Stevenson succeeded him in command of the southern military district. Work on the fort still continued. As the fort approached completion, Col. Stevenson was exercised about a suitable flagstaff—there was no tall timber in the vicinity of Los Angeles. The colonel wanted a flagstaff that would be an honor to his field works and that would float the old flag where it could be seen of "all men," and women, too. Nothing less than a pole 150 feet high would do.

A native Californian, named Juan Ramirez, was found, who claimed to have seen some trees in the San Bernardino Mountains that were mucho alto—very tall—just what was needed for a flagstaff. A contract was made with him to bring in the timber. The mountain Indians were hostile, or rather, they were horse thieves. The rancheros killed them on sight, like so many rattlesnakes. An escort of ten soldiers from the Mormon battalion, under command of a lieutenant, was sent along with Juan to protect him and his workmen. Ramirez, with a small army of Indian laborers and a number of Mexican carts, set out for the headwaters of Mill Creek in the San Bernardino Mountains. Time passed; the colonel was becoming uneasy over the long absence of the flagstaff hunters. He had not yet become accustomed to the easy-going, poco tiempo ways of the native Californians. One afternoon a cloud of dust was seen out on the mission road. From out the cloud came the most unearthly shriekings, groanings and wailings. At first it was surmised that it might be the fag end of Bustamente's army of invasion that had gotten away from its base of supplies, or possibly the return of a Mexican revolution that had been lost on the plains years ago. As the cloud crossed the river into the Aliso road, Juan Ramirez' cavalcade and its Mormon escort emerged from it. They had two tree trunks, one about 90 feet and the other 75 or 80 feet long, mounted on the axles of about a dozen old carretas, each trunk hauled by twenty yoke of oxen, and an Indian driver to each ox (Indians were plentiful in those days). Each wooden wheel of the carts was sending forth its agonizing shrieks for axle grease in a different key from its fellows. Each Indian driver was exhausting his vocabulary of invective on his especial ox, and punctuating his profanity by vicious punches with the goad in the poor ox's ribs. The Indian was a cruel driver. The Mormons of the escort were singing one of their interminable songs of Zion—a psalm of deliverance from the hands of the Philistines. They had had a fight with the Indians, killed three of the hostiles and had the ears of their victims strung upon a string.

Never before or since, in the history of the flag, did such a queer concourse combine to procure a staff to float Old Glory.

The carpenters among the volunteers spliced the two pieces of timber together and soon fashioned a beautiful flagstaff a hundred and fifty feet in length. The pole was raised near what is now the southeast corner of North Broadway and Fort Moore Place. By the first of July work had so far progressed on the fort that Col. Stevenson decided to dedicate and name it on the 4th. He issued an official order for the celebration of the anniversary of the birthday of American Independence at this port, as he called Los Angeles. The following is a synopsis of the order: "At sunrise a Federal salute will be fired from the field work on the hill, which commands this town, and for the first time from this point the American standard will be displayed. At 10 o'clock every soldier at this post will be under arms. The detachment of the 7th Regiment, N. Y. Volunteers, and 1st Regiment, U. S. Dragoons (dismounted), will be marched to the field work on the hill, when, together with the Mormon battalion, the whole will be formed at 11 o'clock A. M. into a hollow square, when the Declaration of Independence will be read. At the close of this ceremony the field work will be dedicated and appropriately named; and at 12 o'clock a national salute will be fired. The field work at this post having been planned and the work conducted entirely by Lieut. Davidson of the First Dragoons, he is requested to hoist upon it for the first time, on the morning of the 4th, the American Standard. It is the custom of our country to confer on its fortifications the name of some distinguished individual who has rendered important services to his country either in the councils of the nation or on the battlefield. The commandant has therefore determined, unless the department of war shall otherwise direct, to confer upon the field work erected at the port of Los Angeles the name of one who was regarded by all who had the pleasure of his acquaintance as a perfect specimen of an American officer, and whose character for every virtue and accomplishment that adorns a gentleman was only equalled by the reputation he had acquired in the field for his gallantry as an officer and soldier, and his life was sacrificed in the conquest of this territory at the battle of San Pasqual. The commandant directs that from and after the 4th instant it shall bear the name of Moore."

Benjamin D. Moore, after whom the fort was named, was captain of Co. A, First U. S. Dragoons. He was killed by a lance thrust in the disastrous charge at San Pasqual. Capt. Stuart Taylor at this celebration read the Declaration of Independence in English, and Stephen C. Foster read it in Spanish. The native Californians seated on their horses in rear of the soldiers listened to Don Estevan as he rolled out in sonorous Spanish the Declaration's arraignment of King George III. and smiled. They had probably never heard of King George or the Declaration of Independence either, but they knew a pronunciamiento when they heard it, and after a pronunciamiento in their governmental system came a revolution—therefore they smiled at the prospect of a gringo revolution. The old fort was located along the easterly line of what is now North Broadway at its intersection with Fort Moore Place. It began near the northerly line of Dr. Wills' lot and extended southerly to the fourth lot south of Fort Moore Place, a length of over 400 feet. It was a breastwork with bastions and embrasures for cannon. The principal embrasure covered the church and plaza. It was built more for the suppression of a revolt than to resist an invasion. It was a strong position; two hundred men, about its capacity, could have defended it against one thousand if the attack came from the front, but it could easily have been outflanked.

In the rear of the fort a deep ravine ran diagonally from the cemetery to Spring street just south of Temple. The road to the cemetery led up this ravine and many an old Californian made his last journey in this world up cemetery ravine. It was known as the Cañada de Los Muertos (the cañon of the dead). The 4th of July, 1847, was a crackerless 4th. The American boy with his fireworks was not in evidence, and the native muchacho knew as little about firecrackers as he did about the 4th of July. The day's festivities ended with a fandango. The fandango was a universal leveler. Mormon and Mexican, native Californians and spruce shoulder-strapped Regulars met and mingled in the dance. The day ended without a casualty and at its close even the most recalcitrant paisano was constrained to shout Viva Los Estados Unidos! (Long live the United States.)

One of the historical fictions that appears in most of the "write ups" of this old fort is the statement that it was built by Fremont. There is absolutely no foundation for such a statement.

Emory's fort was begun before Fremont's battalion reached Los Angeles, and work ceased on it when Stockton's sailors and marines left the city. Davidson's fort was begun while the battalion was at San Gabriel, a short time before it was mustered out. Fremont left for Monterey shortly after the Mormon battalion began work on the redoubt; and when it was completed, or rather when work stopped on it, he had left California and was somewhere in the neighborhood of the Rocky mountains. Neither is there any foundation for the story that the fortification was begun by Micheltorena when Commodore Jones captured Monterey, October 19, 1842. It was not known in early times as Fremont's redoubt.

Another silly fiction that occasionally makes its appearance in newspapers and literary journals is the story that an old adobe building on Main near Fourteenth street was Fremont's headquarters when he was "military commander" of the territory. As I write there lies before me a copy of an illustrated eastern journal of extensive circulation, in which appears a cut of this ex-saloon and present Chinese wash house labeled "Fremont's Headquarters." Not long since a literary journal of our own city, in an editorial, urged upon the Historical Society and the Landmarks Club the necessity of preserving this valuable historical relic of Fremont's occupancy of Los Angeles in the war. The idiocy of a commanding officer establishing his headquarters on a naked plain two miles away from the fort where his troops were stationed and within what would then have been the enemy's lines seems never to have occurred to the authors and promulgators of these fictions. This old adobe house was built six or eight years after the conquest of California. In 1856 it was used for a saloon; Fremont was then a candidate for the presidency. The proprietor named it Fremont's Headquarters.

CHAPTER XXI.

TREATY OF CAHUENGA—TRANSITION.

AS STATED in a former chapter, Fremont's battalion began its march down the coast on the 29th of November, 1846. The winter rains set in with great severity. The volunteers were scantily provided with clothing and the horses were in poor condition. Many of the horses died of starvation and hard usage. The battalion encountered no opposition from the enemy on its march and did no fighting.

On the 11th of January, a few miles above San Fernando, Col. Fremont received a message from Gen. Kearny informing him of the defeat of the enemy and the capture of Los Angeles. That night the battalion encamped in the mission buildings at San Fernando. From the mission that evening Jesus Pico, a cousin of Gen. Andrés Pico, set out to find the Californian army and open negotiations with its leaders. Jesus Pico, better known as Tortoi, had been arrested at his home near San Luis Obispo, tried by court-martial and sentenced to be shot for breaking his parole. Fremont, moved by the pleadings of Pico's wife and children, pardoned him. He became a warm admirer and devoted friend of Fremont.

He found the advance guard of the Californians encamped at Verdugos. He was detained here, and the leading officers of the army were summoned to a council. Pico informed them of Fremont's arrival and the number of his men. With the combined forces of Fremont and Stockton against them their cause was hopeless. He urged them to surrender to Fremont, as they could obtain better terms from him than from Stockton.

Gen. Flores, who held a commission in the Mexican army, and who had been appointed by the territorial assembly governor and comandante-general by virtue of his rank, appointed Andrés Pico general and gave him command of the army. The same night he took his departure for Mexico, by way of San Gorgonio Pass, accompanied by Col. Garfias, Diego Sepulveda, Manuel Castro, Segura, and about thirty privates. Gen. Pico, on assuming command, appointed Francisco Rico and Francisco de La Guerra to go with Jesus Pico to confer with Col. Fremont. Fremont appointed as commissioners to negotiate a treaty: Major P. B. Reading, Major William H. Russell and Capt.

Louis McLane. On the return of Guerra and Rico to the Californian camp, Gen. Andrés Pico appointed as commissioners: José Antonio Carrillo, commander of the cavalry squadron, and Augustin Olvera, diputado of the assembly, and moved his army near the river at Cahuenga. On the 13th Fremont moved his camp to the Cahuenga. The commissioners met in the deserted ranch-house, and the treaty was drawn up and signed.

The principal conditions of the treaty or capitulation of "Cahuenga," as it was termed, were that the Californians, on delivering up their artillery and public arms, and promising not again to take up arms during the war, and conforming to the laws and regulations of the United States, shall be allowed peaceably to return to their homes. They were to be allowed the same rights and privileges as are allowed to citizens of the United States, and were not to be compelled to take an oath of allegiance until a treaty of peace was signed between the United States and Mexico, and were given the privilege of leaving the country if they wished to. An additional section was added to the treaty on the 16th at Los Angeles releasing the officers from their paroles. Two cannon were surrendered, the howitzer captured from Gen. Kearny at San Pasqual, and the woman's gun that won the battle of Dominguez. On the 14th, Fremont's battalion marched through the Cahuenga Pass to Los Angeles in a pouring rainstorm, and entered it four days after its surrender to Stockton. The conquest of California was completed. Stockton approved the treaty, although it was not altogether satisfactory to him. On the 16th he appointed Col. Fremont governor of the territory, and William H. Russell, of the battalion, secretary of state.

This precipitated a quarrel between Stockton and Kearny, which had been brewing for some time. Gen. Kearny claimed that under his instructions from the government he should be recognized as governor. As he had directly under his command but the one company of dragoons that he brought across the plain with him he was unable to enforce his authority. He left on the 18th for San Diego, taking with him his officers and dragoons. On the 20th Commodore Stockton, with his sailors and marines, marched to San Pedro, where they all embarked on a man-of-war for San Diego to rejoin their ships. Stockton was shortly afterwards superseded in the command of the Pacific squadron by Commodore Shubrick.

Fremont was left in command at Los Angeles. He established his headquarters in the upper (second) floor of the Bell block, corner of Los Angeles and Aliso streets, the best building in the city then. One company of the battalion was retained in the city; the others, under command of Capt. Owens, were quartered at the Mission San Gabriel. From San Diego, Gen. Kearny sailed to San Francisco, and from there he went to Monterey. Under additional instructions from the general government brought to the coast by Col. Mason, he established his governorship at Monterey. With a governor in the north and one in the south antagonistic to each other, California had fallen back to its normal condition under Mexican rule. Col. Cooke, commander of the Mormon battalion, writing about this time, says: "Gen. Kearny is supreme somewhere up the coast; Gen. Fremont is supreme at Pueblo de Los Angeles; Commodore Stockton is commander-in-chief at San Diego; Commodore Shubrick the same at Monterey; and I at San Luis Rey; and we are all supremely poor, the government having no money and no credit, and we hold the territory because Mexico is poorest of all!"

Col. R. B. Mason was appointed inspector of the troops, and made an official visit to Los Angeles. In some disagreement he used insulting language to Col. Fremont. Fremont promptly challenged him to fight a duel. The challenge was accepted, and double-barreled shotguns were chosen as the weapons and the Rancho Rosa del Castillo chosen as the place of meeting. Mason was summoned north, and the duel was postponed until his return. Kearny, hearing of it, put a stop to it.

Col. P. St. George Cooke, commander of the Mormon battalion, but an officer of the regular army, was made commander of the military district of the south, with headquarters at Los Angeles. Fremont's battalion was mustered out of the service and Fremont himself ordered to report to Gen. Kearny at Monterey and turn over the papers and accounts of his governorship. He did so, and passed out of office. He was nominally governor of the territory about two months. His jurisdiction did not really extend beyond Los Angeles. He accompanied Gen. Kearny east, leaving Los Angeles May 12, and Monterey May 31. At Fort Leavenworth Gen. Kearny placed him under arrest and preferred charges against him for disobedience of orders. He was tried by court-martial at Washington and was ably defended by his father-in-law, Col. Benton, and his brother-in-law, William Carey Jones. The court found him guilty and fixed the penalty—dismissal from the service. President Polk remitted the penalty, and ordered Col. Fremont to resume his sword and report for duty. He resigned his commission in the army.

Col. Richard B. Mason succeeded General Kearny as commander-in-chief of the troops and military governor of California. Col. Philip St. George Cooke resigned command of the military district of the south in May and went east with Gen. Kearny. Col. J. D. Stevenson, of the New York Volunteers, succeeded Cooke. His regiment, the First New York, had been recruited in eastern New York in the summer of 1846 for the double purpose of conquest and colonization. It came to the coast well provided with provisions and implements of husbandry. It reached California via Cape Horn. The first transport, the Perkins, reached Yerba Buena, March 6, 1847; the second, the Drew, March 19; and the third, the Loo Choo, March 26. Hostilities had ceased in California before their arrival. Two companies, A and B, under command of Lieut.-Col. Burton, were sent to Lower California, where they saw hard service and took part in several engagements. The other companies of the regiment were sent to different towns in Upper California to do garrison duty. Companies E and G were stationed at Los Angeles, Company F at Santa Barbara and Company I at San Diego.

Col. Stevenson had under his command a force of about 600 men, consisting of four companies of the Mormon battalion, two companies of United States Dragoons and the two companies of his own regiment. The Mormon battalion was mustered out in July, 1847; the New York volunteers remained in service until August, 1848. Most of these volunteers remained in California and several became residents of Southern California.

Another military organization that reached California after the conquest was Company F, Third United States Artillery. It landed at Monterey, January 28, 1847, under command of Capt. C. Q. Thompkins. With it came Lieuts. E. O. C. Ord, William T. Sherman and H. W. Halleck, all of whom were prominent afterward in California and attained national reputation during the Civil war. Lieut. Ord made what is known as Ord's survey of Los Angeles. After the treaty of peace was made, in 1848, four companies of U. S. Dragoons, under command of Major L. P. Graham, marched from Chihuahua, by way of Tucson, to California. Major Graham was the last military commander of the south.

Under Col. Stevenson's administration the reconstruction, or rather it might be more appropriately called the transformation, period really began. The orders from the general government were to conciliate the people and to make no radical changes in the form of government. The Mexican laws were continued in force. In February an ayuntamiento was elected at Los Angeles. The members were: First alcalde, José Salazar; second alcalde, Enrique Avila; regidores, Miguel N. Pryor, Julian Chavez, Rafael Gallardo and José A. Yorba; sindico, José Vicinte Guerrero; secretary, Ignacio Coronel.

This council proceeded to grant house lots and perform its various municipal functions as formerly. Occasionally there was friction between the military and civil powers, and there were rumors of insurrections and invasions. There were, no doubt, some who hoped that the prophecy of the doggerel verses that were derisively sung by the women occasionally might come true:

"Poco tiempo
Viene Castro
Con mucho gente
Vamos Americanos."

But Castro came not with his many gentlemen, nor did the Americans show any disposition to vamos; so with that easy good nature so characteristic of the Californians they made the best of the situation. "A thousand things," says Judge Hays, "combined to smooth the asperities of war. Fremont had been courteous and gay; Mason was just and firm. The natural good temper of the population favored a speedy and perfect conciliation. The American officers at once found themselves happy in every circle. In suppers, balls, visiting in town* and country, the hours glided away with pleasant reflections."

There were, however, a few individuals who were not happy unless they could stir up dissensions and cause trouble. One of the chief of these was Serbulo Varela—agitator and revolutionist. Varela, for some offense not specified in the records, had been committed to prison by the second alcalde, or judge of the second instance. Col. Stevenson turned him out of jail and Varela gave the judge a tongue lashing in refuse Castilian. The judge's official dignity was hurt. He sent a communication to the ayuntamiento saying: "Owing to personal abuse which I received at the hands of a private individual and from the present military commander, I tender my resignation."

The council sent a communication to Col.

Stevenson, asking why he had turned Varela out of jail and why he had insulted the judge.

The colonel curtly replied that the military would not act as jailers over persons guilty of trifling offenses while the city had plenty of persons to do guard duty at the jail. As to abuse of the judge, he was not aware that any abuse had been given, and would take no further notice of him unless he stated the nature of the insult offered him.

The council decided to notify the governor of the outrage perpetrated by the military commander, and the second alcalde said, since he could get no satisfaction for insults to his authority from the military despot he would resign; but the council would not accept his resignation, so he refused to act, and the city had to worry along with one judge.

When the time came around for the election of a new ayuntamiento there was more trouble. Stephen C. Foster, the colonel's interpreter, submitted a paper to the council stating that the government had authorized him to get up a register of voters. And the ayuntamiento voted to return the paper just as it was received. Then the colonel made a demand of the council to assist Esteban Foster in compiling a register of voters. Regidor Chavez took the floor and said such a register should not be gotten up under the auspices of the military, but since the government had so disposed, thereby outraging this honorable body, no attention should be paid to said communication. But the council decided that the matter did not amount to much, so they granted the request, much to the disgust of Chavez. The election was held and a new council elected. At the last meeting of the old council, December 29, 1847, Col. Stevenson addressed a note to it, requesting that Stephen C. Foster be recognized as first alcalde and judge of the first instance. The council decided to turn the whole business over to its successor, to deal with as it sees fit.

Col. Stevenson's request was made in accordance with the wish of Governor Mason, that a part of the civil offices be filled by Americans. The new ayuntamiento resented this interference.

How the matter terminated is best told in Stephen C. Foster's own words: "Col. Stevenson was determined to have our inauguration done in style. So on the day appointed (January 1, 1848) he, together with myself and colleague, escorted by a guard of soldiers, proceeded from the colonel's quarters (which were in the house now occupied as a stable by Ferguson & Rose) to the alcalde's office, which was where the City of Paris store now stands on Main street. There we found the retiring ayuntamiento and the new one awaiting our arrival. The oath of office was to be administered by the retiring first alcalde. We knelt to take the oath, when we found they had changed their minds, and the alcalde told us that if two of their number were to be kicked out they would all go. So they all marched out and left us in possession. Here was a dilemma; but Col. Stevenson was equal to the emergency. He said he could give us a swear as well as the alcalde. So we stood up and he administered to us an oath to support the constitution of the United States and administer justice in accordance with Mexican law. I then knew as much about Mexican law as I did about Chinese, and my colleague knew as much as I did. Guerrero gathered up the books that pertained to his office and took them to his house, where he established his office, and I took the archives and records across the street to a house I had rented, where Perry & Riley's building now stands, and there I was duly installed for the next seventeen months, the first American alcalde and carpet-bagger in Los Angeles."

"The late Abel Stearns was afterwards appointed syndic. We had instructions from Governor Mason to make no grants of land, but to attend only to criminal and civil business and current municipal affairs. Criminal offenders had formerly been punished by being confined in irons in the calaboose, which then stood on the north side of the plaza, but I induced the Colonel to lend me balls and chains and I had a chain gang organized for labor on the public works, under charge of a gigantic old Mexican soldier, armed with a carbine and cutlass, who soon had his gang under good discipline and who boasted that he could get twice as much work out of his men as could be got out of the soldiers in the chain gang of the garrison."

The rumors of plots and impending insurrections was the indirect cause of a serious catastrophe. On the afternoon of December 7, 1847, an old lady called upon Col. Stevenson and informed him that a large body of Californians had secretly organized and fixed upon that night for a general uprising, to capture the city and massacre the garrison. The information was supposed to be reliable. Precautions were taken against a surprise. The guard was doubled and a strong reserve stationed at the guardhouse, which stood on the hillside about where Beaudry's stone wall on the new High street is now. A piece of artillery was kept at the guardhouse. About midnight one of the outpost pickets saw, or thought he saw, a horseman approaching him. He challenged, but receiving no reply, fired. The guard at the cuartél formed to repel an attack. Investigation proved the picket's horseman to be a cow. The guard was ordered to break ranks. One of the cannoneers had lighted a port fire (a sort of fuse formerly used for firing cannon). He was ordered to extinguish it and return it to the arm chest. He attempted to extinguish it by stamping on it, and supposing he had stamped the fire out, threw it into the chest filled with ammunition. The fire rekindled and a terrific explosion followed that shook the city like an earthquake. The guardhouse was blown to pieces and the roof timbers thrown into Main street.

The wildest confusion reigned. The long roll sounded and the troops flew to arms. Four men were killed by the explosion and ten or twelve wounded, several quite seriously. The guardhouse was rebuilt and was used by the city for a jail up to 1853.

This catastrophe was the occasion of the first civil marriage ever celebrated in Los Angeles. The widow of Sergeant Travers, one of the soldiers killed by the explosion, after three months of widowhood, desired to enter the state of double blessedness. She and the bridegroom, both being Protestants, could not be married in the Catholic Church, and there was no minister of any other denomination in the country. In their dilemma, they applied to Alcalde Foster to have a civil ceremony performed. The alcalde was doubtful whether his powers admitted of marrying people. There was no precedent for so doing in Mexican law, but he took the chances. A formidable legal document, still on file in the recorder's office, was drawn up and the parties signed it in the presence of witnesses, and took a solemn oath to love, cherish, protect, defend and support on the part of the husband, and the wife, of her own choice, agreed to obey, love, serve and respect the man of her choice in accordance with the laws of the State of New York. Then the alcalde declared James C. Burton and Emma C. Travers man and wife, and they lived happily ever afterwards. The groom was a soldier in the service of the United States and a citizen of the state of New York.

The treaty of peace between the United States and Mexico was signed at Guadalupe Hidalgo, a hamlet a few miles from the city of Mexico, February 2, 1848; ratifications were exchanged at Queretaro, May 30 following, and a proclamation that peace had been established between the two countries was published July 4, 1848. Under this treaty the United States assumed the payment of the claims of American citizens against Mexico, and paid in addition $15,000,000 for Texas, New Mexico and Alta California—an area of nearly half a million square miles. Out of what was the Mexican territory of Alta California there has been carved all of California, all of Nevada, Utah and Arizona, and part of Colorado and Wyoming. The area acquired by this territorial expansion equaled that of the thirteen colonies at the time of the Revolutionary War.

Pío Pico arrived at San Gabriel, July 17, 1848, on his return from Sonora. From San Fernando he addressed letters to Col. Stevenson and Governor Mason, stating that as Mexican Governor of California he had come back to the country, with the object of carrying out the armistice which then existed between the United States and Mexico. He further stated that he had no desire to impede the establishment of peace between the two countries; and that he wished to see the Mexicans and Americans treat each other in a spirit of fraternity. Mason did not like Pico's assumption of the title of Mexican Governor of California, although it is not probable that Pico intended to assert any claim to his former position. Mason sent a special courier to Los Angeles with orders to Col. Stevenson to arrest the ex-governor, who was then at his Santa Margarita ranch, and send him to Monterey, but the news of the ratification of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo reached Los Angeles before the arrest was made and Pico was spared this humiliation.

In December, 1848, after peace was restored, Alcalde Foster, under instructions from Governor Mason, called an election for choosing an ayuntamiento to take the place of the one that failed to qualify. The voters paid no attention to the call and Governor Mason instructed the officers to hold over until the people chose to elect their successors. In May a second call was made under Mexican law. By this time the voters had gotten over their indignation at being made American citizens, nolens volens. They elected an ayuntamiento which continued in power to the close of the year. Its first session was held May 21, 1849. First alcalde, José del Carmen Lugo; second alcalde, Juan Sepulveda; regidores, José Lopez, Francisco Ocampo, Thomas Sanchez; syndic, Juan Temple; secretary, Jesus Guerado. All of these had been citizens of Mexico, Juan Temple having been naturalized twenty years before. The Governor's wish to have Americans fill part of the city offices was evidently disregarded by the voters. Stephen C. Foster was appointed prefect October 29, 1849, by Governor Bennett Riley, the successor of Governor Mason.

In December, 1849, the last ayuntamiento of Los Angeles was elected. The members were: First alcalde, Abel Stearns; second alcalde, Ygnacio del Valle; regidores, David Alexander, Benito D. Wilson, José L. Sepulveda, Manuel Garfias; syndic, Francisco Figueroa; secretary, Jesus Guirada. The legislature of 1849-50 passed an act incorporating Los Angeles (April 4, 1850) as a city. In the act of incorporation its area is given as four square miles. During its probationary state, from January, 1847, until its incorporation as a city by the legislature, it sometimes appears in the official records as a pueblo (town) and sometimes as a ciudad (city). For a considerable time after the conquest official communications bore the motto of Mexico, Dios y Libertad (God and Liberty). The first city council was organized July 3, 1850, just four years, lacking one day, after the closing session of the ayuntamiento under Mexican rule had been held.

PART SECOND.

THE COUNTIES OF SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA.

CHAPTER XXII.

SAN DIEGO COUNTY.

ORGANIZATION.

IN THE act dividing the state into counties, approved February 18, 1850, San Diego is the first county described; and in numbering the senatorial and judicial districts of that time, San Diego was number one. The county included the whole southern end of the state, and was then bounded on the north by Los Angeles county; on the east by the Colorado river; on the south by Lower California; on the west by the Pacific Ocean and part of Los Angeles county. Its area was 14,969 square miles. Its population was 798, of which 650 were residents of the town of San Diego.

The first county election was held April 1, 1850. The officers elected were as follows: William C. Ferrell, district attorney; John Hays, county judge; Richard Rust, county clerk; T. W. Sutherland, county attorney; Henry Clayton, county surveyor; Agostin Harazthy, sheriff; Henry C. Matsuell, recorder; José Antonio Estudillo, county assessor; John Brown, coroner, and Juan Bandini, treasurer. Bandini did not qualify, and Philip Crosthwaite was appointed by the court of sessions to fill the vacancy. The first term of the district court was held in San Diego, May 6, 1850; O. S. Witherby, judge, and Richard Rust, clerk.

THE FIRST INDIAN WAR.

The year 1851 was marked by an Indian war, or rather an Indian scare, for it could scarcely be called a war. The Cohuilla Indians, at that time quite numerous, inhabited the valleys of the San Bernardino mountains, from San Geronio south to the Mexican line. For some time they had been stealing horses and cattle and annoying the settlers. Their chief was Antonio Garra. He was an egotistical fellow. He conceived the idea of a general uprising of the red men and the extermination of the whites. He was even vain enough to boast that he would capture the fort at Yuma and with the cannon taken there attack Los Angeles and San Diego. The first outbreak was at Warner's ranch, about 60 miles easterly from San Diego.

J. J. Warner, a Connecticut Yankee, came to California in 1831, as a trapper. He became a naturalized citizen and obtained a grant from the Mexican government of about 26,600 acres. This he had stocked with cattle and horses and was living there at the time of the American conquest. The Agua Caliente, or Hot Springs, in the neighborhood of Warner's rancho, was a favorite camping place of the Indians. Warner, besides his cattle and horses, kept a stock of goods amounting to about $6,000. This was partly to supply his vaqueros and other retainers and partly to trade with the Indians. This display of wealth tempted the cupidity of the Indians and they plotted to massacre him and his people to obtain plunder. He received warning of their designs and sent his family under an escort to San Diego. The morning after the departure of his family he was awakened by the yells of the Indians. Several horses, saddled and bridled, were tied near the house, ready for any emergency.

On hearing the cries of the Indians, Warner, seizing his arms, rushed to the rear door to secure the horses. They were all gone except one, and an Indian was trying to unfasten it. Warner shot the horse thief dead; and two of his companions who tried to get the horse were sent to the happy hunting ground to join their friend. Taking advantage of the temporary panic into which the Indians had been thrown by the shooting of three of their number, Warner seized a crippled mulatto boy, servant of an army officer who had sent him to the hot springs to be treated for rheumatism, and, placing him in front, mounted his horse and rode away amid a shower of arrows from two hundred Indians. He made his escape unharmed, but the Indians killed one of his servants.

Reaching the camp where his vaqueros made their headquarters, he rallied a small force of these and returned to the rancho, where he found the Indians reveling in his stock of goods. They stood on the defensive when attacked and the cowboys, finding themselves so greatly outnumbered, retreated. Warner was compelled to follow suit, as he was not equal to a whole tribe of Indians. He went to San Diego, where Major Heintzelman was stationed with a force of regulars, to procure assistance.

The alarm of an Indian uprising spread all over the southern district. A company of volunteers was raised at San Diego, of which Cave J. Coutts was made captain. It was called the Fitzgerald Volunteers. Major Fitzgerald had command of all the militia at San Diego. A company of 35 men was raised at Los Angeles for field service and another, of which B. D. Wilson was captain, for home guards to protect the city in case Antonio Garra should undertake to carry out his threats. The officers of the field company were: George B. Fitzgerald, captain; John Jones, first lieutenant, and Roy Bean, second lieutenant. The volunteers were under the command of Gen. J. H. Bean. The regulars and the San Diego volunteers drove the Indians into the mountains and killed about 40 of them. The Los Angeles volunteers, reinforced by five men from the Mormon camp at San Bernardino and 20 from Temecula, did considerable scouting, but did not kill any hostiles.

Antonio Garra, chief of the Cohuillas, was captured by the strategy (or perhaps it would be more in accordance with the facts, by the treachery) of Cabazon, chief of the White Water Indians. He was sentenced to be shot. Standing on the edge of his open grave, he met his death with stoical firmness. An American, Bill Marshall, and a Californian named Juan Verdugo were found to have been implicated in the raid on Warner's ranch. They were tried by a court-martial and sentenced to be hanged. Verdugo confessed his guilt, but Marshall died protesting, to the last, his innocence. In the year 1852 four Indians implicated in the uprising were captured and shot. This settled the Indian question in San Diego for some time.

Col. Warner and his family returned to his ranch after the Indian troubles were over. He lived there until 1857, when he moved to Los Angeles. He died in 1893, at the age of 87 years.

EARLY HISTORY OF THE CITY AND COUNTY IDENTICAL.

In 1850 and for a number of years after there was no settlement in San Diego outside of the city that could be called a town. At each of the large ranchos there was a small settlement made up of the servants and vaqueros and their families. Some of these were designated as precincts when a general election was called, and at a few some one acted as a justice of the peace.

The history of the county and of the city are identical for nearly two decades. The back country so often spoken of was undeveloped and the very few events that happened at points back from the bay are unimportant. The early history of Old San Diego, or Old Town, as it is usually called, has been given in the chapter on the Founding of the Presidios.

The pueblo of San Diego was organized January 1, 1835. It is not, as some writers have claimed, the oldest municipality in California. The pueblos of San José and Los Angeles antedate it many years. Los Angeles having passed beyond the pueblo stage was made a ciudad (city) the same year (1835) that the pueblo of San Diego was organized. The first ayuntamiento or town council, elected December, 1834, was composed of an alcalde, two regidores and a sindico procurador.

The first survey of the pueblo lands was made by Henry D. Fitch in 1845. The Mexican government granted the pueblo eleven leagues or 47,234 acres. This grant to the pueblo was confirmed by the United States Land Commission in 1853. San Diego was more fortunate than Los Angeles, whose claim of sixteen square leagues was cut down to four, or Santa Barbara, which claimed eight, but had to be content with four. San Diego in area, fifty years ago, was the largest town in the United States. Its boundary lines inclosed about 75 square miles; its population, however, was less than ten to the square mile.

ORIGIN OF NEW TOWN.

March 18, 1850, the ayuntamiento of San Diego sold to William Heath Davis, José A. Aguirre, Andrew B. Gray, Thomas D. Johns and Miguel Pedrorena, 160 acres of land a few miles south of Old Town, near the army barracks, for the purpose of creating a "new port." William Heath Davis, one of the oldest living pioneers of California, and author of "Sixty Years in California," in an interview published in the San Diego Sun some fourteen years ago, gives the following account of the origin of New Town:

"Of the new town of San Diego, now the city of San Diego, I can say that I was its founder. In 1850, the American and Mexican commissions appointed to establish the boundary line were at Old Town. Andrew B. Gray, the chief engineer and surveyor for the United States, who was with the commission, introduced himself to me one day at Old Town. In February, 1850, he explained to me the advantages of the locality, known as 'Puerta de los Muertos' (Point of the Dead), from the circumstances that in the year 1787 a Spanish squadron anchored within a stone's throw of the present site of the city of San Diego. During the stay of the fleet, surveying the bay of San Diego for the first time, several sailors and marines died and were interred on a sand spit, adjacent to where my wharf stood, and was named as above. The piles of my structure are still imbedded in the sands as if there had been premeditation to mark them as the tomb-marks of those deceased early explorers of the Pacific ocean and of the inlet of San Diego during the days of Spain's greatness. I have seen Puerta de los Muertos on Pantoja's chart of his explorations of the waters of the Pacific.

"Messrs. José Antonio Acuirre, Miguel de Pedorena, Andrew B. Gray, T. D. Johns and myself were the projectors of what is now known as the city of San Diego. All my co-proprietors have since died, and I remain alone of the party and am a witness of the marvelous events and changes that have since transpired in this vicinity during more than a generation.

"The first building in new San Diego was put up by myself as a private residence. The building still stands, being known as the San Diego hotel. I also put up a number of other houses; the cottage built by Andrew B. Gray is still standing and is called 'The Hermitage.' George F. Hooper also built a cottage, which is still standing near my house, in New San Diego. Under the conditions of our deed we were to build a substantial wharf and warehouse. The other proprietors of the town deeded to me their interest in block 20, where the wharf was to be built. The wharf was completed in six months after getting our title, in March, 1850, at a cost of $60,000. The piles of the old wharf are still to be seen on the old wharf site in block 20. At that time I predicted that San Diego would become a great commercial seaport, from its fine geographical position and from the fact that it was the only good harbor south of San Francisco. Had it not been for our Civil war, railroads would have reached here years before Stanford's road was built, for our wharf was ready for business."

The fate of this wharf of high anticipations and brilliant prospects was prosaic and commonplace. In 1862, some six hundred Union troops en route to Arizona were quartered at the army barrack near the wharf. The great flood of that year cut off for a time all communication with the back country and detained the troops there most of the winter. The supply of firewood ran out and the weather was cold—so the "gallant six hundred," led by the quartermaster, charged the wharf and warehouse, and when they were through charging all that was left of that wharf was a few teredo-eaten piles. The soldiers burned the wharf and warehouse for fuel. Davis filed a claim against the government for $60,000 damages on account of the destruction of his wharf and warehouse by the soldiers. But the government did not "honor the charge he made." After many delays his claim was finally pared down to $6,000 and allowed for that amount.

THE PIONEER NEWSPAPER.

The pioneer newspaper of San Diego was the Herald. The first number was issued May 29, 1851, only twelve days later than the first issue of the Los Angeles Star, the pioneer newspaper of Southern California. The San Diego Herald was published by J. Judson Ames, a recent arrival from Boston. His printing plant met with a number of vicissitudes before it was finally set up in Old Town. Ames, failing to secure printing material in San Francisco, took passage to New Orleans, where he bought an office outfit. On his return the boat in which his stock was stored upset in the Chagres river. He fished out the greater part of his material, but at Panama was attacked by the Chagres fever and delayed some time. He finally reached San Francisco just before the great fire of May, 1851. In that conflagration a part of his plant was consumed. With the remnant that had escaped fire and flood he reached San Diego and established his paper. He must have been a man of indomitable courage to have persevered through all discouragements.

The outlook was not encouraging for the building up of a great newspaper. The town was small and non-progressive; a large portion of its inhabitants were native Californians whose early education had been neglected. There did not seem to be a pressing need for a newspaper, yet with all its uncongenial surroundings the paper attained a widespread fame; not, however, through its founder, but through a substitute to whom for a time Ames entrusted the editorial tripod, scissors and paste pot of the Herald.

Lieut. George H. Derby, of the United States Topographical Corps, had been sent down by the government in August, 1852, to superintend the turning of the channel of the San Diego river into False bay, to prevent it from carrying sand into the bay of San Diego. Derby was a wit as well as an engineer, and a famous caricaturist.

The Herald was intensely Democratic, and was supporting with all its strength John Bigler for governor; the Whig candidate in the contest was William Waldo. Ames had a call to San Francisco to see the Democratic leaders, and no doubt hoped to be seen by them with much needed coin for his influence. Lieut. Derby, better known by his nom de plume, John Phoenix, was entrusted with the editorial management of the paper during Ames' absence. He could not let slip so good an opportunity for a practical joke. Derby was a Whig, or at least became one for the time being. He changed the politics of the paper and turned the shafts of ridicule against Bigler and the Democratic party. Bigler was dubbed Wigler and Waldo, Baldo. Ames was confronted in San Francisco by his party managers with the evidence of his paper's recreancy, and his hopes of subsidy vanished.

He returned to San Diego. Derby thus describes the meeting: "The Thomas Neunt (steamer Thomas Hunt) had arrived and a rumor had reached our ears that 'Boston' was on board. Public anxiety had been excited to the highest pitch to witness the result of the meeting between us. It had been stated publicly that 'Boston' would whip us the moment he arrived, but though we thought a conflict probable, we had never been very sanguine as to its terminating in that manner. Coolly we gazed from the window of the office upon the New Town road; we descried a cloud of dust in the distance; high above it waved a whip lash, and we said, 'Boston' cometh, 'and his driving is like that of Jehu, the son of Nimshi, for he driveth furiously.' Calmly we seated ourselves in the arm chair and continued our labors upon our Magnificent Pictorial. Anon a step, a heavy step, was heard upon the stairs, and Boston stood before us. * * * We rose and with an unfaltering voice said, 'Well, Judge, how do you do?' He made no reply, but commenced taking off his coat. We removed ours, also our cravat. * * * The sixth and last round is described by the pressmen and compositors as having been fearfully scientific. We held Boston down over the press by our nose (which we had inserted between his teeth for that purpose), and while our hair was employed in holding one of his hands we held the other in our left and with the 'sheep's foot' brandished above our head shouted to him, 'Say Waldo!' 'Never!' he gasped.

"'Oh! my Bigler!' he would have muttered, But that he dried up ere the word was uttered.

"At this moment we discovered that we had been laboring under a 'misunderstanding,' and through the amicable intervention of the pressman, who thrust a roller between our faces (which gave the whole affair a very different complexion), the matter was finally settled on the most friendly terms, and without prejudice to the honor of either party." He closes his description with the statement that "the public can believe precisely as much as they please; if they disbelieve the whole of it, we shall not be at all offended."

Lieut. Derby's caricatures very nearly got him into serious trouble. When Jefferson Davis was secretary of war (1853 to 1857) he was continually intermeddling in the small affairs of army life and was very generally disliked by army officers, with the exception of a few personal favorites. He tried to direct everything from "a review down to the purchase of shoe blacking." He changed the patterns of uniforms, arms and equipments several times. It was after one of these changes that Lieut. Derby, then stationed at Fort Yuma, sent Davis a suggestion for a new uniform, illustrated by a series of drawings. The principal improvement in the new uniform was a stout iron hook, which was to be sewed to the rear of the trousers of each private soldier. The illustrations showed the uses to which this hook could be put. In one a soldier was shown on the march carrying a camp kettle, tin cup and other effects suspended from this hook; in another, a row of men were hung by their hooks on a fence fast asleep; they were thus prevented from taking cold by sleeping on the damp ground. In a third a company was shown advancing in line of battle, each man having a rope attached to his hook, the other end of which was held by an officer in the rear, who could restrain him if he advanced too rapidly, or haul him back if he was wounded. When Secretary Davis received these he was in a towering rage and he announced that day at a cabinet meeting that he intended to have Lieut. Derby tried before a court-martial "organized to convict," and summarily dismissed. But the other secretaries, who enjoyed the joke, convinced him that if the affair became public he would be laughed at. Davis, who was utterly devoid of the sense of humor, reluctantly abandoned his court-martial scheme.

Derby published a book under the title of Phoenixiana. It contained a number of his San Diego articles and his famous military uniform drawings. It had an immense sale for a time, but has long been out of print. He died a few years later of softening of the brain.

The Herald, after Phoenix's departure, ceased to be a magnificent pictorial. It suspended publication in 1858 and never resumed.

STEAMSHIPS AND OVERLAND MAIL.

During the decade between 1850 and 1860 the town made but little growth. There was considerable travel between it and the other ports of the coast. In 1851 and for six or seven years later, "the fast-sailing United States mail steamer 'Ohio,' Captain Haley, will run as a regular packet, making her trip once in every two weeks between San Francisco and San Diego, touching at the intermediate points of Santa Cruz, Monterey, San Luis Obispo, Santa Barbara and San Pedro," so says an advertisement in the Los Angeles Star of May 31, 1851. In 1853 and 1854 the "Southerner," of the Southern Accommodation Line, was making regular semi-monthly trips between San Francisco and San Diego, stopping at intermediate points. The steamer "Sea Bird," of Goodwin & Co.'s line, was making trips three times a month, leaving San Francisco the 4th, 14th and 24th of each month. The "Thomas Hunt" also was running between San Francisco and San Diego. Once a month the Panama steamer put into the port with the eastern mail. In 1851 a semi-monthly mail by land was established between Los Angeles and San Diego.

But the event that promised the greatest outcome for San Diego during the decade was the establishment of an overland mail route between San Antonio de Bexar, Tex., and San Diego. The route was by the way of El Paso, Messillo, Tucson and Colorado City (now Yuma)—1,500 miles. The service was semi-monthly. The contract was let to James E. Burch, the postal department reserving "the right to curtail or discontinue the service should any route subsequently put under contract cover the whole or any portion of the route."

The San Diego Herald, August 12, 1857, thus notes the departure of the first train: "The pioneer mail train from San Diego to San Antonio, Tex., under the contract entered into by the government with Mr. Jas. Burch, left here on the 9th inst. (August 9, 1857) at an early hour in the morning, and is now pushing its way for the east at a rapid rate. The mail was, of course, carried on pack animals, as will be the case until the wagons which are being pushed across will have been put on the line. The first train from this side left in charge of Mr. R. W. Laine, who was accompanied by some of the most active and reliable young men in the county, the party taking relay mules with them for use on the desert. The intention is to push on at the rate of fifty or sixty miles a day to Tucson, where, entering the Apache country proper, a large party will be organized to afford proper protection as far as El Paso del Norte or further if necessary. The first mail from the other side has not yet arrived, although somewhat overdue, and conjecture is rife as to the cause of the delay. Until the arrival of the next express from Fort Yuma we will probably receive no tidings from the country through which the mail has to pass, but for our own part we see no reason for alarm in the case. The train leaving here took a large number of letters for Fort Yuma, Tucson, Calabasas, El Paso, etc., in addition to the regular eastern mail." The eastern arrived in a few days later and the San Diegans went wild with joy and built in imagination a city of vast proportions on the bay.

The service continued to improve and the fifth trip from the eastward terminus "was made in the extraordinary short time of twenty-six days and twelve hours," and the San Diego Herald on its arrival, October 6, rushed out an extra "announcing the very gratifying fact of the complete triumph of the southern route, notwithstanding the croaking of many of the opponents of the Administration in this state." "The first mail," so said the extra, "from San Diego had arrived at San Antonio in good style and created naturally a great excitement, the Texans taking fully as much interest in the establishment of the line as the Californians."

But the triumph of the "Southern route" was of short duration. September, 1858, the stages of the Butterfield line began making their semi-weekly trips. This line came down the coast to Gilroy, then through the Pacheco Pass, up the San Joaquin valley and by way of Fort Tejon to Los Angeles; then eastward by Temecula and Warner's ranch to Yuma, then across Arizona and New Mexico to El Paso, where it turned north to St. Louis and Memphis, its eastern termini. San Diego and San Antonio were sidetracked and the Southern route discontinued.

OLD TOWN AND NEW TOWN IN STATU QUO.

After this temporary spurt of enterprise, San Diego lapsed into its old poco tiempo ways. Old Town remained in statu quo and New Town did not expand. There had been rumors of a railroad in 1854 and in 1857, but the muttering of the coming storm between the north and the south had frightened capital and the hope of a railroad had been given up. During the Civil war, there were some troops always at the barracks, sometimes one company, sometimes two or three. The soldiers stationed there did not add much to the revenue of the town. The pay of a private was $13 a month in greenbacks, which, converted into coin at the rate of thirty to forty cents silver for a dollar currency, did not give the defenders of the country lavish amounts of spending money. A considerable amount of the supplies for the troops were landed at San Diego and sent to Fort Yuma by wagon trains. This gave employment to a number of men and teams and added to the business of the town.

The drought years of 1863 and 1864 were not so disastrous to San Diego as to some of the other cow counties. The ranges were not so heavily overstocked and there was more back country not covered by Spanish grants where cattle could be driven when the feed was exhausted on the other ranges.

CHAPTER XXIII.

SAN DIEGO COUNTY—Continued.

THE NEW ERA.

UP TO 1867 San Diego town and county had retained the Mexican customs and conditions of early times more nearly unchanged than any other town or county in the state. Their awakening from a Rip Van Winkle sleep, not of twenty years, but of twenty lustums, was the work of one man. April 6, 1867, Alonzo E. Horton landed in San Diego. He had come down from San Francisco to build a city. The outlook was not encouraging. Old Town was appropriately named; anything new in it would be out of place. It had the appearance of having been finished years before and then forgotten. New Town consisted of the government barracks, officers' quarters, the piles of the Davis wharf and a few houses that had escaped the "wreck of matter" the soldiers had made. Horton was not discouraged. The bay was there. The climate was there and there he determined to build a city.

Horton induced the town trustees to offer a tract of land lying east of New Town on the shore of the bay for sale. At the public sale in May, 1867, he bid off a tract of nearly 900 acres of the pueblo lands at twenty-six cents an acre, and had it surveyed and platted as Horton's Addition to San Diego. The tract is now the center of the city of San Diego. He put his tract on sale. It went slowly, very slowly at first. His returns for the year 1867 were but $3,000. He gave away land to any one who would agree to make substantial improvements. He deeded lots to churches, for hotels and other improvements. He built a wharf, and in 1869 began the erection of the Horton House, the largest hotel at that time in Southern California.

The seed that he had sown now began to bear fruit. The rumor that there was a city building on the bay of San Diego had gone abroad, and people came to buy lots. Another rumor, too, had been spread, and that was that the long-talked-of thirty-second parallel railroad was a certainty. Tom Scott had taken hold of it and Tom Scott was a power in railroad circles. In 1868, immigration had begun to drift southward and find lodgment in the coast counties. In the fall of 1869, the drift was to San Diego, and it resembled an old-time "gold rush." The author has a vivid recollection of a voyage down the coast in the old Senator in the fall of '69. Every berth had been sold a week before the vessel sailed, and then the agents of the company sold standing room. The steamer's cooks and waiters commenced feeding the passengers about six o'clock in the morning and kept it up with slight interruptions till nine at night. The dining saloon was small and the crowd on board necessitated the setting of the tables many times. When all had been fed the tables were cleared, the passengers without berths bunked on the tables, under the tables, or wherever they could spread their blankets. All or nearly all were bound to San Diego to buy lots. The railroad was coming; San Diego was destined to rival San Francisco, and the lot buyers wanted to grow up with the city. Many of the speculators were old Californians who had not struck it rich, but were sure they were on the right road now. One old '49er, in the spring of 1850, had owned a lot on Montgomery street, San Francisco, and had sold it for $400; now it was worth $100,000; he would secure a lot in San Diego and hold on to it and grow in wealth as the town grew in size. And so the talk ran all day and far into the night, of bay and climate, of house lots and business blocks, of transcontinental railroads and Oriental steamships, which were sure to build up a mighty metropolis in the Southland.

August 4, 1868, Joseph Nash erected the first store in New Town. Its entire population then numbered twenty-three souls. In the spring of 1870 the city had upwards of 800 buildings, with a population of 3,000. Among its substantial improvements were two magnificent wharves, costing in the aggregate $80,000; a flouring mill with a capacity of 300 barrels a day; several warehouses, half a dozen hotels, two breweries, a boot and shoe factory, a bank and two newspapers.

The Horton House was completed and opened October 20, 1870. It cost nearly $150,000 and was then "the most elaborate, attractive and spacious hotel outside of San Francisco." The editor of the Bulletin, in a two-column write-up of its attractions, classifies it with the great hotels of the world; his enumeration of the great hostelries of 30 years ago is interesting. Some of them have fallen from their high estate. He says: "What the Grand Hotel is to Paris; Langham's to London; the Astor, Fifth Avenue and St. Nicholas to New York; the Continental to Philadelphia; the Tremont and Parker's to Boston; Barnum's to Baltimore; St. Charles to New Orleans; the Galt to Louisville; the Southern to St. Louis; the Sherman and Tremont to Chicago; the Grand, Lick, Occidental and Cosmopolitan to San Francisco, and the Pico House to Los Angeles, the Horton House is to San Diego." S. W. Churchill was its first manager.

The act authorizing the construction of the Thirty-Second Parallel, the Southern Trans-Continental, the Southern Pacific, the Texas Pacific Railroad (for it was called by all these names) failed to pass at the session of congress in 1869-70; but at the next session it passed by a two-thirds vote on the 3d of March, 1871. Then there was great rejoicing in the city by the bay. The Bulletin says: "As we go to press our city is in a blaze of glory. Fifth street looms up like an immense conflagration. Bon-fires, fireworks, anvil firing and rejoicing are the order of the night." And they had cause to rejoice. For years they had been yearning for a railroad with that "hope deferred that maketh the heart sick"; and now their longings were soon to be satisfied by the "Greatest Railroad of the Age," as the Washington Chronicle pronounced it. That paper said: "No act of the Forty-first Congress will be longer remembered to its credit than that authorizing the construction of a great trans-continental iron highway from the eastern boundary of Texas, near Marshall, via El Paso, to the town of San Diego, on the bay of that name in the state of California." How transitory is fame! Both the railroad and the Forty-first Congress have long since been forgotten!

The act of congress authorizing the building of the railroad settled the question in the minds of the San Diegans. To doubt its building was treason to San Diego. The future of the city was assured; and a brilliant future it was—San Diego, the seaport of the Occident and the entrepot of the Orient. Branch roads were projected into the back country. San Bernardino was clamoring for railroad connection with the metropolis of the south, and Tom Scott was making overtures to Los Angeles for a coast railroad from that city to San Diego. The trade of the Orient would eventually pass through San Diego to the east. There were rumors of an Oriental steamship company in the formative stage. The Panama steamers began stopping at the port, and the Bulletin said: "We hail this event as only second to that in which is recorded the passage of the Southern Pacific Railroad bill." The prices of real estate went up; indeed, under the circumstances it would have been impossible to keep them down. The Bulletin of March 25 says: "The real-estate transactions of the past week are larger than ever before in the history of San Diego and must appear rather nauseating to those newspapers which have been sneering at San Diego for the past year. By the way, we know a gentleman of San José who purchased a block on Fifth street two years ago for $600 and was damned by a paper of his town for so doing. He has been offered $8,000 for the same since the bill passed."

Horton sold $83,000 worth of lots in two months after the passage of the bill and a number of real-estate agents were doing their best to supply the demand. The boomers like Silas Wegg dropped into poetry and a song first sung at a concert in Horton's Hall became the popular ditty of San Diego. I give a few sample stanzas:

"Away to the west, where the sun goes down,
Where the oranges grow by the cargo,
They've started a town, and are doing it up brown,

On the bay of San Diego.

"The railroad, they say, is coming that way,
And then they'll be neighbors to Chicago;
So they built a big hotel, and built it mighty well,

In the town of San Diego."

* * * *

Moral:

"Let's take an early train and haste with might and main,

By lightning express if you say—go,
Where every man's a fortune in a lot that costs him naught,

In the town of San Diego."

April 14, 1871, the postmaster-general ordered a change of the name of the postoffice at South San Diego to San Diego. So New Town, South San Diego and Horton's Addition became simply San Diego.

December 27, 1871, an election was held to vote upon the issue of bonds to the amount of $100,000 to be proffered to any railroad company that would build a railroad connecting San Bernardino with San Diego. The bond issue was carried with an overwhelming majority. San Bernardino also held an election and voted a bond issue equal to five per cent of its taxable property for the same purpose.

The Bay Shore & Coast Road to Los Angeles met with disaster. At the election held in Los Angeles county to vote on the issue of railroad bonds, the Texas Pacific Coast Line and the Southern Pacific to Yuma were competitors. The Southern Pacific won, securing bonds and other subsidy to the amount of $610,000.

In 1872, "Father" Horton, as he was familiarly called, erected a large building for the Texas Pacific Railroad offices, but the employes of that corporation never occupied it. It was afterward used as a city hall. Grading was begun on the roadbed of the Texas Pacific in the latter part of 1872, but was not pushed with a great deal of vigor. About twelve miles of roadbed in all were graded.

In 1873 came a financial crash. "Black Friday in Wall street" was followed by one of the worst panics that ever struck the country. Fortunes crumbled, banks failed, capital hid, railroad building stopped. Enterprises that had promised large returns were dropped immediately. Work on the Texas Pacific ceased and was never resumed.

San Diego during its boom had grown to be a city of 5,000 inhabitants. When work ceased on the railroad the population began to dwindle away. Building in the city ceased. There was nothing to do to earn a living. People could not live on climate, however invigorating, so they left. Father Horton, during flush times, had sold a number of lots to working men on the installment plan. They came to him and offered to give up the lots and let him retain the money paid if he would cancel their contracts. With a generosity unknown in real-estate deals he refunded all the money they had paid and released them of their obligations. In 1875 the population had dwindled down to about 1,500, and these were living largely on faith, hope and climate.

The Kimball brothers, owners of the Rancho de la Nacion, had, during the flush times of the early '70s, laid off a town on the bay about four miles distant from San Diego, and named it National City. It had shared in the ups and downs of the larger city.

A NEW RAILROAD SCHEME.

In 1880 the Kimballs began agitating the project of inducing the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railroad, that had built out into New Mexico, to continue its road to San Diego and National City. They met with but little encouragement at home. For thirty years the people of San Diego had been talking Pacific railroad and their town was no nearer being the terminus of a trans-continental road in '80 than it was in '50. But the Kimballs persisted. One of the Kimball brothers went east at his own expense and presented his scheme to capitalists and railroad men. He met with little success at first, but the offer of 17,000 acres of land on the bay for workshops and terminal grounds induced the directors of the road to investigate the proposition. Other parties owning land contiguous offered additional grants. The railroad company accepted the subsidy and work was begun on the road; and in August, 1882, the California Southern, as the road was then called, was completed to Colton, on the Southern Pacific; and in 1884 to San Bernardino. There it stopped. The great flood of 1884 destroyed the track in the Temécula cañon and once more San Diego was without railroad connection. In 1885 the road through the cañon had been rebuilt and trains were running over it. During the same year the work of extending the California Southern to Barstow, a station on the Atlantic & Pacific, was begun, and early in 1887 was completed. This road and the connecting roads—the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe and the Atlantic & Pacific—formed a trans-continental system of which San Diego and National City were the western termini.

With the rebuilding of the California Southern through the cañon in 1885, and the beginning of work on its extension, the cloud of despondency that had darkened the hopes of the San Diegans began to lift a little; as work progressed and a trans-continental line became more of a certainty, capitalists and speculators came to the town to look around. The old-timers who had loaded up with lots in the boom of 1871-72 and had held on through all the intervening years, simply because they could not let go without losing all, began quietly to unload on the newcomers. The old resident had faith—faith unbounded—in the future of the city, but out of charity to the lot-less he was willing to divide a good thing; and when the transfer was made he chuckled over his smartness. But when the buyer turned over his purchase at an advance of twenty-five or fifty per cent the chuckle died away into a sigh and at the next transfer, when the price advanced a hundred per cent, the sigh increased to a groan.

As the reverberations of the boom grew louder the faithful old inhabitant turned speculator himself and loaded up perhaps with a single lot of the block he had formerly sold, at a price a hundred per cent higher than he had received for the entire tract. In the spring and summer of 1887, speculation ran riot in the streets of San Diego. Prices of real estate went up until it seemed as if they could go no higher; then some adventurous investor would break the record and the holders along the line would mark up the price of their holdings. Business lots, that a few years before were a drug on the market at $25 a front foot, found buyers at $2,500 a foot. A small-sized store room rented all the way from $300 to $500 a month for business, and if cut up into stalls for real estate brokers, brought in a thousand a month. Small and poorly furnished sleeping rooms rented all the way from $25 to $50 a month, prices varying with the landlord's cupidity and the tenant's necessity. The prices of labor kept pace with speculation. Carpenters received $5 to $6 a day, bricklayers $6 to $8. Barbers asked twenty-five cents for a shave and printers earned $50 to $60 a week.

The fame of San Diego's boom spread abroad. The trains came in loaded with speculators, boomers, gamblers and bona fide home-seekers. In the wild gold rush of the early '50s it was a common saying among old Californians "that renegade ministers made the most adroit gamblers." So in the boom of '87 the confiding home-seeker often proved to be the most unscrupulous operator. At one time during the height of the boom it was estimated that the city had a population of 50,000 people. It was a cosmopolitan conglomeration. Almost every civilized nation on earth was represented; and every social condition, high and low, good and bad, was there, too.

The excitement was not confined to San Diego city. It spread over the county. New towns were founded. The founder in selecting a location was governed more by the revenue that might accrue from his speculation than by the resources that would build up his inchoate metropolis. It might be platted on an inaccessible mesa, where view was the principal resource, or it might be a hyphenated city-by-the-sea, where the investor might while away his time listening to what the wild waves were saying and subsist on climate.

It is said that two town sites extended out over the bay like Mark Twain's tunnel that was bored through the hill and a hundred and fifty feet into the air. When the fever of speculation was at its height it mattered little where the town was located. A tastefully lithographed map with a health-giving sanatorium in one corner, a tourist hotel in the other, palms lining the streets, and orange trees in the distance—add to these picturesque attractions a glib-tongued agent, untrammelled by conscience and unacquainted with truth, and the town was successfully founded. Purchasers did not buy to hold, but with hope of making a quick turn at an advance, while the excitement was on. Very few had confidence in the permanency of high prices, but every one expected to unload before the crash came.

The tourist crop of the winter of 1887-88 was expected to be very large, but it did not mature. As the eventful year of 1887 drew to a close and new victims ceased to appear, he who had loaded up for the tourist began to look around quietly for a chance to unload on his fellows. Then he discovered to his dismay that all the others were at the same game. Then the crash came. The speculator who held the last contract could not pay; the one before him could not meet his obligations unless the man to whom he had sold paid up; and so it went all along the line like a row of bricks set on end. The end one toppling over the one next to it starts the movement down the line, and all go down. Before the ides of March had passed every speculator was vainly trying to save something from the wreck. Those who had invested recklessly in boom towns and dry lands lost all; those who had some good unincumbered property in a town or city with a future managed to save a little out of the crash, but "capitalist" no longer followed their names in the directory.

No better criterion probably can be given for measuring the great inflation of property values during the boom than the county assessment rolls for 1887 and 1888. The valuation of all property made by the county assessor at the beginning of the boom early in 1887 was $22,862,250. The assessed value fixed early in 1888 before the collapse had begun was $41,522,608, an increase of almost one hundred per cent in twelve months. In 1890 the assessment had contracted to $26,871,551.

But with all its wild extravagance, its recklessness, its gambling, its waste and its ruined "millionaires of a day," the boom to San Diego was a blessing in disguise. It projected enterprises of merit as well as those of demerit. It helped to make a reality of that "back country" that for years had been a myth, and it brought about the building of a substantial city of what had before been a crude and inchoate burgh. Strange to say, too, the great enterprises projected during the boom were all carried on to completion, notwithstanding the hard times that followed. Depression did not stop progression.

The San Diego Sun, two years after the boom, summing up what had been done since, says: "Since 1887, the Cuyamaca Railway has been built and motor lines extended at a cash outlay of $350,000; the Spreckel's Company has put $250,000 into a wharf and coal bunkers; all our business streets have been paved; a $100,000 court-house built and paid for; three fine school-houses, and all our big hotels except two constructed. Five miles of cable road have been built and put in operation; a fine public library has been established; a new opera-house will soon be completed. The adjacent mining regions have yielded at least $1,000,000 in gold. The great irrigating works of the Sweetwater dam and San Diego flume, involving an expense of $2,500,000, have been constructed, and water supplied at the lowest western prices. Not less than fifteen elegant business blocks have been built, and several fine churches. Over a hundred new residences have been built on Florence Heights alone. To sum it all up, $10,000,000 have been invested in San Diego and its environs since 1887, and the back country has obtained and planted 600,000 fruit trees; which, with those already out, promise to fill, seven years hence, 10,000 freight cars with merchantable products."

The Federal census of 1890 gave the population of county as 34,987; and that of the city 16,159. It was charged that the census of the city was very incorrectly taken and that the real population was over 20,000.

During the years 1889 and 1890 the city and county were recovering from the depression caused by the collapse of the boom, but 1891 was a year of disasters. February 22, a great flood entirely destroyed the railroad track through the Temécula cañon. The road through the cañon has never been rebuilt. During the same storm the Tia Juana River, that is usually a dry sand wash, became a tremendous torrent, spreading out until it was as wide as the Colorado in a spring rise. The town on the American side was entirely washed away, and of that on the Mexican only the houses on upper Mesa were left. The Otay Watch Works, started in 1887, and at one time employing over one hundred operatives, suspended and the employes were compelled to leave.

In October the California National Bank, with more than a million dollars in deposits, failed. The Savings Bank connected with it went down, too, in the crash. Neither ever resumed business. Their affairs were placed in the hands of a receiver. A few small dividends were paid the depositors, but the bulk of the deposits were lost by bad management, wild speculation and the doubtful business methods of J. W. Collins and his partner, D. D. Dare. Collins was arrested, and shortly afterwards committed suicide. Dare, who was in Europe at the time of the failure, never returned to San Diego.

February 7, 1892, the Pacific Mail steamers began stopping again at San Diego for passengers and freight. The wharf of the United States government station at La Playa was completed April 25, 1892. The cable road was extended to the Mission Cliff in July, 1892.

By an act of the Legislature, approved March 11, 1893, 6,418 square miles were taken from the northern part of San Diego to form the new county of Riverside. The new county appropriated $3,849,114 of the old county's assessed valuation. The area of San Diego is now 8,551 square miles. She parted with the towns of Temécula, Elsinore, Murietta, San Jacinto and Winchester. The county division scheme was opposed by San Diego and San Bernardino, but was carried in spite of their protests.

In 1896 the San Diego Brewery, costing $150,000, was erected entirely by San Diego capital.

In 1898, a decade after the collapse of the boom, the city had five miles of paved streets, forty-three miles of graded streets and forty-five miles of sewers. It had twenty-four churches and fourteen schools.

January 21, 1899, the steamship, Belgian King, the first of the California and Oriental Steamship Company's vessels, arrived in port.

August 22, 1899, the steamer, Thyra, the largest vessel that ever entered the port, drawing twenty-seven feet of water, passed safely over the bar and entered the harbor.

May 1, 1899, the State Normal School on the North Mesa was dedicated.

July 28, 1899, Andrew Carnegie donated San Diego $50,000 for a free public library building.

SCHOOLS.

The first public school opened in San Diego was taught by Manuel de Vargas, a retired sergeant of infantry. He was the pioneer schoolmaster of California, having taught a school at San José in 1794, the first school opened in the territory. He taught in San Diego from July, 1795, to December, 1798, at a yearly salary of $250. Don José Antonio Carrillo is said to have taught a school at the presidio in 1812-13. Antonio Menendez was teaching in the old town in 1828-29. Eighteen children were reported in attendance. In 1844 Governor Micheltorena issued a decree, establishing primary schools at San Diego, Los Angeles, Santa Barbara and several other towns. This seems to have been the last school taught at San Diego under Mexican rule.

After the American form of government was established, a school was opened in Old Town about 1853. The early school records have disappeared, if, indeed, any were kept.

In 1867, fifteen years after a public-school system had been established in California by law, San Diego county was all included in one school district and had but one teacher and one school house within its limits. It was then probably the largest school district in the United States. In 1866 the number of white children between five and fifteen years of age, according to the school census of that year, was 335. The census of 1867 gave an increase of only three, which would seem to indicate a short crop that year.

The number who attended public school in 1867 was thirty-two; those attending private schools twenty-two—a total attendance of fifty-four, or about sixteen per cent of the children of school age. This was but little, if any, improvement on the school attendance of Mexican days. In 1877 the census children had increased to 1,693; the number attending public schools 919, and private schools 112. The number of districts had increased to thirty-four and the number of teachers to thirty-five. In 1887 the total number of census children was 5,299; enrolled in the public schools, 3,952. The number of districts was eighty-two and the number of teachers, 115.

THE SAN DIEGO FREE PUBLIC LIBRARY.

The public library was founded in 1882. The first president of the library board was Bryant Howard; secretary, E. W. Hendrick; treasurer, G. H. Hitchcock; trustees, G. W. Marston and R. M. Powers. The Commercial Bank donated the free use of a room for six months. Donations of books were made by a number of persons and a city tax levied for the support of the library.

In the early part of 1899 Mrs. Lydia M. Horton, who was at that time a member of the free library board, wrote to the millionaire philanthropist, Andrew Carnegie, asking a donation to erect a library building. On the 28th of July, 1899, she received a letter from Mr. Carnegie, stating that "If the city were to pledge itself to maintain a free public library from the taxes, say to the extent of the amount you name of between $5,000 to $6,000 a year and provide a site, I shall be glad to give you $50,000 to erect a suitable library building." The proposition was accepted at once. A site was secured on E street, between Eighth and Ninth streets, at a cost of $17,000; of which $8,000 was raised by subscription and the balance paid by the city. The site covers half a block. The building now in course of erection will cost about $60,000. The library contains about 18,000 volumes. Mary E. Walker is the present librarian.

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

The San Diego Chamber of Commerce was organized January 20, 1870, and is the oldest institution of that kind in Southern California. The organizers were A. E. Horton, E. W. Morse, David Felsenheld, Aaron Pauly, G. W. B. McDonald, J. W. Gale, D. Choate and Joseph Nash. Its first president was Aaron Pauly; and first secretary, David Felsenheld. It has been for more than thirty years active in fostering and promoting every public enterprise looking to the welfare of San Diego city and county.

OTHER CITIES AND TOWNS.

OLD TOWN.

OLD TOWN, now the first ward of the city, is the San Diego of history and romance. It is three miles northwest of the city proper. The surf line of the Santa Fé Railroad system passes through the lower portion of it. From 1850 to 1868 it was the county seat. Prior to 1850 it was all that there was of the city or town of San Diego. Here the first germ of civilization in California was planted. The first mission was established here; and here the first Indian convert was baptized.

Dana and Robinson made it famous in their books on life in the California of olden times; and Helen Hunt Jackson has invested it with an air of romance by making it the scenes of the marriage of her hero and heroine in her story of Ramona. The house in which Ramona was married to Alessandro is still pointed out to the tourist.

The San Diego Sun of January 12, 1892, thus rudely tears away the veil of sentiment that Mrs. Jackson threw around her famous characters and shows them up as they were in real life: "The real Alessandro was a horse thief who was shot for his crimes by a San Jacinto man, who is still living. Ramona is a squaw of well-understood character, who lives upon her notoriety and her offenses."

NATIONAL CITY.

The Kimball Brothers in 1869 bought the Rancho de la Nacion, containing 27,000 acres. They subdivided a portion of it into farm lots, built a wharf and laid off a town on the bay four miles south of San Diego, which they named National City. They were quite successful in selling lots, and for a time there was a spirited and somewhat acrimonious rivalry between New Town and National City. The failure of the Texas Pacific Railroad disastrously affected it, as well as its rival. The California Southern Railroad, in consideration of a gift of 17,000 acres of land made by the Kimballs, located its Pacific terminus at National City. Again the town was on the high tide of prosperity. The removal of the railroad shops begun in 1892. The dry seasons of 1898-99 and 1900 have had a depressing effect upon it, but its inhabitants have not lost faith in its future.

CORONADO.

Coronado Beach, or Coronado as it is usually called, is a peninsula that divides San Diego Harbor from the ocean. Up to 1886 it was covered with a dense growth of chaparral. E. S. Babcock originated the scheme of building a town and an immense tourist hotel on it. The Coronado Beach Company was organized and work begun. The brush was cleared off, streets graded, sewers laid and town lots thrown on the market in time to be caught by the boom. The lots advanced rapidly in value and Babcock's scheme proved to have "millions in it." The erection of the Hotel del Coronado was begun early in 1887, and completed in December of that year. The building covers seven acres of ground and can accommodate seven hundred guests. It is one of the largest caravansaries in the world. The dreary and desolate looking peninsula of fifteen years ago is now covered with elegant residences, green lawns and flower gardens. It is reached from San Diego by a steam ferry that connects with an electric railroad that runs to the ocean front of the hotel, a mile distant from the ferry.

OCEANSIDE.

Oceanside on the surf line of the Santa Fe Railroad system is forty-one miles by rail north of San Diego. It was founded in 1884 and during the boom grew rapidly. The Fallbrook branch railroad, once the main line of the California Southern, leaves the Surf Line at Oceanside. The railroad to Escondido forms a junction here with the Surf Line between San Diego and Los Angeles.

The town is four miles from the Old Mission of San Luis Rey and has the rich San Luis Rey valley for its back country. It has several general merchandise stores which have a good local trade.

ESCONDIDO.

Escondido, Hidden Valley or Rincon del Diablo, The Devil's Corner, was formerly known as Wolfskill's rancho and comprises about 13,000 acres of the San Marcos grant. In 1885 it was purchased by a syndicate of San Diego and Los Angeles capitalists, who subdivided it into small farms and laid off a town. The lands had a rapid sale. A large hotel, a bank building and a number of business blocks were built between 1886 and 1890. The farm lands have been planted to citrus fruits and raisin grapes.

FALLBROOK.

Fallbrook, on the western slope of the Coast Range mountains, is twelve miles in a direct line from the coast and sixty-one from San Diego by the railroad. Since the great flood of 1892, which destroyed the railroad in the Temécula Cañon, Fallbrook has been the terminus of the eastern end of the road which is now known as the Fallbrook branch. The older settlement is back a mile or two from the railroad. The town has grown up since the building of the railroad. It has two large hotels and several business houses.

PALA (Shovel), once an asistencia or auxiliary of San Luis Rey Mission, is located in the upper San Luis Rey valley about seventeen miles from the coast and fifty miles north of San Diego. It is largely an Indian settlement. These descendants of the Mission Indians keep up many of the old customs and observances. The Mission Capilla or Chapel still stands in a fair state of preservation. Services are held in it once a month. There is here some of the finest vine and fruit land in the county.

JULIAN, fifty-five miles northeast from San Diego bay, in the mountain regions, is 4,500 feet above the sea level. It owes its origin to a mining rush. In February, 1870, gold was discovered near the ranch of M. S. Julian. The news of the discovery caused a rush and a town was built and named after the proprietor. A number of rich claims were located and for several years a considerable quantity of gold was taken out. The Cuyamaca grant owners laid claim to the mines. After a legal contest, lasting five years, the miners won. Much of the country around Julian is adapted to stock raising. There are some fine orchards of apples, pears, plums and peaches in the Julian district.

BANNER is a mining settlement four miles east of Julian, but 1,500 feet lower. It is on the desert side of the divide in the San Felipe Cañon, the waters of which sink into the desert. The town has several quartz mills, a store, post office and school house.

CHAPTER XXIV.

LOS ANGELES COUNTY.

EXTENT OF THE ORIGINAL COUNTY.

THE original county of Los Angeles was an empire in itself. It extended from the Pacific ocean on the west to the Colorado river on the east, and from San Diego county on the south to Mariposa on the north. Its area was about 32,000 square miles, or a little more than one-fifth of the area of the entire state. Excepting Maine, it was equal in size to the total area of the other five New England states.

The boundaries, as given in the act of February 18, 1850, dividing the state into counties, were very indefinite, but as a vast extent of Los Angeles county was a terra incognita, inhabited by wandering savages, no conflict arose in regard to jurisdiction, except with these Indians and that was settled by bullets and not by boundary lines.

An act of the second legislature repealed the former act, and more clearly defined the boundaries of the county. It is as follows:

"SECTION 3.—County of Los Angeles.—Beginning on the coast of the Pacific, at a point parallel with the northern boundary of the rancho called Malaga; thence in a direction so as to include said rancho, to the northwest corner of the rancho, known as Triunfo, running on the northerly line of the same to the northeast corner; thence to the summit of the ridge of hills called Santa Susanna; thence in a direct line to the rancho Casteyne (Castaic) and Lejon (El Tejon), and along their northern line to the northeastern corners, and thence in a northeast line to the eastern boundary of the state, and along said boundary line to the junction of the northern boundary of San Diego county with the Colorado; thence in a northwesterly direction parallel with the coast to a point three miles from land, and opposite to the southern boundary of the rancho called Malaga, and thence east to the place of beginning; including the island of Santa Catalina and San Clement. The seat of justice shall be at Los Angeles."

In 1851, a colony of Mormons from Salt Lake located where now the city of San Bernardino stands, on a tract of land bought from the Lugos.

They were reinforced by other immigrants from Salt Lake and by some non-Mormon families. The settlement grew quite rapidly. These settlers petitioned the legislature of 1853 to create a new county out of the eastern portion of Los Angeles county. By an act entitled, "An Act for dividing the county of Los Angeles and making a new county therefrom to be called San Bernardino county," approved April 26, 1853, it was provided:

"SECTION 3.—The county of Los Angeles is hereby divided as follows: Beginning at a point where a due south line drawn from the highest peak of the Sierra de Santiago intersects the northern boundary of San Diego county; thence running along the summit of said Sierra to the Santa Ana river, between the ranch of Sierra and the residence of Bernardo Yorba; thence across the Santa Ana river along the summit of the range of hills that lie between the Coyotes and Chino (leaving the ranchos of Ontiveras and Ybarra to the west of this line), to the southeast corner of the ranch of San Jose; thence along the eastern boundaries of said ranch and of San Antonio, and the western and northern boundaries of Cucaimonga ranch to the ravine of Cucaimonga; thence up said ravine to its source in the Coast Range; thence due north to the northern boundary of Los Angeles county; thence northeast to the State Line; thence along the State Line to the northern boundary line of San Diego county, thence westerly along the northern boundary of San Diego to the place of beginning.

"SECTION 4.—The eastern portion of Los Angeles county so cut off, shall be called San Bernardino county and the seat of justice thereof shall be at such a place as a majority of voters shall determine at the first county election, hereinafter provided to be held in said county and shall remain at the place so designated until changed by the people, as provided by law."

The formation of the new county cut off about 24,000 square miles from Los Angeles, but still leaving her 8,000 square miles. She held on to this territory for thirteen years, then she had to give up another slice of her territory, but as this was mostly mountains and deserts there was no opposition to the segregation.

In 1866 the county of Kern was formed out of portions of Tulare and Los Angeles counties. The area of Los Angeles after the creation of Kern county was about 5,000 square miles.

In 1869 began the struggle to cut off a portion from the southeastern part to form a new county. This movement the people of Los Angeles resisted. The contest over county division lasted for twenty years. It ended in 1889 with the formation of Orange county. The story of this long drawn out contest is told in full in the history of Orange county.

After the formation of Orange county Los Angeles had an area of 3,880 square miles. In 1891 an effort was made to cut a slice off the eastern side to form with territory taken from San Bernardino the county of Pomona. Fortunately the scheme failed.

ORGANIZATION OF THE COUNTY GOVERNMENT.

The transition from the Mexican form of government in California to that of the United States was very gradual. Los Angeles the last Mexican stronghold surrendered January 10, 1847. It was not until June 24, 1850, that the American municipal form of government by county officers superseded the ayuntamientos, alcaldes, prefects and syndicos of Spain and Mexico. The legislature had passed a county government act, February 18, 1850, and had provided for an election of county officers to be held the first Monday of April. The election was held, April 1, 377 votes were cast in the county and the following named officers elected: county judge, Augustin Olvera; county attorney, Benjamin Hays; county clerk, B. D. Wilson; sheriff, G. Thompson Burrill; treasurer, Manuel Garfias; assessor, Antonio F. Coronel; recorder, Ignacio del Valle; surveyor, J. R. Conway; coroner, Charles B. Cullen.

COURT OF SESSIONS.

The court of sessions which consisted of the county judge and two justices of the peace constituted the legislative body of the county governments of the state up to 1853, when the civil business of the counties was turned over to a board of supervisors, created by an act of the legislature. The court of sessions had jurisdiction over the criminal business, the impaneling of juries and filling vacancies in office up to 1865, when it was legislated out of office.

The court of sessions was the motive power that set the county machinery in operation. The first meeting of the court in Los Angeles was held June 24, 1850. Hon. Augustin Olvera was the presiding judge; the associate justices were Jonathan R. Scott and Luis Roubideau. Antonio F. Coronel, assessor-elect, and Charles R.

Cullen, coroner-elect, were cited before the court to qualify and file their official bonds. Coronel appeared next day and qualified, but Cullen declined to serve.

At the meeting of the court, June 26, jailer Samuel Whiting was allowed $7 per day salary, out of which he was to employ a competent assistant. He was allowed "for feeding the prisoners, fifty cents each; that each prisoner shall have per day an amount of bread to the value of twelve and one-half cents or an equivalent in rice or beans; balance of the allowance in good meat."

A. P. Hodges, M. D., was appointed coroner (during his term as coroner he also served as the first mayor of the city). The county judge could not speak English and at least one associate judge spoke no Spanish, so G. Thompson Burrill was appointed county interpreter for the court at a salary of $50 per month. He was also sheriff.

At the session of July 11, 1850, it was ordered that the town council be permitted to work the county prisoners by paying the daily expense of each one's keeping—fifty cents. A master stroke of economy. Some one has sneeringly said that the first public buildings the Americans built in California after it came into their possession, were jails. This was true of Los Angeles and in fact of all the counties of southern California.

July 11, 1850, commissioners were appointed by the city and county to select a site for a jail. Lots Nos. 1, 2, 3, 7, 8 and 9 in square No. 34 (north of the Plaza church) were selected for a jail site. The city council was asked to donate said lots to the county and the city was requested to loan the county $2,000, to be used in building said jail, the city council to have permission to use said jail until the loan is refunded. The city fathers did not take kindly to these requests of the judges; so the county had to worry along two years longer before a jail was built and then it was not built on the site selected by the joint commission.

JUDGES OF THE PLAINS.

There was one Hispano-American institution that long survived the fall of Mexican domination in California; and that was the office of Jueces del Campo, Judges of the Plains. A judge of the plains was a very important functionary. It was his duty to be present at the annual Rodeos (round ups of cattle), and Recojedas (gathering up of horses). His seat of justice was in the saddle, his court room the mesa, and from his decision there was no appeal. All disputes about ownership of stock came before him. The code of his court was unwritten, or mostly so, which was fortunate for many of the judges could not read. This hap-hazard way of administering justice did not suit American ideas, so, at a meeting of the court of sessions, July 23, 1850, the county attorney was ordered "to collect the various Bandos and Reglamentos heretofore made in this district respecting the Jueces del Campo and give his opinion upon the same at the next term of this court." At the session of the court, August 22, the county attorney reported a number of regulations, some written, others established by custom. The court added several new regulations to those already existing, the most important of which (to the Jueces) was a salary of one hundred dollars a year to each judge, payable out of the county treasury. Under Mexican rule the plains judge took his pay in honor. As there were a round dozen of these officials in the county in 1850, their aggregate pay exceeded the entire expense of the municipal government of the district during the last year of the Mexican rule. After jails the next innovation the Americans introduced was taxes.

Even at this early day, before California had become a state, there were "Patriotas de Bolsa" (patriots of the pocket), men who knew how to make a good thing of their patriotic services. In the summer of 1850, an expedition under Gen. Joseph C. Morehead had been sent against the mountain Indians, who had been stealing horses from the Los Angeles rancheros. In a skirmish with the Indian horse thieves, a militiaman named William Carr was wounded. Gen. Morehead sent him back to Los Angeles to have him taken care of. At the session of the court, September 18th, the medico who doctored the wounded soldier presented a bill of $503; the patriotic American who boarded him demanded $120, and the man who lodged him charged $45 for house rent. The native Californian who waited on him was satisfied with $30, but then he was not a patriot! The bills were approved, but as the county treasury was as empty as the rancho's corrals after an Indian raid, the accounts were referred to the incoming legislature for settlement. It is gratifying to know that this valuable soldier "lived to fight another day," but it is to be hoped that for motives of economy he kept out of reach of Indian arrows.

FEES AND SALARIES.

The first fee and salary bill of California was based upon prices ruling in the mining counties where a sheriff's fees amounted to more than the salary of the president of the United States. The liberal fees allowed for official services soon bankrupted the treasuries of the cow counties, and in 1851 they were petitioning the legislature for a reduction of fees. It cost $100 to hold an inquest on a dead Indian and as violent deaths were of almost daily or nightly occurrence, the coroner's office was quite lucrative. Some of the verdicts of the coroner's juries showed remarkable familiarity with the decrees of the Almighty. On a native Californian named Gamico, found dead in the street, the verdict was "Death by the visitation of God." Of a dead Indian, found near the zanja, the Los Angeles Star says: "Justice Dryden and a jury sat on the body. The verdict was 'Death from intoxication or by the visitation of God.' Bacilio was a Christian Indian and was confessed by the reverend padre yesterday afternoon." The jurors were paid $10 each for sitting on a body. Coroner Hodges made the champion record on inquests. October 20, 1851, he held eleven inquests in one day. These were held on Irving's band of horse thieves and robbers who were killed by the Cahuilla Indians in the San Bernardino mountains.

The criminal element had been steadily increasing in Los Angeles. In 1851, a military company was organized to aid the sheriff in keeping order. November 24, 1851, the court of session ordered that the sheriff cause fifty good lances to be made for the use of the volunteer company. The pioneer blacksmith, John Goller, made the lances and was paid $87.50 for the job. Goller also made a branding iron for the county. The county brand consisted of the letters "LA" three inches long. In January, 1852, the house occupied by Benjamin Hays, under lease from Felipe Garcia, was sublet by him to the county for a court house for the balance of his term, expiring November 16, 1853. The sum of $650 was appropriated by order of the court of sessions to pay the rent for the agreed term. The first building used for a court house was the old government house that Pio Pico bought from Isaac Williams for the capitol. Pico had resided in it during his term as governor. After the conquest two companies of United States Dragoons were quartered in it. A contract was let, July 8, 1851, to build a jail and John G. Nichols appointed at $6 a day to superintend the job, but some misunderstanding with the city arising, the building was not erected, and September 13, 1851, the court ordered the sheriff to sell the adobes now on hand for use of jail at the highest market price and turn the money over to the clerk of the court.

The first county jail was the adobe building on the hill back of the Downey (then Temple) block used by the troops for a guard house. There were no cells in it. Staples were driven into a heavy pine log that reached across the building and short chains attached to the staples were fastened to the handcuffs of the prisoners. Solitary confinement was out of the question then. Indian culprits were chained to logs outside of the jail so that they could more fully enjoy the glorious climate of California. In 1853, the city and county built a jail on the present site of the Phillips block, northwest corner of Spring and Franklin streets. It was the first public building erected in the county.

The legislature of 1852 created the office of county supervisor. The first election for supervisors of the county was held June 14, 1852, and the following named persons elected: Jefferson Hunt, Julian Chavis, Francisco P. Temple, Manuel Requena and Samuel Arbuckle. The board held its first meeting on the first Monday of July, 1852. Arbuckle was elected chairman. The supervisors transacted the civil business of the county.

The machinery of the county's government was now in full working order. We will turn our attention to other phases of its development.

THE FIRST DECADE OF COUNTY'S HISTORY, 1850-1860.

LAND GRANTS.

In what comprised the original county of Los Angeles there were during the Spanish and Mexican regimes sixty grants of land made. These varied in size from a grant of 44.36 acres to the Mission of San Juan Capistrano to the Rancho Ex-Mission of San Fernando, granted to Eulogio de Celis, containing 121,619.24 acres.

At the time of the conquest about all the land fit for pasturage had been sequestered from the public domain in the form of grants. The oldest grants made within what is now the county of Los Angeles are the Nietos and the San Rafael. According to Col. J. J. Warner's historical sketch, "The Nietos tract, embracing all the land between the Santa Ana and San Gabriel and from the sea to and including some of the hill land on its northeastern frontier, was granted by Governor Pedro Fages to Manuel Nieto in 1784."

"The San Rafael tract, lying on the left bank of the Los Angeles river and extending to the Arroyo Seco, was granted by Governor Pedro Fages, October 20, 1784, and the grant was re-affirmed by Governor Borica, January 12, 1798, to José Maria Verdugo." If, as Col. Warner claims, the "Nietos tract" embraced all the land between the Santa Ana and the San Gabriel rivers, from the sea to the hills, Nietos' heirs did not hold it. Subsequently there were a number of grants made in that territory. The Mission San Gabriel, previous to 1830, had possession of several subdivisions of this tract such as Las Bolsas, Alamitos, Los Coyotes, Puente and others. After the secularization of the missions all the lands held by the padres, except small tracts in the immediate neighborhood of the mission buildings, were granted to private owners.

Shortly after the admission of California to the Union the long-drawn-out legal contests over the confirmation of the Spanish and Mexican grants began. These contests, in some cases, were waged for years before the United States Claims Commission, the various courts and the land commissioner at Washington, before they were settled. Litigation often ruined both the contesting parties, and when the case was finally decided the litigants, like in "Jarndyce vs. Jarndyce," had nothing left but bundles of legal documents. Even when a claimant did win and the decisions of courts and commissions gave him undisputed possession of his broad acres, it often happened that a cancerous mortgage, the result of litigation, was eating away his patrimony. The land grants in Los Angeles have all been confirmed and it is to be hoped that they will remain so. No greater blight can fall on a community than an attack upon the validity of its title to its lands.

In early times the county officials followed the Mexican plan of designating districts and legal subdivision by ranchos. August 7, 1851, the court of sessions "ordered that the county of Los Angeles be divided into six townships named as follows; and to comprehend the ranchos and places as follows to each appropriated." The first of these was the township of Los Angeles. There are few now living who could trace from the description given in the records the boundaries of Los Angeles township fifty years ago. Here is the description:

TOWNSHIP OF LOS ANGELES.—"The city of Los Angeles and the following ranchos, to-wit: Los Corralitos, Feliz, Verdugos, Cahuenga, Tujunga, San Fernando, ex-Mission, San Francisco, Piro, Camulos, Cañada de los Alamos, La Liebre, El Tejon, Triunfo, Las Vergenes, Escorpion, Los Cuervos, San Antonio de la Mesa, Los Alamitos, Vicente Lugo, Arroyo, Seco, Encino, Maligo, Santa Monica, San Vicentes, Buenos Ayres, La Bayona, Rincon de los Buey, Rodeo de Las Aguas, La Cienega, La Centinela, Sausal Redondo, Palos Verdes, San Pedro, Los Dominguez, Rancho Nuevo, Paredon Blanco, Los Serritos, La Jaboneria, Rosa de Castilla."

"The residence of the authorities shall be in Los Angeles city."

IMMIGRANTS AND OVERLAND ROUTES.

Cattle raising continued to be the dominant industry. To make it successful under the conditions then existing it was necessary to hold the land in large tracts. The demand for beef caused by the rush of immigration to the state raised the price of cattle until a well-stocked rancho was more profitable than a gold mine. The overland travel by the various southern routes, all of which converged in Los Angeles, gave a home market for a considerable amount of the home products.

The Sonorese migration began in 1848 as soon as the news of the discovery of gold in California reached Mexico. While these gold-seekers were called Sonorese or Sonorians, they came from the different states of Northern Mexico, but in greater numbers from Sonora. The trail from Mexico by way of Aristo, Tucson, the Pima villages, across the desert and through the San Gorgonio Pass had been traveled for three-quarters of a century. Another branch of this trail crossed the desert from Yuma to Warner's ranch; and then by way of Temécula, Jurupa and the Chino, reached Los Angeles. Along these trails from 1848 to 1852 came the Sonorese migration. These pilgrims to the shrine of Mammon were a hard lot. They were poor and ignorant and not noted for good morals. From Los Angeles northward, they invariably traveled by the coast route, and in squads of from 50 to 100. Some of them brought their women and children with them. With their few possessions packed on donkeys and mules they tramped their weary way from Mexico to the mines. They were not welcomed to the land of gold. The Americans disliked them and the native Californians treated them with contempt. The men wore cotton shirts, white pantaloons, sandals and sombreros. Their apparel, like the laws of the Medes and Persians, "changed not," nor did they change it as long as a shred of it held together. The native Californians nicknamed them "calzonares blancos" (white breeches), and imposed upon them when an opportunity offered. The story is told of a native Californian alcalde or justice of the peace who had his office near the old mission church of San Luis Obispo. When a band of these Sonorian pilgrims came along the highway which led past the old mission, they invariably stopped at the church to make the sign of the cross and to implore the protection of the saints. This gave the alcalde his opportunity. Stationing his alguaciles or constables on the road to bar their progress, he proceeded to collect fifty cents toll of each pilgrim. If word was passed back to the squads behind and they attempted to avoid the toll-gatherer by a detour to the right or left, the alcalde sent out his mounted constables and rounded up the poor Sonorians like so many cattle at a rodeo, then he and his alguaciles committed highway robbery on a small scale. Retributive justice overtook this unjust judge. The vigilantes hanged him, not, however, for tithing the Sonorese, but for horse stealing.

The Sonorian migration began to decline after 1850, and entirely ceased a year or two later. The foreign miner's tax and their persecution by the Americans convinced the Sonorians that there was no place like home. So they went home and stayed there.

A route by which a number of immigrants from Texas and some of the other Gulf states came in 1849 led through the northern states of Mexico until it intercepted the Sonora trail and then by that to Los Angeles.

The old Santa Fe trail to New Mexico; then across Arizona, following the Gila to the Colorado river, was another southern route by which a great deal of overland travel reached Southern California. In 1854, from actual count, it was ascertained that 9,075 persons came by that route. About one-fourth of the 61,000 overland immigrants who came to the state that year reached it by the southern routes. But the route by which the majority of the argonauts of '49 and the early '50s reached Southern California led south from Salt Lake City until it intercepted the great Spanish trail from Los Angeles to Santa Fe at the southern end of Utah Lake. Immigrants by this route, crossing the Colorado desert, reached the San Bernardino valley through the Cajon Pass. Capt. Jedediah S. Smith, in 1826, was the first white man to reach Los Angeles by this trail. There was considerable trade and travel between Santa Fé and Los Angeles over the old Spanish trail before the conquest of California. The early immigration from New Mexico came by this route. By it came J. J. Warner, William Wolfskill, the Rowland-Workman party, numbering forty-four persons; B. D. Wilson, D. W. Alexander, John Reed, Dr. John Marsh and many other pioneers.

For several years before the conquest, on account of the hostility of the Indians, this trail had been little used, and to the great army of the Argonauts who crossed the plains in 1849 it was unknown. The belated immigrants of that year who reached Salt Lake too late to cross the Sierra Nevadas had the alternative presented them of wintering with the Saints or of finding a southern route into California and thus evading the fate that befell the Donner party in the snows of the Sierras. These delayed Argonauts found a Mormon captain, Jef-person Hunt, late captain of Company A of the Mormon Battalion, who had recently arrived in Salt Lake by this southern route. He was engaged as a guide. A train of about 500 wagons started in November, 1849, for Southern California. After several weeks' travel, a number of the immigrants having become dissatisfied with Hunt's leadership, and hearing that there was a shorter route to the settlements than the train was pursuing, seceded from the main body and struck out westward across the desert. After traveling for several days together, they disagreed. Some returned to the main body; the others broke up into small parties and took different directions. One of these parties, numbering eleven persons, penetrated Death valley and all perished. Another, after incredible hardships and having lost several of their number on the desert, reached Los Angeles by the Soledad Pass. Another company, after weeks of wandering and suffering, reached the Tulare valley, where they were relieved by the Indians. The main body, with but little inconvenience, arrived in San Bernardino valley the last of January, 1850.

After the establishment of the Mormon colony at San Bernardino, in June, 1851, the Salt Lake route became a well-traveled road, over which, up to the completion of the Union Pacific Railroad in 1869, a large amount of freight and travel passed between the City of the Saints and the City of the Angels. By this route came a number of the pioneer American families of Los Angeles. Among others may be named the Macys, Andersons, Workmans, Ulyards, Hazards, Montagues.

COMMERCIAL CONVEYANCES.

San Pedro was, in 1850, as it had been for more than half a century before, the entrepot through which the commerce of the Los Angeles district passed. It was, next to San Francisco, the principal seaport of the coast. In the early '50s all the trade and travel up and down the coast came and went by sea. No stage lines had been established in the lower coast counties. In 1848, and for several years after, the only means of getting to the city from the port and vice versa was on horseback. A cabalada (band) of horses were kept in pasture on the Palos Verdes. When a ship was sighted in the offing, the vaqueros rounded up the mustangs, lassoed them and had them saddled, ready for the passengers when they came ashore. As the horses were half-broken broncos, and the passengers mostly newcomers from the states, unused to the tricks of bucking mustangs, the trip usually ended in the passenger arriving in the city on foot, the bronco having landed his rider at some point most convenient to him (the bronco,) not the passenger.

In 1849 Temple and Alexander had a general merchandise store at San Pedro, and did about all the forwarding business of the port. Goods were freighted to Los Angeles in carts drawn by two yoke of oxen yoked by the horns. The carts were similar to the Mexican carretas, except that they had spoked and tired wheels instead of solid ones. A regular freight train was composed of ten carts and forty oxen. Freight charges were $20 a ton. In 1852, stages were put on the route by Banning & Alexander. Tomlinson put on an opposition line, and in 1853 B. A. Townsend was running an accommodation line between the city and the port and advertising in the Star, "Good coaches and teams as the county will afford." The stage fare was at first $10, then $7.50, dropped to $5, and as opposition increased went down to $1, and as the rivalry grew keener passengers were carried free.

The first steamer that ever entered the bay of San Pedro was the "Gold Hunter," which anchored in the port in 1849. She was a side-wheel vessel which made the voyage from San Francisco to Mazatlan, touching at way ports.

The "Gold Hunter" was followed by the steamers "Ohio," "Southerner," "Sea Bird" and "Goliath" in 1850 and 1851. In 1853 the "Sea Bird" was making three trips a month between San Francisco and San Diego, touching at Monterey, Santa Barbara and San Pedro. The price of a first-cabin passage from San Pedro to San Francisco in the early '50s was $55. The bill of fare consisted of salt beef, hard bread, potatoes and coffee without milk or sugar. Freight charges were $25 a ton. It cost $10 to transport a barrel of flour from San Francisco to Los Angeles. The trip occupied four days. The way ports were Santa Barbara, San Luis Obispo and Monterey. There were no wharves or lighters on the route; passengers and freight were landed in the steamer's boats. If the sea was very rough, the passengers were carried to San Francisco and brought back on the return trip. Sometimes when the tide was low they had to be carried from the boat to the shore on the sailors' backs. The sailor, like the bronco, sometimes bucked, and the passenger waded ashore. Both man and beast were somewhat uncertain "in the days of gold—the days of '49."

The imports by sea greatly exceeded the exports. Cattle and horses, the principal products of the county, transported themselves to market. The vineyards along the river principally within the city limits were immensely profitable in the early '50s. There was but little fresh fruit in the country. Grapes, in San Francisco, retailed all the way from twenty-five to fifty cents a pound. The vineyards were cultivated by Indian labor. About all that it cost the vineyardist for labor was the amount of aguardiente that it took to give the Indian his regular Saturday night drunk. So the grape crop was about all profit.

FIRST STATE CENSUS.

The first state census of California was taken in 1852. According to this census the county had a total population of 7,831, divided as follows:

Whites—
Males	2,496
Females	1,597
<hr/>
Total	4,093
Domesticated Indians—
Males	2,278
Females	1,415

The cattle numbered 113,475; horses, 12,173; wheat produced 34,230 bushels; barley, 12,120 bushels; corn, 6,934 bushels. Number of acres under cultivation, 5,587; grape vines, 450,000, of which 400,000 were within the city. This was before any portion of the county had been segregated. Its limits extended from San Juan Capistrano on the south to the Tulares on the north, and from the sea to the Colorado river; of its 32,000 square miles, less than nine square miles were cultivated, and yet it had been settled for three-quarters of a century.

During the '50s the county grew slowly. Land was held in large tracts and cattle raising continued to be the principal industry. At the El Monte several families from the southwestern states had formed a small settlement and were raising grain, principally corn. The Mormons, at San Bernardino, were raising corn, wheat, barley and vegetables, and selling them at a good price. One season they received as high as $5 a bushel for their wheat.

CHAPTER XXV.

LOS ANGELES COUNTY—Continued.

A GOLD RUSH AND GOLD PLACERS.

THE famous Kern river gold rush of 1855 brought an influx of population. Some of that population was very undesirable. The gold rush made business lively for a time, but when the reaction came it left a number of wrecks financially stranded. This mining excitement had one good effect: it called the attention of the Angeleños to the mineral resources of their own county and indirectly brought about their development.

Francisco Lopez discovered gold in the San Feliciano cañon of the San Fernando mountains, March 9, 1841. Gold was discovered in several other cañons of this district and these placers were worked in a desultory sort of a way up to 1848. When the news of Marshall's discovery at Coloma reached Los Angeles, all the experienced miners left for the northern mines, and the gold placers of Los Angeles were abandoned. The Kern river gold rush brought a number of experienced miners to the county, and the San Fernando mines were again opened and a considerable amount of gold dust taken from them. It is reported that Francisco Garcia, working the mines with a gang of Indians, took out $65,000 in 1855. Gold was discovered on the headwaters of the San Gabriel river in 1855. In 1856 the Santa Anita placers, fifteen miles from Los Angeles city, were discovered and mined; the miners making from $5 to $10 a day. In 1858 the Santa Anita Mining Company was organized with a capital of $50,000, hydraulic works constructed, and the gulches mined. The mines paid well. During 1858 and 1859 the cañon of the San Gabriel was prospected for forty miles, and some rich placers located. Two hydraulic companies took out $1,000 a week each. Two Mexicans with a common wooden bowl or batea panned out $90 in two days. In July, 1859, 300 men were at work in the cañon, and all reported doing well. The next year, 1860, was a prosperous season for the miners. Altogether since their discovery, over sixty years ago, it is estimated that the gold placers of Los Angeles have yielded not less than $5,000,000.

Notwithstanding the county was producing gold, grain and cattle, in the later '50s times were hard, money scarce and rates of interest exorbitant. "Eight, ten and even fifteen per cent a month," says the Southern Californian, "is freely paid for money, and the supply even at these rates is too meager to meet the demand." This state of affairs was caused largely by the reaction from the flush times of the early '50s. The native Californians, the principal land-holders, were bad financiers. When times were good and money plentiful, they spent lavishly. When dry years came or the price of cattle fell from over-production, they did not retrench expenses, but mortgaged their lands to procure spending money. With such usurious rates of interest prevailing, it was only a question of the leniency of their creditors when they would be compelled to part with their ancestral acres.

THE SECOND DECADE, 1860-1870.

FLOODS.

The years 1859, 1860, 1861-62 were seasons of abundant rainfall. Indeed, the fluvial downpour of 1861-62 was altogether too abundant. Never before, within the memory of the oldest inhabitant, had there been such floods. The season's rainfall footed up nearly fifty inches. The valley of the Sacramento became a vast inland sea and the city of Sacramento was inundated and almost ruined. Relief boats on their errands of mercy, leaving the channels of the rivers, sailed over submerged ranchos, past floating houses and wrecks of barns, through vast flotsams made up of farm products, farming implements and the carcasses of horses, cattle and sheep, all drifting out to sea. The losses in the Sacramento and San Joaquin valleys footed up into the millions. In Los Angeles county, on account of the smaller area of the valleys and the shortness of the rivers, there was but little loss of property. The rivers spread over the lowlands, but the stock found safety from the flood on the hills. The Santa Ana river for a time rivaled the Father of Waters in magnitude. In the town of Anaheim, four miles from the river, the water ran four feet deep and spread in an unbroken sheet to the Coyote hills, three miles beyond. The Arroyo Seco, swollen to a mighty river, brought down from the mountains and cañons great rafts of driftwood, which were scattered over the plains below the city, and furnished fuel to the poor people for several years. It began raining December 24, 1861, and continued for thirty days with but two slight interruptions.

FAMINE YEARS.

As a result of three successive years of abundant rainfall and consequent luxuriant pasturage, the rancheros allowed their stock ranges to become overstocked. When the famine years of 1863 and 1864 came, the dry feed on the ranges was soon exhausted, and cattle were slowly dying of starvation. Herds of gaunt, skeleton-like forms moved slowly over the plains in search of food. Here and there, singly or in small groups, poor brutes, too weak to move on, stood motionless with drooping heads, dying. It was a pitiful sight. The loss of cattle during the famine years was fearful. The plains were strewn with their carcasses. In marshy places and around the cienegas where there was a vestige of green the ground was covered with their skeletons; and the traveler for years afterwards was often startled by coming suddenly upon a veritable Golgotha—a place of skulls—the long horns standing out in a defiant attitude, as if defending the fleshless bones. It was estimated that 50,000 head of cattle died on the Stearns' ranchos alone. In 1860 the county assessment was $3,064,701; in 1864, $1,622,370.

Don Abel Stearns, one of the greatest of the cattle barons of Southern California, was reduced almost to the verge of bankruptcy. In 1864 all of his landed possessions, consisting of seven ranchos, aggregating over one hundred thousand acres, and all of his city lots and lands were advertised for sale on account of the delinquent taxes of 1863, the total amount of which was a little over $2,000. The lot on the southeast corner of Spring and Second streets, now worth a quarter of a million, was sold in 1863 for $37. Two thousand acres in East Los Angeles were sold in 1864 by the city council for fifty cents per acre. The purchaser took it under protest because the council would not sell him less. Never before had the people of the county been in such financial straits. To add to the miseries of hard times, the people were divided into two hostile factions—Union and Secession. The Civil war was in progress. The Confederate sympathizers were largely in the majority in the county. While there were no active hostilities between the factions, there was a great deal of ill feeling. The Confederate sympathizers were loud in their denunciations of the government and the flag under which they were living and had lived all their lives. However, beyond a few arrests, these would-be Confederates were not harmed.

Los Angeles furnished but one representative to the Union army—that is, one who was an actual resident of the city at the breaking out of the war—and he was Charles M. Jenkins, of the California Hundred. One company of the Native California Battalion was raised in Los Angeles and one in Santa Barbara. This battalion did service against the Indians in Arizona. Camp Latham was established at Ballona in 1861, and the Fourth California Infantry was stationed there for a time. Camp Dunn was established at Wilmington in 1862. All the supplies for the soldiers in Arizona, New Mexico and Utah passed through Wilmington. A small force was kept at Camp Dunn during the war. At one time a squad of soldiers was stationed at Los Angeles to keep the secessionists in check.

The great drought of 1863 and 1864 sealed the doom of cattle raising as the distinctive industry of Los Angeles. The plentiful rainfalls of 1865-66 gave abundant feed, but the ranchos were thinly stocked and their owners were in no condition financially to add to their depleted herds. It was evident that the dynasty of the cattle kings was ended. Hereafter there must be new industries, new methods, new men, if the country would thrive.

SUBDIVISION OF LARGE RANCHOS.

In 1868, what was known as the Stearns' ranchos, an immense body of land, containing about 150,000 acres, and lying between the San Gabriel and Santa Ana rivers, was sold to a syndicate of San Francisco capitalists. This tract contained the original ranchos of Los Coyotes, La Habra, San Juan Cajon de Santa Ana, Las Bolsas y Paredes, La Bolsa Chica, and part of the Alamitos. It was divided into sections and subdivisions of sections in 1868, and put on sale in tracts of forty acres and upward. Immigration began to drift southward in 1868 and 1869 and a number of settlers purchased farms in the Stearns' ranchos and in others that had been divided or partially divided, and began raising grain. The soil was rich and the yield was enormous. As yet but little attention had been paid to fruit culture. The decade closed with the agricultural transformation of the county fairly begun.

THE THIRD DECADE—1870-1880.

RAILROADS.

The third decade of American supremacy in Southern California was an era of railroad building and colony founding. The first railroad line constructed in the county extended from Los Angeles city to Wilmington. It was completed October 26, 1869. The legislature, in 1868, passed bills authorizing the board of supervisors of the county to subscribe $150,000 to the capital stock of a railroad between Los Angeles and Wilmington, and the mayor and common council to subscribe $75,000 to the same object. An election was held and the bonds carried. Ground was broken at Wilmington, March 19, 1868, and the road pushed to completion. Freights and fare were high. It cost $6 to get a ton of freight from anchorage to Los Angeles. It cost a passenger a dollar and a half from the steamer on one of Banning's tugs to Wilmington and a dollar more on the railroad to reach the city. Yet nobody complained and the people clamored for more railroads. The Southern Pacific was building a trans-continental line southeastward and there was a chance for Los Angeles on a through line. After considerable negotiation between a committee of the people of Los Angeles and the directors of the Southern Pacific Railroad, the Southern Pacific people proposed to build fifty miles of their main trunk line through Los Angeles county, twenty-five miles north from the city and twenty-five east, on condition that the people vote a subsidy to the company of five per cent of the taxable property of the county. The Los Angeles and San Pedro Railroad, valued at $225,000, was to be part of the consideration.

An election was called, November 5, 1872, and the proposition accepted by the people. The total consideration, bonds and lands, given the railroad, amounted to $610,000. To appease the people of the southeastern part of the county and secure their votes for the bonds, the railroad company agreed to build a branch road to Anaheim, twenty-seven miles. Work on the road was pushed vigorously and trains to San Fernando, the northern end, and to Spadra, the eastern end, were run April 24, 1874. The great tunnel, 6,964 feet long, under a spur of the San Fernando mountains, twenty-seven miles north of Los Angeles, delayed the early completion of the road. On the 6th of September, 1876, the northern and southern ends of the road were united at Soledad Station, in a cañon of that name; the golden spike was driven with a hammer of silver, and a train bearing the dignitaries of the company and invited guests passed over the road from San Francisco to Los Angeles. A grand banquet was held in Union hall, followed by a grand ball, which lasted till morning, when the San Franciscans returned to their home city on the first through train over the road from the Los Angeles end. The road was pushed on eastward, and in 1882 was completed to El Paso, where it united with the eastern end and Los Angeles had a trans-continental road. The Anaheim branch was completed to that town January 17, 1875.

THE LOS ANGELES AND INDEPENDENCE RAILROAD COMPANY was incorporated in January, 1875. The purpose of the company was to build a railroad beginning at Santa Monica and passing through Los Angeles and San Bernardino and from there by way of the Cajon Pass to Independence, Inyo county. Work was begun at once and the first train between Los Angeles and Santa Monica passed over the road December 1, 1875. A long wharf was built at Santa Monica and ocean steamers stopped there for passengers and freight. The financial panic of 1875 and the dry years that followed put an end to the extension of the road. In 1878 it was sold to the Southern Pacific Company, and that company pulled down the wharf because it did not pay to maintain two shipping points.

COLONIES.

Among the earliest colony projects of this decade was the San Pasqual plantation scheme. Its prospectus was published in the city papers during April and May, 1870. The advertisements stated that "The tract of land selected is a portion of the San Pasqual ranch in Los Angeles county, comprising 1,750 acres of the finest quality. A ditch which forms the northern boundary of the tract, at a cost of $10,000, has also been purchased. The ditch furnishes in the driest seasons sufficient water to irrigate the entire tract. It is proposed to cultivate this land with oranges, lemons, olives, nuts, raisins, grapes, etc., and to commence at once. For this purpose the above company has been formed, with a capital of $200,000, divided into 4,000 shares of $50 each. Payments to be made in regular and easy installments as follows: $10 per share at date of subscription and $5 each year afterward till the whole amount is paid. All money to be used in paying for the land and cultivating the same." When the trees and vines should come into bearing it was proposed to divide the lands among the colonists on the plan that the Anaheim colony lands were divided among the shareholders in 1859. The projectors of the scheme were San Francisco and Los Angeles capitalists. Subscription books were opened at the office of R. M. Widney in the Hellman Bank building. Stock in the company did not go off like the proverbial hot cakes. The scheme was a failure. Citrus fruit culture then was in its infancy, and a very young infant at that. The few orange orchards in the county were on the sandy land of the river bottom. The scheme of growing oranges on the gravelly lands of the San Pasqual was laughed to scorn by the wise old-timers who knew it all.

The most successful colony scheme of the '70s was the Indiana Colony of California. It had its inception in Indianapolis, Ind., in the winter of 1872-73. Dr. T. B. Elliott was the originator of the scheme, and he, D. M. Berry, J. H. Baker and Calvin Fletcher, its most active promoters. The committee sent out to view the land decided the San Pasqual rancho was the best location offered. An incorporation was effected under the name of the San Gabriel Orange Grove Association. The capital stock was fixed at $25,000, divided into 100 shares of $250 each. In December, 1873, the association purchased Dr. J. S. Griffin's interest in the San Pasqual rancho, consisting of about 4,000 acres; 1,500 acres of the choicest land in the tract were subdivided into lots varying in size from fifteen to sixty acres.

January 27, 1874, the lands were distributed on the basis of fifteen acres to a share of stock, and the colonists who were on the ground immediately set to work planting their lands in oranges, raising grapes and deciduous fruits. "It is a singular fact," says Mrs. Jeanne C. Carr, "that there was not a professional and hardly a practical horticulturist or farmer among them." Nevertheless they made a success of fruit culture and demonstrated the fact that oranges could be grown on the mesa lands. April 22, 1875, the settlement ceased to be the Indiana Colony and officially became Pasadena. To Dr. T. B. Elliott, the originator of the California Colony scheme, belongs the credit of conferring on Pasadena its euphonious name. The word is of Indian origin, Chippewa dialect, and means "Crown of the Valley."

So rapidly were the Indiana Colony lands absorbed by settlers that in four years after their purchase only a few small tracts remained unsold. In 1876, B. D. Wilson threw on the market about 2,500 acres lying eastward of Fair Oaks avenue. This was the Lake Vineyard Land and Water Company tract. The settlers on this tract were known as "east siders," while the original colonists were the "west siders," Fair Oaks avenue being the division line. A postoffice had been established March 15, 1875, but had been discontinued in December of that year because no one cared to serve as postmaster at a salary of a dollar a month. September 21, 1876, L. D. Hollingsworth, who had erected a building and opened a store near the corner of Fair Oaks avenue and Colorado street, secured the re-establishment of the postoffice, and the office was kept in his store. Thus was the germ of the city of Pasadena planted, but it took it nearly a decade to germinate. At the beginning of the fourth decade (1880) the "town consisted of a store and postoffice building, a blacksmith shop, a meat market and a schoolhouse at the crossroads near the center of the settlement." The history of the city of Pasadena and a record of its wonderful growth belong in the fourth decade.

POMONA is a child of the colony era. While not incorporated as a colony, like Pasadena, it owes its origin to a co-operative colony-promoting association. Early in 1875, Louis Phillips sold to P. C. Tonner, Cyrus Burdick and Francisco Palomeres 2,700 acres of the Vejar portion of the San José rancho. Tonner and his associates sold their purchase, shortly after they made it, to the Los Angeles Immigration and Land Co-operative Association. This association was incorporated December 10, 1874, with a capital stock of $250,000, divided into 2,500 shares, at a par value of $100 per share. Its officers were: Thomas A. Garey, president; C. E. While, vice-president; L. M. Holt, secretary; Milton Thomas, manager; R. M. Town, assistant manager, and H. G. Crow, treasurer. Its principal object was the subdivision of large land holdings and the placing of these on the market in small tracts for settlement. The association surveyed and subdivided 2,500 acres of its purchase. The town of Pomona, located near the center of the tract, was platted and 640 acres adjoining the town site was subdivided into five-acre lots. The remainder of the 2,500 acres was cut up into forty-acre tracts. In November, 1875, the town had a hotel, a drug store, a dry goods store, two groceries, a meat market and eight or ten dwelling houses. February 22, 23 and 24, 1876, a great auction sale of land and town lots was held on the town site. The first day's sale realized $19,000, which was a big thing in those days. The farm land brought an average of $64 per acre. A number of artesian wells had been sunk and a reservoir holding two and a half million gallons of water constructed. The Southern Pacific Railroad, which, in conformity with the requirements of the subsidy granted by the county in 1873, had been built eastward twenty-five miles to Spadra, was extended to Pomona and that town became the railroad shipping point for Riverside, another colony of the early '70s. Pomona seemed to be on the high road to prosperity, but disaster struck it. First the dry season of 1876-77 demonstrated the need of a more abundant water supply, and next a disastrous fire on the night of July 30, 1877, swept away nearly all of the town. These disasters checked the growth of the town and settlement. In 1880 the population of the town was only 130. The next decade saw a wonderful growth in the town and country around.

SANTA MONICA was another town that was founded in this decade. Early in 1875, Senator J. P. Jones, of Nevada, and Col. R. S. Baker subdivided a portion of the Rancho San Vicente, lying on the mesa adjoining the bay of Santa Monica. The town was named after the bay. July 16, 1875, a great sale of lots was held at the town site. An excursion steamer came down from San Francisco, loaded with lot buyers, and the people of Los Angeles rallied in great numbers to the site of the "Zenith City by the Sunset Sea," as the silver-tongued orator of the Pacific slope, Tom Fitch, named it. Lots on the barren mesa sold at prices ranging from $100 to $500. The town's growth was rapid. In less than nine months after its founding it had 160 houses and 1,000 inhabitants. The Los Angeles & Independence Railroad had been completed to Los Angeles. A wharf had been built and Santa Monica was becoming a shipping point of great importance. Then a financial blight struck the fortunes of Senator Jones. The railroad was sold to the Southern Pacific Railroad; the wharf was pulled down, and the town fell into a decline. In 1880 it and its suburb, South Santa Monica, had only 350 inhabitants.

The decade that had been ushered in with a boom closed in gloom. The bank failures of 1875-76 brought on a monetary crisis. The total failure of the Temple & Workman Bank swept away the fortunes of many. The dry years of 1876-77 supplemented the bank disasters by killing the sheep industry that to a certain extent had taken the place of the cattle industry of the previous decade. The railroad to San Francisco had not proved a blessing. Freight charges were high and the price of grain low. It took about all the farmer received for his grain crop to pay freight, warehouse and commission charges. Indeed, he was lucky if after his crop was sold he did not have to borrow money to pay a deficit—mortgage his farm for the privilege of farming it. San Francisco was his only market. It was evident that the Southern California farmer, with a market 500 miles away, could not compete with the grain growers of the central part of the state, with a market at their doors. Grain growing in the third decade of American occupation had been but little less disastrous than cattle raising in the second. What could the people do?

THE FOURTH DECADE—1880-1890.

The third decade had set in gloom. No roseate hues irradiated the rise of the fourth. The season of 1880-81 was one of the dreaded dry years. The total rainfall was only 5.32 inches. Crops were a partial failure. There were, however, no such harrowing sights as were seen in the famine years. There were no cattle on a thousand hills, no sheep in the valleys, starving to death. The flocks and the herds had disappeared. The more provident husbandmen who now possessed the ranchos, once the domain of the cattle kings and their retainers, were able to provide sustenance for their stock, though the former and the latter rains came not. Irrigation had been made to rectify the shortcomings of nature, and works had taken the place of faith in noveñas.*

The next season showed a decided improvement. Crops were fair and prices good. The

*A term of nine days set apart for prayers, frequently resorted to during dry years in the Spanish and Mexican eras.

Southern Pacific Railroad, pushing eastward, had opened a market for Southern California products in the mining regions of Arizona. The completion of the road in 1882 gave Los Angeles a trans-continental route, and immigration began to drift in—slowly and cautiously at first—then with more confidence and in larger volume. The mortgaged farmers took the first opportunity to unload on the newcomers and chuckled over their success. But when they began to look around for reinvestment they found there had been a sudden rise in the financial temperature. The newcomers brought money with them to develop their purchases and the wheels of industry began to go round. The seasons continued good, that of 1884 being a flood year. Rumors came of a railroad on the thirty-fifth parallel, building westward—rumors that later became a certainty.

BEGINNING OF THE BOOM.

In 1885 the Santa Fe system leased the right to run trains over the Southern Pacific road from Deming to Los Angeles. Later on it obtained an interest in the Atlantic & Pacific road between Albuquerque and Barstow. From Barstow it constructed the Southern California Railroad through the Cajon Pass to San Bernardino, and thence westward to Mud Springs, where it united with the San Gabriel Valley road, which it had absorbed. The completion of this road gave Southern California two complete trans-continental lines, and then the boom was on in earnest. It had begun in 1886 and gathered volume as it progressed. There had been a steady advance in the values of real estate from 1882, when the upward movement began, to 1886, but no inflation. Additions and subdivisions had been made in the older cities and towns, but no new towns created. Early in 1887 town-making began and it went with a rush, a boom when once begun. As the Southern California Railway approached completion, town-making seemed to become epidemic. Within the first six months of 1887, between the eastern limits of Los Angeles city and the western line of San Bernardino county, a distance, by way of the Southern California Railway, of thirty-six miles, there were twenty-five cities and towns located—an average of one to every mile and a half of the road. On the Southern Pacific there were eight and thrown in between the parallel railroads there were three more—making a grand total of thirty-six cities and towns in the San Gabriel valley. The only limit to the greatness of a city was the boundary lines of the adjoining cities.

Other parts of the county were keeping pace with the San Gabriel valley in town-making.

Up on the mountains, down in the desert, and out on the arid mesa, town sites were located and town lots sold. What was to support these towns, the lot purchaser did not stop to consider. He hoped to find an easier dupe than himself, and sell at an advance. The more inaccessible a town, the better the lots in it seemed to sell. Homberg's twin cities, Manchester and Border City, were located on the steep sides of the Sierra Madre mountains, overlooking the Mojave desert. The sites of the twin cities could be seen through a field glass on a clear day, and the easiest way to reach them was by a balloon. Yet Homberg sold about all of the 4,000 lots that he carved out of two quarter sections of government land, and realized about $50,000 by the operation. Chicago Park was located in the wash of the San Gabriel river, where the rocks were so thick that it was impossible to drive a corner stake, yet its 2,300 lots changed hands. Santiago, with its 2,000 lots, was out on a waterless desert, where even the coyotes had to carry canteens when they crossed it. Yet fools rushed in where coyotes feared to tread, and—bought lots.

And yet the boom was not all bilk. There was legitimate speculation and there were honest real-estate agents. The fellows who blew the bubble to its greatest inflation were professional boomers, who had learned the tricks of their trade in the boom cities of the west. They came here not to build up the country, but to make money—honestly if they could make it no other way. It is needless to say they made it the other way.

The magnitude of our great real-estate boom can be more accurately measured by a money standard than any other. The total consideration named in the instruments filed for record with the county recorder in 1887 reached the enormous sum of $98,084,162. Yet this does not tell half the story. Thousands of agreements and contracts of sale were never recorded. Contracts were often transferred anywhere from one to half a dozen times as the property was resold, but when the deed was given the consideration named would be that of the first sale, although the last might be a hundred or a thousand per cent above the first. It is safe to say that the total consideration of all the sales made in 1887 in Los Angeles county alone reached $200,000,000.

The great booms of former times pale into insignificance when compared with ours. The capital stock of John Law's National Bank of France, with his Mississippi grants thrown in, only figured up about $15,000,000—a sum equal to our real-estate transfer for one month, yet the bursting of the Mississippi bubble very nearly bankrupted the French empire. The capital invested in the Darien colonization scheme, which bankrupted Scotland and came near plunging all Europe into war, was only 220,000 pounds sterling, a sum about equal to our real-estate transfers for one day. We ought to feel proud of our boom.

The collapse began in the fall of 1887. Speculators had loaded up for the eastern dupes who were reported coming by thousands to the land of promise. The dupes did not come in great numbers and the visitors who came refused to be duped. Then the real-estate craze began to subside. Those who had loaded for profit tried to unload at cost. Some refused to believe the boom was over, and held on till their burthens crushed them. Others let go at once and saved something out of the crash that followed. During 1888, the adjusting process was going on. Building was active and people still hopeful. In 1889 the outlook was gloomy. Even the most sanguine began to realize that the boom was over. The contraction in values was even more rapid than had been the expansion. Choice business lots and the sites of palace hotels in the new cities, that had been valued by the front foot, were now offered by the acre, and there were no takers. The fourth decade, like the third, closed in gloom.

THE FIFTH DECADE—1890-1900.

The financial depression in which the fourth decade closed did not last long. The energy and the push that had been evolved during the boom had received a momentary check, but they were not dead. There was no time to indulge in whining or repining. Adversity had followed closely on the heels of prosperity and the necessity for bread and butter was more pressing than the need of new towns. The millionaire of a boom metropolis, when the doom of his phantom city had been pronounced, looked out upon a ghostly array of white stakes, often the only visible evidence of the city that was to be. If his city was not hopelessly buried under a mortgage, he plowed under business streets and the sites of tourist hotels and planted them with fruit trees or sowed them in grain.

The professional boomers—the fellows of the baser sort—when the collapse came, betook themselves to pastures new. Retributive justice overtook a few of them and they did enforced service to the country in striped uniforms. When the county at large, in 1890, took an inventory to ascertain the profit or loss of the previous decade, there was a good showing of assets on the credit side. Los Angeles city had increased its population from 11,150 to 50,395 in ten years, and its assessed wealth from six to fifty million dollars. Pasadena, from a cross-roads grocery, had grown to a city of 5,000 inhabitants, with its banks, daily newspapers and palatial business blocks. Pomona, from 130 people in 1880, had increased to 3,634 in 1890. The county at large had raised the number of its people from 33,881 in 1880 to 101,454 in 1890, with 13,580 taken off to form Orange county. Its wealth had increased from $18,000,000 to $80,000,000.

As Pasadena had soared highest in the balloon of inflation, when the drop came she struck bottom the hardest. Her orange groves, once her pride and boast, had been mostly sacrificed on the altar of town lots; and what the boomer had left the cottony scale had devastated. But the boomer departed or ceased to boom, and the cottony scale met its Nemesis in the Australian lady-bug. Then the work of rehabilitation began; and it is remarkable what perseverance, coupled with energy and intelligence, did in a short time. In less than two years Pasadena was on the high road to prosperity, and she has kept pattering along that road at a rapid rate ever since. The reaction throughout the county was equally rapid. After the entanglements in real-estate titles, that the boom had made, were readjusted the people pursued the even tenor of their ways, building up the real cities, planting orange groves, increasing irrigating facilities and promoting new schemes for developing the country.

In 1893 came the bank panic, when nearly every bank in the county closed its doors, but in a few weeks all except two were doing business at the old stands.

At the beginning of the Spanish war, Los Angeles county furnished five companies of the Seventh Regiment California Volunteers, three from Los Angeles city, one from Pasadena and one from Pomona. This regiment, which was made up of volunteers from Southern California, took its departure for San Francisco, May 5, 1898, amidst the plaudits of an immense multitude. It remained encamped there until the close of the war, when the volunteers were discharged. Company D, California Light Artillery, made up of volunteers from the southern counties, was sent to Manila and saw considerable active service.

The most prominent event of the closing years of the fifth decade was the free harbor fight, a contest in which the Southern Pacific Railroad and a few of its local auxiliaries were arrayed against the people of the county in regard to the location of a harbor. The Southern Pacific Company, in 1891, had built a long wharf in the bay of Santa Monica at Port Los Angeles.

When the question of a free harbor came up, Collis P. Huntington, then the president of the road, used all his powerful influence in congress to secure an appropriation for a harbor at Port Los Angeles. As this would be virtually controlled by him and would defeat an appropriation for a harbor at San Pedro, the people, with a few exceptions, opposed his scheme. The fight was a protracted one, but the people won. In 1898 congress voted an appropriation of $3,900,000 for the construction of breakwaters in the bay of San Pedro. The contract for their construction was let to Heldmaier & Neu, of Chicago, for $1,303,198.54. The Free Harbor Jubilee, which was celebrated at San Pedro, April 27, and at Los Angeles April 28 and 29, 1899, was one of the great events of the decade. On that occasion the first boatload of rock from the Catalina quarries was dumped on the site of the breakwater. Misfortune overtook the contractors. Neu was killed in a runaway at Los Angeles before work was begun, and Heldmaier failing to push the work, his contract was cancelled by the government. May 14, 1900, a contract was let to the California Construction Company, of San Francisco, for $2,375,546.05, over a million dollars above the former contract.

The three dry years with which the decade and the century closed were not accompanied by the disasters which overtook the county in former years of drought. Except in a few localities, the people thrived and prospered, and the county increased in population during the decade 70,000.

LIST OF THE CITIES AND TOWNS OF LOS ANGELES WITH THE DATES OF THEIR FOUNDING AND THE POPULATION OF EACH ACCORDING TO THE CENSUS OF 1900.

	Founded.	Population.
Alhambra	1884	808
Avalon	1887	178
Azusa	1887	863
Burbank	1887	366
Claremont	1887	180
Covina.....	1887	255
Compton	1869	636
Downey	1873	700
El Monte.....	1853	266
Glendale	1883	200
Glendora	1887	492
Hollywood	1887	200
Inglewood	1887	200
Irwindale	1894	141
Lordsburg	1887	500
Long Beach.....	1884	2,252
Los Angeles.....	1781	102,479
Monrovia	1886	1,205
Pasadena	1875	9,117
Pomona	1875	5,526
Norwalk	1873	596
Newhall	1877	202
Redondo	1887	855
San Gabriel.....	1775	737
San Fernando.....	1873	200
San Pedro.....	1851	1,787
Santa Monica.....	1875	3,057
South Pasadena.....	1885	1,001
Whittier	1887	1,590
Wilmington	1858	500

Only towns whose population exceeds one hundred are included in the above list.

CHAPTER XXVI.

THE CITY OF LOS ANGELES.

SHAPING THE CITY.

FIFTY years after its founding, Los Angeles was like the earth on the morning of creation, "without form." It had no plat or plan, no map and no official survey of its boundaries. The streets were crooked, irregular and undefined. The houses stood at different angles to the streets, and the house lots were of all geometrical shapes and forms. No man held a written title to his land and possession was ten parts of the law; indeed, it was all the law he had to protect his title. Not to use his land was to lose it.

With the fall of the missions a spasm of territorial expansion seized upon the colonists. In 1834, the territorial legislature, by an enactment, fixed the boundaries of the pueblo of Los Angeles at "two leagues to each of the four winds, measuring from the center of the plaza." This gave the pueblo an area of sixteen square leagues or over one hundred square miles. Next year (1835) Los Angeles was made the capital of Alta

California by the Mexican congress and raised to the dignity of a city; and then its first-real-estate boom was on. There was an increased demand for lots and lands, but there were no maps or plats to grant by; and no additions or subdivisions of the pueblo lands on the market. All the unoccupied lands belonged to the municipality and when a citizen wanted a house lot to build on, he petitioned the ayuntamiento for a lot, and if the piece asked for was vacant he was granted a lot, large or small, deep or shallow, on the street or off it, just as it happened.

With the growth of the town, the confusion and irregularity increased. The disputes arising from overlapping grants, conflicting property lines and indefinite descriptions induced the ayuntamiento of 1836 to appoint a commission to investigate and report upon the manner of granting house lots and agricultural lands. The commissioners reported "that they had consulted with several of the founders and with old settlers, who declared that from the founding of the town the concession of lots and lands had been made verbally without any other formality than locating and measuring the extent of the land the fortunate one should occupy."

"In order to present a fuller report your commission obtained an 'Instruction,' signed by Don José Francisco de Ortega, dated at San Gabriel February 2, 1782, and we noted that Articles 3, 4 and 17 of said Instruction provides that concession of said agricultural lands and house lots must be made by the government, which shall issue the respective titles to the grantees. According to the opinion of the city's advisers, said 'Instruction' or at least the three articles referred to, have not been observed, as there is no property owner who can show a legal title to his property."

The commissioners can not do otherwise but call attention of the Most Illustrious Ayuntamiento to the evil consequence which may result by reason of said abuses and recommend that some means may be devised that they may be avoided. "God and Liberty."

ABEL STEARNS, CACILIO VALDEZ,
JOSE M. HERRERA,
Commissioners.

Angeles, March 8, 1836.

Acting on the report of the commissioners, the ayuntamiento required all holders of property to apply for written titles. But the poco tiempo ways of the pobladores (colonists) could not be altogether overcome. We find from the records that in 1847 the land of Mrs. Carmen Navarro, one of the founders of the town, was denounced (filed on) because she could not show a written title to it. The ayuntamiento decided "that as she had always been allowed to hold it her claim should be respected, because she was one of the founders, which makes her entitled to a lot on which to live."

March 17, 1836, "a commission on streets, plazas and alleys" was appointed to report a plan for repairing "the monstrous irregularity of the streets brought about by ceding house lots and erecting houses in this pueblo."

The commission reported in favor of "formulating a plat of the city as it actually exists, on which shall be marked the names of the streets, alleys and plazas; also, the house lots and common lands of the pueblo." But nothing came of the report, no plat was made and the ayuntamiento went on in the same old way, granting lots of all shapes and forms.

In March, 1846, another commission was appointed to locate the bounds of the pueblo lands. All that was done was to measure two leagues "in the direction of the four winds from the plaza church" and set stakes to mark the boundary lines. Then came the American conquest of California and the days of poco tiempo were numbered. In 1847, after the conquest, another attempt was made to straighten and narrow the streets. A commission was appointed to try to bring order out of the chaos into which the streets had fallen. The commissioners reported, July 22, 1847, as follows: "Your commissioners could not but be amazed seeing the disorder and the manner how the streets run. More particularly the street which leads to the cemetery, whose width is out of proportion to its length; and whose aspect offends the sense of the beautiful which should prevail in the city. When discussing this state of affairs with the syndic (city attorney), he informed us that on receiving his instructions from the ayuntamiento he was ordered to give the streets a width of fifteen varas (about 42 feet). This he found to be in conflict with the statutes. The law referred to is in Book 4, Chapter 7, Statute 10 (probably a compilation of the "Law of the Indies," two or three centuries old and brought from Spain to Mexico and from there to California). The law reads: "In cold countries the streets shall be wide and in warm countries narrow; and when there are horses it would be convenient to have wide streets for purpose of an occasional defense or to widen them in the form above mentioned, care being taken that nothing is done to spoil the looks of the buildings, weaken the points of defense or encroach upon the comfort of the people."

"The instructions given the syndic by the ayuntamiento are absolutely opposed to this law and therefore illegal."

It probably never occurred to the commission to question the wisdom of so senseless a law; it had been a law in Spanish-America for centuries, and therefore must be venerated for its antiquity.

A blind, unreasoning faith in the wisdom of church and state has been the undoing of the Spanish people. Apparently the commission did nothing more than report. California being a warm country, the streets perforce must be narrow.

The same year a commission was appointed to "square the plaza." Through carelessness some of the houses fronting on the square had been allowed to encroach upon it; others were set back so that the boundary lines of the plaza zigzagged back and forth like a Virginia rail fence. The neighborhood of the plaza was the aristocratic residence quarter of the city then, and a plaza front was considered high-toned. The commissioners found the squaring of the plaza as difficult a problem as the squaring of a circle. After many trials and tribulations the commissioners succeeded in overcoming most of the irregularities by reducing the area of the plaza. The houses that protruded were not torn down, but the property lines of the house owners moved forward. The north, south and west lines each measured 134 varas and the east line 112 varas after "squaring."

The ayuntamiento attempted to open a street from the plaza north of the church (now West Marchessault street), but Pedro Cabrera, who had been granted a lot which fell in the line of the street, refused to give up his plaza front for a better lot without that aristocratic appendage which the council offered him. Then the city authorities offered him as compensation for the difference a certain number of days' labor of the chain gang (the treasury was in its usual state of collapse), but Pedro could not be traded out of a plaza front and thus sidetracked in his social status, so the street took a twist around Pedro's lot, a twist that fifty years has not straightened out. The irregularities in granting portions of the unapportioned city lands still continued and the confusion of titles increased.

In May, 1849, the territorial governor, Gen. Bennet Riley, sent a request to the ayuntamiento for a city map and information in regard to the manner of granting city lots. The ayuntamiento replied that there was no map of the city in existence and no surveyor here who could make one. The governor was asked to send a surveyor to make a plan or plat of the city. He was also informed that in making land grants within "the perimeter of two leagues square" the city acted in the belief that it is entitled to that much land as a pueblo.

Lieut. E. O. C. Ord of the United States Army was sent down by the governor to plat the city. July 18, 1849, he submitted two propositions to the ayuntamiento: "He would make a map of the city, marking boundary lines and points of the municipal lands for $1,500 coin, ten lots selected from among the defined lots on the map and vacant lands to the extent of 1,000 varas to be selected in sections of 200 varas wherever he may choose it; or he would make a map for $3,000 in coin."

The ayuntamiento chose the last proposition—the president prophetically remarking that the time might come in the future when the land alone might be worth $3,000. The money to pay for the survey was borrowed from Juan Temple at the rate of one per cent per month and lots pledged as security for payment.

The ayuntamiento also decided that there should be embodied in the map a plan of all the lands actually under cultivation from the principal dam down to the last cultivated field below. "As to the lots that should be shown on the map they should begin at the cemetery (Calvary) and end with the house of Botiller (near Twelfth street). As to the commonalty lands of this city the surveyor should determine the four points of the compass, and, taking the parish church for a center, measure two leagues in each cardinal direction. These lines will bisect the four sides of a square within which the lands of the municipality will be contained, the area of the same being sixteen square leagues and each side of the square measuring four leagues.* The United States claims commission rejected the city's claim to sixteen square leagues, and in 1856 confirmed its title to four square leagues, the dimensions of the old pueblo under the rule of Spain.

Lieut. Ord, assisted by William R. Hutton, completed his Plan de la Ciudad de Los Angeles, August 29, 1849. He divided into blocks all that portion of the city bounded north by First street and the base of the first line of hills, east by Main street, south by Twelfth street and west by Figueroa street; and into lots all of the above to Eighth street; also into lots and blocks that portion of the city north of Short street to College street and west of Upper Main (now San Fernando) street to the base of the hills. On the "plan" the lands between Main street and the river are designated as "plough grounds, gardens, corn and vine lands." The streets in the older portion of the city are marked on the map, but not named. The blocks, except the tier between First and Second streets, are each 600 feet in length and are divided into ten lots, each 120 feet front by 165 feet deep.

Ord took his compass course for the line of Main street, south $24^{\circ} 45'$ west from the corner opposite José Antonio Carrillo's house, which stood where the Pico house now stands. On his map Main, Spring and Fort (now Broadway) streets ran in parallel straight lines southerly to Twelfth street. Travel, regardless of street surveys, persisted in keeping on the mesa and thus Main street, the principal thoroughfare to the south, was made to bend to the westward below Fifth, cutting off the lower ends of Spring and Fort streets.

The names of the streets on Ord's plan are given in both Spanish and English. Beginning with Main street they are as follows: Calle Principal, Main street; Calle Primavera, Spring street (named for the season, spring); Calle Fortin, Fort street (so named because the street extended northward would pass through the old fort on the hill); Calle Loma, Hill street; Calle Accytuna, Olive street; Calle de Caridad, Street of Charity (now Grand avenue); Calle de La

*City archives.

Espranza, the Street of Hope; Calle de Las Flores, the Street of Flowers; Calle de Los Chapules, the Street of Grasshoppers (now South Figueroa street). Above the plaza church, the north and south streets, were the Calle de Eternidad, Eternity street (so named because it had neither beginning or end, or rather because each end terminated in steep hills). Calle del Toro, Bull street (so named because the upper end of the street terminated at the Corrida de Toro, the bull ring, where bull fights were held; it is now Castelar street); Calle de Las Avispas, Street of Hornets, or Wasps; Calle de Los Adobes, Adobe street. The east and west streets were: Calle Corta, Short street; Calle Alta, High street; Calle de Las Virgines, Street of Virgins, and Calle del Colegio, College street. This street, so named because the ayuntamiento had given the Catholic Church a grant of a tract of land for a college, is the only street north of the plaza that retains its original name.

Spring street was known as Calle de Caridad (Street of Charity) at the time of the American conquest. The town then was centered around the plaza and the present Spring street was well out in the suburbs. Its inhabitants were of the poorer classes, who were largely dependent on the charity of their wealthier neighbors around the plaza; hence the name, Calle de Caridad. North Spring is part of an old road made a century ago. It led around the base of the hills out to the brea beds, where the inhabitants obtained the crude asphaltum used for roofing. Ord evidently transferred Spring street's original name, La Caridad, to one of his western streets which was a portion of the old road.

Main street, from its junction with Spring south, in 1846 was known as Calle de La Alegria, Junction street. Los Angeles street was the Calle Principal. Whether the name had been transferred to the present Main street before Ord's survey I have not been able to ascertain. In the early years of the century Los Angeles street was known as Calle de La Zanja, Ditch street. Later on it was sometimes called Calle de Los Vinas, Street of Vineyards; and with its continuation Calle de Los Huertos, Street of Orchards (now San Pedro), formed the principal highway southward to the Embarcadero of San Pedro.

Ord's survey or plan left some of the houses, in the old parts of the city, in the middle of the streets and others were cut off from street frontage. The city council labored long and arduously to satisfy complainants and to satisfactorily adjust property lines to the new plan of the city. Finally in 1854, an ordinance was passed allowing property owners with no street outlet to claim frontage to the streets nearest their houses. Gradually the city took the form that Ord had planned, and the "monstrous irregularity" that had amazed the old regidores disappeared, but the streets widened instead of narrowing, as they should have done to accord with the Spanish street laws.

AMERICANIZING THE CITY.

Although the decree of the Mexican congress making Los Angeles a city was published in California in 1836, ten years later, when the Americans took possession of it, it was still known as El Pueblo, the town. Only in official records and communications did it rise to the dignity of a ciudad (city). American writers of the decade previous to the conquest all refer to it as the "pueblo;" and one of them, Hastings, who came to California overland in 1843, and wrote a book describing the country and telling how to get there, seems not to have heard its real name, but calls it "Poabola, below;" and San José "Poabola, above." The act incorporating it as a city of the American regime was passed by the legislature April 4, 1850. Its area, according to that act, was four miles. Why the "legislature of a thousand drinks" pared down its domain of four square leagues that for seventy years, under monarchy, empire and republic, it had possessed without dispute, does not appear in the act nor in the city records.

As the members of that legislature were mostly "tenderfeet," recently the "plains across," they may not have known the difference between an English mile and a Spanish liga (league), but the most charitable conclusion is, that they deemed four square miles area enough for a city of sixteen hundred people. Why incorporate chaparral-covered hills and mustard-grown mesas, inhabited by coyotes, jack rabbits and ground squirrels? So they made it a mile each way from the plaza; and the city of Los Angeles half a century ago ended at Fifth street on the south; on the north at the Catholic cemetery; its eastern boundary just included the river and its western was hopelessly lost in the hills. No one on that side knew just where the city ended and the country began, and nobody cared, for the land was considered worthless.

Two different nations by legislative decree had raised Los Angeles to the dignity of a city. And yet it was not much of a city after all. Within its bounds there was not a graded street, a sidewalk, a street lamp, a water pipe or a public building of any kind belonging to the municipality.

The first city election under its American incorporation was held July 1, 1850. The officers elected were: A. P. Hodges, mayor (who also held the office of county coroner); Francisco Figuroa, treasurer; A. F. Coronel, city assessor (also county assessor); Samuel Whiting, city marshal (also county jailer).

The first common council met July 3, 1850, and the first record of its doings reads: "Messrs. David W. Alexander, Alexander Bell, Manuel Requena, Juan Temple, Morris L. Goodman, Cristobal Aquilar and Julian Chavez took the oath of office in conformity with Section 3, Article XI, of the state constitution, before Jonathan R. Scott (justice of the peace), and entered upon the discharge of their duties as members of the common council of this city, to which office they had been elected by the people on the first day of this month." David W. Alexander was elected president and Vicente del Campo secretary. The members had been sworn to support the constitution of the state of California, and yet there was no state. California had not been admitted as a state of the Union. It had taken upon itself the functions of a state. The legislature had made counties and cities and provided for their organization and government, and a governor elected by the people had approved the acts of the legislature. The state government was a political nondescript. It had sloughed off its territorial condition, but it could not become a state until congress admitted it into the Union and the slave-holding faction of that body, headed by Jefferson Davis, would not let it in.

The first common council of the city was patriotic and self-denying. The first resolution passed was as follows: "It having been observed that in other places the council members were drawing a salary, it was unanimously resolved that the members of this council shall receive neither salary nor fees of whatsoever nature for discharging their duties as such." But some of them wearied of serving an ungrateful public and taking their pay in honor. Before sixty days had passed two had resigned, and at the end of the year only two of the original members, David W. Alexander and Manuel Requena, were left. There had been six resignations in eight months; and the first council had thirteen different members during its short existence.

The process of Americanizing the people was no easy undertaking. The population of the city and the laws were in a chaotic condition. It was no easy task that these municipal legislators entered upon, that of evolving order out of the chaos left by the change of nations. The native population neither understood the language nor the customs of their new rulers, and the newcomers among the Americans had very little toleration for the Mexican ways and methods they found prevailing in the city. To keep peace between the factions required more tact than knowledge of law in the legislator. Fortunately the first council was made up of level-headed men.

What to do with the Indian was the burning issue of that day, not with the wild ones that stole the rancheros' horses and cattle. For them when caught there was but one penalty for their offense, death.

It was the tame Indians, the Christianized neophytes of the missions, that worried the city fathers. The Mission Indians constituted the labor element of the city and country. When sober they were harmless, but in their drunken orgies they became veritable fiends, and the usual result of their Saturday night revels was a dead Indian or two on Sunday morning; and all the others, old and young, male and female, were dead drunk.

They were herded in a corral and worked in gangs on the streets, but the supply became too great for city purposes; so the council, August 16, 1850, passed this ordinance: "When the city has no work in which to employ the chain gang, the recorder shall, by means of notices conspicuously posted, notify the public that such and such a number of prisoners will be auctioned off to the highest bidder for private service; and in that manner they shall be disposed of for a sum which shall not be less than the amount of their fine for double the time which they were to serve at hard labor." It would have been a righteous retribution on the white wretches who supplied the Indians with intoxicants if they could have been sold into perpetual slavery.

Evidently auctioning off Indians to the highest bidders paid the city quite a revenue, for at a subsequent meeting of the council "the recorder was authorized to pay the Indian alcaldes (chiefs) the sum of one real (12½ cents) out of every fine collected from Indians the said alcaldes may bring to the recorder for trial." A month or so later the recorder presented a bill for $15, the amount of money he had paid the alcaldes out of fines. At the rate of eight Indians to the dollar, the alcaldes had evidently gathered up a hundred and twenty poor Los.

Usually poor Lo paid a higher penalty for sinning than his white brother, but there was one city ordinance in which this was reversed. "Article 14—For playing cards in the streets regardless of the kind of game; likewise for playing any other game of the kind as is played in houses that are paying a license for the privilege, the offender shall be fined not less than $10 nor more than $25, which shall be paid on the spot; otherwise he shall be sent to the chain gang for ten days. If he be an Indian then he shall be fined not less than $3 nor more than $5 or sent to the chain gang for eight days." At first glance this ordinance might seem to have been drafted in the interest of morality, but a closer inspection will show that it is for revenue only. The gambling houses paid a license of $100 a month. So for their benefit the council put a protective tariff on all kinds of gambling.

The whipping post, too, was used as a reformatory agent to instill lessons of honesty and morality into the Indians. One court record reads: "Chino Valencea (Indian) was fined $50 and twenty-five lashes for stealing a pair of shears; the latter fine (the lashes) was paid promptly in full; for the former he stands committed to the chain-gang for two months, unless it is sooner paid." At the same session of the court a white man was fined $30 for selling liquor to the Indians; "fine paid and defendant discharged." Drunkenness, immorality and epidemics—civilization's gifts to the aborigines—finally settled the Indian question—settled it by exterminating the Indian.

THE POST-OFFICE AND POSTAL SERVICE.

The post-office at Los Angeles was established April 9, 1850, nearly four years after California had passed into the possession of the United States. J. Pugh was the first postmaster. There had been a mail service in the territory and possibly a post-office in the pueblo under Spanish rule. Once a month military couriers picked up at presidios, pueblos and missions from San Francisco to San Diego, their little budgets of mail and carried them down the coast of Lower California to Loreto, where the mail was taken in sailing vessels across the gulf to San Blas. The couriers made the round trip in a month. The habilitados (paymaster) acted as postmasters at the presidios. At the pueblos the alcalde or some officer detailed for that purpose acted as administrador de correos (postmaster). As but few could read or write and there were no newspapers taken the revenue of La casa ó administracion de correos la estafeta (post-office) was not large, and it did not require much of a political pull to secure the office of postmaster in Los Angeles a century ago.

Under Mexican rule there was an irregular land service, but most of the mail was carried by sailing vessels. There was a route by the Colorado River and Sonora much shorter than the Lower California post road, but the Indians had a bad habit of distributing the mail, and the mail carriers along the road, and it was used only when a military force made the trip. After the conquest, in 1847, the military authorities established a regular service between San Francisco and San Diego. Soldier-carriers starting from each end of the route met at Dana's Ranch, half way, and, exchanging mail pouches, each then returned to his starting point. It took a fortnight for them to go and return. After the soldiers were discharged, in the latter part of 1848, the land service was discontinued and the mail was carried up and down the coast between San Francisco and San Diego in sailing vessels. Wind and weather permitting, a letter might reach its destination in a few days; with the elements against it, it might take a month to get there.

In 1849, Wilson & Packard, whose store was on Main street where the Farmers & Merchants' Bank now stands, were the custodians of the letters received at Los Angeles. A tub stood on the end of a counter. Into this the letters were dumped. Anyone expecting a letter was at liberty to sort over the contents of the tub and take away his mail. The office was conducted on a free delivery system and every man was his own postmaster. Col. John O. Wheeler, who had clerked for the firm in 1849, bought out the business in 1850, and still continued the laundry post-office. After the establishment of the post-office an officious postal agent from San Francisco found fault with the tub post-office and free and easy delivery system, and the colonel, who had been accommodating the public free of charge, told the agent to take his postal matter elsewhere.

The coast mail was carried by steamers after a regular line was established in 1851, but the service was not greatly improved. The Los Angeles Star of October 1, 1853, under the head of "Information Wanted," sends forth this doleful wail: "Can anybody tell us what has become of the United States mail for this section of the world? Some four weeks since the mail actually arrived here. Since that time two other mails are due. The mail rider comes and goes regularly enough, but the mail bags do not. One time he says the mail is not landed at San Diego. Another time there was so much of it his donkey could not bring it and he sent it to San Pedro on the steamer 'T. Hunt,' which carried it to San Francisco. Thus it goes wandering up and down the ocean." According to the Star, one mail was fifty-two days in transmission from San Francisco to Los Angeles.

The first regular mail service Los Angeles obtained was by the Butterfield stage line. This was the longest mail stage line ever organized and the best managed. Its eastern termini were St. Louis and Memphis; its western terminus San Francisco. Its length was 2,881 miles. It began operation in September, 1858, and the first stage from the east carrying mail reached Los Angeles, October 7, 1858. The first service was two mail coaches each way a week, for which the government paid the stage company a subsidy of $600,000 a year. The schedule time between San Francisco and St. Louis was twenty-four days. The Butterfield route southward from San Francisco was by the way of San José, Gilroy, Pacheco's Pass, Visalia and Fort Tejon to Los Angeles. Eastward from Los Angeles it ran by way of El Monte, Temécula and Warner's ranch to Yuma. From there it followed about the present route of the Southern Pacific Railroad to El Paso; then northward to St. Louis, branching at Fort Smith for Memphis. Los Angeles never has had a mail service more prompt and reliable. The Star, in lauding it, says: "The arrival of the overland mail is as regular as the index on the clock points to the hour, as true to time as the dial to the sun." The best time that it ever made between St. Louis and Los Angeles was nineteen days. In 1861 the Confederates at the eastern end and the Indians at the western destroyed the stations and got away with some of the stock. The coaches were transferred to the Central Overland route via Omaha and Salt Lake City to San Francisco. After the discontinuance of the Butterfield stage line Los Angeles got her eastern mail by way of San Francisco, and had the old irregularities and delays until the railroad was completed in 1876. In 1882 the completion of the Southern Pacific Railroad gave direct mail service east.

The first location of the post-office was on Los Angeles street, near the plaza. In fifty years it has wandered up and down four different streets from the plaza on the north to Eighth street on the south. In June, 1893, it was moved into the building erected for it on the corner of Main and Winston streets and removed, March, 1901, to the corner of Eighth and Spring, while the government building undergoes the slow process of reconstruction.

The postmasters in the order of their appointment are as follows: J. Pugh, W. T. B. Sanford, William B. Osburn, James S. Waite, J. D. Woodworth, T. J. White, William G. Still, Francisco P. Ramirez, Russell Sackett, George J. Clarke, H. K. W. Bent, Isaac R. Dunkelberger, John W. Green, E. A. Preuss, J. W. Green, H. V. Van Dusen, John R. Mathews and Lewis A. Groff.

SCHOOLS AND SCHOOLMASTERS.

The only school of which there is any record in the Spanish era of Los Angeles history is one taught by Maximo Peña, an invalid soldier, in 1817 and 1818. His yearly salary was $140. The first school of the Mexican regime mentioned in the archives was taught by Luciano Valdez, beginning in 1827. His school was kept open at varying intervals until the close of 1831. On account of "the lack of improvement in the public school of the pueblo," the ayuntamiento discharged him and employed Vicente Morago, who had the necessary qualifications for "civilizing and morally training the children," * * * "allowing him $15 monthly, the same as was paid the retiring citizen, Luciano Valdez." February 12, 1833, Morago was appointed secretary of the ayuntamiento at $30 per month and resigned his position as teacher. Francisco Pontoja was appointed preceptor of the pueblo school. He taught to January, 1834, when he demanded $20 per month; the ayuntamiento, "seeing certain negligence and indolence in his manner of advancing the children," discharged him and employed Cristoval Aquilar at $15 per month. He taught a year, and then asked for an increase in his salary. "After discussion it was decided that his fitness for the position was insufficient." He was discharged. In 1835 Vicente Morago again took charge of the school. As he was satisfied with $15 per month his fitness was evident. In 1838 Don Yznacio Coronel taught the school. He received $15, and the parents, according to their means, paid certain amounts. His daughter, Soledad, assisted him, and she was the first lady teacher of Los Angeles.

January, 1844, Ensign Guadalupe Medina, an officer of Micheltorena's army, opened a primary school on the Lancastrian plan, which attained an attendance of 103 pupils and was the most successful school of the Mexican era. The Lancastrian plan was an educational fad once popular, but dead for fifty years. The gist of the system was the nearer the teacher was in education to the level of the pupil, the more successful would he be in imparting instruction. So the preceptor taught the more advanced pupils; these taught the next lower grades, and so down the scale to the lowest class. Lieut. Medina's school was closed because the school-house was needed for army headquarters. Los Angeles was in the throes of a revolution. It could get along without a school, but a political eruption it must have about so often or die. Next year the gringos came, and when school opened again another nation was in charge of affairs. In the seventy years the pueblo was under Spanish and Mexican rule it never built or owned a school-house; nor was there a public school building in California.

The first school under American rule in California was taught by Dr. William B. Osburn in Los Angeles during the year 1847. It was under the auspices of Col. Stevenson, the military commander of the southern district.

When the council was organized July 3, 1850, Francisco Bustamente, employed by the ayuntamiento, was in charge of the public school at $60 per month and an allowance of $20 for house rent. He taught until near the close of the year, when, on account of his large family, whom he could not support out of his meager salary, he asked for $100 per month. The council discharged him, but whether for unfitness or for too much family, records do not state.

In July, 1850, Hugh Overns petitioned the council to establish a school in which he would teach the English, French and Spanish languages. The council allowed him from the public funds $50 per month for the privilege of sending to the school "six orphan boys or others whose parents are poor." January 4, 1851, Rev. Henry Weeks and his wife opened a school, Weeks teaching the boys and his wife the girls. They received $150 a month and furnished their own school rooms. The first school ordinance was adopted by the council July 9, 1851. It provided for an allowance of $50 per month to any educational institution in the city teaching the rudiments of English and Spanish languages.

August 13, 1852, by ordinance, ten cents on the $100 of the municipal tax was set apart for the support of public schools. July 25, 1853, an ordinance was passed for the establishment and government of the city's schools. It provided for the appointment of three commissioners, who shall constitute a board of education, the chairman of which shall be superintendent of schools. J. Lancaster Brent, Lewis Granger and Stephen C. Foster were appointed a board of education, J. L. Brent becoming ex-officio school superintendent.

May 20, 1854, an amended ordinance was passed and Stephen C. Foster, then mayor, was made the first superintendent, and three members of the council constituted the board of education. That year school house No. 1, a brick two-story building, was built on the northwest corner of Spring and Second streets, where the Bryson block now stands. School was opened in it March 19, 1855, with William A. Wallace in charge of the boys and Miss Louisa Hayes in charge of the girls. Co-education was not allowed in those days. School house No. 2 was built in 1856. It was on Bath street, north of the plaza, now North Main street. These two school houses supplied the needs of the city for ten years.

During the '60s, on account of sectional hatreds growing out of the Civil war, the public schools in Los Angeles were unpopular. They were regarded as Yankee institutions and were hated accordingly by the Confederate sympathizers, who made up a majority of the city's population. In 1865-66 the number of school census children in the city was 1,009. Of these only 331 were enrolled in the public schools during the year. The average attendance in the private schools was fifty per cent greater than in the public schools. Twenty-one negro children were enrolled in a separate school. The education of these twenty-one little negroes was regarded as a menace to the future ascendancy of the white race. Out of such mole hills does political bigotry construct impassable mountains. The northern immigration that began to drift into Los Angeles in the early '70s changed public opinion in regard to the common schools. The Los Angeles high school, the first in Southern California, was established in 1873. From this onward the schools of the city have steadily progressed. The city school superintendents, in the order of their service, are as follows: J. Lancaster Brent, ex-officio; Stephen C. Foster, Dr. William B. Osborn, Dr. John S. Griffin, J. Lancaster Brent, E. J. C. Kewen, Rev. W. E. Boardman, A. F. Heinchman, G. L. Mix, Dr. R. F. Hayes, Rev. E. Birdsell, Joseph Huber, Sr.; H. D. Barrows, A. Glassell, Dr. T. H. Rose, A. G. Brown, Dr. W. T. Lucky, C. H. Kimball, Mrs. C. B. Jones, J. M. Guinn, L. D. Smith, W. M. Freisner, Leroy D. Brown, P. W. Search and J. A. Foshay.

The office of superintendent in earlier years was filled by lawyers, doctors, ministers and business men. It was not until 1869 that a professional teacher was chosen superintendent; since then professional teachers have filled the office.

The State Normal school building at Los Angeles was completed in 1882, and the school opened August 29, of that year. It is now next to largest Normal School in the state.

CHAPTER XXVII.

THE CITY OF LOS ANGELES—Continued.

CRIME AND VIGILANCE COMMITTEES.

LOS ANGELES was a turbulent city in its youth. During the Spanish and Mexican eras of its history it was not the scene of many capital crimes, but during Mexican domination it became a storm center of political revolutions. These rarely resulted in bloodshed, and were more famous for noise than for physical violence.

The first vigilance committee on the Pacific coast of North America had its origin in Los Angeles in 1836, twenty years before the world-famous vigilance committee of 1856 was formed at San Francisco. Its story briefly told runs thus: The wife of Domingo Feliz, part owner of the Los Feliz rancho, who bore the poetical name of Maria del Rosario Villa, became infatuated with a handsome but disreputable Sonoran vaquero, Gervacio Alispaz by name. She deserted her husband and lived with Alispaz as his mistress at San Gabriel. Feliz, failing to reclaim his erring wife, sought the aid of the authorities. A reconciliation was effected, and the husband and wife started on horseback for the rancho. On their way they met Alispaz. An altercation occurred and Feliz was stabbed to death by his wife's paramour. The body was dragged into a ravine and covered with brush and leaves. Next day the body was found and the guilty pair arrested. The people were filled with horror and indignation, and there were threats of summary vengeance, but better counsel prevailed. It was the beginning of holy week, and all efforts to bring them to punishment were deferred until after Easter. Monday morning, April 7, a large number of citizens assembled at the house of Juan Temple. An organization was effected. Victor Prudon, a native of Bréton, France, but a naturalized citizen of California, was made president, Manuel Arzaga, secretary, and Francisco Arunjo, a retired army officer, commander of the vigilantes. Fifty-five persons were enrolled in a vigilance committee. The organization was named Junta Defensora de La Seguridad Publico—United Defenders of the Public Safety. An address to the people and the authorities was formulated, setting forth the necessity of the organization and demanding the immediate execution of the assassins. The ayuntamiento, alarmed at the threatening attitude of the people, assembled in extraordinary session. An attempt was made to enroll the militia to put down the uprising, but it was given up. A demand was made on the authorities for Alispaz and the woman. This was refused. The members of the Junta Defensora, all armed, marched in a body to the jail. The guard refused to give up the keys. They were secured by force and Gervacio Alispaz taken out and shot to death. A demand was then made for the key to the apartment (in a private house) where the woman was incarcerated. The alcalde refused to give it up. The key was secured. The wretched Maria was taken to the place of execution on a carreta and shot. The bodies of the guilty pair were brought back to the jail and the following communication sent to the alcalde, Manuel Requena:

“Junta of the Defenders of the Public Safety—
To the First Constitutional Alcalde:

The dead bodies of Gervacio Alispaz and Maria del Rosario Villa are at your disposal. We also forward you the jail keys that you may deliver them to whomsoever is on guard. In case you are in need of men to serve as guards we are at your disposal.

God and Liberty. Angeles, April 7, 1836.

VICTOR PRUDON, President.

MANUEL ARZAGA, Secretary.

A few days later the Junta Defensora de La Seguridad Publico disbanded, and so ended the only instance in the seventy-five years of Spanish and Mexican rule in California of the people by popular tribunal taking the administration of justice out of the hands of the legally constituted authorities.

With the discovery of gold in California began the era of crime. In the decade following that event, to paraphrase one of the Junta Defensora's metaphors, “the dike of legal restraint was swept away by a torrent of atrocious infamy.” Gold allured to California the law-defying as well as the law-abiding of many countries. They came from Europe, from South America and from Mexico. From Australia and Tasmania came the escapee convict and the ticket-of-leave man; from Asia came the “heathen Chinese;” and the United States usually furnished the heavy villain in all the tragedies. These conglomerate elements of society found the Land of Gold practically without law and the vicious among them were not long in making it a land without order.

The American element among the gold seekers soon adjusted a form of government to suit the exigencies of the times and the people. There may have been too much lynching, too much vigilance committee in it, and too little respect for lawfully constituted authorities, but it was effective in controlling the criminal element and was suited to the social condition existing. Los Angeles was far removed from the gold fields, but from some cause, or rather from several causes, it furnished more villains, vigilance committees and lynchings than any other city in the state. San Francisco in its two famous committees, that of 1851 and that of 1856, executed ten men and then gave up the business to the legal authorities. Los Angeles city and county between 1851 and 1871 hanged thirty-five, condemned by popular tribunal and executed by vigilantes. From 1850, for at least two decades the city was seldom or never without some form of a people's tribunal of last resort. The gallows tree in early times stood on Fort Hill. The first execution there was in 1852, when three native Californians were hanged for the murder of two young cattle buyers on the banks of the San Gabriel river, December 4, 1852; three more were hanged, two for complicity in the murder of Gen. Bean, and one for stabbing his friend to death on some slight provocation. One of the suspects for the murder of Bean, a poor cobbler by the name of Sandoval, died declaring his innocence. Years afterwards one of the real murderers on his death bed confessed that the cobbler was innocent.

January 12, 1855, David Brown, for the murder of his companion, Clifford, was taken from the jail and hanged to the gateway of a corral on Spring street opposite the prison. During 1855 and 1856 lawlessness increased. There was an organized band of about one hundred Mexicans who patrolled the highways, robbing and murdering. On the night of January 22, 1857, Sheriff James R. Barton, with a posse consisting of William H. Little, Charles K. Baker, Charles F. Daley, Alfred Hardy and Frank Alexander, left Los Angeles in pursuit of this banditti, who under their leaders, Pancho Daniel and Juan Flores, had been robbing and committing outrages in the neighborhood of San Juan Capistrano. On the road near San Juan they encountered a detachment of the bandits. A short, sharp engagement took place. Barton, Baker, Little and Daley were killed. Hardy and Alexander escaped by the fleetness of their horses. This tragedy aroused the people to a determination to exterminate the murderous gang. Several military companies were organized. The country was scoured, suspicious characters arrested and known criminals hanged without judge, jury or the benefit of a priest. Flores was hanged on Fort Hill and Pancho Daniel eighteen months later was found one morning hanging to a beam across the gate of the jail yard. The vigilantes, exasperated at the law's delays, hanged him. Tiburcio Vasquez's gang were the last banditti to terrorize the southern counties. After committing a series of crimes, the leader was captured in a cañon of the Cahuenga mountains May 15, 1874, by a sheriff's posse under Deputy Sheriff Albert Johnson. Vasquez was hanged March 19, 1875, at San José for murder committed in Santa Clara County. His band was broken up and disappeared from the county.

October 24, 1871, occurred one of the most disgraceful affairs that ever occurred in Los Angeles. It is known as the Chinese massacre. It grew out of one of those interminable feuds between rival tongs or companies of highbinders over the possession of a woman. In attempting to quell the disturbance, Robert Thompson was shot and killed by a bullet fired through the door of a Chinese house. A mob soon gathered and attacked the Chinese dens, and dragging forth the wretched occupants, hanged nineteen of them to wagon boxes, awnings and beams of a corral gate. The mob plundered the Chinese quarters, stealing everything of value they could lay their hands on. The rioting had begun about dark and continued until 9:30 in the evening, when the law-abiding citizens, under the lead of Henry T. Hazard, R. M. Widney, H. C. Austin, Sheriff Burns and others, had gathered in sufficient force to put a stop to the mob's wild work. Finding determined opposition, the murderous miscreants quickly dispersed. Of the nineteen Chinamen hanged, shot or dragged to death, only one, Ah Choy, was implicated in the high-binder war that gave the mob an excuse for robbery and pillage. One hundred and fifty indictments were found by the grand jury against persons implicated in the riot. Only six were convicted and these after serving a short time in the state's prison were released on a technicality.

The last execution by a vigilance committee in Los Angeles occurred on the morning of December 17, 1870. The victim was Michael Lachenias, a French desperado, who murdered his neighbor, Jacob Bell, an inoffensive little man, without provocation. Lachenias, who had the reputation of having killed five or six men, after shooting Bell rode in from his ranch south of town boasting of his deed. He gave himself up and was placed in jail. A vigilance committee, three hundred strong, was formed and, marching to the jail in broad daylight, took Lachenias out, then proceeded to Tomlinson's corral on the corner of Temple and New High streets (where the Law Building now stands), and hanged him to the beam over the gate. During the Chinese massacre five Chinamen were hanged to the same beam. No attempt was made to prosecute the vigilantes that executed Lachenias.

PIONEER NEWSPAPERS.

In our American colonization of the Great West the newspaper has kept pace with immigration. It was not so in Spanish colonization; in it the newspaper came late if it came at all. There were no newspapers published in California during the Spanish and Mexican eras.

Seventy years elapsed between the founding of Los Angeles and the founding of its first newspaper. October 16, 1850, Theodore Foster petitioned the city council "for a lot situated at the northerly corner of the jail for the purpose of erecting thereon a house to be used as a printing establishment." The council, "taking in consideration the advantages which a printing house offers to the advancement of public enlightenment, resolved for this once only that a lot from amongst those that are marked on the city map be given to Mr. Theodore Foster for the purpose of establishing thereon a printing house, and the donation be made in his favor because he is the first to inaugurate this public benefit." Foster selected a lot "back of Johnson's fronting on the corral." The corral or zanja madre (mother ditch) ran along Los Angeles street. Foster's lot, "forty varas each way," granted him by the council, was directly in the rear of where the St. Charles now stands. On this lot Foster built a two-story building. The lower story was used for a printing office and the upper for a living room for the proprietors and compositors.

The first number of the pioneer paper was issued May 17, 1851. It was named La Estrella de Los Angeles—the Star of Los Angeles, or the Los Angeles Star. It was a four-page, five-column paper; size of page, 12x18 inches. Two of its pages were printed in English and two in Spanish. The subscription price was $10 a year, payable in advance. Advertisements were inserted at the rate of $2 per square for the first insertion and $1 for each subsequent insertion. The publishers were John A. Lewis and John McElroy. Foster had transferred his interest in the printing house before the issue of the paper. In September, 1853, he committed suicide by drowning himself in the Fresno river.

Between 1851 and 1856 the Star had a number of different proprietors and publishers. It was not a very profitable investment, so it was passed along from one to another, each proprietor imagining that he knew how to run a paper to make it pay. In June, 1856, Henry Hamilton bought it. He continued its publication until October 12, 1864, when, having fallen under the ban of the Federal government for his outspoken sympathy with the Southern Confederacy, he was forced to discontinue its publication, and the Star set for a time. May 16, 1868, he resumed its publication. In 1870 the Daily Star was issued by Hamilton & Barter. Barter retired from the firm in a short time and Hamilton continued its publication. Ben. C. Truman leased it in 1873, and continued its publication until, July, 1877, Hamilton sold the paper to Paynter & Co. It passed from one publisher to another until finally the sheriff attached the plant for debt in the latter part of 1879, and the Star of Los Angeles ceased to shine.

The second paper founded in Los Angeles was the Southern Californian. The first issue appeared July 20, 1854, C. N. Richards & Co., publishers; William Butts, editor. November 2, 1854, William Butts and John O. Wheeler succeeded Richards & Co. in the proprietorship. The paper was ably conducted and large in size. It died in January, 1856, from insufficient support.

El Clamor Publico was the first Spanish paper published in Los Angeles. The first issue appeared June 8, 1855; its last December 31, 1859. Francisco P. Ramirez was the editor and proprietor. The Southern Vineyard was founded by Col. J. J. Warner March 20, 1858. It was at first a weekly and later on a semi-weekly. It ceased to exist June 8, 1860.

The Los Angeles News was established by C. R. Conway and Alonzo Waite, January 18, 1860. It was at first a semi-weekly; then changed to a tri-weekly and back again to a semi-weekly. January 1, 1869, under the management of King & Offutt it appeared as the Los Angeles Daily News. It was the first daily paper published in Los Angeles. Subscription price was $12 a year, six numbers a week. Its publication ceased in 1873.

These enumerated above were pioneers in the field of journalism. Of the modern papers (those that have appeared since 1860) their number is legion and the journalistic graveyard of unfelt wants is well filled with their remains. I have not space even to enumerate them. The oldest paper now published in Los Angeles is the Evening Express. It was established March 27, 1871.

ANNALS OF THE CITY'S GROWTH AND PROGRESS.

During the first decade (1850 to 1860) of American government of the city it made a steady growth. Wood and brick to a considerable extent had supplanted adobe in building. The first brick were made in 1852 by Jesse Hunter, and the first brick building erected in the city was built on the northwest corner of Main and Third streets.

The population of the city in 1850 was 1,610; in 1860, 4,399. The growth of the city has been irregular, by fits and starts, or booms, as they are now called. In 1849 and 1850 the city had one of its spasms of expansion that astonished the old-timers. Houses already framed for putting together were shipped around the Horn from Boston and New York and even from London. Some of these were sheet-iron buildings. Again in 1858 and 1859 the city had another building boom. The Arcadiablock, on the corner of Arcadia and Los Angeles streets, was built by Don Abel Stearns. It is said to have cost $80,000. The Angeleños pointed to it with pride and claimed that it was the finest business block south of San Francisco. In 1859 Juan Temple erected for a city market the building that was afterward used for a court house. The upper story was designed for and used several years as a theater. It cost $30,000. Ten years later it was sold at $25,000 to the county for a court house. During the year 1859, thirty-one brick buildings and a considerable number of wooden ones were built in the city. It was the biggest building boom in the history of the city up to that time. In January, 1858, the first train of pack camels appeared in Los Angeles. For a year or more afterwards it was no uncommon sight to see a caravan of these hump-backed burden-bearers solemnly wending their way single file through the city. In 1857, through the efforts of Jefferson Davis, then secretary of war, seventy-five camels were imported from Egypt and Arabia to Texas for army service in the arid plains of the southwest. One detachment from the main body was used in packing supplies from Los Angeles to Fort Tejon; others were used in transporting military supplies to the forts in Utah, Arizona, New Mexico and Texas. But the experiment proved a failure. The perversity of the camel and the impossibility of transforming an American mule whacker into an Arabian camel driver destroyed all hopes of utilizing the camel in America, and these "ships of the desert" were left finally to drift in their native element at will. It is said that some of the survivors of the experiment or their descendants are still running loose in the deserts of Arizona and Northern Mexico.

In 1860 the telegraph line between San Francisco and Los Angeles was completed and the first message over the wires was sent by Henry Mellus, the mayor of Los Angeles, at 10 o'clock

P. M., October 8, to H. F. Teschemacher, president of the board of supervisors of San Francisco. The Salt Lake trade, begun in 1855, had grown to considerable proportions. In one month as high as sixty wagons had been loaded in Los Angeles for Salt Lake. May 25, 1861, a grand Union demonstration was held in the city. The Civil war had split the citizens into two hostile factions; the larger number were Confederate sympathizers. The Union men, taking advantage of the presence of a company of the First United States Dragoons, got up a grand procession and marched around the plaza, down Main and up Spring to the court house, where the national colors were unfurled. The United States military band struck up the "Star-Spangled Banner," thirty-four guns were fired, one for each state in the Union, and patriotic speeches were made by Gen. Drown, Major Carlton and Capt. (afterwards Gen.) W. S. Hancock.

January, 1862, was noted for the greatest flood in the history of California. It began raining December 24, 1861, and kept it up almost without cessation for a month. New Year's day the valleys were like inland seas and all communication with the city from the south and east was cut off. The Arroyo Seco brought down immense rafts of driftwood, but as there were no bridges then across the river these did but little harm. They supplied the poor people of the city with firewood. During the early part of 1862 there were about 4,000 troops at Wilmington en route for Arizona and New Mexico. One regiment was stationed at Camp Latham on the La Ballona rancho. This camp was broken up in the summer and the troops removed to Wilmington.

The year 1863 was one of disasters. Smallpox was raging among the Mexicans and Indians and they were dying so fast that it was difficult to find persons to bury them. The great drouth had set in and cattle on the overstocked ranges were dying by droves. There was a feud between the Unionist and secessionist so bitter that a body of troops had to be stationed in the city to protect the Unionists, who were in the minority. Times were hard and money almost an unknown quantity. The property of several of the richest men in the city was advertised for sale on account of delinquent taxes. No assessment for city taxes was made for the fiscal year of 1863-64.

The year 1864 was a continuation of the evil days of 1863. The drouth continued and many of the cattle carried over from the previous year died before grass grew. The secession element was still rampant and a number of arrests were made by the government.

In 1865 the war was over and those on both sides who had fought valiantly with their tongues sheathed their weapons and cried peace. April 19, public obsequies were held in respect to the memory of President Lincoln. Rev. Elias Birdsell delivered the funeral oration. The 4th of July was celebrated for the first time since the beginning of the war. The church of the First Protestant Society, the erection of which had been begun in 1859, under the ministry of Rev. William E. Boardman, a Presbyterian minister, was this year turned over to the Episcopalians in an unfinished condition. It was completed and occupied by Rev. Elias Birdsell, an Episcopal minister. It was advertised for sale by the sheriff in 1864, but nobody wanted a church, and so it was not sold. It stood on the southwest corner of Temple and New High streets, where the steps leading up to the court house now are. It was the pioneer Protestant church of the city.

The year 1868, like that of 1862, was ushered in by a great flood, which left a lasting impress on the physical contour of the county. It formed a new river, or rather an additional channel for the San Gabriel river. Several thousand acres of valuable land were washed away by the San Gabriel river cutting a new channel to the sea, from three to five miles southeast of the old river. The damage by loss of land was more than offset by the increased facilities for irrigation afforded by having two rivers instead of one. The flood in the Los Angeles river swept away the dam of the water-works and cut off the city's water supply, leaving the inhabitants very much in the condition of Coleridge's Ancient Mariner, "Water, water everywhere, and not a drop to drink." The disastrous years of 1863 and 1864 had stopped all growth and improvement in the city. In 1868 the city began to take on a new growth. The subdivision of some of the large ranchos and their sale in small tracts brought in home-seekers. In the city, old-timers who had been holding on for years to town property took the first opportunity to unload on the newcomers; and lots that to-day are valued in the hundred thousands each changed hands in 1868 with the thousands left off.

A number of new enterprises were inaugurated this year. Work was begun on the Los Angeles & San Pedro Railroad. The City Water Company was organized and water piped in iron pipes to the houses. The first bank was organized by Alvinza Hayward and John G. Downey, capital $100,000. The new Masonic Hall on Spring street was dedicated September 29th. The city was lighted with gas.

In 1869 immigration was coming by boatloads. Real estate was advancing in value rapidly. There was a great demand for houses and new buildings were springing up all over the city. The Los Angeles & San Pedro Railroad was completed October 26 and then the old stage coaches that for nearly two decades had raced and rattled over the road between city and port were relegated to obscurity.

In February, 1870, the houses in the business portion of the city were numbered systematically for the first time. The first city directory was compiled this year, but was not published until 1871. There were 110 places where liquor was retailed. The Federal census gave the population of the city 5,614, which was an increase of 1,215 in ten years. The assessed value of property in the city was $2,108,061.

The railroad bond issue was the live question of 1872. The Southern Pacific Railroad Company had made an offer to build twenty-five miles north and twenty-five east from Los Angeles city of its trans-continental line that it was building up the San Joaquin valley. The Texas Pacific met this with an offer to build from San Diego (the prospective terminus of its trans-continental line) a railroad up the coast to Los Angeles, giving the county sixty miles of railroad. The Southern Pacific countered this offer by agreeing to build, in addition to the fifty miles of its previous offer, a branch to Anaheim, making in all seventy-seven miles. The recompense for this liberality on the part of the roads was that the people should vote bonds equal to five per cent of the total taxable property of the county. The bond question stirred up the people as no previous issue had done since the Civil war. The contest was a triangular one, Southern Pacific, Texas Pacific or no railroad. Each company had its agents and advocates abroad enlightening the people on the superior merits of its individual offer, while "Taxpayer" and "Pro Bono Publico," through the newspapers, bewailed the waste of the people's money and bemoaned the increase of taxes. At the election, November 5, the Southern Pacific won.

The city reached the high tide of its prosperity during the '70s in 1874. Building was active. It was estimated that over $300,000 was expended in the erection of business houses and fully that amount in residences. The Spring and Sixth street horse railroad, the first street car line in the city, was completed this year.

The year 1875 was one of disasters. The great financial panic of 1873, presaged by that monetary cyclone, "Black Friday in Wall street," had no immediate effect upon business in California. The years 1873 and 1874 were among the most prosperous in our history. The panic reached California in September, 1875, beginning with the suspension of the Bank of California in San Francisco and the tragic death of its president, William C. Ralston. In a few days nearly every bank in California closed its doors. The two in Los Angeles—the Temple & Workman and Hellman's—closed. The latter resumed business in a few days. The former made an attempt to stem the current of its financial difficulties, failed, and went down forever, carrying with it the fortune of many an unfortunate depositor. One of the bankers, William Workman, an old and highly respected pioneer, from brooding over the failure, went insane and committed suicide. Temple died a few years later, a poor man.

The hard times following the bank failures were intensified by the drought of 1877, which brought disaster to the sheep industry of Southern California. There was no business reaction during the remainder of the decade. The Federal census of 1880 gave the city's population at 11,183, an increase of almost one hundred per cent in ten years. The greater part of the gain was made in the first half of the decade. Railroad connection with San Francisco and Sacramento was made in September, 1876, but it opened up no new market for Los Angeles. Times continued hard and money close. The adoption of the new constitution of the state in 1879 did not improve matters. The capitalists were afraid of some of its radical innovations.

In 1881 times began to improve. The railroad had penetrated into the mining regions of Arizona and opened up a market for the products of Southern California. Its completion next year gave Los Angeles direct connection with the east and brought in eastern investors. During 1883 and 1884 the city grew rapidly. In May, 1883, the school lot on the northwest corner of Spring and Second streets was sold for $31,000; two years before it was valued at $12,000. The board of education purchased from part of the proceeds of that sale the present site of the Spring street school, near Sixth street, for $12,500. The school building was erected in 1884, at a cost of about $40,000. In the spring of 1886 the Atlantic & Pacific and its connecting roads—the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé and Southern California—precipitated a rate war with the Southern Pacific. Round-trip tickets from Missouri river points to Los Angeles were sold as low as $15. Thousands of eastern people, taking advantage of the low rates, visited Southern California.

The country was looking its loveliest. Eastern people, shivering in the "bleak winds of March" when they left their homes, in three or four days were in a land where the plains and hills were green with verdure, flowers blooming and the fragrance of orange bloom perfuming the air. The result was that many of the tourists invested in land and lots and others went home to sell their possessions and return to the promised and promising land. Real-estate values went up rapidly in 1886, but in 1887 came that event that marks the turning point in the city's history—the Boom.

In the historical sketch of Los Angeles county some of the extravagant as well as the ludicrous features of the boom are portrayed. Speculation in city property was mostly legitimate, but values were inflated to the bursting point. After a lapse of fifteen years and a population three times as great as that of 1887, very little of the property that changed hands during the boom, outside of what on three business streets, could be sold to-day at the figures at which it changed hands during the height of the boom; and many of the outlying lots in the eastern part of the city could not be disposed of for the amount of the commission the real-estate agent received for making the sale fifteen years ago.

In 1889 work was begun on the cable railway system. A line was extended on Broadway to Seventh and west on Seventh to West Lake Park. Another line extended from Seventh on Grand avenue to Jefferson street. From First and Spring a line ran on East First to Boyle Heights and from the same point another ran on North Spring, Upper Main and Downey avenue to East Los Angeles. A million and a half dollars were expended in tracks, power houses and machinery. All but the tracks were discarded a few years later, when electricity was substituted for steam and the trolley for the cable. The Los Angeles electric railway system was begun in 1892. The first line constructed was that on West Second, Olive, First and other streets to Westlake Park. The traction system was begun in 1895.

In February, 1892, Messrs. Doheny and Connon, prospecting for petroleum, dug two wells with pick and shovel on West State street, in the resident portion of the city. At the depth of 150 feet oil was found. From this small beginning a profitable industry has grown up. The oil belt extends diagonally across the northwestern part of the city. The total number of wells drilled within the city limits up to June, 1900, was 1,300, and the yield of these from the beginning of the oil development was estimated at 7,000,000 barrels, worth in round numbers about $6,000,000.

In the spring of 1900 the oil industry took on some of the wild-cat characteristics of the great real-estate boom. For a time it was no uncommon feat to incorporate half a dozen oil companies in a day. The capital of some of these ran up into the millions. Oil stocks could be bought all the way from one cent up; and later on, when the excitement began to subside, in bunches of five for a cent. Thousands of dollars were invested in oil stock, not wild-cat, from which there will be no return. Many an investor to-day has a nicely lithographed certificate of oil stock that has cost him more than would an oil painting by one of the old masters. At several elections called at different times between 1895 and 1899 the city area was increased by annexations on the southwest and northeast from twenty-seven to thirty-seven square miles. The population of the city, according to the census of 1900, was 102,298. The assessed value of city property was $67,576,047.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

SANTA BARBARA COUNTY.

ORIGIN OF THE NAME.

WHEN Cabrillo explored the Santa Barbara channel in 1542 he named only a few of the prominent points of the main land and the islands that mark the channel; but few of the names he gave have been retained.

Sixty years later Sebastian Viscaïno's ships sailed through the channel. Padre de La Ascension, one of the three Carmelite friars accompanying the expedition, December 4, 1602, writing a letter descriptive of the mainland and the islands of the channel, headed it Santa Barbara, in honor of Santa Barbara, virgin and martyr, whose day in the Catholic calendar is December 4.

Santa Barbara was born in Nicomedia, Asia Minor, and suffered martyrdom, December 4, A. D. 218, during the persecution of the Christians under the Emperor Maximum. She is said to have been decapitated by her father, a Roman officer serving under the Emperor. One hundred and sixty-seven years after Viscaïno's explorations, Portala's expedition passed up the coast and through the valley where the city of Santa Barbara now stands. Through all these years the channel still retained the name given it by Padre de La Ascension, although so far as we know no ship's keel had cut its waters since Viscaïno's time.

When the presidio was founded, April 21, 1782, the name of the fort, and of the mission that was to be, had already been determined. To Padre de La Ascension belongs the honor of naming the channel from which came the name of the presidio, the mission and the pueblo that grew up around these. When the county was formed naturally it took the name so long borne by the pueblo and the district over which it exercised jurisdiction.

ORGANIZATION OF THE COUNTY.

Santa Barbara is one of the original twenty-seven counties into which the state, or rather the territory, of California (for it had not yet been admitted as a state of the Union) was divided by an act of the legislature. Approved February 18, 1850.

Section 4 of that act created the county of Santa Barbara. The boundaries as given in the act are as follows: "Beginning on the sea coast at the mouth of the creek called Santa Maria, and running up the middle of said creek to its source; thence due northeast to the summit of the Coast Range, the farm of Santa Maria falling within Santa Barbara county; thence following the summit of the Coast Range to the northwest corner of Los Angeles county; thence along the northwest boundary of said county to the ocean and three English miles therein; and thence in a northerly direction parallel with the coast to a point due west of the mouth of Santa Maria creek; thence due east to the mouth of said creek, which was the place of beginning; including the islands of Santa Barbara, San Nicolas, San Miguel, Santa Rosa, Santa Cruz and others in the same vicinity. The seat of justice shall be at Santa Barbara." By an act of the legislature of 1851-52 the boundaries of the county were more clearly defined and some slight changes made in the lines.

The legislature passed acts creating county organizations and providing for the election of county officers. The old system of municipal government that had been in force under Spanish and Mexican rule and under the American rule from the time of the conquest was swept out of existence. In place of ayuntamientos and courts of first, second and third instance, and of offices of alcaldes, prefects, sub-prefects, regidores and syndicos were substituted district courts, courts of sessions, county courts, justices of the peace, common councils, mayors, sheriffs, district attorneys, treasurers, assessors, recorders, surveyors, coroners and constables. To the natives who had been reared under the simple forms of early years the American system of government was complicated and confusing. An election for county officers was ordered held throughout the state on the first Monday of April, 1850; and the machinery of county government was put into operation as speedily as possible. The transition from the old form to the new took place in Santa Barbara in August.

Henry A. Tefft was appointed judge of the second judicial district, which consisted of the counties of Santa Barbara and San Luis Obispo. John M. Huddars acted as clerk of the court. At the April election Pablo de la Guerra, who had represented the Santa Barbara district in the constitutional convention, was chosen state senator and J. M. Covarrubias and Henry S. Carnes the first assemblymen.

Joaquin Carrillo was the first county judge and by virtue of his office presiding justice of the court of sessions. This court consisted of the county judge and two justices of the peace, who acted as associate justices. Besides its judicial duties it also fulfilled the functions of county government now performed by boards of supervisors. The first meeting of the court of sessions was held October 21, 1850, and its first recorded act was the ordering of a county seal. The design of the seal is described as follows: "Around the margin the words, county court of Santa Barbara county, with the following device in the center: A female figure holding in her right hand a balance and in her left a rod of justice; above, a figure of a rising sun; below, CAL. The associate justices at the first meeting of the court of sessions were Samuel Barney and William A. Streeter.

José A. Rodriguez, the first sheriff of the county, was killed in the fall of 1850 on the present site of the oil wells of Summerland while leading a party in pursuit of the murderers of the Reed family at San Miguel Mission. Rodriguez was recklessly brave. The murderers had been surrounded. The members of the sheriff's posse hesitated to close in on them. Rodriguez, to inspire his men with courage, rushed in upon the murderers and, seizing one of them, pulled him from his horse. In the scuffle the fellow shot and killed the sheriff. One of the desperadoes, endeavoring to escape, swam out to sea and was drowned. Three of them, Lynch, Raymond and Quin, were captured, taken to Santa Barbara and shot.

The first assessment of property was made by Lewis T. Burton, county assessor. The total value of all property in the county, real and personal, was placed at $992,676. Cattle were assessed at $8 per head, sheep at $3 per head and land at twenty-five cents per acre. The assessment list of Don José de la Guerra y Noriega is a good illustration of how the lands of the county had been monopolized by a few men. Noriega owned the Conejo rancho, which contained 53,880 acres; the Simi, containing 108,000 acres; Las Pasas, containing 26,640 acres; San Julian, 20,000; the Salsipuedes, 35,200 acres; a total of 243,120 acres; the assessed value of which was about $60,000.

It took the new officers some time to become acquainted with the duties of the several offices. There was a disposition to mix American and Mexican law. In the county as in the city government there were frequent resignations, and the officers changed from one official position to another. County officers held city offices and vice versa, sometimes by appointment and sometimes by election. Joaquin Carrillo, in 1852, was county judge and mayor of Santa Barbara city at the same time. J. W. Burroughs breaks the record as champion officeholder. He was elected sheriff in 1857; appointed recorder September 3, 1851; justice of the peace September 16, 1857; acted as county clerk January 23, 1852, and was appointed treasurer April 14, 1852. January 29, 1851, he had been elected a member of the common council. He held six distinct offices within a little more than a year.

The frequent recurrence of the same family name in the lists of city and county officials might give rise to the charge of nepotism or a family political ring. The de la Guerras and the Carrillos were ruling families in Santa Barbara before the conquest and they continued to be for some time after. The first mayor of the city was a de la Guerra (Francisco). The first state senator was also a de la Guerra (Pablo). Don Pablo, although a bitter opponent to the Americans during the war, after the conquest became thoroughly Americanized. He held many offices. He was a member of the constitutional convention, state senator, acting lieutenant-governor, mayor of Santa Barbara, councilman, supervisor and district judge. At a meeting of the court of sessions December 6, 1852, the judges of the court were Joaquin Carrillo, county judge; Pedro Carrillo and José Carrillo, associate justices.

In early days politics had very little to do with the selection of county officers. Fitness and family (particularly family) were the chief qualifications. It was urged against Don Pablo de la Guerra when he was a candidate for district judge that in a great many cases which would come before him if elected he would be barred from sitting as judge because about half of the population of Santa Barbara county was related to him by blood or marriage. In 1852 District Judge Henry A. Tefft was drowned at Port San Luis while attempting to land from the steamer to hold court at San Luis Obispo. Joaquin Carrillo was elected district judge to fill the vacancy. He held office by appointment and election fourteen years. He did not understand English and all the business of the court was conducted in the Spanish language. Although not a lawyer his decisions were seldom overruled by the higher courts. Charles Fernald was appointed county judge to fill the vacancy caused by the promotion of Joaquin Carrillo. The first county building, a jail, was completed December 1, 1853. In 1853 the county was divided into three townships of about equal area. Township No. 1, elections held at San Buenaventura; No. 2 at Santa Barbara, and No. 3 at Santa Ynez. By act of the legislature of 1852-3 a board of supervisors was created for each county. This relieved the court of sessions of the legislative part of its duties. The first board of supervisors of Santa Barbara consisted of Pablo de la Guerra, Fernando Pico and Ramon Malo.

Up to 1856 Santa Barbara was solidly Democratic in politics. The Whig party seems not to have gained a foothold. In local politics, family, as I have said before, was one of the chief requisites. So one-sided was the county politically that at the state election of 1855 the supervisors in canvassing the vote recorded only the Democratic. The opposition vote seems not to have risen to the dignity of scattering.

November 27, 1855, the supervisors purchased the house of John Kays for a court house, paying for it and the grounds $6,000. The county was now equipped with a court house and jail. The prisoners, who were mostly Indians, were not doomed to solitary confinement. The jail was not capacious enough to hold them. They were given employment outside. We find among the proceedings of the board of supervisors in 1856 an order to the sheriff to sell the adobes made by the prisoners at the county jail at not less than $2.50 per hundred.

CRIME AND CRIMINALS.

During the early '50s the coast counties were the scenes of many deeds of violence. The Argonauts who came to the state by the southern routes and the Sonorian migration traveled the coast road on their way to the mines. The cattle buyers coming south to the cow counties to buy stock came by this route. The long stretches of unsettled country in Santa Barbara and San Luis Obispo counties gave the banditti who infested the trail an opportunity to rob and murder with but little fear of detection.

The Solomon Pico band of outlaws was the first organized gang that terrorized the coast counties. Their victims were mostly cattle buyers. This gang was finally hunted down and most of them died "with their boots on." Some of the remnants of this gang that escaped justice and others of the same kind were gathered up by Jack Powers, who became the recognized leader of a band of robbers and desperadoes. Powers came to the coast as a member of Stevenson's regiment. After his discharge from service he turned gambler and robber. Although it was known that he was implicated in a number of robberies and several murders, he escaped punishment. He was arrested in 1856 when the vigilance committee was disposing of his kind. Although he was released he felt safer to be beyond the jurisdiction of the committee. He went to Sonora, Mexico, where he stocked a ranch with stolen cattle. In a quarrel with one of his men he was shot and killed. His body when found was half eaten by hogs.

Fear of the vigilance committee drove out of San Francisco in 1856 a number of undesirable citizens. Among those who fled from the city was Ned McGowan, a notorious and disreputable politician, who, with several others of his kind, had been indicted by the grand jury of San Francisco county as accessory before the fact of the murder of James King of William. McGowan made his escape to Santa Barbara, where he was assisted and befriended by Jack Powers and some others whose sympathies were with the criminal element. The vigilantes chartered a vessel and sent thirty of their men, under the command of one of their captains, to capture him. McGowan's Santa Barbara friends, some of whom were wealthy and influential, kept him concealed until the vigilantes left. After the disbanding of the vigilance committee McGowan's friends in the legislature secured the passage of a bill giving him a change of venue from San Francisco to Napa county. He was tried and acquitted mainly on the evidence of one of the twenty-two doctors who attended King after he was shot. This physician testified that King was killed by the doctors and not by Casey.

Local vigilance committees, between 1855 and 1860, in Los Angeles, San Luis Obispo, Monterey and Santa Cruz to a considerable extent purified the moral atmosphere of these coast counties; but Santa Barbara, judging from a grand jury report made to the court of sessions in 1859, seems to have been immune from outbreaks of vigilantes. Says this report: "Thieves and villains of every grade have been from time to time upheld, respected, fostered and pampered by our influential citizens, and, if need be, aided and assisted in escaping from merited punishment due their crimes. * * * Offenses, thefts and villainies in defiance of the law, of every grade and character, from the horse and cattle thief to the highway robber and midnight assassin, have dwelt, to our knowledge, for the last five years in our very midst."

THE DOWNFALL OF THE CATTLE KINGS.

For a decade and a half after the discovery of gold in California the owners of the great ranchos of Santa Barbara continued, as they had been in the past, the feudal lords of the land. Their herds were more profitable than gold mines and their army of retainers gave them unlimited political power, which they did not always use wisely or well.

The high price of cattle, the abundant rainfall of the years 1860-61-62 and the consequent luxuriant growth of grass led to an overstocking of the cattle ranges. When the terrible dry years of 1863 and 1864 came, the stockmen were in no condition to carry their numerous herds through the drought. "The county assessment roll of 1863 showed over 200,000 head of cattle in Santa Barbara county. This probably was 100,000 less than the true number. When grass started in the winter of 1864-65 less than 5,000 head were alive. The great herds were gone, and the shepherd kings were kings no more, for their ranchos were mortgaged beyond redemption, and in the next five years passed entirely out of their hands."*

The downfall of these feudal lords was, indeed, pathetic. For nearly a century their ancestors and they themselves had ruled the land. The transition of the country from the domination of Spain to that of Mexico had not affected their rule. The conquering Saxon had come, but his advent had only increased their wealth without lessening their power; at least such was the case in the coast counties. The famine years and their own improvidence had at last undone them. In the days of their affluence they had spent lavishly. If money was needed, it was easy to negotiate a loan on their broad acres. Rates of interest in early times were usurious, ruinous. Five, ten and even fifteen per cent a month were no uncommon rates. Present needs were pressing and pay day was mañana (tomorrow). The mortgage, with its cancerous interest, was made and the money spent. So when the "famine years" swept away the herds and flocks there was nothing to sell or mortgage to pay interest and the end came quickly. It was with the stoicism of fatalists that the great ranch owner viewed their ruin. They had besought the intercession of their patron saints for the needed rain. Their prayers had been unanswered. It was the will of God, why complain? Thus do Faith and Fatalism often meet on a common plane.

During the next four or five years several of the great ranchos were subdivided, or segregated portions cut up into small tracts. When immigration began to drift into the coast counties in the early '70s many of these small tracts in Santa Barbara were bought by eastern immigrants and the transition from cattle-raising to grain-growing and fruit culture wrought a great change not only in the character of the products, but in the character of the population as well.

The write-up of the climate and agricultural possibilities of the coast counties by Nordhoff and others, the judicious advertising of the resources of the county by J. A. Johnson, editor of the Santa Barbara Press (a paper established in 1868), increased steamer communication, and the prospects of a railroad down the coast, all combined, attracted settlers from Northern California and the eastern states. The price of land advanced and in 1874 the city and the county experienced their first boom. The dry year of 1876-77 checked the rising wave of prosperity, and disastrously affected the sheep industry, which since the "famine years" had to a considerable extent taken the place of cattle-raising. Business revived in the early '80s, and the county made good progress. The completion to Santa Barbara in 1887 of the southern end of the Southern Pacific Coast Railroad, and the prospect of an early closing of the gap between the northern and southern ends of that road gave the city and county their second boom. Real estate values went up like a rocket. In 1886 the county assessment roll footed up $8,585,485; in 1887 it went up to $15,035,982, an increase of seventy-five per cent in one year. When railroad building ceased the reaction came. Land values dropped, but the county continued to grow, notwithstanding the long and discouraging delay of fourteen years in closing the gap in direct railroad communication between San Francisco and Santa Barbara. March 31, 1901, the first through trains from the north and the south passed over the completed coast line of the Southern Pacific Railroad. The event was not heralded by any great demonstration, nor was it followed by a land boom, as in 1887, yet there can be no doubt but that it marks the beginning of a new era in the growth and development of the city and county of Santa Barbara.

LOMPOC.

In August, 1874, the Lompoc Valley Company, an incorporation, bought the ranchos Lompoc and Mission Vieja de La Purisima.

*Mason's History of Santa Barbara.

containing a total of 45,644.49 acres. A considerable portion of these lands was divided into 5, 10, 20, 40 and 80 acre tracts. One square mile about the center of the Lompoc valley and nine miles from the coast was reserved for a town site. The sale of the lands began November 9, 1874. It had been widely advertised and attracted a large crowd. The capital stock of the company was divided into 100 shares of $5,000 each. While the sale was in progress shares rose to a premium of $1,000. During the sale about $700,000 worth of land and lots were disposed of. The average price of the farm land was $60 per acre. Some of the corner lots in the town site sold as high as $1,200.

Lompoc was founded as a temperance colony, and like all such colonies has had its battles with the liquor traffic. The first engagement was with a druggist, who was carrying on an illicit traffic in forbidden liquids. His place was invaded by a number of citizens and a Mrs. Pierce plied an ax on a 40-gallon cask of whiskey and flooded the store with the fiery liquid. The druggist drew a pistol and threatened to shoot the destroyers of his intoxicants, but, confronted by two hundred crusaders, he concluded that discretion was the better part of valor and put up his gun. Another engagement, which scored a "knock-out" for the opponents of the liquor traffic, took place on the evening of May 20, 1881. A bomb was thrown into the saloon of George Walker. Nobody was hurt, but the saloon and its contents were completely demolished. The Lompoc Record, commenting on the "earthquake" (as the people facetiously called it), said: "Any one looking for a location for a saloon had better not select a community founded on temperance principles where the land is sold on express conditions that no liquor shall be made or sold thereon, where public sentiment is so nearly unanimous against saloons and where 'earthquakes' are so prevalent and destructive." The seismic disturbances that shook up saloons in the early days of the colony have ceased. The crusaders have buried their little hatchets, but not in the heads of whiskey barrels. The report of the Santa Barbara Chamber of Commerce for 1901 says of Lompoc: "The liquor traffic is confined by license of $75 per month each to two saloons."

Lompoc is an incorporated city of the sixth class. It has a grammar school building, costing $15,000; a union high school that, with its furnishings, cost $12,000; the Methodist North, Methodist South, Baptist, Christian, Presbyterian, Roman Catholic and Episcopal have each its own church building. A bank, mercantile houses, hotels, restaurants, blacksmith shops, creamery, livery stable, warehouses, fruit packing houses, etc., make up the business establishments of the town. Two weekly newspapers are published in the town, the Record and the Journal. The Lompoc Record was established April 10, 1875, and is one of the oldest newspapers in the county.

GUADALUPE.

This town is ninety-five miles northwesterly from Santa Barbara on the Southern Pacific Railroad. In 1872 John Dunbar opened a store at this point and was appointed postmaster when the post-office was established here. This was the beginning of the town. In 1874 it had grown to be a village of 100 houses. In 1875 a newspaper, the Guadalupe Telegraph, was established. It has now a bank, a hotel and several mercantile establishments. A spur of the Southern Pacific Railroad runs to the Union Sugar Factory at Batteravia.

BATTERAVIA.

The Union Sugar Factory at Batteravia was built in 1898 at a cost of $1,000,000. It employs during the sugar-making season 500 men and works up 500 tons per day. The lime used in the manufacture of sugar from beets is burned and prepared for use at the factory. Last season the factory used 8,000 tons of lime. The company has a store, shops and boarding-houses at Batteravia.

SANTA MARIA.

Santa Maria, situated near the center of the Santa Maria valley on the Pacific Coast Railroad, was founded in 1876. It is the business center of a rich agricultural district. A branch line of railroad, five miles long, extends to the sugar factory on Guadalupe Lake. The town has a grammar school employing five teachers and a union high school. It has a bank, three large mercantile establishments and several smaller ones. The community supports two weekly newspapers, the Santa Maria Times, founded in 1872, and the Graphic.

LOS OLIVAS, founded in 1880, is the present terminus of the Pacific Coast Railroad and is a shipping point of considerable importance.

LOS ALAMOS, founded in 1878, situated on the Pacific Coast Railway, midway between Santa Ynez and Santa Maria, has a population of about 300. It is the commercial outlet of an agricultural district of about 150,000 acres, most of which is grazing land.

SANTA YNEZ.

The village of Santa Ynez is situated in the midst of the Rancho Canada de Los Pinos or College ranch. The College ranch or grant was given to the padres in 1843 to found a college, hence the name. The town of Santa Ynez has an excellent hotel, a grammar school, a high school, stores, shops, etc.; also a weekly newspaper, The Santa Ynez Argus. It is surrounded by a large area of farming and grazing lands.

GOLETA is a small village eight miles to the northwest of Santa Barbara. The country around to a considerable extent is devoted to walnut-growing and olive culture.

EL MONTECITO (the Little Forest) is properly a suburb of Santa Barbara. It is about four miles eastward of the city. The valley is nearly oval, and opens to the southwest on the sea. It contains an area of about nine square miles. It is divided into small tracts, and is a favorite place for the suburban residences of persons doing business in the city. The Santa Barbara Country Club's grounds are here. The cottages are built on a level bluff above the ocean. The club has its golf links, tennis courts, bath house, wharf for boating and other accessories for pleasure and amusement.

SUMMERLAND, six miles below Santa Barbara, on the Southern Pacific Railroad, is the principal petroleum district of Santa Barbara county. Oil was struck here in 1893. The oil belt is about a quarter of a mile wide and a mile long. Most of the wells are sunk in the ocean beyond low-water mark. Wharves are run out and the wells bored beside the wharves. Some of these wharves are 1,500 feet long. The output of the oil wells, of which there are about 300, is about 15,000 barrels a month. A railroad station, post-office, several business places, boarding houses and residences of oil operators constitute the village of Summerland.

CARPINTERIA VALLEY is about fifteen miles due east from Santa Barbara. It is sheltered by mountains on three sides and opens to the sea. Its area is about ten square miles, and its width between the mountains and the ocean varies from one to three miles. It is one of the oldest settled valleys in the county. It bears the name given it by the soldiers of Portolá's expedition in 1769. They found the Indians here manufacturing canoes, and they named the place Carpinteria (carpenter shop). The village is located near the center of the valley on the Southern Pacific Railroad.

THE CHANNEL ISLANDS.

Three of the Channel islands are included in the area of Santa Barbara county, namely San Miguel, Santa Rosa and Santa Cruz. These islands are mainly devoted to sheep and cattle-raising.

SAN MIGUEL, the most westerly of the group, is seven and one-half miles long, with an average width of two and one-half miles. The principal landing place is Cuyler's Harbor. At this landing Cabrillo, the discoverer of California, is buried. The island is now owned by the San Miguel Island Company.

SANTA ROSA ISLAND is nine and three-fourths miles long, with an average width of seven and one-half miles, and contains 53,000 acres. It was granted by the Mexican government to Don Carlos Carrillo after his failure to secure the governorship of California in 1837. He gave it in 1842, as a marriage portion, to his two daughters, who were married on the same day, one to J. C. Jones, United States consul to the Sandwich Islands, and the other to Capt. A. B. Thompson. It now belongs to the heirs of A. P. More.

SANTA CRUZ ISLAND is twenty-two and one-half miles long by five and one-half wide, and contains 52,760 acres. It lies almost opposite the city of Santa Barbara and twenty-five miles distant. The surface is uneven, the hills at one point rising to the height of 1,700 feet. The Mexican government at one time attempted to utilize the island for a penal colony. About a dozen convicts were landed on the island with live stock and provisions, with the expectation that they would become self-supporting. They remained on the island long enough to eat up the provisions and the live stock. Then they constructed a raft, crossed the channel to Santa Barbara and quartered themselves on the Mission fathers. They served out their sentences in irons. The island once had a large Indian population. It is a favorite hunting ground for Indian relic hunters. It is now owned by the Santa Cruz Island Company.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

The first public school opened in Santa Barbara was taught by a young sailor named José Manuel Toca. He taught from October, 1795, to June, 1797. José Medina, another sailor of the Spanish navy, succeeded him and trained the young ideas until December, 1798. Manuel de Vargas, a retired sergeant of the army, who, in 1794 taught at San José the pioneer public school of California, was teaching at Santa Barbara in 1799. How long he continued to wave the pedagogical birch, or, rather, ply the cat-o'-nine-tails, which was the schoolmaster's instrument of punishment then, is not known. With the departure of Governor Borica, the schools of California took a vacation. During the closing years of Spanish rule, it seems to have been mostly vacation in them.

The first school under Mexican rule in Santa Barbara that we have any report of was in 1829, when a primary school of sixty-seven pupils was conducted at the presidio. Governor Echeandia was a friend to education, and made a vigorous effort to establish public schools. But "unable," says Bancroft, "to contend against the enmity of the friars, the indifference of the people and the poverty of the treasury, he accomplished no more than his predecessors. Reluctantly he abandoned the contest, and the cause of education declined." And it might be added, the cause of education continued in a state of decline during the remaining years of Mexican rule. The curriculum of the Spanish and Mexican schools was like the annals of the poor—"short and simple." To paraphrase Pete Jones' alliterative formula, it consisted of "lick-in' and no larnin'." The principal numbers in the course were the doctrina Cristiana and Fray Ripalda's Catechism. These were learned by rote before the pupil was taught to read. If there was any time left him after he had committed to memory these essentials to his future spiritual welfare, he was given a little instruction in reading, writing and numbers for his earthly advantage.

The invalid soldiers, the schoolmasters of early days, were brutal tyrants, who ruled without justice and punished without mercy. Governor Micheltorena attempted to establish a public school system in the territory; but his scheme failed from the same causes which had neutralized the efforts of his predecessors. Under his administration in 1844, a primary school was opened in Santa Barbara, but was closed after a few months for want of funds. Pio Pico, the last governor under Mexican rule, undertook to establish public schools, but his efforts were fruitless. The old obstacles, an empty treasury, incompetent teachers and indifferent parents, confronted him and put an end to his educational schemes.

During the first two or three years of American rule in Santa Barbara, but little attention was paid to education. The old indifference remained. The discovery of gold had not greatly increased the population nor wrought any change in social conditions.

When the common council in April, 1850, took control of the municipal business of the newly created city, it inherited from the ayuntamiento a school taught by a Spanish schoolmaster, Victor Vega. The school was in part supported by public funds. The council sent a certain number of poor pupils, i. e., pupils who were unable to pay tuition, for whom they paid a certain stipulated sum. March 26, 1851, "the committee appointed to examine the school, reported, and the president was ordered to pay the schoolmaster, Victor Vega, $64.50, and to draw $64 for every month." This is the first recorded school report of the city.

Evidently there was considerable truancy. At the meeting of the council, November 8, 1851, José M. Covarubias was appointed a committee to examine the school once a month and to report precisely the number and names of pupils who absent themselves and the time of their absence. Any pupil absent over a day lost his seat.

In November, 1852, three school commissioners were elected in each of the three townships of Santa Barbara county. Each township was a school district. After their election the control of the schools in Santa Barbara passed from the council to the schools commissioners of the district. In 1854 a tax of five cents on the $100 was levied for the support of the public schools. Previous to this the school revenues had been derived from liquor licenses, fines, etc.

At the election in 1854 Joaquin Carrillo, district judge, was elected county school superintendent. He did not qualify, and A. F. Hinchman was appointed to fill the vacancy. The Gazette of December 20, 1855, says: "According to the school census there are 453 white children between the ages of four and eighteen years in Santa Barbara district, which is sixty miles long and forty wide. There is one school in it, in charge of a schoolmaster."

December 24, 1855, George D. Fisher, county school superintendent, reported a school taught in the first district (San Buenaventura) by John Rapelli, and one in the second (Santa Barbara), taught by Pablo Caracela. Both of these schools were taught in the Spanish language. American residents had no place to send their children except to a school kept by George Campbell at the Mission Santa Inez (third district), a distance of fifty miles from the bulk of the people.

February 4, 1856, two teachers were employed in the Santa Barbara city schools, Owen Connolly teaching the English school in "the house adjoining the billiard saloon," and Victor Mondran teaching the Spanish school in "the house of the late Pedro Diablar."

In 1857 it was decided "that instruction in the public schools shall be in the English language." The native Californians had opposed this, but the aggressive Anglo-Saxon won. It was the ringing out of the old, the ringing in of the new.

The schools had now passed the experimental stages, and had become an institution of the land. Although no school district in the county owned a school house, yet public education had been systemized. Teachers were required to pass an examination in the subjects taught in the schools, and their compensation was no longer subject to whims of the parents.

SANTA BARBARA MISSION, FOUNDED IN 1786

Although public schools had been established and somewhat systemized, the people were slow to avail themselves of the educational facilities offered. In 1867, fifteen years after the public school system of California had been inaugurated, there were but three school districts and five teachers in Santa Barbara, which then included all of what is now Ventura county. Of the 1,332 census children, only 305, or 23 per cent of the whole, attended any school, public or private, during the year.

The next decade showed a great change in educational conditions. Ventura county had been cut off from the parent county in 1873, but taking the territory as it stood in 1867, there were in it in 1877, 33 districts and 53 teachers. Of the 4,030 census children, 2,782 had been enrolled in the schools.

In 1890 there were 4,429 census children in Santa Barbara county, 3,439 of whom attended school. In 1900 there were 5,617 census children and 66 districts.

Santa Barbara, Lompoc, Santa Maria and Santa Ynez each have a high school. Santa Barbara recently voted $60,000 bonds to build a new high school building.

CHAPTER XXIX.

THE CITY OF SANTA BARBARA.

SANTA BARBARA was incorporated as a city by an act of the legislature approved April 9, 1850. The early municipal records were kept very carelessly. There is no record in the archives of the first city election. The first record of any official action taken for the organization of a city is the minutes of the meeting of the common council held August 26, 1850. A mayor and members of the council had been elected at some previous date, and the councilmen-elect met to organize. The minutes of their proceedings were kept on sheets of foolscap stitched together. Either record books could not be obtained then in Santa Barbara, or the members of the council did not consider their acts of municipal legislation worth preserving in any better form. The minutes of the first meeting are as follows: "In the city of Santa Barbara, on the 26th day of August, 1850, the persons elected to the common council assembled and proceeded to elect a president. Lewis T. Burton having received a majority of the votes, was declared elected. Luis Carrillo was then elected clerk.

Luis Carrillo (Rubica), Tenio" (Clerk).

From the subsequent minutes we learn that Francisco de la Guerra was the first mayor, and "the persons elected to the common council" were Isaac J. Sparks, Anastasio Carrillo, Luis Carrillo, Lewis T. Burton and Antonio Rodriguez. Having elected a president and clerk, or secretary, the council took a vacation for nearly three months. Evidently municipal business was not pressing. The record of the next meeting reads: "November 21, 1850. At the house Anastasio Carrillo, Common Council of Santa Barbara. Present, Isaac J. Sparks, Anastasio Carrillo and Luis Carrillo. Lewis T. Burton and Antonio Rodriguez sent in their resignations as members of the council, which were accepted. Isaac J. Sparks was elected president of the council. An election was ordered to be held on the second day of December next for two members of the council, a treasurer and a marshal; the election to be held in one of the corridors of the house of Lewis T. Burton. Nicolas A. Den was appointed inspector. Augustus F. Hinchman was chosen clerk of the common council.

(Signed) Luis Carrillo, Secretario."

At the special city election, held December 2, 1850, Samuel Barney and Edward S. Hoar were elected councilmen; Carlos Antonio Carrillo, treasurer, and Juan Ayala, marshal. At the next meeting of the council, a committee, consisting of Isaac J. Sparks, Antonio Maria de La Guerra and Nicolas Den was appointed to receive proposals for a survey of the city and report thereon to the council within six weeks. At the meeting of December 14, 1850, a demand was made on the members of the late ayuntamiento for all papers and documents belonging to the old pueblo of Santa Barbara and an accounting for all funds in their hands on April 9, 1850, the date of the city's incorporation.

At the meeting of January 8, 1851, the committee appointed at a previous meeting to ascertain what had become of the papers, documents and moneys in the hands of the officers of the late ayuntamiento reported that the moneys were in the hands of the late prefect, Joaquin Carrillo. From subsequent minutes it seems they remained there. What became of the papers and documents of the ayuntamiento the records of the council do not show.

A contract was made by the council, January 29, 1851, with Salisbury Haley, "To make a complete survey of all that part of the city bounded on the southeast by the shore of the sea; on the northwest by a straight line running parallel to the general direction of said shore boundary directly through the southwest corner of the Mission Garden and from hill to hill on either side; on the southwest by a line running along the foot of the mesa; and on the northeast by a line beginning at the Salinitas and following the city boundary to the foot of the hills, then to the said northwest line; to divide said tract into squares of 150 yards by streets which shall be sixty feet wide, except two streets to be designated by the council, which shall be eighty feet wide; to make an accurate map of said city." For making the survey and map, Haley was to receive $2,000, to be paid in installments of $500 each. April 5, 1851, Haley presented to the council a map of his survey of the city and a demand for the first installment of $500 on the contract.

October 23, 1852, Vitus Wrackenrueder was given a contract to survey the central part of the city and make a new map. His survey is now regarded as the official survey of the city. These surveys in some places ran streets through the houses and in others left the residences without street frontage. It was many years before all the streets were opened through the central or thickly inhabited portion of the city. Those whose land was taken for streets, were given equivalent tracts in the squares belonging to the city.

At the municipal election held in May, 1851, Joaquin Carrillo was elected mayor; he was also county judge. Raymundo Carrillo was chosen treasurer; Thomas Warner, marshal and assessor; Esteban Ortega, John Kays, Antonio Arellanas, José Lorenzano and R. W. Wallace, members of the council. Although the flag of the United States had been waving in California for four years and the constitution had arrived more recently to keep it company, yet the people of Santa Barbara had not become accustomed to the new order of things. At the meeting of the council, May 26, 1851, Samuel Barry, Esq., sent a communication to the council informing that body that he had been appointed United States revenue officer at the port of Santa Barbara. Whereupon the council by resolution agreed to grant him official recognition as an officer of the United States. Had the council considered him a persona non grata and refused him recognition, it is hard to say what the consequence might have been—to Santa Barbara.

The early ordinances of the common council give us glimpses of conditions existing then that have long since become obsolete. The Indian question, fifty years ago, was one that worried the municipal officers of Santa Barbara, as it did those of all other cities and towns of Southern California. The ex-neophyte of the missions was a pariah. He was despised and abused by the whites. His one ambition was to get drunk, and there were always high caste whites, or those who considered themselves such, ready and willing to gratify poor Lo's ambition. To imprison an Indian and give him regular rations was no punishment. He enjoyed such punishment. In Los Angeles, Indian convicts were auctioned off every Monday morning to the highest bidder for the term of their sentence. In Santa Barbara, an ordinance passed June 4, 1851, reads: "When Indians for violations of city ordinances are committed to prison, the recorder shall hire them out for the term of their imprisonment."

One of the most singular decisions ever announced by a court of justice was given in a case of liquor selling to Indians. A certain festal day in the early '50s had been celebrated with a great deal of hilarity and imbibing of wine and aguardiente. The noble red man had vied with his white brothers in celebrating and in getting drunk. This was an offense to the white man, and as there was a heavy fine for selling liquor to Indians, some of the whites instigated the arrest of certain liquor dealers. Among the accused was a scion of one of the most influential families. He was charged with having sold liquor to a Yaqui Indian. The evidence was very clear that the liquor had been sold by the defendant to the Yaqui, but to convict a member of that family, the justice very well knew, would be his political undoing for all time. So in the trial the ethnological question was sprung as to whether a Yaqui was an Indian or a white man. The race question was argued at great length by the attorneys on both sides, and the judge, after summing up the evidence, decided that the prominent cheek bones, yellow skin, straight black hair and dark eyes of the Yaqui were the effects of climate and not of heredity, and inside the Yaqui was a white man. The saloon-keeper was declared not guilty and discharged.

The city government was administered economically in the early '50s, and taxes were light. According to Ordinance No. 30, adopted June 29, 1852, the mayor, acting as recorder or police judge, received $2 for each conviction, which amount he was required to pay into the city treasury. It does not appear that he was allowed to draw anything out of the treasury for salary. The city clerk received $35 per month, the city marshal $20, the city treasurer three per cent on all moneys paid in; the city tax collector six per cent on all collections and the city attorney $10 per month.

The lighting of the city was accomplished in a very economical manner. An ordinance passed in 1852 required "every head of a family in that part of the city bounded north by Santa Barbara street, east by Ortega, south by Chapula and west by Figueroa, to cause a lantern containing a lighted lamp or candle to be suspended every dark or cloudy evening in front of his house from dark to ten o'clock; neglecting to do so he will be fined not less than 50 cents or more than $1 for each offense."

Fifty years ago Santa Barbara was, to use an expressive slang phrase of to-day, a "wide open town." Saloon keeping was the most popular industry. Of fifty licenses granted between August, 1850, and February, 1851, thirty-two were for permission to retail liquors. Sunday was a gala day, and dissipation reached high tide then.

Before the conquest, the Californians were moderate drinkers. Although using wine freely, they seldom drank to excess. When they wished to indulge in a social glass, and some one stood treat for the crowd, they all drank not standing, but sitting on their horses. A squad of three or four, or half a dozen may be, would ride up to a pulperia and, without dismounting, one of the party would order the drinks. The mercader de vino (wine merchant) would bring out a cup or glass filled with wine or aguardiente; each one would take a sip and pass it to his neighbor. One cup served all the party; it was a sort of loving cup. It is said that once, when a crowd of American miners bestowed their patronage for the first time upon a native vinatero, and each called for a separate glass, the wineseller, who had but one glass in his shop, had to send out and borrow enough glasses from his neighbors to supply the demand. When each one of his patrons poured out a full glass of fiery aguardiente and gulped it down, the astonished saloonkeeper crossed himself and implored the saints to protect him from the American diablos.

In 1855, a spasm of virtue seems to have seized the city council. It passed a Sunday closing ordinance: "All stores, shops, taverns and groceries shall close from 12 o'clock Saturday night to 12 o'clock p. m. the following Sunday, except butcher, baker and apothecary shops," so read the ordinance. For a violation of this municipal law the penalty was a fine of not less than $10 or more than $50.

The early councils did business very carelessly. The office of councilman was not a lucrative one. The members took their pay in honors, and honors were not always easy. The office sought the man, but the man dodged it when he could. Resignations were frequent, and as vacancies were not promptly filled, the membership of the council was not often full. The council elected in May, 1853, held no meeting between May 5 and August 27 for want of a quorum. When a quorum was obtained, the disgusted clerk offered his resignation, and it was found that the mayor and two councilmen-elect had failed to qualify. An election was ordered to fill vacancies. Whether they were filled or what that council did afterwards does not appear. When a new council was elected in May, 1854, the minutes of the old council had not been engrossed. The new council ordered them written up, and blank pages were left in the record book for their entry, but the pages are still blank.

The members of the new council instituted an investigation to find out whether the old council could grant its members city lands at lower rates than the appraised value; and also to ascertain whether the land laws of the old ayuntamiento were still in force. What they found out is not written in the record.

CITY LANDS.

Shortly after the organization of the United States land commission in California, Santa Barbara presented her claim for eight and three-fourths leagues of pueblo lands. In May, 1854, the council allowed a bill of $700 for prosecuting the city's claim. December 23, 1854, a public meeting was called to consider the advisability of prosecuting the city's claim to its pueblo lands in the United States courts. The land commission had rejected the city's claim to eight and three-fourths leagues. March 10, 1855, Hinchman & Hoar were given a fee of $500 "for prosecuting the city's claims to her lands before the United States District Court." After a long drawn out contest in the courts, the city's claim was finally allowed in 1861 for four leagues, or 17,826 ¹⁷/₁₀₀ acres, extending from the Rancho Goleta to the Arroyo de La Carpinteria. It was surveyed by G. H. Thompson, May, 1867, and a patent signed by President U. S. Grant, May 25, 1872.

Under the Spanish and Mexican regimes, there was no survey made of the pueblo lands and no map or plat of the town. The ayuntamiento granted house lots on the application of any one desiring to build. The only survey made was to measure so many varas from some previous grant. Streets in those days were not made, but, like Topsy, they "just grewed," and in growing many of them became twisted. It took years after the Haley survey was made to untwist some, or rather to adjust the houses to the new street lines. The street names given were mostly in Spanish. The mixed population of the early '50s so bungled the spelling of these that in 1854 the council appointed a committee "to correct the orthography of certain streets."

In the nomenclature of its streets, Santa Barbara has remembered many of the famous men of the Spanish and Mexican eras of California. Not only have famous men been remembered, but local historical incidents, too, have been commemorated. The historic event that gave Cañon Perdido street its name, gave names also to two other streets and a design for a city seal. Briefly told, the story runs about as follows: In the winter of 1847-48, the American brig Elisabeth was wrecked near Santa Barbara. Among the articles saved was a six-pounder brass cannon. It was brought ashore and lay on the beach for some time. One dark night in April, 1848, a little squad of Californians stole down to the beach, hauled it away and buried it in the sands on the banks of the Estero. What their object was in taking the gun no one knows, probably they did not know themselves. Several days passed before the gun was missed. Capt. Lippett of Company F, Stevenson's Regiment of New York Volunteers, was in command of the post. He was a nervous, excitable man. In the theft of the cannon, he thought he had discovered preparations for an uprising of the natives. He dispatched a courier post haste to Col. Mason, the military governor of the territory at Monterey, with a highly colored account of his discovery. Mason, placing reliance in Lippett's story and desiring to give the Californians a lesson that would teach them to let guns and revolutions alone, levied a military contribution of $500 on the town, to be paid by a capitation tax of $2 on every male over 20 years, the balance to be assessed on the real and personal property of the citizens, the money when collected to be turned over to the post quartermaster. The promulgation of the order in Santa Barbara raised a storm of indignation, and among those whose wail was the loudest were the American-born residents of the town, who had become Mexican citizens by naturalization. Col. Stevenson, commander of the southern military district, who had been ordered to collect the pueblo's ransom by tact, by the soothing strains of a brass band and the influence of Pablo de la Guerra, all exerted on the nation's birthday, July 4, succeeded in collecting the money without any more dangerous outbreak than a few muttered curses on the hated gringos.

After peace was declared, Governor Mason ordered the money turned over to the prefect of the pueblo to be used in building a jail. When the city survey was made in 1850, three street names commemorated the incident, Cañon Perdido (Lost Cannon) street, Quinientos (Five Hundred) street, and Mason street. When the council, in 1850, chose a design for a city seal they selected the device of a cannon statant, encircled by the words "Vale Quinientos Pesos—Worth Five Hundred Dollars." The members of the city council made repeated demands on the ex-prefect for the five hundred dollars, but he refused to turn it into the city treasury, claiming that it was entrusted to him for a specific purpose, and until a jail was built no money would the city get. The city built a jail, but the ex-prefect still held on to the money. The council began legal proceedings to recover the money, but as the judge of the district and the ex-prefect were very closely related the case was transferred to San Francisco. In some unaccountable way the papers in the case were lost, and as no new suit was begun the city never recovered the money. The council chose a new design for its seal, and all the city has left for its $500 is some street names.

One stormy night in 1858 the Estero cut a new channel through its banks. Some citizen next morning, viewing the effects of the flood, saw the muzzle of a cannon protruding from the cut in the bank. Unearthing the gun, it proved to be the lost cannon. It was hauled up State street to Cañon Perdido, where, mounted on an improvised carriage, it frowned on the passers by. Ten years had wrought great changes in the town and the people. The cannon episode was ancient history. Nobody cared to preserve the old gun as an historic relic, and as finders in this case were keepers, they sold it to a city merchant for $80, and he disposed of it in San Francisco at a handsome profit to a junk dealer for old brass.

Santa Barbara in early days had her squatter troubles, in common with other parts of the state, covered by Spanish grants. The most noted of these was what is known as the Arroyo Burro affair. I give the following account of it taken mainly from Mason's History of Santa Barbara: John Vidal, an ex-member of Stevenson's Regiment of New York Volunteers, had for some time rented a piece of land from Dr. Den. When the lease expired, he laid claim to the land under the United States pre-emption laws. The court adjudged the land to Dr. Den, and Sheriff Twist was ordered to evict Vidal. A number of gamblers, among whom was the notorious Jack Powers, rallied to the assistance of Vidal.

Vidal and his friends were reported to be fortified at his ranch house. Sheriff Twist summoned a posse comitatus of two hundred men, and secured a small cannon that stood on the Plaza to batter down the fortifications. The Twist party assembled at the Egirrea House, then used for a court house. Vidal and his companions came riding up as if to begin the fight. Some say their intentions were to effect a compromise. As Vidal rode up two of his men, "Little Mickey" and a Spaniard, lassoed the cannon and tried to drag it away. Twist fired upon them, and the firing became general. Vidal was shot and fell from his horse. The Spaniard of the cannon episode stabbed Twist with a knife. A running fight ensued, but without any further casualties. Vidal lingered fourteen days before death relieved him of his sufferings. Pablo de la Guerra went out to the fort next day and induced the Powers gang to submit to the legal authorities. The disputed tract was afterwards declared by the courts to be government land.

THE PIONEER NEWSPAPER.

The pioneer newspaper of Santa Barbara was the Santa Barbara Gazette. The first number was issued Thursday, May 24, 1855. It was a four-page, five-column weekly, size of page 12x18 inches. One page was printed in Spanish. W. B. Keep & Co. were the proprietors. The names of the members of the company were R. Hubbard, T. Dunlap, Jr., and W. B. Keep. Later on the firm was Hubbard & Keep. In their salutatory the publishers say: "After taking into consideration the fact that there are now in California more newspapers than in any three states in the Union, the doubt of future success of one more might naturally arise in the minds of some wisecracks of our county. A field is undoubtedly open for enterprise and energy in this portion of the state. The counties of Los Angeles and San Diego have, for some time, supported papers, and without boasting we believe that the county of Santa Barbara possesses many advantages over these."

The Gazette was vigorously edited. It made strenuous efforts to arouse the officials and the citizens of the sleepy old city to make improvements, but it was labor in vain. If it did not arouse them to put forth efforts, it did excite their wrath. In the issue of October 4, 1855, the editor draws this picture of existing conditions within the city: "There are deep, uncovered wells, pit-falls and man-traps in various parts of the city, rendering it extremely hazardous to traverse the streets at night, not only for horses and teams but foot passengers as well. There are unsightly gorges and gullies through which the water flows into the street in winter. The slaughter houses reek with filth, and the horrid stench from them pollutes the atmosphere." In another issue the editor appeals to the citizens "to tear themselves away from the blandishments of keno, billiards and cards long enough to examine the route for a post road" over which the mail could be carried through the coast countries to and from San Francisco.

The Gazette in its issue of May 1, 1856, thus inveighs against the want of public spirit in the city officials and citizens: "It does not sound well to hear it said that since the incorporation of this city, more than six years ago, not a single improvement of general utility has been made, if the survey and maps be excepted. Not a street has been graded at the public expense, nor an artesian well nor a public edifice of any kind even projected, nor a wharf at the landing attempted or planned or even its cost estimated." These plain statements of facts were not relished by the old fogies of the town, and they resolved to crush the paper. Its principal revenue had been derived from the public printing. A bill was passed by the Legislature (at the instigation, it is said, of a scion of one of the ruling families whom the Gazette had castigated) authorizing county officials to publish legal notices by posting them on bulletin boards. The public patronage was not sufficient to support a newspaper. The plant was sold in 1858 to two Spaniards, who removed it to San Francisco, where the paper was printed in Spanish as the Gaceta de Santa Barbara. It lingered out an existence of several years, being edited and printed in San Francisco and published in Santa Barbara. Then it died.

Through the first decade of its existence as an American city, Santa Barbara grew in a leisurely way. It was in no haste to become a great city. Old customs prevailed. The Spanish language was the prevailing form of speech. Trade and travel came and went by sea as in the old hide drogher days. Twice a month a steamship landed the little budget of mail, sometimes water-soaked in passing through the surf from ship to shore. Passengers were carried ashore from the surf boats on the backs of sailors, for there was no wharf. If there was no tip offered the sailor there might be a dip proffered the passenger. The sailor was already soaked; if he toppled over with his burden when a breaker struck him a little more salt water did not disturb him. It was different with his burden. Those acquainted with the bucking propensities of the sailors always tipped before they left the boat.

The feudal lords of the old régime still ruled. They had cattle on a thousand hills and an army of retainers. The retainers had votes and the cattle kings controlled their dependents' ballots. The second decade—the decade between 1860 and 1870—saw the beginning of the end of old time manners and customs. The story of the dethronement of the cattle kings more properly belongs to the history of the county at large than to that of the city.

THE NEW ERA.

The terrible dry years of 1863 and 1864, which destroyed cattle raising, the dominant industry of the county, disastrously affected the city. Destitution prevailed and everybody was discouraged. There was no advance, no building, no progress during the early '60s. It was not until immigration began to drift southward about 1867 that the city shook off its lethargy and aroused itself to action. The Santa Barbara wharf was constructed in the summer of 1868. This greatly facilitated commerce. Previous to this vessels anchored a mile or two from shore, and all freight to and from the ship was taken on surf boats. In early times the only road between Santa Barbara and San Buenaventura was along the beach around Punta Gorda and Rincon Point. In high tide it was often impossible, and it was rendered dangerous on account of masses of earth falling from the cliffs. A new road was constructed that avoided the dangers of Rincon Pass, and a stage line up the coast gave increased mail facilities and regular communication by land between Los Angeles and San Francisco without waiting for low tide. Increased steamship communication with San Francisco brought tourists and visitors, and the city began to fix up to receive its guests. June 2, 1870, a franchise was granted to Thomas R. Bard, S. B. Bunkerhoff, Charles Fernald and Jarrett T. Richards to lay gas pipes in the streets and light the city with gas. Several large hotels were erected, among them the famous Arlington. Property values advanced. Blocks that in 1870 sold for $100 in 1874 changed hands at $5,000.

The Santa Barbara College was founded in 1869 by a joint stock company, of which Elwood Cooper was a leading member. The college building was erected in 1871. The college suspended in 1878 for want of support. The rooms on the lower floor of the building, now the San Marcos, are occupied by the high school classes; the upper floors are used as an apartment house.

The cornerstone of the new court house was laid October 5, 1872. The building was completed in 1873 at a cost of $60,000.

The First National Bank of Santa Barbara was organized in 1873. In 1876 its building was completed and occupied. The Santa Barbara National Bank was organized July, 1875, as the Santa Barbara County Bank.

The Natural History Society was organized December, 1876, with a list of twenty-one members. For the first two years of its existence the society met in the Santa Barbara College building. It had but a small collection. In 1883 about 1,200 volumes of government publications that had been in charge of the Santa Barbara College were transferred to it. Funds were donated for furniture and bookcases. Its collections have had several lodging places, and are now kept in rooms on the ground floor of the San Marcos.

THE PUBLIC LIBRARY.

The first movement looking towards the founding of a public library for Santa Barbara originated with the Odd Fellows. That organization along in the later '70s had a considerable collection of books which were loaned out to readers. The time and trouble involved in loaning the books and looking after them was too great to be done gratuitously, and the association after a time discontinued loaning, and the books were stored away.

Under the state law of 1880 for establishing free libraries, the city council, February 16, 1882, adopted a resolution to establish a free library and reading room. At the next city election T. B. Dibblee, Jas. M. Short, O. N. Dimmick, W. E. Noble and S. B. P. Knox were elected library trustees. The Odd Fellows donated all the books in their collection, numbering 2,921 volumes. The first librarian appointed was Mrs. Mary Page. The city has erected a neat and commodious library building, so planned that it can be enlarged without change of design or inconvenience to the patrons of the library. The library now has about 14,000 volumes. Mrs. M. C. Reed is the present librarian, and Miss D. Chambers, assistant.

The decade between 1870 and 1880 marked the transformation of Santa Barbara from an adobe town to one built of brick and wood. The increase of population was not great. After the decadence of the cattle industry many of the natives left the country. The population of Santa Barbara in 1860 was 2,351; in 1870, 2,970, an increase of 26 per cent; in 1880, 3,469, an increase of 17 per cent. The decade between 1880 and 1890 witnessed its most rapid growth. Its population in 1880 as previously stated was 3,469; in 1890, 5,864, an increase of nearly 70 per cent. In the early '80s began a concerted movement among the counties of Southern California to advertise their resources in the Eastern states. "California on Wheels" was sent on its mission east. Railroad building, and particularly railroad projecting by real estate agents, was active. It is remarkable how easily railroads were built then—on paper. A beautifully illustrated pamphlet advertising the Santa Ynez valley issued at this time, states that among the many railroads building or soon to be built is the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe line from Santa Monica via San Buenaventura to the headwaters of the Santa Ynez river, making "the shortest, coolest and most superb scenic route from Los Angeles via the Salinas valley to San Francisco."

August 17, 1887, the first passenger train from Los Angeles arrived in Santa Barbara. The same afternoon came one from San Francisco via Saugus. The city turned out en masse to celebrate the event. There was a banquet in the evening and a grand ball. The boom in real estate was on in earnest and prices expanded, but the railroad before the end of August stopped building, and the real estate bubble collapsed. While the boom lasted, some large sales were made. The recorded transfers for seven months aggregated over $5,000,000. As many of the contracts were not recorded, the sales really reached about $7,000,000. A number of substantial improvements were completed. State street was paved with bituminous rock for two miles at a cost of $180,000. Other streets were graded and miles of sidewalk laid.

The first through trains on the Southern Pacific coast line from San Francisco and Los Angeles passed through Santa Barbara March 31, 1901. Among the recent improvements at Santa Barbara is the completion of St. Anthony's College, a Franciscan college for the preparation of young men who wish to enter priesthood. It is located on rising ground near the old mission. The corner stone was laid June 13, 1899. It was formally dedicated April 25, 1901. It is a stone building, three stories high, and cost about $50,000. The school for a number of years had been conducted in a wing of the old mission. The president is Rev. Peter Wallischek, O. F. M. February 27, 1896, a horrible tragedy occurred in the monastery of Santa Barbara. An insane domestic, employed in the building, shot and killed the Guardian Father Ferdinand Bergmeyer.

The new high school of Santa Barbara will cost, when completed, about $60,000.

CHAPTER XXX.

VENTURA COUNTY.

BEFORE THE COUNTY WAS CREATED.

THE history of the territory now included in Ventura county up to the time of its segregation from Santa Barbara properly belongs in the sketch of that county. As but little space could be given it there, I give a brief review of some of the principal events occurring during the Mexican and early American periods. The mission buildings of San Buenaventura formed a nucleus from which the settlement of the district radiated. The country contiguous, after the secularization of the missions, was held in large ranchos by owners living in Santa Barbara or Los Angeles, and the district suffered from absenteeism.

At the time of the American conquest and for years afterwards the district was sparsely populated. In early days San Buenaventura was one of the stations or stopping places on the so-called Camino real (royal highway), that led from mission to mission up and down the coast.

It was an easy day's ride from San Fernando or from Los Angeles, as rides were made in those days. Although surrounded by a magnificent cattle country, there was but little shipping from its port in the hide droghing days. Dana, Robinson and others who were on the coast at that time make but meager mention of it. The cattle of its extensive ranchos transported their own hides and tallow to market, that is, they were driven to some point near Santa Barbara or San Pedro for slaughter.

The old mission figured in the Civil war of 1838, when Juan Bautista Alvarado and Don Carlos Carrillo were hostile rivals for the governorship of the territory. The battle of San Buenaventura was the Waterloo of Carrillo. It was not much of a battle, as battles were fought in the American Civil war from 1861 to 1865, but it was the most sanguinary conflict in the struggle between Northern and Southern California over which, Los Angeles or Monterey, should be the capital, and who, Alvarado or Carrillo, should be governor.

Casteñada, in command of Carrillo's army of the south, had fallen back from Santa Barbara on the approach of Castro with the army of the north and taken position in the mission church of San Buenaventura. Castro pursuing, with three pieces of artillery, reached San Buenaventura in the night and planted his cannon on the heights overlooking the mission. In the morning he summoned Casteñada to surrender. The summons was indignantly rejected, and the battle was on. For three days there was a rattle of musketry and a roar of artillery. Each supposed he was annihilating the forces of the other. On the third night the southern soldiers, weary of slaughter, attempted to steal out under the cover of darkness and make their way to their desolate homes. They did the stealing part admirably, but when they had crawled out they were promptly halted by the enemy lying in ambush; and as promptly surrendered. After the battle came the painful duty of burying the dead and caring for the wounded. There was but one dead and one wounded—a dead southerner and a wounded northerner, or possibly the reverse (authorities differ). The mission building had received several severe wounds. Castro's marksmen could hit a mission, but not a man. It is said that there are several of Castro's cannon balls still embedded in the adobe walls of the old mission. The battle of San Buenaventura was the Gettysburg of the Civil war between the arribanas (uppers) and the abajanos (lowers).

At the time of the American conquest there was not so far as known an American settler in San Buenaventura. Col. Stevenson, when he was commander of the military district of the South, in 1847-48, sent Isaac Callahan and W. O. Streeter to take charge of the mission property, which had been abandoned by the superintendent. After the organization of Santa Barbara county the San Buenaventura district constituted a township of that county. November, 1852, an election was called to elect three school commissioners for the township of San Buenaventura, but whether any were elected the records do not show. The boundaries, as defined in 1855, are as follows: "First township to extend from the division line of Los Angeles county to the Arroyo known as Arroyo del Rincon. The elections shall be held at the Mission San Buenaventura." The boundaries of the school district were the same as those of the township. The school trustees elected in November, 1855, were José A. Pacifico and Sanchez Rey Olivias.

In December, 1855, John Roselli was teaching a public school at the mission of San Buenaventura. The school was taught in the Spanish language. This was probably the first common school taught in the district and the pioneer school of Ventura county.

In 1857 A. Schiappa Pietra, then a resident of Santa Barbara, started the first store in San Buenaventura. At that time there were but two places in the whole district where travelers could be entertained. One was a tent on the Sespe rancho and the other a hotel kept in the east wing of the mission. In 1858, the American residents were A. M. Conway, Griffin Robbins, W. T. Nash, W. D. Hobson, McLaughlin and Park.

In 1859 the first attempt was made to form a county out of the eastern portion of Santa Barbara. A petition containing 130 names was sent to the legislature praying for the formation of the county of San Buenaventura.

The Los Angeles Star of January 29, 1859, commenting on the project, says: "We might, however, have remained silent, had not the interests of Los Angeles county been brought into the question. Our informant stated to us that we are to be deprived of Fort Tejon township; and that according to the petition it was to be incorporated into the new county, giving to us the Rancho of Conejo or some other place almost entirely valueless in exchange. It is an old maxim not only taught by the fireside, but spread upon every statute book, that he who takes from another without his consent is guilty of robbery. And he who assists in such an act is equally guilty with the leaders. Has Los Angeles county been consulted in this matter? We are certain it has not. Has Tejon district been asked if it would accede to it? We find no one who can answer. San Buenaventura then would like to control not only the 130 persons who are said to have signed the petition, but also the board of supervisors of Santa Barbara county and the like body of Los Angeles county. Don Antonio de la Guerra, chairman of the board of supervisors of Santa Barbara, immediately on hearing of the movement, ordered the clerk of the county to send the representatives of the county in the legislature and the senator of the second district a comparative statement of the number of votes the would-be new county could cast; the pro rata amount of debt they would have to assume; and requesting these representatives to show to the legislative body the folly of the undertaking." The Star assures its readers that our delegation in the legislature will see to it that no "snap judgment" is taken by these plotters for a new county.

It is rather strange that this county division project did not carry in that legislature. The legislature of 1859 was a secession body. It passed a bill dividing the state and creating the state of South California, subject to the approval of the people. At an election held in the fall of 1859 the proposition was voted upon by the counties of San Luis Obispo, Santa Barbara, Los Angeles, San Diego, San Bernardino and Buena Vista. A majority of the voters favored division, but the state was not divided. It was a pro-slavery scheme designed to give the slaveholders of the south more representation in congress. The election of Lincoln, in 1860, put an end to the plot. Nothing came of that county division scheme, either.

In 1860, there were but nine American voters in the precinct of San Buenaventura. The first survey of a town site was made in 1862, by Waterman, Vassault & Co., who owned the ex-mission lands. The first attempt to incorporate the town was made in 1863. Messrs. Simpson, Beebe, Stow, Escandon and others met at the hotel kept by V. A. Simpson and drew up a petition to the legislature asking for incorporation. The legislature, probably considering it too small a matter to waste time on, did nothing with the petition.

The Noachian deluge of 1861-62 made an inland sea of the Santa Clara valley, but did very little damage. The cattle and horses escaped to the foothills and the loss of stock was light. During the famine years of 1863 and 1864 there was a heavy loss of cattle. The dry years, however, did not bring about a subdivision of the ranchos as in Los Angeles. The ranchos were restocked gradually and the old industry, cattle-raising, continued for a time.

The flood of 1867-68 was more severe than that of 1861. "On Christmas day, 1867, the water rose until it was three feet deep in Main street (San Buenaventura). The lower portions of the town were submerged and the inhabitants had to be removed to a place of safety. The warm rain falling on and melting the recently deposited snows of the mountains filled the rivers to overflowing and caused the flood. The land from the Santa Clara hotel to the river was flooded. Forty-seven women were rescued from the flooded houses and carried on the backs of horses or on the shoulders of men to places of safety."

In 1868 the current of immigration, which for years had steadily flowed into Central and Northern California, turned southward. The subdivision of the great ranchos of the south had begun and cheap farm lands were thrown on the market. Successive years of abundant rainfall had obliterated the traces of the "famine years." Prices of all products were good and men of small means in Central California, who had made money by grain-raising on rented lands, began to look around for homes of their own. The completion of the first transcontinental railroad (the Union and Central Pacific) in May, 1869, brought many home-seekers to the coast and some of these drifted southward.

The coast stage line had been established in 1868 on a better basis, and, with increased service, running on regular time, attracted land travel. Heretofore travel up and down the coast had been almost entirely by steamer; and as the large passenger steamers did not stop at San Buenaventura, it had remained comparatively unknown. The stage passengers coming down from the mountains on their journey northward or, rising as it were out of the sea, on their southward trip, beheld stretched out before them the valley of the Santa Clara in all its loveliness and were delighted with the view and enthusiastic over the country's future prospects.

The following table of distances and stations gives the line of the old stage route between Los Angeles, San Buenaventura and Santa Barbara in 1868:

From Los Angeles to Cahuenga Pass
House	9¾ miles.
To New Station.....	5¾ "
To Mountain House (Larry's).....	15¾ "
To Simi Ranch.....	8¾ "
To Las Posas.....	12 "
To Santa Clara River.....	10 "
To San Buenaventura.....	8¾ "
To Rincon	12 "
To Santa Barbara.....	15 "
Total.....	98½ "

The stage, which carried the daily mail, left Los Angeles at 6 a. m. and arrived at 8 p. m. The through time from San Francisco to Los Angeles by stage was 66 hours. The following extract taken from Josephine Clifford's "Tropical California," a series of articles descriptive of the coast counties from San Luis Obispo southward, published in the Overland Monthly several years before Nordhoff's famous letters appeared, gives a pleasing description of the stage ride and of San Buenaventura as she saw it in 1870:

"The regrets I expressed on leaving Santa Barbara came from my heart; it is a lovely spot, and even when I went from it I could not but lean out of the window to catch departing glimpses of it as it faded more and more from sight. The stage road winds along by the sea; the sun was shining, golden, as it seems ever to shine on these serene, blue ripples of water, and there was something so quieting in the soft plashing of the waves against the shore that I laid my head back and, with open eyes, dreamed—dreamed till I fell asleep, and was waked up again by the sound of water rushing immediately under the coach. I looked out in bewilderment; it was true, the horses were drawing the coach through the foaming, flashing waves. The other passengers expressed no concern; so I, too, remained quiet, and soon found that this was the pleasantest way of traveling along the coast.

"Twenty-five miles below Santa Barbara lies San Buenaventura, another old mission, around which quite a flourishing place has sprung up. The flimsy, garish frame houses have crowded themselves in where the olive, the palm, and the fig-tree once grew in unbroken lines; but now only patches of ground, covered with giant pear trees and huge old olives, are visible back of the fast-growing town. Passing through in the broad, positive light of noonday, I could look on these things philosophically and with equanimity; but on my way back from Los Angeles some time later, in the chill hours of the waning night, the sight of the place made me feel sad, almost bitter. Night had not yet lifted her mantle from the earth as the stage rolled heavily toward San Buenaventura, and the roar of the ocean fell on my ear with hollow sound. Soon I distinguished the bell towers of the Mission Church, and the tinkling of the bells, just touched, had a feeble, complaining tone; now we turn into the one long street of San Buenaventura, and in the darkening halls, the clerk of the hotel shows me into a cheerless room, upstairs. I walk to the window—to the rising light—and there, in the yard below are those peerless, graceful palm trees I saw waving and bending in the dim distance. How pitiful to see these neglected daughters of the torrid zone lifting their royal shafts among the stove pipes and empty dry goods boxes of a country store back yard. I stretched out my hands lovingly, and they nodded their proud heads, and flung their arms to the morning breeze, pointing to where those clusters of dark olives stood. But it grows lighter, the stage is at the door, and bears us rapidly away. In the far east breaks the cold gray morning—"those Americans' are coming!"

And "those Americans" continued to come; the "garish frame houses" crowded out the adobe structures. The age of wood supplanted the age of unbaked clay, and in turn was crowded back from the business streets by brick and stone. The "clusters of dark olives" have been thinned by the woodman's ax and but two of the palms nod their proud heads in the morning breeze. And still "those Americans are coming," not by stage, but by steam.

Mrs. Clifford's description of a night ride over the mountains between San Buenaventura and Los Angeles illustrates some of the perils, and inconveniences of travel a third of a century ago: "We had been ascending the mountain for some time, when, during a breathing spell given the horses, the sharp, decided rattle that seems peculiar to just these stages, sounded back to us from somewhere above, as though it were the echo of our own wheels. The driver listened a moment, and then broke out with an abrupt oath, for which he didn't even apologize. 'D—that fellow! But I'll make him take the outside,' he muttered. 'What's the matter?' I asked apprehensively; 'anything wrong?' 'Oh no!' with a look over to my side of the road where the light of the lanterns fell on the trees that grew up out of the mountain side below us, and were trying to touch the wheels of our coach with their top branches—'nothing at all. Only he's got to take that side of the road and take his chances of going over. He'd no business coming on me here.'

"The rattling had come nearer all this time and now a light flashed up a little in front of us and directly a fiery, steaming monster seemed rushing down to destroy us. The air had grown chilly and the horses in the approaching stage seemed to have cantered down the mountain at quite a lively gait; for the white steam was issuing from their nostrils and rising in clouds from their bodies. The six gallant horses, reined up short and stamping nervously to be let loose for the onward run, were a noble sight; and the heavy coach with its two glowing eyes was grandly swaying in its springs. Our own horses were blowing little impatient puffs from distended nostrils, and our coach drawn safely up on the rocky hillside. Both drivers stopped to exchange the compliments of the day—or, rather, the night—our driver speaking in crusty tones, and, pointing down to where the road fell off steep and precipitous below him, warned the other driver 'not to run ahead of his time again.'

"There was nothing remarkable about the supper we took that night except the bats that kept coming in at the front door in a perfectly free-and-easy manner, swarming about our heads till they thought they knew us, and then settling in their favorite nooks and corners. Noticing my untiring endeavors to prevent them from inspecting my head and face too closely, the station keeper observed that people were 'most always afraid of them things when they first come,' but that they 'needn't fright of them; they wouldn't hurt nobody.' The rest of the night was passed inside the stage, though of sleep there was no thought, such jolting and jumping over rocks and boulders; I ache all over to think of it even now! Just before day-break we entered the City of the Angels." * * *

San Buenaventura became ambitious to be classed as a seaport. In January, 1871, a franchise was secured to build a wharf; work was begun upon it in March; and in February, 1872, it was so near completion that steamers were able to discharge their cargoes directly on it. The next advance was the establishing of a newspaper. April 22, 1871, appeared the first number of the Ventura Signal. The editor and proprietor, J. H. Bradley, was a wide-awake, progressive newspaper man. He directed his efforts towards building up the prospective county. He was an earnest and intelligent advocate of county division and labored to organize and unify public sentiment in favor of that measure.

ORGANIZATION OF THE NEW COUNTY.

After the failure of the attempt to divide Santa Barbara county in 1859, the scheme fell into a state of "innocuous desuetude." It was not given up; only held in abeyance. The people were biding their time. There were abundant reasons why the people of the eastern portion of Santa Barbara should have a county of their own when they could afford the expense. It was a long distance to the county seat, and the journey had to be made over roads that were next to impassable in the winter time. The western and more populous part of the county monopolized the offices; and the most harrowing grievance that the average American office-seeker can suffer is to have his claims to political preferment ignored by his party. Then, too, Santa Barbara city, which really dominated the politics of the county, had a large purchasable element among its voters, which, under the leadership and controlled by crafty politicians, decided the political destiny of aspirants for office on a coin basis. The advocates of a new county pointed to the many and grievous wrongs against the right of suffrage committed by the political bosses of Santa Barbara and urged a separation from their contaminating influence. Examples were many.

It is said that at one time when political feeling ran high a whole tribe of Indians were voted. At another closely contested election the passenger list of a Panama steamer was copied and a precinct of 20 voters rolled up 160 votes. The "hole in the wall" election fraud of 1852 was one of the many scandals that shook confidence in the verdict of the ballot box. At that election the voter passed his ballot through a hole in the wall. The election officers, who were all of one political faith, disposed of the ballots as seemed good to them. The electors of the other side had the privilege of voting early and often. If their votes were not counted at least they had the satisfaction of casting a goodly number. The registry law of 1866 checked some of the more flagrant abuses, but bribery, coercion and the open buying of votes went on for several years afterwards.

Immigration had brought into the eastern end of Santa Barbara county a population almost entirely American, and the desire to cut loose from the western end with its peculiar election methods increased as population increased. In 1869, ten years after the failure of the first, a second effort to form a new county was made. Hon. A. G. Escandon was elected to the assembly largely on a county division issue, but Santa Barbara bitterly opposed the scheme when it came before the legislature and the bill for the creation of a new county failed to pass.

In the legislature of 1871-72, the measure again came to the front. Hon. W. D. Hobson, who represented the county divisionists in the legislature, was successful in carrying the measure. The bill creating the county of Ventura was approved March 22, 1872. The boundaries of the county are as follows: "Commencing on the coast of the Pacific ocean at the mouth of Rincon creek; thence following up the center of said creek to its source; thence due north to the boundary line of Santa Barbara county; thence in an easterly direction along the boundary line of Santa Barbara county to the northeast corner of the same; thence southerly along the line between the said Santa Barbara county and Los Angeles county to the Pacific ocean and three miles therein; thence in a northwesterly direction to a point due south and three miles distant from the mouth of Rincon creek; thence north to the point of beginning; and including the islands of Anacapa and San Nicolas."

The bill provided for the appointment of five commissioners to effect a county organization. Early in January the governor appointed Thomas R. Bard, S. Bristol, W. D. F. Richards, A. G. Escandon and C. W. Thacker.

A special election was called for February 25, 1873, to elect county and township officers. The total vote cast was 608 and the following were declared elected:

J. Marion Brooks, District Attorney.
 F. Mollada, County Clerk.
 Frank Peterson, Sheriff.
 John Z. Barnett, County Assessor.
 E. A. Edwards, County Treasurer.
 C. J. De Merritte, County Surveyor.
 F. S. S. Buckman, County Superintendent of Schools.
 Dr. C. L. Bard, Coroner.

The supervisors were James Daly of the first district, a hold-over from Santa Barbara; J. A. Conaway of the second, and C. W. Thacker of the third district. All the officers except the coroner were Democrats. The coroner had no opposition or he, too, would have been overwhelmed by the Democratic tidal wave. Pablo de la Guerra was the district judge of the second district—San Luis Obispo, Santa Barbara and Ventura. Milton Wasson was county judge. Frank Molleda, county clerk, died a few weeks after his election and S. M. W. Easley was appointed to fill the vacancy. The officers having all qualified and filed their bonds, the county of Ventura opened for business March 14, 1873.

The offices of the county officials except that of the treasurer were located in a rented building on the corner of Main and Palm streets in what was known as Spear's Hall. San Buenaventura owned a jail and this was used jointly by the town and county until the county jail was built. A plat for a court house square in the old mission orchard was deeded to the county by Bishop Amat; and in 1873 bonds were issued to the amount of $6,000 by the county; the town donating $4,000 for the purpose of building a court house and jail. The project of building a court house in San Buenaventura aroused the opposition of other towns ambitious to be the county seat (particularly Saticoy and Hueneme), and a court house war was on with all its bitterness. The court house nevertheless was built among the century-old olives in the mission garden; and, although the mutterings of the discontented towns were heard for years afterwards, it availed them nothing. It is not probable that any one of the aspirants of early days will ever become the seat of county government. The main building of the court house was completed in 1874; a wing was added in 1878, and in 1884 four rooms were added to the west end.

During the years of 1872 and 1873 business was active in San Buenaventura and throughout the county. New buildings were going up, property changing hands, and the old town after its sleep of a century awoke from its lotus dream of ease to find itself metamorphosed from a sleepy, half-Indian, half-Mexican hamlet to a bustling, wide-awake, progressive American town.

CHAPTER XXXI.

VENTURA COUNTY—Continued.

ANNALS OF VENTURA TOWN AND COUNTY.

EARLY in 1872 San Buenaventura district issued school bonds to the amount of $10,000 to build a new school house. The bonds were sold and the corner-stone of the building laid September 16, 1872. The number of school census children in the county in 1872 was 809, of which 323 were in the town of Ventura.

The first murder in the new county was committed March 3, 1873. In a dispute over land boundaries George Hargen shot and killed George Martin, on the Colonia rancho. Hargen, after the murder, attempted to escape by flight. He was followed by some of his neighbors, overtaken, arrested and taken back to the scene of the murder. He was confined in a small house and closely guarded. An inquest was held on the body of Martin and the verdict was that he had been murdered by Hargen without provocation. Martin was a peaceable man and a good citizen, Hargen a quarrelsome and dangerous fellow. After the inquest, Hargen was taken to a lone tree on the ranch and hanged. He showed no penitence for his deed, but expressed himself glad that he had killed Martin. No effort was ever made to arrest the vigilantes.

It was generally conceded that Hargen had received his just deserts.

The year of 1874 was one of abundant rainfall; crops were good, prices of grain and stock high, immigrants were coming and the city and county were riding on the wave of prosperity. The first boom was on. The town had grown rapidly. Its population was about 1,000.

The Ventura Library Association was incorporated November 23, 1874. The incorporators were Milton Wasson, James Daly, C. G. Finney, L. F. Eastin, G. S. Gilbert, Jr.; C. H. Baily, J. J. Sheridan, T. B. Steplton and L. C. Granges. All members paid $5 a year to the support of the library; those not members were allowed the privilege of drawing books on the payment of twenty-five cents per month. A room was secured, and with the proceeds of a fair and festival was fitted up with shelves and furniture. Six hundred volumes were bought and the library opened. It was kept open until 1878, when, becoming involved in debt, it was closed. The library trustees, Messrs. James Daly, M. H. Gay, C. H. Baily, L. F. Eastin and J. J. Sheridan, made a proposition to the board of town trustees to transfer the assets of the association to the town, provided the town trustees would pay the library indebtedness and agree to levy a tax for the support of the library in accordance with the state law providing for a library fund in incorporated cities and towns. The town board accepted the proposition and took charge of the library August 21, 1878. J. F. Newby was appointed librarian and held the office until February, 1888. The town owns its own library building, which is a part of the city hall. New books are added as means will allow. The library is in charge of Miss Florence Vandever, who is a very efficient and competent librarian.

In 1875 the town and the county had grown populous enough to support another newspaper. J. H. Bradley had done good work with the Signal, the pioneer newspaper founded in 1871. He made it a model country newspaper. His health failed and in 1873 he disposed of his interest in it to E. Shepherd and J. J. Sheridan. They kept up the early reputation of the paper. The first number of the Daily Ventura Free Press was issued November 14, 1875. It was published by O. P. Hoddy. The subscription price of the daily was $8; weekly, $3. In his salutatory, the editor says: "In conducting the Free Press we shall endeavor to the best of our ability to be a champion and friend of the people." The daily was a four-page, eight-column blanket sheet. The editor was often driven to desperation to fill his local columns with news items. The town was small, the people were intent on their own business and it was the same wearying round of sameness day after day. At the end of an uneventful week the editor utters this wail: "If ever in the publication of a local paper we were driven to desperation in search of items we are this week. Not even a dog fight has occurred to relieve the monotony. We have felt almost justified in placing a man on the watch for wild geese or sending a reporter to the clam beds."

February 19, 1876, H. G. McLean became proprietor of the daily and weekly Free Press. With the advent of a rival paper a newspaper war broke out. There was no scarcity of items after that. There was perhaps no more news, but there was more noise. People never quarrel silently. Expletives, hot with wrath or icy with irony, were hurled back and forth from sanctum to sanctum. During the famous More murder trial the rival papers assailed each other viciously, the Signal scathingly condemning the murder and the Free Press excusing it.

The Monumentals, a fire company, was organized in 1875; B. F. Williams, president; L. F. Eastin, secretary, and R. G. Surdam, foreman.

The Gas Company was organized the same year; J. M. Miller, president; L. F. Eastin, secretary.

February 25, 1876, the steamer "Kalorama," 491 tons' burden, belonging to the Coast Steamship Company, was lost. While lying at Wolfson's wharf, on account of the rough sea, she chafed against the wharf and was ordered to move out to the floating buoy. On the way thither her screw fouled with the mooring rope and left the vessel at the mercy of the wind, which drove her ashore. As she lay on the beach her heavy machinery broke loose in her hull. The loose machinery and the beating of the waves broke her to pieces. The loss was estimated at $77,500.

In 1877 occurred the murder of T. Wallace More. The excitement, prejudices and political issues even, that arose out of the varying circumstances connected with the trial of the conspirators made this one of the most celebrated cases in the criminal annals of California. Thomas Wallace More, by purchase from the old Californian families, had acquired large land holdings in the Santa Clara valley. He and his three brothers at one time owned a tract thirty-two miles long, bordering on the Santa Clara river. Among his purchases was the Sespe rancho, originally granted to Don Carlos Carrillo in 1829. More bought this grant in 1874, paying in full for six leagues the amount of land the grant was supposed to contain. The United States Land Commission had confirmed the grant in 1853 for this amount. The United States, as adverse claimant, appealed the case to the United States district court. When the plat was brought into court it was found that the number of leagues had been changed from two to six at some time during the existence of the grant. More, to prevent the whole grant from being rejected, consented to take two leagues; the remaining four leagues being government land, was open to settlement and about forty squatters located on it. Frequent disputes arose between More and the squatters. The ill feeling between them was intensified by More attempting to buy the four leagues from the government under an act passed subsequent to the rejection.

On the night of the 23d of March, 1877, More was sleeping at the ranch house on his grant. About midnight the barn was discovered on fire and he and his hired man rushed out to save the contents of the building. More was shot down as he came into the light by some masked men, and while lying on the ground begging for his life was riddled with bullets. Suspicion fell upon the squatters. To avert it they held a meeting and some of the murderers were loudest in their condemnation of it, and passed resolutions denouncing it and offering their assistance in ferreting out the murderers.

Austin Brom, one of the Sespe settlers, having quarreled with Curlee, one of the conspirators, revealed to the administrator of the More estate the names of those who had conspired to kill More. As a result of these revelations and some other evidence obtained by the authorities, F. A. Sprague, J. S. Churchhill, J. F. Curlee, Jesse M. Jones, Ivory D. Lord, Charles McCart, H. Cook and J. A. Swanson were arrested. N. H. Hickerson, chairman of the meeting at which the resolutions were passed, being on his death bed, also made some revelations. After the arrest Jesse M. Jones turned state's evidence. On trial Sprague and Curlee were found guilty. Sprague was sentenced to be hanged and Curlee to imprisonment for life. On the trial of Lord the jury disagreed. When the trial of the next conspirator was begun, Jones, a weak and unscrupulous fellow, having evidently been induced to do so by purchase or persuasion, retracted his former evidence and admitted that he had perjured himself. As it was impossible to convict without his testimony, the others were discharged. Sprague's sentence was commuted to imprisonment for life. Stoneman, when governor, pardoned him. Curlee obtained a new trial, and the jury disagreeing, his case was finally dismissed. Jones' financial circumstances were greatly improved by his connection with the plot.

The year 1877 was one of disasters to Ventura both by sea and land. Two vessels were wrecked in the bay that year. The brig Crimea, 223 tons' burden, loaded with lumber, while made fast to the wharf, parted her cable and was driven ashore by the heavy northwesterly gale prevailing at the time. The loss was estimated at $9,200.

December 1, 1877, the brig Lucy Ann, 200 tons' burden, parted her mooring during a violent northwester and was broken to pieces. One life was lost. The vessel was valued at $6,500.

The year 1877 was one of the dreaded dry years. After the almost total destruction of cattle-raising in the "famine years" of 1863 and 1864 the sheep industry came to the front in Southern California. The high price of wool in the years immediately following the close of the Civil war, the rapidity with which sheep multiplied and the small cost of their maintenance made the business of wool-growing very profitable. As the agricultural lands of the valleys were utilized for grain-growing the ranges were curtailed and the sheep were crowded back on the mesas and foothills. When drought came the feed on these was soon exhausted and sheep were dying by thousands. On the island of Santa Cruz alone 25,000 starved to death. On the main land whole droves perished. Some of the owners drove their sheep to Arizona and Southern Utah and thus saved a remnant of their flocks. Others depending on a late rainfall delayed their departure until too late, and attempting to cross the deserts with their starving bands lost them all. The dry year put a temporary check to the prosperity the county had been enjoying for several years.

In 1879 the assessed value of the property of the county was $3,399,000. The land under cultivation was estimated by the county assessor at 75,000 acres. Of this amount about one-half was sown in barley; corn came next and wheat third, the three cereals monopolizing about 60,000 acres of the cultivated lands; while the bean, now one of the great agricultural staples, only occupied 1,800 acres, and the sugar beet was then unknown among the products of the county.

The great flood of 1884 swept down through the Soledad cañon and carried the Southern Pacific Railroad track out of the cañon down the Santa Clara river to the sea. Out beyond the mouth of the river for several days during the flood a great raft made up of bridge timbers, ties and telegraph poles, the wreckage of the railroad, was tossed back and forth by the river current and the breakers. When the flood subsided this flotsam was cast on the beach or carried out to sea. The Santa Clara river spread out over the valley and for a time rivaled the Father of Waters during a spring rise. The flood did but very little damage in Ventura county.

In 1886 the construction of the coast line of the Southern Pacific Railroad was begun at Saugus, a station on the main road from Los Angeles to San Francisco. Work was pushed rapidly down the Santa Clara valley, and early in 1887 the road was completed to San Buenaventura. The reaction from the debilitating effects of bank failures on the coast, dry years and the low prices of grain did not begin till about 1882; from that on there was a steady advance in the price of real estate. With the advent of the railroad in 1887 it went up with a bound. The real estate agent became very much in evidence. What the town or the county lacked in actual conditions his vivid imagination supplied. On every side was evidence of growth and progress. The magnificent Hotel Rose was built at a cost of $120,000. To prevent business from drifting up town too rapidly a syndicate of down-town property holders built the Anacapa Hotel. Streets were graded, sidewalks laid, a theater built and the town assumed metropolitan airs.

The railroad reached Santa Barbara in August, 1887, and there stopped. The halt would not be long. The gap between the northern and southern ends would soon be closed, so the real estate boomers said. Besides, the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe had surveyed a route from Santa Monica to San Buenaventura, then up the river of the same name, crossing the divide to the Santa Ynez, down its valley and by way of the Salinas valley and San José to San Francisco. Rivalry between the two roads would force them to hurry up the work. San Buenaventura on two main lines would become a great railroad center. But the Santa Fe did not materialize; the Southern Pacific remained stationary and the gap was wide open. Hope deferred made the heart of the real estate agent sick. The boom subsided and San Buenaventura awoke from a dream to the reality that she was not a great railroad center.

In 1890 the Federal census gave the town a population of 3,869, a very healthy growth for the decade. The population of the county was 10,071. The total number of school census children between five and seventeen was 2,703, of whom 1,962 attended school.

September 1, 1890, the town was lighted by electricity.

The Ventura County Pioneer Society was organized September 19, 1891. Dr. C. L. Bard was made president and L. F. Eastin secretary. The vice-presidents were John Barry, J. Hobart, K. P. Grant, Thomas A. Rice and J. A. Conaway. James Daly was chosen treasurer and A. J. Snodgrass marshal. All male residents of the county, June 2, 1873, were made eligible to membership. Sixty-two members signed the rolls the first evening.

F. S. S. Buckman, the first superintendent of schools of Ventura county, was assassinated in San Francisco by a man named Daly. He shot Buckman in the back, mistaking him for his (Buckman's) brother, with whom he had a quarrel. Daly was tried, found guilty and sentenced to the state's prison for life.

December 29, 1891, José de la Rosa, the first printer to set type in California, died in the town of Ventura. He brought a printing press and font of type to Monterey in 1834, and printed the first book ever issued in California. He was born in the pueblo of Los Angeles, Old Mexico, and lacked but eight days of being 103 years old. At the time of his death he was the oldest printer in the world. On the press he brought was printed the first newspaper published in California, The Californian, published by Semple & Colton, August 15, 1846.

The railroad to Nordhoff was completed in 1892.

July 9, 1895, an election was held to vote upon the proposition of bonds to the amount of $106,500 to purchase the property of the Santa Ana Water Company. The bond issue was carried by a vote of about seven to one in favor. On the question of issuing bonds in the sum of $23,500 to purchase the arc light system of the Ventura Land and Power Company, submitted the same day, the vote stood six to one in favor. The proposition to purchase the water system was afterwards rejected by the town trustees on account of defective title so it was claimed.

The number of census children in the county in 1895 was 3,592. Two high schools had been established, Ventura and Santa Paula. The assessed valuation of the county in 1895 was $8,236,147. It was estimated that the county in 1895 produced 2,600 carloads of beans valued at $1,100,000.

The year 1898 marked the beginning of a new industry and the introduction of a new agricultural product into the county. The Pacific Beet Sugar Company erected a sugar factory and refinery at Oxnard and inaugurated the cultivation of the sugar beet. Oxnard was founded in January, 1898. The population of Ventura county, according to the Federal census of 1900, was 14,367, an increase of 4,298 in ten years, or about thirty per cent; that of San Buenaventura 2,470; of Santa Paula, 1,047; of Oxnard, 1,000.

OTHER TOWNS.

HUENEME.

Hueneme or Wynema, as the name was formerly spelled, is an Indian word, meaning a resting place, or place of security, and was so named by the Indians because in this bay or harbor they found a resting place from adverse winds. The town was founded in June, 1870, by W. E. Barnard, G. S. Gilbert and H. P. Flint. It was the first town really founded in the district, which later formed Ventura county. San Buenaventura, the oldest town of the district, grew up around the mission without founding. Hueneme is twelve miles south of the county seat and is situated on a coast projection of the Colonia rancho. The Hueneme Lighter Company established a shipping port here in June, 1870, and received shipments of lumber. During the first year 60,000 sacks of grain were loaded on vessels by means of lighters. Thomas R. Bard and R. G. Surdam obtained a franchise to construct a wharf at this point. Work was pushed rapidly on the structure, and in August, 1871, the wharf, 900 feet long and extending out to where the water was 18 feet deep, was completed. (In 1897 the wharf was extended to 1,600 feet, with an average depth of water at its end of 30 feet.)

Upon the completion of its wharf, Hueneme became one of the most important shipping points on the southern coast. It was the outlet by sea of the rich corn, barley and bean district south of the Santa Clara river; and of the wheat and fruit-growing valleys of the Las Posas, Simi and Conejo. Hueneme is a town of warehouses. It now has seven of these, with a capacity of 500,000 sacks. It has a bank with a capital of $50,000, three churches and supports a weekly newspaper.

NORDHOFF.

Nordhoff, named for the celebrated writer, Charles Nordhoff, is located in the center of the Ojai valley, fifteen miles north of San Buenaventura. It has an elevation of 900 feet above the sea level. The town was founded in 1874. R. G. Surdam purchased sixty acres, which he subdivided into town lots. The town contains several churches, a good school and a public library. It supports a weekly newspaper, the Ojai, established in 1890. The Ojai valley is a famous citrus fruit belt. Nordhoff is connected with San Buenaventura by railroad.

SANTA PAULA.

Santa Paula, sixteen miles easterly from San Buenaventura, on the coast line of the Southern Pacific Railroad, was founded in 1873 by Blanchard and Bradley. It is located at the junction of the Santa Paula creek with the Santa Clara river and takes its name from the creek. The first hotel opened in the town was Dodson's. Wiley Brothers opened the first mercantile establishment. One business place that antedated the founding of the town was Major Gordon's saloon, "The Cross Roads." One September day in 1873, Tiburcio Vasquez and his gang of robbers and cutthroats visited the major's liquid dispensary and spent money for drinks most lavishly. Their high toned liberality and disregard for money made a deep impression on the major; and after their departure he was loud in their praise. "The most polished gentlemen, sir, I ever met in California." The major very nearly had a fit when an officer of the law who was on their trail told the major who his "polished gentlemen" were.

In 1875 Santa Paula contained two hotels, two stores, two saloons, a postoffice and a flouring mill half a mile above the business center. The discovery of petroleum that year in Santa Paula cañon greatly accelerated its growth. It experienced another boom in 1887, when the railroad was built through the town. Since 1875 Santa Paula has been the headquarters of the oil industry of Ventura county. The larger oil companies have offices here and a pipe line from the wells conveys the oil to Ventura. Besides the support the town receives from the oil industry it is the center of a rich fruit growing district. Both citrus and deciduous fruits are produced here. Santa Paula is a city of churches. It supports more different denominations than any other town of its size in the state. The Universalists, Presbyterians, Catholics, Baptists, Methodists, Episcopalians, Holiness and Christians have church buildings, and there are several other religious organizations who have not yet erected buildings. The town has an excellent high school. Two weekly newspapers—the Chronicle, founded in 1886, and the Sentinel—keep the people posted on the news of the day.

OXNARD.

Oxnard, named for Henry T. Oxnard, President of the American Beet Sugar Company, is the youngest town in the county, but in rapidity of growth it has distanced all competitors. January, 1898, it consisted of one lone house—a structure of rough upright boards. In March, two months later, there were seven buildings. In June, 1901, it boasted of an elegant house, a bank, a $22,000 school house, a $16,000 Masonic Hall, a number of mercantile establishments, among them one carrying a $100,000 stock, a daily newspaper (the only one in the county), a number of fine residences, a sugar factory (the largest with one exception in the world), three church buildings, one of the prettiest designed plazas in Southern California and a population of 2,000. Its school census, taken May, 1901, gave its school population 523, the largest of any town in the county except that of San Buenaventura which numbered 720.

The following, compiled from the Oxnard Courier, gives a brief description of the sugar factory: "The construction of the Oxnard Beet Sugar Factory was begun early in 1898. The main building is an immense structure. It is 121 feet in width by 401 in length and 90 feet high. The sugar house, where the finished product is stored, extends from the west end of the building 220 feet, and is 65 feet in width. The boiler house is 100x300 feet. Crude oil is used for fuel and three iron tanks placed 700 feet away from the main building have a storage capacity of 33,000 barrels each. The twin steel smoke stacks are twelve feet each in diameter at the base, and rise to a height of 155 feet. They constitute a landmark that can be seen miles away. There are two vertical lime kilns, one 95 feet high and the other 85 feet, supplying 180 tons of lime a day, which is used in clarifying and purifying the beet juice in the process of sugar making. The building, machinery, etc., cost $2,000,000. Oxnard and the factory are connected by rail with the main line of the Southern Pacific by a branch road to Montalvo, distant five miles. The Oxnard Daily Courier, founded May 8, 1901, published by Charles A. Whitmore and edited by J. A. Whitmore, is the only daily paper now published in Ventura county. The Weekly Courier was established in 1898.

EL RIO.

El Rio was formerly known as New Jerusalem. It was founded by Simon Cohn in 1875. As about all the business of the town was in the hands of Hebrews, it took the name of the holy city of the Jews, with a prefix. It has considerable business. There is no synagogue in it, but it has a large Catholic church and parsonage. The Methodists had a church building there, but it has recently been removed to Oxnard. El Rio is on the stage road between Montalvo and Oxnard, and about half way between San Buenaventura and Hueneme.

MONTALVO, five miles by railroad easterly from San Buenaventura, is a small town with one of the Southern Pacific Milling Company's great warehouses in it. It is in the center of the apricot region. The Oxnard branch unites with the main line of the Southern Pacific Railroad here. It was laid out in 1887, when the railroad was built.

SATICOY, on the railroad nine miles east from the county seat, was formerly known as the Springs. It is the principal town of the Santa Paula y Saticoy rancho. Saticoy and West Saticoy, two different settlements, are practically one for business. West Saticoy contains three churches and a school building that cost $10,500.

FILLMORE began its existence at the advent of the railroad in 1887. From it is shipped the famous brown building stone. It is surrounded by oil derricks.

BARDSDALE is on the old Sespe grant, and was named for Thomas R. Bard, who sold 1,500 acres to R. G. Surdam. The latter laid out the town in 1887.

CAMULOS RANCHO, made famous by Helen Hunt Jackson in her story of Ramona, is in the extreme eastern end of the county near the railroad. Visitors have been debarred admittance to the ranch house, as it was in danger of being carried away piecemeal for relics.

Other post towns are Simi, thirty-four miles from the county seat; Springville, fifteen miles away; Piru City, thirty miles; Newberry Park, a mountain town, and Timberville, also in the mountains.

THE OIL INDUSTRY.

Next to Ventura's magnificent agricultural resources comes its wealth in petroleum. It is the pioneer county in oil production. The first attempt to utilize the oil from the seepages which abound in various parts of the county was made by George S. Gilbert in 1861. He put up a small refinery on the Ojai rancho and a similar one in the Santa Paula cañon, and made a fair quality of illuminating and lubricating oil. The experiment did not pay; the cost of production exceeded the profits.

In 1864, a company, composed of Leland Stanford, A. P. Stanford, W. T. Coleman and Levi Parsons, commenced operations in Wheeler cañon, Cache cañon, and at several other points. They hoped to find light oil similar to that of Pennsylvania. With the imperfect machinery for boring then in use, they could not sink deep wells. Their development work was done by running tunnels into the ridges where the seepages showed the presence of oil. One tunnel in Wheeler cañon yielded fifteen barrels of oil a day, but as it was a heavy black oil they had no use for it. So the tunnel was abandoned and work ceased.

In the same year, 1864, the California Petroleum Company, with a capital of $10,000,000, was organized in Pennsylvania by Col. Thomas A. Scott, the great railroad magnate of that day. The company purchased the Ojai, Colonia, Calleguas, Simi, Las Posas and Guadaluasca ranchos. Machinery, tools, piping and everything needed in well boring were purchased in the east and shipped to California by water. Thomas R. Bard, now United States Senator of California, was sent to superintend the business of the company. Some of the machinery was lost while landing it at Hueneme. In June, 1865, the first well was begun in Ventura cañon, seven miles from San Buenaventura, near a large pit of tar. It was not a success. Another was bored, but was also a failure. After considerable experimenting a gusher was struck, but it soon ceased to gush. Several tunnels were run into the hills. Some of these gave a fair yield of black oil, but that was not what the Pennsylvanians were looking for. After four years of experimenting without success, the company retired from the oil business, having sunk over $200,000 in prospecting.

About the time the Pennsylvania Company abandoned the field, Messrs. Adams and Thayer began prospecting. They had purchased land in what is now Adams cañon with the intention of going into stock raising. From the oil indications they imagined that oil stock might be the more profitable stock to raise. They developed several small wells. In 1876 they sunk a well and obtained a fine quality of light oil, just what prospectors for a decade or more had been seeking. Later in the year the Pacific Coast Oil Company made an important strike in oil of the same quality. The oil business began now to assume importance. In 1883, Lyman Stewart, an experienced Pennsylvania oil man, came to California and shortly afterwards W. L. Hardison came from the same state. They formed the Hardison-Stewart Company. This company and the Torrey cañon and the Sespe companies were later merged into the Union Oil Company of California. One of the wells sunk by the Hardison-Stewart Company is 2,800 feet deep. Another in the same cañon, bored in 1888, has produced 122,000 barrels in a single year, worth at that time $4 per barrel. Well No. 16 of the Union Oil Company was a genuine gusher. It was estimated that 10,000 barrels of oil ran to waste before it could be capped. Oil development has steadily progressed in Ventura for a quarter of a century with no sign of decline. The principal oil districts are Santa Paula cañon, Adams cañon, Torrey cañon, Sespe, Little Sespe, and Piru.

The strikes of the later '70s developed the first oil boom of Southern California. Whenever a seepage showed, a claim was located, then a company was formed and stock sold. As the boom progressed, sharpers sunk holes and poured oil into them to entrap the confiding into purchasing claims or stocks. The second oil boom of Southern California, that of 1900, is too recent and too well remembered by those who were duped into purchasing wild-cat stock to need recording here. History repeats itself sometimes, and so do oil booms.

THEODOSIA B. SHEPHERD SEED AND PLANT CO.

On the block east of the Rose Hotel are the floral gardens established in 1886 by Mrs. Theodosia B. Shepherd. From small beginnings the enterprise has grown to a large business. From the gardens and seed farms near by are annually shipped to eastern dealers thousands of bulbs, besides seeds and plants in great quantities. By hybridization and fertilization Mrs. Shepherd has produced a number of new and beautiful flowers, among which may be named a new eschosholtzia—the Golden West. Mrs. Shepherd's greatest work has been with begonias, of which she has 300 varieties, many of these produced by crossings.

THE ISLANDS OF VENTURA COUNTY.

Ventura county includes within its area two islands: Anacapa, eighteen miles from the coast, and San Nicolas, distant eighty miles. Anacapa is seven miles long and one wide. It is uninhabited. There is no water upon it. On the higher portions there is some vegetation, upon which a band of sheep subsists, obtaining water out of their feed. Father Gaballeria, in his History of Santa Barbara, writing of the Channel Islands, says: "One of them, formerly called the uninhabited island, was named Anacapa, meaning deceptive vision. This name the Indians had always applied to it. The Indians were wont to ply between the coast and the island with their canoes, and Anacapa island presents a complete deception to the navigator. At times the island seems quite near, when in reality it is a long distance away; and again it appears from afar a panorama brilliant with rich vegetation, while in fact it does not possess sufficient water to supply life's needs. The natives styled it for this reason Anacapa—false appearance, deceptive, illusory."

In the Santa Barbara Gazette of November, 1856, I find this account of the massacre of the Indians on San Nicolas Island by the Aleuts of Russian America: "In 1811 a ship owned by Broodman & Pope, of Boston, commanded by Capt. Whettemore, trading on this coast, took from the port of Sitka, Russian America, about thirty Kodiak Indians to the islands of the Santa Barbara Channel for the purpose of killing sea otter, which were very numerous on these islands. Capt. Whettemore, after landing the Kodiaks on the island and placing in their hands firearms and the necessary implements of the chase, sailed away to the coast of Lower California and South America. In the absence of the ship a dispute arose between the natives and the newcomers on account of the seizure of the females by the Kodiaks. The Kodiaks, possessing more activity, endurance and knowledge of war and having superior weapons, slaughtered the native males, old and young, without mercy.

"On the island of San Nicolas not a male, old or young, was spared. At the end of a year Capt. Whettemore returned, took the Kodiaks on board and carried them back to Sitka. From that period little is known of this island till 1836, when Capt. Isaac Williams, collector of the port of San Pedro, visited the island in a small vessel and took on board all the Indians remaining, except one woman who was left in the manner stated by Capt. Russell in the California Magazine. The Indians of the islands were of the type of the coast Indians, and were no doubt a part of them."

Retribution overtook Whettemore. His ship was captured the following year (1812) near the Sandwich Islands by the British ship of war

"Phoebe," and he was taken to England a prisoner of war.

The following is Capt. Russell's "Narrative of a Woman Who Was Eighteen Years Alone Upon the Island of San Nicolas, Coast of California," referred to in the above extract from the Santa Barbara Gazette. It was published in Hutching's California Magazine, November, 1856, and probably is the earliest and one of the most reliable accounts of the lone woman of San Nicolas Island. I omit the introduction which does not directly apply to the subject, and leave out the sentimental padding that the author stuffed into the story.

"One evening while seated beside our quiet camp fire, placidly smoking our pipes, Mr. Nid-ever related to me the following remarkable history: Twenty years ago the whole of the Indian tribes inhabiting this group of islands were engaged in a fierce and exterminating war with each other, and to such an extent was this deadly hostility waged that already the population had very much diminished and would in all probability before many years become entirely extinct. To prevent this, and at the same time to ameliorate the condition of the Indians, the fathers of the mission of Santa Barbara conceived the idea of removing them to the main land. For this purpose they visited the islands in company with a few partially civilized Indians and explained to them the advantages of removing to the mission. They finally consented to go on promise of protection from their enemies being given by the fathers.

Accordingly a small vessel was sent to the different islands and the various tribes were taken, one by one, to the mission of Santa Barbara. But while the last of the Indians were embarking at the island of San Nicolas and all were supposed to be on board, a child was missing, and its mother, after frantically looking for it on the ship and adjacent rocks, rushed off to the interior of the island to seek for it. A storm was threatening, and the captain, after delaying as long as he dared, put to sea. The storm broke in all its fury, and the vessel, after narrowly escaping shipwreck, landed its living cargo at Santa Barbara. Before the vessel could return for the woman, it was wrecked and entirely lost, and as no other could be obtained at that time, the poor woman had to remain upon the island, where she lived alone for eighteen years. After the discovery of gold it was rumored that San Nicolas was inhabited. Sea otter hunters had frequently found human footprints on it. As the footprints were all alike it was concluded that there was but one person living on it, and many attempts were made to find out who this strange being was. Mr. Nid-ever, of Santa Barbara, a pioneer who came to California twenty-five years ago, took up the search. He had been a Rocky Mountain trapper, and was as expert as an Indian in following a trail. Visiting the island he discovered the tracks and followed them until he saw among the rocks of the island near the mouth of a cove a singular object on its knees skinning a seal. Upon approaching he found it to be a woman clad in a dress of feathers. When she saw him she jumped up, and with excessive joy ran towards him and seemed almost beside herself with delight at the sight once more of a human being. In her hand she held a rude knife-blade that she had made from a piece of old iron, probably obtained from the fragment of some wreck, and which she valued beyond anything in her possession. She was unable to make herself understood, except by signs. She willingly accompanied her rescuer to Santa Barbara. Father Gonzales of the mission tried to find some of the Indians who had been taken from the island eighteen years before, but none were discovered, and none of the Santa Barbara Indians understood her language.

"It appears from her narrative that after leaving the vessel in search of her child she wandered about for several hours, and when she found it the wild dogs which infest the island, even to the present day (1856), had killed and nearly devoured it. When she returned to the landing the vessel was gone with all her friends and kindred.

"From day to day she lived in hope, beguiling the weary hours in providing her wants. With snares made of her hair she caught birds, and with their skins, properly prepared, she made her clothing; her needles were neatly made of bone and cactus thorns; her thread was of sinews from the seal. In these and many other articles found in her possession she exhibited much of the native ingenuity she possessed. Whether she still remembered her own language or not will forever remain a mystery. She was very gentle and kind, especially to children, and nothing seemed to please her more than to be near them.

"The sympathy felt for her welfare caused the people to supply her, bountifully, with everything she needed, and very imprudently allowed her to eat almost anything she chose, and the result was that in about six months after her escape from her lonely exile she sickened and died, having undoubtedly been killed by kindness."

In the February number (1857) of Hutching's California Magazine the editor, in an article on The Indian Woman of San Nicolas, states that George Nid-ever, the gentleman who discovered the woman, had presented Capt. C. J. W. Russell on his recent visit to Santa Barbara with a water-bottle made of grass, a stone mortar, necklace and other things made by the woman during her long and solitary residence on the island. He further states: "There is upon this island a good-sized cave in which she took up her abode, and on the walls of which she had kept a rude record of all the vessels that had passed the island, and of all the most remarkable occurrences in her lonely history, such as seeing large quantities of seals, hailing of vessels in the distance, etc."

CHAPTER XXXII.

ORANGE COUNTY.

BY an act of the legislature approved March 11, 1889, the territory now forming Orange county was cut off from the southeastern portion of Los Angeles county. The movement to form a new county out of that portion was begun twenty years before it was accomplished. The late Major Max Strobel of Anaheim was the originator of the scheme. In the fall of 1869 he drew up a bill, creating the county of Anaheim and making the town of Anaheim the county-seat. The dividing line between the old and the new county began at a point in the Pacific ocean, three nautical miles southwestward from the mouth of the old San Gabriel river, thence running northeasterly, following the channel of that river to an intersection with the San Bernardino base line; thence east on that line to the division line between Los Angeles and San Bernardino counties.

Strobel had enlisted in his scheme the active co-operation of some of the wealthiest pioneers of the county. William Workman of the Puente, Temple, Rubottom, Fryer, Don Juan Foster, Ben Dryfus, A. Langenberger, and others, favored his project. Armed with numerous signed petitions and abundantly supplied with coin, Strobel appeared in Sacramento at the opening of the legislative session of 1869-70. Early in the session his bill passed the assembly with but little opposition. The hopes of the divisionist rose high, the new county was assured. Anaheim became a political Mecca for office-seeking pilgrims. Statesmen of Los Nietos and place hunters from San Juan counselled with the patriots of Anaheim, and parcelled out the prospective county offices among them.

Then came a long delay. Opposition to the scheme had shown itself in the senate. The people of Los Angeles city had awakened to the fact that they were about to be left with a large area of mountains and deserts, and but very little else.

The new county took in all of the fertile valleys of the Los Nietos, the San José and the Santa Ana. The delay lengthened. Strobel was hopeful, but the opposition was working most vigorously. Gold would win, and gold he must have or all would be lost. The envious and uncharitable queried as to what had become of all the coin Strobel had taken with him, and intimated that he had been fighting the tiger in the jungles of Sacramento and that the tiger had the best of it. But the faithful gathered together their hard earned shekels, and the proceeds of many a gallon of wine, the price of many a bronco and many a bullock were sent to Strobel that he might convince the honest legislators of the richness and resources of the new county.

Another long delay and anxiety that was cruel to the waiting statesmen on the banks of the Santa Ana. Then one day in the ides of March the lumbering old stage coach, with its tri-weekly mail, rolled into the embryo capital of the new county. The would-be officeholders gathered at the postoffice, eager for the latest news from Sacramento. It came in a letter from Strobel. The bill had been defeated in the senate, but he was working for a reconsideration and would be sure of success if more money were sent. To Strobel's last appeal even the most faithful were dumb.

Major Max Strobel, the originator of the division scheme and its most earnest advocate in its early stages, deserves more than a passing notice. A soldier of fortune and a Machiavel in politics, he was always on the losing side. He was a man of versatile genius and varied resources, a lawyer, an editor, a civil engineer, an accomplished linguist and a man of education. He was a German by birth, and reputed to be of aristocratic lineage. A compatriot of Carl Schurtz and Sigel in the German revolution of '48, on the failure of that movement, with Sigel, his intimate friend, he fled to this country. He drifted down to Nicaragua, and for a time filibustered with Walker. He finally located in Anaheim, where he bought a vineyard and engaged in wine making. But the life of a vineyardist was too narrow and contracted for his genius; he was constantly branching out into new projects. He was one of the pioneer petroleum prospectors of the state. In 1867 he sunk a great hole in Brea cañon, where, if he did not strike oil, he did strike the bottom of the purses of those whom he enlisted in his scheme. Even in this project his ill luck followed him. In the immediate vicinity of where he bored for oil thirty-four years ago, oil gushers abound to-day and fortunes have been made in oil.

After his failure to divide the county he started a newspaper in Anaheim. It was to be the organ of county division. It succeeded in dividing the divisionists into two factions, the Strobel and the anti-Strobel, who waged a wordy war against each other through the columns of their respective organs, the Advocate and the Gazette. Strobel's organ, The People's Advocate, died from some cause, probably insufficient nutrition, and was buried in the grave of journalistic failures. Strobel's last venture was the sale of Santa Catalina Island to European capitalists.

Supplied with funds by the owners and rich mineral specimens from the island, he sailed to England and located in London. He succeeded in convincing a syndicate of English capitalists of the mineral wealth and other resources of the island, and negotiated its sale for a million dollars. A contract was drawn up and an hour set on the next day when the parties were to sign and the money to be paid. When the hour arrived for closing the transaction Strobel did not appear. Search was made for him. He was found in his room dead, dead on the very eve of success, for the sale of the island would have made him rich. Negotiations for the island were broken off by the death of Strobel. Nearly twenty years after his death it was sold for one-quarter of what he was to receive.

Strobel might be said to be the father of Orange county. He was the progenitor of the scheme that resulted in its creation, although he died years before it was born. After the death of Strobel, the management of the county division scheme was placed in the hands of a committee. The name was changed from the county of Anaheim to the county of Orange, the committee arguing that immigrants would be attracted by the name, forgetful of the fact that there were only about fifty other places named Orange in the United States. The north-eastern boundaries of the prospective county were contracted so as to leave out the San José valley, the people of that valley electing to remain in the old county. A bill creating the county of Orange was introduced into the legislative session of 1872, but it never reached a vote.

In 1873 the division question drifted into politics. A county division convention was held in Anaheim, and a man by the name of Bush from Santa Ana was nominated for the assembly. The policy of the divisionists was to force one or the other of the political parties to place Bush on its ticket to secure the division vote. In their conventions neither the Democratic nor the Republican party took any notice of Bush's candidacy. Ignored by both parties, he made an independent campaign, received a few votes and then passed out of the political arena forever.

In the legislature of 1874, Wiseman, nicknamed the "Broadaxe" from the vigorous way he hewed the Queen's English, appeared as the champion of county division. Neither his pathetic appeals for the oppressed people of the prospective county of Orange nor his superlative denunciations of their oppressors, the county officials of Los Angeles, convinced the lawmakers at Sacramento that the people were suffering for the want of a new county.

Another change was made in boundaries and name. The northern line of the prospective county drifted southward to the new San Gabriel river. In 1878 a bill to create the county of Santa Ana and making Anaheim the seat of its government was drafted. The name was a concession to Santa Ana, a concession, however, that failed to conciliate. The town of Santa Ana, that had no existence when Strobel promulgated the division scheme in 1869, had now grown to be a formidable rival of Anaheim. It was ambitious to become a county seat itself, and vigorously combated the division projects of its rival. Local jealousies and the opposition of Los Angeles defeated the measure in the legislature.

In 1881 another division effort was made. Anaheim patched up a truce with her rival, Santa Ana. The vineyard city was to have the seat of government for two years, then it was to be a free-for-all scramble among all the towns and the one that could corral the most votes was henceforth to be the capital of the county of Santa Ana. Bills were introduced in both the senate and the assembly, but died on the files, smothered by "slickens" (mining debris), the absorbing question of that session.

The question of county division fell into a state of "innocuous desuetude." The rivals, Anaheim and Santa Ana, were preparing for the final struggle. It came in 1889. Col. E. E. Edwards, a resident of Santa Ana, was elected one of the members of the assembly from Los Angeles county. He introduced a bill to create the county of Orange and leaving the location of the county seat to a vote of the people of the new county. The northern boundary line had again drifted southward. Coyote creek had become the Rubicon, and it was only four miles north of Anaheim. Santa Ana in the change of boundaries had outgeneraled her rival and virtually decided the county seat question against her opponent. For twenty years Anaheim had contended for county division. Now she opposed it, but in vain. The bill passed and was approved by the governor. In the county seat question Santa Ana won over all of her rivals. The county of Orange set up in business for itself, August 1, 1889, and so ended the longest contest over the formation of a new county of any in the history of the state.

An election for county officers was held July 17, 1889, and the following named officials were chosen: Superior judge, J. W. Towner; sheriff and tax collector, R. T. Harris; district attorney, E. E. Edwards; county clerk, R. O. Wickham; auditor and recorder, G. E. Foster; treasurer, W. B. Wall; county assessor, Fred C. Smythe; county superintendent of schools, J. P. Greeley; county surveyor, S. O. Wood; coroner and public administrator, I. D. Mills; supervisors, William H. Spurgeon, S. Armor, S. A. Littlefield, Jacob Ross and A. Guy Smith.

Orange county is bounded north by Los Angeles county, east by Riverside, south by San Diego and west by the Pacific ocean. It has an area of 675 square miles, or 432,000 acres. All the area of Orange county, with the exception of a few hundred acres of mountain land, was covered by Spanish land grants. The old time ranchos south of the Santa Ana river except the Santiago de Santa Ana belonged to the Mission San Juan Capistrano; those north were attached to the Mission San Gabriel. After the secularization of the mission, these ranchos, when they became depleted of cattle and horses, were granted by the governor on recommendation of the ayuntamiento of Los Angeles to applicants who could comply with the law, that is, make certain improvements and stock the rancho with cattle.

SPANISH RANCHOS IN ORANGE COUNTY.

The following named comprises the ranchos within the limits of Orange county: Mission Vieja or La Paz, Trabuco, Boca de La Playa, El Sobrante, Niguel, Canada de los Alisos, Lomas de Santiago, San Joaquin, Santiago de Santa Ana, La Bolsa Chico, Las Bolsas, half of the Los Alamitos, part of the Los Coyotes, San Juan Cajon de Santa Ana, Cajon de Santa Ana, part of La Brea and a part of La Habra.

The Rancho Santiago de Santa Ana, on which the cities of Santa Ana, Orange, Tustin and several smaller towns are located, is one of the oldest grants in California. Col. J. J. Warner, writing in 1876, says, "During the first quarter of the present century, the Santiago de Santa Ana rancho was universally known among the people inhabiting the country, as one of the oldest ranchos, and there are many good reasons for the belief that its founding was contemporary with that of San Rafael." (The San Rafael rancho lying on the left bank of the Los Angeles river and extending to the Arroyo Seco was granted by Governor Pedro Fages, October 20, 1784, to José Maria Verdugo.)

"There is no room to doubt the statement that a grant of the Santiago de Santa Ana tract to José Antonio Yorba was made in 1810 by Gov. José Joaquin de Arrillaga, but in a partition suit in the district court for this county, a few years ago, for the partition of that tract of land among the heirs and claimants, testimony was introduced which showed that the original occupant of that tract was N. Grijalva, who, as also his wife, died leaving only two children, both daughters; that one of these daughters married José Antonio Yorba and the other Juan Pablo Peralta, and it is far more probable that the former of these two latter persons obtained a new or confirmed grant from Arrillaga in 1810 than that Grijalva should have established himself upon the tract without having obtained a grant from the governor. In this partition suit the court recognized the claim of the Peraltas as descendants of the original proprietor of the land."

The boundaries of the Santiago de Santa Ana as defined in the grant made in 1810, were the summit of the mountains on the northeast, the Santa Ana river on the west, the ocean on the south, and a line running from what is now Newport bay to a certain Red Hill for the southwest boundary. The rancho contained 62,000 acres. During the great flood of 1825, the Santa Ana river left its old channel at a point about three miles easterly of where Orange now stands and cut a new channel for itself some distance southeasterly from its former one. Between the two channels there was about 13,000 acres. The rancho was surveyed by a United States deputy surveyor, and the new channel was taken as its western boundary, although all the old residents claimed that the old channel was the true western boundary. The rancho Las Bolsas was floated over the land between the channels.

THE SQUATTER WAR.

In the early '70s, a number of settlers squatted on this land, claiming that it was government land. The land was covered with a heavy growth of willows and the squatters made a living by cutting and selling the timber for fire wood.

The squatters soon found that they could not hold the tract as government land, for since the river was the dividing line between Las Bolsas and the Santiago, the land must be in one or the other ranchos. Their next move was to buy the claims of the Yorba heirs to all lands outside of that portion of the Santiago de Santa Ana that had been partitioned among the heirs. The legal contest between the squatters and the Los Angeles and San Bernardino Land Company, the owners of the Bolsas grant, was waged in all the courts up to the supreme court of the United States. In that court Judge Stephen J. Field decided that since a United States patent had been issued to the Bolsas first it held over the Santiago, which, although the older grant, had been patented later than the other. He required of the settlers a bond of $75,000 before he would grant an appeal. This ended the squatter war. They could not put up the bond. The settlers were evicted by the United States marshal and the land company, after a decade of litigation, obtained possession of the disputed territory, but the timber was gone. The squatters really had the best of it.

SCHOOLS.

Orange county has most excellent public schools. Their efficiency is largely due to the untiring labors of Prof. J. P. Greeley, who has held the office of county school superintendent since the organization of the county. Through the efforts of Prof. Greeley the county possesses a larger teachers' library than any other county in the state. There are 2,300 volumes in the library. According to the first school census taken after the organization of the county (that of 1890) there were 4,011 children between the ages of five and seventeen. There were at that time in the county thirty-nine school districts and seventy-four teachers. The school census of 1900 gives 5,887 between the ages of five and seventeen. When the county was organized there was not a high school within its limits; now there are three.

The high school of Santa Ana was organized September, 1891. A fine new building, costing about $30,000, was completed in 1900. Ten teachers are employed in the school. The total enrollment of pupils last year (1900-01) was 243.

Anaheim high school was organized in 1898. It employs four teachers and has an attendance of sixty-six pupils. Bonds have been issued for the erection of a high school building costing $12,500. The corner stone of the new high school was laid July 4, 1901.

Fullerton high school is made up of a union of six districts. It employs four teachers and has an enrollment of sixty-two pupils. A two-story high school building was completed and occupied in 1898.

The educational affairs of the city of Santa Ana are managed by a board of education consisting of five members. There are six primary and grammar school buildings. Thirty teachers are employed in these schools. Prof. J. C. Templeton is the city superintendent and also the principal of the high school.

The pioneer school of the section now comprising Orange county was the Upper Santa Ana, now Yorba. The first school opened in it was taught by T. J. Scully in 1857. Hon. William M. McFadden, school superintendent of Los Angeles county from 1870 to 1874, taught in the district a number of years. About fifteen years ago the name of the district was changed to Yorba, the city of Santa Ana taking the former name of the pioneer district.

Since the county set up in business for itself it has built a handsome court house costing over $100,000. The affairs of the county have been well managed. There has been a steady growth in production and a healthy increase in population. The census of 1890 gave the population of the county at 13,589. In 1900 it had increased to 19,696, a gain of over thirty-three per cent. Although one of the smallest counties in the state, it ranks among the highest in fruit production. Over 1,500 car loads of citrus fruits are shipped out of the county annually, bringing a return of nearly half a million dollars. The dried fruits amount to about 2,000 tons.

The Orange County Park in the Santiago cañon is one of the finest natural parks in the state. The park is the gift of James Irvine and contains 160 acres, wooded with magnificent oaks and sycamores.

HISTORY OF THE CELERY INDUSTRY.

Thirty-one years ago, when the author first visited the now famous peat lands of the Westminster and Bolsas country, these lands were known as ciénagas, and were regarded as worthless. These ciénagas were tracts of swampy lands containing usually ponds of water in the middle skirted around with a rank growth of willows, tules and nettles. During the rainy season the entire area of the ciénaga was overflowed. In the fall and winter these marshy lands were the resorts of millions of wild geese; they were also the haunts of wild ducks and other water fowl, and were the favorite hunting grounds of the sportsmen of that day. The early settlers counted the ciénagas as so much waste land, or rather as worse than waste, for the drier portions of these swamps were the lurking places of wild cats, coyotes, coons and other prowlers which preyed upon the settler's pigs and poultry.

Later on the larger of these swamps became the feeding places of wild hogs that subsisted upon the tule roots and wild celery growing there. About twenty years ago some of the smaller of these marshes were drained, cleared of their brush and vegetable growth and planted to corn. The yield was so prolific that these lands rose rapidly in value. The settlers organized drainage districts and constructed canals to carry off the water, and these swamps were reclaimed. They became the most valuable corn and potato lands in the county. The abundant growth of wild celery upon which the wild hogs had fed and fattened before the reclamation of the ciénagas indirectly led to the experiment of growing tame celery upon them for the eastern markets.

The following sketch of the origin and growth of the celery industry of Orange county is compiled from the Santa Ana Blade's Celery edition of February 7, 1901: "The first experiment in celery culture on the peat lands was made in 1891 on a tract of land south of Westminster known locally as the Snow & Adams place, on which several thousand dollars was expended, but without satisfactory results. E. A. Curtis, D. E. Smeltzer and others were the prime movers in making the experiment the outcome of which was such a flat failure that all but Mr. Curtis gave up the idea. Mr. Curtis' pet scheme came to fruition sooner than was anticipated, for about this time he entered the employ of the Earl Fruit Company, and with the consent of the firm resolved to again give celery culture a trial.

"The proposition had many drawbacks, not least of which was the scarcity of help to cultivate the crop and the entire lack of experience in the laborers available. In this extremity, Mr. Curtis bethought himself of the Los Angeles Chinese market gardeners and their knowledge of celery growing, and at once entered into negotiations with a leading Chinaman to undertake the work of growing eighty acres of celery on contract, the Earl Fruit Company to furnish everything, including implements, needed in the cultivation of the crop, also money advanced for rental of the land and the supplying of water where needed by digging wells; so that $5,000 was advanced before a stock of celery was ready for shipment. The result was fairly successful, notwithstanding the untoward experience of the Chinese laborers at the hands of white men, who worried and harassed the Celestials both in season and out of season, carrying their unreasoning resentment to the extent of burning the buildings erected by the Earl Fruit Company, carrying off the implements used in cultivation and terrorizing the Chinamen employed to the imminent risk of driving them away entirely and thus sacrificing the crop for want of help to attend it.

"All this risk and expense fell directly on the Earl Fruit Company, for returns for their investment could only come when the crop was ready for market, and it may easily be imagined that E. A. Curtis, as a prime mover in the venture, occupied a most unenviable position. But Mr. Curtis kept right on and overcame every obstacle that presented itself, and to E. A. Curtis, as manager for the Earl Fruit Company, is due the credit of demonstrating the superior advantages of Orange county for the successful growing of celery and the introduction and establishment of an industry that has permanently added hundreds of thousands of dollars to the resources of the county.

"The crop from the land thus experimented with was shipped to New York and Kansas City and consisted of about fifty cars, a considerable shipment at that time, as prior to then a car load of California celery was an unheard of quantity. There was, of course, not much profit made for that season after everything was paid, for the items of expense were many and included all the loss and damage suffered while the crop was maturing and a bill of $1,100 paid an officer of the law for protection afforded the Chinese laborers while at work during the season. But it paid a margin of profit and proved beyond dispute that under favorable conditions celery culture might be undertaken with prospects of success, and this fact once established the rest was easy."

Celery growing has developed into one of the leading industries of Orange county. It is estimated that the area planted this season to celery will exceed 2,500 acres. About 1,000 cars were required to move last year's crop. The celery cars carry 150 crates, or about 1,200 dozen bunches.

The area of celery culture has extended from the peat lands where it was begun, over a considerable portion of the "Willows," a tract of land lying between the old and the new beds of the Santa Ana river, the scene of the squatter contest of twenty-five years ago.

The Southern Pacific Railroad has a branch line running from Newport Beach, the terminus of the Santa Ana and Newport road, to Smeltzer (eleven miles), near the northern extremity of the peat lands. The station and shipping points on this road are Celery, La Bolsa, Wintersburg, and Smeltzer.

THE OIL INDUSTRY.

Prospecting for petroleum in what is now the Fullerton oil district began more than a third of a century ago. In 1867 Major Max Strobel of Anaheim sunk a well in Brea cañon. About the same time a prospect well was sunk on the Olinda rancho, but in neither place was oil found in paying quantities. With the imperfect machinery in use at that time it was impossible to sink to any great depth. Indications were plentiful and every expert who prospected the cañons and foothills of the district was convinced that rich oil deposits existed in that locality. Brea cañon contained large deposits of crude asphaltum, and twenty-five years ago the Los Angeles Gas Company was shipping two car loads a week of brea for the manufacture of gas, it being cheaper than coal at that time. In 1897 the Santa Fe Railroad Company made a rich strike, and since then oil development has gone on steadily.

The oil district extends from Brea cañon to the head of the Soquel cañon. In depth the wells range from 800 to 1,600 feet. The output of oil in November, 1900, reached 35,000 barrels. The Santa Fe Railroad Company is an extensive operator; at the beginning of the present year it had twenty-six wells yielding 10,000 barrels per month. The price of land in the oil district advanced with boom-like rapidity. The Olinda rancho, containing 4,480 acres, was sold early in 1898, before oil was struck on it, for $15,000. The purchaser, after consulting some of his friends over his bargain, forfeited his deposit. Two years later the rancho was sold to a syndicate of capitalists for $500,000. The oil of the Fullerton district is of superior quality. Its gravity ranges from 30° to 32°.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

ORANGE COUNTY—Continued.

CITIES AND TOWNS.

ANAHEIM.

NEXT after the Mormon settlement of San Bernardino, Anaheim is the oldest successful colony experiment in the state. The scheme of purchasing with their combined capital a large tract of land, dividing it into small farms and planting it with vines for wine making, was originated by several Germans residing in San Francisco. Early in 1857 they began an examination of different localities for their proposed colony site. In the Los Angeles Star of September 19, 1857, I find these items regarding the project: "It is with much pleasure we make the announcement that the company who have for some time been seeking a location for an extensive vineyard have at last succeeded in obtaining land suitable to their purpose. The project is the most important ever contemplated in the southern country, and as it is to be carried out by energetic, practical men, there can of course be no doubt of its full success, especially as the stock required is already paid up.

"The Los Angeles Vineyard Company is composed of fifty share holders, who we believe are principally Germans, the majority residing in San Francisco. Each share is rated at $750. They have purchased a tract of land on the Santa Ana river, about twenty-five miles from the city, consisting of 1,200 acres, which is to be laid off in lots of twenty acres each. Streets are to be made throughout the grounds so that each lot shall open on a good highway. * * * The land has been purchased from Don Pacifico Ontivera, with certain privileges from Don Bernardino Yorba, from whose residence these grounds are situated about five miles. Mr. George Hansen, a very competent gentleman, has been appointed superintendent of the company. This we understand will be the largest vineyard in the world, there being none in Europe of such extent.

"The company is under the direction of a board of trustees in San Francisco—president, Otmar Caler; vice-president, G. Charles Kohler; treasurer, Cyrus Beythien; secretary, John Fischer. In Los Angeles the affairs are carried out under the direction of an auditing committee, composed of the following gentlemen: Messrs. John Frohling, R. Emerson and Jay zinsky; sub-treasurer, Felix Bachman." The San Francisco Alta of January 15, 1858, has this notice: "The stockholders of the Los Angeles Vineyard Society held a meeting on the evening of January 13, at Leutgen's Hotel, Montgomery street. They resolved to give the name of Anaheim to their vineyard in the Santa Ana valley in Los Angeles county." This effectually disposes of that pleasant fiction often repeated of late years, namely, that the colony was named for the first child born in it—Anna Fischer. At the time it was named there were no families living there. Its name is a combination of the German word heim (home) and the Spanish form of the proper name Ana—a home by the (Santa) Ana river.

The improvement of the tract purchased was begun in the winter of 1857-58 and pushed forward vigorously by the superintendent, George Hansen. The Los Angeles Star of January 30, 1858, contains this notice of the labor in progress on the colony site: "As may be expected, Anaheim is a busy place. All is life, industry and activity." * * * "In the operations at present in progress there, are employed seven men, fourteen horses and seven plows in making ditches; one man, one wagon and two horses procuring provisions and firewood; fourteen men, fourteen wagons and fifty-six horses in hauling fence poles; one wagon and ten horses in bringing cuttings; thirty-three men making ditches and fences; there are two overseers, besides cooks, etc.—making in all eighty-eight men, ten women, eighty-four horses, seven plows and seventeen wagons. The daily expenses are $216."

"The land owned by the company is a tract of one and a half miles long by one and a quarter miles broad. It is surrounded by a fence five and a half miles long, composed of 40,000 willow poles, each of which is eight feet long, being six feet above the ground. They are planted one and a half feet apart, and are strengthened by three horizontal poles, and defended by a ditch four feet deep six feet wide at the top, sloping to a breadth of one foot at the bottom."

These willow poles took root and made a living wall around the colony. Across the streets were gates, which when closed shut out all invaders. This live fence was necessary to keep out the tens of thousands of cattle that roamed over the plains for miles on all sides of the little vineyard colony. The superintendent, George Hansen, constructed for the company a main zanja seven and a half miles long to bring water from the Santa Ana river to and through the colony tract and about three hundred and fifty miles of lateral ditches for distributing the water to the different tracts. On each twenty-acre lot, eight acres of vines were planted the first year. These were cultivated and cared for by the company. At the end of two years the vines first planted had come into bearing, and all assessments having been paid a division of the lands was made. Each shareholder had paid into the general fund $1,200. Each lot had a value placed on it according to situation, improvements, etc., the values ranging from $600 to $1,400. The division was made by lot. As each stockholder had paid in the same amount, viz.: $1,200, the man who drew a $1,400 lot paid over $200 to the equalization fund, and the man who drew a $600 lot received $600 cash. In addition to his vineyard lot, each shareholder received a lot in the town plot. After the distribution, a number of the colonists came down from San Francisco, built houses on their lots and entered on the career of vineyardist and wine makers. Each proprietor assumed control of his vineyard lot December 15, 1859, and thereupon the company management ceased.

Among the original settlers there was but one man who understood the art of wine making. The colonists were mostly mechanics. "There were several carpenters, a gunsmith, an engraver, three watchmakers, four blacksmiths, a brewer, a teacher, a shoemaker, a miller, several merchants, a bookbinder, a poet, four or five musicians, a hatter, several teamsters and a hotelkeeper."*

They went to work with that patient industry characteristic of the Teuton. They had to learn the art of wine making mostly by experimenting. The colony was thirty miles from Los Angeles, the nearest point to obtain supplies. From there they had to haul lumber for building and all other necessities, until they established a landing on the ocean twelve miles from the town.

It was a hard struggle for several years, but their perseverance and industry won. The property that cost them an average of about $1,080 originally, at the end of ten years was worth from $5,000 to $10,000. The colonist during that time had supported their families and paid for their improvement from the products of their lands.

Unlike the Spanish pobladores (colonists), who always built a church first and left the building of a school house to those who came after them, the Anaheim colonists built the school house first and left the church building to those who came later.

In the town plot of forty acres, which occupied the center of the colony, a lot had been reserved for a school house. On this a commodious building of adobe had been erected to serve the double purpose of a school house and assembly hall, but during the great flood of 1861-62 the waters of the Santa Ana river overflowed the colony site and damaged the foundations of the school house, rendering the building unsafe. A school was maintained in the Water Company's building on Center street until 1869, when a new building was erected.

The original colony tract contained 1,165 acres (it was part of the rancho San Juan Cajon de Santa Ana), and was purchased from Juan Pacifico Ontiveras for $2 per acre. In 1860 the Anaheim Water Company became the possessor of the ditches and water rights originally belonging to the Anaheim Vineyard Company. The stock of this company was an appurtenance of the land and could not be diverted from it. This company originally incorporated with $20,000 capital stock. In 1879 its stock was increased to $90,000, and the ditches extended to cover what was known as the Anaheim extension.

*Nordhoff.

The Cajon Irrigation Company's ditch was completed in November, 1878, at a cost of $50,000. It tapped the Santa Ana river at Bed Rock cañon, and was, at the time of its completion, fifteen miles long. It has since been extended. In 1879 the Anaheim Water Company bought a half interest in this ditch. All the water interests on the north side of the Santa Ana river have been consolidated into the Anaheim Union Water Company. Anaheim was incorporated as a city February 10, 1870, but a city government was too great a burthen for the people to carry. The legislature of 1872, on petition of the tax-burthened inhabitants, disincorporated it. It was incorporated as a town by act of the legislature March 18, 1878. Thompson & West's History of Los Angeles county, published in 1880, says of the schools of Anaheim: "The town of Anaheim boasts of the handsomest school building and the largest school in the county outside of Los Angeles city."

For several years the school buildings had been inadequate for the school population. In 1877 Prof. J. M. Guinn, who had been principal of the Anaheim school for eight years, drafted a bill authorizing the district to issue bonds to the amount of $10,000. He was instrumental in securing its passage by the legislature. It became a law March 12, 1878. The bonds were sold at par and the school building, costing over $10,000, was built out of the proceeds. This was one of the first, if not the first, instance in the state of incorporating and bonding a school district to secure funds to build a school house—a method that since has become quite common and has given to California the best district school houses of any state in the Union. Anaheim school district was extended to take in what was formerly Fairview district and a four-room school house erected in West Anaheim.

NEWSPAPERS.

The pioneer newspaper of Anaheim and also of Orange county is the Anaheim Gazette. The first number was issued October 29, 1870.

It was established by George W. Barter, who obtained a subsidy from a number of public-spirited citizens to found a newspaper in Anaheim. He bought the plant of the defunct Wilmington Journal. The old press that he obtained had come around the "Horn," and in 1851 had been used in printing the Los Angeles Star, the pioneer paper of Southern California. Barter, after a short and inglorious career, sold the paper to Charles A. Gardner in 1871. Gardner sold it to Melrose and Knox in 1872. Knox retired in 1876. Fred. W. Atheran was connected with the paper for a time in 1876-77, after which Richard Melrose became sole proprietor and continued so until it was sold to its present proprietor, Henry Kuchel. The Orange County Plain Dealer was established at Fullerton, March, 1898, and afterwards removed to Anaheim. It is an eight-column, four-page weekly; size of page, 20x25 inches. Its present editor and publisher is J. E. Valjean.

For a quarter of a century Anaheim was the greatest wine-producing district in California. About 1885 a mysterious disease attacked the vines. Within five years from its first appearance two million vines that made up the vineyards of Anaheim and vicinity were dead. After the destruction of the grapevines, the vineyard lots were planted with orange trees and English walnuts. These have come into bearing and have transformed the appearance of the old vineyard colony. The living wall of willows that once surrounded it and the four gates on the four sides that shut out the great armies of cattle that once roamed over the plains beyond disappeared long ago. There is little in the present appearance of Anaheim to remind the old-timer of the "Campo Aleman" (German Camp), as the native Californians named it forty-five years ago.

CHURCHES.

The pioneer church of Anaheim is the Presbyterian. It was organized by Rev. L. P. Webber (the founder of the Westminster colony) in 1869.

The church building was erected in 1872, at a cost of $3,500. The Episcopal Church of Anaheim was organized April 27, 1875. The church building was completed in the fall of 1876, at a total cost of $3,600. The Roman Catholic Society was organized in 1876. A church, costing about $1,000, was built in 1879. These are the pioneer churches. In addition to these, the Methodist Episcopal North and the Christian denominations have church buildings.

FRATERNITIES.

Anaheim Lodge No. 207, F. & A. M., was organized in October, 1870. The lodge built a hall in 1874, at a cost of $4,000. Anaheim Lodge, I. O. O. F., was organized January 23, 1872. Odd Fellows' Hall was erected in 1875. Orpheus Lodge No. 237, I. O. O. F., was organized November 5, 1875. Orion Encampment No. 54, I. O. O. F., was organized January 4, 1876. Anaheim Lodge No. 85, A. O. U. W., was organized March 5, 1879. It surrendered its charter in 1893, but was reorganized under the same name and number in June, 1900. The various fraternal organizations are well represented in Anaheim.

IMPROVEMENTS.

In January, 1875, the Southern Pacific Railroad completed a branch to Anaheim. For nearly two years that town was the terminus; then the road was extended to Santa Ana, where it ended. In 1887 the San Diego line of the Southern California or Santa Fe system was built through the city. The same year a number of vineyards in the eastern part of the town were divided into building lots. The Hotel del Campo, a $40,000 tourist caravansary, was built, but it did not pay and came very near bankrupting its progenitors. The city has steadily progressed through all vicissitudes. It has a bank (the Citizens'), a number of stores, several manufacturing establishments, and is the center of a large trade. Its growth has always been solid and substantial.

CITY OF SANTA ANA.

Santa Ana, the capital of Orange county, was founded in October, 1869, by William H. Spurgeon. He purchased the allotment of Zenobia Yorba de Rowland, one of the heirs to the rancho Santiago de Santa Ana. The tract purchased contained seventy-six acres. This, with the exception of ten acres reserved for a public square, Mr. Spurgeon platted in town lots and placed on the market for sale. He built a store room, 18x36 feet, on the northeast corner of Fourth and West streets, of rough redwood boards battened. This was the first building erected in the town. In this building he opened a general merchandise store. At first the only patronage he received from the citizens of the town was his own, for the reason that he constituted the town's entire population. But he did not long remain "monarch of all he surveyed." Others joined him, and in December there was a population enough to organize a school district. The district was named Spring. In January a public school was opened; Miss Annie Casad was the first teacher. The school house was a rough board structure, with long, backless benches for seats, and no desks or blackboards. It stood on Sycamore street, near Third.

Santa Ana was about two miles south of the old stage road that led from Los Angeles to San Diego. This road was the so-called Camino Real or Royal Highway that had been traveled for a century. There were no bridges across the Santa Ana river at that time. In winter when the waters were high, on account of the quicksands fording the river was a hazardous undertaking. The Rodriguez crossing, just north of Orange, on the old stage road, was the only safe crossing in times of high water. Mr. Spurgeon built a road at his own expense from the stage road to his town and subsidized the stage company to diverge its route through Santa Ana. He secured a post-office for the town and was appointed postmaster. His salary was the munificent sum of $1 a month. He held the office until 1879, when the yearly compensation had increased to $800. Then several public-spirited citizens were not only willing, but anxious to relieve him of his burden. At first the town grew slowly. Much of the country around it was held in large tracts and was sparsely settled. In 1877 the Anaheim branch of the Southern Pacific Railroad was completed to Santa Ana. This gave the town an impetus that sent it way ahead of its competitors, Orange and Tustin. It became the business center of a large area of country.

The first newspaper established in the town was the Santa Ana News, founded by Nap. Donovan May 15, 1876. It was not a paying venture, and after running it about a year he sold it to Spurgeon, Fruit and James McFadden, who experimented with it for a time and then discontinued its publication.

PIONEER CHURCHES.

The first church organized at Santa Ana was the Methodist Episcopal South. The organization was effected at a meeting held in the residence of W. H. Tichenal in December, 1869. Services were held in a private residence at first, and later on in the school house. A church building was erected in 1876. The Methodist Episcopal Church North was organized in 1874. The Baptist Church was organized in March, 1871. Its building was completed and dedicated in September, 1878. The United Presbyterian Church was organized June 22, 1876. Its edifice was completed August, 1877. These are the pioneer church organizations, all of which were organized over a quarter of a century ago. Now almost every religious denomination is represented in the city.

FRATERNITIES.

The following named are the pioneer fraternal organizations: Santa Ana Lodge, F. & A.

M., was organized October 1, 1875. Santa Ana Lodge, No. 236, I. O. O. F., was organized October 30, 1875. Santa Ana Lodge, No. 151, I. O. G. T., was organized January 19, 1878. Santa Ana Lodge, No. 82, A. O. U. W., was organized February 27, 1879. Sedgwick Post, No. 17, G. A. R., was organized December, 1879. The following named orders and societies, in addition to those named above, have organizations in the city: Sedgwick Woman's Relief Corps; K. O. T. M. Tent No. 8; Santa Ana Commandery, No. 36, K. T.; Santa Ana W. C. T. U.; Hermosa Chapter, O. E. S.; Santa Ana Council, Fraternal Aid Association; Santa Ana Lodge, K. of P.; Shiloh Circle, Ladies of the G. A. R.; Santa Ana Camp, Woodmen of the World; Court Santa Ana, Foresters of America; L. O. T. M., Ekell Society; Uniform Rank, K. of P.; Court Silverado, I. O. F.; Sycamore Lodge, Rebekahs.

BANKS.

The pioneer bank of Santa Ana is the Commercial, incorporated in April, 1882. It transacts a general banking business.

The First National Bank was organized May, 1886. It has a paid-up capital of $150,000. It pays interest on deposits, as well as doing a general banking business.

Orange County Bank of Savings was organized in 1889. It pays interest on deposits.

THE PRESS.

Santa Ana is well supplied with newspapers. The pioneer paper of Santa Ana, as has been previously stated, was the Santa Ana Weekly News, established May 15, 1876, by Nap. Donovan. It was short-lived. The next paper was the Santa Ana Herald, established in October, 1877, by Nap. Donovan. In 1880 it was sold to Jacob Ross. November 13, 1881, A. Waite became the publisher. He continued in charge to 1886. As the Orange County Herald, weekly and semi-weekly, it is now published by Hon. Linn Shaw.

The Pacific Weekly Blade was founded in 1886 by W. F. X. Parker and J. Waterhouse. Later Waterhouse purchased Parker's interest in the paper and founded the Daily Blade in 1887. In 1889 the paper passed into the hands of a syndicate, composed of Victor Montgomery, W. H. Spurgeon, J. M. Lacy and C. W. Humphreys. The syndicate conducted the paper until May, 1895, when the present management, McPhee & Co., purchased the property. The daily is an evening paper.

The Santa Ana Weekly Bulletin was founded June 16, 1899, by D. M. Baker and J. W. Rouse. It is now published by D. M. Baker and F. A.

Chamberlin. It is Democratic in politics. The semi-weekly Standard is published by Belmont Perry.

KEARNEY'S WATERLOO.

The town of Santa Ana attained considerable prominence during the anti-Chinese campaign of the so-called workingmen's party as the place where the sand lot agitator, Dennis Kearney, met his Waterloo. Kearney was making a tour of the southern counties, delivering vituperative harangues against the government and abusing every man of prominence who did not truckle to his domination. He had a large following in Southern California, the leaders of which were for the most part disgruntled politicians out of a job, but who hoped to ride into power on the sand lot agitation. Kearney, feeling secure in the number of his followers, turned his abusive tongue loose on certain persons in the different communities he visited who had incurred the enmity of his adherents there, without regard to whether the information given him was true or false. Reaching Santa Ana on his journey southward, he delivered one of his characteristic harangues. In it he made a number of false charges against the McFadden Brothers, who a year or so before had built a steamer and ran it from Newport to San Francisco in opposition to the Old Line Steamship Company, but had finally been compelled to sell it to their opponents at a considerable loss.

As Kearney was about to take the stage for San Diego at the old Layman Hotel, that then stood on the present site of the Brunswick, he was confronted by Mr. Rule, an employe of the McFaddens, with a demand for the name of the person who had given him the lying information about the steamship transaction. Kearney turned livid with fear and blubbered out something about not giving away his friends. Rule made another and more imperative demand for the name. Kearney began to back off from his opponent, fumbling at his pistol pocket in an effort to draw his gun. Rule struck him a blow that sent him reeling across the sidewalk against the hotel. Recovering himself he ran through the barroom into the dining room and across a vacant lot into a drug store, pursued by Rule. In the drug store Rule floored him, and, holding him down, punctuated each demand for the name of the informer by a punch in Kearney's countenance. One of the slandered men rescued Kearney from his uncomfortable position. Rule's attack on the sand lot agitator was made without the knowledge of his employers, who would have prevented it had they known any such action was contemplated. Kearney departed for San Diego, a sadder and a wiser man. He had learned to his sorrow the arant cowardice of the men who had been urging him on in his tirades of slander; not one of whom when he was taking his punishment at Santa Ana had dared to interfere in his behalf. He had counseled hemp and mobbing for plutocrats and capitalists, but when a little mob-law had been applied to himself he whimpered. He had said from the sand lot platform: "I hope I will be assassinated, for the success of this movement depends on that;" but when offered an opportunity to play martyr for the cause, he had fled the chance with all the agility that fear lent his heels. From that day on his star waned. When, with pistol in hand, he had taken to his heels and fled from an unarmed opponent he had shown himself to be a cowardly blatherskite. Rule had unmasked him. His followers began to desert him. The politicians who had hoped to ride into power on the back of this ex-drayman, when his following began to desert him, scrambled out of his party with as much speed as they had tumbled into it. Rule a few years later was drowned in Newport bay.

ORANGE.

The territory of Orange originally bore the name of Richland. In 1870 A. B. Chapman and Andrew Glassell bought the allotments of several of the Yorba heirs in the Santiago de Santa Ana rancho, comprising several thousand acres. This tract was subdivided into ten, twenty and forty acre lots. Eighty acres were divided into town lots.

A ditch from the Santa Ana river was constructed to the tract in the winter of 1871-72. Several vineyards of muscat grapes were planted in the spring of 1872, and a few orange trees. Early in 1873 a post-office was established and named Orange. The agitation for the formation of a new county to be named Orange was quite active about this time. The town of Orange had hopes of becoming the seat of government of the new county. The former name of the district, Richland, fell into disuse and Orange took its place both for the town and school district. A school house was built in 1873. In 1874 the first church was built. It belonged to the Methodist denomination, but was also used by others. A hotel was erected, but as the patronage was not sufficient to support it, it was used as a sanitarium. Three stores, the hotel and a saloon constituted the business houses of the town in 1875. In the winter of 1878-79 a new ditch was constructed at a cost of $60,000. This gave an abundant water supply and the settlement flourished.

The ravages of the yellow scale in the early '80s retarded citrus tree culture, and the vine disease materially injured the raisin industry. The energy and perseverance of the people overcame all obstacles and the district has become a large producer of oranges and lemons. Orange supports six churches, each owning its own house of worship. The denominations represented are the Methodist, Presbyterian, Christian, Lutheran, Baptist and Episcopalian. The town supports a free library, containing about 3,000 volumes. Connected with the library is a reading room. Orange supports two weekly newspapers, the Orange Post, established in 1885 by William Ward, and, passing through several hands, it was bought in 1892 by its present editor and proprietor, Mrs. Alice L. Armor. The Orange News was founded in February, 1886, by its present publisher, James Fullerton.

Orange is an incorporated city of the sixth class. It is located at the junction of the kite-shaped track and the surf line of the Southern California or Santa Fé Railroad. It is also connected with Santa Ana by a motor line.

TUSTIN.

In 1867 Columbus Tustin and N. O. Stafford bought of Bacon & Johnson a tract of land containing 5,000 acres. This they divided equally between them. Mr. Tustin, on his portion, subdivided about 100 acres into town lots and named the place Tustin City. On the town site, at his own expense, in 1872, he built a school house. The same year a post-office was established in the town or city. In 1887 the Tustin branch of the Southern Pacific Railroad was built to the town, which ever since has remained the terminus of that road. The town has a bank, hotel, store and other business facilities. It has an excellent school, employing six teachers. The Presbyterians and Adventists have church buildings.

FULLERTON.

Fullerton while one of the youngest towns of the county is one of the most thriving. It is a child of the boom and was founded in 1887. It is located on the Santa Fé Railroad, twenty-three miles southeast from Los Angeles and ten miles northerly from the county seat. It is surrounded by an excellent fruit country and does a heavy shipping business in English walnuts, oranges and lemons. The oil from a number of wells in the oil district is piped to Fullerton for shipment. The town has several hotels, a number of mercantile establishments, a bank and a newspaper, the Fullerton Tribune, established in 1898. The union high school building, a brick structure, costing about $10,000, was completed and dedicated in 1898. The town is not incorporated. At a recent election the question of incorporating was decided in the negative.

WESTMINSTER COLONY,

In the autumn of 1871 Rev. L. P. Webber secured from the Los Angeles and San Bernardino Land Company a tract of 8,000 acres lying between Anaheim and the ocean on which to locate a colony. It was intended to be a temperance colony. The settlers pledged themselves not to grow grapes for the production of wine and brandy. The founder endeavored, as far as he was able, to secure settlers of his own church and the colony was known as a Presbyterian settlement. The first church erected in the colony was Presbyterian. A tract of 160 acres in the center of the colony lands was subdivided into town lots. A hotel, a school house, three churches, a blacksmith shop, two store buildings, a doctor's office and drug store were built on the town site; then, the town stopped growing and has remained stationary ever since. Of late years dairying has become the principal industry and two creameries are located near the town. Near Westminster are the famous peat lands, where trainloads of celery are grown and shipped to the eastern states.

GARDEN GROVE.

The town of Garden Grove was founded in 1877 by Dr. A. G. Cook and Converse Howe. A post-office was established the same year. A large business house was built and a store opened in it. The building was burned down in 1880. The town has a fine school house and employs five teachers. It has a hotel, a Methodist church, a Holiness church and a Latter-day Saint's organization. There are a number of walnut groves in its immediate vicinity. It is surrounded by an excellent agricultural country.

LOS ALAMITOS.

A large sugar factory was located on the Alamitos rancho in 1897. Around this has grown up a town. It is located on a branch of the Southern Pacific Railroad, extending from the Santa Ana line at Lorra, near Anaheim, to Ala-mitos, nine miles. The beet sugar factory distributes about a half a million dollars yearly among the farmers in this district. There is a school building, a church and boarding houses for the employes of the factory.

BUENA PARK.

The town of Buena Park was laid out in 1887. It is located on the Southern Pacific Railroad, thirteen miles northerly of Santa Ana. It has a condensed milk factory, established in 1889. This factory distributes monthly about $15,000 for milk and labor. The town has a hotel, two general merchandise stores, a school of two departments, and a Congregational church.

NEWPORT BEACH.

Newport Beach is the chief seaport of Orange county. It is ten miles southwest of Santa Ana and is reached by the Santa Ana & Newport Railroad. The town contains a school house, a Methodist church, a post-office and a mercantile establishment. It has a wharf where freight and passengers are landed. It is a favorite seaside resort for the people of Santa Ana.

CAPISTRANO.

The first settlement in Orange county was made at what was formerly known as San Juan Capistrano. The mission of that name was founded in 1776. After the secularization of the missions an Indian pueblo was established here, but it was not a success. A Mexican population built up a town at the ruins of the old Mission buildings. Capistrano is probably the most thoroughly native Californian of any town in the state. The Mission church, destroyed by an earthquake, was the largest and most imposing building ever built by the Mission fathers. Its ruins attract many visitors. Capistrano has a hotel, several stores, a school house and a number of saloons. Church service is still held in a room of the old Mission buildings. Capistrano is on the main line of the Santa Fe Railroad, sixty miles from Los Angeles and about the same distance from San Diego.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

RIVERSIDE COUNTY.

EARLY SETTLEMENTS.

RIVERSIDE county, the youngest of the counties of Southern California, was formed of segregated portions of San Bernardino and San Diego counties. San Bernardino parted with 590 square miles of her territory, which included the rich valleys and foothills of the southwest section. In this area are the cities and towns of Riverside, Corona, Beaumont and Banning. The early history of the portion segregated is properly a part of the history of San Bernardino, but to make a continuous narrative I give a brief outline of the first settlement of that county.

The earliest settlement within the bounds of what is now San Bernardino county was made at what is known as Old San Bernardino, or, as it is sometimes called, the Old Mission of San Bernardino. In the year 1820 an adobe building forty varas wide by eighty long, with walls three feet thick and thatched with tules, was erected on a sloping mesa of the upper Santa Ana valley. It was not built for a mission church, as is generally supposed. It was built as a store house for the large crops of wheat raised by the Mission Indians of the valley, and a part of it was used as the residence of the mayordomo or overseer of the neophytes. The rancho on which it was located belonged to the Mission San Gabriel and was named by the padres San Bernardino. From the rancho the county derived its name.

After the secularization of the Missions in 1835, the rancho was used by Don Antonio Maria Lugo as a cattle range. One of his sons resided in the old building erected by the padres. In 1842 Governor Alvarado granted to José Maria Lugo, José del Carmen Lugo (sons of Don Antonio Maria Lugo) and Diego Sepulveda the Rancho de San Bernardino, containing nine square leagues, or about forty thousand acres. Upon this tract is located the city of San Bernardino. The Lugos built houses for themselves and for their vaqueros and thus became the first settlers.

The Jurupa, another of the Mission ranchos, was granted to Juan Bandini in 1838 by Governor Alvarado. Bandini stocked the rancho with horses and cattle. The mountain Indians and the renegade neophytes, who had joined their gentile brethren, were expert horse and cattle thieves. They made frequent raids upon the stock of the rancheros of the valley and rendered both their lives and their property unsafe. To resist the encroachments of the Indians, the ranch owners encouraged immigration. The first colony to settle in the valley consisted of twenty families of New Mexico. They located on the upper part of the Jurupa. Their town, known as Agua Mansa (still water), was built on the low bank of the Santa Ana river. It was entirely destroyed by the great flood of 1862. At the close of the Mexican era (1847) the settlements in the San Bernardino valley consisted of a few scattered ranch houses, with their accompaniments of corrals and jaceles or huts of the Indian laborers.

After the discovery of gold in 1848 the immigrants who reached Salt Lake City too late to cross the Sierra Nevadas on account of the deep snow in the mountain passes had to choose between wintering with the Saints or reaching California by some Southern route. Early in 1849, an advance guard of Mormons had found a route to Southern California that was not blocked by snow in the winter. This route led southwesterly from Salt Lake along the foot of the Wasatch Mountains, then through the Utah valley to the southern end of Utah Lake, where it struck the old Spanish trail from Los Angeles to Santa Fe. This trail entered the San Bernardino valley by the Cajon Pass.

A train of 500 wagons came by this route to California in the winter of 1849-50. Jefferson Hunt, a former captain of the Mormon Battalion, was the guide. In the winter of 1850-51 a large number of immigrants came by that route, and for many years the belated gold-seekers reached the land of promise by the Mormon trail, as it was called.

Brigham Young, recognizing the necessity of some more accessible outlet to the ocean for the inland empire that he hoped to found than over the high Sierras or eastward to the Missouri across the long stretch of arid plains, early in the spring of 1851 sent out a colony to form a Mormon stake of Zion somewhere near the mouth of the Cajon Pass. The first detachment of this Mormon colony, consisting of 150 families, reached the San Bernardino valley early in May, 1851. While the leaders were looking for a location the immigrants remained encamped at the southwest entrance to the Pass.

In June about 300 wagons arrived from Salt Lake. A portion of these were Mormons and the remainder belated gentiles from the "states." During the summer about 900 Mormons arrived in the San Bernardino valley. In September the leaders of the band, Amasa Lyman and Charles Rich, bought the San Bernardino rancho, consisting of eight square leagues, from the Lugos. The stipulated price was $77,500. It was bought on credit, the Mormons depending on their future grain crops for the purchase money. The colonists set about improving the land, and the same year of their arrival they had 3,000 acres sown in grain. In the spring of 1852 the Indians became troublesome and the Mormons built a fort on part of what is now the site of San Bernardino City. The Indians were subdued and the Mormons located on their individual tracts. The rancho was subdivided into five, ten, twenty, forty and eighty acre lots. These lots were sold on reasonable terms to persons desiring to settle. The colony became quite prosperous. In 1856 the colonists produced 30,000 bushels of wheat, 15,000 bushels of barley and 7,000 of corn. They owned, according to the assessor's report of that year, 14,470 cattle and 1,558 horses. The population on the ranch was estimated at 3,000. In the town of San Bernardino there were ten business houses.

In 1857 trouble came upon the colony. For ten years Brigham Young had acted as governor of the state of Deseret, as the Mormons called their settlements in the Salt Lake valley. He and his followers had given the United States government a great deal of trouble. President Buchanan shortly after taking office appointed Amos Cummings governor of Utah to supersede Young and sent a force of 2,500 soldiers to aid Cummings in enforcing the laws. Brigham and the Twelve Apostles rebelled and prepared for war. He issued a mandate ordering all the Mormons in the distant Stakes of Zion to return to Salt Lake. The faithful at San Bernardino obeyed. They disposed of their property for whatever they could get for it and departed. Some remained. These were called "independents" and were regarded by the faithful as renegades. Amasa Lyman and Charles C. Rich, the purchasers of the rancho and the leaders of the colonists, with a train of thirty wagons, took their departure for Salt Lake April 25, 1857. This was the first train to go. During the summer and fall about 1,200 Mormons left San Bernardino for Salt Lake.

In December, 1857, about 25,000 acres of the rancho which had not been subdivided and placed on sale was transferred by Lyman, Rich, Hanks & Co. to Messrs. Conn, Tucker, Allen & Coopwood. Although many of the Mormons remained and some of those who obeyed the "prophets'" call returned later, San Bernardino thereafter ceased to be a Stake of Zion and ceased to be distinctively a Mormon colony.

Up to 1870 the increase in the population of the county was slow. It was isolated and far from market. Most of the land was held in large tracts and was devoted to the raising of cattle and sheep.

The early '70s was the colony-forming era of Southern California history. This form of colonization wrought a great change in the class of immigrants coming and in the kind of productions grown. It was the transition period from cattle and sheep to grain and fruit. San Bernardino county profited greatly by the change, but of this more anon when we come to treat of Riverside.

FORMATION OF RIVERSIDE COUNTY.

Having given a brief outline of the history of one of the counties from which the most populous portion of the new colony was segregated, I take up the formation of Riverside county. The first attempt to form the county of Riverside was made in the legislature of 1891. Three ambitious towns in Southern California were at the same time seized with a desire to become county seats, and bills were introduced in the legislature of 1891 to form the three new counties from territory taken from the three old counties, Los Angeles, San Bernardino, and San Diego.

Pomona county was to have been formed from the eastern portion of Los Angeles county and a slice taken from the western side of San Bernardino. Riverside county sliced a triangle off the southwestern part of San Bernardino and appropriated a rectangle of San Diego's northwestern area; while San Jacinto county cut deep into San Diego's eastern area. Bills creating these counties were introduced in the legislature. Then there was a triangular contest between the inchoate counties, each fighting its rivals. The old counties, San Bernardino and San Diego, bitterly opposed the schemes of the divisionists. One San Bernardino editor denounced the division plan as "geographical sacrilege," and another charged the divisionists with attempting mayhem on the Saints (Diego and Bernardino). The Riverside bill passed the senate with only eleven opposing votes and the hopes of its progenitors soared high. The county offices were divided up and a seat selected for the new county. Then came an agonizing delay. The assembly had become involved in one of those interminable scandals that crop out during the sessions of our legislature. Before the "waste basket scandal" could be hushed up the session ended and the Riverside bill died on the files.

In the legislature of 1893 the Riverside scheme came to the front early in the session; the other two division projects were held in abeyance or at least were not pushed with vigor, and did not reach a vote. The act to create the county of Riverside was approved March 11, 1893. Riverside county was formed from the southwestern part of San Bernardino county and the northern part of San Diego. From San Bernardino it took 560 square miles and from San Diego 6,418, thus giving the new county an area of 7,008 square miles. It is bounded on the west by Orange county and on the east by the Colorado river. In its contour Riverside county is widely diversified. In it rises one of the highest peaks (Mount San Jacinto) in Southern California and the deepest depressions below the sea level are found within its limits.

It possesses every variety of climate. In the wooded cañons of Mount San Jacinto the snow never melts; in the depression of the Colorado desert the heat exceeds that of the torrid zone; while on its western mesas, where the breezes waft the fragrance of the rose and the orange blossom, perpetual spring rules the year.

Its productions are as varied as its climate. Its mountains produce lumber; its deserts yield salt, and its western plains are the greatest orange-growing districts in the world. It produces deciduous fruits as well as the semi-tropic. Peaches, apples, apricots, prunes, pears and cherries thrive and yield abundantly. In the lowlands along the Santa Ana river alfalfa makes dairying a profitable industry. Gold, silver, coal, coal asbestos are found within its borders.

ERA OF AGRICULTURAL EXPERIMENTS.

The terrible drought of 1863 and 1864, which virtually put an end to cattle-raising as the distinctive industry of Southern California, brought about the subdivision of many of the large grants that had been held for stock ranges. The decline of the cattle industry compelled the agriculturists of the south to cast about for some other use to which their lands could be turned. The later '60s and the early '70s might be called the era of agricultural experiments in California. Olden-time tillers of the soil will recall perhaps with a sigh the silk-culture craze, the Ramie-plant fad, the raisin-grape experiment and other experiences with tree and plant and vine that were to make the honest farmer happy and prosperous, but which ended in dreary failure and often in great pecuniary loss.

To one of these fads—the silk-culture craze—Riverside owes its location, and for this reason the sericulture mania deserves more than a passing notice. To encourage silk culture in California the legislature in 1866 passed an act authorizing the payment of a bounty of $250 for every plantation of 5,000 mulberry trees two years old. This greatly stimulated the planting of mulberry trees if it did not greatly increase the production of silk.

In 1869 it was estimated that in the central or southern portions of the state there were ten millions of mulberry trees in various stages of growth. Demands for the bounty poured in upon the commissioners in such a volume that the state treasury was threatened with bankruptcy. At the head of the silk industry in the state was Louis Prevost, an educated French gentleman, who was thoroughly conversant with the business in all its details. He saw a great future for it, and firmly believed that the Golden State would outrival his native country, France, in the production of silk. He had established at Los Angeles an extensive nursery of mulberry trees and a large cocoonery for the rearing of silk worms. His enthusiasm had induced a number of the leading men of the south to enter into an association for the purpose of planting extensive forests of mulberry trees for the nourishment of silk worms; and for the establishment of a colony of silk weavers. The directors of the association cast about for a suitable location to plant a colony.

I take this notice of the visit of the president and a director of the association to San Bernardino from the letter of a correspondent of the Los Angeles Star June 15, 1869: "Messrs. Prevost and Garey have been here looking out for land with a view to establish a colony for the culture and manufacture of silk. The colony is to consist of one hundred families, sixty of whom are ready to settle as soon as the location is decided upon. Both of these gentlemen are highly pleased with our soil, climate, etc., and consider it far better adapted to the culture of the mulberry than any other of the southern counties." The directors of the California Silk Center Association of Los Angeles (by which name the organization was known), through its superintendent, purchased 4,000 acres of the Rubidoux rancho, which was a part of the Jurupa rancho, granted to Juan Bandini in 1838, and 1,460 acres of government land on the Hartshorn tract, which adjoined the Rubidoux rancho to the eastward. They also arranged to purchase from the Los Angeles & San Bernardino Land Company 3,169 acres of that portion of the Jurupa rancho opposite the Rubidoux rancho on the east side of the Santa Ana river.

Prevost, the president of the association, died August 16, 1869, before the land deal was completed. The winter of 1869-70 was one of short rainfall and but little was done towards planting trees on the colony grounds, and no effort was made to colonize the tract. The death of Prevost had deprived the association of its main-spring and its works stopped. Besides the silk culture craze had begun to decline. The immense profits of $1,000 to $1,200 per acre that had been made in the beginning by selling silk worm eggs to those who had been seized by the craze later had fallen off several figures from over-production; and to give a finishing blow to the fad the state canceled the bounty. The Silk Center Association having fallen into hard lines, offered its lands for sale on most advantageous terms, and it soon found a buyer.

THE COLONY ASSOCIATION.

"On the 17th day of March, 1870, at Knoxville, Tenn., J. W. North issued and sent to numerous persons in the Northern states a circular, entitled, 'A Colony for California.' In that circular was briefly stated what was expected as to the establishment and carrying on of the proposed colony which had not at that time any definite form or special proposed location."

In this circular Judge North said: "We do not expect to buy as much land for the same amount of money in Southern California as we could obtain in remote parts of Colorado or Wyoming; but we expect it will be worth more in proportion to cost than any other land we could purchase in the United States. We expect to have schools, churches, lyceum, public library, reading room, etc., at a very early date, and we invite such people to join our colony as will esteem it a privilege to build them."*

In the summer of 1870 Judge J. W. North, in company with several other gentlemen who had become interested in the proposed colony, visited Southern California to secure a location for their prospective colony. After examining a number of tracts of land offered, they, on the 14th of September, 1870, purchased from the stockholder of the Silk Center Association all the real estate, water rights and franchises of that corporation. The purchasers had organized under the name of The Southern California Colony Association. The members of the association were Judge John W. North, Dr. James P.

Greves, Dr. Sanford Eastman, E. G. Brown, Dr. K. D. Shugart, A. J. Twogood, D. C. Twogood, John Broadhurst, James A. Stewart and William J. Linville. Judge J. W. North was made president and general manager of the association. The land was bought at $3.50 per acre. It was mesa or tableland that had never been cultivated, and so dry that one old timer said he had seen "the coyotes carrying canteens when they crossed it." It was not even good sheep pasture, and it is said that Rubidoux at one time had it struck from the assessment roll because it was not worth paying taxes on.

During the fall of 1870 a portion of the lands was surveyed and platted. A town was laid out and named Jurupa, from the name of the rancho, but this was soon changed to Riverside. The river, the Santa Ana, did not flow by the side of the town, but the colonists hoped that a considerable portion of its waters would eventually be made to do so.

The first families to arrive in the colony reached it late in September, 1870. Their dwellings were constructed of rough upright redwood or pine boards, battened, the families camping out while the buildings were in the process of construction. As there were neither paint nor plaster used and the chimney was a hole in the roof out of which the stove pipe projected, it did not take long to erect a dwelling. The nearest railroad was Los Angeles, sixty-five miles away, and from there most of their supplies and building material had to be hauled on wagons.

It was easy enough to survey their land and plat a town site, but to bring that land under cultivation and to produce from it something to support themselves was a more serious problem. Land was cheap enough and plentiful, but water was dear and distant. It required engineering skill and a large outlay of capital to bring the two together. Without water for irrigation their lands were worthless and the colony a failure.

The colonists set to work vigorously in the winter of 1870-71 to construct an irrigating canal from a point on the Santa Ana river to the colony lands. Early in the summer of 1871 the canal, at a cost of about $50,000, was completed to the town site. A few enthusiasts in citrus culture, before the canal was dug, bought seedling orange trees in Los Angeles at $2 apiece, and after hauling them across the arid plains sixty-five miles, planted them in the dry mesa and irrigated them with water hauled from Spring brook in barrels. The rapid growth of these trees, even under adverse circumstances, disproved the sneer of the old-timers that orange trees would not grow in the sterile soil of the mesas, and greatly encouraged the colonists.

*Riverside—The Fulfillment of a Prophecy. By John G. North.

The raisin grape was at that time coming into notice, and many of the early settlers planted their grounds in vineyards. Others experimented with the deciduous fruits, and a few had an abiding faith in the orange. Orange trees had to be raised from the seed, and the eight or nine years required to bring a seedling orange to bearing looked like a long time to wait for returns.

After a series of experiments, some of them costly, the colonists finally evolved the "finest" product for their soil and market, and that was the Bahia orange, or, as it is now called, the Washington navel orange. In December, 1873, L. C. Tibbets, a Riverside colonist, received by mail from a friend at Washington, D. C., two small orange trees which had been imported from the City of Bahia, in Brazil, by the agricultural department. This variety is seedless and of fine flavor. It became immensely popular. Buds were taken from the parent trees and inserted in the stocks of the seedling orange trees and the variety was propagated by budding from tree to tree as rapidly as buds could be obtained. The descendants from these two trees number well up to a million. One of these old trees has been recently presented to the city by its present owner, O. Newberry.

ARLINGTON.

In 1873 Samuel C. Evans, a wealthy banker of Fort Wayne, Ind., came to Riverside. He purchased a half interest in 10,000 acres of land known as the Hartshorn tract (now known as Arlington), lying to the southward of the original colony tract. Capt. W. T. Sayward of San Francisco was the owner of the other half. These gentlemen began the construction of a canal for the irrigation of their lands. They were denied the right of way across the lands of the Southern California Colony Association. Mr. Evans quietly secured a controlling interest in the stock of the Colony Association and then dictated his own terms. In 1875 he assisted in organizing the Riverside Land and Irrigation Company, and in 1876 he became its president. This company absorbed the Southern California Colony Association, its unsold land, water rights and canals. The two water systems were consolidated under one management, the canals were extended and thousands of acres of fertile land brought under irrigation.

Up to 1875 Riverside had grown slowly, but with the accession of a larger territory, with an increased water supply, new settlers coming and more money in circulation, it took on a new and healthier growth. The world-famous Magnolia avenue was begun at this time. From a pamphlet published by Capt. W. T. Sayward in 1875, descriptive of the new lands just thrown on the market, I take this description of what Magnolia avenue was intended to be by one of its projectors: "A grand avenue has been surveyed and laid out from Temescal creek nearly to San Bernardino in a straight line eighteen miles long and 132 feet wide, running through the lands of the Santa Ana, New England and Riverside colonies. This avenue is to be lined the entire distance with fruit, shade and ornamental trees on each side and one row in the center; and when completed will make the most beautiful drive and be the best ornamented road in the world."

The amount of land contained in the colonies named above is, according to the pamphlet, as follows: "Riverside colony, 8,000 acres; New England, 10,000 acres; Santa Ana, 7,000 acres. All these colonies are united in one irrigating system." The city of Riverside has long since swallowed up all these colonies and has taken in about 10,000 acres besides. The present area of the city is about fifty-six square miles. It was incorporated in 1883.

In 1875 the population of the Riverside settlements was estimated at 1,000. The town then had within its limits one church edifice, a school house, a hotel, two restaurants, a carriage and wagon factory, three general merchandise stores, a drug store, a livery stable and two saloons. Another saloon was added to the number early in 1876. Although not large, it seems then to have been a "wide open town," judging from the number of saloons in it. The saloons were closed so long ago that many of the present inhabitants are perhaps not aware they ever had any in the town.

FIRST EVENTS.

The first railroad meeting in Riverside of which I have any record was one held in the school house February 23, 1876. The Southern Pacific was building eastward. San Bernardino confidentially expected to be on the main line, and Riverside had hopes that it might be. The railroad passed between them and laid out a town of its own, Colton. San Bernardino set up a wall and petitioned the legislature to pass an act bonding the county so that it could build a road of its own to tide water at Anaheim landing. Riverside cautioned the legislature against the schemes of its neighbor in the following amusing resolution: "Resolved, That the people of Riverside respectfully request the honorable senate and house of representatives of California not to be too much moved by the touching appeal of the town of San Bernardino: Riverside could lament just as hard if it were disposed to."

The first Circus Fair held in Riverside opened

February 12, 1879. It was conducted under the auspices of the Southern California Horticultural Society. The exhibit was mainly seedling oranges, Mediterranean Sweets, St. Michaels and Konahs, with a few specimens of the navel orange. The Riverside Press thus exultingly describes one of the most attractive features of the fair: "D. C. Twogood's exhibit was four boxes of seedling oranges packed. These four boxes, open and full of fine fruit, made a broad glare which fairly illuminated that end of the hall." The oranges were exhibited on plates, and the plates were not heaped. Cicily and China lemons formed a part of the exhibit. A Konah orange six inches in diameter was one of the wonders of the fair. A census or enumeration taken in 1879 of the citrus fruit trees in Riverside, Sunnyside and Arlington gave the following numbers of each: orange trees, 160,861; lemon, 23,950; limes, 28,642. In addition to the citrus trees there were 221,465 vines and about 50,000 deciduous fruit trees. A very good showing for a colony only eight years old.

OTHER FIRST EVENTS.

The first building erected in the Riverside settlement was the office of the Southern California Colony Association, September, 1870. It was built on land now occupied by the Santa Fé depot.

The first child born in the settlement was a daughter of John Broadhurst, born December 26, 1870. The first in the town of Riverside was a daughter of A. R. Smith, born March 31, 1871.

The first sermon preached in the town was delivered by Rev. A. Higbie, a Methodist minister. He was also the surveyor of the colony tract.

The first resident clergyman was Rev. J. W. Atherton, a Congregational minister. The first church erected in the town was a Congregational.

The first school house was built in 1871. It was a frame building costing $1,200.

The first mercantile establishment was opened by E. Ames in the winter of 1870-71. The first brick building, a store room 25x75, was erected by Buet Brothers in 1875.

The first newspaper published was the Riverside Weekly News. The first number appeared November 27, 1875.

The public library was established in 1879.

The first shipment of oranges was made in the winter of 1879-80.

CHAPTER XXXV.

RIVERSIDE COUNTY—Continued.

RIVERSIDE WATER SYSTEMS.

THE citrus groves of the Riverside valley cover about 20,000 acres. Four large water systems supply water for irrigating the territory covered by these groves, viz.: The Riverside Water Company, the Gage canal, the Jurupa canal and the Riverside Highland Water Company.

THE RIVERSIDE WATER COMPANY is composed of the land owners under the system. It supplies the older orchards in the valley. Two shares of stock are appurtenant to an acre. The company obtains its water supply from the Santa Ana river, and from Warm Springs and wells in the San Bernardino artesian belt. This system has forty miles of main canal (half of which are cemented) and about 150 miles of laterals. This company also owns and operates a piped water system, by means of which it distributes throughout the city about 150 inches of pure artesian water under heavy pressure. The pressure is sufficient to afford fire protection without fire engines.

This water is delivered through eighteen miles of mains and twenty-six miles of smaller pipes.

THE GAGE CANAL.

Very few of the many irrigating schemes that have been promoted in recent years for the development of water and the reclamation of arid lands have been so successful as that commonly known as the Gage canal. From small beginnings this enterprise has developed into magnificent proportions. In its gradual development it well illustrates the truth of the old couplet:

"Tall oaks from little acorns grow, Great streams from little fountains flow."

Mathew Gage, a jeweler by occupation, came to Riverside in March, 1881. He was comparatively a poor man. Shortly after his arrival he took up under the desert land act a section of land. This land was situated on the plain above the canals and eastward of the Riverside settlement. There was apparently no way of getting water upon it except from the clouds. Around it were thousands of acres fertile and productive if water could be brought upon them, but barren without it. To perfect the title to his section of desert land he must bring water upon it from some source. His first move was to buy some old water rights in the Santa Ana river. Next he secured a large tract of land bordering on that river and lying about two miles southeast of San Bernardino City. On this land he began sinking wells. In 1882 he began work on his great canal. Wiseacres who "knew it all" ridiculed the scheme of the tenderfoot, and prophesied its failure. Narrow-minded people who could not comprehend the magnitude of the undertaking and who feared some injury to their petty interests opposed it. But Gage labored on undaunted, conquering every obstacle and surmounting every difficulty. On the 10th of November, 1886, he had twelve miles of the canal completed and was delivering water therefrom. In the year 1888 he extended the canal a distance of ten miles in a southwesterly direction, skirting the foothills and bringing under irrigation the lands now known as Arlington Heights. The main canal is twenty-three miles long, it is twelve feet wide on the bottom and four feet deep at the head; and reduces to five feet wide and four feet deep at the terminus. It is cemented throughout with Portland cement, which prevents any loss from absorption. The Gage water system covers about 7,500 acres. Its total cost, including the land up to the present time, is about $2,000,000. The system and the lands under it have been transferred by its progenitor to the Riverside Trust Company, Limited, a corporation of English capitalists. This company controls the lands of Arlington Heights, and has spent a large amount of money in grading and planting trees along Victoria avenue. This street rivals the famous Magnolia avenue. Its elevation and graceful curves afford magnificent views of the Riverside valley. It is proposed to connect it with Magnolia avenue near Arlington station, thus making a continuous drive of twenty miles.

The JURUPA CANAL is used in common by four or five different corporations. It carries about 850 inches and supplies the orchards of West Riverside and the land along the Santa Ana river. The water rights of this system are the oldest on the river, and come down from the original granting of the Jurupa rancho.

The RIVERSIDE-HIGHLAND WATER COMPANY obtains its supply of water from 175 acres of water-bearing land in the Lyttle creek basin. It has developed about 500 inches, which is pumped into its pipes by electricity. To economize the cost of pumping, a tunnel was run some 3,000 feet, reaching the wells forty feet below the surface. The water is conveyed to the orchards in a 24-inch steel pipe twelve miles long. This water supply covers about 2,300 acres lying above the Gage canal in the Highgrove section.

POPULATION AND WEALTH.

The population of Riverside county, according to the federal census of 1900, was 17,897; the population of the city in 1890 was 4,683; in 1901, 7,973, a gain of 70 per cent in ten years. The total assessed value of the county property in 1901 was nearly $17,000,000. City assessment, $5,919,630. The orange shipment from Riverside City for the season of 1900-01 was 5,327 car loads; of oranges and lemons combined, 5,517 cars.

THE PRESS.

The pioneer newspaper of the colony was the Riverside Weekly News. The first number was issued November 27, 1875. It was founded by Jesse Buck and R. A. Davis. It was a five-column paper; size, 12x15 inches. April 29, 1876, Buck retired with this brief valedictory: "The bell rings, the curtain drops, Buck is out." R. A. Davis, Jr., continued the publication until it was merged into the Riverside Press two years later.

The Riverside Press, a seven-column weekly paper, was founded by James H. Roe, June 29, 1878. L. M. Holt assumed the management of it, January 10, 1880. He enlarged it to eight columns and changed the name to the Press and Horticulturist. The Daily Press was established in 1886. It is still published as an evening daily. The Valley Echo was established in 1882 by James H. Roe and R. J. Pierson. December 6, 1888, the Echo was consolidated with the Daily Press and the Weekly Press and Horticulturist, E. W. Holmes becoming a partner, the firm being Holmes, Roe & Pierson. The Weekly Reflex, established in 1895, was consolidated with the Press and Horticulturist, October 1, 1896.

The Daily Enterprise, the oldest daily of Riverside, was established in 1885. The Daily Globe, established in 1896, was consolidated with the Enterprise, October 30, 1897. A bi-weekly edition of the Enterprise is also published. The Enterprise has absorbed the following named weekly papers; the Weekly Searchlight, May 7, 1896; the Weekly Perris Valley Record, March 5, 1896; Moreno Indicator, November 7, 1896.

The Daily Enterprise is a morning paper, eight pages, six columns to the page. Monroe & Barton are the publishers and proprietors.

CORONA.

Corona, formerly South Riverside, is fifteen miles southwest of Riverside on the San Diego branch of the Santa Fé railroad. It was founded in 1887 by the South Riverside Land and Water Company of which ex-Governor Samuel Merrill of Iowa was president. The town site was platted in the form of a circle one mile in diameter. The town is encircled by a boulevard 100 feet wide, lined on each side by shade trees. The town grew rapidly at first. Six months after its founding there were in it ninety buildings completed, some of them brick blocks—one a $40,000 hotel. Then it came to a standstill. Recently it has taken on a new growth. Its water supply is obtained from wells in the Temescal cañon. Recently the Corona Irrigation Company purchased 160 acres of land near Perris in the San Jacinto artesian belt, and has a large force of men employed constructing a cemented ditch to bring the water to the head of the present pipe line, a distance of twenty-nine miles. When completed, the entire line will be about forty miles long, and it is estimated that it will increase the present supply about 800 inches. The town or city is incorporated. The corporation boundaries, like those of Riverside, take in a large number of orange groves. The owners of the groves do not object to city taxes as the municipal ordinances afford them better protection against insect pests.

Corona supports an excellent high school. The school building, which also includes the class rooms of the grammar and primary departments, cost $20,000. The city has within it six church organizations owning buildings, a weekly newspaper (The Corona Courier), six mercantile establishments and a public library of 600 volumes. Its population, according to the last federal census (June, 1900) was 1,434. In the foothills back of the town is a large pipe factory, the Pacific Clay Manufacturing Company, where is made the vitrified pipe so extensively used in the irrigating pipe lines. The company also manufactures pottery, fire brick and tiling. Corona has several sobriquets. It is known as Circle City and Crown City, and the district as the Queen colony.

TEMECULA, the most southern town in the county, is the terminus of the San Jacinto, Elsinore and Temécula branch of the Santa Fé railroad system, fifty-one miles southeasterly of Riverside. The town was formerly a station on the California Southern Railroad (now the Santa Fe), built in 1881, and connecting San Bernardino and San Diego. The great flood of 1892 destroyed the railroad in the Temécula cañon, and it has not been rebuilt. Since then Temécula has been the southern terminus of the Santa Fe system in the valley between the Santa Ana and San Jacinto mountains. It is the business center of a large and productive area of fertile land. It is largely devoted to grain raising. The Temécula grant was in the olden time the wheat field of the Mission San Luis Rey, to which it belonged.

MURRIETTA, on the Temécula branch of the Santa Fe railroad, was laid out in 1886. The Murrietta portion (about 14,000 acres) of the Temécula rancho was purchased by the Temécula Land and Water Company, subdivided and placed on the market in small tracts in the autumn of 1884. Grain and hay are the principal products shipped from Murrietta. There are two churches in the town, but no saloons.

ELSINORE, known as the "Lake City," is twenty-eight miles south of Riverside. The town is located between the hills and the shore of the lake or laguna. This laguna, which gives name to the rancho, is about five miles long by two wide. Its waters are slightly alkaline. In 1884 Graham, Collier & Heald bought the Laguna rancho, subdivided it and placed it on the market in small tracts. The town is famous for its hot springs. Within its limits there are over one hundred of these springs. The waters of these are efficacious in curing bronchial ailments, asthma, dyspepsia, rheumatism and derangements of the liver and kidneys. In the neighborhood of Elsinore is the most extensive coal mine in Southern California. The output of this mine is largely used in operating the factories for manufacturing vitrified salt glazed sewer pipe. There is also near Elsinore one of the largest deposits of potter's clay in the state. The town is well supplied with schools and churches, and supports a good weekly newspaper, the Elsinore Press.

PERRIS, sixteen miles southeast of Riverside, is located at the junction of the San Jacinto and Temécula branches of the Santa Fé railroad. The town was laid out in 1882. In 1883 the Southern California railroad was completed to this point. The San Jacinto branch road was completed in 1888. Perris has an elevation of about 1,300 feet above the sea level. It is surrounded by a fine agricultural region. The failure of the Bear valley irrigation scheme was a serious drawback to Perris valley, but the discovery that the plain around it is a great artesian belt has more than recompensed for the loss of the Bear valley water rights. Near Perris is a government Indian school, where 150 boys and girls are being educated and trained in the industrial arts.

WINCHESTER is a small town on the San Jacinto branch of the Santa Fe railroad, nine miles westerly from San Jacinto. It is surrounded by a fine agricultural country, and is within the artesian belt.

LAKEVIEW is connected with the Santa Fe railroad system by a short branch road, of which the town is the terminus. It is twenty miles southeast of Riverside. It derives its name from its proximity to San Jacinto lake, or sink of the San Jacinto river. The Lakeview Town Company, a Chicago association, controls about 10,000 acres of rich fertile mesa varying in elevation from 1,400 to 1,800 feet. The tract is irrigated from artesian wells.

HEMET is located on the foot hills of the San Jacinto mountains at an elevation of 1,600 feet. Its population in 1900 was 905. It has a magnificent water supply, the source of which is Lake Hemet, an artificial lake made by building a dam across the lower end of the Hemet valley at an elevation of 4,200 feet. The dam is constructed of granite, and is 100 feet thick at the bottom and 30 feet at the top, and 122 feet high. The dam flows the water back nearly three miles. This water supply covers about 7,000 acres. Hemet has a fine hotel costing $35,000. It has the only flouring mill in Riverside county. Hemet is the starting point for Strawberry. Stages run to the valley during the summer.

SAN JACINTO CITY is the terminus of the San Jacinto branch of the Santa Fe railroad. It is the oldest town in the county. The nucleus of the San Jacinto settlement dates back into the Mexican era. The rancho San Jacinto Viejo was granted to one of the Estudillos in the early '40s, and included some 36,000 acres of the choicest land in the valley. The lines of the grant were so run as to take in most of the San Jacinto river. This gave the rancho control of about all the pasture lands of the valley.

A syndicate of capitalists in the early '80s purchased 18,000 acres of this rancho, and laid out the town of San Jacinto. The town was incorporated April 9, 1888. The corporate limits take in six sections of land. It is substantially built, most of the buildings being of brick. It was severely shaken by the earthquake of December 25, 1899, but no lives were lost in the city. San Jacinto is an important shipping point, having about 200,000 acres of choice fruit and grain lands tributary to it.

STRAWBERRY VALLEY, an elevated plateau in the San Jacinto mountains, twenty-two miles from San Jacinto, has for many years been a popular summer resort. It has an elevation above the sea level of 5,200 feet. The valley is timbered with pine and oak, and has three streams of running water and several springs. There were formerly two hotels in the valley, the old hotel at Strawberry and a small one at Idylwild.

In the fall of 1899 a syndicate of Los Angeles physicians, of which Dr. F. T. Bicknell is president, bought the 120 acres on which the old hotel was located; and next they secured the Idylwild tract containing 160 acres. They have since purchased adjoining tracts, making in all 1,090 acres of mountain land. This corporation, known as the California Health Resort Company, is constructing a large central building of sixty rooms for a sanatorium. Besides the main building there will be a number of cottages of from three to five rooms each, the occupants of which will take their meals in the dining hall of the main building. In addition to these improvements the association has laid off the village of Idylwild, where cottages will be built for rent. The creeks and springs afford a plentiful supply of pure mountain water.

BEAUMONT was formerly known as San Gorgonia. It is a station on the Southern Pacific railroad, and is located on the divide or summit of the San Gorgonia Pass, at an elevation of 2,500 feet above the sea level. The town was laid out in 1887, and had for a time quite a rapid growth. It has at present two mercantile establishments, one church (Presbyterian), a school-house of three departments and a hotel. It is surrounded by a grain-growing district.

BANNING, on the Yuma branch of the Southern Pacific railroad, was laid out in 1882. A syndicate of Nevada capitalists purchased a tract of land, a small plat of which was divided into town lots and the remainder subdivided into farm lots. A cement ditch eight miles long was constructed up into Moore's cañon, and an abundant supply of water secured for the colony tract. Banning is most picturesquely located. In its immediate vicinity are Mount San Bernardino, Mount San Jacinto and Grayback, the three highest peaks in Southern California, and stretching out to the eastward lies the Colorado desert. The Banning district produces large quantities of excellent peaches.

THE CONCHILLA VALLEY.

That trite old metaphor, "the desert shall be made to blossom as the rose" has been literally verified in a desert section of Riverside county. While the roses blooming in the desert may not be very numerous, there are acres of melon blossoms. Fifty miles eastward from Riverside City lies the Conchilla (Little Shell) valley, a part of the Colorado desert. This valley extends forty miles from northwest to southeast, and is from five to fifteen miles in width. On three sides it is inclosed by mountain chains, and on the fourth it merges into an unbroken plain that stretches to the Colorado river. Its bottom is from 120 to 250 feet below the sea level. Several years since the Southern Pacific managers procured water at some of their desert stations, but the sinking of these wells was quite expensive. Early in the year 1900 the hydraulic process of well boring was introduced into the valley and proved quite successful. Bountiful supplies of fresh water were struck at depths varying from 350 to 600 feet.

As soon as it was known that an abundance of artesian water for irrigation could be obtained at a moderate cost there was a rush for claims. Actual settlement did not begin until September and October, 1900, and but few of the settlers had their wells bored and their land cleared for cultivation before February, 1901. The crop that seemed to assure the quickest returns and the most profit was melons. By the middle of June the farmers had harvested their grain crops and were shipping cantaloupes and watermelons to Chicago at the rate of a car load a day. There are now about fifty flowing wells in the valley, which will eventually form a fruitful oasis in the desert. The heat and the entire absence of fogs ripen fruits and melons from six weeks to two months earlier than any other part of the United States. As an example of the value at which land is held, an offer of $8,000, was refused for the relinquishment of a homestead claim of 160 acres, of which only fifty acres has been brought under cultivation.

SOME TWENTIETH CENTURY EVENTS.

Among the leading events that have agitated Riverside City and county the present year (1901) may be named the building of a city high school at a cost of $30,000, the purchase of the Chalmers block at a cost of $20,000 for a court house and county jail site, the donation of $20,000 by the millionaire philanthropist, Andrew Carnegie, to the city of Riverside for the erection of a free library building, the letting of a contract by the board of supervisors for the construction of a $35,000 county jail, and the laying of the corner stone of the Sherman Institute, an Indian school. The question of building a new jail called forth considerable discussion. Some invidious comparisons were made in regard to the policy of building a $30,000 high school for the accommodation of 300 high school pupils and the building of a $35,000 jail for the reception of a dozen or so hobos. The supervisors nevertheless decided to build the jail.

THE SHERMAN INSTITUTE.

Nearly fifty years ago Hon. B. D. Wilson, in an able report on the condition of the Southern California Indians, their needs, their treatment by the whites, the laws enacted for their government, and the cruelties to which they were subjected, sums up the Indian's status thus: "All punishment—no reform;" and such has been his fate under the rule of Spain, of Mexico and of the United States.

Though long delayed, for the remnants of the Southern California Indians happier days are coming. These wards of the nation are to be cared for and given a chance to reform. Enlightened statesmanship has taken away the governmental support formerly given to sectarian Indian schools, and has established instead secular institutions for his intellectual and industrial training.

Nearly ten years ago the superintendent of Indians affairs under President Harrison recommended the establishing at some point on the Pacific slope a government school for the industrial training of Indian youth, similar to the great school at Carlisle, Pa. During President McKinley's first term commissioners were sent to look over the field. They recommended the location of a school at some point south of Tehachepi. The fifty-fifth congress appropriated $75,000 for the purchase of land and erection of buildings. The commissioners authorized to select a site recommended that offered by Riverside, and congress ratified its purchase. This site consists of forty acres on Magnolia avenue, near Arlington. The present congress voted an additional appropriation for the erection of buildings and other improvements. The plans for twelve brick buildings, suitable for school rooms, dormitories, offices, laundry, mess hall, etc., were drawn by a government architect in accordance with suggestions made by Capt. A. C. Tonner, assistant superintendent of Indian affairs. A contract for the construction of these buildings was let to Lynn & Lewis of Redlands for $150,000, the buildings to be completed by March 1, 1902.

July 18, 1901, was a gala day for Riverside. It was the day designated for the laying of the cornerstone of the Sherman Institute, an institution that is to be made the great Indian school of the west. Every portion of Southern California was represented and there were representative men from the northern and central parts of the state. United States Senator Perkins presided and Hon. Will. A. Harris of Los Angeles delivered the oration of the day. A guitar and mandolin club of twenty girls from the Indian school at Perris and a brass band composed of twenty-six boys from the same school furnished the instrumental music for the occasion. Quartets of Indian boys and girls of the Perris school also rendered vocal selections that were highly appreciated.

The school is named for Hon. James S. Sherman, congressman from the twenty-fifth congressional district of New York and chairman of the committee on Indian affairs of the present house of representatives. He has been active in securing the appropriation and in furthering the interests of the school.

It is estimated that there are about 600 Indian children in the various Indian reservations of Southern California without school facilities. If these are left to grow up on the reservations they will follow in the footsteps of their fathers. The only hope of "reform" for the Indians of Southern California is in the removal of the young from the evil environments of the reservations and an industrial training in schools such as the Sherman Institute is intended to be.

BIOGRAPHICAL

PREFACE.

The high standing of Southern California is due not alone to its ideal climate and the rare beauty of its scenery. Other regions, boasting an environment as attractive, have nevertheless remained unknown to the great world of commerce and of thought. When we study the progress made by the various cities and counties of Southern California, especially during the two last decades of the nineteenth century and the opening years of the twentieth century, we are led to the conclusion that the present gratifying condition is due to the enterprise of public-spirited citizens. They have not only developed commercial possibilities and horticultural resources, but they have also maintained a commendable interest in public affairs, and have given to their commonwealth some of its ablest statesmen. The prosperity of the past has been gratifying; and, with the building of the canal to connect the Atlantic and the Pacific, with the increasing of railroad facilities, with the further development of local resources, there is every reason to believe that the twentieth century will witness the most marvelous growth this region has ever made.

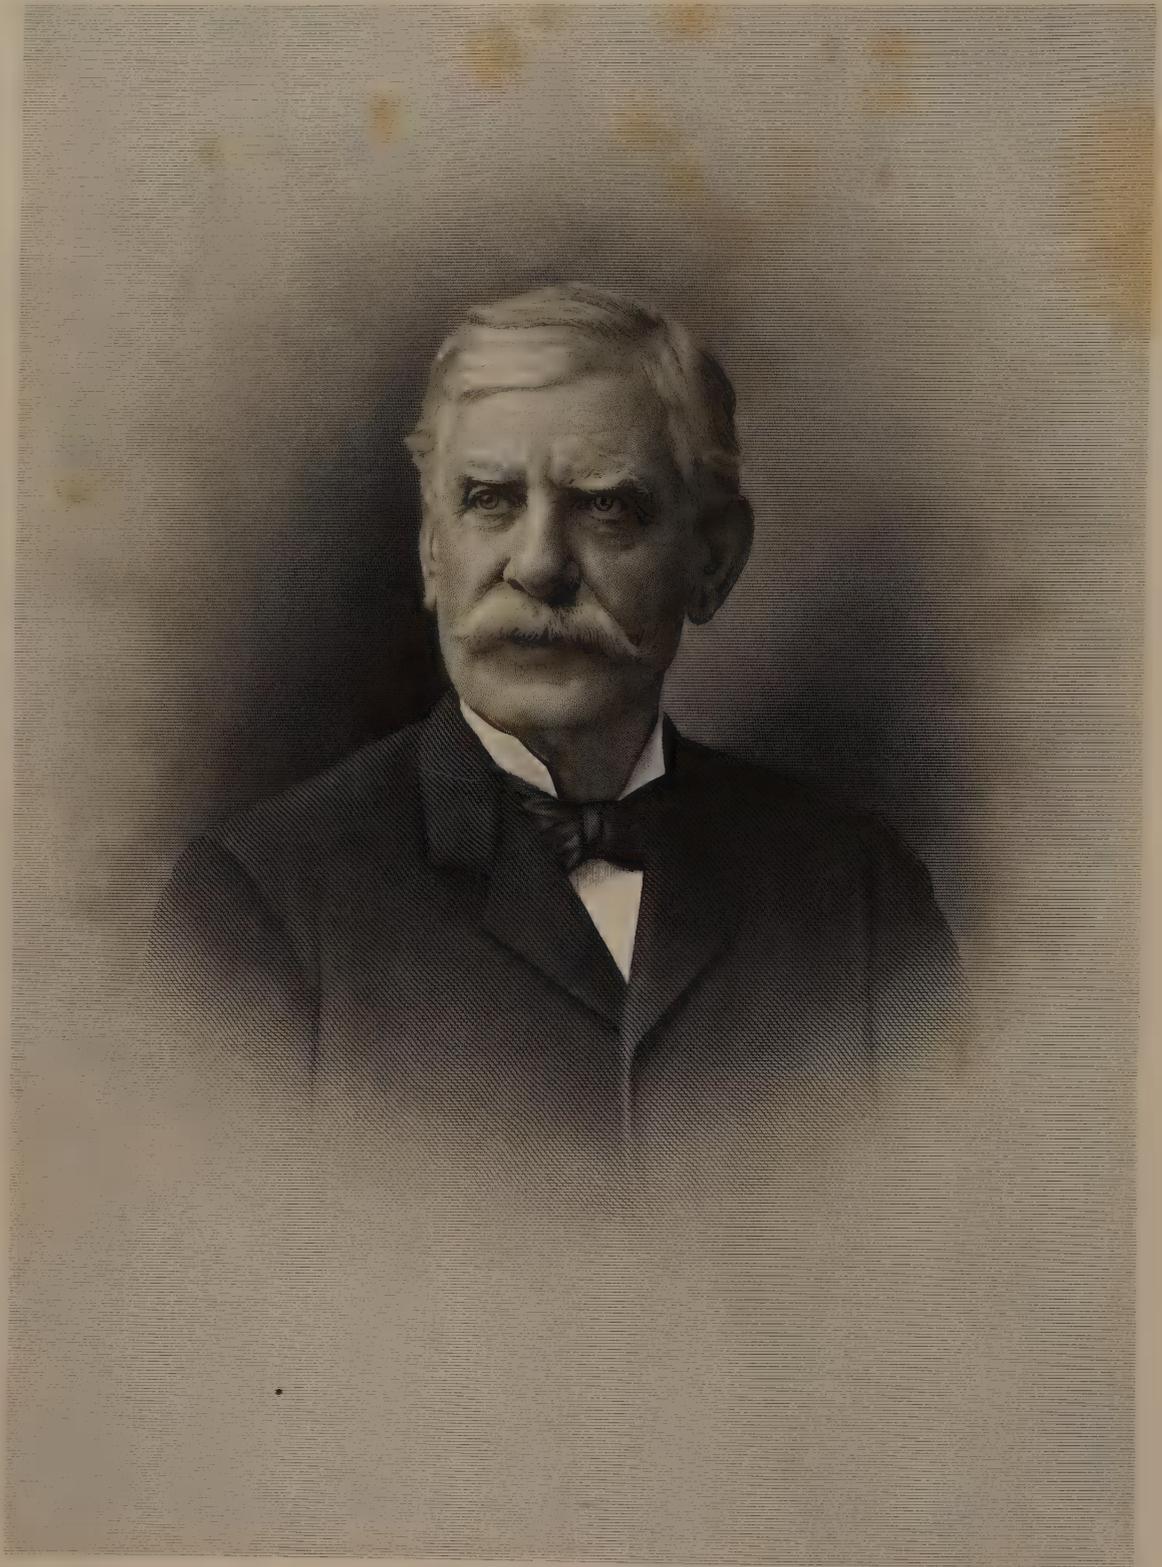

The preceding pages have been devoted to a résumé of the history of Southern California, while in the following pages mention is made of many of the men who have contributed to the development and progress of this region,—not only capable business men of the present day, but also honored pioneers of years gone by. In the compilation of this work and the securing of necessary data, a number of writers have been engaged for many months. They have visited leading citizens and used every endeavor to produce a work accurate and trustworthy in every detail. Owing to the great care exercised, and to the fact that every opportunity was given to those represented to secure accuracy in their biographies, the publishers believe they are giving to their readers a volume containing few errors of consequence. The biographies of a number of representative citizens will be missed from the work. In some instances this was caused by their absence from home when our writers called, and in some instances was caused by a failure on the part of the men themselves to understand the scope of the work. The publishers, however, have done all within their power to make this work a representative one.

The value of the data herein presented will grow with the passing years. Posterity will preserve the volume with care, from the fact that it perpetuates biographical history that otherwise would be wholly lost. In those now far-distant days will be realized, to a greater extent than at the present time, the truth of Macaulay's statement, "The history of a country is best told in the lives of its people."

CHAPMAN PUBLISHING Co.,
Chicago.

"LET THE RECORD BE MADE OF THE MEN AND THINGS OF TODAY, LEST THEY PASS OUT OF MEMORY TOMORROW AND ARE LOST. THEN, PERPETUATE THEM NOT UPON WOOD OR STONE THAT CRUMBLE TO DUST, BUT UPON PAPER, CHRONICLED IN PICTURE AND IN WORDS THAT ENDURE FOREVER."—Kirkland.

"A TRUE DELINEATION OF THE SMALLEST MAN AND HIS SCENE OF PILGRIMAGE THROUGH LIFE IS CAPABLE OF INTERESTING THE GREATEST MAN. ALL MEN ARE TO AN UNMISTAKABLE DEGREE BROTHERS, EACH MAN'S LIFE A STRANGE EMBLEM OF EVERY MAN'S; AND HUMAN PORTRAITS, FAITHFULLY DRAWN, ARE, OF ALL PICTURES, THE WELCOMEST ON HUMAN WALLS."—Thomas Carlyle.

Thomas Publishing Co. Chicago.

Thomas R. Bard

HON. THOMAS ROBERT BARD.

HON. THOMAS ROBERT BARD. The family of which United States Senator Bard is a distinguished member was founded in America by Richard Bard, who, with his father, Archibald Bard, crossed the ocean in 1745 and settled in Pennsylvania. In common with other pioneers, Richard Bard experienced many trials and vicissitudes, not the least of which was the capture of himself and wife by the Indians, April 19, 1758. Five days later he effected his escape, after which he made constant efforts to secure the release of his wife. Finally, after more than a year of captivity, she was given up at Fort DuQuesne for a ransom of forty pounds sterling. A son of Richard Bard was Thomas Bard, a native of Franklin county, Pa. The latter's son, Robert M., was born in that county in 1810 and died there in 1851. He married Elizabeth S. Little, who was born at Mercersburg, Pa., in 1812, and died in 1880. She was a daughter of Dr. P. W. Little, and granddaughter of Col. Robert Parker, a Revolutionary officer.

Into the family of Robert M. and Elizabeth S. Bard, a son, Thomas Robert, was born at Chambersburg, Pa., December 8, 1841. His education was secured principally in Chambersburg Academy, from which he was graduated, with the honors of his class, at eighteen years of age. In 1859 he studied law under Hon. George Chambers, a retired supreme justice of the state of Pennsylvania; however, preferring an active life, he soon turned his attention to railroad and mining engineering, in which he received a practical training in the Allegheny mountains. Later he accepted a position in a forwarding and commission house at Hagerstown, Pa., and was there during the war period, when, owing to his pronounced Union sympathies, his life was more than once in peril. He was on the battlefield of Antietam during that great engagement and, though not a soldier, entered the lists and fought for the Union. About that time he rendered valuable services for the assistant secretary of war, Col. Thomas A. Scott, who, after the Confederates in a raid had burned the residence of Mr. Bard's mother, at Chambersburg, induced him to go to California to take charge of the Colonel's business interests.

Early in 1865 Mr. Bard settled in Ventura county, where he has since been a leading citizen. For a time he superintended the California Petroleum Company's affairs on Rancho Ojai, in which Colonel Scott was interested, but later he turned his attention to the management of the Colonel's property, consisting of the following ranchos: Simi, 113,000 acres; Las Posas, 26,600; San Francisco, 48,000; Calleguas, 10,000; El Rio de Santa Clara, 45,000; Cañada Larga, 6,600; and Ojai, 16,000, besides his lands in Los Angeles and Humboldt counties, about 12,000 acres, making a total of 277,000 acres. The management of these vast interests required the greatest tact and energy, owing especially to disputes concerning titles which caused ill feeling; but the lands of which he disposed have been found to have perfect titles.

In 1871 Mr. Bard built the wharf at Hueneme and laid out the town. For years he has been president of the Hueneme Bank and the Hueneme Wharf Company, also president of the Sespe Oil Company, which controls large areas of oil territory; president of the Torrey Cañon Oil Company; and president of the Mission Transfer Company, which owns the pipe lines and refineries at Santa Paula. After the incorporation of the Bank of Ventura, he was chosen its president, which position he filled for fifteen years. He organized the Simi Land and Water Company and the Las Posas Land and Water Company. On the death of Colonel Scott in 1882, he was appointed administrator of his California estate and disposed of the same in the interests of the heirs.

The homestead of Mr. Bard, known as "Berylwood," is one of unusual beauty. The grounds are attractively laid out, with long avenues of palms and other ornamental and shade trees. The choicest plants and most beautiful flowers add to the artistic completeness of the scene. Indeed, floriculture may be said to be Senator Bard's hobby, and when he traveled abroad in 1899, his first quest was a study of the flora of different European countries. It has been his ambition to secure for his California home rare and choice plants, and he has propagated new varieties, having in this way secured the rose known as the "Beauty of Berylwood." The grounds at Berylwood resemble a great English estate and are among the most beautiful in Southern California. In connection with the property there is an apricot orchard, from which a handsome income is assured.

Ever since coming west Mr. Bard has been one of the active workers in the Republican party. Several times he was elected supervisor of Santa Barbara county, before Ventura county was formed. In 1884 he served as a delegate to the Blaine convention at Chicago, and in 1892 was chosen to act as a presidential elector. The greatest honor of his life came to him February 8, 1900, when he was elected to the United States senate, being the unanimous choice of the Republican members of the state legislature. Since becoming senator, much of his time has necessarily been spent in Washington, and there he has guarded the interests of his constituents and proved himself to be a worthy representative of the greatest state of the west. The trust reposed in him he has never violated; on the contrary, he has ever been watchful of the people's interests and has been a stanch advocate of measures calculated to promote California's development. From his youth he has been a keen judge of men, and this trait has proved helpful to him in the discharge of his many duties; indeed, it is said that his first impressions of men are seldom incorrect, and that he has seldom had occasion to regret a confidence once reposed in another.

In 1876 Mr. Bard married Miss Mary Gerberding, who was born in California in 1858, being a daughter of E. O. Gerberding, the founder of the San Francisco Bulletin. Their marriage was solemnized at the family residence on Clay street, San Francisco, where Mrs. Gerberding still makes her home. Born to their union were eight children, seven of whom are living, viz.: Beryl, Mary L., Anna Greenwell, Thomas G., Elizabeth Parker, Richard and Bernard Philip. In order that the children may have the advantages offered by the city schools, Mr. Bard purchased a residence on West Adams street, Los Angeles, and there the family spend the winters, returning to their country estate in Ventura county for the summer months. Senator Bard was reared in the Presbyterian faith, to which he has always adhered, but he is very liberal and broad in his views and thoroughly sympathizes with all movements and societies aiming to benefit mankind. He is one of the principal supporters of the Presbyterian Church in the Hueneme district and attends its services when at his country place.

Doubtless California has no citizen better known throughout the United States than is Senator Bard. The qualities that gave him prominence in his own state have also made him a notable addition to a body numbering among its members some of the most able and gifted men of our country, and it may be safely predicted that the eminence already attained by Southern California will be enhanced by the wise efforts of its representative in the U. S. Senate.

HON. STEPHEN MALLORY WHITE.
Some lives, though short as we count the years, are nevertheless long when estimated by the amount accomplished in private business enterprises or in public service. Of Stephen M. White it may be said that his life is "measured not by years, but by intensity." Into an existence covering less than half a century he crowded experiences and secured results not often attained in a life that stretches beyond the allotted three score and ten. Only the possession of extraordinary ability can account for his pre-eminence. Beginning his career as an officeholder of the state in 1886 and as a United States senator in 1893, in the comparatively short period that elapsed from these dates to the time of his death, he achieved a national reputation, and was a constant promoter of California's prosperity and commercial welfare.

Undoubtedly Senator White inherited much of his ability from his father, William F., himself a man of literary tastes and the author of "Early Days in California." A native of Ireland, educated in New York City, he came to California, accompanied by his bride, in 1849, and spent his remaining years in this state, principally residing on his large ranch at Watsonville, Santa Cruz county. He married Fannie Russell, a relative of Hon Stephen Mallory, of Florida, whose son served in the United States senate at the same time with Stephen Mallory White. At this writing Mrs. Fannie White resides in San Francisco. In her family there were two sons and six daughters who attained mature years, and all are living excepting Stephen M. One of the family, Edward, resides at Watsonville.

In San Francisco, Stephen M. White was born January 19, 1853. His boyhood days were largely passed on the ranch in Santa Cruz county. He was educated in St. Ignatius College at San Francisco, and in Santa Clara College, from which he was graduated with the degree of B. S. After having been admitted to the bar, in the fall of 1874 he came to Los Angeles, where he was soon recognized as a promising lawyer and able man. His election to the office of district attorney, in 1883, was a tribute to his ability and the recognition of the same by the people. It was largely due to his admirable service in that capacity that he was selected as one able to represent the district in the state senate. His election in 1886 may be termed the beginning of his public career. Thenceforward he remained in the service of his state and country. Soon after he became senator the governor, Washington Bartlett, died, and Lieutenant-Governor Waterman became chief executive, which caused Mr. White to be made presiding officer of the senate in the first session and acting lieutenant-governor in the second session. His thorough knowledge of parliamentary law enabled him to fill these positions with fairness to all and in a manner preventing criticism from any.

The staunch advocacy of Democratic principles by Senator White brought him into notice among those of his party throughout the state and nation. His ability as a leader was unquestioned, his knowledge of parliamentary law unexcelled by any statesman, and his insight into questions of state thorough and comprehensive. In 1888 he was delegate-at-large to the Democratic national convention, of which he was chosen temporary chairman. Four years later he was a delegate, and again in 1896 served as delegate-at-large and permanent chairman. His career as United States senator began in 1893, and during his service in Washington he made a notable record for thorough work in questions of finance and commerce. Perhaps, however, his greatest work, and that which will stand as his monument, was in connection with the establishment of the harbor at San Pedro. For this measure he stood with his whole heart. He gave himself unreservedly to promoting its success; this, too, in spite of the enormous moneyed interests arrayed by the opposition. Finally, after a struggle that would have daunted a man less determined, he conquered, and the harbor was established that is destined to be a mighty factor in the future growth of California. What the future might have held for him is beyond our ken, but it might reasonably be supposed that, had he been spared to old age, the remainder of his life would have been given to public service and to a championship of measures calculated to promote the welfare of the state. When he passed away, February 21, 1901, there were not wanting men who believed that the greatest Democrat west of the Rocky Mountain region had been called away; be that as it may, certain it is that his death removed one of the notable figures in the senate during the latter part of the nineteenth century and one of California's greatest statesmen.

In Los Angeles, June 5, 1883, Mr. White married Miss Hortense Sacriste, who was born in North Carolina and came to Los Angeles with her father in 1873, afterward going east and completing her education in a convent at Philadelphia. Her acquaintance with Senator White began when she was fifteen years of age, and they were married as soon as her education was finished. Born of their union were four children now living, William Stephen, Estelle, Hortense and Gerald Griffin. Her grandparents, Francis and Eliza (Genotelle) Sacriste, resided near Philadelphia, where the former engaged in manufacturing. Her father, Charles, was born at Bordeaux, France, and received his education in a Quaker college at Wilmington, Del. After coming to Los Angeles he started the first woolen manufactory in this city, it being located on Sixth and Pearl streets. His death occurred in 1890. His wife, Ann (O'Neill) Sacriste, was born in Ireland and received her education in a convent at Wilmington, Del. Some years after the death of her husband she passed away in Los Angeles. They were the parents of eleven children, only four of whom are living, Mrs. White being the youngest of these. The other daughter resides at Santa Clara, Cal., while the two sons make their home in Virginia.

HON. ORESTES ORR. For some years past the Republican party in Ventura county has had as one of its principal members ex-Senator Orr, a resident of the city of Ventura since 1878. His prominence in the party may be judged from the fact that for several terms he was chosen chairman of the county central committee, while for many years he was a member of the state central committee. The various positions to which he has been elected have come to him from his party and are a tribute to his popularity and a just recognition of his worth. For three successive terms he served as district attorney, being elected in 1884, 1886 and 1888, and serving until January, 1891. On the Republican ticket, in 1892, he was nominated for senator and was elected, over two opponents, by a large plurality, serving in the state legislative sessions of 1893 and 1895. During his first term he was chairman of the committee on roads and highways and in 1895 was honored by the chairmanship of the committee on corporations, both of which positions he filled in an efficient and creditable manner. At the expiration of his second term he was not a candidate for re-election, but resumed the practice of law, in which he had previously been engaged.

The Orr family is of Scotch descent, but the first of the family in America came from county Donegal, Ireland. They possessed the sturdy characteristics of the Scotch-Irish race, and these qualities have been transmitted to their descendants. The great-grandfather of Mr. Orr settled in Pennsylvania, where the grandfather, Russell, was born and reared. In early manhood the latter settled in Mahoning county, Ohio, where he afterward improved a farm. The father, Casselman, was born on that homestead and when a young man sought a homestead for himself among the cheaper lands of the Mississippi valley, settling in Wayne county, Ill., where he cleared and improved a farm and remained until his death. He married Mary E. Willett, who was born in Ohio and died in Illinois. Her father, George Willett, a Virginian by birth, sojourned in Ohio a few years, and then established his permanent home in Wayne county, Ill. The Willetts are an old Virginian family, of English origin.

In a family of three sons and three daughters (all living), Orestes Orr was the oldest and was born near Fairfield, Wayne county, Ill., December 5, 1857. As a boy he attended district schools in Illinois. Showing the possession of qualities that fitted him for the law, he determined to fit himself for that profession, and accordingly took up his studies in Fairfield. Coming to Ventura, Cal., in 1878, he continued his studies in the office of Williams & Williams, and in 1881 was admitted to the bar, since which time he has engaged in practice, with the exception of the period spent in the state senate. For one term he was city attorney. This was during the early period of his practice and furnished him with the practical experience so essential to complete success in the law. Fraternally he is connected with the Elks at Santa Barbara, and is also identified with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. His marriage took place in Ventura and united him with Miss Ella M. Comstock, who was born in Oskaloosa, Iowa. They are the parents of three children, Charles, Addie and Frank.

JOHN M. RADEBAUGH, M. D. The pioneer physician of Pasadena is a descendant of two of Pennsylvania's oldest families. On the paternal side he represents the fourth generation from Peter Radebaugh, a captain in the Revolutionary conflict; the third generation from Jacob, a merchant; and the second generation from John Radebaugh, a native of Franklin county, Pa., a soldier in the war of 1812 and for years a large real-estate owner in Chambersburg, Pa. The family was founded in America by Heinrich Radebaugh, father of Capt. Peter, and an emigrant from Germany to Lancaster, Pa., in 1738. When the Reformed Church was established the family had cast in their fortunes with those of the new faith, and succeeding generations adhered to the same belief.

Through maternal ancestry Dr. Radebaugh traces his descent from Peter Middelkauff, who came from Germany to America in 1728 and settled in Lancaster county, Pa. His son, Leonard, served as a private in the Revolutionary war, and in defense of the same cause fought side by side with three of his wife's brothers, bearing the family name of Castle. This Revolutionary soldier had a son, Jacob, who was a farmer in Adams county, Pa. Next in line of descent was David, who inherited the valor of his Revolutionary ancestor and offered his services to the country in the war of 1812. At nineteen years of age he was brevet-major. At the close of the war he took up mercantile pursuits in Gettysburg, Pa., and became so prominent in Adams county that he was elected from there to the state legislature and senate, serving in the former body for a period of fifteen years. Though he was about seventy years of age when the Civil war broke out, years had not extinguished the fire of his patriotism, and he was as eager to serve his country as he had been fifty years before. His service at that time as captain of the Pennsylvania Cavalry Company Militia was remarkable by reason of his unusual age for active service. His death occurred in Shippensburg. He had married Susan Mark, whose grandfather was a captain in the first war with England.

The father of Dr. Radebaugh was John, a native of Chambersburg, Pa., a graduate of Pennsylvania College, and a practicing attorney in the city of his birth. While he was still too young to have achieved success, at the very outset of his career, when twenty-eight years of age, death brought to an untimely end all of his activities and blasted the hopes he had cherished for a successful future. He had married Mary Middelkauff, who was born in Gettysburg, Pa., and who survived him many years, dying when sixty-three. Of their union two children were born, but David died in infancy, and John was the only one to attain maturity. He was born in Chambersburg March 11, 1851, and grew to manhood in Gettysburg. After having prepared for college in Chambersburg Academy, in 1866 he entered Pennsylvania College, where he took the complete course, graduating in 1870 with the degree of A. B. Three years later the degree of A. M. was conferred upon him. During the same year (1873) he was graduated from the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania and received the degree of M. D. By competitive examination he was awarded a position as interne in the Orthopedic Hospital, where he remained a year, afterward being for fifteen months connected with the Philadelphia Hospital. The experience gained in these two institutions was of inestimable value to him when he began in practice for himself, which he did in Philadelphia. After a year of private practice there he joined his stepfather, Dr. Robert Horner, a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania, the two practicing together in Gettysburg.

When Dr. Radebaugh came to Pasadena in 1881, it was not only his first glimpse of this now beautiful city, but also his first visit to the coast. Being pleased with the country, he decided to remain, and he has since made Pasadena his home. He was the first physician to build an office here, the location he selected being now the site of the Carrollton Hotel. At the time there were only two physicians in the community, and both of these were ranchers, devoting little time to the profession. Hence he deserves the title of "pioneer physician." He is now located on Euclid avenue and conducts a general practice, in addition to which he served as a member of the board of health from its organization until 1901. By means of study in the Post-Graduate School of New York City he has kept in touch with the many developments made in therapeutics since he completed his university course, and his knowledge is further enlarged by the careful perusal of medical journals and other literature bearing upon the profession, also by his active connection with California State and Los Angeles County Medical Societies. Though not active in politics to the extent of partisanship, he is nevertheless a strong Republican. In religion he is of the Episcopal faith.

Ellwood Cooper

ELLWOOD COOPER. It is the opinion of many that there is no region where wise judgment and tireless industry bring more satisfactory results than in this far western state. With a soil that readily responds to cultivation and a climate that is unsurpassed, the horticulturist has much to aid him in his efforts to gain success; and certainly, if the career of Ellwood Cooper may be taken as an example, a young man has great opportunities in the field of horticulture in California. Ellwood ranch is known throughout the entire country. To the student of progress it presents a type unique and interesting. Established by its present owner in 1870, it has since been developed from a seemingly barren waste into a valuable homestead. The owner is a man who has made a thorough study of horticulture, and his knowledge of the science was recognized some years ago by his election as president of the State Board of Horticulture. A practical test has been made of many theories he held, and in this way he has promoted his own success, as well as advanced the science of horticulture. He is a leader, possessing the resourceful mind, the keen judgment and the originality of thought that fit him for projecting new ideas and new methods of work into his chosen occupation.

Ellwood ranch lies twelve miles west of Santa Barbara and is intersected by Hollister avenue. It comprises two thousand acres, the western portion of which extends from the ocean to the mountains. At the foothills there are a number of tenements and other houses, occupied by the employes of the ranch, and lying seven-eighths of a mile from Hollister avenue. One of the most noticeable features of the property is the olive oil manufacturing plant, which is the largest in California, and from which is turned out more oil than from any other plant in the world. Two hundred and fifty acres are planted in an olive orchard, comprising twelve thousand five hundred trees. Mr. Cooper is the pioneer olive-grower of Santa Barbara county, having planted his first trees in 1872, and since then he has demonstrated that the olive is one of the most profitable trees grown here.

Besides the olives, there are one hundred acres in English walnuts, with about four thousand trees; and more than one thousand deciduous fruit trees. To protect these trees from the ocean winds and to modify the climate, Mr. Cooper planted a large number of eucalyptus trees, comprising twenty-five varieties of this genus. In addition to the fruit industry, many hundred acres are devoted to grain and grazing, the owner having a herd of one hundred and fifty Jersey cattle, from which he supplies butter to Santa Barbara and San Francisco. In an article in the Youth's Companion the Marquis of Lorne refers to Mr. Cooper as a "gentleman who has a magnificent farm on the Pacific and has shown that California can produce better olive oil than France, Spain or Italy; grapes as good as any man could desire; English walnuts and European almonds in crops whereof the old countries hardly ever dream; oranges, lemons and Japanese persimmons, with other fruit and crops too numerous to mention; and all hedged from the gentle sea winds by belts and bands of Australian eucalypti, which grow in ten years to one hundred feet. But such a paradise is not for the beginner, who must make his money before he indulges in so many broad acres."

Tracing the ancestry of the Cooper family, we find that they are of English extraction and Quaker belief, and adhered to the peace-loving customs of their sect. The first of the name in America came with William Penn from England. The grandfather, Jeremiah, was a son of John Cooper, and a woolen manufacturer, while the father of our subject, Morris, was a farmer and miller. The wife of Morris Cooper was Phoebe Barnaby, who like him was a native of Pennsylvania and the descendant of English Quakers. Ellwood Cooper was born in Lancaster county, Pa., in May, 1829, and received school advantages. When quite young he went to Philadelphia, where he worked in a store for a year, and then joined an importing and shipping house. His employers, Samuel A. Lewis & Bro., were engaged in the Brazilian trade, principally with Pernambuco and Rio de Janeiro. In 1855 he left Philadelphia, taking a position with a shipping house in the West Indies, where he remained ten years, being for a year head clerk and afterward a partner in the business. His home was at Port au Prince, St. Domingo. The unhealthy climate finally forced him to return to the States, and afterward he connected himself with a mercantile house in New York, that ran a line of steamboats, built ships and had vessels trading with many different countries. They were both importers and exporters, and conducted a large commission business. The revolution in Cuba during Grant's administration and the troubles in Hayti before the overthrow of General Salnave caused the firm great losses in money, although in other respects they were uniformly prosperous.

The inclement climate of the Atlantic seaboard led Mr. Cooper to invest in California property and in 1870 he came to Santa Barbara county and settled upon the ranch which he had purchased before leaving the east. This has been the scene of his subsequent activities and successes. His knowledge of horticulture is so extensive and thorough that he has been repeatedly requested to furnish articles on the subject to newspapers and periodicals, and he has been a very frequent contributor to the Santa Barbara Press. In addition he is the author of three books: "Report of Trade, with Statistics, between the United States and San Domingo;" "Fruit Culture and Eucalyptus Trees;" and "Treatise on Olive Culture." Through these various publications he has done much to direct attention to needed reforms in fruit-growing and to arouse attention on the part of intelligent men in this industry. With the firmest faith in California's future, he has never hesitated to proclaim the richness of her resources and the wide range of her possibilities. Indeed, it is to such men as he that the state owes its present standing. One phase of the olive industry in which he has been particularly interested is its introduction as a food and medicine. Physicians testify to the value of pure olive oil as a remedial agency, possessing a direct alterative effect in constitutional diseases and restoring to a worn-out or broken-down tissue just such elements of repair as its reconstruction demands. It is also used with happy results for massage, inunctions and bathing. Hence its introduction into the homes throughout our country will be attended by helpful consequences, and he is a true friend of humanity who labors toward that end.

In Philadelphia, in 1853, occurred the marriage of Mr. Cooper and Miss Sarah P. Moore, a native of Pennsylvania and a descendant of Quaker ancestors who accompanied William Penn to America. One son and two daughters comprise the family of Mr. and Mrs. Cooper. The former, Henry, is in charge of the oil manufacturing industry. The latter, Ellen and Fannie, also reside on the home ranch.

The political belief of Mr. Cooper brings him into hearty sympathy with the Republican party. He was an ardent admirer of President McKinley as embodying the highest type of American spirit and American impulse, and approves of the protective system known as the McKinley tariff; also supported his conservative and determined course in the Cuban difficulties; admired the very able manner in which the incidents arising out of the Spanish war were managed; champions the policy adopted in the Chinese outbreak; and, in a word, believes that the prosperity enjoyed by the United States the past few years is directly attributable to the lamented martyr president, William McKinley.

DE LA GUERRA FAMILY. Hon. Pablo de la Guerra, ex-lieutenant governor of California, was born in Santa Barbara, November 29, 1819. His father, Don José Antonio, was a son of Don Juan José de la Guerra, and, following the Spanish custom of adding to the paternal surname the name of the mother's family, he was known as Don José Antonio de la Guerra y Noriega. Born March 6, 1779, in Novales, Spain, in 1797 he went to the city of Mexico, where he was employed by his uncle, Don Pedro Noriega, in the mercantile line. In 1801 he arrived in California and settled at Santa Barbara, in whose early history he was destined to become an important factor. He became so large a land-owner that at one time his possessions aggregated two hundred and fifty thousand acres, including the following ranches: San Julian, forty-eight thousand acres; Simi, ninety-six thousand acres; Las Pozas, forty-eight thousand acres (where Santa Paula and other towns now lie); Tapo vineyard, fourteen thousand; El Conejo, twenty-four thousand five hundred, and Los Alamos, forty-eight thousand acres. Nearly all these tracts were stocked with many thousands of cattle, sheep and horses. He owned the de la Guerra gardens, in the center of what is now Santa Barbara. While acting as military governor of Alta California, he resided on the corner of what is now Santa Barbara and Cañon Perdido, called "El Presidio," but this place becoming too small for his family, he built the de la Guerra mansion, which is a well-preserved historic house of Santa Barbara.

The marriage of the Don united him with Doña Maria Antonia Carrillo, who was born in Lower California, of Spanish descent. In 1810, when Mexico claimed independence, he was appointed Habilitado General from both Californias to the vice-royal government in Mexico, and, starting toward the capital with his family, he was captured at San Blas by the patriots, then in revolt against Spain. Many others were arrested at the same time and a large number were shot, but, he being among the last to be captured, miraculously escaped, saved by the tidings of the approach of the Spanish General Callejas. On joining the Spanish forces he found his wife, who had become separated from him. He also lost a writing desk containing $30,000, but three days later he met a priest whom he knew and who by chance had found and recognized the writing desk. On the delivery of the desk, the owner was pleasantly surprised to find that the money had not been molested. With this sum he bought a vessel and returned to Santa Barbara. In 1811 he was appointed to the command of the troops at San Diego, and there he made his home for some years. In 1817 he was appointed captain of the troops at Santa Barbara and returned thither, which afterward continued his home, with the exception of a brief period spent in Mexico as Habilitado General.

Finding that in Santa Barbara there was a scarcity of every convenience of life, he gave his influence toward the development of material resources and the establishing of new industries. Among other things he established an olive oil plant, a flour mill, carpenter and blacksmith's shop, shoe store, bakery, soap factory, general warehouse, and drug and dry-goods store, all of these being in the rear of the mansion, except the soap factory, drugs and dry-goods store, which were within twenty feet of the present city hall. One of the captain's most enjoyable duties was the distribution of soap, gratis, to the Indians and Mexicans, who came each week to receive their allowance, which was given to them with a joke or pleasant remark. Then, too, they often received donations of clothing, blankets, sugar, lard, and other essentials. Over three thousand Indians at one time resided at the mission, and a large number of them were known by name to the captain.

Captain de la Guerra died February 11, 1858, at the age of eighty-three, and he and his wife, who had died December 25, 1843, were buried in the same sepulchre under the floor of the old mission church. They were the parents of eight sons and five daughters, and to them they gave every possible advantage. Two sons were sent to the city of Mexico to be educated, one to Chile, South America, and still another to England, while several sons and grandsons were sent to Georgetown, D. C. The eldest son, José Antonio, married Doña Concepcion Ortega y Lopez. Juan José was graduated from three colleges in England and his early death terminated a career that gave brilliant promise. The other children were Rita de Jesús; Maria Teresa, who married William Hartnell; Raymundo; Maria de las Augustias, who married Manuel Jimeno, secretary of state and provisional governor of Alta California, and after his death became the wife of Dr. James L. Ord, of the United States army; Francisco, who married Ascension Sepulveda and afterward her sister, Concepcion; Pablo; Maria Ana, who married Alfred Robinson, of Boston, Mass.; Joaquin; Miguel, who married Trinidad Ortega de Pico; Antonio Maria, who was captain of a native California cavalry during the Civil war; and Maria Antonia, who married Cesario Lataillade, a native of France, and after his death became the wife of Don Gaspar Oreña, a native of Spain.

After completing his education in the city of Mexico, Pablo de la Guerra returned to California, and, at the age of nineteen years, he served as collector of customs at Monterey, then, with one exception, the most important office in the state of California. At the age of twenty-eight, March 7, 1847, he married Doña Joséfa Moreno, member of an old Spanish family of Monterey. They became the parents of six daughters and one son. The son and three daughters reached maturity; Francisca, widow of Thomas B. Dibblee; Carlos, interpreter, teacher and translator of Spanish; Delfina, and Herminia, widow of Louis E. Lee, of Rochester, N. Y. In 1849 Pablo de la Guerra was a member of the first constitutional convention of California. For several terms, and until 1861, he was a member of the state senate. During the latter year he was elected president of the senate, and, on the election of Governor Downey to the United States senate, the lieutenant-governor became governor, and Senator de la Guerra was promoted to the office of lieutenant-governor, which he filled ably. March 11, 1861, he was admitted as attorney and counselor of the supreme court. October 21, 1863, he was elected judge of the first judicial district, comprising all of Southern California. He was re-elected in 1869 to serve another term of six years, but in 1873 his health became so seriously impaired that he resigned the office. He died February 5, 1874, in Santa Barbara, and was interred in the family sepulchre at the Mission Church. Personally he possessed a high sense of honor, great dignity of bearing, and a marked consideration for others. Courteous to all, his friends were many and his influence great.

ALFONSO L. DEN. This cattle raiser, dairyman and horticulturist was born in Santa Barbara county, at the Dos Pueblos (now the Naples) ranch, March 19, 1854. His father, Nicholas A. Den, was one of the very early settlers of California, having arrived in the western country in 1836. Alfonso received his education in California, and was graduated from Santa Clara College in 1875, with the degree of Bachelor of Science. Almost immediately he turned his attention to ranching and stock-raising, and became part owner of the Dos Pueblos ranch, which he built up and improved, and where he carried on extensive sheep and cattle enterprises. Originally the possessor of fifteen hundred acres of land, he has disposed of all save five hundred and fifty, which is located about twelve miles from Santa Barbara. Two hundred and sixty acres of his land are rented to the Oxnard Sugar Company. Ninety acres of the remainder are under English walnuts in a bearing condition, ten acres under bearing olive trees, and the balance is devoted to cattle raising and a dairy. For the dairy Jersey cows alone are raised, and the place is called Glen Anne, because located in the glen of that name. Although possessing a fine country home, Mr. Den is at present a resident of Santa Barbara. He is a Democrat in politics, has been a school trustee for some years, and is ex-member of the central committee.

The marriage of Mr. Den and Annie Taylor was solemnized in Santa Barbara in 1900, Mrs. Den being a native of Santa Barbara, and a daughter of Alexander S. Taylor, formerly a newspaper and general literary man.

ROBERT MACKINLAY, M. D., who is engaged in the practice of medicine at Santa Barbara, has been a resident of this city since the fall of 1893. A descendant of an old Scotch family, he was born in Edinburgh June 10, 1861, and was the oldest son of John and Sybella (Grieve) Mackinlay, natives of Edinburgh, where the former has long been connected with manufacturing interests.

After having been primarily educated in private schools, Robert Mackinlay matriculated in the University of Edinburgh in 1878, and continued his studies in that institution until 1882, when he graduated with the degree of M. B. Five years afterward his alma mater conferred upon him the degree of M. D. Immediately after graduating he opened an office in Manchester, England, and there gained his first practical experience in professional work. Two years later he removed to Litchfield, England, where he carried on a general practice until 1893, the year of his removal to Santa Barbara. His entire time is devoted to the practice of medicine and surgery, and in both he keeps abreast with the latest discoveries and developments. At one time he acted as secretary of the Santa Barbara County Medical Society and he still is connected with the same. He has his office on State street, opposite the Arlington hotel.

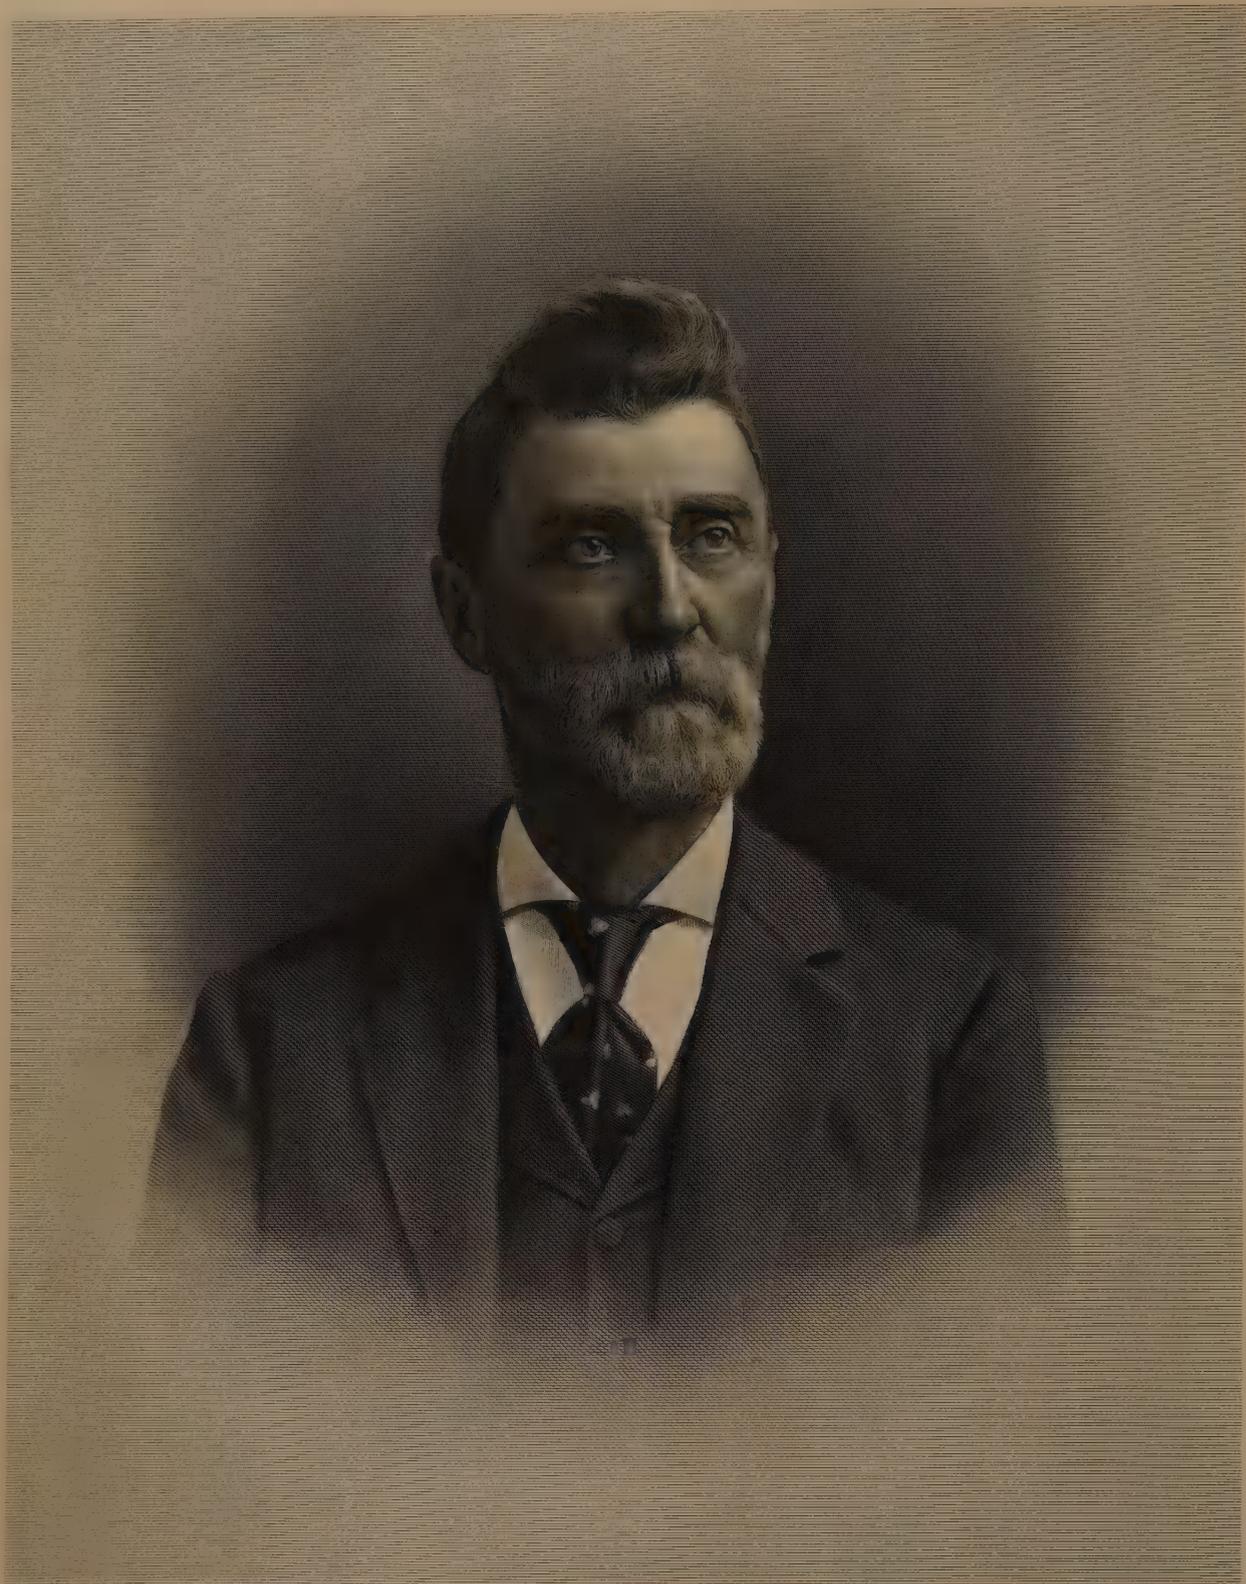

During his residence in England, Dr. Mackinlay was united in marriage, in Lincolnshire, with Miss Marian Trevor Bradburne, who was born in Plymouth, England, and who, like himself, was reared in the faith of the Church of England. They are the parents of three children, John, Lucia and Anna.

PAUL DE LONGPRE. Throughout the United States there are few names that carry with them such magic in artistic circles as the name of Paul de Longpré. Often called Roi des Fleurs, he is indeed the "King of the Flowers" in the realm of art, and his paintings of floral beauties have won admiration from noted connoisseurs of America and Europe. In his studio, and in galleries where his creations are exhibited, they are often greeted with the exclamation, "Could Paradise contain anything more lovely?" From one painting to another the visitor passes in wonderment and admiration, noting the fact that even the smallest studies are treated with an artistic sympathy revealing the depth of feeling that the artist possesses. The assertion of another artist, "He is not a painter; he's a botanist," shows the universal recognition among professionals of his accurate delineation of flower life. Being wholly self-taught, he owes nothing to other masters, but has allowed ample scope to the development of his own original and novel ideas in art. Bonnat, Bouguereau and Gérôme, when consulted with reference to his work, declared in writing "The compositions in flowers, by Paul de Longpré, are above criticism and are known as a great success. One cannot praise them too highly."

In Lyons, France, Paul de Longpré was born in 1855. His mother was a Creole, born on the island of Martinique, a beautiful young girl of fortune, accomplished, and with much charm of manner. After her marriage to Victor de Longpré she made her home in France, but her husband's artistic abilities, though of an high order, did not prove remunerative, and her income became exhausted. The eldest sons, when nineteen and seventeen years of age, went to Paris, where they earned a livelihood for the family by painting fans. The younger son, Paul, in time also became interested in the same work. He was ten years old when he began to paint. Artistic ability was his by inheritance. The stamp of genius was upon even his earliest productions. In 1876, when twenty-one years of age, his first picture was accepted by the Paris Salon. From that time onward his career was one of success. The sale of his pictures brought him a small fortune, which, unfortunately, was entirely swept away through the failure of a bank in Paris, and at the time of coming to New York City in 1890 to begin a fortune again, he had only $900 left. Being a stranger in America, he saw his little capital dwindle down to $400, and still prospects were gloomy. It was at that time he had the courage to expend or invest every dollar that he had in the painting of flowers for an exposition of flower paintings, the first of its kind ever made anywhere. Securing the finest gallery there, he started the exhibition. All his acquaintances had predicted a failure, but the venture proved the turning point in his career. Amateurs of art and all the press were delighted with his work. Sales were rapid and frequent, and his exhibitions afterward became annual affairs that brought together the aristocracy of New York as critics and purchasers.

From the time of his first exhibition in 1896 until 1899 Mr. de Longpré was one of New York's most notable artists. During this time he often heard of California, and particularly of its wealth of flowers. Desiring to become acquainted with the flora of the Pacific coast, he came to California in March, 1899, and for two years rented a residence on Figueroa street, Los Angeles, where, in the midst of beautiful surroundings, he was afforded exceptional opportunities of painting from nature. In June, 1900, he began to build on the property which he purchased from ex-Governor Beveridge on Prospect avenue, Hollywood, near Los Angeles, and since then he has given much time and thought to the creation of a homestead which it is his ambition to make the most artistically beautiful in California. There are many who believe that his ambition has already been realized. Certain it is that Hollywood is unique among the homesteads on the coast. Designed from original plans of his own; with interior finishings that are unique and tasteful, including hardwood floors with inlaid borders in every room; with a studio fitted up with rare works of art and art treasures; with furniture made from original designs, including cabinet, stands, screens, tables, etc., manufactured of black cherry; and portieres that were selected after thousands had been examined, in order that the desired harmony in color might be maintained; with these many other attractions, the residence is one never to be forgotten by those who have the good fortune to be entertained by the genial host. Here he and his wife, with their two daughters, have their home. In the east, he has annual exhibitions in various cities. Every winter his work is displayed first in the American Art Galleries in Madison Square or at Knoedler's, in Fifth avenue, New York. At a recent exhibition in that city twenty-eight paintings were sold for nearly $7,000. In every city where his work has been displayed the press and the best art critics have been unstinted in their praise of his skill. He is recognized as the great American master of the flowers. His knowledge of their form and structure is absolute and his taste in combination is unsurpassed. On the walls of his studio there is not a picture which will not repay careful study and fascinate by the skill with which the artist has performed his task. They are works of high art in their play of light and shade, in the taste with which the accessories are introduced and treated, in their harmony of tone and their breadth of style. A mere glimpse at his pictures proves him to possess a genuine love for flowers, and it is his belief that they have refining influences; that all children should be reared in an atmosphere where flowers dwell, and that pictures of flowers should be hung on the walls of nurseries, where they will claim the attention of the children.

John, F. Moore.

JOHN F. MORE. The More family is well known in Southern California, and its various members are entitled to conspicuous places in the history of the regions where they became extensive land owners and prominent promoters of enterprise in the early days. John F. More was born in Medina county, Ohio, August 19, 1839, and is the only surviving male member of a family of twelve children, six sons and six daughters, all of whom in time came to California. A. B., the oldest son, settled in this state in 1847, coming from Mexico, where he had helped to prosecute the war. T. W. and A. P. came west in 1849, and Henry H., in 1850, and they established the firm of More Brothers, who began business by driving cattle to the mines, but eventually became owners of large tracts of land. In 1854 they bought the Calletano or Sespe tract and later the Santa Paula-Saticoy. At one time they owned a strip of land extending from within a mile of the sea up the Santa Clara valley for more than thirty-two miles; fifteen thousand acres of this tract they afterward sold to G. G. Briggs. It was in this valley that T. Wallace More was assassinated on the memorable night of March 24, 1877, by masked men who first set fire to his barn in order to get him out of his house, and then shot him as soon as he appeared. Mortally wounded, he entreated that they shoot no more, but his dying request was for naught, and they continued to pierce him with bullets in order to make sure of their deadly work. A. P. More died in 1893 and at that time was the owner of the island of Santa Rosa. Of the brothers, A. P., H. H. and A. B. are buried in Oakland, Cal., and L. W. and T. W. in Santa Barbara.

The youngest of these brothers was John F. More. He received his education in Ohio and there married Miriam Hickox, daughter of Royal N. Hickox, of that state. Born of their union are three children now living, namely: Belle, wife of C. P. Austin; Miriam and John F., Jr., the latter a student in the University of California at Berkeley. Three children are deceased: Olive, who died in infancy; Mary, who graduated with the class honors from Mills Seminary and died in young womanhood; and Alexander H., who died when a young man. Mr. and Mrs. Hickox reside with their daughter, Mrs. More, at No. 131 Arrellaga street, Santa Barbara, where the family have a pleasant and comfortable home.

The ranch belonging to Mr. More is situated five miles from Santa Barbara, on the sea coast, and covers one thousand acres of land that slopes toward the mountains. The ocean bank is one hundred feet high and of solid rich clay, where are found large pockets of asphaltum containing many thousand tons. This is easy to mine, for when blasted on the beach the tide carries away the loose clay, leaving the mineral free. To facilitate the shipment of produce Mr. More has a private pier. His walnut orchard covers two hundred acres and is without doubt one of the largest in Southern California. There is also a large olive orchard. Modern improvements are everywhere apparent, including a substantial ranch house and commodious barns. The house is occupied by the men employed in carrying on the work of the ranch, and Mr. More himself stays there when the busy season requires his absence from his Santa Barbara home.

Off the coast of Goleta, the little village near the More ranch, is the speed ground for the United States gunboats, chosen especially because of the enormous quantities of oil floating on the water and thus producing a calm sea. Three towers are built for the starting gauge, one of which is on Mr. More's ranch, and the others on the site of the Santa Barbara mountains. The bay west from the ranch was once quite a harbor, and a large shipping industry was conducted, the same receiving its name from Daniel Hill, to whom Governor Pio Pico granted four thousand four hundred and forty acres of land. Mr. Hill built a schooner and launched it before the present little town, and hence the name Goleta, or schooner.

Politically Mr. More is affiliated with the Republican party. All of his brothers had similar political views, with the exception of the oldest, A. B., whom the others declared took a Jeffersonian Democratic view of politics merely for the sake of argument with the brothers.

HUGH D. VAIL. The name of Hugh D. Vail will ever be associated with the history of Santa Barbara. By nature and training a lover of science, he delighted in fathoming its unchanging laws, and in leaning upon its fundamental principles. The simplicity of his faith as a Quaker recognized no irreconcilable antagonisms between religion and science, and therefore the immutable laws of nature were intensified and strengthened by the element of the unknowable, which is after all the shadowy road beyond scientific calculation.

The Quaker instinct was deep seated, and extended beyond one John Vail, the American founder of the family, a Quaker preacher, who emigrated from England and settled in New Jersey about 1710. His descendants have invariably been people of influence and position in their respective localities, and Hugh D. upheld the traditions of his forefathers. He was born in Plainfield, N. J., and received a thorough literary and scientific education, graduating from Haverford College. The greater part of his life was spent in Philadelphia, where he was engaged in active business until his retirement in 1875. In 1881 he located in Santa Barbara, and thenceforward, until his death, June 28, 1900, he was prominently identified with the city's growth and achievements. He was director and vice-president of the First National Bank, was a director in the Commercial Bank of Santa Barbara, and was president of the Library Building Company, which organization owned considerable business property on State street, including what is commonly known as the Clock building. He was a strong and uncompromising Republican, and possessed a stirring and contagious vitality which extended to many lines of activity. He erected a residence on Chapala street, and here his last days were spent in the enjoyment of that esteem which his character and achievements merited. As pertaining to astronomy and meteorology he was widely quoted as an authority, on weather reports especially his accuracy was rarely questioned, and his services in this capacity were of untold value to the cities which profited by his residence. He married Miriam L. Vail, a native of Rahway, N. J., and they became the parents of two children, Hugh F. R. and Edward F. R. Vail.

HON. P. M. GREEN. It would be impossible to write a history of Pasadena without making frequent mention of Hon. P. M. Green, to whom in no small degree is due the credit for the fame of the city as one of the most beautiful residence cities in the world. His connection with its history extends back to the days of the Indiana colony, ere yet a city had been dreamed of or its possibilities for culture become a vision in the minds of the most sanguine. As early as 1873 he was among the twenty who organized the Orange Grove Association and incorporated the same, acquiring the right of title to fifteen hundred acres, which was subdivided into homesteads of from fifteen to sixty acres. The following year the preliminary survey was completed. Meantime a few members of the Indiana colony had come west to investigate for themselves and Mr. Green among others discerned the possibilities that lay dormant in the soil, awaiting the hand of the skillful horticulturist to develop them. With him to see an opportunity was to grasp it, and his early identification with Pasadena is but another indication of the wisdom of his judgment and the keenness of his foresight.

The Green family is of old Quaker stock, although, notwithstanding this, it was represented in the Revolutionary war by men who, though peace-loving as are the Friends, were yet too independent to brook tyranny. North Carolina was the early home of the family, whence they removed to Kentucky, and in that state Lot Green was born and reared. Removing to Rush county, Ind., he became justice of the peace and the leading man of his community, but died in 1845 before he had provided his family with the comforts it was his ambition to secure for them. He was a Whig in politics and in religion was connected with the Missionary Baptist Church. His wife, Annie Cooper, was born, reared and married in Kentucky, where her father was a Baptist minister. She died in 1842, when her son, Perry M., was scarcely four years of age. Of her eight children only three are living, and two of these are in Pasadena, Perry M. and Mrs. A. O. Porter. The former was born in Rush county, Ind., May 7, 1838, and was next to the youngest in the family. Orphaned when very young, he never knew the affection and careful oversight of father and mother, and his was a somewhat lonely boyhood. When fourteen he began to clerk in a store, but the work being uncongenial, he went on a farm as a hired hand, receiving $7 a month. After a time he resumed clerking, and then attended the Richland Academy in Rush county. When nineteen he began to study law with Davis & Wright of Shelbyville, and in 1859 was admitted to the bar of Indiana, after which he engaged in practice at Shelbyville for five years. During this period he assisted in organizing the city government, served as the first city clerk, and for four years acted as city attorney. However, believing that a larger city would offer more encouraging opportunities for advancement in the world of commerce, in 1865 he removed to Indianapolis, where he became a member of the firm of Campbell & Green, wholesale and retail manufacturers and dealers in drugs. On disposing of his interest in this business in 1873, he came to California, his decision to come west being influenced by the hope that a mild climate might benefit his wife's health.

Acquiring property in the Indiana colony, Mr. Green became the owner of sixty acres two miles south of Pasadena, and here his early knowledge of horticulture was gained. However, to a man of such keen mental faculties, the management of a fruit farm did not present a sufficient outlet for his activities, and we find him acquiring many other interests as the years passed by. In 1885 he organized the Pasadena Bank, with a capital stock of $50,000, of which he became president and manager. In May of 1886 this institution was converted into a national concern, and incorporated as the First National Bank of Pasadena, capital stock $100,000, with a present (1902) surplus of $70,000. It is significant of the wise supervision of the president that the institution has always paid ten per cent dividends annually. In 1901 a savings department was also organized, under the title of the Pasadena Savings, Trust & Safe Deposit Company, with a capital stock of $50,000. Of this institution Mr. Green is also president.

From the early period of his residence in Pasadena, Mr. Green has been associated with companies for the securing of water and has been interested in every movement for the providing of adequate irrigation facilities. For twenty-five years he has been a director of the Pasadena Land and Water Company, which was the first of the kind organized in this vicinity and which also established the first system in the state whereby water was conveyed by pipes for irrigating purposes. The efforts of the company provided an abundance of water for the Indiana colony tract on the west side. The first gas company organized here had Mr. Green among its directors and promoters, and he was also a director of the first street car company in this city. Under his supervision the bank erected a large building on the corner of Fair Oaks avenue and Colorado street, which was equipped with modern conveniences for the convenience of the bank officials. On the organization of the Los Angeles National Bank Mr. Green was placed on its board of directors and he is also its vice-president.

In Shelbyville, Ind., October 30, 1860, Mr. Green married Miss Henrietta Campbell, whose father, John S. Campbell, was born in Delaware, reared in Philadelphia, Pa., and became a pioneer of Indiana. During the presidency of Abraham Lincoln he served as postmaster of Shelbyville. Other offices were tendered him, including those of mayor and recorder of deeds. Mr. and Mrs. Green have one child, Mary. On the organization of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Pasadena in 1873, Mr. and Mrs. Green became charter members, and from that time until 1901 he held the office of trustee, finally, however, declining further re-election. Another agency for good, the Y. M. C. A., has always received his encouraging aid and sympathy, and his service as a director of the local organization has been helpful to the cause. He has been a constant member of the Pasadena Board of Trade and a warm adherent of all organizations and movements for the commercial upbuilding of Southern California. While he has never been an active partisan, his advocacy of Republican principles is pronounced. On that ticket, in 1879, he was elected to the state legislature as a representative from Los Angeles county. The present constitution was adopted during the same year, and the legislature of 1880 therefore had a very serious task set before it, in the adaptation of the laws to the constitution. At that session he introduced a bill for the establishment of a state normal at Los Angeles, and, though failing of passage then, he had the satisfaction of knowing that it was carried during the next session. On the expiration of his term he was not a candidate for re-election, but resumed the duties of private life. While, however, his ambitions are not in the direction of public affairs, yet he is in every respect a progressive citizen, who keeps in touch with the developments of the age, whether in the banking business, in commercial circles, in problems connected with adequate irrigation at reasonable cost and in the other varied movements typical of twentieth century activity in Southern California.

J. H. BARTLE. The First National Bank, of which J. H. Bartle is president, was established in 1887 under the title of the Bank of Monrovia and as a private financial institution, the incorporators being J. F. Brossart, John Wild and J. F. Sartori. Occupying for a short time temporary banking quarters, the proprietors of the bank vigorously pushed forward the work of building a structure adapted for their needs. Of ample dimensions, 50x60 feet, the block is of brick, and contains headquarters for customers and clerks and a room for the directors in the rear. One of the most striking features of the equipment is a fireproof vault, built into the bank from the foundation of the building, and provided with a time lock safe. When the building was ready for occupancy, in July of 1887, the newly organized First National Bank (into which the Bank of Monrovia had been merged) was established and has since occupied these quarters. The original officers were J. F. Brossart, president; John Wild, vice-president; and J. F. Sartori, cashier. A change was made in the presidency January 10, 1888, when L. W. Hellman was called to be head of the institution, and at the same time G. W. Perkins became vice-president.

The association of Mr. Bartle with the bank dates from April 13, 1888, when he was appointed assistant cashier, and as such he continued until January 24, 1891, when his satisfactory services were recognized by his promotion to be cashier. The position which he had previously filled was tendered to W. A. Chess, October 1, 1892. Those who have had official direction of the bank since February 27, 1894, are J. H. Bartle, president; J. F. Sartori, vice-president; and W. A. Chess, cashier, while since 1901 K. E. Lawrence has served in the capacity of assistant cashier. Business is still conducted with the same paid-in capital as at first, this being $50,000, but there is now also a surplus of $10,000. The present board of directors is composed of such solid financial men as H. W. Hellman, vice-president of the Farmers and Merchants Bank of Los Angeles; T. L. Duque, president of the Main Street Savings Bank; J. F. Sartori, president of the Security Savings Bank; J. H. Bartle, president of the bank, and C. K. Ingersoll, of Monrovia, whose efforts, seconding the judicious management of the officers, have contributed to the establishment of the concern upon a solid basis gratifying to its stockholders and the source of great confidence to its depositors. That portion of the ground floor not utilized for banking purposes has been fitted up as a store and is rented as such, while the second floor is utilized for offices and apartments.

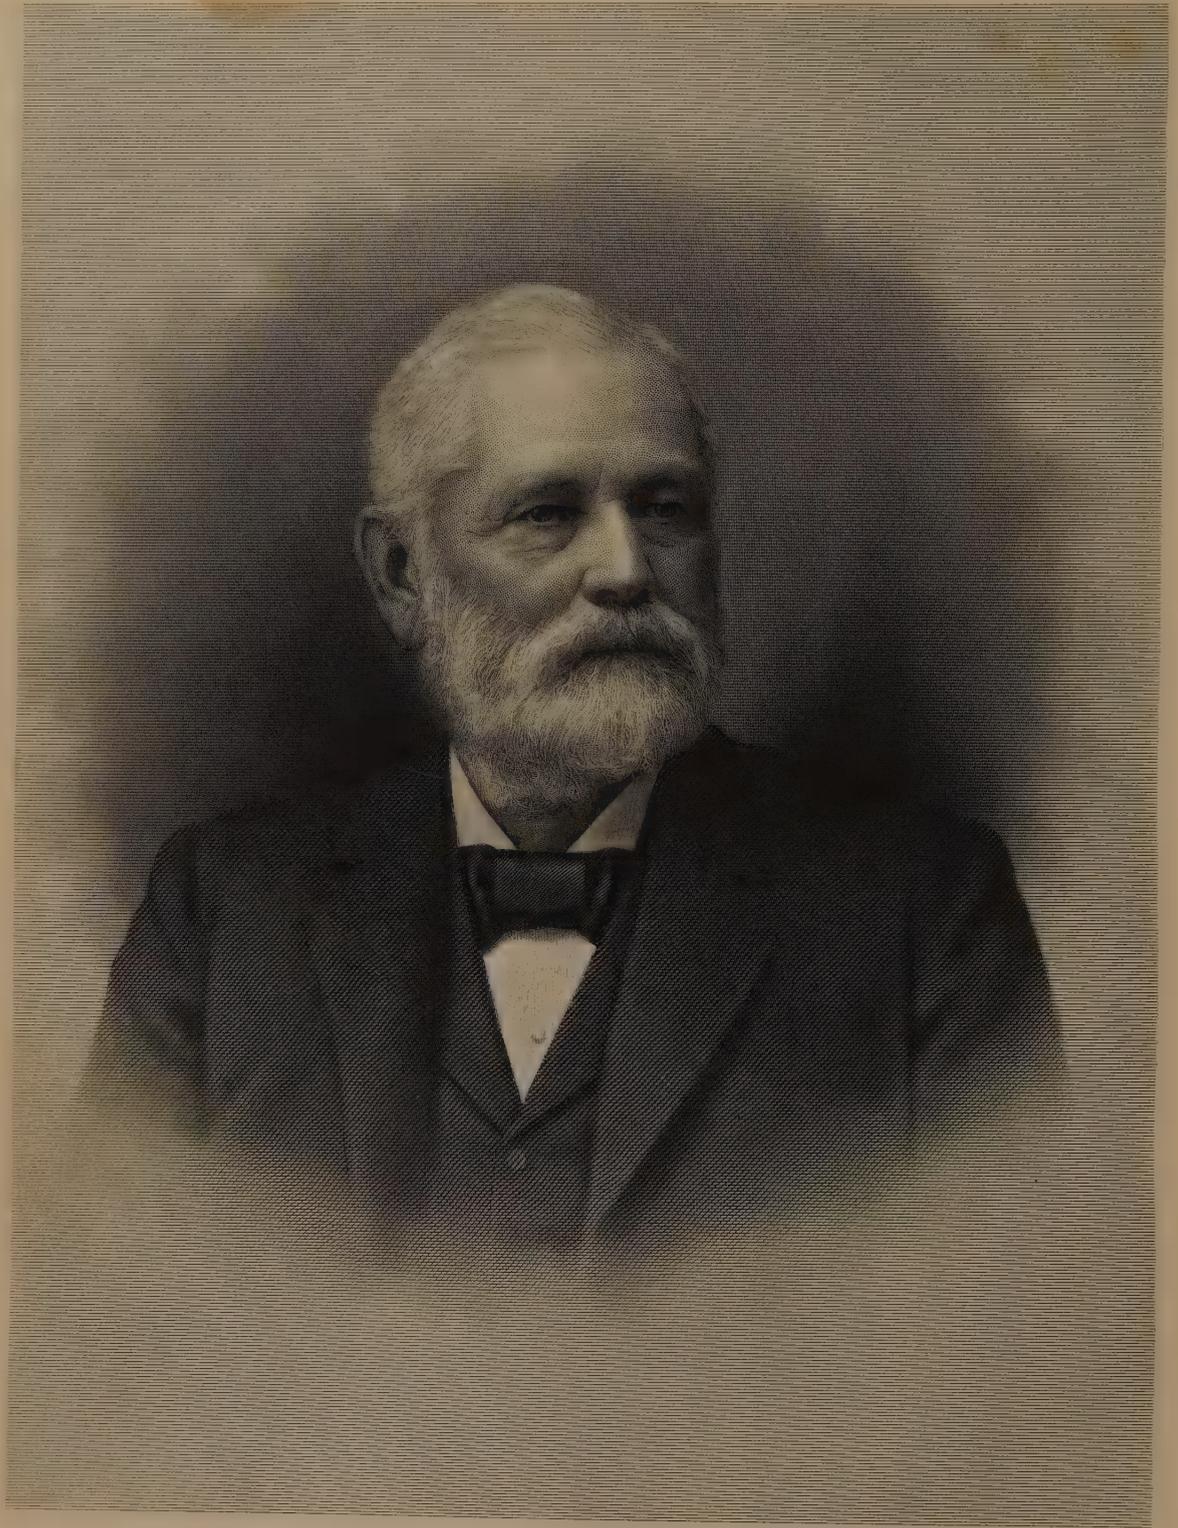

Mr. Bartle, to whose keen and capable oversight the success of the bank is due in large measure, is a native of Michigan, born in July of 1855. At an age when many boys are still in school, he started out to make his own way in the world, and by diligence and perseverance gained a thorough knowledge of mercantile pursuits. Opening a store of his own, he met with a success that was as gratifying as it was deserved, but, unfortunately, his health broke down under the strain of constant overwork. Realizing the need of change to a milder climate than Michigan affords, in 1885 he came to Southern California, where he visited many of the cities and towns. Among all these places he found none whose climate excelled that of Monrovia. Here it seemed as if Nature had especially favored her children and had granted them more blessings than she usually bestows upon mankind. The pure air from the mountains, warmed by the sunshine, encompassed the inhabitants with a constant benediction and seemed even to invigorate and fertilize the soil, so that fruits and flowers grow with remarkable luxuriance.

Disposing of his business interests in Michigan in 1886, the next year Mr. Bartle returned to Monrovia as a permanent resident and has since been among its most influential citizens. In 1890 he erected on Myrtle avenue a two-story frame building, with two stores and various offices. When fire destroyed this structure, in June of 1897, he immediately rebuilt, this time putting up a brick building, 40x80, with two stores and considerable office room. Other property in Monrovia he owns and has improved, including his residence, where in the intervals of business duties he finds relaxation and pleasure in the society of his wife (formerly Miss Amelia Bowerman of Canada) and their three children, Stanley, Kathleen and Gerald.

In religious views Mr. Bartle is liberal, adhering to no creed, but favoring all movements which tend toward the uplifting of humanity. The lofty principles of Masonry he exemplifies in his life, and has been an active member and treasurer of the lodge in Monrovia since its organization. Aside from his connection with banking interests in Monrovia, he has had similar interests elsewhere, particularly in Covina, Los Angeles county, where he aided in organizing and establishing the Covina Valley Bank, now known as the First National Bank of Covina, on whose board of directors he has rendered wise service from its inception.

GEORGE H. PECK, Jr. At the time of Mr. Peck's settlement in San Pedro there was little in the appearance of the locality to give rise to large hopes for its future prosperity. The town, indeed, had not yet sprung into existence, and most of the lots were platted and laid out under his personal supervision. No one has done more than he to promote the welfare of the place, and to aid in the development of its resources. Particularly has his assistance been noteworthy in the line of establishing local finances upon a substantial basis. Having interested capitalists in the establishment of a bank at San Pedro, soon after his arrival he opened what is still known as the Bank of San Pedro, of which he has since been manager and vice-president, William G. Kerckhoff being the president. The original capital stock, $25,000, has been doubled, which fact indicates the steady and gratifying growth of the bank.

Thomas H. Stinson

Mr. Peck was born in San Francisco, October 5, 1856, and is a son of George H. Peck, Sr., to whose sketch upon another page the reader is referred for the family history. Until twelve years of age George H., Jr., lived in San Francisco, and then accompanied the family to the large ranch which his father had purchased near El Monte. There he remained for eight years, meantime receiving a common-school education. When twenty years of age he secured employment as baggageman on the Southern Pacific Railroad, his run being between Los Angeles and Wilmington, and later he was promoted to be a conductor on the same run. While working for the railroad company, he invested his earnings in real estate, and thus reaped fair profits. On resigning his position he settled in San Pedro, where he has since made his home. In 1888 he was appointed vice-consul of Sweden and Norway in the district of Southern California, which position he has held ever since. A study of the needs of the state has made him a pronounced advocate of a high protective tariff, through which alone can the far west compete with European shipments; hence, even to a greater degree than many Republicans, he champions this plank of the party platform. In fraternal relations he is connected with the Knights of Pythias. By his marriage to Miss Olive Betts he has four children, William, Rena, Alma and Leland. The family are identified with the Episcopal Church.

With no measure is the name of Mr. Peck more closely associated than with the opening up of North Manhattan Beach in Los Angeles county. In 1901 he purchased one thousand acres, affording three miles of beach frontage, and here he is laying out a summer resort, the lots in which are finding a ready sale at from $200 to $500 each. The beach lies fifteen miles from Los Angeles and five miles north of Redondo. It is protected by Point Vicente on the south, Point Oume on the north, and Catalina island on the west. The beauty of the location is unsurpassed, and the curving of the beach in a circular form makes it one of the most attractive beaches on the coast. At present it is reached by the Santa Fe Railroad, and soon an electric line will be built, furnishing another mode of transportation. Deeds are so drawn that no liquor will ever be permitted to be sold on the grounds, and a building restriction insures a desirable class of cottages. Without doubt, in time North Manhattan will come to be known as one of the most popular resorts on the coast, and its present prospects and future prosperity may be attributed to the energy, wise judgment and determination of its founder.

THOMAS D. STIMSON. The impetus given by Mr. Stimson toward the permanent progress of Los Angeles can scarcely be overestimated. Coming to this city from the east shortly after the collapse of the "boom," he found every industry at a standstill, while capitalists held back, fearing to invest means where prospects were so gloomy and uncertain. It was then that his firm faith in the future of Los Angeles asserted itself. With an optimism born of a far-seeing judgment, he gave himself to the development of local resources, furnished employment to many workmen, erected buildings of a most substantial character, and made improvements of permanent value to the city. Immediately after his arrival, in 1890, he purchased property and laid the plans that resulted, in 1893, in the erection of the Stimson block, which was far in advance of anything that had been erected up to that time. Later he built the Muskegon, on Broadway and Third; the Allen Flats, on Spring and Seventh; the Spencer, on Third, between Broadway and Hill; and he had just completed the plans for the Douglas block at the time of his death, which occurred January 31, 1898. Subsequently the estate erected the building, carrying out his plans, with the exception that the height was five instead of eight stories. The finishings of his block are as fine as can be found in the entire city, nor is there any that is lighter or more pleasant in every respect. Besides his interest in building these various blocks, he officiated as president of the Columbia Savings Bank and as a director in the Citizens Bank of Los Angeles, and was actively connected with the Chamber of Commerce.

The only son of Horace and Olive (Johnson) Stimson, natives of New York, Thomas D. Stimson was born in Ontario, Canada, July 31, 1828, and was reared principally in New York state, where his father was a manufacturer. Later the family settled in Albion, Mich., where the father was similarly engaged. When a mere boy, the son began to earn his livelihood, and was employed in helping to push boats up the Paw Paw river. In 1847 he went to Chicago, intending to enlist in the Mexican war, but at the time he tendered his services the required quota had been filled. He then hired under Mr. Ryerson, of Chicago, to work in a lumber mill in Muskegon, Mich., but being of an independent and ambitious disposition, he was not satisfied to remain in the employ of another. With D. A. Blodgett, also a young man, he embarked in lumbering, first getting out the logs and then investing in pine lands. He erected the first mill at Big Rapids, Mich. Three years later he moved the mill to Muskegon, and afterward built another mill, carrying on both of these for years. Success seemed to be his from the first. The energy and determination that he possessed, combined with wise judgment, turned Fortune's wheels in his favor, and his career thenceforward was one of uninterrupted success. It is not, however, to be inferred that he had no obstacles to surmount, no difficulties to overcome; but his resolution and courage enabled him to meet and conquer them. To facilitate his work he built several railroads from his pine lands to rivers and also acquired the ownership of several boats, and until 1890 he had a wholesale yard in Chicago. Some time during the '80s he invested in pine lands in Washington and established his sons there; starting them in the manufacture of lumber, under the firm title of the Stimson Mill Company and the Stimson Land Company. This business has been continued to the present and is one of the largest of its kind on the coast. Notwithstanding his varied interests of a business nature, he kept thoroughly posted in politics and was closely associated with the Democratic party in Michigan. Twice he was delegate-at-large from that state to national conventions, once in Cincinnati and at another time in St. Louis. He was connected with the Masonic fraternity and a believer in its work and creed.

In Grand Rapids, Mich., Mr. Stimson married Miss Achsah J. Spencer, who was born in Clyde, N. Y., a daughter of Laban and Melinda (Richmond) Spencer, natives respectively of New York and Massachusetts. Her paternal grandfather was born in Wales, of English descent, and for years was a manufacturer in New York. At an early day her father settled upon a farm near Pontiac, Mich., and in addition to improving the land followed the shoemaker's trade and manufactured cooper's supplies. Later he was interested in lumbering in the pine lands. His wife accompanied her parents, John and Chloe (McClough) Richmond, from Massachusetts to New York, later to Michigan. The Richmond and McClough families were old settlers of Massachusetts (the latter having had its first emigrant come in the Mayflower), and both were represented in the Revolutionary war. After the death of Mr. Spencer his widow came to Los Angeles and spent her last days with her daughter, Mrs. Stimson, in whose home she died, February 17, 1901, aged almost eighty-nine years. Of her six children all but one are still living, one daughter, Mary E., residing with Mrs. Stimson, while two sons, John and James, reside in Los Angeles, and a third son, Alvah, continues to make his home in Oakland county, Mich. Several times before removing to Los Angeles, Mrs. Stimson had come here from the east and each time the favorable impression was deepened, so that finally, when Mr. Stimson retired from the lumbering business, he came here to spend the twilight of his life. In 1891 he erected a palatial brown stone mansion, which is considered architecturally one of the most beautiful homes of Los Angeles, and here, surrounded by every comfort, Mrs. Stimson continues to reside. In her family there are six children, of whom Willard H., Charles D. and Ezra T. are the executors of the estate; Willard H. and Ezra T. reside in Los Angeles and have large and important interests in the Stimson Land Company and the Stimson Mill Company. The only daughter, Mrs. Olive J. Fay, resides in Los Angeles. Charles D. is president of the Stimson Mill Company at Seattle, Wash., and Fred S. is also in that city and connected with the same company. J. D. Stimson died in San Francisco November 19, 1900.

UNIVERSITY OF
SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA.

A distinction credited to the University of Southern California is that it is the oldest Protestant educational institution in this part of the state. The project, which originated in the brain of Judge R. M. Widney, developed under consultation with such eminent authorities as Rev. A. M. Hough, E. F. Spence, Dr. J. P. Widney, Rev. M. M. Bovard, and G. D. Compton, and it was decided to build a Methodist college or university in or near Los Angeles. Offers of land were received from Los Angeles, Boyle Heights, Temple street and West Los Angeles, but a majority of the trustees decided in favor of West Los Angeles. The first important step in the transaction was accomplished July 29, 1879, when J. G. Downey, O. W. Childs and I. W. Hellman deeded to A. M. Hough, J. P. Widney, E. F. Spence, M. M. Bovard, G. D. Compton and R. W. Widney, three hundred and eight lots in the West Los Angeles tract, in trust as an endowment fund for the University of Southern California. Also, about forty acres of land was donated by owners of adjacent property, and in 1880 thirty of the lots were placed on sale. Although their market value did not exceed $50, friends of the institution willingly gave $200 each.

At the time of selection, the site for the college buildings and campus on Wesley avenue, near Jefferson street, was covered with tall wild mustard stalks, and streets were undefined save by stakes. The general aspect was dreary and unpromising, an impression intensified by the utter absence of houses or any signs of activity. The present music hall of the university was the first building made possible by the sale of the lots, and in August, 1880, the purpose of the institution was further demonstrated, when Revs. M. M. and F. D. Bovard entered into a contract with the trustees to carry on the educational work for five years. Rev. M. M. Bovard was elected president, and a small endowment was secured for the embryo institution from the sale of lots and by private donations. The present four-story college building was erected in 1886, and under the competent corps of teachers, and the enthusiasm and help of the trustees, the scope of the institution was perceptibly broadened.

In 1882 Messrs. George and William B. Chaffey, the founders of the Ontario Colony, made a tender of a deed of trust to a large body of land for a Chaffey college of agriculture in connection with the university. In March, 1882, the corner stone of a brick college building was laid at Ontario, San Bernardino county, and in 1887 the school was thrown open to the public as a branch of the University of Southern California, and has ever since been conducted as a preparatory school.

The College of Medicine which comprises an important and popular department of the university was founded in 1885 by Dr. J. P. Widney, and the school started in a building on Alison street, but eventually removed to the building of its own on the west side of Buena Vista. The architectural scheme of the building is appropriate to its needs. The opportunities offered, and the high standard maintained, fully justify a reputation by no means local in its extent.

The Maclay College of Theology, also established in 1885, was first located in San Fernando. Credit for this department of the university is almost entirely vested in Hon. Charles Maclay, who not only donated land valued at $150,000, but erected the building in which the infant school started upon its career of usefulness. However, the school was closed at San Fernando in 1893, and opened at the University of West Los Angeles in October, 1894.

Following is a list of the heads of the institution from the founding: Rev. M. M. Bovard, D. D.; Rev. W. S. Matthew, D. D.; Rev. F. M. Cherington, D. D.; Joseph P. Widney, M. D., LL. D.; Milton E. Phillips, A. M.; Rev. G. W. White, D. D.; Rev. George Cochran, D. D.; William Trafton Randall, A. M.

The University now comprises the colleges of Liberal, Medicine, Dentistry, Law, Theology, Music, and Fine Arts. The faculty numbers ninety in all and there are over six hundred students. Since the inauguration of Dean Randall, under the leadership of Bishop Hamilton and by the efficient work of Field Secretary Rev. T. C. Miller, over a quarter of a million dollars has been raised for additional endowment.

WILLIAM TRAFTON RANDALL, A.M., Dean of the University of Southern California, is a direct descendant in the third generation, of Benjamin Randall, founder of the Free-Will Baptist denomination. He was born in Maine and is a son of Rev. D. B. Randall, D.D., and Emily (Trafton) Randall. His father, a native of Vermont, joined the Maine conference when eighteen years of age and afterward filled all the leading appointments, being presiding elder several times, and serving four terms in the general conference. For many years he was chaplain of the state legislature. Both the abolition and the temperance movements received his hearty support. At the time of his death, which occurred in 1900 in his ninety-third year, he was the oldest Methodist Episcopal clergyman in America.

The education of William T. Randall was acquired in the Maine Wesleyan Seminary and the Wesleyan University in Connecticut. During his junior year he was editor-in-chief of the university publication, and in his senior year was the university orator and graduated with honors. Taking up educational work he was engaged as teacher in district schools, then as principal of high schools and superintendent of schools, after which he became dean of Chaffey College, and in June of 1901 came to Los Angeles as dean of the University of Southern California. In 1884 he married Louise A. Woodruff, daughter of James and Clara Woodruff, and a native of New Britain, Conn. They are the parents of two children, Louise Marguerite and Wilbur Walter.

Among the organizations with which Dean Randall is identified may be mentioned the Delta Kappa Epsilon fraternity and the Phi Beta Kappa scholarship fraternity. In religion he is connected with the Methodist Episcopal church, and in 1896 represented Southern California in the general conference of the denomination at Cleveland, Ohio. As president of the Republican Club he was enabled to promote the welfare of that party in his community. Among the other important local capacities in which he has officiated are the offices of president of the city board of trustees of Ontario, Cal., and president of the Board of Trade.

F. M. SALE. The various industries which give Moneta a place among the growing colonies of Southern California have an enterprising representative in Mr. Sale, who has made his home in this state since 1894. He was born in Niagara county, N. Y., June 22, 1871, and is a son of Frank and Catherine (Wilson) Sale, natives respectively of London, England, and Syracuse, N. Y. Crossing the ocean to America in 1857, Frank Sale settled near Lockport, N. Y., and engaged in farming upon land which he purchased there. Since then agriculture has been his life work, and in the locality where so many years of his life have been passed he is known and honored as a man of upright life and progressive spirit. Of his three children the subject of this article was second in order of birth, and was given fair advantages in the schools of Lockport, after which he engaged in farming.

On his arrival in California, in 1894, Mr. Sale leased a tract of land at Gardena, and set out thirteen acres in strawberries, which soon became a source of gratifying profit to him. Somewhat later he bought four lots in Moneta, and here he has erected a commodious and attractive residence. He also leases eighty acres which he has in barley, and five acres, which are planted to strawberries and Logan berries. Since attaining his majority he has voted with the Republican party and supports with earnestness the principles it represents. He is a member of the Fraternal Brotherhood, also of the Independent Order of Foresters and the Ancient Order of United Workmen.

In Gardena, Cal., Mr. Sale married Miss Mittie Young, who was born in Michigan, and by whom he has one son, Ashley. Mrs. Sale is a daughter of A. S. Young, a native of New Jersey and a farmer by occupation, who, moving to Iowa, made his home in that state for fourteen years. From there he came to California, settling at Gardena, where he bought a farm of forty acres. On disposing of that property he returned to New Jersey, and from there removed to Illinois, settling in Fairfield, Wayne county, where he now owns and cultivates a farm of two hundred acres.

ALEXANDER FRASER MILLS. Although for many years a resident of California Mr. Mills is by birth a Canadian; was born at Richmond, seven miles from Ottawa, on the last day of the year 1849. His grandfather, John Mills, came from England as a soldier, and in the Barracks was born his first son, George, who still survives. The second son, John, the father of Mr. Mills, was born near Ottawa, and grew to manhood on a farm; then for some years engaged in woolen manufacture near Perth, after which he was a business man in Stirling, and next was connected with iron works and a large woolen factory at Marmora. The breaking away of a dam in 1869 caused a total loss of his property, but he rebuilt at once, and the mills are still running, though he retired many years since. His wife, Sarah, was a daughter of Alexander Fraser. Mr. Fraser was a Highlander from Scotland and came to America in 1812. He was an officer in the English army, his uniform and sword being still in the family. He married an English lady and settled on a farm near Perth in 1815. Sarah Mills was there born, and died in 1900. She is survived by three sons and five daughters. Two of the sons, Robert and John, are business men of San Francisco. Alexander Fraser Mills, who was the second son, received his education in the grammar and high schools of Stirling. In 1866 he helped to build a woolen factory, and in 1870 was made manager of it, but the following year the business was sold. In May, 1873, he came to California, and after a year in Santa Barbara settled in Los Angeles. Here he took a course of study in the Lawler Institute, graduating in the business course.

An excellent idea of the nursery business was gained by Mr. Mills while employed by Thomas A. Garey, who was then the largest nurseryman in California, and it was there that Mr. Mills gained a thorough knowledge of orange culture. Resigning his position in 1877 he came to Pasadena and embarked in the nursery business, in which he met with encouraging success from the first. With a keen foresight concerning future values, he bought seven and one-half acres on the corner of Colorado and Fair Oaks avenue, which were then but country roads. Of the land, three hundred feet were on Fair Oaks and ten hundred and eighty-nine on Colorado, running to Pasadena avenue. In 1878 he set out citrus and deciduous trees on the land. The next year he became superintendent for H. H. Hall's Perfumery ranch at Carpinteria, Santa Barbara county, but after a year resigned to devote himself to the nursery business. During early days he set out thousands of acres in vineyards and orange groves in Los Angeles county. In 1883 he platted the A. F. Mills subdivision opening up De Lacey street, which he named for his wife's family; a private driveway has since become known as Mills street. In 1886 he built the Mills block, with a frontage of fifty feet on Fair Oaks avenue, and he also erected the News block, 60x72, corner of Colorado and De Lacey streets. Since the age of twenty-one years he has been a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, of which, at times, he has been Sunday-school superintendent and a member of the board of trustees, and also has been identified with the Y. M. C. A. In politics he is a Republican and fraternally is connected with the Independent Order of Foresters.

At Santa Barbara, in 1879, occurred the marriage of A. F. Mills and Miss Cora Roberta Lacey, who was born in Oskaloosa, Iowa, and is a graduate of the Santa Barbara high school. She was second among four children, of whom her brother, Friend E. Lacey, is a resident of Pasadena and an attorney in Los Angeles. Her sisters, Theo and Mrs. Emma S. L. Shoup and a nephew, John M. Shoup, also reside in Pasadena. The family of which she is a member comes from the de Laceys of France and crossed from Normandy with William the Conqueror. Robert W., who was born in Cadiz, Ohio, was a son of John Mills de Lacey (the prefix "de" being retained until this generation). When a boy he learned the builder's trade. In 1849 he came via the Horn to San Francisco, where he engaged in mining. In 1852 he returned to the east by the isthmus, the next year was married, then spent eighteen months in Wheeling, W. Va., and in 1855 settled in Oskaloosa, Iowa, where he had many important contracts.

Andrew Cassell

The year 1872 found him bringing his family to San Francisco, and from there by boat to Santa Barbara, where he bought a home and engaged in building. In 1884 he came to Pasadena and bought five acres on Villa and Moline streets, also fifteen acres on Villa and North Moline, where he engaged in horticulture. On this place his death occurred August 26, 1893, since which the five-acre tract has been sold by his heirs, but the fifteen acres are still retained, with the exception of such portion as has been opened into streets. He was a Republican in politics, an active worker among the Odd Fellows, and for forty years a leading member of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

At Sistersville, W. Va., October 3, 1853, Robert W. Lacey married Miss Nancy Engle, who was born in Greensburg, Pa. Her father, Ezra, who was born December 13, 1790, was a son of Peter Engle, who was born in Ghent, Belgium, August 17, 1747. The latter's father, John P. Engle, a native of Saxony, brought his wife and family to America in 1749, settling in Frederick, Md. During the Revolutionary war Peter Engle was with General Washington and took part in the capture of the Hessians at Trenton, also spent the winter of 1777-78 at Valley Forge, where he suffered all the horrors of cold and hunger. He died in Greensburg, Pa., as did also his wife, Susanna (Bugh) Engle, who was born in Maryland in 1750. At Harper's Ferry Ezra Engle learned the gunsmith's trade, and later engaged in business at Greensburg, then at Sistersville. Such was the quality of his work that people came to him from miles away in order to purchase one of his guns. His death occurred when he was seventy-eight. His wife, Nancy, was born in Mapletown, Pa., and died at Sistersville, W. Va.; of their nine children four are living. She was a daughter of Jacob Black, a native of Greene county, Pa., and a first cousin of Jeremiah S. Black, the noted attorney of Pennsylvania; Jacob Black married Margaret Grindstaff, of Pennsylvania.

Among the pioneers of Pasadena none stands higher in the estimation and confidence of the people than does Mr. Mills, who by reason of his long residence in the same locality, his intimate knowledge of the development of Pasadena and his integrity, together with other fine qualities, combine to place him in the ranks of the city's most honored pioneers and respected citizens.

ANDREW GLASSELL, Sr. From the period of his arrival in California during the pioneer days of 1852 until his death, nearly fifty years later, Mr. Glassell was intimately associated with the profession of law in this state, with the exception only of the momentous days of the Civil war. His influence was apparent during the formulative period of the state, when men of powerful minds and strong wills were needed to place the commonwealth upon a substantial basis; nor were his achievements less commendable during those later years of progress and development which have rendered possible the high standing of California to-day.

Many of the qualities so noticeable in the life of Mr. Glassell were his by right of inheritance from Scotch ancestry. He was the fourth in direct succession to bear the name of Andrew Glassell, the first having been a worthy Scot whose son and namesake founded the family in Virginia. In a family of six children, whose parents were Andrew and Susan (Thornton) Glassell, the last survivor was Andrew, born in Virginia, at the ancestral home (known as Torthorwald) September 30, 1827. When seven years of age he was taken to Sumter county, Ala., where his father became a cotton planter near Livingston. At seventeen years of age he entered the University of Alabama, from which he was graduated in 1848. The study of law he began under the preceptorship of Hon. Samuel W. Inge, and on being admitted to the bar commenced a general professional practice, during which time he enjoyed the friendship of Hon. John A. Campbell, at one time a justice of the supreme court of the United States.

As before stated, it was in 1852 that Mr. Glassell cast in his fortunes with the new state of California. The recommendations which he brought from Judge Campbell not only secured his admission to the bar of the supreme court of this state, but also gave him at once a high rank among its lawyers, and he was soon appointed a deputy of the United States district attorney of California at San Francisco. His especial assignment was the trying of a large number of land cases, some of which were then pending before the United States land commission, appointed under act of Congress of March 3, 1851, to settle the titles to lands in this state. After three years in this position he resumed private practice in San Francisco and so continued until the war, when, on account of his southern sympathies rendering it impossible for him to take the test oath, he temporarily closed his office, and until after the termination of the war engaged in running a steam saw mill and manufacturing lumber and staves near Santa Cruz. With the close of the war he again took up professional labors, selecting Los Angeles as his future home and entering into partnership with Alfred B. Chapman, a friend of his boyhood and at one time an officer in the regular army. For a time the firm title was Glassell & Chapman, but the admission of Col. George H. Smith, January 1, 1870, caused a change of name to Glassell, Chapman & Smith; and for a short time Henry M. Smith, now deceased, and late judge of the superior court of Los Angeles county, was a member of the firm. In 1879 Mr. Chapman retired to engage in horticultural pursuits, and later George S. Patton, a nephew of Mr. Glassell, was admitted as a junior partner. This association continued until 1883, when Mr. Glassell retired, to enjoy in his declining years the leisure and comforts which he had so worthily won and merited.

During his residence in San Francisco Mr. Glassell married Lucy Toland, whose father, Dr. H. H. Toland, was the founder of the Toland Medical College, now the medical department of the California State University. Nine children were born of this union, namely: Susan G., wife of H. M. Mitchell, represented elsewhere in this work; Minnie G., Mrs. Harrington Brown, of Los Angeles; Hugh, who is manager and one of the executors of his father's estate; Andrew and William T., both of whom are represented on another page; Louise G., wife of Dr. J. DeBarth Shorb, of Los Angeles; Philip H. and Alfred L., of Los Angeles; and Lucien T., who died at nineteen years. Mrs. Lucy Glassell was born in South Carolina and was a mere child when brought to California, where her death occurred at thirty-nine years of age. In religion she was a faithful member of the Catholic Church. Six years after her death Mr. Glassell was again married, his second wife being Mrs. Virginia Micou Ring, of New Orleans, who died in Los Angeles in 1897. The death of Mr. Glassell occurred at his home, No. 352 Buena Vista street, Los Angeles, January 28, 1901. Many tributes of respect and honor were paid to his memory by those who had been associated with him during the years of his professional activity. Among others we quote the following from the memorial adopted by the attorneys of Los Angeles and prepared at their request by a committee consisting of Stephen M. White, A. M. Stephens, A. W. Hutton, J. R. Scott and J. A. Graves.

"At all times since the formation of the co-partnership of Glassell & Chapman down to the time of Mr. Glassell's retirement, the firm of firms of which he was the head enjoyed a large and lucrative practice. He and his copartners were favorably known throughout the state and especially in this section, and they were usually retained on one side or the other of every important civil suit tried in this county and vicinity. The records of the several tribunals, state and federal, abound with evidence demonstrating the extent and importance of the litigation so ably conducted by and under the supervision of Mr. Glassell, and to these records reference is made as the highest and best evidence of his reputation, worth and ability as a lawyer. Not only was the firm of Glassell & Chapman active practitioners of the law, but they did much to develop and improve this section of the state. They did not, as so many owners of large tracts of land have done, wait to become enriched by and through the enterprise of their neighbors, but took an active interest in all matters calculated to induce immigration and the upbuilding of Southern California. One instance of their deals in real estate may be cited: About 1868 they became the owners of a large tract of land in the Rancho Santiago de Santa Ana. This tract was subdivided and a large irrigating canal constructed to conduct the waters of the Santa Ana river to the farming lands and to the town of Richland, which was laid out by them, and the land offered for sale upon terms most favorable to settlers. This little town of Richland is now the city of Orange. The canal of the Semi-Tropic Water Company has been from time to time extended and enlarged until to-day it forms a large part of the property of the Santa Ana Valley Irrigation Company and a portion of the finest system of irrigation in the southern portion of the state.

"Mr. Glassell was one of the incorporators, and for many years preceding his death one of the directors, of the Farmers and Merchants Bank of Los Angeles. He also took part in the organization of the Los Angeles City Water Company in 1868 and continued to be one of its large stockholders. About the same year the firm of Glassell & Chapman acted as the attorneys in the incorporation of the Los Angeles & San Pedro Railway Company, by which company the first railroad in Los Angeles county was constructed. They were its attorneys continuously until the road was transferred to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, when the firm became local attorneys for this latter company. As a lawyer and as a man he was scrupulously honest, direct in his methods, open and frank in all his dealings, and toward the members of the bar always extremely courteous and affable, but at the same time in the trial of a case bold and vigorous. He was generous to those who were associated with him in his cases and always quick to recognize and acknowledge their services rendered in the common cause. He was liberal to the young men who entered the profession through his office and more than one member of your committee remember with gratitude his kindness, helpfulness and generosity, and it is most pleasing now to remember that in all of their intercourse with him they cannot recall one single coarse expression or a single instance in which even for a moment he laid aside the bearing of a gentleman. He was a sound lawyer, deeply versed in the principles of his profession and thoroughly posted as to precedents affecting the questions in hand. He was a safe adviser and practical rather than brilliant. He was not an orator, but always terse, clear and forcible in argument. He was at all times thoroughly prepared at the trial, and in the preparation acted upon the theory that he is the best lawyer who drafts his pleading and other papers so thoroughly as to leave no weak points for the attack of his adversary, and consequently but little need of oratory to defend them. In his business dealings with his debtors he was merciful and forbearing, often reducing or remitting the debt when its enforcement might have seemed to be harsh. Each member of your committee has personally known Mr. Glassell for more than a quarter of a century and can without reservation attest that they never heard expressed any suspicion of the man. By devotion to his profession and by rare business sagacity he accumulated a large fortune, but by far the richest legacy he leaves behind him is the reputation which he earned by a lifelong course of honest dealing in his professional and business career. Notwithstanding his retirement from the practice hereinbefore noted, his life was a laborious one and full of responsibilities, and it is said by one who was very near to him in his latter days that he was ready to lay down the burdens of life and rest. His mortal career is ended; his life's roll is made up and at its conclusion is written the endorsement, "An honest and just man."

COL. LORENZ P. HANSEN. The years that have elapsed since Colonel Hansen came to Pasadena in 1890 have found him active in promoting measures for the benefit of the people, indefatigable in forwarding schemes for the improvement of transportation facilities, and energetic in the development of real-estate interests. Soon after his arrival he acquired by purchase twenty acres lying between Lake, Wilson, California and San Pasqual streets, and this tract he improved, converting it into a beautiful homestead. Subsequently three acres were sold, but he still owns seventeen acres, forming what is known as Oak Villa, his present home, and this property he has improved with a cozy residence, a thrifty orange grove and excellent water facilities. In addition to his own home another house stands on the place. He built the Masonic Temple, corner of Colorado street and Raymond avenue, a three-story structure, 65x125, and one of the finest buildings in Pasadena; this he recently sold. Besides his property in Pasadena, he was interested in lands at Lake View, Riverside county, and is a director in the Lake View Water Company.

The parents of Colonel Hansen were Olaf and Maria Hansen, natives of Denmark; the former a brick mason. In the family of six children three attained maturity, two daughters and one son, all of whom are now in America. Lorenz P., the second of these, was born in Rise, North Schleswig, Denmark, July 26, 1847, and as a boy attended the national school. When fourteen he began to learn the ship carpenter's trade in Abenrade. Two years later, on the breaking out of the Danish-German war, he was pressed into service as a teamster, serving until the close of the war. Meantime, in the battle of Oversea, he received a sabre wound over the right eye and was also wounded by a shell that struck him in the neck. When the war was over he went to Copenhagen and secured employment in a wholesale house, remaining there until 1868, when he came to the United States. In this country his first location was Detroit, where for three years he was employed in the wholesale wood yard of Mr. Livingstone, winning promotion to the position of superintendent through his faithfulness and ability. Being ambitious to acquire a good English education, he attended school every evening, so that his life was a very busy one.

From Detroit Colonel Hansen went to Chicago in 1871, immediately after the fire, and opened a restaurant on Madison and Dearborn streets, where he remained for twenty years. His was the first restaurant started after the fire and became one of the well-known places in the city. The business was conducted under the German name of Radskeller, which means the court's assemblage place to dine. In 1890 he sold the business and came to California, since which time he has made Pasadena his home. During his residence in Chicago he was president of the Eclipse Manufacturing Company, manufacturers of steam radiators. The real-estate business also received considerable attention from him. He erected the University Club building on Dearborn, between Washington and Madison streets, one of the most central locations in Chicago. Another important undertaking was the building of the Geneva Flats, a large apartment building on Rush street, which he still owns. For five years he was a member of Company I, First Regiment Illinois State Militia, and then assisted in organizing the Veterans' Corps, to which he belonged for several years, and of which he was a charter member.

The marriage of Colonel Hansen occurred in Detroit and united him with Miss Anna Mosegaard, who was born in North Schleswig, Denmark. They are the parents of two children. Their son, Waldemar Grant, is represented elsewhere in this volume. The daughter, Laurina, is a graduate of Irving Institute of San Francisco. After coming to California, Colonel Hansen became interested in securing better transportation facilities than then existed in Pasadena and Los Angeles. He was one of the original promoters of the Pasadena & Los Angeles Electric Railway Company, and its first vice-president. All of the street car franchises were granted in his name and he personally obtained the right of way. After the road was completed he disposed of his interest therein. As the first president and a promoter of the Santa Monica Railroad (now the Los Angeles and Pacific Railway), he was active in the construction of this road and still owns stock in the same. For three years, by appointment, he served as aide-de-camp on the staff of Gov. H. H. Markham, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel. Under Governor Burt he held the same official rank for four years, continuing for eighteen months under Governor Gage, when he resigned. In politics he is a pronounced Republican. While in Chicago he was made a Mason in Golden Rule Lodge, which he served as senior warden; there joined the chapter and commandery, and was a member of St. Bernard Drill Corps, in command of the second division. At this writing he is connected with Corona Lodge in Pasadena.

The personal characteristics of Colonel Hansen are such as command respect in the business world and win warm friendships in social circles. In this era of strenuous activity those deserve commendation who rise to influential positions when assisted by the prestige of birth, education and ancestry. Still more do those men merit praise who rise above such obstacles as foreign birth, a lack of knowledge of American customs and language, and the discouraging outlook of a friendless condition in a strange country. To this latter class belongs Colonel Hansen, who came to America a stranger in a strange land; yet, with the determination and force of will which have always characterized him, set himself to work to win a name and place for himself. How well he has succeeded in his meritorious endeavor his present position abundantly testifies.

JAMES A. HILL. Among all of the contracts filed by Mr. Hill since he began business in Los Angeles, there has been none more important than the building of the Third street tunnel, a work of such magnitude that two years were spent in excavating. The construction was peculiarly difficult on account of the presence of a large quantity of water, which was discovered after many prominent civil engineers had declared it to be a dry hill. During the process of building he was one of the seventeen men who were buried beneath the debris at the time the cave fell in. The accident occurred at 11:30 in the morning and it was eleven at night before the first men were unearthed; shortly after midnight most of the men had been rescued, but it was three days before all were out. It seems little short of a miracle that fourteen of the number were saved, although two of these were in a very critical condition when rescued. The completion of the tunnel has proved of the greatest benefit to Los Angeles, and it is estimated that five thousand people pass through it every day.

Mr. Hill was born at Stuart, Guthrie county, Iowa, August 30, 1865, a son of Andrew Jackson and Susan (Thompson) Hill, natives of Ohio. His paternal grandtather, Andrew J. Hill, Sr., was born in Pennsylvania, and when a boy, with his father, was captured by the Indians, and saw his father killed by the savages, while he himself was put to torture, his ears pierced and his tongue split. Finally, on payment of a ransom, he was freed. Later he settled in Ohio, where he died. Andrew J., Jr., removed to Guthrie county, Iowa, in 1847, and entered a tract of government land, which he improved and upon which he died at sixty-seven years of age. His wife is still living on the old homestead. Her father, John Thompson, the son of a Revolutionary soldier, served in the war of 1812 and afterward settled in Ohio, thence, in 1847, going to Guthrie county, Iowa, of which he was the earliest settler.

In a family of eleven children, all but one of whom attained mature years and six are living, James A. Hill was fourth in order of birth, and is the only one in California. From early boyhood he helped in the work of the farm, attending school only six months altogether. When he was ten he began to work at the bricklayer's trade in Des Moines, under S. A. Robinson, and three years later was drawing a man's wages. Some of his early work was in the building of the state capitol. About 1881 he went to Omaha, Neb., where he was a charter member of the Union, and in 1884 and 1885 worked as a contractor. During the fall of 1885 he came to Los Angeles, where he has since followed contracting, having probably had some part in the erection of over three thousand buildings in this city. Much of his work has been upon the best residences and public buildings. Coming here when the town was still small, but when it was beginning to attract strangers as residents or investors, he found himself overwhelmed with contracts during the boom period and even afterward, while a general depression existed, his services were still in demand. Among his contracts were those for the Homer Laughlin building, Hotel Van Nuys, Newmark building, Douglas and Baker blocks, Third street tunnel (with Mr. Swenson), Salisbury block (1886), Bryson and Bonebrake block, Hinstell building, Baker and Leed's warehouses, and the addition to the State Normal. Besides his contracting business he is interested in oil, as a stockholder in the Hiawatha and Kramer Oil Companies.

Cyphard Bard

As a delegate to convention and a participant in public affairs, Mr. Hill has been of assistance in promoting Republican success. He is connected with the Fraternal Brotherhood and the Maccabees. By his marriage to Miss Nellie Fillburn, who was born in Santa Rosa, Cal., he has a son, Robert, and the family occupy a pleasant home at No. 1317 West Eleventh street.

CEPHAS L. BARD, M. D. Prominent among those to whom the medical and surgical profession for years was a source of pleasure and research, in whom the opening vistas and yet hidden paths inspired the workings of a master mind, and who, after a strenuous army and frontier experience, later long continued peaceful practice, was Dr. Cephas L. Bard, who came to California in 1868, and was the first graduate physician to locate in the then small settlement of Ventura.

The ancestry represented by Dr. Bard was an enviable one, the profession of law and medicine being upheld by brilliant exponents on the maternal side, while on the paternal side Drs. John and Samuel Bard were founders of the College of Physicians and Surgeons in New York City. Remote ancestors of the family were among those persecuted Huguenots who were forced to seek an asylum in more tolerant England, from which country they crossed the sea and became pioneers of Pennsylvania. The great-great-grandfather, Richard, settled in the state of William Penn in 1745, and in 1758 he and his wife were captured by the Indians and saved from a general massacre for a more dreadful fate. Fortunately, however, he succeeded in making his escape, and his wife, after being in captivity for a year, was surrendered at Fort Du Quesne in consideration of a ransom of forty pounds sterling. The paternal grandfather, Thomas Bard, was also born in Pennsylvania, was a farmer during his active life, and during the war of 1812 was invested with the rank of captain.

The next in succession, Robert M. Bard, the father of Dr. Bard, was born in Chambersburg, Pa., in 1810, and became a prominent attorney and a leader of the bar of Franklin county, Pa., at the time of his death being candidate for congress. The mother of Dr. Bard, formerly Elizabeth Little, came of a distinguished family, and was the daughter of Dr. P. W. Little, of Mercersburg, Pa. Her brother, Dr. B. Rush Little, was at the time of his death professor of obstetrics in the Keokuk (Iowa) Medical College, and another brother, R. Parker Little, was for years connected with the Columbus Medical College. The maternal grandfather of Mrs. Bard, Col. Robert Parker, was on the staff of General Lafayette during the Revolutionary war, and received special recognition from General Washington as a reward for gallant service during the conflict. Two sons and two daughters were born to Robert M. Bard and wife, and the two sons, Cephas L. and Thomas Robert, rose to eminence among the citizens of Ventura county, the latter being honored by election to the United States senate from the state which he so materially and ably served.

A native of Chambersburg, Pa., Dr. Bard was born April 7, 1843, and was graduated from the classical course of the Chambersburg Academy at the age of seventeen. As a preliminary to the study of medicine he entered the office of Dr. A. H. Senseny, one of the most talented physicians of Pennsylvania, and later began to study at the Jefferson Medical College of Philadelphia, when an interruption was caused by the outbreak of the Civil war. Enlisting as a private in Company A, One Hundred and Twenty-sixth Pennsylvania Infantry, he participated in the second battle of Bull Run, and the battles of Antietam, Fredericksburg and Chancellorsville. At the expiration of his nine months of service he continued to study at Jefferson Medical College, and finally passed an examination before an army board and was appointed assistant surgeon to the Two Hundred and Tenth Pennsylvania Infantry by Governor Curtin. This regiment was exceptionally active and was at the front in all of the important battles, its greatest losses occurring at Hatcher's Run, Dabney's Mills, Petersburg, Gravelly Run and Five Forks. The regiment was commanded by Col. William Sergeant, brother-in-law of General Meade, commander of the army of the Potomac.

After the war Dr. Bard returned to Pennsylvania and resumed the study of medicine, graduating from Jefferson Medical College in 1866, and then practicing at Chambersburg until 1868. During a part of the time he was county physician. He then located in Ventura, after which he pursued, at various times, special courses in New York and Philadelphia, and acted as county physician during the greater part of his residence here. He was the first president of the Ventura County Medical Society, and in 1893 was elected president of the Southern California Medical Society. At a meeting of the State Medical Society in San Francisco, in 1897, he was elected president, and the following year presided at the meeting in Fresno. He was a member of the American Medical Association and surgeon of the Southern Pacific Railroad from Saugus to Carpinteria and branches. In political affiliation he was a Republican and in religion a Presbyterian. He was a member of the Military Order of the Loyal Legion, the Grand Army of the Republic, Cushing Post; Lodge No. 214, F. & A. M., at Ventura, Chapter No. 50, R. A. M., and Al Malakiah Temple, N. M. S., of Los Angeles.

With his brother the senator, Dr. Bard, erected a memorial hospital to their mother, Elizabeth Bard. This institution is on the hill near Ventura, and commands a splendid view of the valley, ocean and Channel Islands. The hospital was opened January 1, 1902, and six days later the doctor was taken there as a patient, from which he never returned to his home. An operation performed April 17 was powerless to check the disease, and his death occurred three days later. In Ventura, where he had lived so long, he was greatly beloved, and retained the affectionate esteem and confidence of the people. His profession was all in all to him and he truly gave his life for it. Among professional co-workers throughout the state he won an eminence to which his skill and attainments justly entitled him.

GEN. LIONEL A. SHELDON. The Sheldon family crossed from Normandy to England at the time of William the Conqueror, either accompanying that victorious general or following shortly after the battle of Hastings. Generations that succeeded the Norman emigrants held positions of honor and trust, one of the name having been mayor of London, another bishop of Canterbury, while still another served as a lieutenant-general in the British army. The majority of the family resided in Yorkshire and were adherents to the house of Plantagenet. During the contest between Cavaliers and Roundheads, they gave their allegiance to the former party. The family was first represented in America in 1646, when three brothers crossed the ocean and settled at Billerica, Mass. They bore the names of John, Isaac and William. The latter, from whom General Sheldon is descended, soon removed to Rhode Island and became a supporter of Roger Williams. His descendants lived in Rhode Island to and including the grandfather of General Sheldon, who in early manhood removed to Renssalaer county, N. Y., and there married Abigail Udal, a native of Wales. The mother of the grandfather was Hannah Allen, member of one of Rhode Island's most prominent families, and he gave his son, Allen, the family name of his mother. Born and reared in Renssalaer county, N. Y., Allen Sheldon and an older brother, Lionel, learned the trade of dyer and woolen manufacturer at Troy, N. Y. Afterward they established the business of woolen manufacturers on a branch of the Susquehanna river, near Worcester, Otsego county, N. Y. In the war of 1812 five of the brothers of Allen were in the service, Lionel being a colonel, Alanson a captain serving on the staff of General Winchester, while William and Benjamin were lieutenants and Asa fought in the ranks.

The mother of General Sheldon bore the maiden name of Anna Maria de les Dernier, and was a granddaughter of Dr. Louis de les Dernier, a Huguenot, who emigrated from Paris to Halifax, Nova Scotia, about 1765, his son being at the time seventeen years of age. The great-grandmother was Mademoiselle de Bohnn, of Geneva, Switzerland. The doctor was a man of education and of considerable wealth for the times. He exerted himself to induce the people of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick to join the colonies in the Revolution, and for this was driven from home, seeking refuge in the wilds of Maine, with three of his sons. His wife and the youngest sons were sent to Boston. His property was confiscated. The three oldest sons joined the American army. In a skirmish with the British and Indians on the Chaudiere river, while Arnold was advancing against Quebec, the grandfather received such a severe wound that he was rendered decrepit for life. Previous to this he had married Mercy, daughter of Capt. Elisha Freeman, a seafaring man, and a native of Cape Cod, Mass. After losing his ship in Passamaquoddy bay, Captain Freeman settled in Nova Scotia, where he became noted as a minister and lived to be almost a centenarian. The grandfather went to Nova Scotia in disguise and with difficulty removed his wife and one child to Kinderhook, N. Y., where his daughter, Anna Maria, was born.

The birth of General Sheldon occurred at Worcester, Otsego county, N. Y., and he was given the names of his uncle and father. The name Lionel has been in the family for many generations, coming from Lionel, father of Richard Coeur de Leon. For some time the manufacturing interests of Sheldon Brothers were prosperous, but finally serious complications arose, and Allen, catching the western fever, sold his interest to Lionel, then removed to Ohio, where he bought a considerable tract of land in La Grange, Lorain county. The land was almost wholly covered by a dense forest, only about fifteen acres having been cleared and fenced. The only buildings were a log house and a barn. The earliest recollections of General Sheldon are associated with this frontier home in the midst of the wilderness. At the age of five he was sent to a country school, where he was a pupil three months in the summer and a similar period in the winter. At the age of twelve attendance was cut down to the winter term, as his assistance was needed on the farm during spring, summer and autumn. At sixteen he was able to obtain a teacher's certificate, but considered himself too young to teach. In the following autumn, winter and spring he was an attendant upon a select school and studied some of the higher branches, after which he spent five months on a farm, receiving $8 a month. Soon after he was seventeen he entered the preparatory department at Oberlin, where he pursued an irregular course for three years, interrupted by teaching during the winters, and working in the hay and harvest field in the summer vacations. On leaving college he went to Southern Indiana, where he taught one term. On his return home he entered a law office at Elyria, and at the expiration of the year was admitted to the bar. His father having died in the meantime, he settled the estate, also taught school for a term, and then entered the law school of John W. Fowler, at Poughkeepsie, N. Y., from which he was graduated at the expiration of two terms. Returning to Ohio, he began the practice of the law.

The connection of General Sheldon with public affairs began while he was still a young man. In 1856 Governor Chase appointed him probate judge of Lorain county to fill a vacancy, and he served to the end of a term, but declined to be a candidate for election, preferring to return to his practice. In 1859 the organized military companies of the county elected him brigadier-general of the militia, and he was holding that office at the outbreak of the Civil war. Thus he was placed in charge of recruiting within the county. Having important cases in the common pleas and district court, he refused to enlist for the three months' service, as a term of each was to hold within that time. When three years' troops were called for, Governor Denison offered him the colonelcy of a regiment, but he declined on account of an insufficient knowledge of drill and military management. To prevent the disbandment of a cavalry company which he had recruited, he accepted the captaincy by election of the men, took the company into camp, and in a few days was promoted to be major of the Third Battalion of the Second Ohio Cavalry. While in Columbus in attendance upon a state convention he was offered a lieutenant-colonelcy by Governor Denison, who stated that he intended to promote James A. Garfield from lieutenant-colonel to colonel of the Forty-second Ohio Infantry, and would be pleased to tender Mr. Sheldon the position thus made vacant. The matter was discussed by Mr. Sheldon with Mr. Garfield, who had raised the regiment and was keenly interested in its success. It was the first meeting between the two men, who were afterward united by ties of warmest friendship that death alone was able to sunder. The result of their consultation was satisfactory, and on the 6th of September, in the adjutant-general's office, they were mustered into the service in the grades mentioned.

General Garfield being assigned to the command of the entire force to operate against Humphrey Marshall in eastern Kentucky, the command of the regiment in the field fell upon Colonel Sheldon. The expedition was successful, Marshall was defeated at Middle Creek and driven out of the state. Garfield was promoted to the rank of brigadier-general, and his lieutenant-colonel succeeded to the colonelcy of the regiment. The next service of the latter was in the expedition under Gen. George W. Morgan against Cumberland Gap, which was captured June 18, 1862. The flag of the Forty-second regiment was planted on the heights at six o'clock in the afternoon. Early in August Gen. E. Kirby Smith, with thirty thousand men, got into the rear of Morgan's force of about ten thousand, while in front was Stevenson's command of ten thousand men. For a time the condition was desperate, but September 14 de Courcsey's brigade, the Forty-second Ohio in front, started to run through Kirby Smith's army. That brigade stole a march and safely reached Manchester, Ky. The balance of Morgan's army followed and concentrated at Manchester. The troops of Kirby Smith and Stevenson pursued. From Manchester the Forty-second Ohio covered the retreat for forty-eight hours. After crossing the Kentucky river Morgan's army encountered John Morgan's cavalry, with which numerous affairs ensued. The retreat was memorable for its hardships, deprivations and success.

After a few weeks of service in West Virginia Morgan's division was ordered to Memphis, Tenn., where it arrived the latter part of November, and was incorporated into the Thirteenth Army Corps. At Memphis Gen. W. T. Sherman detached Colonel Sheldon from his regiment and placed him in command of a brigade of new troops. In this capacity the latter commanded the advance in the attack upon Vicksburg on the north side at Chickasaw Bayou, where his command was on the front line for five days and nights, and it was also the last to leave the field. At the mouth of the Yazoo the regiment met Gen. John A. McClernand, who, being senior in rank, assumed command, and proceeded to the capture of Arkansas Post, on the Arkansas river, seventy miles above its mouth at the Mississippi river. Colonel Sheldon was given the front and after fighting about seven hours he charged and captured the fort. Next the command was returned to the point opposite Vicksburg, and early in March was ordered to Milliken's Bend, as the point from which the advance was to be made in the rear of Vicksburg. After their arrival at Perkins' plantation, the command was ordered to take the advance and to assault the fortifications at Grand Gulf, but the navy being unable to silence a formidable battery planted at the water's edge, the army marched past Grand Gulf on the opposite side of the river. The gunboats and transports having run the batteries, in the morning the army was ferried down and across the river to Bruinsburg. The Colonel's command held the front and lost most heavily at Port Gibson, he himself receiving an injury in that battle. He was present during the siege of Vicksburg, near the close of which he was attacked by typho-malarial fever and was off duty for fifty-five days.

After the surrender of Vicksburg the Thirteenth Army Corps was sent to the department of the Gulf. There Colonel Sheldon was in the campaign up the Teche and to Opelousas, and was then sent to Plaquemine, one hundred and ten miles above New Orleans, to resist the advance of General Walker. He remained in command of that district four months, and was then transferred to the command of the district of Baton Rouge. From there he was sent in command of five regiments to the assistance of the retreating army of Banks after the disastrous Red river campaign. From that time until the close of the war he was in command of an expeditionary force that operated in Arkansas, Louisiana and Mississippi. In recognition of meritorious and gallant services he was brevetted brigadier-general. At the close of the war he was in New Orleans and remained there, engaging in professional practice, which steadily grew more important and lucrative. As he had been prominent in the army, so also in affairs of peace he proved himself to be a wise counselor, and his service of three terms in the house of congress added new lustre to his name. In 1880 he was a delegate to the national Republican convention, where he was instrumental in securing the nomination of his friend, James A. Garfield. Later he and his wife spent two months in the White House as the guest of the president, who also showed his friendship by tendering him the appointment as governor of New Mexico, an office that he filled from May 5th, 1881, until June 15, 1885. On the expiration of his term he remained in the territory practicing law. In December, 1885, he was appointed a receiver of the Texas & Pacific Railroad, which he operated for two years. When the road was sold and his accounts adjusted (which occurred without objection to a single item), he removed to Pasadena, Cal., where he has since resided. Since coming west he has had numerous honors conferred upon him. In 1896 he was a delegate-at-large from the state to the Republican national convention at St. Louis, which nominated McKinley for president.

In spite of his active life and the hardships of his army service, General Sheldon is unusually well-preserved, and at once impresses a stranger as a man of fine physical powers. However, splendid as are his powers of body, they are surpassed by those of the mind. In the midst of his busy life, he has found time to gain a broad knowledge and has devoted many of his happiest hours to literary pursuits. In habits he has been exemplary and in character irreproachable. Doubtless, if those best acquainted with him were asked his chief trait, they would promptly reply "Moral courage," and it is true that this faculty is especially prominent among his characteristics. It was noticeable in his youth, and the years of manhood have given abundant opportunity for its development. As a patriot and a statesman, and a man who has rendered most helpful service to our country, his name is worthy of perpetuation in the annals of the nation.

A. L. JENNESS. Very early in the history of America three brothers bearing the family name of Jenness came from England to seek homes in the new world. One of these settled in Rye, N. H., and from him the lineage is traced to Judge A. L. Jenness, of Santa Monica. Joseph Jenness and his son, Joseph, Jr., spent their entire lives as farmers near Wolfboro, Carroll county, N. H. The latter married Eliza J. Hawkins, who was born at Wolfboro and is now living on the Wolfboro homestead. Her father, Joseph, was descended from an English family long resident in New Hampshire.

The family of which A. L. Jenness is a member consisted of himself and two sisters, of whom one sister is deceased. He was born on the farm near Wolfboro May 11, 1842, and received excellent educational advantages, for his parents were of that sturdy class of New Englanders whose devotion to education has made that region a power in the world. After a course of study in Wolfboro Academy he entered New Hampton Institute and later matriculated in Amherst College, where he continued until the junior year. About 1867 he became a teacher in Clermont county, Ohio. The year 1869 found him in Missouri, where he was long a successful and prominent educator. For a time he was connected with the schools of Audrain county, in 1872 went to Monroe county, and a year later secured an appointment as teacher in Montgomery county, where he was superintendent of the Danville schools until 1882. From 1883 until 1888 he held a position as superintendent of the Montgomery City schools. Next he was for two years superintendent at Jamesport, where his successful work sustained the high reputation he had previously won in educational circles. From 1890 to 1892 he was engaged with the Fayette schools, and the two following years was superintendent of the Chillicothe (Mo.) schools. Meantime he was actively interested in institute work, was a favorite speaker at county and state teachers' conventions, and did much to promote educational work in Missouri. His removal from the state to California in 1894 was a loss to the public-school system, whose welfare he had so long and so honorably promoted.

Settling in Santa Monica in 1894, Mr. Jenness has since made this city his home, and has engaged in the real-estate and insurance business both here and in Los Angeles, besides which, from 1898 to 1902, he held the office of justice of the peace, elected on the Republican ticket. He is a member of the vestry of the Santa Monica Episcopal Church. Fraternally he is a past officer of the Ancient Order of United Workmen and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, his membership in the latter organization now being with the Montgomery City, Mo., lodge. While living in Missouri he married Rosa Marshall, who was born in Ohio and died in Missouri. The two daughters of their union, Louisa R. and Lydia J., are teachers in Ohio schools. After coming to Santa Monica he was again married, his wife being Margaret Van Every, who was born near Hamilton, Ontario, and who shares with him in the esteem of associates and acquaintances.

Joel W. Fisher

Chapman Publishing Co. Chicago.

MAJOR JOEL ADAMS FITHIAN. The life which this narrative sketches began April 3, 1839, near Bridgeton, Cumberland county, N. J., on the old Fithian homestead which has been in the family for generations, and closed at Los Angeles, Cal., March 26, 1898. Between these two dates is the epitome of a career that was busy, useful and successful. Whether as a soldier on the battlefield between north and south, or as a soldier in the no less stern battle of life, Major Fithian acted well his part; and the prosperity that came to him was directly attributable to his wise judgment and tireless activity. The latter years of his life were intimately identified with Santa Barbara, where he made his home. It may be doubted if any citizen maintained a warmer interest in the city's well-being and growth than did he. From the time of establishing his home here until his death, he was a constant contributor to movements looking toward the city's advancement. His name is particularly associated with the Fithian building, Santa Barbara's finest structure, which he began in 1895 and completed the following year. The building affords a fine specimen of modern architecture and is in every respect substantial and elegant. With a frontage of one hundred and forty-six feet on State, corner of Ortega street, it occupies a location central and desirable, and its commanding position is further enhanced by the presence of a large Seth Thomas clock with chimes. It was Major Fithian's privilege to see the consummation of this building, but the many other plans he cherished for the city's improvement were prevented by death. Among these plans was one for the improvement of Ortega street between State and Chapala, by the erection of substantial business houses, including a two-story block covering two-thirds of the street. Had not death intervened, the city would now possess many other monuments to his business enterprise.

When a boy Joel Adams Fithian resided in Bridgeton, N. J., with his parents, Joel and Hannah (Ludlam) Fithian, but before reaching his majority he removed to Easton, Md. There he became the owner of a large plantation. About that time sectional feeling was bitter. The war was approaching, and in his part of Maryland the sympathies of the people were with the south. A committee of prominent citizens waited upon him and gave him twenty-four hours to leave the state. Knowing the fate that other Union men had met, he felt that "discretion was the better part of valor" and left, returning to Bridgeton, N. J. Shortly afterward, with Lieut. (later Capt.) Elijah Husted, he opened a recruiting office and, under the name of the Kearney Guards, formed what afterward became Company F, Twenty-fourth New Jersey Infantry, of which he was duly elected captain. With the regiment he was mustered into service September 16, 1862. Upon reaching the field, the Twenty-fourth was attached to General Abercrombie's brigade, but soon was permanently transferred to French's (Third) Division, Couch's (Second) Army Corps, Army of the Potomac, Brigadier-General Nathan Kimball commanding. His eminent fitness for staff duty was recognized by Gen. William H. French, who appointed him to the important office of inspector-general of the Third Division, and in that capacity he took part in the battle of Fredericksburg, in December, 1862, under General Burnside; and Chancellorsville, in May, 1863, under General Hooker. On the expiration of his term of enlistment he was mustered out June 29, 1863. However, he was not content to remain out of the service as long as the government remained in need of soldiers, and he soon returned to the army. February 28, 1864, he was appointed major and additional paymaster, U. S. A., in which capacity he was with the armies of the Potomac and Shenandoah, participating in various campaigns under General Sheridan. Immediately after the surrender of the Confederates he was ordered to Richmond, Va., to assist in the final payment of the soldiers, and he remained on this duty until October 12, 1865, when he resigned his commission and resumed the duties of a private citizen.

The next thirty years of Major Fithian's life were devoted principally to the banking business, first in Richmond, Va., where he became vice-president of one of that city's largest banks; and later in New York City, and Paris, France, where his interests were large and of the greatest importance. Finally, attracted by the sunny skies and genial climate of California, he established his home in Santa Barbara, into whose activities he at once entered with the energy that was one of his characteristics. Possessing the qualities of mind and heart that win and retain friends, he soon became one of the leading citizens of his adopted city. In any gathering of people his soldierly bearing, courtly dignity of manner and genial courtesy made him a conspicuous figure. Nature had endowed him liberally, and education and culture had brought these gifts to fruition. His face bore the stamp of a striking personality, and even those who met him but once could readily discern his possession of powers that raise a man from competency to wealth and prestige and prominence.

In New York City Major Fithian married Fannie B., daughter of Richard B. Connolly. Four children were born of their union. The elder daughter, Myra, married Chester Allan Arthur, son of ex-President Arthur, and resides in Colorado Springs, Colo. The younger daughter, Fannie, is the wife of Comte Arthur de Gabriac, of Paris, France. One son, R. Barrett, is a resident of Santa Barbara, in whose improvement he takes an active part. The other, Joel R., is an extensive horticulturist of Carpinteria, and president of the Union Mill & Lumber Company. They are both members of the Santa Barbara Club, the Polo and Country clubs and the Chamber of Commerce. Major Fithian built and founded the Country Club in Montecito, which now belongs to his elder son, R. Barrett. In 1898, while Major Fithian was returning from a visit of a few months in Paris, apparently full of life and health, he was suddenly taken ill in the journey across the continent, and was unable to proceed further than Los Angeles, where he died within a comparatively few miles of the home he loved. After his death Mrs. Fithian spent a portion of each year in Europe, while the balance of the time was passed in her old home-town of Santa Barbara. Her death occurred December 29, 1901, when she was visiting in Paris.

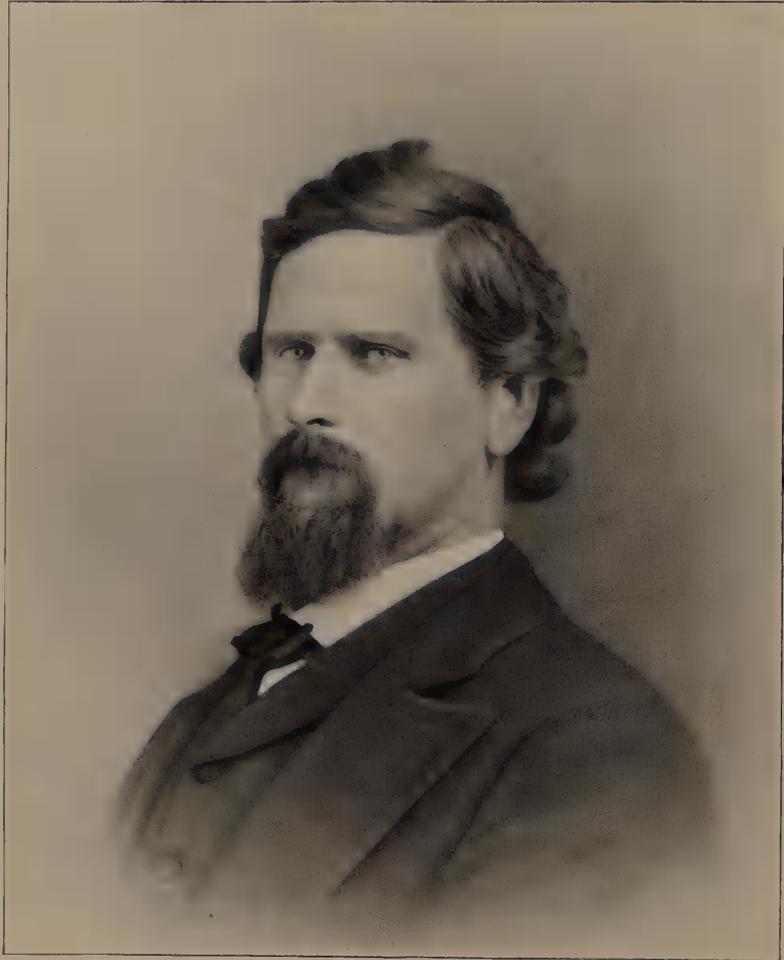

GEORGE WALTER JUDKINS. The Judkins family came from England to Maine many years ago and was afterward identified with the development of the Pine Tree state. After some years of seafaring life, during which time, as mate of a vessel, he has sailed all over the world, Lawrence McLaurin Judkins decided to seek a home on the Pacific coast and in 1847 rounded the Horn and landed in San Francisco. For a time he engaged in trading on the Sacramento river, but as soon as news of the discovery of gold reached him he hastened to the mines of the American river, where he joined the eager throng of gold-seekers. A few years later he purchased a farm in Sonoma county and in 1862 removed to San Diego county, buying a tract of unimproved land fifteen miles above old San Diego. The cultivation of this property engrossed his attention and he was bringing it to an excellent condition when, in 1868, he was murdered by one of his Indian employes. He had survived some years his wife, Annie (Dornell) Judkins, who was born in Wisconsin, crossed the plains in 1850 and died in Sonoma county. Of their three children, Foscaria died in Nevada; Joseph D. resides in Washington, and George Walter, in Los Angeles.

His membership in Ramona Parlor, Native Sons of the Golden West, proves that George Walter Judkins is a native Californian. He was born in Petaluma, Sonoma county, October 16, 1858, and grew to manhood on a farm. In 1879 he traveled through Nevada and Idaho, visiting the principal mining centers, and then crossed the mountains on horseback, and in 1880 arrived at Chico, Butte county, Cal. Going next to San Francisco, he secured an unimportant position in the machine shop of the Pacific Rolling mills, where he learned the machinist's trade. On completing the trade he was employed to put in machinery of all kinds in different parts of California. His residence in Los Angeles dates from September, 1888, when he began contracting and building. In 1891 he entered the employ of the Los Angeles Consolidated Railway Company (now the Los Angeles Railway Company), and after assisting to put in their plant, he acted as chief engineer of the same for six years. On the organization of the Los Angeles Traction Company, he accepted a position as first engineer and superintended the building of the company's plant, which is one of the largest in the city. As motive power, four boilers are used, each with three hundred and twenty-five horse power, oil being used as fuel. Two engines have two hundred and fifty-horse power, and one has seven hundred and fifty. With a view to enlarging this capacity the company expects soon to put in other boilers and engines, which will make the plant one of the largest in the entire west, as it is already one of the most reliable and perfect in its operation.

In Chico, Cal., Mr. Judkins married Miss Nona McCargar, who was born in Minnesota, and by whom he has three children, Georgia, Ray and Hazel. The family are identified with the Methodist Episcopal Church, to the support of which Mr. Judkins is a contributor. Fraternally he is connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows in Los Angeles; Independent Order of Foresters, in which he is past officer; Modern Woodmen of America and Fraternal Brotherhood, as well as Native Sons of the Golden West, previously mentioned. For eight years he was a member of the board of examiners, having charge of examinations of stationary engineers applying for licenses. In politics he votes with the Republicans.

The position held by Mr. Judkins is one for which he is especially qualified. The mechanical skill with which nature endowed him has been developed and trained by constant study and by long experience in his particular occupation. His knowledge of machinery is complete and thorough, and those in a position to know have said that, in their opinion, Los Angeles has no resident more familiar with the operating of large plants than is Mr. Judkins.

R. B. Cress

ROBERT BRENT ORD. During a comparatively long and very useful life Robert Brent Ord creditably upheld the reputation of a family numerously identified with the important affairs of the country, and who served with distinction during the Civil war, their talents adding lustre also to the professions of law and medicine, and solidity to the commercial undertakings in which they were engaged. Judge Ord was born in Washington, D. C., March 4, 1827, a son of James Ord, who was born in England, and came to the United States when a young man. The elder Ord acquired his education at Georgetown College, his intention being to enter the priesthood, but subsequent events modified his plans to entering government service, first as midshipman, and later as one of the regular navy. For many years he was located in Michigan as Indian agent at Sault Ste. Marie, after which he retired from business life and located in Santa Cruz. After the death of his wife he lived for a time in San Francisco, his remaining years being spent with his son, Gen. E. O. C. Ord, at whose home his death occurred. He married Rebecca Ruth Cresap, member of an old Maryland family, who prided themselves upon gallant service in the wars of the Revolution and 1812. Of the seven sons and one daughter in the family, one son and one daughter are now living. Placidus served in the Civil war and died in Omaha; Gen. Edward O. C. Ord participated in the Civil war with the rank of major-general; Judge Pacificus Ord came to California in 1849, was an attorney of large wealth, judge of the supreme court of California, and died in Washington in 1900; Dr. James L. Ord was a practicing physician in Santa Barbara for forty years, was surgeon in the United States army, and died in Maryland; Marcey, who came to California in 1849, was a successful business man and died in Santa Cruz; John, who came west in 1855, resides at the old homestead in Santa Cruz; and Georgiana C. is Mrs. Judge Holliday, of San Francisco.

Judge Robert B. Ord was reared at Sault Ste. Marie and educated in a Maryland college. In 1849 he came to California via Panama, the steamer Oregon bringing him from the isthmus to San Francisco. The following years were notable for remarkable undertakings in the stock raising business, operations being conducted upon the old Glen ranch which he purchased near Chico, Colusa county, and which contained over three thousand acres. For a long time he was a general stockman, but finally made a specialty of sheep and hog raising. During the drought of 1864 he suffered the fate of all similarly engaged and lost heavily, but continued to raise stock until 1866, when ill-health decided him to institute a change. He then located in Santa Barbara and bought the present family property, two blocks of land in almost the heart of the city, lying between De la Vina and Castillo and Cañon Perdido and De la Guerra streets. At times he also owned other town property as well as ranch property near the city, and was active in real estate transactions. A Democrat in politics, he held several important offices, and was known as Judge Ord, by reason of holding the offices of police judge and justice of the peace. Fraternally he was associated with the Knights of Pythias and the Masons. His death occurred October 20, 1889.

August 24, 1859, Judge Ord married Eliza Good, a native of England, and a graduate of Hanover College, Peckham. Her father, John Good, was born near Peckham, and was a designer and manufacturer of wall paper. He brought his family to America in 1849 and lived in Chicago until 1853, when he crossed the plains and settled at McCallamy Hill, Cal., where he engaged in the mercantile business at the mines until his death in 1856. His wife, formerly Jane Radon, was born in Ireland, and died in San Francisco, and was the mother of five daughters, three of whom are now living. Mrs. Ord followed the fortunes of her parents until her marriage, at the age of sixteen years, and vividly recalls the journey across the plains in 1853 with horse teams. Since her husband's death she has continued to reside at the family home, and to look after her property interests, which is no small undertaking, as she is the owner of three residences here besides other property. Mrs. Ord is the mother of eight children, viz.: James A., who is in Mexico, mining; Robin Captivilla, also of Mexico; Emmett S., who is a hardware merchant in Bisbee, Ariz.; Mrs. Eliza Georgiana Mears, of Mexico City; Mrs. Althea Watson, of Monterey, Mexico; Edward, who died one month after his father at the age of seventeen years; Mabel, who is living at home; and Walter, who is in Bisbee, Ariz.

GEN. O. H. LAGRANGE. The governor of the Pacific Branch National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers traces his genealogy to Peregrine de LaGrange a Huguenot, who settled in Holland. In Motley's Rise of the Dutch Republic mention is made of this heroic man, who, after having borne an honorable part in the siege of Valencia, fell into the hands of the enemy and was by them offered freedom and many honors provided he would enlist under their banner. With the courage of a martyr he refused the terms and suffered an ignominious death rather than accede to demands that were in his eyes dishonorable. It was a grandson of this hero who founded the family in America.

M. B., son of Christian LaGrange, was born in Albany county, N. Y., and married Jane A. Cullen, daughter of Hugh and Polly (Ten Eyck) Cullen, members of old families of New York. For a time the home of the family was in Fulton, Oswego county, N. Y., and it was there that a son, O. H., was born. In 1845 they removed to Wisconsin and settled on a farm near Ripon. During the Civil war the father served in the quartermaster's department. His death occurred in Oakland, Cal., in 1876, and his wife also died in this western state. They were the parents of four sons and two daughters, of whom O. H. was the firstborn. One of the sons, Wallace, served as captain in the First Wisconsin Cavalry and received his death wound at Dandridge, Tenn.

When the first call was made for volunteers in the Union service O. H. LaGrange was ready and eager to respond, and April 19, 1861, his name was enrolled in Company B, Fourth Wisconsin Infantry. On the organization of the company he was unanimously elected its captain, and in that capacity, May 9, responded with an appropriate address on the occasion of the presentation of a flag from the ladies of the city to the Ripon Rifles. Going to the front, he at once won recognition through his meritorious service and received promotion successively to major, lieutenant-colonel and colonel of the First Wisconsin Cavalry. May 13, 1862, a battalion of this cavalry arrived at Four-Mile, near Chalk Bluff, Ark. Parties of guerrillas had been driven out of southeast Missouri and were in bivouack on the Arkansas side of St. Francis river, two miles below the ferry. Before daylight May 14, Major LaGrange, with a squad of scouts, appeared at the ferry and called to the ferryman to bring the boat and take them over. The Confederate replied by a harmless volley and the battalion was soon in line behind the scouts covered by timber. A private of Company C swam the river and brought the ferryboat over. This would only carry twenty-five men, and that number, with Major LaGrange and Sergeant-Major Holcomb, who swam their horses, crossed at once. The Confederate pickets retreated toward their camp and the major, with the men who had crossed, started in pursuit. About two miles from the ferry they came up to a colored man with a fine black stallion the guerrillas had brought from Missouri. This horse Major LaGrange mounted. When within two hundred yards of a cabin, the Union soldiers were met by a volley from some felled timber, behind which the Confederates were in hiding. Warned by this, they themselves took to the trees for cover and returned the fire. The major on his black horse, in throwing himself forward to escape a horizontal limb, looked into the muzzle of a double-barreled shotgun held by a Confederate forty feet away. At once the major fired at the man, who fell back, mortally wounded. Leading his men, the major then spurred his horse among the Confederates and emptied his revolver, whereupon the enemy fled in confusion. Thirteen of their dead were buried where they fell. Later the guerrillas boasted that they had killed the black horse and the officer who rode among them and who, they said, escaped in that fight by wearing a coat of mail. It happened, however, that the man whom they killed and who rode a colt sired by the black stallion, was Surgeon H. N. Gregory, who two weeks later rode over the same ground with a party of Union soldiers and met death at the guerrillas' hands.

October 23, 1863, Major LaGrange was assigned to command the Second Brigade, First Cavalry Division, army of the Cumberland, and, although a junior colonel, he retained command until the close of the war, except while a prisoner of war from May 9 until August 16, 1864, while under fire at Charleston, with forty-nine others, to stop bombardment, and specially exchanges for Confederates similarly exposed to fire of shore batteries. On being exchanged he declined a proffered leave of absence, preferring to remain at the front so long as his country had any need of his services. Often he was in great peril; five times the horse he rode was killed under him, two of them by cannon shot. So meritorious was his service and so gallant his stand in action that, in 1864, he was complimented in general orders, by direction of General Foster, and at other times he was specially commended by McCook, Mitchell, Stanley, Elliott, Sturgis, Rosecrans, Thomas, Sherman and Wilson.

Under the administration of President Grant, in 1869, General LaGrange was appointed superintendent of the United States mint at San Francisco, and this responsible position he held for eight years. During his service the mint coined $246,000,000 with less waste than ever known before and at less cost; and charges were reduced one-half for melting and refining, coinage charge of one-half of one per cent on gold abolished. During his residence in California he held the office of district attorney of Alameda county, and it is worthy of note that he convicted on every indictment found. In the election of 1868 he was a presidential elector-at-large from California. In 1884 he returned to the east and from that time made his home in New York City until 1899, when he was appointed governor of the Pacific Branch of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers. From 1895 to 1898 he was fire commissioner of New York City. In that capacity he was instrumental in increasing the firemen's pension fund $325,000 in one year out of insurance and excise taxes, while he also bettered the fire-alarm telegraph service and promoted discipline among the firemen. Particularly worthy of note is the fact that, although pensionable since 1862, he has never applied for a pension, and often remarks that he hopes to live to be the last "unpensioned volunteer."

Stephen Rutherford

STEPHEN RUTHERFORD. In his native land of Scotland, where he was born May 11, 1848, Mr. Rutherford grew to maturity and acquired a common-school education. He was a son of William and Jessie (Balmer) Rutherford, the former of whom died in Scotland, while the latter is now making her home with her sons in California. After immigrating to the United States, Stephen Rutherford came direct to Santa Barbara county, Cal., and for a year worked out on a farm, after which he rented land. His means were carefully saved in order that they might be applied to the purchase of property. In 1873 he bought fifty acres of the Hill ranch, to which purchase he later added another fifty, and finally disposed of the whole at a reasonable profit.

At present Mr. Rutherford owns one thousand acres where he resides, adjoining Naples, and sixteen miles from Santa Barbara. The property is well improved and is conducted according to modern methods of agriculture. Of late the land has greatly increased in value owing to the discovery of oil wells here, the immediate cause of this discovery being the fact that oil floated on the surface of the ocean off the coast. Men are now at work in an endeavor to develop the large supply, and Mr. Rutherford has bright hopes of the results. His ranch is devoted to barley, hay and corn, as well as general farming. The crops are fed to his stock, of which he has a large number of head. A walnut orchard of sixty acres, recently planted, is in fine condition and bids fair to give large returns.

Twenty-seven years ago, at Santa Barbara, Mr. Rutherford married Agnes Lawrie, a native of Scotland. To Mr. and Mrs. Rutherford have been born the following-named children: William L., who is married and lives on a ranch in the neighborhood of the homestead; Agnes, Jessie and Stephen, all at home; Alice, who is attending the high school in Santa Barbara; and George and Lawrie, who are attending the Naples school. The sons are industrious and capable, and assist in the care and management of the large ranch. In religion Mrs. Rutherford is connected with the Christadelphian Church.

When Mr. Rutherford came to California he had little money and few friends. His prospects were not encouraging. But he had willing hands and a stout heart and was determined to succeed. The first year after his arrival in Santa Barbara county he slept under one of the large live oak trees that now stand on his estate, and which make it one of the most beautiful spots on the coast. There he dreamed of days to come when he would be the owner of a fine estate. That was his ambition; with nothing less would he be content. The dreams of those early days have been fulfilled, not through luck or chance, but because he labored constantly to achieve the desired result. One of the most helpful factors in his success was his wife, who was always in thorough sympathy with his ambition and who proved herself a rare and valuable helpmate as well as a most affectionate wife and mother. What he earned she saved and added to, and thus it came about that in the course of time the name of Rutherford in and about Naples became a synonym for progress, morality and prosperity, and his fine estate will be handed down unincumbered to his posterity. Such men are the very bulwark of a state and on them rests with safety the welfare of a nation.

FRANK LINDENFELD. At the hands of Mr. Lindenfeld the subject of paving is well understood, he having devoted much time and thought to perfecting this most necessary department of city improvement. In his native city of Diburg, Hesse-Darmstadt, Germany, where he was born September 24, 1848, he was apprenticed when fourteen years old to the trade of paving, and has since devoted a considerable portion of his time to the application of his trade. The family from which he springs came originally from Austria, where the great-grandfather was born, and where he added luster to the name of Lindenfeld by distinguished service as a commanding officer in the Austrian army. He afterwards removed to Hesse-Darmstadt, and there Adam Lindenfeld, the father of Frank, was born, as was also the mother, Maggie (Otto) Lindenfeld. The father was a farmer, and was head forester to the king of Hesse-Darmstadt. Of the seven children born to Adam and Maggie Lindenfeld three sons immigrated to America, and of these Nicholas, who located in Rochester, N. Y., was a physician, and after removing to Los Angeles turned his attention to the study of law. He subsequently became a prominent member of the Los Angeles bar, and practiced up to the time of his death in 1900. Another son, Andrew, is living in Los Angeles, and is in the employ of the city park company.

After completing his trade of paving, Frank Lindenfeld traveled extensively throughout Europe, especially in different provinces in Germany and Switzerland, and in the fall of 1868 came to America, via Antwerp and Liverpool. He located in Rochester, N. Y., and started his career as a paver, later residing in Buffalo, and still later removing to Cleveland, Ohio, where he lived until his removal to San Diego, Cal., in 1874. In California he became interested in the brewing business, and after learning all that he could pertaining thereto, he located in Los Angeles, and as there was no paving to be done, engaged in the brewery industry. For five years he was head brewer and manager for the Philadelphia brewery, and was afterwards head brewer for the New York brewery for the same length of time. In 1888 he resigned and retired permanently from the brewery occupation, and since devoted his time exclusively to his trade, and to contracting for stone and cement work. Several years ago he was one of the organizers of the Los Angeles Brewing Company, was elected a director and the first secretary of the company, and helped build up the plant. He resigned his positions one year later, and sold out his interest in 1900. Mr. Lindenfeld is interested in the growth of his town, and as a Democrat has been active, serving on various city and county committees, and as a member of the state Democratic committee. He is fraternally associated with the American Foresters, the Independent Order of Foresters, and the Turn Verein Society. He is a member of the Los Angeles Association of Cement Contractors.

Mrs. Lindenfeld was formerly Mary Beyer, a native of Pennsylvania, and was reared in Cleveland, N. Y. She is the mother of seven children, viz.: Hattie, who is now Mrs. Moran, of San Francisco; Annie, who is Mrs. Black, of Los Angeles; Lena, who is a resident of Los Angeles; Nicholas; Frank A.; Rose, a graduate of the high-school and Los Angeles Business College, and who is a stenographer and notary public, of Los Angeles; and Elizabeth, who is at home.

THOMAS LLOYD. The Lloyd family was founded in the United States by James Lloyd, a cotton manufacturer in England, who in 1827 brought his wife and children to America and settled in Wheeling, W. Va. At first he was employed as superintendent of a cotton mill there. In 1830 he purchased land in what is now Noble county, Ohio, and two years later he settled upon and began the improvement of his farm, while at the same time he was proprietor of a country inn on the Marietta state road. His son, Charles, a native of Cheshire, England, born in 1811, was sixteen years of age when the family settled in America, and during almost all of his active life he was a business man at Harriettsville, Noble county, Ohio. A natural mechanic, in early life he became a skilled blacksmith, and later invented and patented a number of ingenious devices. After twenty-one years as a blacksmith and machinist, he turned his attention to merchandising, which occupation he followed until his retirement from business. Fraternally he was connected with the Masons and Odd Fellows, and in religion was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. In 1837 he married Sarah Booth, who died at Harriettsville in 1885. Somewhat later he came to California, where his last days were spent. His death occurred in August, 1890, at the home of his son, Thomas, in Los Angeles. Of his eight children, four sons and a daughter are living. One son, John, served in the Thirty-sixth Ohio Infantry during the Civil war, and is now a contractor in Ohio. Edward A. and Thomas reside in Los Angeles, Cal.; James F. M. lives in Missouri, and Lydia A. (Mrs. Thorburn) resides at Waterville, Minn. The maternal grandfather, John Booth, was born, reared and married in England, from which country he brought his family to America and settled on a farm in Belmont county, Ohio.

The next to the oldest in the family of Charles and Sarah Lloyd was Thomas Lloyd of Los Angeles. He was born in Monroe county, Ohio, March 18, 1845, and was reared in Harriettsville, where he had public school advantages. Under his father he acquired an early knowledge of the mercantile business and was working in the store when the Civil war began. At once he tendered his services, but was rejected on account of his short stature and extreme youth. However, with sympathies fired for the Union, he determined to help the cause of the north in some way, and so he went with the recruiting officers, beating the tenor drum. Expecting to be admitted to the service as a drummer, he went to a sawmill near by to have a board sawed out for the purpose of having a drum made to order. Unfortunately, while at the mill he met with an accident that caused the loss of his right arm. His first thought was not of the affliction that had befallen him, but there was borne down on him the consciousness that now he could never go to war. From that time until 1869 he had charge of the store. In the fall of the latter year he was elected recorder of Noble county and in January, 1870, he assumed the duties of the office. Three years later he was re-elected, and continued in the position until January, 1877. His next venture was as a farmer near Caldwell, Noble county, but soon he sold the farm and turned his attention to the hotel business, buying the Warner house at Caldwell and changing its name to the Exchange hotel. For three years he was proprietor of the hotel and then, after an interval of two years, he came to California, May 10, 1883, being the date of his arrival in Los Angeles. Soon he purchased twenty acres southwest of University, where he carried on horticultural pursuits and a vineyard for three years. Believing that the buying and selling of real estate offered an excellent field for an enterprising man, he turned his attention to this business, in which he has since engaged, and now has his office on the corner of Thirty-eighth street and Wesley avenue. At this location he owns 130x130 feet, on which site he has put up a block of store buildings, and he has also erected a number of residences. In addition to real estate, he is agent for insurance and loans. His interest in politics has continued from youth. Frequently he has been a delegate to state, congressional, judicial and county conventions of the Republican party, and at one time served as a member of the county committee. In Vincent Methodist Episcopal Church he is officiating as chairman of the board of trustees.

In Caldwell, Ohio, Mr. Lloyd married Miss Bethiah J. Frazier, who was born in Sarahsville, that state, and received her education principally in Caldwell Normal School. Her father, Hon. W. H. Frazier, is one of the most distinguished men of his part of Ohio. The Fraser (as the name was originally spelled) family came from Scotland and were Jacobites and ardent supporters of Prince Charlie. It was Flora Fraser (afterward Lady Macdonald) who hid the "Bonnie Prince" in a cave at the time of the battle of Colloden. Persecution came upon the family, and both the Macdonalds and the Frasers sought an asylum in America, settling on the eastern shore of Maryland, where the family name was Americanized to Frazier.

From his native county of Kent, in Maryland, George Frazier accompanied his parents to Ohio in 1802. He married Bethiah Randall, a native of Washington county, Pa., and they reared eight children, of whom William H. was the fourth son. A man of ability and force of character, George Frazier stood high among his fellow-citizens, and for many years acted as magistrate in Trumbull county, Ohio. His death occurred in Guernsey county, that state, in 1852. Born in Hubbard, Trumbull county, William H. Frazier accompanied his parents to Guernsey county, and received his education in Madison College at Antrim, Guernsey county. At Coshocton, May 17, 1852, he was admitted to the bar, and at once began to practice at Sarahsville, Noble county. In 1858 he removed to Caldwell, which had been made the county-seat that same year. From 1855 to 1865 he served as prosecuting attorney. Three times he was elected judge of the court of common pleas in the eighth judicial district, the last two times being elected without opposition in a doubtful district. His service extended from October, 1871, until September 8, 1884. The following month he was elected judge of the circuit court for the seventh circuit and, by allotment, his term became four years. Twice he was re-elected, each time for six years, continuing to fill the responsible position in a most able manner until February, 1901, when, at the expiration of his third term, he refused a further nomination. No citizen of Noble county has been more prominent or public-spirited than he. Alike at the bar and on the bench, his service has been such as to win the respect and commendation of all. Impartiality characterized his decisions and justice was the keynote of all of his rulings. Former residents of Noble county are now to be found scattered through various parts of the United States, and an inquiry of any one of them concerning Judge Frazier always calls forth a tribute of admiration for his mental attributes and the high character of his citizenship. With others, he founded the first bank in the county, and of this institution, the Noble County National Bank, he was the first and has been the only president.

As vice-president and a director, he was intimately identified with the building of the Cleveland & Marietta Railroad (now a part of the Pennsylvania system).

November 30, 1854, Judge Frazier married Miss Minerva E. Staats, who was born in Noble county in 1838 and died there in 1898. Her father, Elijah, was a pioneer farmer of the county, and one of her half-brothers, Lewis Baker, was United States minister to Nicaragua and Costa Rica. In the family of Judge and Mrs. Frazier there were eight children, five of whom are living, namely: Bethiah J., Mrs. Lloyd; Anna E., Mrs. Daniel Neuhart, of Los Angeles; Mary E., Mrs. Schwartz, whose husband is a missionary in Japan; Lewis B., a lawyer at Caldwell, Ohio; and Minerva M., who is with her father at the old home. Three children comprised the family of Mr. and Mrs. Lloyd. Charles Edgar, who was educated in the University of Southern California, died April 26, 1894, at the age of twenty-one years. William Frazier, who also received his education at the University of Southern California, and who married Miss Petrea Doyle, of Los Angeles, served in Company C, Seventh California Infantry, during the Spanish-American war, and is now vice-president and manager of the Southwest Printers' Supply House at No. 111 South Broadway, Los Angeles. The only daughter, Mabel, is a student of voice culture in the University of Southern California.

There is much in the life of Mr. Lloyd to inspire and encourage the young. When a young man, he started out for himself, hampered by an affliction that might have discouraged one less determined; yet with unflinching courage and constant zeal, he worked his way steadily forward until he has attained a post of honor and influence in the esteem of his fellow-citizens. His character naturally strong and forceful, has been deepened and strengthened by adversity, while prosperity has not lessened his kindliness of heart and generosity of spirit. With his wife, he holds a high place in the regard of associates and friends, and is accounted worthy of rank among those progressive and honorable men who have laid the foundation of the prosperity and commercial growth of Los Angeles.

LAZARD KAHN Justice of the Peace for fourteen years, at present a general merchant and one of the chief promoters of the town of Los Alamos, was born in Phalsbourg, Lorraine, France, in 1850. Until his eighteenth year he lived in his native land, where he received a common-school and college education, immigrating to the United States in 1868. He at once came to California and settled in Santa Barbara, where for four years he was a clerk, gradually working his way up in the world until he was able to engage in business for himself. In 1880 he came to Los Alamos and started a jobbing house in liquor, and in 1896 established a general merchandise business which has been conducted on successful lines. A large trade has rewarded his efforts, and his upright business methods have placed him among the commercial forces of the county.

Aside from his general business interests Mr. Kahn owns large ranch properties. In politics he is a Democrat, but aside from his position of justice of the peace has devoted little time to official office. However, he is a staunch upholder of educational matters, and has done much to promote the interests along that line. At the Arroyo Hondo, in Santa Barbara county, in 1875, Mr. Kahn married Josephine Ortéga, a daughter of Pedro Ortéga, a native of Santa Barbara county and a descendant of an old Spanish family that were among the pioneers of California, and of this union there are four children: Edmond, Samuel, Mattie and Anna.

WILLIAM H. KOOPMAN. Since the fall of 1881 Mr. Koopman has made Los Angeles his home and business headquarters. He was born in the city of Hanover, Germany, May 15, 1863, a son of Henry and Caroline (Slifer) Koopman, natives of Hanover, and lifelong residents of the German empire. His paternal grandfather, a Hanoverian, was for some years a soldier in the German army and remained at the front during the Napoleonic campaigns. The parental family comprised four sons and one daughter, of whom all are living except one son. Albert is a brick-mason in St. Louis and John a carpenter in Los Angeles. The oldest son, William H., spent the first eleven years of his life in Hanover, but in 1874 came to America, joining an uncle and aunt in St. Louis. He was the first of the family to cross the ocean, his brothers not coming until some years later. For some time he was a pupil in the public schools in St. Louis, after which he attended Concordia College. About 1879 he was apprenticed to the carpenter's trade in St. Louis, and during the two ensuing years he devoted himself closely to acquiring a thorough knowledge of the occupation. When his boss came to Los Angeles he accompanied him thither, in order to complete his trade, and after starting out independently he acted as foreman of jobs.

Taking up independent contracts in 1896. Mr. Koopman has since had charge of the erection of the Coughran building at Long Beach, the Bacon block on Broadway in Los Angeles, four business houses on Temple street, and numerous residences in all parts of this city, including his own house at No. 1406 Union street. More than once his services have been called into requisition in adjoining cities, where his work uniformly gives satisfaction by reason of his accuracy, promptness and painstaking care. He was one of the organizers of the Master Builders' Association, to which he has since belonged, and he is also identified with the Builders' Exchange. In national politics he is a Republican, while in religion he adheres to the faith of his forefathers and holds membership in the Lutheran Church. After coming to Los Angeles he married Miss Louisa Linzenberd, who was born near Jefferson City, Mo. Their family consists of three children: Edgar, Alfred and Elsa.

M. ELLA WHIPPLE MARSH, B. S., M. D. Since her earliest recollections Dr. Whipple Marsh has been associated with the Pacific coast states, but the family of which she is a member is of eastern colonial stock. Her grandfather was a native of Rhode Island and became a farmer in Chautauqua county, N. Y., where her father, Hon. Samuel R. Whipple was born and reared. In turn, the latter identified himself with regions further west, settling near Batavia, Kane county, Ill., where his oldest child, M. Ella, was born. During her infancy the family started across the plains, with ox-teams, and after traveling from April to October arrived in Oregon. Their choice of a location came by chance. When he started Mr. Whipple was undecided as to whether to settle in California or Oregon. Finally he came to the dividing of the roads, with the question still unsettled, so he let the fall of a stake decide the matter, and in that way became a resident of Oregon. Taking up a donation land claim of six hundred and forty acres on the Columbia river, he became interested in farming and cattle-raising. In 1861 he removed to Vancouver, Wash., still, however, taking charge of his cattle and farms, but giving more attention than before to public affairs and serving with ability in the territorial legislature of Washington, to which he was elected on the Republican ticket. In religion he was connected with the Methodist Episcopal Church. His wife, Charlotte, was born in Orange, N. J. When thirteen years of age she began to teach school in New Jersey, later following the same occupation in Westfield Academy in Western New York, and finally taking a school in Batavia, Ill., where she met and married Mr. Whipple, her wedding being solemnized in the home of Lieutenant-Governor Bross of Illinois. A woman of splendid education (almost wholly attained by self-culture), she was considered one of the most successful teachers of her locality, and won the friendship of the most cultured people in every town where she lived. All through her mature life she was a faithful member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Her death occurred in Vancouver, Wash., when she was almost sixty-two years of age. Three children survive her, namely: M. Ella, of Pasadena; Mrs. C. E. Brown, of Los Angeles; and George A., an extensive farmer in Washington.

After having graduated from Vancouver

Joseph Sexton

Seminary in 1870 M. Ella Whipple entered Willamette University, from which she holds the degree of B. S. Afterward she taught school in Oregon and Washington, being for a time principal of the Lower Astoria schools. From childhood it had been her ambition to study medicine, and when the way was open, she took up the work under Mrs. Dr. Ford Warren, of Portland, Ore. In 1881 she entered the medical department of Willamette University, from which she was graduated in 1884. To further fit herself for professional work, she took a hospital course in the Battle Creek Sanitarium and also a special training course in the University of Michigan. Returning to Washington she was for one term superintendent of the schools of Clarke county and at the same time practiced medicine in Vancouver. For one term she held the position of city health officer of Vancouver, and twice she was a member of the Territorial Republican convention. Coming to California in December, 1887, she spent two months in Long Beach, and in February, 1888, opened an office at Pasadena, where she has since conducted a general practice. In this city, April 18, 1892, she became the wife of Rev. J. N. Marsh, a retired minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church and a resident of Pasadena since 1887. Her office and residence is now at No. 314 Arcadia street, Pasadena.

The personal characteristics of Dr. Whipple Marsh are as marked as her professional aspirations and acquirements. Possessing a broad mind, wide scope of knowledge and liberal views, she gives her influence to all the forward movements of the day. Both in Washington and California she has maintained an interest in suffrage work, being a believer in the justice of a ballot that knows no distinction of sex. A constantly broadening knowledge of the evil wrought by intoxicants has made of her a stanch prohibitionist. Ten times she has been elected secretary of the local Women's Christian Temperance Union, which position she now holds, and she also acts as state superintendent of franchise in California for the Union. Another forward movement to which she has given sympathy and aid is that connected with the school savings bank, and, as superintendent of the county work, she has placed the system upon a substantial basis. The Pasadena Medical Society numbers her among its members. In religion she is identified with the Methodist Episcopal Church, and has been prominent both in church and Sunday-school work. Not only in Pasadena, but formerly in Oregon and Washington, she accomplished much in behalf of her denomination, assisted many struggling congregations in getting a foothold, and served as a trustee and in other offices of trust. While in Washington she organized the Clarke County Teachers' Institute, which still holds annual meetings and is continuing its good work in the interests of educators. It will thus be seen that, professionally, educationally and religiously, she has been prominent in the various places of her residence, and has done much to foster the movements that contribute to the well-being of mankind.

JOSEPH SEXTON. The Sexton family traces its ancestry to England, but has been identified with American history for several generations. On the Harrison Pike, not far from Ebenezer Church, and only nine miles from Cincinnati, stood the family homestead, and there for years Joseph Sexton, Sr., was successfully engaged in agricultural pursuits. In spite of the fact that he had no advantages when a boy, he rose to a position of prominence in his community and was a leader in the Whig party. He was twice married and by his first wife had two children, Richard and Mary. The son succeeded to the possession of the old homestead, which he cultivated for some years. However, his tastes were rather toward business than agriculture, and he sought an opening more suited to his inclinations than the continued cultivation of somewhat worn-out soil. In the near-by village of Dent, on the Harrison Pike, he opened a store, which he conducted in partnership with W. H. Scudder.

In those days the drift of population was toward the west, and especially toward California, which had recently attracted world-wide attention by the discovery of its riches in gold. The two partners began to consider the feasibility of seeking their fortune in the remote regions of the Pacific coast, and they finally decided to risk their all in the new country. Accompanied by their wives, they started for California in the summer of 1852, going via the Nicaragua route, and landing in San Francisco January 4, 1853, after a very tedious voyage on the steamship S. S. Lewis, an old and condemned propeller, which sank on its next trip. In San Francisco, Richard Sexton started a wood and coal yard, continuing in the business about one year. From there he moved to Ione valley, forty miles east of Sacramento, in Amador county, where he had a fruit farm and a small nursery. During the dry season of 1864 he sold out and moved to Petaluma, Sonoma county, near which place he bought a ranch of eighty acres. On that property was established the Petaluma nursery, which was carried on for several years by his oldest son, William. In February, 1868, he moved from Sonoma county to Santa Barbara, where, although ostensibly retired from business, he yet maintained an active interest in real estate investments and the supervision of his various holdings. He bought one hundred acres of the Hill ranch, paying $22 an acre for the same, and soon afterward sold sixty acres of the tract, receiving for the same as much as he had paid for the entire property; later he sold the balance. He continued to make his home in Santa Barbara until his death, at the age of sixty-six years. By his marriage to Ann Claypool, who was born in New Jersey, and died in California, previous to his demise, there were born five children, namely: Elizabeth, who is the widow of John Edwards; William, deceased; Joseph, George and Lewis.

Joseph Sexton was born in Ohio, March 14, 1842. He was reared on a fruit ranch. In November, 1867, he moved to Santa Barbara, and started the Santa Barbara nursery. It was a wet winter and he was compelled to start in town. He bought property, corner Montecito and Castilleo streets, and planted his nursery on same block where the electric power house was built in 1901. When he started, Santa Barbara was in its infancy; but few Americans were there. He succeeded in securing enough lumber to build a small cabin, 12x16 feet; there were but two windows in town for sale, and no shingles or shakes; had to cover with boards. From the first he met with a success that was encouraging. The winter of 1868-69 he transferred his nursery to his home ranch at Goleta, Santa Barbara county.

Too much praise cannot be given Mr. Sexton for importing and introducing a great many of the finest specimen plants that decorate the city of Santa Barbara to-day. At the home place at Goleta he now owns sixty-five acres of land devoted to the nursery business and to the raising of pampas plumes. Of the latter industry he is the pioneer in California, having made the first shipment to San Francisco and to Peter Henderson of New York City. Since then the business has grown until it has reached splendid proportions and has become not only profitable to himself but of inestimable benefit to the county of Santa Barbara, for he buys up most of the crops raised by others in his neighborhood. One-half million or more of the plumes he ships annually, his principal markets being London, Hamburg and Berlin.

In another industry beside the raising of pampas plumes, Mr. Sexton has been a pioneer and has made a noteworthy contribution to the development of California's resources. To him belongs the distinction of having introduced soft shell walnuts in Southern California. In 1867 he shipped one hundred and twenty pounds of the nuts from San Francisco to Santa Barbara county. These were mixed nuts that had been imported from Chile in South America. He planted them in his nursery and sold about seven hundred and fifty trees. The balance, about two hundred and fifty trees, he planted in an orchard of his own. Of these, sixty came in as soft or paper shell nuts, and he cultivated them with the greatest care, finally crossing between the hard and soft shell walnuts and securing what is now known as the soft shell walnut of commerce. As the raising of these nuts has grown to be one of the most important industries of Southern California, too great praise cannot be given to Mr. Sexton for his pioneer work in the developing of the nut.

The home of Mr. Sexton in Goleta is a commodious residence containing modern improvements and furnished in a manner indicative of the refined taste of the family. In addition to his homestead, he owns a ranch of four thousand acres in Ventura county. On that tract he has a large herd of stock and also raises grain and beans. The supervision of his various interests leaves him little time for identification with local affairs, hence he has never been a politician or an active worker in his party (the Republican), but he can be relied upon to support its principles with his vote and influence, and he has always been a contributor to measures for the benefit of the people educationally, morally and commercially.

In 1894 he retired from the nursery and left it in charge of his oldest son, Charles, and he spent the most of his time on his ranch at Ventura, trying to develop water enough for his stock. Not succeeding in that, he had to look for water from some other source. The inhabitants of all of that section lying between Ventura and Saticoy, and along the telegraph road, had to haul their water in tanks for domestic use and their stock. Mr. Sexton was the principal promoter in establishing the Saticoy Water Company, that took the tank off the wagon, and they now water miles of public road and have been a great benefit to that section of the county.

His marriage took place at Goleta, Santa Barbara county, November 18, 1869, and united him with Miss Lucy A. Foster, daughter of I. G. Foster. They became the parents of twelve children, seven boys and five girls. The eldest son, Charles, was killed by a dynamite explosion while putting in boiler flues at Carpinteria when he was twenty-eight years of age. He was a young man of promise and possessed excellent business and social traits of character.

BENJAMIN M. PAGE, M. D. Remotely of English extraction, Dr. Page of Pasadena is a member of one of the colonial families of Connecticut. His paternal grandfather, Isaac, son of John Page, was born at Northford, Conn., and grew to manhood upon a farm. Throughout active life the occupation of agriculture was his principal calling, but he also engaged in the building business, and had charge of the erection of many residences and a number of mills while living in Ohio. In 1827 he removed to Ohio and bought land near Cleveland, where he devoted the balance of his life to the development of a valuable farm. At the time the family settled in Ohio, Rev. Benjamin St. John Page was a boy of twelve, his birth having occurred near New Haven, Conn., in 1815. On completing the studies of local schools he entered Western Reserve College, from which he was graduated in due time. Immediately afterward he became a theological student in Yale College, and on the conclusion of the required course was ordained to the ministry of the Presbyterian Church, which he served in various pastorates in Ohio. During a portion of his active career he preached in the Congregational denomination, but, returning to his former connection, remained in Presbyterian pastorates in Ohio and Connecticut until his death, which occurred in 1868 in Warren, Ohio.

The marriage of Rev. Benjamin St. John Page united him with Miss Emily Benjamin Maltby, who was born in the West Indies and grew to womanhood in Northford, Conn. Her father, Samuel Maltby, a native of Northford, went from New Haven to the West Indies in the merchant-marine service, and afterward became a manufacturer in Northford, remaining there until his retirement from business. His wife was a member of the DeWitt family, of New York. His father, Benjamin Maltby, was born in Connecticut, where he engaged in farming and the milling business. Like the Pages, the Maltby family descends from English ancestry. Mrs. Emily Page is still living and makes her home with her only child, Benjamin M., in Pasadena.

In the suburbs of Cleveland, Ohio, Benjamin M. Page was born, July 18, 1843. Reared there and in Connecticut, his education was received principally in Russell's Collegiate Institute in New Haven. In the fulfillment of an ambition he had cherished from boyhood, in 1861 he took up the study of medicine, entering the College of Physicians and Surgeons in New York City and taking the regular course of lectures in that institution, from which he was graduated in 1864. The two ensuing years were devoted to practical work in Kings County Hospital, after which he opened an office in Cleveland, Ohio, and entered upon private practice. Owing to ill health, however, in the spring of 1873 he was obliged to relinquish his professional cares, and seek a climate more favorable. With that object in view he came to California and for one year remained at Santiago Canon, where the constant outdoor exercise and healthful climate proved so beneficial that he deemed it safe to return to Cleveland. Unfortunately, a return to practice caused an immediate loss of health, and since then he has been unable to engage in professional work. For some years he made his home at North Haven, Conn., from which point in 1887 he came to Pasadena, his present home. Though he has not practiced medicine since coming here, his interest in the profession has not ceased, and he is a member of the Pasadena Medical Society, as well as an interested student of all advances made in the science. He is a charter member of the Twilight Club, and in religion affiliates with the Congregational Church, in which at one time he was a trustee. His marriage was solemnized in North Haven, Conn., and united him with Cornelia Blakeslee, a native of New Haven. Their only child, Benjamin Edwin, is a graduate of Leland Stanford University, class of 1899, also of the law department of Columbia University, New York, class of 1902. Mrs. Page is a daughter of George E. and Elizabeth (Atwater) Blakeslee, natives of North Haven and New Haven, Conn., respectively.

F. U. NOFZIGER. Because of the extent of its operations, the admirable methods employed in its various departments, and the high character of the men directing its affairs, the lumbering enterprise of Nofziger Brothers ranks among the solid commercial agencies of Los Angeles. F. U. Nofziger, the president and manager of the company, and one of the most experienced lumbermen in the west, was born near Keota, Washington county, Iowa, August 2, 1868, a son of J. P. Nofziger, and grandson of Christian Nofziger. The grandfather, Christian, was born in Alsace, Germany, and came to the United States with his father, another Christian, when twelve years of age. In the Fatherland the ancestors had, with few exceptions, been tillers of the soil, and the younger Christian was reared to an appreciation of this means of livelihood, to which he devoted himself in part after locating in Wayne county, Ohio. Nevertheless, he was a religious enthusiast, and his fervor found vent in the ministry of the Amish Church, to which he owed allegiance for many years. In later life he settled near Sturgis, on the Fawn river, where his death occurred.

J. P. Nofziger was born and reared in Wayne county, Ohio. In addition to becoming a farmer, he also studied for the ministry, and in his effort to alleviate the sorrows of humanity, preached from the platform of the German Baptist Church. At the beginning of the Civil war he removed to Iowa and settled in Washington county, and in 1878 homesteaded a claim near Orleans, in Harlan county, Neb. In 1900 he came to California, and his declining years are now being spent in the midst of his horticultural interests at Lakeside. He married Amelia C. Correll, a native of Wayne county, Ohio, a daughter of Daniel Correll, who was born in Pennsylvania. Mr. Correll comes of a very old family which was represented in the state of William Penn long before the Revolutionary war, and he himself was one of the pioneers of Wayne county, where his days were spent in farming. Five children were born to Mr. and Mrs. J. P. Nofziger, and of these, D. I. is the partner of F. U. Nofziger; Minnie is the wife of Mr. Cline, of Philadelphia; B. O. is a resident of Hitchcock county, Neb.; and Galen is living at home.

Until 1879 F. U. Nofziger was reared in Iowa, at which time he accompanied the family to Nebraska and supplemented his previous education in the public schools by further training at Franklin (Neb.) Academy. His higher education was gained solely through his own efforts, for at the age of seventeen he began to teach school and with the profits resulting therefrom was enabled to enter the college at Mount Morris, Ogle county, Ill., after which he took a two years' course at McPherson College in Kansas. At the latter institution he met his expenses by engaging as a tutor in mathematics, but left the college in the senior year in order to devote all of his time to teaching. In July of 1891 he came west and located at Lordsburg, in Southern California, where he taught for a year. In the spring of 1892, in partnership with his brother, D. I., he bought, and successfully managed a lumber yard for eleven months. Upon the disposal of this interest in 1893, Mr. Nofziger bought a ranch at Lemon, Los Angeles county, and in addition to ranching, engaged in teaching and also represented the Newport Wharf & Lumber Company. In March of 1894 he removed to Pasadena and started the yard for the Willamette Lumber Company, and after perfecting its plans managed the concern until January of 1895. He then became identified as manager with the Newport Wharf & Lumber Company at Redlands, and in 1900 bought out the Western Lumber Company on the corner of Ninth and Pedro streets, Los Angeles. At the same time he organized the Nofziger Brothers Lumber Company, of which he is president, and his brother, D. I., secretary and treasurer. Eighteen months later the brothers increased their responsibility by the purchase of the Newport Company yards at Redlands, Riverside, Corona, Hemet, and Santa Ana, and of these the Riverside, Redlands and Corona yards are still continued, with an additional agency at San Bernardino. In 1901 the headquarters of the company were established at the corner of Eighth and Main streets, where is conducted the retail yard, and a wholesale yard has been started at Sixth and Palmetto streets, on the Santa Fe tracks. D. I. Nofziger shares with his brother vast credit for the upbuilding of their business, he having gained his principal experience while manager (from 1897 until 1900) of the North Ontario Lumber Company, at North Ontario, also with the Newport Lumber Company and as assistant manager at Pasadena for two years.

In Juniata, Neb., Mr. Nofziger married Maggie Yoder, a native of Washington county, Iowa. Her father, Stephen Yoder, who is now living in Los Angeles, comes from an old Pennsylvania family, and is a minister in the German Baptist Church. He was a farmer on a large scale in Washington county, Iowa, and in 1880 removed to Shelby county, of the same state, where he continued agricultural enterprises. Mrs. Nofziger was educated at Mount Morris College, and at McPherson, Kans., and like her husband has had extended educational experience, having begun to teach when sixteen years of age. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Nofziger, J. C., Bennett Ray, and Frances. Mr. Nofziger is a Republican in national politics, and in Redlands was a member of the San Bernardino County Central Committee. He is variously associated with the social and business organizations of Los Angeles and vicinity, and is a member of the Chamber of Commerce, the Jonathan Club, and the Hoo Hoo's. He is a man of large adaptability to the public needs of his neighborhood, and possesses to an unusual degree personal attributes which not only win business success but the confidence of all who know him.

JOHN B. PROCTER. In addition to serving in the capacity of city clerk of Santa Monica and ex-officio assessor for the past two years, Mr. Procter is interested in real estate and insurance, and represents the London Assurance, Liverpool, London and Globe, and St. Paul Companies. Of English birth and lineage, he is a son of Rev. Gilbert and Mary (Gorton) Procter, natives of Lancashire, where the former was a rector in the Church of England. The paternal grandfather, William Procter, was a large landed proprietor and a gentleman of leisure, having no business cares except such as were connected with the management of his estate. The maternal grandfather, Richard Gorton, was also a landed proprietor and a gentleman of wealth.

Among seven children (four now living), John B. Procter was the third son and is the only one in America. He was born in Lancashire September 12, 1861, and received a liberal education in Victoria University, Manchester. Since early manhood he has made his home in the United States, where he arrived April 19, 1883. For a time he engaged in farming at Larchwood, Iowa, but in 1887 came to California and settled in Santa Monica, which has since been his home. During the entire period of his residence here he has been connected with the insurance and real-estate business, in both of which lines he has gained considerable prominence. With the Englishman's inherent love for the recreations that develop the physique and also relieve the monotony of business, he has found much pleasure in polo, and was one of the originators of the game when it was first started in California, also officiated as captain of the Southern California Polo Club during its existence. Before leaving England he married Miss Rosetta Machell, who was born at Newby Bridge, and whose father, Capt. Thomas M. Machell, was for years an officer in the English army. The two children of Mr. and Mrs. Procter are James Machell, who is attending school in England, and Gilbert.

J. R. Williams

The blue lodge of Masons at Santa Monica has Mr. Procter as one of its members, and he is also connected with the Foresters of America. Reared in the faith of the Church of England, he has always adhered to its doctrines, and is now treasurer and a vestryman of the Santa Monica Episcopal Church. Since becoming a citizen of the United States he has given his support to the Republican party.

JAMES R. WILLOUGHBY. That early discouragements and the absence of capital or influence are no bars to success is happily illustrated in the life of James R. Willoughby, owner and manager of one of the largest and finest stock farms in Ventura county. A native of Canterbury, Windham county, Conn., Mr. Willoughby was born October 22, 1831. The family ancestry is traced to England, whence three brothers emigrated in an early day and settled in Connecticut. His father, William F., was born in Windham county and died there in 1849; while the mother, Phoebe, daughter of James Carey, was likewise a lifelong resident of Connecticut. The Carey ancestry is traced to Anne Boleyn, who by her death paid the penalty for the honor of being the wife of Henry VIII of England.

In the family of William F. and Phoebe Willoughby there were twelve children, nine of whom reached maturity. Two daughters live in California, and Otis H., who was a California pioneer of 1854, is now a resident of Watsonville. The oldest son, James R., was educated in the public schools of Connecticut and remained on the home farm until he undertook the long voyage to the far west. January 20, 1853, he engaged passage on the steamer Northern Light, Captain Tinglepoe, from New York to San Francisco via the Nicaragua route, but later he boarded the steamer Independence, Captain Sampson, for San Francisco. This boat was doomed to a terrible fate, being both wrecked and burned, and two hundred out of four hundred and fifty passengers were drowned. With others, Mr. Willoughby was cast upon the island of Margareta. There were a number of whalers in Magdalena bay and they there found a way out of their difficulties through the barque Meteor, which carried them safely to San Francisco. Without even a hat upon his head, but none the worse physically for his accident, he started out to face the problem of making his living, and was soon rewarded by securing work by the day at odd tasks, until such time as he could find steady employment. He began to be interested in buying and selling cattle, hogs and horses, and in time worked up a large wholesale butchering business in San Francisco, where he remained for twenty-nine years.

The first introduction of Mr. Willoughby to the lower coast regions was in 1865, when he traveled south from San Francisco, purchasing sheep and cattle. During this trip he was so impressed with the advantages of Ventura county that he soon after bought sixty-five hundred acres of the old ex-mission and Saticoy ranches. At one time he owned as much as thirteen thousand acres of land, but he has disposed of all this except his original purchase. He is extensively engaged in raising rough-fleeced black-faced sheep, Shorthorn cattle, and a standard draft of horses. Many fine records have been shown by the horses raised on this farm, among them being a record of 2:15 by Richmond, Jr. Mr. Willoughby also owned a third interest in Old Richmond and raised the mother of Waldo J. on his farm, together with other fine horses. Besides his farm interests he is active in the affairs of his county and township, was elected county supervisor on the Republican ticket, also served for one term as city trustee and has been chairman of the county central committee and a member of the state central committee. Since the organization of the People's Lumber Company, in which he bore a part, he has been its treasurer and a director.

In San Francisco Mr. Willoughby married Mary E. Holloway, who was born in Tennessee and died in 1881. Of this union there were the following children: W. F., who is a farmer in Ventura county; Abbie, who is the wife of Fred R. Butcher, of Saticoy; G. D., a farmer in Ventura county; Charles, who is farming with his father; and James, who is engaged in the insurance business in Salt Lake City. August 10, 1886, Mr. Willoughby married Rena Roberts, who was born in Minnesota, a daughter of William and Mary (Fowler) Roberts, natives respectively of Wales and England. The paternal grandfather was born and died in Wales, and married an English woman. The father immigrated to New York and then settled in Mankato, Minn., engaging in contracting and building there until 1896, when he came to Ventura county. He served during the Indian wars in Minnesota. His wife, Mary Fowler, was born in England, a daughter of Henry Fowler, who came to America and followed the dental profession at St. Anthony Falls, Minn. To Mr.

and Mrs. Roberts were born four children, three of whom are in California, Mrs. Willoughby being the youngest. She was reared and educated in Minnesota, and is a graduate of the Mankato Normal School. Of her marriage two children have been born, Rena Sessions and Otis Huntington Willoughby.

PORFIRIO PALOMARES. The Palomares family of Los Angeles is descended from Don Francisco de Palomares, governor of the castle of St. Gregory at Oran, Spain. In his family there were six children, namely: Esteban, who was lieutenant-colonel of the Knights of the Order of Santiago; Don Juan, who became governor of the castle after his father's death; Don Antonio, who was a judge; Don José; Eugenio, who lost his life as a result of his attempts to overthrow the Catholic religion; and Dona Francisca, who married Don Diego Francisco, Knight of the Order of Santiago and governor of the plaza of Oran. The second of the sons, Captain Juan, is remembered in the history as the officer who led his men in a determined but hopeless resistance against the Turkish troops at Borchá. After the majority of his troops had been slain, not being able to defend himself and the castle, he set fire to the powder house or depository, and blew up the castle, beneath whose ruins the dead bodies of himself and his men were later found.

Tracing the history of the family down toward the present, we find that Don Francisco de Palomares was a well-known citizen of Toledo, Spain. A letter written to his sister and dated Mexico, 1777, states that he was born about 1701 and died in Madrid in 1771. His children were Don Francisco, who was clerk of the city of Madrid and died in 1795; Donicio, Maria Josefa and Juan Leocadio. The last-named crossed the ocean from Spain to Mexico and established a home in Sonora, where he married Dona Maria Antonia Gonzales de Zayas, sister of Father Elias, an influential priest. Their only son, Juan Francisco, was born in Sonora, and became the father of the following children: Herman, Antonia, Juana, Francisca, Procofio, Almara, Tranquilina, Fiburcio, Manuel, Ygnacio and Jesus. Among the children of Manuel was Juan Leocadio, by whose marriage to Maria Antonia Gonzales was born an only child, Christopher. The latter came to Los Angeles as a sergeant in the Mexican army and afterward served as judge of Los Angeles. His residence stood on the present site of the Arcade depot. By his marriage to Benedicta Luisa he had the following children: Concepcion, Barta, Rosario, Francisco, Ygnacio, Louis, Dolores, Maria Jesus and Josefa. Of this family Ygnacio married Concepcion

Lopez, and their children were Louise, Teresa, Tomas, Francisco, Manuel, Josefa, Concepcion, Caroline and Maria. The second of the sons, Francisco, at an early age secured employment as assistant on a ranch. Later he became a large property owner and wealthy cattleman. It is said that for years he was the largest land owner in all of the Pomona valley, and over his fields roamed thousands of cattle and horses. Eventually he carried fewer heads of stock, but of a higher grade. On the ground where the home of Mr. Nichols now stands he built a large adobe house, and here the happiest days of his life were passed, in the society of his family and the many friends whom his genial qualities had drawn to him. In those days there was an abundance of rain, consequently the pastures were in excellent condition for the stock. Little land was cultivated. Indians were numerous, but did no damage except to steal cattle occasionally. Wild game abounded, and the sportsman found rare pleasure in hunting the deer, antelope, bears and wolves with which the remote valleys were filled. Little did those pioneers dream of the wonderful transformation of the present; some of them lived to witness many of the changes wrought by the incoming of American settlers, and he was among the number. The increase in the values of land caused him to dispose of much of his property, and his last days were spent in retirement from business. He was one of the leading Democrats of his day and locality and for some time filled the office of supervisor. In religion he was of the Catholic faith. He died in 1882 when forty-six years of age, leaving a wife and four children. The former was Lugardia Alvarado, a native of Los Angeles, and who died June 14, 1896, at the age of fifty-six years. The children were Concepcion, who married Eduardo Abila; Christina; Francisco, who married Virginia Miller; and Porfirio, who forms the subject of this article.

When the estate was divided Porfirio Palomares received seventy-six acres for his share, of which amount he afterward sold twenty-nine acres. At this writing he owns one hundred and ninety-one acres of higher lands where he raises alfalfa for feed. In addition he is the possessor of forty-three hundred acres in San Diego county, the whole forming what is known as the Montserrat ranch. His attention is devoted to a general farming business and to the management of his vineyard. On his place will be seen a substantial set of buildings, provided with the modern equipments. Like his father, he is a Roman Catholic in religion and a Democrat in politics. With his wife, Hortense, daughter of Vicente Yorba of Orange county, he has a large circle of friends throughout Southern California, and is regarded as a worthy descendant of Spanish nobility.

JOSE DOLORES PALOMARES. There is scarcely a resident of the eastern part of Los Angeles county to whom the name of Palomares is unfamiliar. Particularly is this true of those who are acquainted with the early history of the county. At a very early day the family became established here, having come from Mexico and originally from Spain, of which country they belonged to the nobility. The representative of the family whose name introduces this sketch and who is a well-known citizen of Lordsburg, traces his lineage to Don Juan Leocadio Palomares, of Sonora, Mexico, who married Dona Maria Antonia Gonzales de Zayas and had an only son, Christopher. As a sergeant in the Mexican army the latter became connected with the military affairs of his native land. About 1771 he identified himself with the pioneers of the then straggling hamlet of Los Angeles, where he served as judge and built a home on the present site of the Arcade depot. When quite advanced in years he passed away, thus closing a career that had been long and intimately associated with the pioneer history of the City of the Angels. By his marriage to Benedita Saiz he had the following-named children: Concepcion, Barbara, Rosario, Francisco, Ygnacio, Louise, Dolores, Maria Jesus and Josefa.

The fourth member of this family, in order of birth, was Francisco, who was born in 1806 and grew to manhood amid the primitive surroundings of his California home. During his entire life he devoted himself to farming, much of the time making his home in San Jose, where he had a ranch with large numbers of cattle and horses. When advancing years rendered manual labor no longer possible he relinquished to younger hands the active work connected with his ranch, but still maintained a supervision of his property interests. At the time of his death he was eighty-three. His wife, Margarita (Pacheco) Palomares, had died in 1857 when fifty-two years of age. They were the parents of the following-named children: Benedita, Maria Jesus, Christopher, Rosalio, José Dolores (the subject of this article), Concepcion and Francisco.

In the sketch of Porfirio Palomares, on another page, will be found further mention of the family genealogy and a record of the descent as traced from the governor of the castle of St. Gregory, at Oran, Spain. José Dolores Palomares was born in San José, Cal., March 24, 1841, and was reared to a knowledge of farm affairs. Selecting agriculture for his life work, he turned his attention to farming in the Calaveras valley and also had ten years of experience in ranching in Santa Clara county. A later venture was the real-estate business, which occupied six years, and afterward he spent three years carpentering at Contra Costa.

Since 1876 he has made his home in Lordsburg, where he owns a valuable farm and gives his attention to a supervision of his interests. In 1882 he erected a commodious house and barn, planted fruit trees of various kinds and a vineyard, since which time he has improved and sold considerable of his property, although still retaining important village possessions. Like the majority of the Palomares family, he favors the Democratic party and is a Roman Catholic in religious views. By his marriage to Sarafina Macias, daughter of Estaban Macias of Mexico, he has nine children, namely: Porfirio, Maggie, Chonita, Francisco, Arturo, Emilia, Rosa, Issavel and Ernestine.

CAPT. SAMUEL F. REBER. For the important position he now holds, as quartermaster and commissary of subsistence at the Pacific Branch National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, Captain Reber is admirably qualified by reason of his long and successful experience as a soldier in the Civil war. This appointment, tendered him through the recommendation of Senator Foraker of Ohio, forms a fitting climax to the patriotic spirit manifested during the days of our country's need, when as a volunteer he eagerly sought for an opportunity to fight for the Union, braving hardships and perils in order to aid in securing victory for the stars and stripes.

The ancestry of the family is traced to John Reber, a German, who in 1742 immigrated to Berks county, Pa. From him descended Bernard, whose son, John Reber, was a native of Berks county, followed farm pursuits, and died in Lewisburg, Pa. Next in line of descent was Samuel, also a native of Berks county, and who removed to Illinois in 1852, settling on Yellow creek, near Freeport. The next year he died at his new home. In Berks county he had married Mary Ritter, whose father, Jacob Ritter, was born in that county, of an old Pennsylvania family. In 1859 she removed to Dayton, Ohio, and there died in 1879. Of her sixteen children who grew to years of maturity three daughters and three sons are now living. Imbued with a patriotic spirit, five of the sons enlisted in the Union army and served with meritorious valor. Levy, who was for three years a soldier in the Forty-sixth Illinois Infantry, died in Nebraska in 1896; Martin, who was for three years in the same regiment, is now living at Eldorado Springs, Mo.; Samuel F. was a soldier in the Twenty-fourth Ohio Infantry for three years of the war; Henry, who was a member of the Ninth Iowa Infantry, died in Dayton, Ohio, in 1869; and James, who as a sixteen-year-old boy enlisted in the One Hundred and Thirty-second Ohio Infantry, is now cashier of Winters National Bank of Dayton, Ohio.

In Lewisburg, Pa., Samuel F. Reber was born in 1843. His childhood years were passed principally in Illinois, but in 1859 he removed from there to Dayton, Ohio. In 1861, at the first call for volunteers, he enlisted in the service, but the quota being full, he was assigned to the Twenty-fourth Ohio Infantry, and was mustered in at Camp Chase. As orderly sergeant he proved himself efficient and won promotion to drillmaster of the non-commissioned officer. Among his early engagements were those at Greenbrier and Cheat Mountain, W. Va., after which his regiment and the Sixth Ohio were sent to Kentucky and assigned to Nelson's division of the army of the Ohio, organized by General Buell. Shortly after the commission of lieutenant was tendered him, he commanded his company at Shiloh, all of the commissioned officers being either disabled or killed. Having proved himself an efficient leader he was offered promotion to captain, but being only nineteen years of age he considered himself too young to accept the responsibility. Among his engagements in 1862 were those of Woodbury, Perryville and Stone river. In October he was assigned to the pioneer corps and made assistant quartermaster and impressing officer of the army of the Cumberland, where his duties afforded a splendid scope for the display of his unusual ability. Meantime he had accepted an appointment as first lieutenant, and in January, 1863, was sent to Washington, D. C., to receive instructions in a new system of telegraphy. Returning to the army in April, he was in time to participate in the Chattanooga campaign which culminated in the battle of Chickamauga. While the army was stationed at Chattanooga he was in active service on Waldron's Ridge and in the Sequache valley, returning in time for the battles of Lookout mountain and Missionary Ridge. In the latter engagement he sent and received all of General Grant's messages. In the winter of 1863-64 he had charge of a signal station of observation on Lookout mountain. During the Atlanta campaign he was chief signal officer of the Twentieth Army Corps and was with General Hooker in every engagement of the campaign. The term of service having expired, his regiment was discharged, but he was retained by special order of the war department and remained until Atlanta was captured. The news of the capture he signaled to Vining Station, nine miles from Atlanta, where a telegraph office had been established. He was mustered out October 13, 1864, and at once began recruiting volunteers in Dayton. In March, 1865, he was tendered a commission as lieutenant-colonel by the governor of Ohio, but all indications pointed to a speedy close of the war, and so he declined the honor. He was also commissioned a lieutenant in the regular army and still retains the commission in his possession, but decided he would prefer business pursuits. During all of his service, working side by side with him, was Burch Foraker, a brother of Senator Foraker. It is worthy of note that their promotions were simultaneous, even including the signal service, and thus was formed a friendship between the two that continued until Captain Foraker died in 1875.

When the war had closed and men began to settle down to the ordinary pursuits of civic life, Captain Reber went to Portsmouth, Ohio, where for years he carried on an insurance business. In 1883 he removed to Minneapolis, Minn., where he carried on a building business until 1900. While there he served as health inspector, having been appointed under a Republican administration, he being a pronounced and active Republican. His marriage, in Lancaster, Pa., united him with Miss Sarah B. Kieffer, who was born in that city. Four children comprise their family, namely: Burch Foraker and John Charlton, who are connected with the St. Paul road in Minneapolis; Samuel Kieffer, who is associated with the Fresno Democrat in Fresno, Cal.; and Walter W., also an employe of the St. Paul in Minneapolis. While in Dayton, Ohio, Captain Reber was initiated into Masonry, and for years has held membership in the blue lodge at Portsmouth. During the period of his residence in Minneapolis he was adjutant of Plummer Post, G. A. R. In 1900 he came to California to visit his son in Fresno and was so pleased with the climate and the country that he decided to remain, hence the appointment as quartermaster at the Soldiers' Home, which was tendered him September 20, 1901, proved most happily in accord with his own tastes and preferences, and on the 1st of October he entered upon his duties, to the efficient discharge of which he has since devoted his time and thoughtful attention.

J. C. RUST. A resident of Pasadena since 1884, Mr. Rust has been identified in various ways with the growth and progress of this city. He was born at North Vernon, Ind., January 19, 1857, and is a son of Abraham and Sarah (Boner) Rust, who make their home in Pasadena. His father, who was a native of Ohio, spent a portion of his earlier life in that state and Indiana, but later engaged in farm pursuits in Kansas, returning from there to Indiana, and finally settling in California. In the family there were twelve children, but five are deceased.

Until eighteen years of age J. C. Rust lived in Indiana. From there he went to Illinois and began farming in Jackson county. Five years later he removed to Kansas and took up a tract of farm land in Riley county. Not feeling satisfied with the limited education he had received, he applied some of his savings to the broadening of his education, for which purpose he attended the State Agricultural College at Manhattan. However, when ready to enter upon the senior year he left the college in order to take up the study of medicine. For a time he read under Dr. Paddock of Nelawaka, Kans., and later was with Dr. Cope, of Vernon, Ind., but on his return to Kansas gave up his intention to become a physician, and instead went to the mines of Silver Reeve, Utah. A year later, in March, 1884, he arrived in Pasadena. His early undertakings in this city were along the line of real-estate investments. On the corner of Illinois and Garfield avenues he laid out two acres, forming the J. C. Rust addition to Pasadena. In addition he laid out five acres, comprising the Rust subdivision of Whittier; also another five-acre tract, the Rust & Landreth subdivision of Whittier; and the Rust, Baldwin & Landreth subdivision of Whittier, ten acres.

F. J. Beckwith

During the World's Fair Mr. Rust visited in the east. On his return he engaged in the local express business on the Terminal road, after which he was with Patten & Davis. In April, 1896, with his brother, S. L., he established the Independence Ice Company, a wholesale and retail concern, the two brothers having continued together ever since. In addition he is interested in the Revenue Oil Company in Kern county. As a member of the Electro-Geodetic Mining Company, which operates in different parts of Arizona, he has important connection with mining interests, and besides he is a director in the Golden Age Mining Company, operating in Chaparal, Ariz. He is connected with the Pasadena Board of Trade, is a staunch Republican in political views, and in fraternal relations is associated with the Woodmen of the World. When living in Manhattan, Kans., he married Miss Ivaloo Winder, who was born in Ohio and received an excellent education in the Manhattan schools. While living in that city she became a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, with which she has since been connected. The two children born of this marriage are Everett W. and Russell L.

FRANCIS JEFFERSON BECKWITH.
Much of interest attaches to the life of this pioneer of Ventura county, whose history for many years was closely associated with that of the county and whose death was a distinct loss to its citizenship. Mr. Beckwith was born in Ontario county, N. Y., August 14, 1834, of Scotch ancestry. His father, Nathan, Jr., was born in 1798 and for many years made his home in New York, from which state he moved to Iowa and took up land on the then frontier. However, he later returned to New York and died in Ontario county when sixty-five years of age. The grandfather, Nathan, Sr., was a pioneer of Oswego county, N. Y. Three of the Beckwith family bore arms with the Americans during the war of 1812. The mother of Mr.

Beckwith bore the maiden name of Phoebe Granger and was born in Ontario county in 1808, her father, Elihu Granger, having removed there from New Jersey.

In a family of seven children Francis J. Beckwith was the youngest. When quite young he accompanied his parents to Indiana and afterward endured the vicissitudes connected with clearing a tract of raw land, in the midst of frontier surroundings lacking every comfort of modern civilization. After the death of his father he continued at home, assisting his mother after the older children had gone into homes of their own. On starting out for himself he went to Michigan and bought land near Vermontville, Eaton county. No improvements had been attempted, and his first task was the building of a log cabin. Next he attempted to put the land under cultivation. After two very busy years on that place he sold out and secured employment in a mill, where he remained for three years.

September 21, 1874, was the date of Mr. Beckwith's arrival in California. For two years he worked for his brother, Appleton, on the latter's ranch in Ventura county. He then went back to Indiana, but two years later returned to California and re-entered the employ of his brother. February 3, 1881, Appleton Beckwith died, bequeathing to his brothers, Francis J. and Addison, his ranch of seven hundred acres. At a later date Addison sold his interest to Francis J., who thus became the sole owner of the valuable estate. Three hundred acres of the tract are rich farming lands, while the balance is adapted for pasturage with the exception of a small acreage of waste land. In location the ranch has many advantages. It is in the midst of a fine farming country, where successes in the past have encouraged the farmers to renewed efforts for the future. Formerly hogs and cattle were the chief products, but corn and lima beans now form the staple products, and from this Beckwith ranch twenty-five cents of corn and two thousand pounds of beans form an average crop. The most of the improvements on the place are the result of Mr. Beckwith's painstaking care and watchful oversight. He planted the trees that now adorn the homestead; and built the large barns and granaries whose well-filled cribs denote plenty and comfort.

August 27, 1859, Mr. Beckwith married Sarah L. Greenmayer, who was born July 5, 1841, and is a daughter of Jesse and Mary (Paul) Greenmayer. Her father was born in Pennsylvania in 1818 and her mother, of Dutch descent, was born in that state the same year. The four children of Mr. and Mrs. Beckwith are: Caroline, born in Indiana, September 20, 1860, now the wife of George A. Jones, of Ventura county; Charles F., born in Indiana, January 12, 1862; Delbert T., born in Michigan, January 31, 1869; and Emma G., born October 22, 1878, now the wife of M. M. Baker, of Ventura county.

While a Republican in politics, Mr. Beckwith at no time participated actively in public affairs. Instead, his attention was concentrated upon improving his ranch and training his children for useful positions in society. He died December 30, 1901, and his body was laid in its final resting place on New Year's day. In death he was followed by the respect of associates and the affection of family and intimate friends. The end was unexpected, resulting from an attack of pneumonia and heart failure, and his sudden demise came as a shock to his acquaintances, and particularly to the pioneer element of the valley, among whom he had lived and labored for so many years.

WILLIAM ROMMEL. A resident of Los Angeles since 1883, Mr. Rommel was born in Jefferson county, Ky., January 28, 1849. For many years the family of which he is a representative lived in the vicinity of Stuttgart, Wurtemberg, Germany, where they were scientific agriculturists and devoted members of the Lutheran Church. Daniel Rommel, the father of William, was born in the same locality, graduated from the Royal College of Wurtemberg, and became proficient in horticulture, floriculture and landscape gardening. When twenty-one years of age he crossed the ocean and settled in Kentucky, where he first managed and later owned a fine plantation, and remained on the property until his death. He was an anti-slavery man and fearless in his denunciation of injustice. In Kentucky he married Barbara Beerworth, who was born in that state, her father having migrated there from Wurtemberg. She is now seventy-three years of age and makes Los Angeles her home. Of her ten children, all attained maturity and seven are now living, four in California. John is president of the Rommel Oil Company of Los Angeles; Edward is secretary of the same company; and a sister, Mrs. Kohlmeier, also lives in Los Angeles.

Until his eighteenth year Mr. Rommel was reared on his father's farm in Kentucky, during which time he received a fair education in the public schools. In order to prepare himself to be an architect and contractor he undertook mechanical studies with an expert in that line. In 1875 he began building in Louisville, Ky., where he erected some of the finest buildings in the city. In 1883 he came to Los Angeles, being the first of the family to settle in the far west. Immediately he entered the building business, his first contract being for the residence of Winnall Dalton. Later constructions due to his skill are the Young Men's Christian Association building, the English Lutheran and Christian churches, besides many other public and private structures. In January of 1895 he was appointed building inspector by Mayor Frank Roeder, and served until 1897. At one time he was president of the Builders' Exchange, of which he is a charter member. He was also a charter member of the Chamber of Commerce. In 1901 he became interested in the real-estate business as a member of the firm of Glass & Rommel, who have made a specialty of buying vacant property, putting up houses on the same, and then selling as opportunity offered. They also act as insurance agents.

In Louisville, Ky., Mr. Rommel married Mary Philipine Freyvogel, a native of that city. They are the parents of six children: Nettie, Mamie, Samuel, Calvin, Carrie and Gertrude. The family are connected with the Lutheran Church, toward which Mr. Rommel is a contributor. In national politics he is a supporter of the principles of the Republican party. While in Louisville he became a member of Campus Lodge, A. F. & A. M. There, too, he was raised to the Royal Arch, Knight Templar and thirty-second degrees. On coming to Los Angeles he became a charter member of the Southern California Lodge, F. & A. M., Commandery No. 9, K. T., Los Angeles Consistory and Al Malakiah Temple, N. M. S.

E. E. SHAFFER. The auditor of San Diego county, who has been a resident of San Diego since 1870, was born in Contra Costa county, Cal., May 29, 1859, and was one of three brothers now living. The eldest of these, George B., is connected with the First National Bank of Los Angeles; and the youngest, J. E., was deputy in the auditor's office in San Diego until his death, which occurred April 13, 1902. The father, Josiah Shaffer, removed from Pennsylvania to Iowa and in 1849 crossed the plains with an ox-team, afterward engaging in mining on the American and Feather rivers. Finding the venture less profitable than hoped, he took up farming in Contra Costa county. From there he came to San Diego and engaged in milling. In 1872 he began the manufacture of salt by the solar process, having his works at the head of the bay, and continuing in the occupation until he died, in 1880, at sixty-one years. His wife, Delia D., was born in Harrison county, Pa., of Scotch descent, and in 1851 crossed the plains with a sister and brother-in-law, settling in Contra Costa county. Her death occurred in San Diego in 1892.

The education of E. E. Shaffer was obtained in grammar and high schools, also in the San Francisco Business College. For twelve years he had charge of Snyder's book and stationery business. He then engaged in the manufacture of salt, as a partner of his brother, J. E., their works being known as the La Punta salt works. Under their supervision they were enlarged to a capacity of six hundred tons per year. In January, 1901, the plant was sold. In 1892 E. E. Shaffer was elected county auditor on the Republican ticket. Two years later he was re-elected. Meantime the legislature had changed the term to four years, so that he remained in office for his second term a period of four years. In 1898 he was re-elected by a large majority, to serve until January, 1903. In San Diego he married Mathilda Gabrielson, who was born in Danville, Wis., and by whom he has three sons, George Ernest, Daniel Eugene and Elmer Evan. Fraternally Mr. Shaffer stands very high in Masonry, is past president of the Native Sons of the Golden West, a member of the Encampment, I. O. O. F., the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, Maccabees, Ancient Order of United Workmen, Independent Order of Foresters and Knights of Pythias.

JAMES MILLER GUINN, of Los Angeles City, was born near Houston, Shelby county, Ohio, November 27, 1834. His paternal and maternal ancestors removed from Scotland and settled in the north of Ireland in the latter part of the seventeenth century. His father was born near Enniskillen, in County Fermanagh, and his mother, Eliza Miller, was born near Londonderry. His father came to America in 1819, and after ten years spent in the lumber business in the province of New Brunswick he migrated to Ohio, in 1830, and located on a tract of land covered with a dense forest.

James M. Guinn spent his boyhood years in assisting his father to clear a farm. The facilities for obtaining an education in the backwoods of Ohio fifty years ago were very meager. Three months of each winter he attended school in a little log schoolhouse. By studying in the evenings, after a hard day's work, he prepared himself for teaching; and at the age of eighteen began the career of a country pedagogue. For two years he alternated teaching with farming. Ambitious to obtain a better education, he entered the preparatory department of Antioch College, of which institution Horace Mann, the eminent educator, was then president. In 1857 he entered Oberlin College. He was entirely dependent on his own resources for his college expenses. By teaching during vacations, by manual labor and the closest economy, he worked his way through college and graduated with honors.

On the breaking out of the Civil war, in 1861, he was among the very first to respond to President Lincoln's call for volunteers, enlisting April 19, 1861, four days after the fall of Fort Sumter. He was a member of Company C, Seventh Regiment, Ohio Volunteer Infantry. Later he enlisted in the same regiment for three years. This regiment was one of the first sent into West Virginia. He served through the West Virginia campaign under McClellan and afterwards under Rosecrans. The Seventh Regiment joined the army of the Potomac in the fall of 1861, and took part in all the great battles in which that army was engaged up to and including the battle of Gettysburg. In September, 1863, the regiment, as part of the Twelfth Army Corps, was sent to the west, and was engaged in the battles of Lookout Mountain, Missionary Ridge and Ringgold. Its three years being ended, it was mustered out the 1st of June, 1864, in front of Atlanta.

In August, 1861, while the Seventh Regiment was guarding Carnifax Ferry, on the Gauley river, it was attacked by three thousand Confederates under Floyd and Wise. After a desperate resistance it was forced to retreat, leaving its dead and wounded on the field. On the retreat the company of which Mr. Guinn was a member fell into an ambush and nearly one-half of those who escaped from the battlefield were captured. Mr. Guinn, after a narrow escape from capture, traveled for five days in the mountains, subsisting on a few berries and leaves of wintergreen. He finally reached the Union forces at Gauley Bridge, almost starved. At the battle of Cedar Mountain his regiment lost sixty-six per cent of those engaged—a percentage of loss nearly twice as great as that of the Light Brigade in its famous charge at Bala-klava. Of the twenty-three of Mr. Guinn's company who went into the battle only six came out unhurt, he being one of the fortunate six.

Of his military service, a history of the company written by one of his comrades after the war, says: "Promoted to corporal November 1, 1862; took part in the battles of Cross Lanes, Winchester, Port Republic, Cedar Mountain, second Bull Run, Antietam, Dumfries. * * * On every march of the company till his discharge."

After his discharge he was commissioned by Governor Tod, of Ohio, captain in a new regiment that was forming, but, his health having been broken by hard service and exposure, he was compelled to decline the position.

In 1864 he came to California (by way of Panama) for the benefit of his health. After teaching school three months in Alameda county he joined the gold rush to Idaho, packing his blankets on his back and footing it from Umatilla, Ore., to Boise Basin, a distance of three hundred miles. For three years he followed gold mining with varying success, sometimes striking it rich and again dead broke. His health failing him again, from the effects of his army service, he returned to California in 1867; and in 1868 went east and took treatment for a number of months in Dr. Jackson's famous water cure, at Danville, N. Y. He returned to California in 1869, and in October of that year came to Los Angeles county. He found employment as principal of the schools of Anaheim—a position he filled for twelve consecutive years. He reached the town with $10; by investing his savings from his salary in land, at the end of twelve years he sold his landed possessions for $15,000. During the greater portion of the time he was employed in the Anaheim schools he was a member of the county board of education. He helped to organize the first teachers' institute (October 31, 1870) ever organized in the county. In 1874 he married Miss D. C. Marquis, an assistant teacher, daughter of the Rev. John Marquis. To them three children have been born: Mabel Elisabeth, Edna Marquis and Howard James. The Marquis family is of Huguenot ancestry. The progenitors of the family in America left France after the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and settled in the north of Ireland. From there, in 1720, they emigrated to America, locating in Pennsylvania.

In 1881 Mr. Guinn was appointed superintendent of the city schools of Los Angeles. He filled the position of school superintendent for two years. He then engaged in merchandising, which he followed for three years. Selling out, he engaged in the real estate and loan business, safely passing through the boom. He filled the position of deputy county assessor several years.

Politically he has always been a staunch Republican. He was secretary of a Republican club before he was old enough to vote, and, arriving at the voting age, he cast his first vote for John C. Fremont, in 1856, and has had the privilege of voting for every Republican nominee for President. In 1873, when the county was overwhelmingly Democratic, he was the Republican nominee for the assembly and came within fifty-two votes of being elected. In 1875 he was the nominee of the anti-monopoly wing of the Republican party for state superintendent of public instruction. For the sake of party harmony he withdrew just before the election in favor of the late Prof. Ezra Carr, who was triumphantly elected. He served a number of years on the Republican county central committee, being secretary from 1884 to 1886.

Mr. Guinn took an active part in the organization of the Historical Society of Southern California, in 1883, and has filled every office in the gift of the society. He has contributed a number of valuable historical papers to magazines and newspapers and has edited the Historical Society's Annual for the past ten years. He is a member of the American Historical Association of Washington, D. C., having the honor of being the only representative of that association in Southern California. While engaged in the profession of teaching he was a frequent contributor to educational periodicals and ranked high as a lecturer on educational subjects before teachers' institutes and associations. He is a charter member of Stanton Post

No. 55, G. A. R.; also a past post commander, and has discharged the duties of post adjutant continuously for ten years. In Southern California Lodge No. 191, A. O. U. W., he has held the office of recorder for fourteen years. When the Society of Pioneers of Los Angeles county was organized, in 1897, he was one of the committee of three selected to draft a form of organization and a constitution and by-laws, and has filled the position of secretary and that of a member of the board of directors continuously since the society's organization.

Besides the historical portion of this volume, he has written a brief history of California, and a history of Los Angeles city and county.

JAMES T. DUNN. The family represented by Mr. Dunn, of Gardena, is among the oldest and most honorable of Georgia. His grandfather, James Lavender, was a native of that state and one of its lifelong residents. For his day and locality he was a rich man, his possessions including two thousand acres of land and sixty-five slaves. At the time of his death, in 1864, the value of his lands had been greatly lessened by reason of the Civil war, which brought death and destruction in its wake. John, father of James T. Dunn, was born and reared in Georgia, and cultivated a plantation of eighty acres there. During 1857 he removed to the southern part of Arkansas and bought eighteen hundred acres in Union county, where he engaged in raising cotton for twelve years. February 5, 1870, he left his Arkansas home for the Pacific coast, and on the 3d of March he arrived in Los Angeles, from which city he proceeded to Downey. There he bought eighty acres of land and his son, James T., purchased a forty-acre tract. In the fall of 1880 he removed to Redondo Beach, and for six years leased and cultivated five hundred acres, where he raised barley. The year 1886 found him in Moneta, where he bought twenty-six acres, and improved the same with a neat residence. At this place his death occurred in 1895. His wife was Mary Lavender, a native of Georgia, and by their union three children were born who attained maturity, James T. being the eldest of these. He was born near Atlanta, Ga., March 17, 1850, and received a fair education in private schools, after which he became interested in farming. In the various removals of the family he accompanied them, finally settling in Moneta, where he has made his home since 1886. In 1891 he embarked in the grocery business and about the same time erected the first store building here, this being also utilized for a postoffice. He still operates a feed mill on his property. However, of late years he has given his attention almost wholly to the cultivation of his ranch of two hundred acres, of which sixty acres are in peas and strawberries, while the balance is in barley. Under his supervision the land has been transformed from a raw prairie to an improved and valuable ranch, and he has also added to its value by his private pumping plant, which has one hundred inches' capacity.

CHARLES FERNALD.

While in Arkansas Mr. Dunn married Miss Ellen I. Edington, who was born in Alabama. Her father, Jesse M. Edington, a native of Tennessee, carried on a cotton plantation in the south and was a man of considerable influence in his locality; his last years were spent in California. The family of Mr. and Mrs. Dunn consists of the following children: Jesse L.; Mary E., wife of J. M. Hardwick; and John J., a university student. The family are associated with the Methodist Episcopal Church South and are interested in all movements for the welfare and progress of their community. In general elections Mr. Dunn always votes the Democratic ticket. During his thirty years and more of residence in Southern California he has witnessed the many changes wrought here; has seen booms rise and fall, people come and go, and now at last has the gratification of seeing an era of steady prosperity set in, which ultimately will make of this region the most desirable residence section of our whole country.

CHARLES FERNALD. The life whose salient events this biography depicts began in North Berwick, Me., May 27, 1830, and closed in Santa Barbara, Cal., July 7, 1892. The Fernald family comes from a long line of Puritan ancestry and was founded in America by Dr. Reginald Fernald, who was born in Bristol, England, and as physician and surgeon accompanied the expedition of Sir Ferdinando Gorges to the new world, settling in New Hampshire in 1631 with Capt. John Mason's company. A grant of fifty acres was conveyed to him in 1640. The northeast shore of the Piscataqua river which he and his brother Thomas owned, remained in the family for one hundred and fifty years, when John Fernald, Jr., conveyed away Fernald's Island, which, June 15, 1806, passed into the ownership of the United States and is now the site of the Portsmouth navy yard. During the Revolutionary war Hercules Fernald, grandfather of Charles, and who was born at Kittery December 4, 1749, rendered brave service in the Massachusetts line, fighting at Dorchester Heights, Fort Constitution, Bennington, Bemis Heights, Stillwater, Saratoga and other noteworthy engagements with the British.

The education of Charles Fernald was largely gained under the preceptorship of Prof. Harrison Carroll Hobart. When less than nineteen years of age he joined a party bound for California, and after a long journey arrived in San Francisco June 14, 1849. A few months in the mines sufficed to prove that his tastes ran in other directions. Returning to San Francisco, he engaged in editorial work on the Post and Alta, well known publications of that city. Meantime his law studies were carefully continued. The fire of May 4, 1851, and that of May 4, 1852, somewhat dampened his enthusiasm in regard to life in the far west, and he decided to return to New England. With this purpose in view, but wishing first to visit some friends in Southern California and then take the Panama steamer at San Diego, he came to Santa Barbara, June 30, 1852, where he met his friends, Edward Sherman Hoar and Augustus F. Hinchman.

So complete has been the transformation in the appearance of Santa Barbara that one can scarcely imagine the contrast afforded by present-day activity in comparison with the sleepy drowsiness of the Mexican settlement of fifty years ago. Just at the time of Mr. Fernald's arrival, however, the peaceful lives of the people had been interrupted by an organized set of bandits who terrorized the entire community and who had compelled the county officers to resign their positions. The best men of the community were making a determined effort to evolve order out of anarchy. At this opportune time Mr. Fernald was offered the position of county judge if he would remain. In a day his entire plans were changed and all idea of returning east was abandoned. March 14, 1853, he received the appointment as judge, and September 5, same year, he was elected to the office, to which he was re-elected two years later. One of his first official acts was the appointment of Russel Heath as district attorney. His splendid personal courage enabled him to cope with the desperadoes who had no regard for life or property. His life was in constant danger in the then unsettled condition of the country and he had many stirring experiences in the administration of the law, and holding in check the many rough characters who menaced the public peace. That he succeeded in administering justice and in securing the respect of the community is proved by the fact that he held the office for four successive terms, by election. Under the first state constitution the duties of a county judge were not limited to the trial of civil cases. As judge of the court of sessions he presided at the trial of many criminal offenses, and he was also judge of the probate court and of the county court.

During his incumbency of the office, Judge Fernald was a close student of the law and also of the Spanish language. As a result he was thoroughly equipped to handle the peculiar litigation of the country arising principally from the construction of Mexican grants, their authenticity, limitations and boundaries, and consequently after retiring from the bench he was retained as counsel by the principal owners of property in Santa Barbara, which at that time included the present county of Ventura. He was admitted to the state supreme court September 2, 1854, to the United States circuit court in 1857, and the United States supreme court in 1874. His superior legal acquirements and readiness of resources in the management of complicated matters affecting the titles to land and arising in the peculiar disputes characteristic of the country after the conquest, secured his employment in his profession not only by the land owners of his locality, but also brought him a clientage beyond the borders of California, notably as attorney for Thomas A. Scott of Philadelphia, who owned large ranches in Southern California. Especially valuable to the city were his services in finally settling the title to and fixing the boundaries of its municipal lands, as successor to the ancient pueblo of Santa Barbara, by obtaining a patent therefor (four square leagues) from the United States land department, the first patent ever issued to a pueblo in this state.

With the almost unanimous vote of the people, Judge Fernald was elected mayor of Santa Barbara in May, 1882, and served for two years, declining, however, to accept the salary attached to the office. During his service as mayor the Marquis of Lorne and the Princess Louise honored Santa Barbara with a visit of three weeks. Later Judge Fernald was chosen United States commissioner for the southern district of California. Possessing linguistic ability, he familiarized himself with French and Italian literature, and few residents of the United States excelled him in knowledge of the Spanish language. Of international law and the science of government he was a constant student, and he was familiar with the principles of civil as well as common law. A life member of the American Forestry Association, he was deeply interested in the care of the forests and the raising of fruit, and the first experiments in planting and cultivating olive trees in Southern California, outside of the old missions, were made by him in 1865-66, when he purchased the Belmont property, near Santa Barbara, and planted it in olives, for the purpose of proving that olives could be produced for preserving and for making oil of the best quality.

At North Berwick, Me., August 7, 1862, Judge Fernald married Miss Hannah Hobbs, daughter of Wilson and Sarah Eliot (Goodwin) Hobbs, and a descendant of Judge John Hill, Samuel Goodwin (son of Dominicus and Hannah (Hill) Goodwin), Robert Eliot and the Pepperell family. The children of Judge and Mrs. Fernald are four, two sons and two daughters. Mrs. Fernald is a member of the Daughters of the American Revolution and the Colonial Dames, her ancestors, the Goodwins and Hobbs, both having had representatives in the Revolutionary and colonial wars. A brother of her mother, Hon. Ichabod Goodwin, was the war governor of New Hampshire, and another brother, Dr. Daniel Goodwin, was president of the University of Pennsylvania. Judge Fernald was a life member of the Pioneer Society of California, member of the National Association of Sons of the American Revolution, member of the American Academy of Political and Social Science in Philadelphia, and of the California State Bar Association, in which he served as vice-president.

As the bearing and deeds of Judge Fernald in life had been worthy a knight of old, it was fitting that his associates, the Knight Templar Masons, should perform the cross of steel over his grave. His comrades in the California Society, Sons of the American Revolution, issued a pamphlet calling attention to his worthy life and dwelling upon his merits. The superior court of the state, in and for the county of Santa Barbara, presented the following resolutions, quoted in part:

"Whereas, on the 7th of July, 1892, Charles Fernald, a member of this court, was removed by death from his sphere of action in our midst;

"By the death of this, our brother attorney, the bar of this county, as well as that of the state, has met with a loss that will long be felt. After forty years of service upon the bench and as an advocate and counselor at this bar, his name has become identified with Santa Barbara in legal circles throughout this coast. Although just past the age of three-score, he outranked us all in years of practice here. He was eminent in ability, intellectuality and learning, in urbanity, courtesy and the exercise of the ethics of his profession, he stood the peer of any. His success, particularly in land litigation, gave him a reputation and clientage beyond the local bar. He set an example as an honorable practitioner and never knowingly represented an unjust cause. The work of his latter years might be called 'A volume of selected cases,' for not every cause could command his professional skill. To the younger members of the bar he was ever ready to impart the benefit of his ripe experience; and his name will remain particularly green in the memory of these. Therefore be it

"Resolved, That in the death of Charles Fernald, the bar of Santa Barbara county has lost a distinguished and valued member, the state of California an honorable citizen, and his bereaved family a devoted and dearly beloved husband and father."

In the resolutions passed by St. Omar Commandery No. 30, K. T., of Santa Barbara, attention was called to the fidelity of Judge Fernald to the high and lofty principles of Masonry, and as a token of respect to his memory the swords of the officers and knights, and the banner of the commandery were draped in mourning for thirty days. Numerous tributes to his worth were also called forth from the press, both local and general. The Santa Barbara Press, in alluding to his attainments, stated that "In judicial circles throughout the state he was known and recognized as a lawyer of prominence. He was a member of the San Francisco and the State Bar Associations, and the familiar friend of the distinguished lawyers whose youthful brilliancy add luster to the early history of our commonwealth. In his social conduct he set an example to the community worthy of emulation. He was faithful, affectionate and indulgent as a husband and father, and it was a privilege to be admitted to the home circle. There he cast aside all the weapons and armor of the battlefield and became the warm-hearted host, and captivated and charmed all with his fund of knowledge, so happily expressed. It is with sorrow that Santa Barbara parts with one who was so closely identified with her interests and progress."

From the San Francisco Bulletin: "Charles Fernald, who died at his residence at Santa Barbara, July 7, was one of the best-known lawyers in the state. He had been a familiar figure in the supreme court for years, and among the older members of the bar he had many friends. Coming to California in the early days, when but a youth, he had grown up with the commonwealth. He had seen the jurisprudence of the state molded from a chaotic mass of pioneer times into a complete code for the guidance and protection of the citizen. As a beardless youth he had argued cases before Murray, Baldwin and Field. As an advocate in the vigor of manhood he had tried many important suits before the justices erected under the new constitution.

"As a lawyer Mr. Fernald was earnest, industrious and able. He entered into the preparation of a case with the same ardor that he would were his own fortunes involved; he made his client's interests his own. As a citizen he was a leader in every enterprise that had for its object the advancement of the state. Corruption in the body politic had no more relentless foe. In his intercourse with his fellows he was considerate, courteous and kind; he had all the attributes of a gentleman and he exemplified them in his daily life. In his home he was everything that a husband and father should be."

ROY B. STEPHENS. During the colonial period the Stephens family became established in Virginia and from there later generations moved to Kentucky. Thomas N., son of a Virginian, was born in Kentucky and became a pioneer farmer of Missouri, where he remained until death. Next in line of descent was Dr. Charles R. Stephens, a native of Monroe county, Mo., and a graduate of Bellevue Hospital Medical College, class of 1874. Immediately after graduating he accepted an appointment as surgeon in the United States army, in which capacity he continued for three years, meantime being stationed on the frontier. Many of his experiences were thrilling and perilous, and the years of his service formed an eventful period of his career. One of his least desirable experiences was in the expedition of 1876 under General Crook, when the regiment was so nearly starved that they were forced to eat mule meat. In the battle of Rosebud he was with Gen. Guy V. Henry, when the latter was shot through the nose. Subsequently he was sent to Washington to assist in amputating the leg of Lieutenant Van Lutoltz and give the officer needed attention until recovery. After leaving the army he was for two years surgeon at the Winnebago Indian agency. On turning to private practice, he opened an office in Omaha, Neb., and afterward followed his profession in Middle Grove, Mo., from which place in 1888 he came to South Pasadena, Cal. The latter part of October, 1901, found him locating for practice at Victor, Cal., where he died three weeks later, on the 14th of November.

After going to the central west Dr. Charles R. Stephens married Miss Ida F. Demarest, who was born in New York City and died in California December 6, 1897. Through the Demarest family the ancestry is traced back to the Bogardus family and Anneke Jans. Her grandfather, John G. Demarest, of Hackensack, N. J., was a son of Bridget (Brower) Demarest, whose father, John, was a son of Abraham Brower, the latter a son of Sybroust Brower, whose mother, Annette (Bogardus) Brower, was a daughter of William Bogardus, the latter a son of Everardus Bogardus. An uncle of Mrs. Stephens, Abraham Demarest, was a leading publisher and engraver of New York City. Her father, William F. Demarest, a native of New York City, became a pioneer of Omaha, Neb., and opened a grocery there before the Civil war. From that time until his death he engaged in mercantile pursuits. Six children were born of his union with Mary Ann Cox, who was born in the same county in England as Queen Victoria and on the same day as the late queen. Her death occurred in Omaha. When a girl Mrs. Stephens was given excellent educational advantages in Omaha and grew to womanhood, the center of a large social circle conspicuous for refinement and culture. Before her marriage she visited in Denver, Colo., where her brother-in-law, Charles Fleury, was making his headquarters during the building of the Colorado Central Railroad, for which he was a contractor. While in that city she attended a grand ball given in honor of Duke Alexis of Russia, and on that occasion received from the duke the compliment of being the most beautiful woman he had seen in America. After coming to Pasadena she was appointed in charge of the postoffice, under the administration of President Harrison, and continued to hold the position until her death.

In Omaha, Neb., Roy B. Stephens was born September 21, 1876, being the only child of Dr. C. R. and Ida F. (Demarest) Stephens. In 1889 he accompanied his parents to South Pasadena, and while still a mere boy began to assist his mother in the postoffice, also clerked in the San Gabriel Valley Bank from 1894 until 1897. In the capacity of deputy he was given charge of the South Pasadena postoffice in January, 1897, and in February of the following year was commissioned postmaster at this point, which office he has since filled. At first a fourth-class station, the office has now become third-class, and receives thirteen and dispatches eleven mails per day. Though "rocked in the cradle of Democracy" Mr. Stephens is a true-blue Republican and holds his appointment under a Republican administration, but numbers his friends among all parties, his service giving general satisfaction. He is connected with the American Club and the Uniform Rank, K. O. T. M., and in religious associations is identified with the First Christian Church of Pasadena. His marriage was solemnized at Whittier, Cal., April 30, 1901, and united him with Miss Ceola Landreth, who was born in Illinois and came to Whittier with her father, Lewis Landreth, a pioneer of the colony.

J. B. STOUTENBURGH. The fact that Mr. Stoutenburgh of Pasadena represents one of the oldest Holland-Dutch families of New York is indicated in his genealogy, which he traces back in an unbroken line, through eight generations, to Jans Roeloffsen and Anneke Jans. Going back five generations in the family history, we find that his ancestor, Jacobus Stoutenburgh, came from Holland to America in 1720 and was the very first settler of Hyde Park, Dutchess county, also served as the first judge of that county. His wife, Margaret Teller, was a granddaughter of Sarah Roeloffsen and a great-granddaughter of the two notable Hollanders previously named. At the old homestead in Dutchess county occurred the birth of William I. Stoutenburgh, who in early life followed farm pursuits, but later conducted a mercantile establishment in Wayne county, N. Y., and finally retired to Dutchess county, where he died. When a young man he married Caroline Allen, daughter of Bartholomew Allen, a farmer. She was born in Dutchess county and died there, at an advanced age. Of her four children, one son and one daughter survive. The son, J. B., was born in Pennsylvania April 15, 1836, and grew to manhood at Williamson, near Palmyra, N. Y., receiving his education in subscription schools, Walworth Academy and Palmyra Union school. While still a mere boy, under the instruction of his father, he gained an excellent knowledge of merchandising, and the information thus acquired was supplemented by his clerkship in a store in Jackson, Mich., whither he went in 1856. From Jackson he removed to Kewenaw Point on Lake Superior, in the Upper Peninsula, where he acted as clerk and bookkeeper in a store connected with the copper mines.

After two years at the Point, in 1866 Mr. Stoutenburgh went to Detroit, where he engaged as bookkeeper with John J. Bagley & Co., tobacco manufacturers. In 1869 he became a member of the firm, whose principal member was at the time governor of Michigan. Owing to the absence of the governor from the office in the discharge of his executive duties, much of the responsibility and management of the business developed upon Mr. Stoutenburgh, who held the office of treasurer and also acted as financial manager of the company. The immense trade of the firm was not limited to America, but extended even across the ocean into Europe, and its management required the utmost tact, keenness of ability and resourcefulness of action. In his capacity of manager he proved equal to every emergency, and many attributed the high standing of the firm to his judicious oversight and great energy. Two years after the death of Governor Bagley the business was sold, and Mr. Stoutenburgh then became a member of the Detroit board of public works, first under Mayor Thompson, and then under S. B. Grummond. His terms of service lasted for four years, during the last of which he acted as president of the board. Under his efficient oversight as president the improvement of Belle Isle Park was begun, the continuance of which in later years has made the park one of the most beautiful spots in the United States. Another work of which the board had charge was the opening of the boulevard around Detroit, which contributes toward making the city one of the most beautiful in the country.

In Jackson county, Mich., near Columbia, Mr. Stoutenburgh and Miss Mary C. Hewitt were united in marriage. They have an only daughter, Mary Ellen. The family have resided in Pasadena since 1887, and Mr. Stoutenburgh has been largely retired from business cares, although his enterprising spirit will not permit him to enjoy entire leisure, and he has assisted in starting the Nemaha Water Company, also, with three others, improved one hundred and twenty acres at Ontario, which is now a bearing orange orchard. In politics he is a Republican and socially belongs to the Twilight Club. The unusual success he has attained in life proves him to be a man of varied talents, who merits prosperity and prominence by his diligence in business, his uprightness in all dealings, and his high sense of honor.

D S Blackburn

CAPT. D. S. BLACKBURN. It was through his official connection with the Twenty-first Illinois Infantry (Grant's old regiment) that Captain Blackburn gained the title by which he is usually known. He is a descendant of an old and honored Kentucky family, and a son of J. M. and Rachel (Shelby) Blackburn, natives respectively of Kentucky and Pickaway, Ohio, the latter being a daughter of David Shelby, an Ohio pioneer. When a young man, in 1821, his father settled near Paris, Ill., and continued to make his home in that vicinity until his death, which occurred at eighty years of age. During the Blackhawk war he served as colonel of a regiment. His wife also died in Illinois. Their only child, D. S., was born near Paris, Ill., May 15, 1836, and passed his early years upon the home farm, receiving his education in a log schoolhouse near his home. When he reached manhood he became interested in farming and stock-raising and gradually built up an extensive business.

At the opening of the Civil war D. S. Blackburn was among the first to volunteer his services to his country. May 10, 1861, he enlisted as a volunteer in one of the ten regiments that were raised by Governor Yates of Illinois. His regiment was first known as the Seventh Congressional District Regiment, but in June was mustered in as the Twenty-first Illinois Infantry. As second lieutenant of Company F he was sent to Missouri under Col. U. S. Grant. They marched to Missouri from Springfield, Ill., because the colonel said he could teach them more in one day of marching than in a month of camp life. After a short time at Monroe Station, Mo., they were ordered to different parts of the same state. At Pilot Knob, Mo., November 17, 1861, he was appointed captain of Company F, by Governor Yates.

In a battle at Fredericktown, Mo., October 8, 1861, the regiment defeated the Confederates, driving them back to Little Rock and thence to Tennessee. After participating in the battle and siege of Corinth, they proceeded to Chattanooga. Following this came the battle of Perryville. From December 30, 1862, to January 4, 1863, they were engaged in the battle of Stone River, where the regiment lost in killed and wounded over three hundred men. He was a participant in the famous battle of Chickamauga and also fought for the stars and stripes at Missionary Ridge and Lookout Mountain. During the Georgia campaign he took part in the engagements at Tunnel Hill, Dalton, Dallas, Resaca, Altoona, Buzzard's Roost, Kennesaw Mountain, Peach Tree Creek and the siege of Atlanta. When the siege ended only about twenty-five of his old company were left. Fate seems to have especially protected him, for in all of these battles he was never wounded. In July of 1865 he was mustered out at Chattanooga with the rank of captain.

When his country no longer had need of his services, the captain returned to the Illinois farm and resumed the peaceful pursuits in which he had previously engaged. He remained in the same locality until 1875, when he came to California and bought a farm of three hundred acres six miles east of Ventura. Since coming here he has given his attention principally to bean raising. In Macomb, Ill., he met and married Miss Alice Piper, a native of Indiana. Their union was blessed by a daughter, Jessie, who brightened their home for seventeen years, but was taken by death in 1891. Mrs. Blackburn is a member of the Presbyterian Church, the services of which the captain attends. While living in Illinois he was made a Mason at Paris. At this writing he is connected with the Ventura Post, G. A. R., and the California Commandery, Loyal Legion. No resident of the county is more stanch than he in allegiance to the Republican party, and none is more interested in the development of local resources. His splendid war record is equaled by his record as a private citizen, as an agriculturist and as a business man, and he is honored and esteemed as one of the most substantial and sterling citizens of his community.

REV. MARSHALL C. HAYES. In the year 1680 George Hayes came from Scotland to Windsor, Conn. His eldest son, Daniel, was captured by the Indians during Queen Anne's war in 1708 and held captive for five years. He was the great-great-grandfather of President R. B. Hayes. While the state of Connecticut was still under the British rule, Daniel's grandson, Joel Hayes, enlisted as a lieutenant in the army of patriots and assisted in bringing to our country independence and freedom. His son, Joel, was born in Simsbury, Conn., and for forty-four years officiated as pastor of the Congregational Church at South Hadley, Mass., where he died. Next in line of descent was Joel 3rd, a native of South Hadley, who there conducted mercantile pursuits; being prospered in his financial ventures and possessing great generosity as well as considerable means, he gave the site on which Mount Holyoke College was erected. His son, Oliver B., was born in South Hadley, graduated at Williams College in 1854, and in 1866 settled in Dalton, Mass., where he became connected with a brother-in-law, Z. M. Crane, of the present firm of Crane & Co. He died at Dalton in 1897. His marriage united him with Josephine, daughter of Winthrop Laffin, a paper manufacturer of Lee, Mass., where she was born and reared. Her sister married Hon. Z. M. Crane, and their son, Hon. W. Murray Crane, is the present governor of Massachusetts.

Though born in Dubuque, Iowa (his birth occurring February 8, 1858), Marshall C. Hayes spent little of his boyhood in that city, but was reared in Dalton, Mass. In 1884 he was graduated from Williams College, after which he entered McCormick Theological Seminary in Chicago, taking the regular course and completing his studies in 1887. His graduation was soon followed, October 8, same year, by his ordination to the Presbyterian ministry and his appointment as missionary to Kanazawa, Japan. Immediately afterward he sailed for his new field of labor, where he passed several very busy and active years. On his return to America, in June, 1892, he settled at Shandon, Cal., where he remained for fifteen months. The year 1894 found him pastor of the Presbyterian Church of North Chicago, Ill. In January of 1896 he returned to California, where he first spent a year on rented property in Pasadena, and in October, 1896, bought his present property in this city. The building of an attractive and comfortable residence formed one of his first tasks, in the accomplishment of which he secured for his family a delightful abode. February 2, 1897, he began the setting out of an orchard of orange trees, to which the ten-acre ranch is devoted. In the caring for the trees, watching the development of the fruits, picking, packing and shipping them, he finds the physical exercise which, in his former labors as minister, was so often denied him. While he has practically retired from the ministry, his heart is as deeply concerned in the welfare of the church as ever and his keen intellectual acumen gives the same pronounced allegiance to Presbyterian doctrines as in his more youthful days. The denomination that was founded by Calvin and fostered by the self-sacrificing toil of thousands of pastors and millions of adherents has gained a distinct addition through his ministry at home and abroad, nor have his efforts been less arduous along lines not strictly religious, yet distinctly humanitarian.

In Iola, Kans., October 16, 1887, occurred the marriage of Rev. Mr. Hayes and Miss Medea Brewster, daughter of a merchant and descended from that historic character, Elder William Brewster, of Mayflower fame. The children born of their union are Marshall C., Jr., and Oliver B., who are students in the Throop Polytechnic Institute in Pasadena; Louise, Winthrop L. and William Brewster.

EDGAR EUGENE SELPH, attorney at Los Angeles and Pasadena, and secretary of the Roosevelt Mining and Milling Company, was born in Salem, Marion county, Ore., in 1860, and comes of a family of Welsh descent, the name being originally spelled Sylph. William Selph, the father of Edgar Eugene, came to California in the days of gold, crossing the plains from his native home in middle Tennessee, and engaging for a short time in the pursuit of mining. In 1852 he located in Oregon, and combined his trade of blacksmithing with the occupation of farming, in the vicinity of Salem, but in after years removed to Jackson county, Ore., where he is still living, at the age of seventy-eight years. He married Julia Chitwood, a native of Iowa, and of English descent, and who came to Oregon in 1853. Mrs. Selph, who died in 1872, was the mother of four children, three of whom attained maturity, one daughter and one son only surviving at the present time.

The career of Edgar Eugene Selph was entirely of his own making, for his father was a man of moderate means, and the son was obliged to shift for himself at the early age of twelve. While performing the tasks on a farm he formulated large plans for the future, in which a good education played no inconsequent part. Though handicapped by responsibility, he managed to secure a common education and qualify as a teacher, and in this way he worked his way through McMinnville College, which he entered in 1880, and where he remained for five years. While teaching he began the study of law under W. D. Fenton (now one of the attorneys of the Southern Pacific Railway Company) in Portland, Ore., and was admitted to the Oregon bar in April of 1890. His professional career was inaugurated in Oregon, where he engaged in a general practice. On account of his wife's health he located in Southern California in the spring of 1898, and after residing for a time in Pasadena, settled permanently in Los Angeles. His professional and business interests have since been divided between the two cities, his office in Los Angeles being in the Potomac building. Although engaging in a general practice, Mr. Selph makes a specialty of mining and corporation law, and has been identified with some of the most ambitious undertakings in his line during his residence in the state.

The Roosevelt Mining and Milling Company, of which Mr. Selph is secretary, was incorporated April 12, 1901, the directors being S. Washbourn, T. L. Martin, T. Lormer, J. E. Parker, E. H. Royce, V. L. Carroll and E. E. Selph. The officers of the company are: S. Washbourn, president; T. L. Martin, vice-president, and E. E. Selph, secretary. The San Gabriel Valley Bank is the depository. The directors are men of high standing in the business world of Southern California, and are trustworthy and conservative. The property of the company is located in San Bernardino county, eight miles from Ludlow, a station on the Santa Fe Railroad, and the roads leading thereto may be safely traversed by heavy loads at all seasons of the year. Adjacent to the mines are the celebrated John R. Gentry group of mines, from which have been taken thousands of dollars in gold; also the Bagdad Mines, owned by Hon. Chauncey Depew and others. The company is developing their property, and the output consists of gold with a small per cent of copper.

Mr. Selph is a member of the Board of Trade in Pasadena, and of the Chamber of Commerce in Los Angeles. While living in Oregon he became identified with the Masonic fraternity some years ago, and he is now connected with several Masonic bodies. He was made an Odd Fellow in Sheridan, Ore., and is now a member of Commercial Lodge in Los Angeles. He is also a member of the Woodmen of the World, the Fraternal Brotherhood, and the Knights of the Maccabees. Politically he is a Republican. Mr. Selph ranks among the most able of the attorneys in Southern California, and is personally one of the most popular and influential.

ELI RUNDELL. Before the days of the forty-niners in California, Mr. Rundell had cast in his fortunes with this great western region. With a party numbering about seventy-five, having thirteen wagons and other accessories, he left St. Joe, Mo., May 8, 1846. Five months later California was reached, and they went into camp forty miles north of the present site of Sacramento. Next they proceeded to San José, camping where the railroad offices now stand. As a member of Fremont's Battalion, he witnessed the battle of Santa Clara. After three months of service in a local company, he secured work in a sawmill at Santa Cruz. Later, with others, he went to Calaveras, where he helped to build houses. One of his vivid recollections of that period is a hunting expedition on the San Joaquin, during which they killed one hundred and fifty elk. Continuing the trip, they came to the present site of the Newhall ranch, and thence made their way up the coast through Santa Barbara, about May, 1848.

Hearing of the discovery of gold, Mr. Rundell hastened to the mines and at Placerville discovered numerous acquaintances among the gold seekers from the east. In 1849 he went to Stockton, where he clerked for Captain Weber one year. In the spring of 1850 he went to San José and embarked in the livery business, but later took up farming. In 1852 he began the manufacture of saddle trees and saddles, for which, in those early days, he received high prices. He continued the same business at Gilroy from 1853 to 1864, after which he resided in Watsonville one year. In September, 1866, he came to Santa Barbara as agent for the Coast Line Stage Company, also as manufacturer of the harness used by the company. When the stage lines were discontinued some sixteen years later he turned his attention to other industries, and since 1885 has been engaged in the harness business. Meantime, in 1868, the stage owners built a toll road across the mountains to Los Olivos, and he was elected president and manager of the same, which position he held until the road was sold, in 1896.

In Locke, Cayuga county, N. Y., Mr. Rundell was born December 14, 1828, a descendant of an old eastern family. His father, William, and grandfather, Eli, were natives of Connecticut, and residents of New York and Ohio, where the former made shoes and the latter manufactured harness. The death of William Rundell occurred in Republic, Seneca county, Ohio, when he was fifty. His wife, Miranda (Mills) Rundell, was born in Cayuga county, N. Y., and died in Ohio in 1887. Of their seven children, the oldest, Eli, is the only one now on the coast. He was six years of age when the family settled in Seneca county, Ohio, and grew to manhood on a farm there. After coming to California, he married Kate McGee, who was born in Boston and died in Santa Barbara in 1897, leaving three children: Fred, of Santa Barbara; Albert, who is connected with the Southern Pacific road, and Alice (a twin of Albert), who is the wife of a physician in Ukiah. In October, 1900, Mr. Rundell was united in marriage with Mary A. Hammon, a half sister of his first wife and a native of Boston, Mass.

In politics a Democrat, Mr. Rundell was elected to the council on that ticket and served for thirteen years. During seven years of that time, in accordance with a resolution made by all the councilmen, he drew no salary. When he was elected to the office, not a sidewalk had been built, and in this work he took a deep interest from the start. He also assisted in the straightening and grading of the streets and the starting of other public improvements. In religion he is of the Spiritualist belief. After coming to Santa Barbara he was made a Mason in Lodge No. 192, of which he is now serving his twenty-eighth term as treasurer, and he is also connected with the chapter. The Odd Fellows, White Rose Lodge of Rebekahs, and Marguerite Chapter, Order Eastern Star, number him among their members, and of the last-named he was secretary for many years.

A. KINGSLEY MACOMBER. Within the memory of men now living Africa was denominated the "unknown" continent, and, aside from the immediate vicinity of the coast, the feet of white men had never penetrated its vast wildernesses. Then came the brave and knightly Livingstone, who made two attempts to reach the interior from the east, and during his second expedition died at Bangwelo. The intrepid Stanley, with a splendid equipment of men and necessities, made three attempts to reach the interior from the north, but failed. During one of these expeditions his assistant, Maloney, with a few men, made an expedition to some distance from the main party and succeeded in killing Misiri, the king of Mahdi. On another occasion the Germans sent a formidable expedition from the west, but it was never heard from, and its members undoubtedly perished in their ill-fated endeavors.

At the time of the Major Allen Wilson massacre at Majuba hill, the sole survivor was Major F. R. Burnham, and he it was who, during a Matabele war, killed Molimo, the witch doctor. His fame as an explorer had spread to England, and when he proposed seeking to gain more definite information concerning the interior, it was felt that he was the man to head an important expedition. Accordingly, when Cecil Rhodes and the British government authorized the formation and equipment of a company of explorers, Mr. Burnham and Mr. Ingram were placed at the head of the expedition, with permission to draw for anything they wanted. They accepted on the condition that they were allowed to choose the members of the party, which was granted them. Among those who were honored with an invitation to accompany them was A. Kingsley Macomber, who was at the time a young man of twenty years, eager for adventure, fearless, robust and active, and well equipped, physically and mentally, for the arduous campaign before him. He was born in Morristown, N. J., March 7, 1874, and in 1883 came to Pasadena, where his father, H. K. Macomber, M. D., is one of the oldest and most influential physicians. On accepting Mr. Burnham's invitation in 1894, he went via New York and the Canary Islands to Capetown, Africa, thence to Pretoria. The expedition traveled by coaches six hundred miles to Buluwayo, at one time the home of Lobengula, whom Burnham is supposed to have killed in 1893. There the expedition started on its tour of exploration. It consisted of nine white men (all Americans), about fifty Zulus and fifty pack animals. They spent six months in the heart of the country, and found a number of new tribes that hitherto had only been heard of indirectly. Practical value was given to their investigations by reason of their surveys and maps of the interior.

One of their most difficult feats was the crossing of the Zambesi river which at this point is about a mile wide. This was accomplished after two weeks of effort, the mode devised being the forming of pontoons from rubber beds that were inflated and lashed together. They were the second white party to see Victoria Falls on the Zambesi river, a magnificent spectacle, far surpassing our own Niagara in grandeur and sublimity, with the waves rushing wildly down from a height of three hundred and seventy-five feet, to seethe in a seeming caldron of foaming waters. No expedition had hitherto reached the Kafui and Mashukulumbue rivers, nor had any white men ever before seen the Monchoia mountains, the highest peak of which they named Mount Wilson in honor of Major Allen Wilson and Wilson's Peak of the San Gabriel valley. In memory of the same distinguished explorer and martyr, Major Wilson, Major Burnham had erected a monument. They located the copper fields and made other important discoveries. At every point of advance savage tribes were to be met and subdued or pacified. One of these, of which Mashu was the head, was particularly fierce and bloodthirsty, and the white men only escaped death through the fortunate circumstance that they had plenty of meat to give the savages, who were almost starving. Then, when night fell, they escaped in the darkness.

At one time Mr. Burnham and Mr. Macomber were escaping hostilities from the northern tribes for five days, and during that time slept only a few hours, the rest of the time hurrying on foot over the two hundred and fifty miles between them and the Zambesi river. At first eight Zulus were with them, but by the fourth day they had all dropped out from fatigue, and the two white men were alone, but finally they reached the river in safety. They journeyed around the camps of the natives, following the southern cross by night and the sun by day. The expedition returned to Buluwayo just before the Jameson raid and the breaking out of the Matabele war. The English garrison had been so greatly depleted that the natives were quick to take advantage of the fact, and brought about a massacre, in which about three hundred out of the one thousand residents of the vicinity were killed. At that time Mr. Macomber and a comrade, Mr. Blick of Pasadena, who had been in the Filabusi camp fifty miles from Buluwayo, fortunately were in town on the night of the massacre, so their lives were saved; but the twenty remaining in camp met a sad fate at the hands of the natives. The white people gathered in Buluwayo, where they were besieged by the Matabeles. The little telegraph line strung from tree to tree to Pretoria saved them, for they got a message through to Capetown before the natives cut the line. The English wired back that they would start two thousand men at once, but it would require two months to reach them, which estimate proved about correct, as over two months passed before relief came. Meantime the garrison was almost depleted of ammunition and provisions, and the rations were one small biscuit per day to each man, so that relief came none too soon. After Buluwayo was relieved the expedition disbanded and Mr. Macomber returned to London, where he received the degree of Fellow of the Royal Geographical Society from the imperial government, authorized by the Queen and the Royal Geographical Society. The last act of Queen Victoria was the awarding of medals to these survivors of the Matabele war. In December, 1896, he returned to the United States, and for a time engaged with E. R. Kellam of Los Angeles in operating the Black Diamond coal mine at Gallup, N. M., also engaged in prospecting and mining in the Cascades and Coast range.

Henry Lewis

January 17, 1902, Mr. Macomber organized the Los Angeles Trust Company, with a capital stock of $1,000,000. This is the first strictly and exclusively trust company organized in the city and its outlook for the future is exceedingly favorable. Associated with him in the company are some of the most prominent capitalists and foremost business men of Southern California. Under the direct supervision of Mr. Macomber, who is president of the company, an eight-story building is now being erected on the choice northeast corner of Second and Spring streets, to be known as the Los Angeles Trust building. This company ranks as one of the strongest financial institutions of the west, and its successful future is assured by the able management.

HENRY LEWIS, one of the early pioneers in the Carpinteria valley, was born near Massass Junction, Va., in 1830. His father was a farmer, and Henry followed a like occupation, although a part of his boyhood was passed in a store in Washington, D. C. At the age of twenty years he married Miss Chattin, of Virginia, and he then bought a farm and began what has proved to be his life work. He sold out all interests and came to California in 1857. The next year he went into the mines in Tuolumne county, and after six months' experience he came out "with rheumatism and little else," the former of which has remained with him through life.

In December, 1858, Mr. Lewis moved to Half Moon Bay, and there farmed for three years. In the spring of 1862 he came to Carpinteria valley, purchased eighty-eight acres of land and pitched his tent near where his house now stands. He bought his property from the city of Santa Barbara at $1.25 per acre, the land being wild and uncultivated and covered with brush and live oak trees. He drove down from Half Moon Bay looking along for a desirable situation, and the Carpinteria valley was the first location which seemed practicable. He immediately began cutting and clearing, and now has one of the most complete ranch properties in the place. The only white people then in the valley were Col. Russel Heath and Mr. Lowrie. As rapidly as land was cleared he began the cultivation of lima beans, corn and barley. In 1864 they had a very dry year, no crops maturing and horses and cattle dying for want of sustenance. Mr.

Lewis has since added eighty acres to his ranch, which now numbers one hundred and sixty acres, one hundred and fifty acres of which he plants to lima beans, with an average crop of two thousand pounds to the acre.

Mr. Lewis lost his first wife in February, 1863, and in 1879 he married Mrs. Rebecca Mullin of Cincinnati. He has seven children by his first wife and three by his second, all living. His handsome two-story residence, fine barns and suitable out-buildings, all go to show the thrifty and successful farmer, and his well-kept ranch is significant of the prosperity which has attended him.

GILBERT H. SPROUL. From the far eastern state of Maine, where he was born near Windsor in April, 1830, Gilbert H. Sproul sought the opportunities and possibilities of the great undeveloped west. As a partner of his brother Atwood (in whose sketch appears the family record) he acquired possession of a large body of unimproved land in Los Angeles county in 1868, the purchase price of the same being $11 an acre. While his brother continued for some years to make Oregon his home, he himself gave personal attention to the improvement of the California property. December 15, 1874, the brothers gave to the Southern Pacific Railroad a right of way through their land, as well as twenty acres, on which was erected a depot and needed equipments at Norwalk. The town site was then surveyed just opposite the depot, but has since been largely added to, from a portion of their ranch of four hundred and fifty-seven acres. The home of the family has since been north of town.

Besides these two brothers, a third, Ephraim, had come at the same time to California, but the latter was killed by an Indian in Humboldt county, Cal., and the other two had many narrow escapes from the savages. In December, 1870, Gilbert H. brought his family to the ranch, and when a postoffice was established he was appointed postmaster. In addition, he was prominent in other affairs connected with the early history of the town. Under his supervision an artesian well was sunk which cost $2,500 or more and which is still the source of water supply for the village. November 20, 1864, he married Miss Anna M. Davis, daughter of Thomas C. and Rachel D. (Carlton) Davis. Her maternal grandfather was of English extraction and served as an aide to Washington during the Revolution. Mr. Davis was born at Martha's Vineyard, Mass., from which he accompanied his parents to Farmington, Me., in childhood. By his own efforts he acquired a thorough education, which he utilized in teaching school in Maine and New York. For some years he held office as justice of the peace.

While he possessed unusual ability, it was in the direction of literature rather than business, hence he gained a high standing as a man, but did not achieve financial success. His mother was a member of the Puritan family of Smiths. When he was about seventy-two years of age he came to California to visit his daughter, returning later to Kansas, where he died. His wife also died in Kansas when fifty-seven years of age.

After having completed her education in the schools of Farmington, Me., Anna M. Davis began to teach school, which occupation she followed several years. Since her marriage she has made her home in California, with the exception of a year spent in Kansas. Of her children Ambrose A. is engaged in horticultural pursuits in Orange county; Hattie resides with her mother at Norwalk; Gilbert is station agent at Orange for the Southern Pacific Railroad; and Frank is in the mercantile business at Downey. Since the death of Mr. Sproul, which occurred September 3, 1883, Mrs. Sproul has devoted herself to the management of the various interests bequeathed her, including eighty acres of the old ranch, subdivided into lots of an acre or less. During recent years she has disposed of many lots in Norwalk, the purchasers being permanent settlers of a high class. Included in her possessions is an eighty-acre tract containing two good wells; this she rents. Under the administration of President Harrison she was given charge of the postoffice at Norwalk and continued to serve in the position under Cleveland, resigning after nine years of service. In addition to the management of her property and the rearing of her children, she has kept posted in the world of literature and art, and, as a correspondent for some of the Los Angeles papers, has not only proved the possession of ability as a news-writer, but has also kept before the public the attractions and advantages of Norwalk as a desirable location for a home.

THOMAS COATES STOCKTON, M. D. San Diego numbers among its long-established residents this influential physician and successful horticulturist, who is a pioneer of 1869. He was born at Smiths Creek, near Sussex Vale, New Brunswick, Canada, April 3, 1837, and traces his ancestry to Richard Stockton, who with his son, Richard Stockton, Jr., more than a hundred years previous to the Declaration of Independence, emigrated from England and settled in the central part of New Jersey. In 1701 Richard Stockton, Jr., purchased of William Penn, an estate of 5,500 acres on Stoney Brook, of which the present city of Princeton is in the center. He, his wife, and five children, Richard, Samuel, Joseph, Robert, and John, were the first residents of that name in Princeton. Hon.

Richard Stockton, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, was the son of John Stockton.

Major Richard Witham Stockton of Princeton, was a son of Samuel Stockton. During the Revolution he was a major in the New Jersey Volunteers, known as Stockton the famous land pilot to the King's troops. He was surprised February 18, 1777, by Colonel Nelson of Brunswick, N. J., and with fifty-nine privates, taken prisoner. General Putnam sent him to Philadelphia in irons, of which Washington disapproved. "The Major," he said, "has, I believe, been very active and mischievous, but we took him in arms, as an officer of the enemy, and by the rules of war, we are obliged to treat him as such, and not as a felon." At the close of the war, not finding continued residence in the United States desirable on account of his Tory sympathies, he removed to St. John, New Brunswick. He was a grantee of that city and enjoyed half pay. He died at Sussex Vale in that province. His son, Lieut. Andrew Hunter Stockton, was born in Princeton, January 3, 1760, became officer of the marines in the British navy and was twice captured and exchanged during the Revolutionary war, after which he went with his father and three brothers to St. John, New Brunswick. April 4, 1784, he married Hannah Lester, of New York state, by whom he had four sons and one daughter, all whom survived both parents. He died at Sussex Vale, May 8, 1821.

Next in line of descent was Charles Witham Stockton, second son of Lieut. Andrew Hunter Stockton, who was born April 4, 1787, near Sussex Vale, and became a large farmer in that locality, also was justice of the peace many years. He died at Smith Creek, July 12, 1869. Thirteen children, nine sons and four daughters, were reared of the fifteen that were born of his marriage to Alice Coates. She was born in New Brunswick, and died at Smith Creek, May 21, 1865, seventy-two years of age less six days. Nine sons and six daughters survived her. She was a consistent member of the Wesleyan Society forty years.

The youngest of the fifteen children was Thomas C. Stockton, who was also the only one of the large family to settle in the states. He was educated in Mount Allison Academy, after which he spent a year in Harvard Medical College, Boston, Mass., and three years in the Bellevue Hospital Medical College, from which he was graduated in 1868. Frequently since then he has engaged in post-graduate work in the Poly-clinic of New York. After his graduation he opened an office in New York City and was appointed out-door physician to the Marion Street Lying-In Hospital. Desiring to establish his home in a region where the climate was more equable, he came to San Diego, and has since carried on a general practice, besides which he has for four terms served as health officer of San Diego, for many years officiated as county physician, for one term filled the position of police commissioner and for seven years held office as county coroner. After having filled the position of United States pension examiner for years, on the organization of the first board he was made a member of the same and elected its treasurer, filling the office for thirteen years. In connection with the position of coroner, he was ex-officio public administrator.

The practical identification of Dr. Stockton with horticultural interests began in 1876, when he bought an interest in a large grant and began the improvement of an olive orchard. Of the two hundred acres that he owns, fifty have been planted in olives that produce abundantly. Besides this property he has other farm lands in the county. At one time he owned the site of the Normal School and donated one-third of his holdings there to the institution. He erected a sanitarium on F street and still owns the building, which is now utilized as a United States army hospital. Scarcely a movement has been projected for the benefit of San Diego that has lacked his hearty co-operation and support. He was interested in bringing the railroad into the city, realizing that permanent prosperity would be impossible without this aid to modern civilization. The County Horticultural Association has received the benefit of his experience and advice, as has also the San Diego Natural History Association. He is corresponding member of the Gynecological Society of Boston. In professional organizations, his interest has been keen and constant, and he has long been associated with the American, State, Southern California and San Diego Medical Associations. The last-named he assisted in organizing, was chosen its first secretary and later served as its president. Politically he was for years an upholder of Democratic principles, but when the party inserted a freesilver plank in its platform in 1896 and further declared against expansion in 1900, he found himself no longer in sympathy with its tenets, and now votes with the Republican party. While living in New Brunswick he was made a Mason in Leinster Lodge, and he has also been identified with the Odd Fellows, being a member of San Diego Lodge No. 153, Encampment and Rebekahs.

The marriage of Dr. Stockton took place in San Diego June 5, 1873, and united him with Miss Minnie G. Slade, who was born in Buffalo, N. Y., July 22, 1850. She is a daughter of Samuel Slade, who for many years served as superintendent of schools of Buffalo, and was recognized as one of the most efficient educators of Western New York. To Dr. and Mrs. Stockton have been born two children, namely: Samuel S. and Mabel E.

FRANK GRAVES. Many of the citizens of Los Angeles are of New England birth and lineage, and among this class is Mr. Graves, who was born at Marblehead, Mass., on the 4th of July, 1853. His father, Benjamin T., who was likewise a native of Marblehead, followed the trade of carpenter and builder and at the same time engaged in shipbuilding. During the Civil war he served both in the army and the navy, afterward resuming the business of a contractor in his home city. From there in 1872 he moved to Missouri and settled on a farm in Douglas county, where he remained until death. He was the son of a sea captain who sailed all over the world and died while on a trip to the West Indies. The marriage of Benjamin T. Graves united him with Elizabeth Sheene, who was born in Nova Scotia and died in Massachusetts, leaving two sons, Frank and Benjamin, the latter now a farmer in Missouri. Her father was a sea captain and was lost at sea, off the Grand Banks, during the memorable gale of 1847.

Inheriting from his grandfathers a taste for the life of a sailor, Frank Graves shipped as cabin boy on a merchant vessel, Gem of the Ocean, which anchored at Melbourne, Australia, after a voyage of one hundred days or more. On the same ship he proceeded to San Francisco, and on landing there learned of the assassination of President Lincoln. Later he made three trips to Australia, returning each time to San Francisco, and then rounded Cape Horn to New York, and finally arrived at Marblehead after an absence of three years. He was then only fourteen years of age, and, feeling the need of a better education than he had previously received, he entered school, where he carried on his studies for two years. Under his father he gained an early and thorough knowledge of the carpenter's trade, which he followed in St. Louis, Mo., from 1872 to 1875, and in Springfield, Mo., from the latter year until 1886, meantime taking up the work of a contractor. In 1886 he came to Los Angeles, where he built and now occupies a residence at No. 3120 Baldwin street. With the exception of his work in the original development of the Los Angeles oil fields, he has given his attention exclusively to contracting and building, and has met with success in this occupation. Numerous residences in different parts of the city prove his skill as a builder, among these being the home of F. W. Braun, the Salazar residence on Twenty-eighth and Hoover streets, the home of Mrs. M. A. Wilcox on the corner of Hoover and Adams streets, and what is now the Laughlin residence on West Adams street.

While in Springfield, Mo., Mr. Graves married Miss Ophelia Thomas, a native of New York state. They have two sons, Sidney

Thomas and Guy Hubert, the elder of whom assists his father in the contracting business.

A charter member of the Builders' Exchange, Mr. Graves has been connected actively with this important society ever since its organization. No movement or society for the benefit of contractors or that will aid in his success as a builder is overlooked by him or regarded as of little importance. It is his ambition to excel in his chosen occupation, and he spares no pains and neglects no opportunity for broadening his knowledge of contracting. At one time he was interested in oil, being a pioneer in the Los Angeles field, and assisted in putting down several wells which were producers, but his interest in these he afterward sold. The Republican party receives his staunch support in local as well as general elections. Besides his connection with the Independent Order of Foresters, he is identified with the Odd Fellows, having been initiated into the latter order in Springfield, Mo., where he was past noble grand and representative of his lodge in the St. Louis convention when the change was made from five to three degrees. At this writing his membership is in the East Los Angeles Lodge and he is also a charter member of the East Side Encampment.

HORACE G. HAMILTON. Orwigdale farm, ideally located on a branch of the Los Angeles river at Ivanhoe, three miles northwest of Los Angeles, has five hundred acres of fine farming alfalfa and pasture land, upon which is conducted one of the most scientific and modern dairies in Southern California. The milk taken into town for delivery is furnished by as fine a herd of Jerseys as can be found grazing upon any meadows in this sunshiny land, and although some of the cattle belong to other breeds, the beautiful Jersey face predominates, and among them are many heads of registered stock. These prolific producers of one of the most necessary commodities have been carefully reared, and the highest standard maintained, and for the last five years the milk has had the highest test in the Los Angeles health office. Mr. Hamilton established his dairy on the farm in 1894, and in 1901 headquarters were secured in the city at Nos. 211-213 North Beaudry, and a cooling plant has been erected at each end of the line; also the milk is iced when being conveyed into town by the three teams and wagons. The California hospital has been supplied with milk from this dairy ever since it was started, besides many other institutions of the kind of a local nature.

H. G. Hamilton, the genial owner of Orwigdale farm, and the promoter of the Hamilton dairy, was born in Wooster, Wayne county, Ohio, July 22, 1868, and is of Scotch paternal extraction. His father, Thomas S. Hamilton, was born in New Lisbon, Ohio, and his grandfather, Judge David Hamilton, was also a native of the same state. Judge Hamilton was a county probate judge at New Lisbon, and afterwards in Wayne county, and his death occurred at Wooster, Ohio. Thomas S. Hamilton served for three years and three months during the Civil war, and was a member of the One Hundred and Sixteenth Ohio Volunteer Infantry. He engaged in the hotel business at Wooster, and was proprietor of the American House, later removing to Chicago, where he successfully continued his former occupation during the World's Fair. He came to Los Angeles with his son in 1894, and has since had charge of Orwigdale farm, in the development of which he has taken the greatest interest. He married Laura Ilgenfritz, a native of Ohio, and daughter of Frank Ilgenfritz, the latter being a large shoe manufacturer in Wooster, although he eventually died in Missouri. Two children were born into the family, Horace G. and Mrs. C. F. Mickley, the latter also a resident of Los Angeles.

After graduating from the high school, Mr. Hamilton entered the University of Wooster (Ohio) and was graduated from the special course at that institution. He then removed to Cleveland, Ohio, and became bookkeeper for Frank Hurd & Co., a position maintained for three years. He then filled a similar capacity with the Merchants' Fruit Auction Company, and in 1892 removed with his father to Chicago, expecting large returns from a contemplated hostelry for the entertainment of the traveling public. The Wooster Hotel, advantageously located on Fifty-fifth street, near the entrance to the World's Fair grounds, more than realized the expectations of its managers, and became a popular headquarters for the Ohio contingent visiting the city. With larger returns than rewarded the average who undertook similar enterprises at that hazardous time, Mr. Hamilton disposed of his interests when Chicago again assumed its normal equilibrium, and settled in Cleveland, Ohio, where also he managed an hotel, and where he remained until coming to California in 1894.

The marriage of Mr. Hamilton and Susie G. Orwig was solemnized in Cleveland, Ohio, Miss Orwig, for whom the farm is named, being a daughter of Rev. A. W. Orwig, a clergyman in the Methodist Episcopal Church. During the war Mr. Orwig was in government employ, and is now residing in retirement in Los Angeles. Mr. Hamilton is an active member of the Southern California Dairymen's Association, and has been secretary of the same for the past two years. He is also a member of the Jersey Breeders' Association and vice-president of the Los Angeles Milk Board of Trade. He is also a member of the Ohio Society of Southern California. Fraternally he is associated with the Royal Arcanum and the Ancient Order of United Workmen. With his wife he is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Mr. Hamilton is well fitted to represent the ideal dairy conditions of Southern California, for his trained intelligence has grasped the surrounding possibilities and turned them to the best possible account. In other ways also he is public spirited and enterprising, and his success from a commercial and social standpoint is based upon merit and ability of a high order.

J. W. Sargent

J. W. TAGGART. One of the most capable exponents of legal science in Southern California is J. W. Taggart, a resident of Santa Barbara since 1882, and one of the town's most honored and helpful citizens. He was born in Parkersburg, W. Va., and is second in a family containing four sons and two daughters, of whom three sons and one daughter are now living. During the years of bitter persecution in Scotland the Clan McTaggart numbered among its members those who rebelled at the religious intolerance in their native land, and sought and found an asylum in County Antrim, Ireland, where they were among the well known Orangemen. In the Irish province the paternal grandfather, James Taggart, was born. He was a seafaring man, and upon engaging in transporting cargoes between Glasgow and Montreal, Canada, made his headquarters in the Canadian city, finally giving up the sea and for a time making that his home. His declining years were spent in Wheeling, W. Va., where he engaged in farming and stock-raising, and where he died at an advanced age. A Presbyterian in Ireland, he became an Episcopalian in America, and was buried after the rites of his adopted church.

Col. George Washington Taggart, the father of J. W., was born in Montreal, Canada, and went to Wheeling, W. Va., when a child. He was educated in Virginia, and at an early age decided upon the law as a means of a livelihood. As a preliminary, he read law under Mr. Kirkwood, then of Mansfield, Ohio, later United States secretary of the interior, and was admitted to the Ohio bar. However, possessing a decided talent for mechanical engineering, he became master mechanic for the Baltimore & Ohio (then the North West Virginia) Railroad Company, with headquarters at Parkersburg, W. Va., and remained in this capacity until the Civil war. To further the cause of the Union he raised Company D, Fourteenth West Virginia Volunteer Infantry, of which he was captain, and later served as lieutenant-colonel on Gen. George Crook's staff. Eventually he was made provost-marshal of the department of West Virginia, and served as such until the close of the war. With the restoration of peace he returned to Parkersburg and engaged in the mercantile business, but is now living in retirement. He has held many local political offices in the past, and is at present a member of the Loyal Legion. In the Grand Army of the Republic he is an ex-grand commander of the department of West Virginia, having occupied that position during the year 1887. He is a member of the Methodist Church, as is also his wife, Eliza (Hines) Taggart, who was born in county Galway, Ireland, her parents having been farmers in the west of Ireland.

The education of J. W. Taggart was acquired in the public schools of Parkersburg, W. Va., and after graduating from the high school he for a year attended the West Virginia College at Flemington. Later he combined educational work with the study of law, his first professional researches being conducted under the capable leadership of C. C. Cole, judge of the district court of the District of Columbia. He was admitted to the bar in 1880, came to California in 1881, and located in Santa Barbara in 1882, where for two years he was manager for the Dimmick, Sheffield & Knight Fruit Company. In 1885 he undertook the practice of law as a partner of Judge E. B. Hall, the first attorney-general of West Virginia, and in 1889 began independent practice. In 1893 he formed a partnership with John J. Boyce, which was amicably continued until the election of the latter to the state senatorship, after which Mr. Taggart continued to practice alone. He has been prominently identified with Republican political matters in the west, is ex-member of the county committee, and was secretary of the same for ten years, and he has also served on the congressional committee of which he was chairman, besides being a delegate to state conventions for several years. For four years he served as a member and president of the school board, and during that time the advance was made of incorporating the kindergarten and manual training school into the public school system. This was the first undertaking of the kind in the west, and Santa Barbara has now the finest Sloyd school on the coast, the school building and equipment having been presented by Miss Anna S. C. Blake. Mr. Taggart was a member of the first board of fifteen freeholders, and also of the second board of freeholders, each of which formed a city charter, the charter of the latter being eventually endorsed by the legislature. During 1886 and 1887 he was assistant district attorney, and at the general election held in 1898 was the Republican candidate for judge of the superior court of Santa Barbara county. He was chosen captain of the camp of the Sons of Veterans, and later served for one term in the naval reserve of Santa Barbara. Fraternally

he is associated with the Masonic Lodge No. 192, of Santa Barbara, and the Royal Arch Masons, and he is a charter member of the Santa Barbara Benevolent Protective Order of Elks.

The marriage of Mr. Taggart and Kathrine Payne occurred in Los Angeles, Mrs. Taggart being a native of Pennsylvania. Of this union there are three children, James Deacon, Elise and Kathrine. Mrs. Taggart is a member of the Episcopal Church.

A. V. CREGIER. One of the most successful of the builders and contractors who are responsible for the beautiful homes and fine public buildings of Pasadena is A. V. Cregier, of the firm of Hess & Cregier, and one of the oldest in his line in the city. The career of Mr. Cregier has been an exceptionally active one, and to enumerate his undertakings in California alone is to lay claim to more than is accomplished in the average life. Upon his arrival in Pasadena December 9, 1886, he purchased a lot and built himself a home, and at once entered into plans for building and contracting. Throughout the city he has built hundreds of residences, including the Green and Earl homes, and has extended his activities into many of the surrounding towns. In La Canada, Lamanda Park and Altadena especially there are numerous evidences of his skill and artistic appreciation. It may be said that while he has erected some public buildings, his specialty seems to lie in the construction of residences, and upon this line of work his reputation is chiefly based.

Much of his success in life Mr. Cregier attributes to the early training received at the hands of an exceptional mother, whose lovable and honest traits of character are recalled with pride by the children who survive her. She was formerly Hannah Van Vranken, a native of Clifton Park, N. Y., and daughter of Abraham, also born in New York, and of Holland descent. The father of Mr. Cregier, Jacob Cregier, was born in Holland, and settled in Schenectady county, N. Y., with his parents. He was a large farmer during his years of activity, and spent the remainder of his life in his adopted locality in New York. To himself and wife were born seven children, six of whom are living, A. V. being the only son in the family, and the only child on the Pacific coast.

In Schenectady county, N. Y., A. V. Cregier was born July 29, 1851, and while yet a small boy learned the carpenter's trade. He was a natural mechanic, and his mother took justifiable interest in his progress, encouraging and helping him to succeed. When eighteen and a half years old he served an apprenticeship of three years in Schenectady, following which he removed to Washington, D. C., and in government employ helped to build the Smithsonian Institute and the Fisheries building under Colonel McDonald. He then settled in New York City and assumed charge of the carpentering department of the Methodist Book concern on North Broadway, and later had charge of one hundred and eight tenement houses owned by Charles Sager Appleby. He also ran a screen manufactory and job shop on One Hundred and Thirty-third street in Harlem, N. Y., and had all that he could do to supply customers that patronized his little establishment, for a period covering five years, or until his removal to Pasadena in 1886.

Through his marriage to Libbie Baldwin, in Saratoga, N. Y., seven children have been born into the family of Mr. Cregier, three of whom are living, Mabel Edna, Hannah Caroline, and Glenn. Mr. Cregier was formerly a Republican, but has been a Prohibitionist since 1896. Fraternally he is connected with the Woodmen of the World. He has been a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church for thirty years and in the east was superintendent of a Sunday-school. Aside from his regular occupation, he has numerous interests in Pasadena, all of which have been successful, and have added to his substantial financial standing. He is a stockholder in the Bisbee Belle mine at Bisbee, Ariz., and he also holds stocks in several oil concerns. He is progressive and enterprising, and occupies an honored position in the community of which he has long been a resident.

JULIUS FRANCIS HALL. After years of successful identification with the building interests of Denver and of Colorado, Mr. Hall came to Los Angeles in November, 1892, and has since engaged in contracting and building, being for a period of six years a member of the firm of Hall & Dryden, but since June, 1900, alone in business. Among his contracts may be mentioned the following: Delaware, Gordon and Fitzwilliam blocks, Crane Manufacturing Company's building, Howe building, the remodeling of the Callahan block and Elks Hall, the addition to California Hospital, the erection of R. J. Northam's block and warehouse, Shattuck & Desmond's warehouse, the Perry mill, the Thompson residence at Sixth and Bonnie Brae streets, and the residence of Rev. A. C. Smither, pastor of the First Christian Church. In addition to these and many other buildings, he has erected a number of houses for himself in different parts of the city, but these he has sold, with the exception of his residence at Alhambra.

Mr. Hall was born in Youngsville, Pa., October 6, 1853, a son of J. L. and Cornelia A. (Camp) Hall, natives of New York state. His paternal grandfather was from Massachusetts, but moved to New York, and there the father grew to manhood on a farm. Being next to the oldest of a large family, the support of the others fell upon him after his father's death. For about four years he engaged in the plumbing and hardware business at Youngsville, Pa., but later was a business man of Jamestown, N. Y., for many years, and until his death. His wife also died in that city. She was a daughter of Milo Camp, a New England pioneer of New York, and in 1854, a pioneer of Minnesota, where he served as probate judge of his county. His brother, Anson Northrup, took the first steamboat up the Mississippi river.

The oldest of a family of two sons and one daughter, Julius Francis Hall was thrown upon his own resources when only eight years of age, and at first was errand boy in a store, later became clerk and then bookkeeper. However, he did not neglect his education, but by the time he was twelve he had worked his way through the higher arithmetic, and later he studied two years in a college at Jamestown. In April, 1870, he left his old home and went to Cheyenne, Wyo., where he clerked in a store. August 9, 1872, found him in Denver, where he found employment. In the fall he accompanied a surveying corps to Clear Creek county as far as Idaho Springs and Georgetown, and while there he became interested in the saw-mill business. With Henry Wilson, he engaged in manufacturing lumber, and in 1876 he operated a lumber yard at Georgetown. At the time of the "boom" in Leadville, he went there, in February, 1879, and engaged in contracting and building. Misfortune came to him while living there, as he lost $10,000 through forest fires. When the exposition opened in Denver, in 1882, he went to that city, but soon returned to saw-milling in Clear Creek county. Later he went to Fort Garland and for two years conducted a ranch, after which he resumed contracting in Denver and had the contracts for numerous fine residences on Capitol Hill.

At Floyd Hill, Colo., Mr. Hall married Miss Martha A. Wilson, who was born in Ontario, Canada, and in 1873 accompanied her parents to Colorado. They became the parents of four children, namely: Arthur Henry, who died in Colorado at the age of eighteen years; Florence R., Grace A. and Martha M., at home. Mrs. Hall is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. In national politics Mr. Hall is a staunch Republican. From the reorganization of the Builders Exchange he has been one of its active members and is now serving as second vice-president and member of the board of directors. He is a charter member of the Master Builders' Association. While living in Georgetown he was initiated into the Order of Odd Fellows, and is now past officer in East Side Lodge No. 325, which he has represented in the grand lodge. In the East Side Encampment he is past high priest. While in Denver he was identified with the Canton and at one time he also affiliated with the Order of Rebekahs.

C. M. HANSEN. In the ancient and populous town of Flensburg, Schleswig-Holstein, Germany, C. M. Hansen was born December 28, 1863, his parents being Hans and Dorothea (Jensen) Hansen, natives respectively of Nes-tive Zieland, Denmark, and Angen, Schleswig-Holstein. After the death of the father, which occurred in Flensburg while he was still a young man, the mother cared for and reared the children, preparing them for useful and honorable positions in the world. There were four in the family, and two of these, C. M. and Theodore, came to California, the latter being now a landscape gardener in Pasadena. The mother also came to Pasadena, and remained here until her death, in 1898.

When fifteen years of age C. M. Hansen became an apprentice to the trade of a cabinet-maker, which he completed in his native town. During 1881 he crossed the ocean and settled in Buffalo, N. Y., where he followed his trade for six years, as an employe of the firm of Miller, Brown & Messmer, and making a specialty of interior hardwood finishings. From Buffalo in 1887 he came to California, settling in Pasadena, where he was engaged as a cabinetmaker with the Pasadena Manufacturing Company. A year later he went to San Francisco, where he was engaged in stair-building for twelve months, and afterward for eighteen months he was foreman for J. Norris, in the building of several churches. His next location was Modesto, Stanislaus county, where for a year he followed contracting and building. On his return to Pasadena in 1894, he took up contracting which he has since carried on, and since 1901 has had C. H. Towle as a partner. Among his contracts are those for the residences of J. M. Kiehl, Mrs. Flora L. Bland, J. P. Baumgartner, and the Jones and Wooster residences. Aside from his connection with the Woodmen of the World, he is not interested in fraternal organizations, nor has he been active in politics. While living in Buffalo he married Miss Alma Hildegard Pohle, who was born in Saxony, Germany. They are the parents of four children, Theodore, Elsa, Arthur and Arnold.

HERMANN HAASE. More than thirty of the palatial homes in the city of Los Angeles have been constructed by Hermann Haase, one of the most capable of the contractors and builders of Los Angeles. Nor do these represent the sum of his labors in this beautiful town, for many public edifices have arisen under his guidance, among which may be mentioned the Lindley block on the corner of Main and Sixteenth street. Special examples of his skill in the residence line are the Rice residence on Wilshire Boulevard, the Turner home on Washington street, the Price house on Seaverance street, and others equally meritorious.

Like many of his countrymen who have become expert builders, Mr. Haase learned his trade at a comparatively early age, and was apprenticed, when fourteen years of age, for three years. He was born in the province of Brandenburg, Germany, November 23, 1858, and is a son of Julius and Caroline (Koenig) Haase, natives also of Brandenburg. The father was a miner during his active life, and passed his days in the land associated with the deeds of his ancestors. Of the six children in the family all are living, Hermann Haase being the second oldest child.

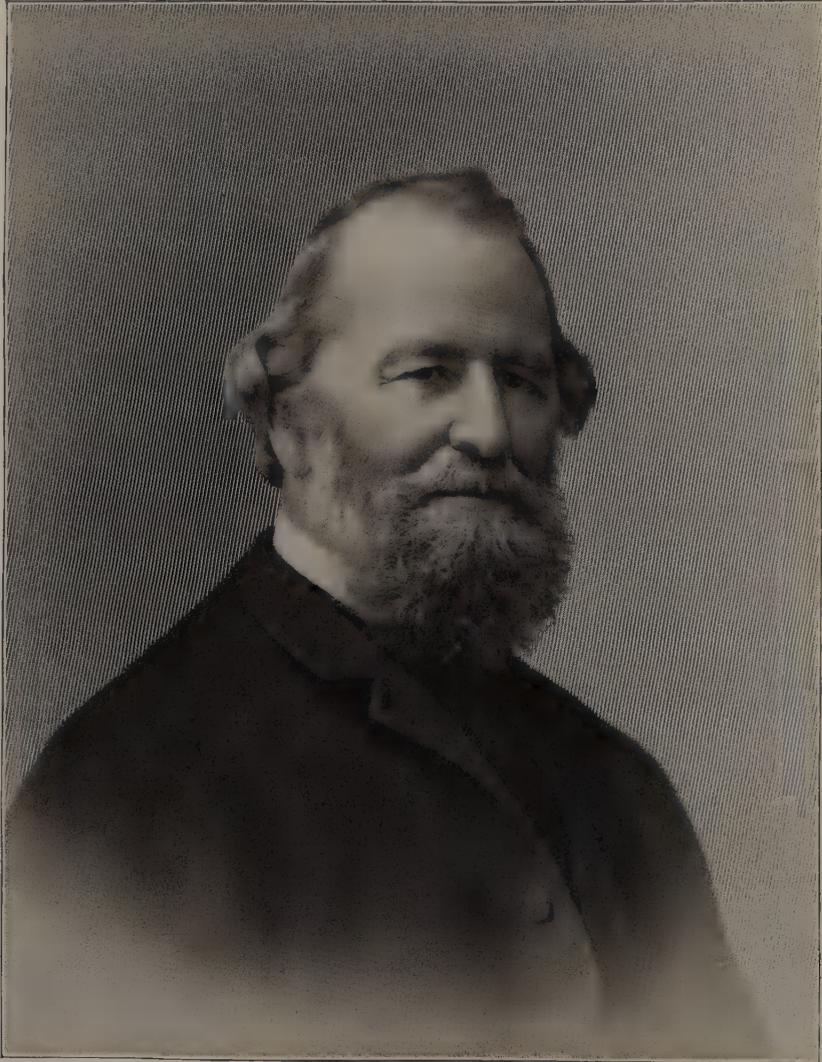

The youth of Mr. Haase was spent for the greater part in Berlin, and it was in this great city that he learned his trade, and from the gates of which he departed upon an extensive jaunt through the country as a journeyman carpenter. He visited different parts of Germany, France, Switzerland and Austria, and in 1884 came to the United States, locating in Galveston, Texas. He was fairly successful in the southern city and remained there until his removal to Los Angeles in 1887. A large field seems to have been awaiting him, for work came his way in a short time and continued with unabating vigor until 1887. He then felt justified, by reason of his large acquaintance and secure footing, in starting in to build and contract, since which time the before mentioned undertakings have been accomplished.

Before leaving his native land Mr. Haase married, in Berlin, with Caroline Voss, a native of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, and of this union there have been five children: Freda, who is now Mrs. Hoffman, of Los Angeles; Bertha; Ella; Julius; and Hilda. Fraternaly Mr. Haase is associated with the K. O. T. M., Los Angeles Tent No. 2. Until that organization was discontinued he was a member of the Master Builders Association, and he was formerly a member of the Builders Exchange. He had been prominent in promoting many worthy enterprises throughout the city, and has had interests in several lines of activity represented in Southern California. Mr. Haase is a successful builder and admirable citizen, and has formed many desirable friendships in the city of his adoption.

JOHN HAYES. Since establishing his home in Los Angeles in 1887, Mr. Hayes has been active and influential in building circles. He was born in North Wrentham, Mass., May 30, 1858, being the only child of Matthew Hayes, who removed from Massachusetts to Chicago, Ill., in 1872 and was afterward engaged in the building business in that city until his death. Shortly after the family settled in Chicago, John Hayes secured employment with J. N. Adams, a wholesale commission man on South Water street. Two years later he was apprenticed to the bricklayer's trade under L. L. Leach, a government contractor, with whom he remained until the spring of 1876, when he came to California. A visit to Los Angeles revealed that then sleepy Spanish town unawakened from the slumber of centuries, and therefore little activity was to be found in building circles. For several months he worked at his trade in San Francisco, after which he was similarly occupied in Portland and other parts of the northwest, but for a few weeks only.

The first trip of the Zealandia from San Francisco to Sydney, Australia, was undertaken May 24, 1876, and Mr. Hayes was one of the passengers. After four weeks in Sydney he went to Melbourne and various parts of Victoria and New South Wales, and from there, in 1878, he proceeded to Wellington, New Zealand, where he worked at his trade for eight months. A pioneer in the building business, he assisted in the erection of the second, third and fourth brick structures put up in the capital town of New Zealand. From Melbourne he set sail on the Kent, which passed through the Suez canal and Mediterranean sea to London and from that city he proceeded to New York on the Baltic. After a visit in Massachusetts, he returned to Chicago, where he was employed in the Adams commission house for two years, when he resumed work at his trade in the new town of Pullman. A later venture was as a contractor, with a specialty of pressed brick fronts, and during the five seasons of his work he erected over one mile of frontage each year. A severe attack of bronchitis in the fall of 1887 was the thing which led him to return to the city of Los Angeles and its genial climate once more. After his arrival he soon secured employment with C. Collins, a pioneer builder, and worked for him on the United States custom house and postoffice, the Tenth Street Hotel, gas works and numerous other old-time landmarks. As foreman for D. Kilpatrick, he had charge of the San Bernardino High School, jail and other work. In 1892 he engaged with Mackey & Young, general contractors, afterward on the outfall sewer to the ocean, the State Normal School, Whittier Reform School and many other minor jobs until 1895, when he branched out for himself on the Davies warehouse, the White, Hickson and Kreim buildings on First street, Frankensfield and Grant buildings on Broadway, Wieland Bottling Works, State Normal School in San Diego, all buildings, the Salt Lake freight house, George Ralph building, Tod Ford building on Broadway near Fifth, and Conservative Life Building on Third and Hill streets, besides other large work in connection with B. Lantry Sons on the Santa Fe Railroad, which has been done with credit to himself and those connected with him.

J. C. Severance

C. M. Serrance.

In the Builders' Exchange he is a member of the board of directors. Besides his activities in the building business, he has been interested in the development of the Los Angeles oil field and owns some good wells on his property. His connection with Masonry dates from his initiation in the South Gate Lodge of this city, and he is also a member of the Royal Arcanum. In politics he is a Republican and always supports party principles. His marriage, in Los Angeles, united him with Miss Kittie Schindler, who was born in Canton Glarus, Switzerland. Of their union five children were born, namely: Eunice, John, Jr., Kittie, George and Florence.

THEODORIC C. SEVERANCE. Though of remote French extraction, the Severance family came to America from England, and several successive generations have been identified with the history of Massachusetts. In that state, at Old Shelburne, Theodoric Cordenio Severance was born March 1, 1814, a son of Dr. David Severance, a practicing physician through all of his active life, and Diana (Hoyt) Severance. When a young man, fortified by excellent home training and education, the son went to Cleveland, Ohio, where he was employed in a bank, and subsequently he was teller in the Bank of Auburn (New York), of which his wife's uncle, James S. Seymour, was the president. On his return to Cleveland, he accepted a position in a leading bank, and later became cashier of the Canal Bank of Cleveland, where he continued until 1855. An important position as an officer in the North Bank of Boston induced him to return to Massachusetts, where he continued until the outbreak of the Civil war, accepting an appointment as collector of the customs at Port Royal, S. C. At the close of the war he returned to Boston, where he remained until his removal to the Pacific coast, in July, 1875.

Shortly after establishing his home in Los Angeles, Mr. Severance, together with H. D. Barrows, assisted in organizing the first Horticultural Society of Southern California, in which he became one of the first officers. During the year of his arrival in California, he purchased ten acres on what is now West Adams street, one of the most choice residence portions of Los Angeles. On this land he laid out Severance street and disposed of a large part of the land; but retained several acres as a homestead, and the residence now occupied by Mrs. Severance. In the parlors of this house were held the first Unitarian services in the city, these being under the charge of Rev. John D. Wells, of Quincy, Mass. After several meetings, an organization was effected, and in the building up of a church for this congregation, both Mr. and Mrs. Severance were deeply interested, being for some years members of the original board of trustees.

Among the philanthropies which received the benefit of counsel and assistance from Mr. Severance was the Los Angeles Orphan Asylum, in the organization of which he assisted, subsequently filling the position of treasurer, Mrs. Frank A. Gibson holding office as secretary. All through the early days of its history, when its struggles for existence were keen, he continued to be its friend and helper, and finally had the satisfaction of seeing it become a large and prosperous institution. Like a majority of the residents of Massachusetts, he was, before and during war times, a staunch Abolitionist, a member of the Free Soil and Liberty parties, and later the Republican. Being to some extent a man of leisure during the latter half of his life, he was able to associate himself with charitable movements to a degree that was impossible in his earlier years, and in a quiet and unostentatious way he contributed largely of his means and time to worthy philanthropies. In addition to his purchase of city property, he acquired, with members of his family, a large holding in San Bernardino county, comprising two Spanish leagues (over nine thousand acres), embracing a large part of what is now known as the Muscupiabe ranch; six thousand acres of this holding, lying three miles north of the city of San Bernardino, still belongs to the family.

The death of Mr. Severance occurred October 12, 1892. Two years before that he and his wife had celebrated their golden wedding, at which time relatives and friends had gathered at their residence to congratulate them upon the attainment of this auspicious day. Their marriage was one of mutual helpfulness and service. To an unusual degree they were fitted each to promote the other's happiness. Both were educated, cultured and refined; possessing those qualities of mind and heart that enable men and women to be of service to the world. Mrs. Severance was formerly Caroline M. Seymour, of Auburn, N. Y., born in Canandaigua, that state, of Scotch and Dutch descent. Her father, Orson Seymour, a native of Hartford, Conn., was for years, before his death, in 1825, a banker at Canandaigua. Her mother, Caroline M., was born in New York City, a daughter of Dr. Peter Clarke, a surgeon in the war of 1812, and for years a practicing physician of New York City and a member of the staff of the first hospital established there. Mr. Clarke was born in Milton, Conn., to which point his parents had removed from Glasgow, Scotland; his wife was a Miss Fischer, of a Knickerbocker family of New York, of Holland-Dutch descent. Mrs. Caroline M. Seymour died in Buffalo, N. Y., leaving two daughters and a son, namely: Caroline M., Mrs. Severance; J. O., of Los Angeles, and Harriette E., Mrs. Henry Ivison, who died in New York in 1894. By the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Severance five children were born, of whom three survive, namely: J. Seymour, of San Francisco; Mark Sibley, of Los Angeles; and Mrs. Julia S. Burrage, of Boston, Mass. The youngest son, Pierre Clarke, who, like his brothers, received the advantages of study in Harvard College, died in Boston in 1889.

While making her home in Ohio Mrs. Severance became one of the early advocates of Woman's Suffrage and from that time to the present she has been earnest in her advocacy of the movement. In 1854 Mrs. Severance delivered the first address by a woman before the Young Men's Mercantile Library Association of Cleveland; and during the next few years was asked to repeat her address on "Humanity: a Definition and a Plea" (which covered logically the unpopular Woman's Rights questions) in cities of Ohio, New York, and later in Boston, before Theodore Parker's Fraternity lecture course. She organized, in 1868, the New England Woman's Club, in Boston, which is claimed to be the first organization under the club title and method in our country, although very near in date to the New York Sorosis. After coming to Los Angeles she organized the first Woman's Club in this city and officiated as president of the same; later also acting as president of the Friday Morning Woman's Club. For one term she was a member of the Library Board. Believing most thoroughly in the kindergarten movement, as expounded by Froebel and other pioneers of the system, she has always been an advocate and supporter of it. During 1878 she started the first Free Kindergarten Association in Los Angeles, and until recently has been its president. Largely through the labors of this organization, after a struggle lasting many years, the kindergarten was made a part of the public school system. However, the association is still continued for the benefit of children under the age required by the state law.

Mrs. Severance has been a close student of the trend of modern thought, and of the relations between labor and capital. Indeed, she is acquainted with these topics to a degree unusual among those not engaged in actual business. Intensely interested in Christian Socialism as the application of the Golden Rule to daily life and public relations, she believes that the wisest statesmanship is that which prepares to meet the crisis now upon us in our industrial conditions, and so avert a violent catastrophe. Like all those who truly love our country, she desires to promote those measures which make for its upbuilding and the permanent prosperity, not merely of a few, but of all its citizens. Advancing years have brought no weakening of her mental powers, but, with faculties preserved and heart mellowed by the passing of the years, she devotes the twilight of her life, as she devoted its afternoon, to promoting movements that will help and bless mankind.

FERDINAND NIEMANN. In the province of Hanover, Germany, where he was born March 20, 1853, Ferdinand Niemann grew to manhood upon a farm and received the advantages of study in the national schools and gymnasiums. During the process of the Franco-Prussian war, in 1870, he volunteered in the Prussian army, and served for a year in the Third Regiment Infantry, Guard Corps, at Hanover, after which, in June, 1871, he crossed the ocean to America. For a year he remained in New York City, and in 1872 proceeded to Texas, where his brother still makes his home. During the years that followed, until 1887, he was principally occupied in teaming, by which, together with farming, he accumulated a competence.

On coming to Los Angeles in 1887, Mr. Niemann began taking cement contracts, and has since continued in this business, having orders for work in Santa Monica, Pasadena, Santa Barbara, Los Angeles, Long Beach and many other towns of Southern California. In Santa Monica he built the foundation for the United Electric Company's plant; also the sixteen-foot wide sidewalk which extends fifteen hundred feet along the ocean front. In Santa Barbara he built the foundation of the United Electric Company's engine and power plant; also the foundation for bath house and plunge bath for the same company in Long Beach, which was the most difficult feat of its kind ever executed on the coast. Among his Los Angeles contracts have been the following; the walk on the Broadway tunnel; West Adams Heights; many contracts for concrete sidewalks, and the foundation for the Sale Lake Railroad depot and concrete work for the same. He has his office at No. 244 South Broadway and his residence at No. 1354 Union avenue. Uniform satisfaction has been given by his work, and his painstaking skill and watchful oversight invariably secure the most accurate results. Besides being a member of the Chamber of Commerce, he is secretary and director of the Cement Contractors' Association, in the organization of which he assisted. Politically he is a Republican and in fraternal relations a member of the Maccabees. In his family there are three sons and one daughter.

ALLAN FRASER. A portion of the estate upon which Mr. Fraser lives was formerly owned by his uncle Donald Fraser who was one of the pioneers of Ventura county and a wharf builder by occupation. An expert in his line, his services were in demand all along the coast, and he constructed wharves at Santa Barbara, Santa Monica and San Francisco, and accumulated quite a fortune from his various enterprises. The great bank failure in San Francisco, however, seriously crippled him financially. He afterward turned his attention to the management of his splendid ranch, the principal industry of which was fruit raising. In spite of his successes he led a somewhat lonely life and never married, and at his death in 1890 the property reverted to the heirs, of whom Allan Fraser was one.

The father of Allan Fraser, Thomas by name, was one of the heirs of the wharf builder, and came to California in 1889 with his wife and eight children, Allan, Silas, Christine, John, Grant, Lizzie, Ella and Daniel. He built himself and family a fine residence in 1891, but did not long enjoy his home upon his brother Donald's estate, for his death occurred in 1895. The children all live upon the ranch, as does the mother, who was before her marriage Mary Jane McPhee of Nova Scotia. Seventy acres of the property is planted with fruits and walnuts, the walnuts having been planted thirteen years ago by the uncle, Donald, and the apricots eight years ago by the father and his oldest son, Allan. The latter added to the original land in 1899 by the purchase of three hundred and twenty additional acres, so that the property now aggregates six hundred and forty acres. Of this one half belongs to Allan Fraser, three hundred acres to the mother and twenty acres to Silas. It is all under cultivation, and a portion is irrigated by the Ventura Water, Light and Power Company, eighty-five acres alone being planted in beans, an unusually large crop for this part of the county.

In 1893 Mr. Fraser married Louise, daughter of Ambrose Prientener, of Switzerland, and of this union there are four children, Ida, Willie, Robert and Margaret. Mr. Fraser built a commodious home for his family in 1899, the exterior constructed with reference to a fine appearance and the interior fitted with all modern conveniences. In politics he is a Democrat, but as regards local elections independent. His wife is a member of the Roman Catholic Church and his mother affiliates with the Presbyterian denomination.

WILLIAM HENDERSON. As one who has evolved advanced theories on the subject of plumbing and general sanitation, the name of William Henderson is known from the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean. Did not his former splendid services in connection with the city of Boston entitle him to appreciation, the fact that in the brain of the humble and obscure plumber's apprentice was conceived the system of plumbing now adopted in all of the principal cities of the United States would place him at the head of those humane benefactors and social scientists who have met the problem of municipal cleanliness and therefore municipal health.

In the fashioning of his worthy career Mr. Henderson has striven unaided from either the standpoint of money or influence, for his earliest fortunes were allied to responsibility and the necessity for caring for himself and a large family. For the first twenty years of his life he was reared in Glasgow, Scotland, where he was born May 21, 1844, the scion of an old Scottish family who had long held their own in the marts of trade. The paternal grandfather, James, was born in Shettleston, Lanarkshire, and was a hand loom weaver by occupation, an industry engaged in by many of his forefathers. His son, another James, the father of William, was also a native of Shettleston, near Glasgow, and in his youth learned the art of hand loom weaving from his father. Afterwards branching out into the mercantile business in Glasgow, he manufactured sewed muslin, and also became a wholesale shipper and ship-owner on the Clyde, engaging principally in the Mediterranean trade. He was a man of varied and vital interests, and in 1832 was one of the leaders in the Chartist agitation in Glasgow, the members of which were armed and prepared to fight Great Britain, should that country ignore the demand for a Reform Bill. Fortunately for future events, the government yielded, and this circumstance is recognized as the beginning of the British liberal party. The breadth of mind of Mr. Henderson and the humanitarian nature of his instincts were best illustrated by his attitude in regard to the slavery question in the United States, during which he sided most emphatically with the cause of the Union. He was not unfamiliar with this land of large possibility, for in 1847, accompanied by two of his wife's brothers, and his own son James, he traveled over a considerable portion of the eastern states, and it may have been the reflection of his appreciation of the chances here represented which caused him in later years to advise his son, William, not to waste his time in Great Britain, but to go to America. Mr. Henderson was a member of the Presbyterian Church, and his death occurred in April of 1865, at the age of sixty-four years. The handloom weaving industry was an occupation also on the maternal side of the house, for the mother of William Henderson, formerly Janet Martin, a native also of Lanarkshire, was a daughter of William Martin, a hand loom weaver. James Martin, the son of William, was a member of the city council, and a judge on the bench of Glasgow for twenty years, and because of his radical rulings and wise decisions attained to great celebrity. He was an extreme radical, and one of the leaders of the Chartist party, and his ability and fame also were handed down for safe keeping to his son, James Henderson Martin, who is following in the judicial footsteps of his distinguished sire. Mrs.

Henderson, who died when comparatively a young woman, was the mother of nine children, of whom William is the only one living.

When twelve years of age, William began a six years' apprenticeship as a plumber, and after completing his trade found a position awaiting him in Liverpool, England, as foreman of a large plumbing concern. In 1865 he returned to Glasgow as foreman in the shop where he had formerly been an apprentice, later taking a trip to Dublin, Ireland, but eventually returning to his former position in Liverpool. In 1873 he came to America and located in New York City, intending to there follow his trade, but owing to the panic of that year removed to Boston, which happened to be the same year as the great fire. He secured a position in a large shop, and the thought and intelligent application which he had bestowed upon his trade won for him almost immediate recognition as a man of more than ordinary resource. In 1876 he did the plumbing of Wellesley College, and of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, but the first practical test of the system devised by him in 1862, while an apprentice, was on the residence of Hon. E. L. Philbrick. This system is known as an anti-syphon air-pipe system of plumbing, with disconnecting trap between sewer and dwelling. This was placed in all of the palatial homes of Back Bay, Boston, and in the public buildings, and impressed the excellence of the system not only upon the city officials, but upon government representatives, so that Mr. Henderson was employed by the nation to submit tests of his theory before the United States National Board of Health at the Mechanics Fair Building in Boston in 1882.

Owing to the strenuous nature of his life in Boston, Mr. Henderson became conscious of a limit to his endurance, and realized the desirability of a change of climate and associations. He therefore chose California as climatically and commercially in his favor, and upon locating in Los Angeles in 1884 started a plumbing business on the corner of Main and Third streets. In 1892 he bought the ground and built his present business place, which is 50x60 feet in ground dimensions; and located on the corner of West Adams and Magnolia streets. The business is now conducted under the firm name of William Henderson & Sons, and among the buildings and residences in Los Angeles which have been fitted out by them may be mentioned the following: the residences of General Chaffee, Mrs. Kelley, J. Wigmore, J. S. Slauson, Judge Silent, J. and A. O. Smith, H. T. Lee, Dr. Nelson Keeley, Flint, Whiting, Foster, and Vermillion, Lewis, etc.; the Long Beach and Monrovia Hotels; Keller's Hotel at Santa Monica, besides many other public buildings scattered throughout Southern California, including the Women's Temperance Union.

While living at Glasgow, Scotland, Mr. Henderson married Agnes Cockburn, a native of Glasgow, and of this union there have been twelve children, ten of whom are living, viz.: James, a plumber in Petaluma, Cal.; Mrs. Agnes Loricke, of Los Angeles; David, who is ranching; Janet, at home; George and Edward Philbrook, who are in partnership with Mr. Henderson; Mrs. Lizzie Douhnor, of Los Angeles; Douglas, Mrs. McCombs, of Los Angeles; Hazel and Pauline, who are at home. William, the fifth child, and Dougal, the seventh, died in Los Angeles. Mr. Henderson by no means confines his interests to the plumbing business, but has substantially entered into various enterprises in the vicinity. The Henderson subdivision of nine acres, between Thirty-eighth and Thirty-ninth streets and Western and Dunkar avenues, is but one of his numerous real-estate possessions in the city, and of which he still owns thirty-five lots. He owns a ranch at Clearwater, which is rented by his son David. He is fraternally associated with the Masons, having joined that organization in Boston, where also he was elevated to the Royal Arch Chapter. Formerly he was a Knight of Pythias. He is a member of the Master Plumbers' Association, and has probably done more to elevate the popular idea on sanitation as viewed through the eyes of a profound thinker and student of social and economic conditions than any individual on the Pacific coast. Nevertheless, he has found public education along these lines a matter to be conducted with extreme patience, for not all are amenable to innovations which suggest future welfare rather than immediate expenditure and convenience. Many practical inventions are credited to Mr. Henderson, not the least important of which are the Automatic Closet System Valve, patented in July of 1878; the Automatic Grass Sprinkler, to dispense with the use of hose; the Portable Grease Trap and Unique Waste, and numerous other valuable improvements connected with the plumbing business which have been given to the public and not patented.

PAUL HAUPT. Although not a native of the United States, Mr. Haupt has no recollection of any home other than this country. He was born near Gerlitz, Prussia, Germany, October 13, 1852, and was less than three years of age when, in the spring of 1855, his father, August, brought the mother and three children from Hamburg to New York in a sailing vessel, and from there to Louisville, Ky., where he gave his attention to the building business for many years, having learned the carpenter's trade under his father, continuing with him until he had gained a mastery of the occupation.

C. S. A. Johnson

The growing city of St. Paul attracted Mr. Haupt to its activities in 1880 and there he became a contractor and builder. His work was not limited to his home city nor indeed to Minnesota, but extended as far west as Washington and Oregon. Included among his contracts were those for the Fidelity Trust Building at Tacoma, the Pacific National Bank at Tacoma, a part of the Northern Pacific shops at Tacoma, Library and Ladd buildings in Portland, and numerous others, representing a value of almost $400,000 for his eighteen months of work. Among his contracts in St. Paul were those for numerous business blocks and public buildings. During the fall of 1893 he came to California and has since engaged in contracting and building in Los Angeles, where, among many contracts, he has had those for the residence of A. M. Ozmun and the Ozmun building on Fifth between Broadway and Hill; the Jacobi and E. P. Bryan buildings, the church and hospital at the Soldiers' Home, an ice plant for the Distilled Ice and Cold Storage Company, and the residence of Victor Ponet, the eight-story Los Angeles Trust Company Building, also the twelve-story Union Trust Company Building, now under way, and many other noted contracts. He has his office in the Laughlin building and his residence at No. 400 West Thirty-third street. While living in St. Paul he married Miss Alma Lindahl, who was born in Rockford, Ill. Their children are Edward Paul, William Frederick and Norma Lindahl, The family attend the Presbyterian Church.

The political views of Mr. Haupt bring him into affiliation with the Republican party, whose local and national tickets he uniformly supports. His connection with Masonry dates from his residence in Louisville, Ky., and he is now a member of the Southern California Lodge, F. & A. M. He was raised to the chapter degree in Sigma Chapter, Louisville, and to the commandery in Damascus Commandery, St. Paul, and is now connected with Los Angeles Commandery No. 9, K. T. On the organization of the Builders' Exchange he was chosen its second vice-president, and also for three years served in the capacity of a director.

CHARLES S. HAUGHERTY. The position which Mr. Haugherty holds, that of manager of the Buckeye ranch, he has filled since 1887. The property lies in the El Cajon valley, near the village of Bostonia, San Diego county, and embraces one hundred and seventy-seven acres, owned by the Harbough brothers, of Cleveland, Ohio. Seventy-five acres are under cultivation to raisin grapes, five acres are in oranges, and the balance is utilized for hay and pasture land. All of the improvements now noticeable are the result of the energy and judicious oversight of the present manager, who has spared no pains to bring the estate to the highest possible degree of cultivation.

HON. C. F. A. JOHNSON. The records of the Johnson family show that they were among the early settlers of Maine. Dr. Abner, son of Isaac Johnson, was born at Sullivan, Hancock county, that state, February 22, 1786, and after graduating in medicine established himself as a practitioner in Waterford and Sullivan. During the war of 1812 he held a commission as surgeon. During much of his active life he devoted himself to the manufacture of Johnson's liniment, which became a famous household remedy and is still made and sold, put up in the same form as in the original. In 1812 he married Julia Sargent, who was born in Boston, Mass., August 30, 1786, and died in Wethersfield, Conn., June 30, 1878. Like her husband, she was throughout life a faithful adherent of the Congregational Church.

One of the well-known figures in the colonial history of Massachusetts was Col. Paul Dudley Sargent, father of Mrs. Johnson, and special interest attaches to his history because he was one of those brave heroes to whom the United States owes its independence. Born in Salem, Mass., in 1745, he was a young man when British tyranny aroused the colonies to arms. He took part in the memorable Boston tea party. At his own expense he outfitted a regiment, and this was one of nineteen that constituted General Washington's camp at Cambridge in July, 1775. With the young Marquis de Lafayette at times he shared the honor of being aide-de-camp to Washington. Among the engagements in which he bore a part were those of Bunker Hill, Long Island, New York City, Trenton and Princeton, and in later life he loved to recall that stirring night when, with his illustrious general and other brave men, he crossed the Delaware and surprised the British and Hessians in camp. Almost the whole of his private fortune was sacrificed for the cause of the young republic, and when he retired from the army, at the expiration of three years of active service, he found himself obliged to begin anew. After the close of the war he took up mercantile pursuits, but finally retired to a small farm near Sullivan, Me., and there he passed from time to eternity September 28, 1828. His honorable service for his country and his sacrifice of private fortune for the public good endeared him to all patriots. Many well-known men, among them Talleyrand, came to his little home in Maine to enjoy his hospitality and talk over with him the stirring scenes in which he had borne a part. Patriotism and large mental resources came to him by inheritance, as his father, Col. Epes Sargent, was a man of ability; and his mother was a daughter of Governor

John Winthrop by his marriage to Ann Dudley, granddaughter of Governor Thomas Dudley of Connecticut. The marriage of Paul Dudley Sargent united him with Lucy, daughter of Thomas and Lucy (Smith) Saunders, the latter a daughter of Rev. Thomas Smith, of Portland, Me., and the former a member of the council of Massachusetts during the troubles with England that ended in the war for independence.

In the family of Dr. Abner and Julia (Sargent) Johnson there were three daughters and four sons, but one alone survives, this being Charles Fitz Abner Johnson, of Long Beach, Cal., the subject of this narrative. One son, Dudley, enlisted as a lieutenant in the Seventeenth Maine Infantry, and was killed in the battle of Chancellorsville. Another son, Thomas, who came to California in 1850, died of cholera on the American river the following year. The fourth son, Samuel, died in Bangor, Me. Among the daughters there was one, Mrs. Charlotte McKay, who served throughout the Civil war as a nurse and later wrote an interesting history of her experiences in the army. In recognition of her faithfulness, the regiment with which she was for a long time presented her with a diamond Maltese cross.

The next to the oldest in the family was Charles Fitz Abner Johnson, who was born in Sullivan, Me., February 10, 1827. He studied classics in Bangor Theological Seminary, and later attended Gorham Academy. After a period of clerking in Bangor, he went to Cincinnati and learned telegraphy, thence went by boat to New Orleans, and in 1849 took passage on a sailing vessel to the Chagres river and the Isthmus of Panama. From there he took the ship, Oregon, to San Francisco. Like all forty-niners, he tried his luck at mining, his first experience being on the Yuba river. Later, as a freighter, he took the first mule-train of provisions to Yreka. In 1852 he returned east via Panama and engaged in the lumbering business on the Aroostook and St. John's rivers. One of the most successful enterprises in which he was engaged was the manufacture of potato starch, and in this at one time he had the largest business in the whole world, having ten steam mills in different parts of Aroostook county. It was not until he came to California in 1889, that he sold out his manufacturing plant. Besides this enterprise he was extensively engaged in merchandising and had a bank at Presque Isle. At the same time he bore a very active part in political affairs, being, indeed, one of the most influential Republicans in all Maine. His acquaintance included the leaders of the party throughout the country, and he was more than once visited by Garfield, Blaine, and other men of national fame. In 1884 he was state elector on the Blaine ticket and had the honor of casting his ballot for that candidate in Augusta, Me.

When Mr. Johnson first came to California, it was as a young man, without influence or means. When he came a second time, forty years had elapsed since the occasion of his first visit; the country had undergone marvelous changes; he himself had made an honorable record as a business man and progressive citizen, and had accumulated a competency sufficient to provide every comfort for his declining years. Selecting Riverside as a suitable location, he bought twenty acres on Palm avenue and engaged in horticulture there for six years. In 1895 he removed to Long Beach and erected an attractive home on Cedar avenue. Upon the reincorporation of Long Beach, in the fall of 1897, he was elected a trustee, and by the board was chosen its president, thus being the first mayor of the reorganized town. As is generally known, Long Beach had passed through a season of great depression, and business was at a standstill. No improvements had been made owing to lack of funds, and no new settlers were drawn here, although the climate was all that the most exacting could demand. Largely through his efforts a radical change was made. Improvements were instituted, the city hall lot was purchased and the city hall erected; the pavilion was built; and he also recommended the establishment of an electric light plant and sewerage system, but neither suggestion was carried out at that time, although thousands of dollars would have been saved to the city had the work not been deferred. He was a director in the Bank of Long Beach and a stockholder in the Savings Bank. Here, as in the east, he was a staunch supporter of Republican principles and of the men pledged to promote these principles.

The first marriage of Mr. Johnson united him with Sarah C. Jewett, who was born in Gardiner, Me., a daughter of Samuel Jewett, and a sister of G. K. Jewett, who was president of a railroad in Maine. Her father was born in Massachusetts, as was also her mother, a Miss Kimball. While visiting at Fallbrook, Cal., Mrs. Sarah Johnson died; the body was brought to Riverside for interment. Of this marriage five children were born, three of whom attained maturity, viz.: Mrs. Louise Frémont Selfridge, of Boston, Mass.; Mrs. Kate Dudley Wheelock, of Riverside; and Edward Jewett, who is engaged in the insurance business in Boston, and who brought the first ostriches to this country from South Africa, where he had spent a year studying the habits of the birds. Mr. Johnson had an adopted son, Hon. T. H. Phair, known as the "Starch King," who is a member of the Republican state central committee of Maine, and at one time was state senator. Another adopted son, Percy A. Johnson, is a large rancher of Fallbrook, Cal., and a member of the Board of Trade there.

In Riverside occurred the marriage of Mr.

Johnson and Mrs. Harriet (Campbell) Hart, who was born in Griswold, Conn., a daughter of E. F. and Mary E. (Burlingame) Campbell, natives of Connecticut. Her paternal grandfather, Napoleon Bonaparte Campbell, was born in the Nutmeg state, of Scotch descent, and her maternal grandfather was Capt. Peter Burlingame, also a member of a prominent family of that state. In an early day E. F. Campbell settled in Janesville, Wis., where he engaged in merchandising, but later he removed his business to Ashley, Ill., and there died. His wife died in Janesville. They had only two children, Mrs. Johnson and Mrs. Roberts, the latter of Fond du Lac, Wis. In the female seminary of Janesville Mrs. Johnson received excellent advantages. Shortly after leaving school she became the wife of Josiah F. Hart, and with him she went to Europe in 1875. During the period of their residence on the continent Mr. Hart studied the pipe organ, while his wife devoted herself to art. The natural talent which she possesses was cultivated under the best masters, and such was her success that one of her paintings was accepted for the exposition at Brussels. Especially has she attracted favorable criticism in her studies from life, which are exceptionally well executed, indeed, seemingly perfect in the smallest details. The period of foreign study Mr. Hart also found of the greatest benefit, and from the time of his return to America in 1880 until his death in 1887 he was known as a fine pipe organist. In 1884 he and his wife came to California and settled at Riverside, and after his death she continued to reside there until her second marriage. She is a charter member of the Ebell Society, which she has the honor of serving as president, and in addition she is actively connected with the Eastern Star. Both Mr. and Mrs. Johnson became members of the Congregational Church, in which he was a deacon. While living in Maine he was one of the founders of the church of that denomination in Presque Isle. He was made a Mason in Ashland, Me., and after coming to Long Beach became a charter member of the blue lodge in this city.

Mr. Johnson died May 27, 1902, and was buried in Riverside.

EDWARD HENDERSON, M. D. During the years of his residence in Pomona Dr. Henderson has not only built up an excellent practice, but has also engaged to some extent in horticulture, which he finds a pleasant relaxation from professional duties. Like the majority of the citizens, he was attracted to this place by reason of its delightful climate and a desire on his part to escape the storms and blizzards incident to life east of the Rocky mountains. January, 1891, found him a newcomer among the people of Pomona, but in the years that have since elapsed he has won his way to their friendship and has gained their confidence through his professional skill.

The early education of Dr. Henderson was obtained in Jefferson county, Iowa, where he was born in 1850. On completing his school studies, he took up medicine, and in 1874 was graduated from the College of Physicians and Surgeons at Keokuk, Iowa, after which he engaged in practice in Iowa, first at Batavia, and later at Cromwell. In 1891 he came to Pomona, and, finding the climate all that could be desired, he located here permanently, since which time he has conducted a general practice.

For two years Dr. Henderson was president of the board of health, of which he is now secretary. He is a member of the Pomona Board of Trade. Along the line of his profession he is connected with the Pomona Valley Medical Society, the Los Angeles Academy of Medicine and the Southern California Medical Society. Fraternally he is past grand of the Odd Fellows' lodge, a member of the Masonic blue lodge, the Fraternal Aid and the Independent Order of Foresters. By his marriage to Alice Caldwell, a native of Vermont, he has two children, namely: Evelyn, who is the wife of Albert Hummill, of Seattle, Wash.; and Ralph Stanley. The latter, when a fifteen-year-old boy, won at the Gun Club meeting twenty-three out of twenty-five shots, which is the best record in Southern California. The doctor, too, is an expert shot and is now acting as president of the Gun Club, in whose meetings he maintains the keenest interest.

LAWRENCE HOHL, proprietor of the Pico market in Los Angeles, was born in Ailingen, Wurtemberg, Germany, April 27, 1866, and was reared and educated in his native land. While still very young he gained a fair knowledge of the ways of bakers, for his father, Sebastian, and his grandfather, Valentine, were knights of the flour bin, and devoted their years of activity to concocting appetizing and nourishing pies, cakes and bread. Sebastian Hohl and his wife, Regina (Richter) Hohl, were born in Wurtemberg, and the former is now retired from active business life. Of their children five sons and one daughter attained maturity, Lawrence being the second child. He remained at home and assisted his father with the bakery until seventeen years of age, after which he spent a year in farming, and in 1884 immigrated to the United States, arriving in New York harbor May 12. At once he proceeded to Philadelphia, where he worked in a medical manufacturing laboratory for Ashenback & Miller for ten months, after which he took his way to San Antonio, Tex., and worked in a dairy owned by John App, for three months. Next he became a coachman for Gustav Gross, the banker, and at the end of thirteen months engaged in learning the butcher business with Mr. Schultz.

In June of 1887 Mr. Hohl came to San Francisco, Cal., and in July arrived at Los Angeles, where for a week he was employed in the Atlas Mill, and was then with Samuel Meyer for a year. Subsequently he was employed by Frank Schade, Therbach & Weaver, and was with Wicker for two and a half years, and then formed a partnership with Mr. Strauber on Montreal street, an association which was severed at the end of three months. He was then with Charles Gassen for four years, after which he started the Pico market at No. 1422 West Pico street. The excellent business methods of Mr. Hohl have drawn a constantly increasing patronage, aided, no doubt, by the affable and agreeable manner of the proprietor, and his never-failing effort to please. Politically Mr. Hohl is a Democrat, and he is fraternally associated with the Sons of Herman and the Modern Woodmen of America.

PERRY A. HOWARD. On coming to the United States from Ireland, Samuel Howard settled in New York, but later, removing to Wisconsin, became a farmer in Green Lake county. His son, C. A., a native of Rochester, N. Y., acquired large interests in the vicinity of Kingston, Wis., where he made his home many years. At a later date he became a large stock raiser near Sun Prairie, Wis. About 1880 he settled in Lawrence, Kans., and directed his attention to the oversight of his large ranch in Russell county. His death occurred in February, 1885. While residing in Wisconsin he married Phoebe Jane Perry, who was born in New Hampshire, a daughter of Samuel Perry, and a member of a colonial family of New England. After the death of her husband she came to California and died in Los Angeles when sixty-three years of age. Her four children are residents of this city, namely: Charles H., Perry A., Mrs. Myrtle Vories and Mrs. Daisy B. Fuller.

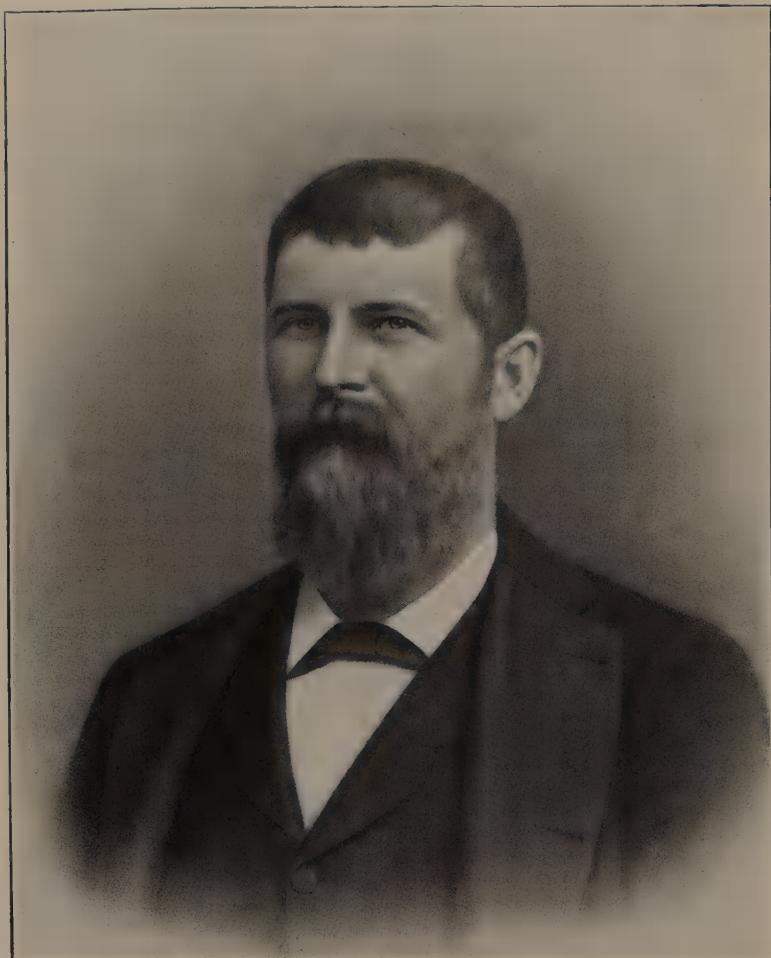

On the home farm near Kingston, Green Lake county, Wis., Perry A. Howard was born November 15, 1860. At the age of nineteen years he was graduated from the Wisconsin State Normal at Whitewater and the next year, 1880, removed to Lawrence, Kans., afterward assisting his father in the management of the large stock ranch in Russell county. Shortly after the death of his father the ranch was sold and he removed to Alma, Kans., where he bought one-half interest in the Bank of Wabunsee county, and for three years acted as cashier of that institution. Selling out in 1888, he came to California, settling in Los Angeles, where he now makes his home. As secretary of the board of park commissioners, he was an integral factor in the beginning of the park improvements, and much of the planning which has evolved the beautiful Westlake, Elysian and East Los Angeles parks, originated during those four years of his service. From 1892 until 1894 he was street superintendent of Los Angeles, having been elected on the Republican ticket, and during his term he superintended the building of about thirty miles of street sewer. In 1894 he took up general contracting, and has since made a specialty of the building of streets, in which line he has perhaps accomplished more than any other contractor of the city. He is a member of the Builders' Exchange and a participant in all the movements for the benefit of the trade. His contracts have been executed with such promptness and fidelity that he has become recognized as a leader in his occupation and occupies a distinctive place among his fellow-craftsmen.

In Victor, Mitchell county, Kans., Mr. Howard married Miss Nettie Farrand, who was born in Iowa and removed to Kansas with her father, James Wesley Farrand, a veteran of the Civil war. The three children born of their union are John Wesley, Perry Alonzo, Jr. and Irene. The family attend Immanuel Presbyterian Church, of which Mrs. Howard is a member. Ever since attaining his majority Mr. Howard has been a voter in behalf of Republican principles. In Pentalpha Lodge No. 202, F. & A. M., he was made a Mason, while his initiation into Odd Fellows Order occurred in Semi-Tropic Lodge No. 371, to which and to the encampment he still belongs. Other organizations which enroll him as a member are the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks; Los Angeles Court, Independent Order of Foresters; La Fiesta Camp No. 63, Woodmen of the World; and Hermosa Lodge No. 33, Fraternal Brotherhood.

LOUIS JACOBI. The vicinity of Marburg, in Prussia, Germany, is the locality around which cluster the early associations and memories of Mr. Jacobi, who was born there July 2, 1850, the third in a family of five children and the only one of the number to seek a home in America. His father, Ludvig Jacobi, was the son of a contractor and builder and himself became a large railroad contractor, rendering skillful work not only in the laying of tracks but also in the construction of large tunnels. After some years he gave up contracting and became the proprietor of a flour and grist mill, in which business his last years were spent. In early manhood he married Louisa Morer, whose entire life, like his own, was passed in Germany.

Under the careful oversight of his father, Louis Jacobi acquired in youth a thorough knowledge of millwrighting. On attaining his majority he crossed the ocean to the United States, settling first in Putnam county, Ill., but in a short time going to Hazleton, Luzerne county, Pa., where he secured employment at the carpenter's trade. On returning to Putnam county, Ill., he followed carpentering and milling. The year 1877 found him in the Gunnison district of Colorado, where he continued building, but at the same time became interested in mining. He was a pioneer of the San Juan country, where he was employed as foreman in the building of bridges and depots for the Denver & Rio Grande Railroad. Drifting still further toward the west, he came to California in 1883, and for two years was engaged as foreman of buildings in San Francisco.

B J Hayden

Since 1885 Mr. Jacobi has made his home in Los Angeles. One of his first jobs here was as assistant foreman in the building of the Bradbury residence, after which he took the contract for the Bradbury hotel in Monrovia and later was foreman of the Phillips block, now occupied by the People's store. This was the first large business block built in Los Angeles and was four stories in height, with a basement. As foreman he was connected with the building of the convent on Pico Heights and the Orphans' home on Boyle Heights. The success which had rewarded his efforts and the large acquaintance he had formed in building circles led him to begin taking contracts, and later years have proved the wisdom of this step. He had the contract for the Tajo building on First and Broadway for Mr. Bradbury, the contracts for the city fire department's headquarters on South Hill, for numerous business houses in the center of the city, the Blaisdell residence on Figueroa and Adams streets, two houses for Mr. Waller on Boyle Heights, the De Mange residence, also on Boyle Heights, and many other substantial and commodious residences.

In Los Angeles Mr. Jacobi married Miss Louisa G. Schillinger, who was born in Bavaria, and by whom he has four children, Carl, Mary, John and Walter. The family occupy a residence at No. 612 North St. Louis street, which was built by Mr. Jacobi, and in addition to this, he has built up and now owns other property. Along the line of his occupation, he is connected with the Builders' Exchange and is a charter member of the Master Builders' Association. At national elections he casts his ballot for Republican candidates. With his family he is identified with the Presbyterian Church and a contributor to the activities of the denomination. While in Putnam county, Ill., he was made a Mason, and after coming to Los Angeles he became a charter member of Hollenbeck Lodge No. 319, F. & A. M. Later he was raised to the Royal Arch degree in Signet

Chapter No. 57, and is besides a member of the Grand Council of Los Angeles. Another fraternity with which he is associated and in whose activities he maintains an interest is the Royal Arcanum.

B. T. HAYDEN. The recollections of Mr. Hayden often travel backward to the days when, as a boy of twelve years, he crossed the plains with his parents. It was during the period of the Civil war, when the Indians were particularly troublesome and hostile, and the party to which he belonged was in constant danger of deprivations. The services of the twelve-year-old boy were utilized as a body guard, and he did his duty with all the faithfulness of a veteran. Fourteen head of cattle and ten head of horses were driven through to Union county, Ore., where all at last landed, unharmed.

Mr. Hayden was born in Illinois, December 1, 1850, and was fourth in a family of four sons and five daughters. His father, William Hayden, a native of Kentucky, and a pioneer of Illinois, removed from there to Texas, thence to Missouri, later to Iowa, and finally crossed the plains to Oregon. In all the places of his residence he made a specialty of raising cattle and horses. Arriving in Oregon, he homesteaded and pre-empted three hundred and twenty acres in Union county, of which his family were the first settlers. In time the Cove (as his ranch was called) became a favorite stopping place for travelers through the then sparsely settled state, and he gained many warm friends through his open-handed hospitality. His death occurred in Moneta, Cal., in 1895, when he was seventy-two years of age. His wife, who bore the maiden name of Elizabeth Ervin, was born in Ohio and now makes her home in Oregon.

Exceedingly few were the advantages which Mr. Hayden enjoyed during his boyhood years. His time was spent in the saddle rather than the schoolroom, and this was not only because he preferred the former, but also because there were no schools near his Oregon home. His skill in breaking horses was a matter of comment among all acquaintances. At one time the Umatilla Indians had a horse that had nearly killed three of the best Indian riders and beat them out. When he heard that no one was able to subdue this horse, he straightway looked it up. He finally bought the animal and when he had broken and trained it, there was no finer saddle horse in the whole country. While some Indians were friendly in those days, as a rule they were treacherous and hostile. On one occasion he had to ride alone eighteen miles from Washo Ferry to Farewell Bend on the Snake river. Friends advised him not to start on the journey, believing he would be killed, but he was too brave to give up. After he had gone some distance he found that two Indians were following him on horses. He stopped at a sudden turn in the road, and when they rode up, they found a gun pointed at them. Under these circumstances they made no attempt to molest him, but quietly pursued their way.

After having homesteaded and pre-empted a farm in Willowa county, Ore., Mr. Hayden remained there for nine years. In addition, he bought four hundred and eighty acres of school land, which was utilized as a sheep ranch, but this property he afterward sold. Conditions of health led him to remove to California, where he settled at Moneta and purchased twenty acres of timber land. A residence was soon built and other improvements made. For four years he conducted a general mercantile business, for a similar period served as postmaster, and he has also been a promoter of the Moneta Canning Company, of which he is now president. He built Hayden's hall, which is a substantial building, adapted for a theatre and for lodge purposes. Besides these various interests, he was a half-owner of a warehouse.

In Union county, Ore., Mr. Hayden married Miss Margaret Huffman, who was born in Missouri, her father, John Huffman, having migrated to that state from Virginia. They have two children, Hazel G. and Audrey W. Mrs. Hayden is identified with the Ladies Order of Maccabees and Fraternal Brotherhood, while Mr. Hayden is connected with the Fraternal Brotherhood and the Knights of Pythias. In politics, though reared in the Democratic faith, he has for some years been an active supporter of the Republican party.

ERNEST JENSEN. The industrial calendar of Los Angeles contains no name more prominently identified with brick manufacturing than is that of Jensen, of the firm of Jensen & Hadacheck, of Pico Heights. Ernest Jensen, one of the substantial and successful members of the family of that name, was born in Schleswig-Holstein, near Meldorf, December 11, 1861, a son of Christian and Johanna (Royer) Jensen, natives of the same locality. Christian Jensen, as well as his father before him, was a brick manufacturer, and came to America in 1883, his death occurring in Los Angeles. The grandfather Royer was a stone-mason and blacksmith in Schleswig-Holstein. There were eight children born to Christian Jensen and his wife, four of whom are living, and of these, Dora and Henry live in Los Angeles, while Christina is a resident of Wisconsin.

As became the son of a brick manufacturer, Ernest Jensen gained familiarity in his extreme youth with the different departments of the industry, and at the same time laid in a store of useful information at the public schools of Meldorf. From his fifteenth year he was actively associated with his father in business, and in 1881 immigrated to America via Hamburg, the steamer arriving in Philadelphia from Liverpool after a voyage of eleven days. At Chicago, Ill., Mr. Jensen engaged at his trade as foreman of the works of Mayer & Toll, a position maintained with credit and success until 1887. He then resigned to come to Los Angeles, where his brother Henry was already located, and where he assumed the foremanship of the latter's brick yard for over ten years. In 1899 he started in to manufacture brick on Sixteenth street and Western avenue under the firm name of Jensen & Hadacheck, the business being conducted under the name of the Pico Heights Brickyards. A good quality of clay is found in convenient quantities, and the firm turn out enormous numbers of brick annually.

In Chicago, Ill., Mr. Jensen married Lena Bruhn, a native of Meldorf, Schleswig-Holstein. Of this union there is one child, Johanna. Mr. Jensen is a Republican in political affiliation, and is fraternally associated with the Maccabees and the Fraternal Brotherhood. With his wife he attends the German Lutheran Church. He is one of the solid business men of this part of the county, and is esteemed by all who enjoy his friendship or are associated with him in a business way.

JOHN SHIELS. One of the well-known business establishments of Riverside is that of John Shiels & Sons. The senior member of this firm, a pioneer of Riverside, came to California in 1883 and at once embarked in business as a tinsmith. Having little capital, his first ventures were on a very small scale. His shop was at first located on Main near Ninth street. After a time he began to devote considerable attention to plumbing and his success was so gratifying that he acquired a prominent position among the plumbers of the city and was engaged in contracts of importance, representing large amounts of money. Since 1891 he has had his shop at Tenth and Market streets.

During 1886 the sons of Mr. Shiels, Charles M. and William Frederick Shiels, were admitted into partnership, and the title became John Shiels & sons, since which time it has continued as such. The sons, being capable and energetic young men, have proved of the greatest assistance to their father, and are aiding in maintaining the reputation of the firm at the high standard established years ago. Among their contracts may be mentioned those for the McNabb and Crawford residences on Magnolia avenue, A. P. Johnson's house on Palm avenue, and the residences of William Irving, John Mylne and Mr. Henderson at Arlington Heights. In addition, they have also had contracts for sewer work.

AUGUSTUS C. HAZZARD. It is not strange that Mr. Hazzard should have found in the ministry an outlet for his earnest religious spirit. He began to preach in 1854, and was ordained in the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1857. During the following seven years he was devoted to his duties in the church, his labors in Michigan ending in 1864. Owing to failing health, he was obliged to consider the matter of a change of climate and surroundings, and the far west seemed to offer a surcease from physical disability. He accordingly journeyed hence by way of Panama and San Francisco, and upon arriving at his destination at once assumed charge of the Santa Rosa station. After a short time he went to St. Helena, in the Napa valley, where he continued his ministerial work. He was for a time on the Sacramento circuit, and at different times stationed at various points throughout California, and now remains in the Southern California Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

In 1883 Mr. Hazzard took up his permanent residence with the early pioneers of Whittier, the land at that time being covered with great stretches of barren waste. And here, also, his strong and ardent personality was a factor for good, for he taught and exemplified the gospel of mercy and good-will. Interested to a large degree in farming and horticulture, he at first secured about one thousand acres of the promising soil, the majority of which he later disposed of to other agriculturists. At the present time his attention is entirely given to horticulture, and he has one hundred and fifty acres under English walnuts and twenty-five acres under citrus fruits.

ALLEN W. NEIGHBOURS. Though a resident of the vicinity of Downey since 1865, Mr. Neighbours was not then a newcomer, having previously lived in San Bernardino since 1853. In 1863 Mr. Neighbours crossed the plains with an ox-team in a train of emigrants, facing dangers of the most pronounced kind, and located at the end of their journey in San Bernardino, Cal., finally going to the vicinity of Downey, which has since been his home. He was one of the earliest pioneers of the district, and has, during the course of his life here, witnessed many changes and improvements, the credit for which is due in a large measure to his assistance and interest in the development of the latent resources. He was married twice; his first wife, Priscilla Burrow, died in Arkansas. Elizabeth McCann, his second wife, was a native of Tennessee, and seven of their children survive.

In national politics Mr. Neighbours is a Democrat and interested in all of the undertakings of his party. Vitaly interested in the cause of education, he was chosen to serve for several years on the school board as a trustee. He is a member of the Los Nietos and Ranchito Walnut Growers' Association, incorporated. Essentially a self-made man, he has won the approval and esteem of the entire community by his attitude toward matters pertaining to the well-being of the neighborhood. Mr. and Mrs. Neighbours have a fine ranch of fifty-five acres of land, about twenty acres of which are in walnuts.

JAMES FLETCHER ISBELL. Upon the arrival of Mr. Isbell in Southern California in 1868 great herds of cattle and sheep roamed at will and grazed on the uplands and in the meadows. His first place of residence was at one time included in the home ranch of Don Pio Pico, the last Spanish governor of California. In Spanish the title of the property was Rancho Passo de Bartolo Veja. The governor was a loyal American citizen and a gentleman of the old school, dignified and courtly. He proved a good friend to Mr. Isbell; the latter raised a crop of corn on his ranch with only once irrigating the land. Don Pio Pico offered to sell him all the land he wished at $20 per acre, and to wait for payment until he had harvested his crops. This offer Mr. Isbell refused, although he has ever since regretted doing so. Instead, he went to Orange county in 1872 and bought twenty acres of land for $30 an acre, but traded ten of the acres for orange trees to plant on the balance of the property. In addition he bought five acres, thus having fifteen acres, which he later sold for $500 per acre. The increase in the value of the property was due to his efforts in the interests of irrigation. He was instrumental in the organization of the Santa Ana Valley Irrigation Company, which bought out the Chapman & Glassell Company. The old ditch was not large enough to accommodate the demand for water, and Mr. Isbell was one of sixteen men who went to Los Angeles and bought out the old company. They built what was practically a new ditch, and by cutting a tunnel they created a forty-foot water power, which is used by the Olive Milling Company. The ditch cost about $65,000, much of which amount was worked out by the stockholders. It has proved of incalculable value to the entire country and irrigates twenty thousand acres of land. Immediately after its completion prices began to advance, and it was for this reason that Mr. Isbell was enabled to sell his property at a large increase over its purchase price. During the work of building the ditch he superintended one gang of the construction party, at the upper end of the ditch, in the Santa Ana Cañon in the mountains.

In 1883 Mr. Isbell changed his location to the ranch at Los Nietos, where he now resides. Here he has thirty acres in all, twenty-five of which are under English walnuts and five under oranges. Originally a waving cornfield shook its tassels in the air, plebeian progenitor of a golden aristocracy. Since his return to Los Angeles county Mr. Isbell has done considerable work in grading ditches in the Los Nietos valley. He worked for the Santa Fe Railroad Company in securing for them the right of way between Los Angeles and the Orange county line. He also put up the grade at the railroad crossing at Los Nietos station, thus giving the Santa Fe the right of way, and obliging the Southern Pacific to put up the signal tower. While working for the railroad company he was able to secure fifty acres of land, on which he located the town of Rivera, subdivided the property into lots, and these he sold.

CLAYTON LEWIS. The chief engineer and electrician of Second street station, Edison Electric Light Company of Los Angeles, is a member of an old Pennsylvanian family, whose genealogical record is traced to Lewis the Springer, so-called by reason of his remarkable skill in jumping. These two names were transmitted to posterity under the family cognomens of Lewis and Springer, both of which spring from the same ancient English stock. John Lewis, a native of Warren county, Pa., became a pioneer of the county of the same name in Ohio, and from there about 1856 removed to Madison, Wis., thence going to Baraboo, Wis., in all of which places he followed the occupation of a tinsmith and copper-smith. During his residence in Madison he served for one term as city treasurer. His death occurred at Baraboo in 1876. He married Martha Lutton, who was born in Pennsylvania, of Scotch-Irish lineage, and is now a resident of Santa Ana, Cal. Of their twelve children all but two attained maturity and nine are now living. The two eldest sons, James, of Grand Rapids, Mich., and Samuel, of Fresno, Cal., were soldiers in the Civil war, the former being a member of the Forty-third, and the latter of the Forty-eighth Wisconsin Infantry.

In Madison, Wis., Clayton Lewis was born January 13, 1858. When a boy his health was so delicate that attendance at school was impossible, hence his education was secured principally from reading and observation. At sixteen he began to grow strong and was able to take up farm work. In 1879 he went to Iowa and was for two and one-half years employed as locomotive fireman on the Sioux City & Pacific Railroad, after which he was employed as locomotive engineer for a year. In a similar capacity he worked in Texas and Nevada, and during the summer of 1883 became locomotive engineer for the Oregon Railroad and Navigation Company, in which connection he remained for two years. A later position was on the Northern Pacific Railroad. In 1886 he became engineer in the Central station of the local electric light company of Bismark, N. D. A year later he returned to Oregon and was employed there and in Washington by contractors for the installation of electrical plants. He helped to install the first four electric street railroads in the state of Oregon, also many of the first electrical plants in that state and Washington.

On coming to Los Angeles, in 1895, Mr. Lewis was employed by Arthur Perry in an electrical capacity, and then was connected with the San Antonio Light and Power Company, having charge of their plant in the San Antonio cañon, fifteen miles north of Pomona, which was the first commercial long distance plant in the whole world. Power from this plant was transmitted as far as San Bernardino, twenty-eight miles away. After six months Mr. Lewis resigned and, returning to Los Angeles, during the same year (1897) became chief engineer and electrician in charge of the Second street station of the West Side Lighting Company, now the Edison Electric Company. This position he has since filled. Under his supervision there has been a gradual increase in the capacity of the plant from one hundred-horse power to six engines, having a combined capacity of fifteen hundred horse-power. The perfect condition of the plant is largely due to his keen and intelligent supervision, and the able manner in which he has discharged every duty has brought him frequent and merited commendation. The high opinion of his ability held by the members of his craft was proved in 1900 when he was elected president of Los Angeles No. 2, National Association of Stationary Engineers, and in other ways he has received tangible evidence of a general recognition of his ability and influence. Though not active in politics, he is well informed regarding the problems which divide our great parties to-day, and gives his support to the Republican organization. Fraternally he is connected with the Modern Woodmen of America and the Ancient Order of United Workmen. His marriage, in La Grande, Ore., united him with Miss Catherine Adams, who was born in Saratoga county, N. Y., and by whom he has a daughter, Adeline. In religion Mrs. Lewis is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

MICHAEL KLASSEN. To the subject of building in all its phases Mr. Klassen has devoted the greater part of his active life, and has applied thereto the most profound study and practical research. Since 1890 he has been superintendent of cement foundations of buildings for Carl Leonardt, and for the last year has been the partner of Mr. Leonardt. During these years Mr. Klassen has carried out contracts for the largest and heaviest work in Los Angeles, nor have his services been at all confined to this, his favorite city. He superintended among others the Chino sugar factory and the factories at Oxnard; Ames, Neb.; Rocky Ford, Colo.; and another re-built factory in Nebraska; the plunge at Santa Monica and Redonda; the foundation of the Bradbury block,

Abraham Mann

German-American Bank, Wilcox Building, Turner Hall, the Philadelphia brewery, the Los Angeles Street Railway Company's building, and the heavy work for the Lankershim, Henne and Insurance buildings.

Upon the ancestral lands of his family Mr. Klassen was born near Trier, on Mosel, Prussia, November 28, 1854, and on this same farm his father, Michael, lived for seventy-one succeeding years. He was a man of importance in his neighborhood, and was a non-commissioned officer in the Prussian army. The paternal grandfather, Michael, tilled the acres of the time-honored estate which also witnessed his birth, and also engaged in the lumber manufacturing business on an extensive scale. His son, Michael, married Annie Mary Grewer, a native of the vicinity of Trier, a daughter of Jacob Grewer, farmer and hotel man, and the descendant of a prominent Prussian family. Two of the brothers of Mr. Grewer were killed in the war with Napoleon in 1813. Mrs. Klassen died when her only child, the third Michael in the family, was three years old. He was reared at the old home and received a fair education in the public schools, and at an early age displayed particular aptitude for the use of carpenter's tools. This tendency was fostered by his uncle, who was a carpenter, and by close association with the saw-mill of his grandfather. Having mastered his trade he entered government employ in the railroad service during the Franco-Prussian war in 1870. The following year he immigrated to America, and worked at his trade in Brooklyn, N. Y. He afterwards located in New York City and worked at the bench, and his life was practically uneventful until the breaking out of the Modock war created a demand for the services of the alien as well as native sons of the land.

April 17, 1873, Mr. Klassen left his saws and hammers and chisels and took up the vocation of arms, as a soldier in Company A, Twelfth United States Infantry. After the first year he was promoted to the rank of corporal, and after six months more to the rank of sergeant, in which capacity he served for the remainder of the strife. His regiment came on a special train to San Francisco for a campaign in the lava beds, which resulted in the hanging of Captain Jack and two of his confederates. In all he served in the army for five years, and was mustered out April 17, 1878, having previously spent some time at Camp Wright and at Mojave, Ariz. After the service Mr. Klassen located in Los Angeles and worked at his trade until 1880, in which year he went to Tombstone, Ariz., and contracted and built for two years. He then decided upon Los Angeles as a desirable permanent place of residence, and his subsequent success in his chosen occupation has seemed to substantiate the wisdom of his choice.

The marriage of Mr. Klassen and Mrs. Jane E.

Dees, of Ireland, occurred in San Francisco, and of this union there are three children: John is a carpenter in business with his father, while Robert and Annie are living at home. Mr. Klassen has built a pleasant and convenient residence at No. 1455 West Thirty-seventh street, which is the scene of much agreeable hospitality. He is a Republican in politics, and is fraternally associated with the Maccabees. In the business world of Los Angeles he is regarded as a substantial and capable acquisition, and by his friends and associates he is appreciated for the traits of generosity, consideration and unquestioned integrity.

ALFRED BECK CHAPMAN. From the time when he first saw California, in 1858, to the present day, Mr. Chapman has never wavered in his enthusiasm concerning the ultimate prosperity of the state. Many of our pioneers passed away before their fond hopes were realized, but it has been his high privilege to witness the transformation of the country wrought during the passing years. He has lived to see what was in days gone by a wild tract of land covered with brush and mustard and worthless except for stock pasturage, transformed into a prosperous, highly cultivated and beautiful region, whose attractions win unstinted praise from even the most critical of strangers.

The Chapman family came from England. William S. Chapman, of Virginian birth, graduated from the University of North Carolina, of which his father was president, and afterward engaged in the practice of law and the management of his cotton plantation. Had he been spared to old age, undoubtedly his talents would have brought him success, but he died while still a young man, being thirty-two years of age. Some years before he had married Miss Coziah A. Beck, daughter of Col. Alfred Beck, a militia officer. Their son, Alfred Beck Chapman, was named in honor of his distinguished grandfather, and was born at Greensboro, Ala., September 6, 1829. Graduating from West Point in 1854, he was afterward stationed at Forts Leavenworth, Benicia, Tejon and Churchill. He held the rank of lieutenant, but resigned his commission and retired from the army to engage in the practice of law. Coming to Los Angeles in 1861, he studied law with his father-in-law, J. R. Scott. After the war he formed a partnership with Andrew Glassell, and three years later another attorney was admitted to the firm, which became Glassell, Chapman & Smith. The junior member was Col. George H. Smith, late of the Confederate army. A large practice was built up in local courts and the supreme courts of the state. For several years Mr. Chapman was city attorney, later district attorney.

Retiring from the firm in 1879, Mr. Chapman settled upon a portion of the Santa Anita rancho, his original purchase comprising sixteen hundred acres. Since then he has sold some of the ranch, and now owns seven hundred and fifty acres. Like all horticulturists, he has had his reverses, and, like most of them, too, he has had many successes. He has large acreage in citrus trees.

In 1859 Mr. Chapman married a daughter of J. R. Scott. They became the parents of the following-named children: Alfred Scott, who became an authority in fruit-growing and served as a member of the state horticultural society, and now resides in Los Angeles; William, a physician practicing in Spokane, Wash.; Lucy, Ruth, Evelyn and Richard. After the death of his first wife Mr. Chapman married a daughter of the late Col. W. H. Stephens. No one is more deeply interested in the progress and welfare of his community than Mr. Chapman. While he is a staunch Democrat and a believer in the Episcopal faith, his interests are broader and more comprehensive than those of any party or church, but represent all that is best and truest in mankind. In promoting his own success he has advanced the prosperity of San Gabriel valley, and has been instrumental in attracting hither a highly desirable class of citizens.

W. A. WELDON, M. D., is the proprietor of the leading drug store in San Pedro and has been closely connected with every movement tending to advance the permanent welfare of this place. Broad minded in his views and loyal in his devotion to the chosen city of his abode, he accepted the responsible position of chairman of the board of trustees of San Pedro.

Dr. Weldon was born in South Portland, Me., in 1853, but was reared in the city of Boston, where he obtained an excellent education in the public schools. After completing his high school studies he entered Bowdoin College in Maine, where he spent two years in the academic department. He then obtained a position in a drug store, and, while mastering the business, he also devoted considerable attention to the study of medicine. In 1884, after he had been given his degree as a doctor of medicine from Bowdoin College, he came to the west, and for a couple of years pursued his practice in the eastern part of the city of Los Angeles. In 1886 he came to San Pedro, where he soon built up a large and representative practice. From 1890 to 1893 he served as county coroner, and for several years he has been retained by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company as their district surgeon. He owns and carries on a well-equipped drug store, and usually gives employment to two clerks. He is the federal quarantine officer for the United States marine hospital service at San Pedro.

In politics the doctor favors the Republican party. Fraternally he stands high in the ranks of the Foresters of America. May 11, 1901, he married Miss Franc Hawks, principal of the Boyd street school of Los Angeles.

JOHN J. DEAN. When Mr. Dean arrived in Moneta he found scarcely the semblance of a village, for as yet no streets had been laid out and there were only three houses to indicate the site of the future town. With a firm belief in the possibilities of the soil, he bought five and one-half acres which had been planted to barley. On this land he set out strawberries, blackberries, Logan berries, and various larger fruits, and he has since devoted himself with encouraging success to the berry industry. For some years he made his home in a small house, but it was inadequate to his needs, and was replaced by an attractive residence which has no superior in the entire community. Another improvement is a private gas pumping plant of twenty-six inches. Having a talent for landscape gardening, he has made his home and lawn attractive, and is constantly making some improvement to add to the beauty of the property.

It was after having traveled in many parts of the world that Mr. Dean decided California to be unexcelled as a place of residence. He was born in England August 4, 1851, and is a son of Henry and Marie (Whitehall) Dean, also natives of that country. His grandfather, William Dean, was a lifelong resident of England, as was also the father, who was a gentleman of leisure and owned an estate of almost three thousand acres, known as Hazel Hall. In a family of six children John J. Dean was the fourth. As a boy he was given the advantages of public and private schools. At the age of twenty-one he came to the United States and for five years served an apprenticeship to the nursery business on Long Island. Subsequent to the completion of his time he worked as a journeyman in South America, Canada and the West Indies. On his return to New York, he secured employment as landscape gardener for the state insane asylum at Auburn, and this position he held for seven years. For four years afterward he engaged in landscape gardening in Dallas, Tex., and from there in 1887 came to California, settling at Tropic. Soon, however, he returned to New York, but fifteen months later came back to the Pacific coast, and worked as a foreman in the Elysian Park nursery, Los Angeles. From that city he came to Moneta in 1890. While in Los Angeles he married Miss Jeanette Weaver, who was born in Sussex, Wis. They are members of the Presbyterian Church and hold a high position in the respect and esteem of their acquaintances. Since becoming a citizen of the United States Mr. Dean has voted with the Republican party, both in local and national elections. Active in Masonry, he is identified with the blue lodge, chapter, commandery and consistory.

J. W. Bell

A. W. BUELL. If it is true that retrospection plays a part in our later years in proportion as the conditions in the present are remote from those of the past, Mr. Buell must have abundant material for reflection, and one can imagine him spending the evenings of many winters before a glowing grate fire, unconscious of the moving of the dial, or the wasting away of the embers. For the peaceful life which he is spending at his beautiful home in Santa Barbara is so strangely at variance with that of his youth and middle age, so thoroughly modern, so attuned to twentieth century comfort and even luxury, that to look back whence he came seems like peering into half-lighted vistas, remote, and altogether inaccessible. For the other half of the picture has a setting of pioneer days, dear to the historian and romanticist, and recalls the white man fearlessly entering the domain of the red man, the progress to the little log school house, the prized candle light, the distaff and spinning wheel, and the dangerous and interminable plains, beckoning the credulity and ambition of man to the boundless resources beyond. Viewed in the artificial light of recent advance, this picturesque delineation is full of charm and beauty and simplicity, yet they who created it suffered from privation and hardship, and by reason of their courage, challenge our boundless admiration and ceaseless gratitude.

The Buell family is of English descent, and settled first at Plymouth and later in Connecticut. The grandfather, Samuel, served in the Revolutionary war, as mustering officer and military drill master, and while in the Quebec campaign became enamored of the beauties of Vermont, locating there after the close of the war. For a farm he bought out a Mr. Ash, after which he returned to Connecticut, married, and prepared to transport his household goods to the new home in the Green mountains. The country was locked in icy fetters and the journey was made by sled with a yoke of oxen, and, in order that the oxen and cattle which accompanied the family might not slip on the ice, they had to be shod. Some of these same shoes are at present a prized possession of the family. Mr. Wilcox accompanied the newly married couple on this expedition, and they were the first settlers in Essex, Chittenden county, Vt. The land was cleared of timber, and there began an ideal pioneer existence, in which carded wool, spinning and weaving played an important part, for the winters were cold, and the process of transforming crude sheep's wool into clothing for the human frame had to be accomplished under the low roof of a Vermont cabin. Food was cooked in the broad fireplace, and a little log house was built near the spring and there a nursery was planted from seeds brought from Connecticut. Later still a new dwelling house was built on the knoll, and in this more modern affair Lynos Buell was born, the father of A. W., and March 18, 1836, A. W. Buell himself was ushered into existence in the same little house. Moral austerity ruled over the establishment of Grandfather Buell, an instance of which was repeatedly furnished when he later kept an inn, and became a deacon in the Congregational Church. He allowed no one to go by or travel on the Sabbath, even if he had to keep them over Sunday for nothing. He was also a strict temperance man. He lived to the good old age of seventy-four years, and his wife survived him until eighty-four years of age. Two of the sons were in the war of 1812, Samuel and Orange, and both were at Plattsburg, the latter attaining the rank of captain.

Lynos Buell spent his life farming on the old homestead in Vermont, and he carefully utilized the two hundred and eighty acres for dairy purposes, and for the raising of fine merino sheep. He was a selectman for many years, was a Whig, an abolitionist and a Republican, and a member of the Congregational Church. He lived to be seventy-one years of age. The mother, Hannah (Olin) Buell, was born in Westford, Chittenden county, Vt., a daughter of James Olin, a native of the vicinity of Bangor, Me., and an early settler of Vermont, where he died at the age of ninety years. The Olin family was of English descent, an old New England family, and the forefathers were as a rule seafaring men. Mrs. Buell died at the age of seventy-four years, and was the mother of six children, five of whom grew to maturity. Rufus Thompson Buell in 1853 came to California around the Horn on the Yankee Blade, and now resides in Santa Ynez, having a farm of fourteen thousand acres and owning over two thousand head of cattle. Mary Marion, who became Mrs. Thompson, died in Colchester, Vt.; A. W. was next in order of birth; Analutia died at the age of eight years; Harlan came to California in 1863, and is a merchant at Watsonville; and James died in Montecito, where he was postmaster and a merchant.

On his father's farm in Vermont A. W. Buell developed ambitious traits of character, which found an outlet March 17, 1857, the day before he was twenty-one years of age. The auspicious occasion was his starting for California from Burlington, Vt., going by rail to St. Louis and from there by steamer to Boonville and by stage to Versailles, from which point he went in an ox train to Westport, Mo., where they outfitted. There were three wagons and three yoke of oxen for each wagon, eighty head of cattle, forty horses, and three thousand five hundred sheep, and sixteen men. Mr. Buell worked his way through by driving one of the teams for N. Talcott & Co. Their course was up the Platte river to Fort Laramie, and for fifteen days they camped on the south side of the Platte river. A long remembered experience was the crossing of this river with the cattle and provisions, when Mr. Buell was in the cold water from daylight to dusk for fourteen days, guiding the sheep as they swam to the opposite shore. At night they were obliged to stand guard to protect the sheep from the howling wolves, and one night he himself was nearly killed by these bloodthirsty animals. Arriving in Humboldt, Mr. Buell left the train and set out for California, experiencing great difficulty in crossing the desert, but arriving safely in San Francisco, December 24, 1857, more than ten months after starting on the trip. The journey across the plains was a comparatively uneventful one, judging by the experience of those who were in advance and who followed behind, many meeting ruthless death by being massacred by the Indians and Mormons.

Mr. Buell intended to get work to do in Oakland, but found no position, so he walked forty miles in one day and surprised his brother, R. T., who had four years previously located in California at Point Reyes. R. T. Buell was a graduate of Oberlin College and had been a teacher for some years, but in California turned his attention to stock raising. In this locality Mr. Buell started to farm with a partner, and they improved some land and put one hundred and forty acres into barley and thirty acres into potatoes. When harvest time came around the grain was cradled and bound by hand, and when they succeeded in locating a threshing machine in the neighborhood, they were obliged to hand out the neat little sum of $40 a day while they were traveling there and back. This expenditure was not conducive to very exorbitant gains, and at the time of reckoning in the fall Mr. Buell had available assets amounting to fifty cents, a pair of blankets, and a saddle horse, which he sold in short order and took himself to San Francisco with small regret for things left in the rear. He worked on a milk ranch for a year, and performed the feat of getting up at midnight, milking numerous cows, and started for the city before the sun had thought of rising. A year later he went back to Point Reyes, rented his brother's dairy, and with Joe Fay as a partner ran the dairy on halves for three years. During that time business looked up a little and they made $15,000, in no easy way to be sure, for they worked night and day, milked fifty-four cows or more, and had no chance to fritter away valuable time.

This experience ended, Mr. Buell rented Steele's dairy, conducted on quite a colossal scale. One hundred and sixty cows came in for attention, and the services of ten men were required, the output of the dairy during one year being sixty thousand pounds of cheese and three tons of butter. They also raised hogs. By the end of five years he had a fine start, and then went to San Mateo county and engaged in the dairy business with Fred Thompson for a year, but not liking this arrangement he decided to go south, and, accompanied by his brother, R. T., arrived in Santa Barbara August 14, 1867. Upon looking around they found a man named Hughes who owned a half interest in a San Carlos ranch, and they purchased the other half of the ranch, consisting of about thirteen thousand acres, after which the brother went back to Vermont, and Mr. Buell returned to San Francisco for money. He also bought Cañada Corral rancho, consisting of one league, or four thousand four hundred and forty-four acres. In December of 1867 he brought back a fine herd of cattle for a dairy, shipped lumber from Pigeon Point for building, erected the dairy and residence which are still standing, and engaged in the dairy and stock-raising business. He also raised sheep, and at one time had thirty-five hundred head, and upon his pastures grazed some of the finest horses that ever shook their manes in Southern California. Belmonts and Morgans were raised to the exclusion of other breeds, and here matured Flory, with a record of two-twenty; Lompoc, with a record of two-twenty-two and a half; and Bullet, with a record of two-twenty and a half. San Carlos was later sold to the brother of Mr. Buell, and Cañada Corral, with its fine record of successes in the dairying, sheep-raising and stock-raising line was disposed of to Mr. Hazard, who also bought eighty head of horses for $10,000, Mr. Buell reserving six horses for his own use.

Mr. Buell came to Santa Barbara and bought the property which at present constitutes his home, and which consists of two and three-fourths blocks on Milpas and Montecito streets. Nor does this cover the extent of his property, for he owns forty acres in Montecito, and considerable other business and residence property in Santa Barbara, besides the Victoria livery stable. His own home is improved and beautified to the extent of the landscape gardener's art, and is one of the fine places in the city. His wife, formerly Mary Carter, of Vermont, and whom he married in Monterey county in 1868, is the mother of seven children, and is one of the interesting pioneer women of the county. The children are as follows: Mrs. Jennie Malhart, of Oxnard, whose husband is a farmer on a large scale; Elizabeth, at home; Alonzo, a resident of Santa Barbara; Mabel and Lena, who are students in the high school; Louis and Harold. Mrs. Buell is a member of the Catholic Church. In voting at presidential elections Mr. Buell never deviates from the straight path of Republicanism.

W. S. Day

HON. WILLIAM SCOTT DAY, judge of the superior court of Santa Barbara county, was born in Smith (now Trousdale) county, Tenn., March 14, 1848, and was the oldest son of Henry Douglas and Martha (Kearley) Day, natives of Tennessee. Ten children comprised the family, and all but one of the number attained mature years, seven of these now surviving, but Judge Day is the only one on the Pacific coast. The Day family is of Scotch extraction. John Douglas Day, a native of North Carolina, married a member of the Scotch family of McCaulleys, and settled on the Cumberland river in Tennessee, where he became a large planter. His son, Henry D., removed to Arkansas in 1859 and for two years remained on a farm there, but April, 1861, found him in Illinois, where he carried on a farm in Union county until he was accidentally killed at sixty years of age. His wife, who is of Welsh and Scotch descent, is now more than eighty years old and continues to reside in Illinois.

When the family moved to Arkansas William S. Day was eleven years of age, and in 1861 he accompanied them to Illinois, where he attended district schools and the Carbondale Seminary. From the age of sixteen he devoted several years to teaching school, but in 1872 took up the study of law under Judge M. C. Crawford, of Jonesboro, Ill., and was admitted to the bar in Mount Vernon, Ill., in June, 1874. From that time until 1888 he engaged in professional work at Jonesboro. In 1876 he was elected state's attorney of Union county, which office he filled for four years, after which time he devoted himself to his private practice. In 1882 he was admitted to the bar of the supreme court of the United States. At the election of 1886 he was chosen to represent his district in the state legislature, where he served in the session of 1887.

Coming to California in 1888, Mr. Day selected Santa Barbara as his home and here began a general practice of law. In April, 1897, Governor Budd appointed him judge of the superior court, to succeed Judge Walter B. Cope, resigned. At the general election, in the fall of 1898, he was elected, on the Democratic ticket, by a majority of two hundred and eight in a county that usually gave a Republican majority of three hundred and fifty; it is a notable fact that he was the only Democrat elected at that time. During his term of office he has held court in Los Angeles, Riverside, San Bernardino, Ventura and San Luis Obispo, as well as Santa Barbara. As jurist, he is known for fidelity to duty, logical mind, impartial spirit and lofty principles of honor and justice, and both at the bar and on the bench his career has been one worthy of emulation.

In Jonesboro, Ill., Judge Day married Miss Helen A. Frick, member of a pioneer family of Illinois that originally came from Germany to North Carolina. They are the parents of two children. The son, William Clarence, after graduating from the Santa Barbara high school, entered Leland Stanford University, from which he was graduated in 1901, at twenty-one years of age. The daughter, Alice M., graduated from the high school at fifteen years of age, and is now attending Bryn Mawr College in Pennsylvania.

During his residence in Illinois Judge Day was made a Mason and officiated as master of his lodge. He was also raised to the chapter and commandery degrees in that state. He is a charter member of St. Omar Commandery No. 30, K. T., of which he is past eminent commander. In addition he is a past officer in the local lodge of Odd Fellows and a member of the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks. In his religious belief he is a Unitarian, and is now a member of the board of trustees of his church in Santa Barbara. Socially he and his family are honored wherever known, for the talents that have brought him professional prominence are no less conspicuous in private and social life.

ALONZO E. HORTON. Probably the most noted man in San Diego is A. E. Horton. He belongs to that class of pioneer residents to whom so large a debt of gratitude is due. Often alluded to as the father of San Diego, his history has been inseparably associated with that of the city. He has lived to see what was in years gone by an apparently worthless tract of land transformed into one of the charming coast cities of California, while all around the country is prosperous, beautiful and finely cultivated. The history of his early experiences here reads more like a romance than a chapter from real life. Everywhere the influence of his energy and faith in the future was apparent. His own enthusiasm created the quality in others. When he landed in San Diego bay on the steamer Pacific, which had six passengers and twenty-six tons of freight, he came ashore in a yawl boat. While waiting for a conveyance to old San Diego he walked to the place where the courthouse now stands and at once remarked that the site would be unsurpassed for a city. Going to the old town he found that the six hundred or more acres of level land could be bought by having the land put up and sold to the highest bidder. This was done after a board of trustees of old San Diego had been elected in order to make the transaction legal. Eleven days later the sale came off. Two hundred acres were offered. His bid of $100 was at once accepted. Then a quarter section was put up; he bid considerable less than before and secured the land. The sale continued until he had secured the entire six hundred, besides other land, until he owned one thousand acres, comprising Horton's first addition to San Diego. There were many who believed disappointment awaited him as it had met a Canadian who, fifteen years before, attempted to make the land profitable. However, the people who predicted failure had not counted on his pluck and perseverance. He agreed with General Rosecrans that, if a railroad could be built from Yuma to San Diego, the latter would make the finest harbor in the world. He brought a shipload of piles from Santa Cruz and made arrangements to build a wharf. To anyone who would erect a building he donated a lot, and thus soon had more than twenty buildings. After due consideration he determined to make Fifth the principal street. To any man who erected a 12x16 building he gave a lot, and when twenty-one buildings had been put up he bought them back (excepting one). At his own expense he whitewashed the side to the water front. Through all these methods the town was widely advertised. In the carrying out of his plans he employed about one hundred and fifty men. Special inducements were offered merchants to locate in the new town. Constant improvements were made to the streets. It was an era of interesting experiences. Many men refused offers made by him that eventually would have made them independent fortunes. The Horton House and Horton's Bank building were the result of his indefatigable efforts to build up the town. Through his efforts a postoffice was established. Later a daily mail was secured to take the place of the previous weekly mail. The telegraph company was induced to build to San Diego after he had agreed to back the enterprise financially.

As may be imagined, those were very busy days for him. Indeed, he often accomplished in a day what five or six other men by their combined efforts could not have done. He seemed tireless. There was no matter too great or too small for him to aid by co-operation. Finding that the gentleman who did all the freight and passenger business to the town was exorbitant in his rates, he endeavored to induce him to make some concessions, and when he would not Mr. Horton persuaded George Wright to put the steamer Tabor on between San Francisco and San Diego, and in this way passenger fare was reduced from $60 to $30 for the round trip, while freight was brought down from $15 to $9 per ton. His influence furnished employment to a great army of workmen. Just in all his dealings, these men felt the benefit of his kindly spirit when, without request on their part, he reduced the hours of labor per day from twelve to ten, while at the same time he was liberal with wages, paying $5 and $6 a day. When the first bank was started he became its president. Within nine months after beginning the erection of the Horton house he had it completed at a cost of $150,000, and the hotel was a financial success from the start. For his homestead he selected the place where he landed on his first arrival here, on Horton Heights, at what is now State and Olive streets. From the first he realized the necessity of securing a railroad for San Diego, and his efforts were constantly bent toward that end, and in the end he was successful. When he wished to secure the passage of a railroad bill in Congress for the Texas Pacific he went to Washington, D. C., and there interviewed Sunset Cox, member of Congress from Ohio, who had been a staunch opponent to the bill. Now, it happened that Mr. Cox had been attorney for the Panama men who had sustained a loss during the riot, and Mr. Horton had been the main witness in securing damages for these men, costing the New Granada government over $2,000,000. For this reason Mr. Cox felt very friendly toward Mr. Horton, and was ready to listen to his arguments. Finally he withdrew his opposition to the bill, which was passed with the amendment that fifty miles a year were to be built east from San Diego and fifty miles or more west from Fort Yuma.

Turning to the personal history and ancestry of Mr. Horton, we find that Barnabas, son of Joseph Horton and a native of Leicestershire, England, settled in Hampton, Mass., in 1635, thence going in 1640 to New Haven and in October of the same year to Southold, L. I. His son, Joseph, removed to Rye, Westchester county, N. Y. Erastus Horton was born in Connecticut and died in San Diego, Cal., at eighty-seven years of age. His wife was Tryphena Burleigh, also a native of Connecticut, but of Scotch descent; she died in San Diego when eighty-five years of age. Of their seven children Alonzo E. was the oldest son. The youngest daughter is Mrs. W. W. Bowers of San Diego. The subject of this article was born in Connecticut October 24, 1813. When two years of age he was taken by his parents from Union, Conn., to Stockbridge, Madison county, N. Y., and four years later to New Haven, Oswego county, N. Y., where his first school lessons were taken under the direction of Miss Patty Woodward. When he was eleven the family moved to the shore of Lake Ontario, and it was there that his father had an illness that left him blind. Thenceforward he assisted in the support of the family, and, after returning from school, two miles distant, he worked at basket-making. Soon he left school and spent his time in chopping wood to supply orders from Oswego for hewed timber. At twenty years of age he began to clerk in a store, later was a lake sailor and afterward captain of the Wild Goose, between Oswego and Canada. During the winter of 1834-35 he learned the cooper's trade, his specialty being flour barrels.

Then the city of Oswego elected him constable by the largest majority ever given any candidate on the Whig ticket.

Upon the advice of a physician, who, however, thought him incurably ill with consumption, he came west. In 1836 he landed in Milwaukee, and for a time he was busily engaged in making investments, all of which showed his keen judgment and sound common sense. Nor were those days devoid of danger, for frequently his life was sought by highwaymen, and more than once it was only his quick wit that saved his life. Returning east, he passed the time until 1840 in employment in various places. His first western home was purchased in the town of Oakland, Wis., that year, and his father and family followed to that locality not long after. Through investments in cattle in Illinois, which he sold in Wisconsin, in one year he increased his capital of $150 to $4,000. In St. Louis he saw profits in land warrants and bought sufficient to locate fifteen hundred acres. Out of this investment grew the village of Hortonville, Wis. His first town was buried in the woods, and with eight men he cut a four-mile road to his proposed mill site. By the time he had lots to sell he was sawing lumber with which to improve them. The prices and payment for material were of small account with the proprietor. Houses must be built whether settlers had money or not. In a year from the completion of the mill there were one hundred and fifty people living in Hortonville. At the end of two years he sold the remaining property there at a profit of $7,188.

The first trip made by Mr. Horton to California was in 1851. His mining ventures, unlike his experiences in other lines of activity, were not successful. However, in other ways he was prosperous. He opened a store at Pilot Hill and constructed a ditch six and one-half miles long to supply the miners with water. After a year he sold his waterworks and other interests for $6,500. His next employment was trading in gold dust on account of the Adams Express Company, usually realizing $30 a day in commissions. After the failure of the company he began in the work for himself and met with remarkable success. Although he carried large quantities of gold dust about with him, he managed by dress and actions to lead highwaymen into believing him to be a "green Yankee," and he was never attacked. At the same time he carried on another successful venture. This was the putting up of ice twenty-five miles above Georgetown, which was so remunerative that three hundred and twelve tons netted him $8,000.

Among the passengers on the steamship Cortez, in March, 1856, was Mr. Horton. After the steamer arrived at Panama the memorable uprising of the natives occurred, and had it not been for his promptness the mob would have carried out their plan. Nearly two hundred persons from the steamer were dining in the hotel when the attack took place, but only three had firearms. The announcement that the rioters were coming caused a stampede from the table to the upper rooms. On bursting into the house the leading ruffians were halted at the stairway by Mr. Horton and his aides, and a few effective shots drove the assailants into the streets. Immediately a reign of terror began, and there were many who owed their lives to Mr. Horton's steady aim in shooting down their assailants. His coolness and bold action succeeded in bringing the passengers together in safety on the ship. He had lost $10,000, but had the gratification of having saved many lives. On their arrival in New York the passengers chose Mr. Horton to proceed to Washington and make a statement of the occurrences at Panama in response to a demand from the authorities to that effect. Accepting the appointment, he gave his time to a settlement of the claims. A demand for reparation was made by the United States. However, his own claim for $10,000 was strenuously opposed by the governor of New Granada, who knew the part he had taken in resisting the attack and who wished vengeance for the lives lost among his countrymen. As a compromise, Mr. Horton gave up his claim in order that the others might be paid the amount of their losses. Starting again to the west after the Civil war, he included a trip to British Columbia and engaged in mining in the Caribou district, but unsuccessfully. Reaching San Francisco without capital, he tried various plans for restoring his lost fortunes, but had not met anything especially attractive at the time he heard San Diego discussed as one of the great cities of the future. The value of the harbor and climate were the topics of the evening at a private gathering he attended. So impressed was he that sleep was impossible. Getting up, he began a careful study of a map of California. He decided that the location was excellent and offered special inducements, and determined to go at once. With this decision he returned to bed and slept soundly until morning. Within three days his store was closed and the stock sold. With the proceeds, less than $500, he started to San Diego, arriving April 6, 1867. He was pleased beyond his expectations, and decided to invest, with the results previously stated.

It was some time after coming to San Diego before Mr. Horton could arouse the people to a necessity of having regular elections. Finally he secured an election for trustees, who were empowered to sell city lands. Candidates were provided and elected. The property was legally advertised and sold. A deed to seven hundred and fifty acres was made at twenty-six cents an acre, and the only bidder was Mr. Horton. The work of advertising the new city was immediately commenced. His labors were untiring from the time he measured off lots and blocks with a tape line and laid out the streets for his workmen to clear from cactus and sage brush until the winter of 1869-70, when his sales averaged $15,000 a month. From $3,000 in 1867 his receipts increased to nearly $85,000 in 1869. All the money he received was invested in improvements to the town, and it is safe to say that $300,000 have been used by him for that purpose. His faith never failed him, even when crops failed for want of rain and croakers began to publish accounts of retrogression and certain death to the enterprise. In every way his fellow-citizens have endeavored to show him the respect which they hold for his judgment and ability. In the senatorial contest of 1871 he carried his own county (although it usually gave a large Democratic majority), and only failed of election by reason of the adjoining county giving the usual Democratic majority.

While living in Wisconsin Mr. Horton married Sally Millington Wright, who was born in New York, and died in Jefferson county, Wis. His second marriage united him with Miss Sarah Wilson Babe, who died while on a visit in the east. His present wife was Lydia M. Knapp, a native of Massachusetts. One of the endearing traits in Mr. Horton's character was his long and kind care of his parents. From an early age the burden of their support largely fell upon him, and not only did he discharge every duty that filial affection prompted, but he also gave them that love which made their latest years their happiest and most comfortable, and his tenderness toward his mother made the separation from him the severing of the dearest and last earthly tie before her departure from this world.

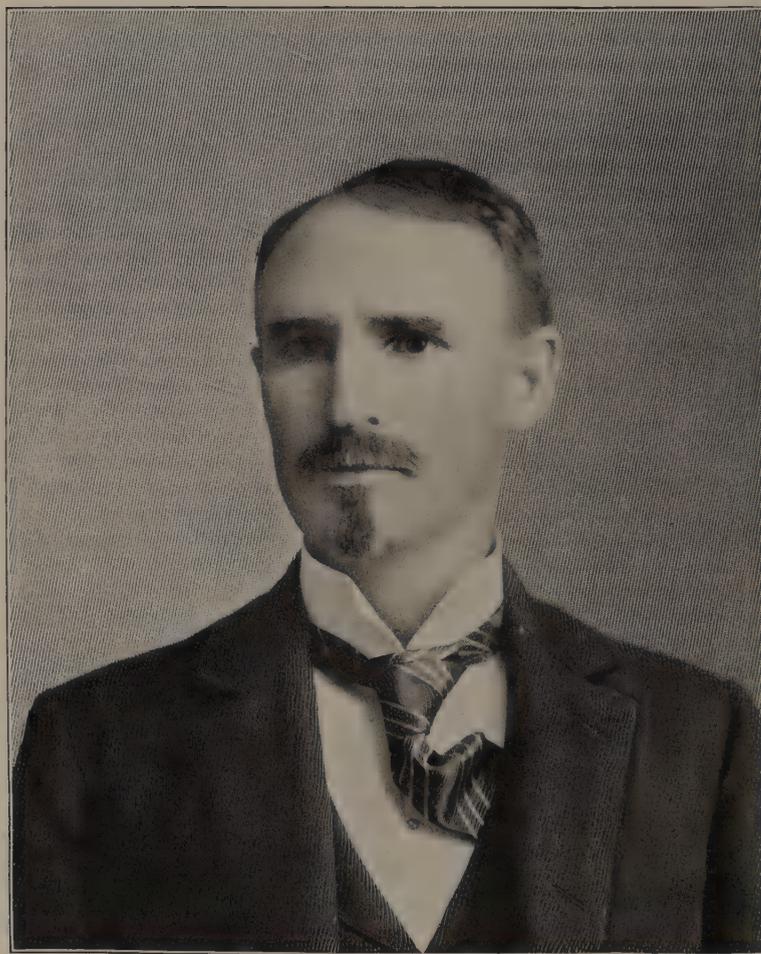

HON. POMEROY W. POWERS. The decade which measures Mr. Powers' identification with the building activities of Los Angeles represents an era of great importance in his life. Shortly after coming to this city, in 1892, he became a member of the real estate firm of Bowen & Powers, one of whose chief enterprises was the improvement of the Jones tract, between Pico and Sixteenth streets and West Union avenue, by the building of almost all of the two-story residences now to be seen on that tract. Since the erection of these buildings the firm has improved property in other parts of the city, and has also maintained important mining interests.

Near Canandaigua, at Rushville, Yates county, N. Y., Mr. Powers was born February 19, 1852, being the second child of B. W. and Sinah L. (Hudson) Powers, natives of Rushville. His paternal grandfather was an attorney, while his maternal grandfather, John Hudson, was a large farmer. For years B. W. Powers bought and sold live stock in his native town, but about 1855 he moved to Lyons, Iowa, where he became a large contractor. Going to Kansas in 1860, he was a member of the company that laid out the town of Irving, on Blue river, in Marshall county, five miles below Blue Rapids, and he bought one hundred and sixty acres in that vicinity, but the great drought of the same year discouraged him and he sought a home amid the more encouraging surroundings of Manhattan, Kans. In addition to cultivating land near there, he engaged in contracting, and for several years served as a member of the city council. His death occurred in 1891, when he was visiting in Kansas City. Politically, he voted with the Republicans, while in religion he was a Methodist. His wife, who is now eighty-eight years of age, makes her home in Kansas City. They were the parents of three sons and three daughters, all of whom are living but one daughter.

The public schools and Bluemont College of Manhattan, Kans., afforded Pomeroy W. Powers excellent educational advantages. It was his father's determination that each boy should learn a trade, and he was apprenticed for four years to a harness-maker in Manhattan. At the expiration of his time he began selling lumber at Junction City, Kans., and after nine years in that place went to Kansas City as general manager of the Western Lumber Company's offices. Shortly afterward he was chosen president of the company, and under his able management the company acquired the ownership of many yards, principally on the Santa Fe line. His rise from an employe to the president of the company within a comparatively short period shows that he has an abundant supply of energy, force of character and resourcefulness. The seven years of his service as president were characterized by a steady growth and large proportionate increase in the company's business. In addition to this important responsibility he engaged considerably in buying and selling property and erecting houses, all of which fitted him for his subsequent career in Los Angeles. On severing his associations with Kansas City he moved to the Pacific coast.

In Chenango county, N. Y., Mr. Powers married Miss Ida Bowen, who was born in German, that county. They are the parents of seven children, namely: Benjamin Nelson, who acts as superintendent of the building business of P. W. Powers; Hale P., who is engaged in the cattle business at Junction City, Kans.; Grace B., Mrs. Hannas, of Los Angeles; John R., a student in the State Agricultural College of Manhattan, Kans.; Clifford, Earl and Mav. During the Spanish-American war John R. was a soldier in the army, having enlisted in Company F, Seventh California Infantry.

F. W. Ewing

Since coming to Los Angeles Mr. Powers has taken an active part in politics, and has become known as an earnest and pronounced supporter of Republican principles. Three times he has been chosen to act upon the county central committee and each term his service has been characterized by activity, keen judgment and fidelity to the party's welfare. The Union League Club numbers him among its members. During December, 1900, he was nominated to represent the Fourth ward in the common council and was elected by the largest majority given any candidate for the council that year. On the organization of the council he was elected its president, and this post he now fills, having also, during the absence of Mayor Snyder, served several times as acting executive of Los Angeles. In his office he has done good service not merely for his party but for the entire citizenship, being one of those men who, while they advocate the principles of their party, yet rise above narrow partisanship in their desire to promote the welfare of their home city and advance the interests of their fellow-citizens.

FELIX WINFIELD EWING was born in Wayne county, Ill., May 27, 1849, and is the only child of James and Harriet (Huston) Ewing, natives respectively of Indianapolis, Ind., and Wayne county, Ill. His paternal grandparents, Joshua and Ann Ewing, natives of Ohio, removed to Indianapolis, where the former engaged in milling and contracting. The maternal grandfather, Joseph Huston, was a pioneer of Wayne county, Ill., where he married Clarissa Skinner. After working as a postal contractor in Wayne county, James Ewing became an early settler of central Illinois, near Decatur, where at first he continued in the occupation he had previously followed, and later engaged in agriculture. In 1865 he removed to the vicinity of Portland, Ore., where he continued as a manufacturer until his retirement from business life. Later he removed with his family to Ashland, Ore., where he died October 13, 1878. His widow passed away March 21, 1889, while visiting in Ellensburg, Wash., and was buried beside her husband in the Ashland cemetery.

When sixteen years of age Mr. Ewing accompanied his parents by wagon train across the plains from Decatur, Ill., to Portland, Ore., following up the Platte river, then going to the Columbia, and traveling down the same. After an interesting though dangerous journey of six months he reached his destination and shortly afterward became a student in a high school near Portland. Subsequently he attended an academy at Ashland and then taught school in that vicinity, while pursuing law studies in the office of Judges Kahler and Watson at Jacksonville. Not having sufficient means to enable him to continue legal work exclusively, in December, 1875, he went to Modoc county, Cal., where he taught school for a time in addition to his law studies.

In May, 1877, Mr. Ewing was admitted to the bar of the twenty-first judicial district court of California, and in May, 1881, was licensed by the supreme court in Sacramento. In the fall of 1877 he was elected district attorney of Modoc county, an office which he filled for three successive terms. He continued to reside at Alturas, Modoc county, where he practiced law with much success until 1889, when he toured the state of Washington in search of a new home, but finally, in December of that year, settled with his family in San Diego, where he remained until going to San Buena Ventura, his present home.

Since establishing himself in San Buena Ventura, August 8, 1892, Mr. Ewing has engaged in the practice of law. A partnership which he formed with N. Blackstock (now railroad commissioner) January 2, 1893, has continued ever since, and the firm of Blackstock & Ewing is well and favorably known in the community. In addition to a large general practice they act as attorneys for the bank of William Collins & Sons, Santa Paula Bank, A. Levy & Co., bankers, and the Ventura County Lumber Company. They have a fine suite of well-equipped offices in the Collins Bank Block, and possess one of the best law libraries in Southern California. The two partners own a ranch of eighteen hundred acres, where they carry on a general stock and farming business, finding in the management of the property a relaxation from their professional labors.

Since attaining mature years Mr. Ewing has been an adherent of the Democratic party and now takes a leading part in its local councils, his interest being demonstrated by his labors as chairman of the Ventura Democratic-central committee, which office he filled for two terms with zeal and intelligence. In 1898 he was his party's nominee for district attorney in Ventura county, and was elected, running six hundred votes ahead of his ticket. He assumed the duties of his office in January, 1899, for a term of four years, and is discharging its obligations efficiently. Fraternally he is a past officer in the order of Odd Fellows.

The marriage of Mr. Ewing and Miss Bertie Somers Kemble was solemnized in Lake City, Modoc county, Cal., August 29, 1877. Mrs. Ewing was born in Jefferson City, Mo., but received her education in a Sacramento (Cal.) academy. Two children have blessed their union, Edna Maude and James Felix. Mr. Ewing owns and occupies with his family a fine modern residence in Ventura-by-the-Sea, which commands beautiful views of the city and the bay.

WARREN C. KIMBALL. Some years ago the writer of this article, with a party of friends from the east, was enjoying a tour through California. They were one day in National City, and chance led them to a pretty homestead nestling among the trees, whose owner, with the typical western hospitality, bade them welcome and took them on a tour of inspection over his ranch. This gentleman was none other than Mr. Kimball. Although a stranger to all of his guests, his courtesy and friendly spirit were so marked as to leave a delightful impression in the minds of his visitors, and not one of them has ever forgotten the few hours spent at Olivewood ranch.

A resident of San Diego county since 1868, Mr. Kimball was born near Concord, N. H., in 1839. September 14, 1861, he arrived in San Francisco with his two brothers, Frank and Levi, all of whom engaged in contracting and building for nearly ten years under the firm name of Kimball Bros. In 1871 he came to the present site of National City, where in 1868 he had bought a Spanish land grant containing 26,632 acres, purchasing in partnership with his brothers. At once the land was surveyed into tracts of from ten to one hundred and sixty acres, and these the proprietors began to sell. About five square miles were utilized in the survey for the town of National City, which they laid out and divided into blocks and streets. On the property remaining in their possession they kept a flock of several thousand sheep. In 1872 they made a resurvey of National City and changed the streets so as to run north and south, or east and west. Realizing the need of railroad facilities, they did all within their power to secure the same, and in 1869 bonded ten thousand acres to the Memphis & El Paso Railroad under General Fremont, but the road was never built through to California, and the land reverted to the original owners, the Kimball brothers. In 1869 they organized a water company, taking the supply for irrigation and domestic use from Sweetwater river. After many years of connection with the sheep business in 1881 they disposed of their flocks and turned their attention to the raising of fruit.

As early as the fall of 1868 Frank Kimball had built a house on the ranch, and in 1872 Warren C. began the erection of a commodious residence. It is here that he has since made his home. The community is under great obligations to them on account of their efforts to interest others in horticulture, and it was they who first proved that fruit could be raised on the bay. They were among the first to introduce oranges in this district and the first to plant olive trees, having set out an orchard of fifteen hundred trees in 1875. Water for the orchard was supplied by a windmill. Besides the olives fifty acres were planted in oranges and lemons. By the exercise of sound common sense in their work they made the orchards financially remunerative, and their thrifty appearance and evident success inspired other men to embark in horticulture. However, it was not sufficient to merely interest people already residing here. They realized the necessity of interesting eastern capital. With this idea in view, they have always been foremost in planning for exhibits in various parts of the United States. In 1885 they made an exhibit of a carload of fruit at the New Orleans Exposition, paying personally all the expenses incident to the exhibition. This was the first exhibition of California fruit at any point east of the Rocky mountains, and not only brought them eighteen first premiums, but stimulated thousands to inquiry concerning the resources, climate and opportunities offered by California. In 1886 the brothers shipped a carload of fruit to Boston, this being the first California product ever sent to New England. A tasteful exhibition of the fruit was made in historic old South Church. While they paid all expenses personally, the good accomplished was not limited to them, but embraced all residents of San Diego county. In 1880 they held the first horticultural and agricultural fair in New York City under the auspices of the National Ranch Grange, of which they were the heads.

The question of irrigation has always engaged the best thought and attention of the brothers. Believing that the highest prosperity could never be attained until this problem was solved, they early set themselves to find some way out of the difficulty. They were active in securing eastern capital for the building of the now famous Sweetwater dam, one of the largest of its kind in the world. At another time Frank went to Boston and completed all the negotiations for the building of the California Southern Railroad from Barstow to National City. To this road in 1880 they donated ten thousand acres situated on the bay front and known as the Chulavista tract. They were also financially interested in the National City & Otay Railroad, and were stockholders in the San Diego Land and Town Company. In fact, there was no movement for local progress that lacked their support and co-operation. They are, indeed, the fathers of the town.

The marriage of Warren C. Kimball united him with Flora M. Morrill, a lady of superior ability and culture. Like her husband, a native of New Hampshire, she grew to mature years in that state, and in 1862 came to California, where she afterward resided. A lover of the beautiful, she was of the greatest assistance to her husband in the beautifying of their home and the wide-spreading lawn contains many rare trees which she secured and planted. Nor did her efforts cease there. She was very active in setting out trees and otherwise rendering the town attractive, and all of the shade trees along the public roads are the result of her forethought and wise planning for the future. In 1875 the San Diego Chamber of Commerce offered a prize of $75 for the best article written on San Diego county and its general improvements, and this prize was awarded to Mrs. Kimball by competent judges. For many years she was a corresponding editor of the San Francisco Granger, which responsible position she filled in a most efficient manner. Her death, July 2, 1898, was a deep bereavement to Mr. Kimball, to whom she had been helpmate, counselor, friend and companion for so many years.

HENRY P. WOOD. Through travel in various parts of the world Mr. Wood has gained a cosmopolitan knowledge that makes him a valued citizen of his home town of San Diego. Since May, 1892, he has made his home in this city, where for many years he has been intimately associated with all movements tending to the development of an increased supply of water for the rich lands of San Diego county, realizing that an abundance of water for irrigation is the basis of prosperous conditions throughout the southwest. From 1892 to 1899 he held office as the Hawaiian consul at San Diego, continuing until the office was discontinued in the latter year. Like many of California's progressive men, he has mining interests in the west. He is especially interested in the Inglewood mine in Tyson's valley, Yuma county, Ariz., and is now president of the Inglewood Mining Company. His time is, however, practically devoted to the discharge of his duties as secretary of the San Diego Chamber of Commerce, to which office he was appointed in May, 1899, and which he has since held. There is no movement that has contributed more constantly and effectively to the growth of San Diego than has the Chamber of Commerce, which, since its establishment in 1874, has had a continuous existence, and is now the leading business association in the city. With a membership of about five hundred, it is indicative of the best thought and advancement of the town, and is typical of the recent material development of local resources. One of the most attractive features of the chamber, which has a central location on Sixth and D streets, is its exhibit of local products, showing the fine quality of the citrus fruits grown in this part of California and setting forth the advances made in other directions by the progressive men to whom the present prosperity is due. Mr. Wood is also a member of the board of directors and secretary of the San Diego Eastern Railway Company, an organization formed under the auspices of the San Diego Chamber of Commerce for the purpose of securing a direct line of railway east from San Diego to the Colorado river.

The first of the Wood family in America was Alexander Wood, a native of England and a pioneer on the Hudson river in New York. His son, Cornelius, born in New York and a farmer by occupation, had a son, John, whose birthplace was Newburgh-on-the-Hudson. The latter moved to Oswego, N. Y., where he was a builder and owner of boats, and engaged in a transportation business on the lakes. Hiram W., son of John, was born in Oswego and became a wholesale commission merchant, first in New York and later in New Orleans. Going to California in 1850, he began mining in Nevada county, where he also carried on a store. His last days were spent on the Hawaiian Islands, where he died. He had married Jane, daughter of William Patton, of Irish descent. She was born in Newburgh, N. Y., and died in Nevada county, Cal. The only child of their marriage, Henry P., was born in Nevada county, Cal., June 2, 1855, and received his education principally in Hudson Academy at Newburgh, N. Y. In 1877 he went to Hawaii and began the work of superintendent of a training school on the Isle of Maui, from which point in 1879 he went to Kohala, Island of Hawaii, to take charge of a mercantile establishment. After a residence of eleven years on the islands in 1888 he returned to California. He has also made several trips to England and traveled extensively on the continent. Between 1888 and 1892 he went to Central America traveling on foot and by canoe along the line of the Nicaragua canal, in which way he gained a thorough knowledge of this vast undertaking. In 1897, as the special representative of the Southern California Chambers of Commerce, he went to Washington, D. C., in behalf of the movement for the completion of this canal. Again, in 1901, he represented San Diego in Washington in behalf of canal and harbor improvements.

During his residence in Hawaii Mr. Wood married Miss Emma Wight, who was born and reared there. Her father, James Wight, was born in East India, the son of an officer in the English army. Given excellent educational advantages, he graduated in medicine from a university in Edinburgh and then located for practice in Australia, but from that island removed to Hawaii in 1850. During the half century that has since elapsed he has become the owner of a large sugar plantation, and is one of the most prominent citizens of his locality. By his marriage Mr. Wood has two daughters, Ada and Ethel. Fraternally he is connected with the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks; in politics is a Republican and in religion an Episcopalian. Among his other associations is that of membership in the National Geographic Society.

E. A. RIZOR. From a French and German ancestry Mr. Rizor inherits the reliable traits of character which have contributed to the realization of his plans in life and which have placed him among the foremost lawyers in Santa Barbara. He was born in Columbus, Ohio, August 11, 1868, a son of J. S. Rizor, who was born near Coshocton, Ohio, and is now living in retirement in Santa Barbara. The great-grandfather Rizor was born in Alsace-Lorraine, and upon immigrating to America located first in Maryland and then went to the vicinity of Coshocton, Ohio, where he farmed and where he eventually died. The paternal grandfather was a merchant tailor by occupation, but his life was a comparatively short one, and he also died in Ohio.

Although a harness-maker by trade, after removing to Columbus, Ohio, J. S. Rizor engaged in general contracting. Later he took up his residence in Illinois, and afterward turned his attention to mining in Colorado. In 1880 he located in Fort Scott, Kans., and engaged in mercantile pursuits, and was equally successful as a general contractor up to the time of his retirement and removal to Santa Barbara in 1891. His wife, Mrs. M. C. (Trindle) Rizor, was born in Clifton, Greene county, Ohio, a daughter of William Trindle, a native of Pennsylvania. The Trindle family came from the north of Ireland, a fine old family of land owners and prominent men in their respective communities. The great-great-grandfather Trindle was an Irish nobleman, and his two younger sons immigrated to America and bought a large tract of land, upon a portion of which Mechanicsburg, Pa., now stands. The paternal grandfather settled in Ohio, where he was successful as a farmer and stock raiser. Mrs. Rizor, who is still living, has two children, her daughter Emma being the wife of C. E. Welch of Los Angeles, Cal.

E. A. Rizor was reared in Illinois and Colorado and graduated from the high school and business college of Fort Scott. As a temporary means of livelihood he learned telegraphy with the Western Union, and by this company was stationed at Wichita, Kans. He later engaged with the Santa Fe Railroad Company and was stationed in the Indian Territory and Texas. In 1891 he came to Santa Barbara and began the study of law under Hon. J. J. Boyce, ex-state senator, completing his studies with Judge D. P. Hatch of Los Angeles. After being admitted to the bar in 1894 he engaged in general practice in Los Angeles until 1896, when he took up his permanent residence in Santa Barbara, and has since worked up a large practice. He is a Republican in politics and ex-member of the county central committee.

Mrs. Rizor was formerly Mabel Kiler, born in San Rafael, Cal., and one of the Native

Daughters of the Golden West. Her father, Edmund F. Kiler, an early settler in California, was for many years identified with the redwood country, and is now a commission merchant and an extensive farmer near Santa Barbara.

FRANK P. FRARY, mayor of San Diego, has made his home in this city since 1875. Of French descent he was born in Fremont, Ohio, December 7, 1856, and is the only son of Orin P. and Martha J. (Smith) Frary, natives of the same town as himself. His father, who was the son of a New Yorker, grew to manhood in Fremont, and from there went into the Civil war as second lieutenant of Company A, One Hundred and Eleventh Ohio Infantry. At the close of the war he settled in Lansing, Mich., where he carried on a drug business for some years, but is now living retired.

From 1868 to 1875 Frank P. Frary made his home in Lansing, Mich., and attended the schools of that city. December 8, 1875, was the date of his arrival in San Diego, and at once he secured employment with the Coast Line Stage Company between San Diego and Santa Ana. In 1882 he obtained the contract to carry mail and operate a stage line between San Diego and Julian, a distance of sixty miles, and in this work he continued steadily until 1897, when he sold out. In the mean time, he also had the Cuyamaca line from Lakeside to Cuyamaca. During 1886 he bought an interest in the Westcott & Webb Transfer Line, firm name Westcott, Webb & Frary. The Pioneer Truck Company was incorporated May 15, 1889, Mr. Frary being secretary, treasurer and manager, while Mr. Westcott holds the office of president. The company conducts a general storage, transfer and freight business, and makes a specialty of heavy work. Besides his close connection with this growing and important enterprise, Mr. Frary is interested in the Encinitas Copper Mining and Smelting Company, of which he has been secretary and treasurer since its incorporation and which owns and operates a good mine.

Elected to the board of delegates on the Republican ticket in 1896, Mr. Frary's re-election in 1898 proved his popularity as a city official, while his choice as president of the board further emphasized his recognition as a man of ability. He is a member of the San Diego Chamber of Commerce. In April of 1901 he was elected mayor of the city of San Diego and May 6, same year, was installed as mayor for a term of two years. His important position he has filled to the satisfaction of all. After coming to this city he was made a Mason in San Diego Lodge No. 35, F. & A. M. For many years he has been secretary of San Diego Lodge No. 153, I. O. O. F., and at one time he served as noble grand, while he acts as scribe of Cen-ennial Encampment No. 58. In addition, he is connected with the Foresters of America, and Woodmen of the World. His marriage took place in San Francisco and united him with Miss Maud Thayer, who was born in that city, of an old family of New Hampshire. They have two daughters, Ruth and Gladys.

Wm Moore

CAPT. WILLIAM MOORE was born near Augusta, Me., April 3, 1827, on the Kennebec river, the night that the famous bridge of the same name was burned. William and Sarah (Reed) Moore were his father and mother. They were born in County Tyrone, north of Ireland, but were Scotch and Protestants. In 1819 they crossed the ocean to St. Johns, New Brunswick, neither of them at the time being more than twenty years of age. Their two eldest children were born in Canada. Shortly afterward they moved to Augusta, Me. They were of a family of farmers and linen weavers, manufacturing their own flax, and having from twenty to thirty weavers with hand looms. In America they became farmers and their four sons and four daughters were reared on a farm. Of these children, two sons and one daughter survive. Andrew and James (twins) are builders, doing an extensive business in Kansas City, Mo. Another brother, Joseph Moore (now deceased) owned a large tract of land in Missouri and during the Civil war served as colonel of a Missouri federal regiment.

After having learned the carriage-making trade, in 1848, when scarcely twenty-one years of age, William Moore began to manufacture carriages, buggies and sleighs in Lewiston Falls, Me. There he belonged to a military band and played the cornet. His military coat, high grenadier hat and brass horn (about fifty years old) are in the possession of his family in Los Angeles. One of his sisters married a Quaker and settled near Philadelphia; their son and daughter are living in Southern California and these are William Moore's only relatives in California, besides his wife and children. As a boy and young man William was held in high esteem among his associates. He was always quiet and unassuming, but strong in his opinions when he believed he was in the right. He possessed an unusual fondness for reading, which continued to his last illness. This he credited in a measure to an early acquaintance with two neighbor school teachers. Many profitable evenings were spent with them, eagerly reading history or other books which they were kind enough to offer him. He had an excellent memory and could recite pages of Burns', Scott's, and Moore's poetry, besides which he was a constant reader of general literature—politics, history, travels and romance, and he could recite or read Scotch dialect admirably. He had a fair knowledge of music and was an excellent Spanish scholar. In fact, he had information on a variety of subjects and was an interesting conversationalist, possessing unconscious wit and humor, and with a quaint way of expressing his thoughts. His smooth brow and tranquil eye, at seventy, showed his serene disposition and equable temperament, and his affable disposition made many friends and few or no enemies.

Occasionally he would refer to the old days of Los Angeles and tell pioneer stories. Friends would listen with surprised interest, but he was seldom in the mood to revert to the past. Frequently he was asked to contribute notes for publication, but he always smilingly declined; the same when asked to parade on the Fourth of July, not because he was not patriotic, but because he was devoid of personal vanity and averse to display. Once he told the story of "Peg-leg" Smith and his mine, but the writer remembers only the end—there was no "Peg-leg" mine—only a myth to lure men to journeys and disappointments. Now and then he referred to his trip from San Francisco to Los Angeles. He missed the occasional steamer and determined to come on horseback, but his purchase proving troublesome, he turned it loose and made the entire journey on foot. To one of his disposition the trip seemed neither long nor tedious, for he was young and in fine health and spirits, had two gold "slugs" in his pocket that he had mined in Napa mountains, and was interested in seeing a new country and so much of it. One night he came to a deserted hut and rested. A dry, stiff hide was by the side of the road. This he pulled over him and laughed as he did so, thinking it was better than nothing, and likening it to the comfort of a door for a covering.

A curious account is narrated of a night spent by George Hansen and William Moore in an old Spanish house that possessed crude carved wooden images of saints and apostles. The two men occupied the rooms where these relics were, but had not noticed them upon retiring. Awakening in the night, the moon was shining and lighting up the ghastly images in a startling manner, giving the young surveyors sensations of a curious presence in the room, and it is not surprising that they could not sleep.

William Moore left New York for California on the 4th of July, 1852, engaged about eighteen months in the lumber regions of Napa and in mining. He arrived in Los Angeles April 3, 1854, on the twenty-seventh anniversary of his birth. For a time he worked at carriage-making here, and helped to make the first carriage in the city, but soon applied himself to surveying, and continued in that business until a short time before his death. He was first connected with George Hansen in surveying and engineering, and they continued lifelong friends, sometimes alternating in office and at other times working together. His name appears on many of the maps on record in this county as surveyor, often as owner of property. For about forty-three years he worked and lived in and about Los Angeles, and meantime watched the growth of the place from a few scattered adobe houses to a city of one hundred thousand, with elegant public and private buildings. He surveyed ranches, county lines and city property, was familiar with Spanish grants and old titles, and was continually examining records and helping people to adjust their lines when in question. He laid out ditches, reservoirs and tunnels. In 1858-59 he was county surveyor; in 1873-74 served as city surveyor or street commissioner. These offices were then merged, and this was the first attempt to establish uniform grades in the city of Los Angeles. Very curious was the appearance of some of the main streets, as the writer remembers them. Some lots were up and some down, and steps and stairs were made to pass from one height to another, involving fatigue and circumlocution in walking a short distance. Strenuous opposition to improvement made the office of city surveyor anything but pleasant. He was often called upon in city and county courts to give expert testimony in old suits to settle boundaries, for at one time or another he had surveyed nearly every foot of land in the county. He had a keen memory for old landmarks and "corners" and could tell where to dig for long-buried stakes and "monuments." By disinterested advice and assistance he endeared himself to many old pioneers and Spanish settlers, and was often consulted and rendered valuable assistance freely.

The title of captain by which he was known came to him through his service as captain of a company of California infantry at the opening of the Civil war. In 1861 a wave of patriotism spread over our broad land, reaching the Pacific coast and the new state of California. Men quickly stepped into line and perfected themselves in military tactics. It was then William Moore organized and drilled a company under the President's first call for troops of Los Angeles soldiers. Though impatient to go to the seat of war, they were doomed to disappointment, for, instead of being ordered east, they were made home guards.

In the home of Gen. Volney Howard, of San Gabriel, January 3, 1874, Rev. C. F. Loop, of Pasadena, united in marriage William Moore and Mary E. Hall, a native of New York. George Hansen, Prudent Beaudry and a few other friends were present. Two children were born of the union, Florence and Hansen, twenty-four and twenty-two years old, healthy and happy young people, still living with their mother on East Twentieth street, Los Angeles, which has been the family home for twenty years. Graded streets are invading their home neighborhood and their once prolific orchard is liable to be divided. The only son, Hansen Moore, who combines the names of two worthy surveyors and lifelong friends, is six feet and two inches in height and weighs two hundred and forty-five pounds. The daughter is a graduate of the Los Angeles high school.

In 1876 Captain Moore and his wife visited the Centennial, and visited his mother, sisters and brothers, who then lived near Philadelphia and in Missouri, and the reunions after an absence of the son for twenty-five years were very pleasant. The dear old mother had prayed daily for her absent son, and could scarcely realize his actual presence. She would look long at the stout, mature man, and say he "could not be the slender William who left home to see the world so many years ago."

Captain Moore died January 11, 1897. The funeral took place in a pitiless rain. Friends and neighbors wended their way in carriages through splashing mud and water to bear him to his last resting place, but as they reached Rosedale cemetery the sun shone out clear for a few moments during the service. Shortly before he died, after a brief sleep, Captain Moore raised one hand and then the other, then waved both at once, as though directing an assistant surveyor. Doubtless thoughts of the old vocation flitted through his mind, but at last the final signal was given and his course was run. Surveyors wave both hands to denote completion, and that was evidently what he intended to express, failing to speak. His was a peaceful, harmonious life; gentle and kind in his home; cheerful and dignified among men. The manner of his burial was in keeping with his dislike for display. So far as learned his relatives are good citizens, doing their duty in their everyday life, to family, neighborhood and country. Several pursued mechanical vocations; one was district attorney of Salina, Mo.; several were farmers and others soldiers. Two nephews, Walter B. and Robert A. Moore, were officers in the late war. The family has always been respected, and scores of Los Angeles pioneers knew and esteemed William Moore, the old surveyor.

JAMES C. RIVES. A career worthy of emulation from many standpoints, strong and discerning in its recognition and acceptance of opportunity, is that of James C. Rives, district attorney, horticulturist and promoter of the well-being of Los Angeles and vicinity. In maintaining the reputation of an enviable ancestry Mr. Rives has worked unaided along the devious paths to present success, for at a very early age he was face to face with responsibility and the formation of his own future. He was born near Atlanta, Ga., January 4, 1846, a son of Dr. Burrell and Elizabeth A. (Taylor) Rives, natives, respectively, of Fulton and Morgan counties, Ga., and the mother a descendant of the Alexander H. Stephens family. The paternal grandfather, Rev. Jackson Rives, was born in Virginia and came of a family long represented in the Old Dominion, the immigrating ancestor having come from the home of his forefathers in England. Later bearers of the name shouldered their muskets on the fields of Bunker Hill and Brandywine.

Rev. Jackson Rives was a clergyman in the Baptist denomination in Georgia, and in later life entered the mercantile ranks, his useful life extending beyond the Biblical allotment to more than a cycle of years. His son, Dr. Burrell Rives, was a graduate physician and practiced his profession in Georgia and Virginia. During the Civil war he sided with the Confederacy, and was a surgeon in Gen. Joe Wheeler's division of General Bragg's army. In 1867 he started for California with his family via the southern route, but upon arriving at Sulphur Bluffs, Tex., remained there for two years. In 1869 he again started across the plains and through Arizona to San Diego, locating in the Los Nietos valley, near the present site of Downey, where he practiced medicine until his death in 1880, at the age of forty-one years. His wife, who is living with her son, James C., is the mother of six children, four of whom attained maturity, and three are living, James C. being second. Edward is a pharmacist, while John Logan, a graduate of the State Normal, is engaged in educational work in Los Angeles.

A vivid recollection is still retained by Mr. Rives of the journey across the plains from Texas, of the ox teams with their obstinate endurance, the raids upon the stock by the Indians and the ever-present dangers of the overland trail. He was educated at the district schools of the Los Nietos valley, but because of the early death of his father was obliged to go to work when fourteen years of age that he might assist in the family maintenance. He therefore applied himself to the printer's trade in Los Angeles, and between 1880 and 1884 worked on the different dailies in the city. In the meantime he had gained a fair knowledge of general newspaper work, and in 1885 started the Downey Weekly Review, a periodical managed with gratifying success for three years. An opportunity presenting itself to dispose of the paper on good terms, he applied himself to the further study of law, with which he had already familiarized himself during the leisure of the past few years. Upon being admitted to the bar in 1887 he began to practice in Los Angeles, where his correct understanding of legal science, his personal kindness and tact won for him an almost immediate recognition.

As a staunch adherent of Republican principles and issues Mr. Rives has ever taken a keen interest in the undertakings of his party, and in 1898 he was nominated for the office of district attorney, and was elected by one of the largest majorities ever received by a county official, his showing being nearly five thousand over his opponent. January 1, 1899, he assumed control of the office, the arduous duties of which necessitate the employment of six deputies. The administration of Mr. Rives has been well received throughout, his executive ability, his decisive handling of difficult situations, and his devotion to the best interests of the people, having won for him the praise of all who believe that public office is public trust. For many years he has been on the state central committee and the county central executive committee, and has taken an active part in stumping the state.

Notwithstanding the fact that his most aggressive and responsible interests have been centered in Los Angeles, Mr. Rives has always lived at Downey, where he owns an eighty-acre ranch, and one of the most delightful Southern California homes imaginable. September 4, 1889, he married Mary Lee Crowell, a native of Arkansas, and sister of C. T. Crowell. To Mr. and Mrs. Rives have been born four children, Edward L., Robert C., Howard and Pauline. Mr. Rives is extensively engaged in horticulture, and upon his finely improved and appointed ranch has sixty acres of orchard, forty-five of which are walnut bearing, the remainder being devoted to oranges. He is a member of the Los Nietos and Ranchito Walnut Growers' Association, the Southern California Fruit Association, and the Chamber of Commerce. Fraternally he is associated with the Ancient Order of United Workmen, the Knights of the Maccabees, and the Independent Order of Foresters. He is popular and a welcome visitor of the principal social and business organizations in which Los Angeles abounds, notably the Jonathan and the Union League Clubs, and numbers among his friends the most desirable social element of the city and its surroundings. In personal appearance Mr. Rives so strongly suggests the great slave emancipator that he has come to be known as the Abraham Lincoln of California.

HON. CHARLES H. IVINS, A. B. A pioneer of 1852 on the Pacific coast and of 1856 in California, Judge Ivins is now a resident of Santa Monica, which in his opinion possesses the most equable climate of any of our coast cities. He is a member of a colonial family of New Jersey, whose original emigrants to America came from Scotland. His parents, Charles and Elizabeth (Shinn) Ivins, were natives of New Jersey, and in 1841 settled in Iowa, dying in Keokuk, that state. The mother was a member of a Quaker family, of Holland-Dutch extraction. Of her children two sons attained mature years, and one of these, William, died in Keokuk. Three daughters, Mrs. Seaton, Mrs. Hauxhurst and Mrs. Patterson, make their home in Oakland, Cal., while the remaining daughter, Mrs. Jansen, is a resident of Los Angeles.

In Bordentown, N. J., Charles Henry Ivins was born April 1, 1829. About 1841 he accompanied the family via Philadelphia and the canal, thence by boat down the Ohio and up the Mississippi, to Keokuk, Iowa. A short time afterward he returned east as a student in Princeton College, from which he was graduated in 1848 with the degree of A. B. Two years later he was admitted to the bar and began the practice of law in Keokuk. However, the allurements of the unsettled west aroused his ambition. Thousands were seeking the Pacific coast in the hope of gaining a fortune, and he joined one of these parties of gold seekers, with the intention of going to California, but while en route his plans were changed somewhat. The ox-train left Keokuk in April, 1852, for what proved to be a very hard trip across the plains, via Omaha, the Platte, north of Salt Lake, and on to Oregon. During the same year the territory of Washington had been organized, and the recognized qualifications of Mr. Ivins led to his appointment as a district judge of the new territory, which had its seat of government at Olympia. The district over which he presided centered at Port Townsend, where he made his headquarters. For four years he continued in the position, and later was appointed judge of admiralty, which office he filled for two years.

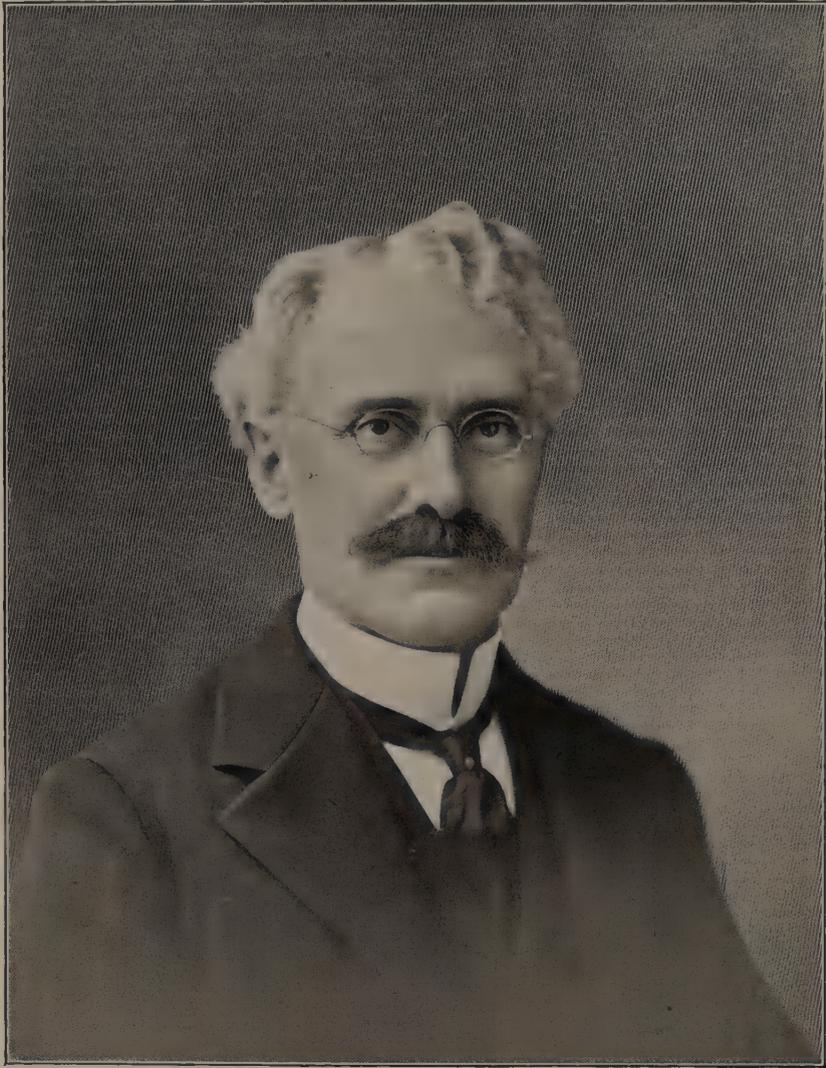

Meantime Judge Ivins had made a trip to California in 1854, and had been so delighted with the prospects here that he decided to remove to the state. In 1857, on resigning the office of judge, he settled at Petaluma and embarked in the cattle business, which he conducted upon so large a scale that at one time he had two thousand head of cattle on his range. Later he bought a large ranch and range in Mendocino county, where, however, the severe winters caused a heavy loss in his herds. His next venture was the erection of a large hotel at Markleyville, Alpine county, Cal., but this business not proving financially remunerative, he returned to Petaluma, where he resumed ranching. The purchase of a tract of land near town proved a wise investment, as it was later sold to good advantage. Reports concerning San Luis Obispo county led him to remove there. One thousand acres, comprising a part of Santa Rosa rancho, he purchased for $1.75 an acre, the price being low on account of recent droughts. Two years later the price had risen to $15 an acre. His purchase comprised the northeast corner of Santa Rosa rancho, and was watered by Santa Rosa creek. No improvements had been made, but under his oversight soon fences had been built, a house had been put up, and other buildings erected as needed. During the last two years of his stay in Petaluma he had made $8,000 in his dairy, and on coming to San Luis Obispo county he brought his stock with him, after which he engaged in cattle-raising, dairying and general farming for eight years. He still owns one thousand acres known as the Ivins ranch of Santa Rosa, and this land is rented to two dairymen.

On leaving the stock business and resuming the practice of law, Judge Ivins made his home in Oakland for three years and practiced in San Francisco, after which he conducted a general practice at Santa Rosa and erected a beautiful residence in that town. However, on account of his wife's ill health, he deemed a change advisable, so removed to Alameda, where he built an attractive home and engaged in law practice. The change not proving as beneficial to his wife as had been anticipated, in 1893 he took her to San Diego, and the following year established their home in Santa Monica, which has proved to be the climate needed to restore her health. Since coming here he has built a commodious residence on Ninth and Arizona streets, and has carried on a general law practice in Los Angeles and vicinity.

In 1857 and again in 1858 Judge Ivins returned to visit his old friends in Keokuk, Iowa, both these trips being made via Panama. Judge Ivins married Miss Mary Elenora Cole, a daughter of Gen. Edward Cole, a hero of the Mexican war. She was born in Rochester, N. Y., and reared in Keokuk, Iowa. Possessing mental powers above the ordinary, these have been developed by an excellent education and subsequent wide range of reading. Indeed, her literary attainments make her conspicuous in circles to which the gift of a broad mind and a gifted pen is the open sesame. In the work of the Federation of Women's Clubs she has been active, and she has the distinction of having officiated as the first president of the Coterie Club of Santa Monica, which she organized. She still holds an official position in the state federation of Women's Clubs. One of her papers, concerning the community property rights of women, attracted more general attention than any recent article from a woman's pen. In religion she is of the Episcopalian belief, as is also Judge Ivins. Their only son, Ernest C., is the present sheriff of San Luis Obispo county, and their only living daughter, Mrs. Cora Jessie Stewart, resides with them. Another daughter, Mrs. Kate M. Hoefler, died in San Francisco.

In many respects Judge Ivins is particularly fitted for the office of jurist. Nature endowed him with a power of keen analysis, a discriminative mind, clearness of judgment and an impartial spirit, which rendered his decisions on the bench fair and just. His conclusions were reached slowly, but when once his mind had formulated certain opinions and arrived at certain conclusions, he was seldom proved to be in error. More than once, since coming to Santa Monica, these qualities of which he is the possessor have been used for the benefit of the city, in matters pertaining to the municipal welfare. While he is a Democrat at all times, yet partisanship has had no place in his career.

W. E. Sawtelle

W. E. SAWTELLE. The town of Sawtelle was founded by the Pacific Land Company, whose officers are Robert C. Gillis, president; W. T. Gillis, vice-president; Robert F. Jones, secretary and treasurer; W. E. Sawtelle, manager. The organization of the company dates from 1897, and the following year the map of the Barrett Villa tract, two hundred and twenty-five acres, was recorded. In June, 1901, the Lindsay addition of one hundred acres was made, while in October, same year, the Pacific farms, comprising about four hundred acres, were laid out, making a total acreage of seven hundred and twenty. It had been the original intention to name the town Barrett, but when a petition was made for a postoffice, the government notified them that there was a post-office in the state named Bassett and the similarity between the two would result in much confusion; therefore another name was essential. The residents of the villa at once requested that the name be made Sawtelle, in honor of the company's manager and representative, and thus the name was adopted which is now in use.

In many respects the location of Sawtelle is unexcelled. It lies on the line of the Los Angeles & Pacific Railroad, fourteen miles from Los Angeles and three miles from Santa Monica, and within easy access of both by means of the half-hour car service. It possesses the additional advantage of being within one-half mile of the Soldiers' Home, where $500,000 is paid out annually by the government. This same proximity makes the town strictly prohibition, as under the laws of the state liquor cannot be sold within one and one-half miles of the Home; hence as a residence point for families wishing to rear their children in the midst of desirable surroundings it affords special advantages. An abundance of water is obtainable from sixty-five to seventy-five feet below the surface, and about fifty wells have been sunk without one failure to secure water. In addition, the town site possesses a water system. The town is subdivided into four hundred and thirty house lots, three hundred and seventy-five acreage lots and thirty ranches containing from four to twenty acres each.

When the company built its office, in the spring of 1898, the building stood in the midst of a barley field. A store was erected at the same time, and this formed the nucleus of the present town. Sales moved very slowly the first year, and the real activity did not begin until the summer of 1899, since which time over one-half of the property has been sold. Within three years the town grew from a single cottage to one hundred and fifty residences, and almost every day during the season witnesses the completion of some building and the beginning of another. This fact in itself proves the briskness of sales, a fact which is noteworthy by reason of dullness in sales in many other towns. Perhaps one reason of this is found in the fact that the frequent dry seasons have retarded sales elsewhere, but here, the town not depending upon fruit orchards for its existence, building goes on apace unaffected by the quantity of rain supply.

Referring to the personal history and genealogy of Mr. Sawtelle, we find that he descends from a Huguenot family that fled from France at the time of the revocation of the edict of Nantes and sought refuge in England, whence subsequent generations went to Massachusetts. Richard Sawtelle, a native of Groton, Mass., soon after the Revolution settled in Norridgewock, Somerset county, Me., where Indians still roamed through the large forests. His son, George, was born there, became a merchant, and in 1861 was appointed postmaster under President Lincoln, which position he filled twenty years or more. He was a member of the Congregational Church and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. His marriage united him with Sarah Peet, who was born at Norridgewock and died there. Her father, Rev. Josiah Peet, a native of Connecticut, became a Congregational minister in Maine. It was the custom in those Puritan days for the citizens of a town to select their minister, and in accordance with that custom Rev. Mr. Peet was so chosen as the Norridgewock preacher.

In the family of George and Sarah Sawtelle there were three sons and one daughter. Of these Mrs. Hopkins continues at the old home; Dr. F. G., of Providence, R. I., was a member of the Third Maine Battery during the Civil war; F. J. is an architect; and W. E., the youngest of the four, is manager of the Pacific Land Company and a resident of Los Angeles, Cal. The last-named was born in August, 1850, in the house where his father first saw the light. In 1869 he went to Worcester, Mass., where later he became interested in the Sanford-Sawtelle Company, a mercantile house founded in 1835, and in which he is still a stockholder. His marriage, in Portland, Me., united him with Miss Mary Wheeler, who was born in Indiana, and by whom he has two daughters, Katharine and Barbara. On account of the health of Mrs.

Sawtelle, which he hoped a change of climate would benefit, in 1896 Mr. Sawtelle brought his family to California. For a short time he remained in San Diego, but in 1897 became one of the organizers of the Pacific Land Company, in which he is still actively interested. In national politics he is a Republican. During his residence in Worcester he was a member of the board of trade. With his family, he attends the First Presbyterian Church of Los Angeles. Personally, he is a man of active mind, fertile brain, keen perceptive faculties and indomitable energy, and it is largely due to these qualities that he has made a success of his work with the land company, for the founding of a town is an arduous enterprise and he who undertakes it must necessarily possess qualities of a high order, if he would bring a gratifying degree of success to the undertaking whose management he has assumed.

FRANCIS A. HOLLENBECK. In tracing the genealogy of Mr. Hollenbeck of Los Angeles, we find that he descends from a family that came from Holland to America in a very early day. For many years succeeding generations lived in the east, where they were principally connected with agricultural pursuits. His father, Silas C., son of John Hollenbeck, was born in Akron, Ohio, March 4, 1824, and while still in his youth accompanied his parents to Illinois, settling in Winnebago county. During the long period of his residence there agriculture formed his chosen occupation and brought him gratifying returns from a financial point of view. However, desiring to spend his last years in a less severe and rigorous climate, he decided to seek a home in California, and accordingly during 1882 settled at Verdugo, Los Angeles county. Buying a tract of sixty-six acres, he set out the same in various kinds of fruits and devoted himself to the care of the land and the trees. While in Illinois he had served as supervisor, but after coming to the Pacific coast his connection with politics was limited to the casting of a Republican ticket at elections. Though his life was one of great activity, embracing in its earlier half many difficulties and hardships, his stalwart physique was not undermined by his constant labor; indeed, until shortly before his death, it was constantly remarked that he bore his years unusually well. He died June 5, 1901, when seventy-seven years of age.

By the marriage of Silas C. Hollenbeck to Mary Ann Reed, who was born in New York and died in Illinois, four children were born, viz.: Francis A., of Los Angeles; Julia B., Mrs. Henry W. Benson, of Florence, Cal.; Willard, deceased, and Edward H., of Verdugo. The eldest of the three, Francis A., was born in Winnebago county, Ill., February 1, 1849, and as a boy received such advantages as his native county afforded. Under the wise training of his father he was qualified to assume responsibilities of his own and ably conduct extensive farming interests. When twenty-six years of age he left home and went to Thayer county, Neb., where he bought a quarter section of farm land. The placing of the ground under cultivation, the erection of needed buildings and the general oversight of the place, consumed his time and attention and brought him fair returns for his care and trouble. Meantime, his father had removed to California, and the reports he sent back were so encouraging that the spring of 1885 found him in Los Angeles county, where he bought one hundred and eighteen acres near Florence. The larger portion of the land was devoted to general farm purposes, although there was also a vineyard. In the cultivation of this property he engaged for twelve years, finally selling the land in 1897 and removing to Los Angeles, where he is now interested in the real estate business, with office at No. 215 Currier block. Like his father, he has always been a firm believer in Republican principles, but has not been an active participant in politics, and as yet has never consented to hold office, although his information concerning matters of public moment and his high ideals of citizenship would make his services valuable in an official capacity.

CALEB T. CROWELL. On first coming to California, in 1871, Mr. Crowell settled twelve miles southeast of Los Angeles, where he built the first business house in the now thriving village of Downey. The name which the town bears was given it by Mr. Crowell in honor of his personal friend, ex-Governor John G. Downey. As yet no railroad had been built through this section of Los Angeles county, but three years later the Southern Pacific Company opened a branch road from Florence to Downey, and within another year this had been extended to Anaheim. After two years, as a merchant in Downey Mr. Crowell turned his attention to farming and horticulture, and while endeavoring to secure water for irrigation purposes he bored a well, which, although not furnishing a sufficient flow for irrigation purposes, proved to possess mineral properties of great value. Soon afterward he sold the well to Dr. Fulton, and for a time it was known as Fulton's well, but more recently has borne the name of Santa Fe Springs.

Near Clinton, Hinds county, Miss., Mr. Crowell was born October 28, 1850, the eldest child of Hon. R. P. and Amanda (Perdue) Crowell natives, respectively, of North Carolina and Georgia. His paternal grandfather, Edmund Crowell, a soldier of the Revolution, spent his entire life on a plantation in Halifax county, N. C., and there died. The maternal grandfather came from France to Virginia, later going to Georgia and finally settling upon a plantation in Mississippi. When quite young R. P. Crowell went to Mississippi with an uncle, Mr. Lowe, and for some years followed surveying and civil engineering, but afterward turned his attention to planting. In 1854 he removed to Arkansas, where he bought a plantation on the Red river, near Texarkana, and became the owner of Egypt farm and Cypress Brook farm. Both in Mississippi and Arkansas he served as county surveyor. At the breaking out of the Civil war he was a member of the Arkansas legislature, in which body he used his influence in opposition to secession and in favor of the state remaining in the Union. His death occurred August 12, 1865, soon after the fall of the Confederacy. His wife survived him some years, dying in Downey, Cal. Fraternally he was a Mason in high standing. Of his five children all but one are living, and three reside in California, namely: Caleb T., Mrs. J. C. Rives, wife of the district attorney of Los Angeles county, and Joseph, in San Jose.

G. A. Broughton M.D.

When the family moved to Arkansas Caleb T. Crowell was four years of age. After his father's death he was sent to a college in Clarksville, Tex., and later began clerking in Shreveport, La., thence coming to California in 1871. Seven years later he returned to Texarkana, Ark., where he engaged in the manufacture of lumber and later followed the same occupation in other parts of the state. When the lumber supply of Arkansas was practically exhausted he went to Northern Louisiana, where he operated two mills. A similar business was conducted in Lufkin, Angelina county, Tex., where he owned an interest in a fine milling plant and about twenty-five miles of railroad, of which he is still a director. The Lufkin Land and Lumber Company, in which he is a director, has one of the finest lumber mills in the United States, and has a manufacturing capacity of 250,000 per day. At this writing he is still president of the Crowell & Spencer Milling Company at Longleaf, Rapides parish, La., which owns its own railroad and a mill with a capacity of 80,000 per day. During his residence in Louisiana he also acted as manager of the company. The plant which he organized in Arkansas and which was incorporated under the title of Bodcaw Lumber Company is now the largest milling plant in the state, and owns its own railroad, one hundred and thirty miles long. Of this he also acted as president and manager for some years. In 1893 he returned to California and built an attractive residence at No. 901 South Union avenue, where he and his family have since made their home. His wife is identified with the Baptist Church, and he has been a contributor to the same, also to various philanthropies. In politics he is a Democrat and a member of the Central Club.

The marriage of Mr. Crowell united him with Miss Ella Stamps, who was born in Alabama of an old southern family, and removed to Arkansas with her father, H. J. Stamps, a planter and merchant. Born of this union are five children—Belle; James Stamps, who is general manager of the Louisiana milling plant established by his father; Susie Lee; Robert D., who is assistant manager of the Louisiana mill, and Ida.

It is not too much to say that Mr. Crowell merits praise for the success he has achieved. When he was a young man, just ready to start out in life, the south had not recovered from the calamity of the war. Industries were at a low ebb. An air of discouragement pervaded the country. Beginning then, with his youth and enthusiasm, he worked his way forward until he had established industries giving employment to a large number of men and thus greatly benefiting the localities in which they had been established. At least three large and successful plants owe their origin to his enthusiasm and energy, and, while thus building up communities, developing local resources and attaining financial prosperity, at the same time he won the confidence of his large circle of business and social acquaintances and maintained the esteem and respect of all.

GEORGE ANTHONY BROUGHTON, M. D. While to Dr. Broughton belongs the distinction of being a son of one of the greatest benefactors and promoters of Santa Barbara county, and while a justifiable pride has stimulated the effort to maintain so admirable an example of a worthy life, it may also with justice be said that the qualities he possesses would bring him prominence unaided by ancestral influence; for now, while practically a young man, he has attained a prominent place in the profession in his county and obtained a very extensive and lucrative practice in the locality where he resides.

Dr. Broughton was born in Santa Cruz, Cal., February 28, 1875. His parents, W. W. and Mary Elizabeth (Anthony) Broughton, were among the early settlers of Santa Cruz, where his father began the practice of law and journalism. His boyhood days were spent in Lompoc, Santa Barbara county, where his parents have resided for the last twenty-five years. He received his education in Santa Barbara county and San Francisco, graduating from the Medical Department of the University of California May 13, 1896. After his graduation he served an internship at the Sacramento County Hospital and the French Hospital, San Francisco, and then entered into general practice at Chino, San Bernardino county. In 1898 he gave up his practice there and located at Oxnard to have charge of the surgical work at the sugar mills, then being erected by the American Beet Sugar Company, which work he now has, in addition to an extensive country practice and the surgery for the Southern Pacific Railroad Company throughout this vicinity.

February 10, 1901, Dr. Broughton married May Livingston, a resident of Los Angeles and a native of Hueneme. Her parents, Robert G. and H. (Palmer) Livingston, were among the very early settlers of Ventura county, and lived in Hueneme for many years, where Mr. Livingston conducted a very extensive mercantile business, the family later moving to Los Angeles, where they now have their home. A woman of rare accomplishments and delightful personality, Mrs. Broughton received her educational advantages in Los Angeles and San Francisco, completing her studies in music and art in Florence, Italy, in 1900. To Dr. and Mrs. Broughton was born a daughter, Beatrice, November 25, 1901. Mrs. Broughton is a member of Acacia Chapter, Order of Eastern Star, Los Angeles. Dr. Broughton has affiliations with the Oxnard Masonic Lodge and Oxnard Masonic Club, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, Knights of Pythias and Independent Order of Foresters. He is also a member of the Southern California Medical Society.

JUAN B. BANDINI. During the early days of San Diego (Old Town) the Bandini family was prominent among the representatives of Spanish aristocracy. Capt. José Bandini, a native of Spain, became an officer in the Spanish navy, and in that capacity spent a considerable period in Peru, South America, where he married Gertrude Orgacita, also of Spanish lineage. Later he became interested in mercantile marine trading along the coast of California, but finally retired, became a landsman, and died at San Gabriel. His son, Juan, was born in Peru, and in early manhood held a commission in the Spanish navy. Accompanying the family to California, he settled in San Diego, and there married Dolores Estedillo, who was born in Monterey, and died in San Diego. Her father, Capt. José Estedillo, was a native of Spain, an officer in its army and for years a commander of land forces in California.

Many enterprises called forth the energy and executive ability of Juan Bandini, chief among these being merchandising, farming and stock-raising. His possessions steadily increased until they included fifty thousand acres, extending from Rincon to Agua Manse. It seemed as if fortune accompanied him in all of his ventures. This was largely due to his strong character, wise judgment and indomitable will. The plans which he made he possessed the energy to execute, and his influence was a potent factor in the development of Southern California. Indeed, during pioneer days people sometimes smilingly said that Juan Bandini and Abel Stearns owned all of Southern California, a statement that had in it a degree of truth when it is remembered that he owned Jurupu and Rincon ranches, one-half of Encenado and all of the Guadalupe and Tecatta ranches, besides many other landed estates. Included in his property was the present site of San Diego, which he and Mr. Davis sold to Mr. Horton, the founder of New Town. His death occurred in 1859, when he was visiting his daughter, then the wife of Abel Stearns, in Los Angeles. Of his first marriage were born the following children: Josepha, who died in Los Angeles; Alexander, who died in childhood; Arcadia, whose first husband, Abel Stearns, died in 1871, and three years later she was married to Col. R. S. Baker, one of the founders of Santa Monica; Isadora, who died in Los Angeles; José M. and Juan B., both of Santa Monica. The second wife of Juan Bandini was Dona Refugio Bandini, by whom he had two daughters and three sons, now living.

In Old Town (San Diego) Juan B. Bandini was born November 15, 1833. When eight years of age he was taken to Los Angeles, and from twelve to sixteen was on American vessels in the merchant marine service. Returning to Los Angeles, he became a clerk in the store of Abel Stearns, but later took charge of a ranch owned by his father in Lower California. Subsequent to his father's death he returned to Los Angeles to superintend the business owned by Mr. Stearns. Later he engaged in the cattle business at San Luis Rey, where he owned and operated Last Chance ranch. When he again went to Los Angeles he identified himself with real estate matters and assisted Colonel Baker, who owned the Vicente ranch of thirty-six thousand acres, but sold the larger part to Senator Jones of Nevada. The two men donated three hundred acres, valued at $100,000, to the United States government for the establishment of the Soldiers' Home. After the death of Colonel Baker Mr. Bandini took charge of Mrs. Baker's interests in Santa Monica, where he has since made his home. Though proud of his Spanish lineage, he is a loyal American, a pronounced Republican and a thorough patriot. During the Civil war he was lieutenant of Company B, First California Cavalry, and served in California and Arizona for eighteen months, when he was honorably discharged.

The first wife of Mr. Bandini was Esperanza Sepulveda, a native of Los Angeles and daughter of José Diego Sepulveda. Among the Spanish pioneers of California Mr. Sepulveda held high rank. Born in 1813, he was a son of Dolores Sepulveda, whose vast estates extended along the seacoast from San Pedro to Redondo and for miles back into the foothills. On this property, known as San Pedro rancho, José Diego Sepulveda was born and spent his entire life, dying in 1869, when fifty-seven years old. His wife was Maria Elisalda, daughter of a wealthy Spanish officer living in San Diego. Mrs. Esperanza Bandini died in Los Angeles in 1866, leaving two daughters, namely: Mrs. Arcadia Gaffy of Los Angeles and Mrs. Dolores Ward of London, England. The second marriage of Mr. Bandini occurred in San Diego and united him with Miss Caroline Moreno, member of an old family of that city, where she died in 1874.

P. J. Barber

HON. P. J. BARBER. The history of the Barber family in America dates from 1635, when Thomas Barber, who was born in England in 1614, crossed the Atlantic and settled first at Windsor, later in Hartford, Conn. Next in line of descent was Thomas (2d), born in 1644, whose son, Thomas (3d), born in 1673, was the father of Thomas (4th), born in 1716, and the latter had a son, Jacob, born in 1738, whose son, Thomas, born in 1773, was the father of Hon. P. J. Barber, and was born in Canton, Hartford county, Conn. His early life was spent in a country town. He was well educated, particularly as a musician, was a good vocalist, played every instrument then in vogue, the violin being his favorite, and wrote and taught music for years. He carried on farming early in life; later conducted a boot and shoe factory.

During the war of 1812 Thomas Barber raised a company of volunteers, but on the morning of starting for the front he was thrown from his horse and his shoulder was broken, thus preventing him from entering the service. Indeed, he never afterward recovered from the injury. In 1820, accompanied by his family, he removed to Nelson, Portage County, Ohio, settling on Section 36, the journey by ox-teams taking forty-five days. With the assistance of his oldest sons, he cut down the timber, planted crops, put up a log house and barn, and made every effort to establish a comfortable home in the then wilderness of the Western Reserve. Adversity came to him, and from the first he was called on to endure many hardships, not the least of these being caused by the burning of his barn, with all his first year's crops just as a severe winter had set in, and by the same fire he lost some of his stock and all of his farm implements. This would have discouraged and disheartened many men, but with his fortitude and power of endurance he was undaunted, and with the help and encouragement of his devoted wife and children he struggled through the next few years, determined to regain losses and provide a comfortable home. So far were they from civilization that bears, wolves, deer and other wild game were plentiful, and the Indians had scarcely yet abandoned those forests for the western prairies. But he and his wife had other troubles to bear up under besides those of a financial nature. In 1828 sickness entered the home, and within fifteen months five of their children were laid in their graves. After this his fortunes took a turn for the better; he cleared away more of the forests and put under cultivation one of the best of farms, built a commodious dwelling, barns, etc., planted large orchards, manufactured maple sugar, butter and cheese, his crops were plentiful, and his lands increased in value. He was a man of sterling qualities, honored and respected by all; his word was as good as his bond; he was sound in judgment, public-spirited, and a man of dauntless courage. He was a member of the Masonic order, and a believer in the noble principles for which that fraternity has ever stood. He died in the old home September 17, 1848, in his seventy-sixth year.

The mother of P. J. Barber bore the maiden name of Percy Merrill, and was born in Hartford county, Conn., in 1781. She became the wife of Thomas Barber in 1797, and reared a large family, the youngest of whom, Peter J., is the sole survivor. Her death occurred in the same old home in Nelson, Portage county, Ohio, May 19, 1849. The Merrill family in this country descends from Nathaniel Merrill, who was born in England in 1610, and settled in Newbury, Mass., in 1634. He and his wife, Susan, had a son, John, born in 1635, who married Sarah Watson. Their son, Willerton, born June 28, 1675, married Hannah Waters, by whom he had a son, Gideon, born in 1710. The latter married Mary Bigelow, and their son, Nathaniel, born in 1742, married Hannah Belden, their daughter, Percy, becoming the mother of P. J. Barber.

Ten years after the Barber family settled in Nelson, Ohio, the subject of this article was born, November 26, 1830. When a boy he had the advantages of district schools, supplemented by attendance at Windham Academy. When seventeen years of age he began to learn the cabinet-maker's trade in Windham, Ohio. In 1849 he went to Cleveland, where he followed cabinet-making and carpentry, and at the same time took up the study of architecture. In 1852 he fell a victim to the California gold fever and joined a party who were planning to seek their fortunes in the far west. From New York they sailed to Panama in February, 1852, having passage on the steamer United States to Chagres, thence going by a small boat to the head of river navigation, and from there by mules to Panama. At the isthmus there were nine thousand people waiting for ships to take them to California.

After a delay of many days they secured passage on the old Clarissa Andrews. Among the passengers were E. W. Earl, E. C. Smith, L. V. Hopkins, Ezra S. Johnson and Prof. J. W. Pike, all close friends of Mr. Barber. Prof. Pike it was who gave the old ship the name of "floating coffin." The voyage was a memorable one, that left a lasting impression upon the minds of the survivors. One of the company of the Ohio party, Barnus Ives, became delirious from fever contracted at Panama, and when but four days out threw himself overboard and was lost at sea. Seventeen—including the only woman aboard—died on the voyage, resulting from hunger and thirst, and were consigned to the briny deep; no doubt they were devoured by sharks that followed close in the wake of the ship. Death stared all in the face for many long, weary days. They finally landed in San Francisco, May 22, 1852, after a voyage of sixty-five days.

The majority of Mr. Barber's comrades proceeded to the mines, but he decided to remain in the city for a time, and secured work at his trade. In August he went to Marysville, but his investments there in the Mammoth Joint Stock Mining Company proved a total loss, as during the winter the snow lay from three to ten feet deep, and in it the sixty-six animals owned by the company and packed with machinery and provisions for the mine were lost, also two men; and before the place could be reached in the spring the secretary sold the mine and mill and was never after heard from by the stockholders. To add to his troubles, he was taken ill with fever, and for days his life was despaired of. When convalescing, the hotel where he stopped was burned, and he narrowly escaped alive, while his clothing and hair were burned as he fled through the flames, he having risked his life to save that of the watchman who was asleep in a remote corner of the second story. Returning to San Francisco in December, he worked on the Haun & Whisman Mill near Santa Clara during the summer of 1853, and in 1854 and 1855 was employed in Oakland and its foothills. Mr. Barber worked at the carpenter's trade and also studied architecture, under the noted French Architect Heurn, and later worked at draughting for Reuben Clark on the plans for the California state capitol. From 1856 to 1869 he contracted for buildings in San Francisco, being also architect and superintendent for many besides. While in San Francisco he was secretary of the Builders' Association, and was treasurer of the Elysian Club for years. This was a social organization of a very delightful character, of which he entertains most pleasant memories. He was an active member for years of the First Light Dragoons in San Francisco, under Capt. C. L. Taylor, and but for a young wife and child would have gone into the Union Army with the California hundred. He has often regretted that circumstances were against him.

Becoming convinced that the climate of San Francisco was ruining his health and that Santa Barbara offered especial advantages above all other localities, Mr. Barber gave up a good and lucrative business and removed to this city in 1869, and has since made it his home.

Among the buildings for which Mr. Barber was architect may be mentioned the court-house, Santa Barbara College, Arlington hotel and annex, Presbyterian Church, several school buildings here, besides one in Lompoc, Santa Ynez and Carpinteria, the Clock building, First National Bank, the Dibblee mansion, Crane's Hall, opera house, Cottage Hospital, Channel City Hall, Public Library, Savings Bank, upper Hawley block, the residences of John Edwards, Orena, Captain Moore, Rev. James Villa, Mrs. Lucy Brinkerhoff, Judge Canfield, A. W. Buell, Captain Greenwell, and others, having, altogether, planned and had charge of erecting over one hundred and forty buildings in Santa Barbara county, representing an outlay of more than $1,250,000. For four years he was also interested in the lumber business as a member of the firm of Tompkins & Co., and for a time he owned a suburban farm of twenty-seven acres, on which he had fine crops of corn, grain, etc., an orchard, and for years a large apiary.

It might be supposed that the numerous business responsibilities of Mr. Barber would leave him no time for public affairs, but not so. No one was more interested in the early growth of Santa Barbara. Every movement for the city's progress has received his encouragement and assistance. In 1880 he was elected mayor, serving one term. In 1882, under President Arthur, he was appointed postmaster, and held the office for four years. After much solicitation on the part of his fellow citizens, in 1890, he again consented to be a candidate for the mayoralty, and was elected by a large majority. During this administration he planned the boulevard, fountain and other work of Plaza del Mar, which is conceded to be the finest work of its kind along the coast. Another act to be credited to this administration is the building of the large out-fall and other sewers, sufficient in capacity for a city of 100,000 inhabitants at cost of \$18,000. By persistent efforts he saved to the city over \$200,000, in thwarting a scheme for putting in a $4\frac{1}{2} \times 6\frac{1}{2}$ -foot sewer, a mile and six hundred feet long, that could not be reached by one-fourth of the sewage of the city. The city fire cisterns and flushing tanks were planned and superintended by him and the most of the bridges. At the time of President Harrison's visit to Santa Barbara, April 3, 1891, Mayor Barber arranged for his reception, and was himself the bearer of this city's welcome to its distinguished guest. The president was met by Mayor Barber and Senator Heacock, at Pasadena, and accompanied to Santa Barbara, where he was honored by our first battle of flowers; an immense arch spanned State street; the key-stone, 10x12 feet, was ornamented with his picture, flags, bunting, etc., and he was given an immense reception in the evening at the Arlington Hotel.

In addition to the various offices mentioned, Mr. Barber was a member of the board of health for one term. He was president of the County Mid-Winter Fair Association, exhibiting in San Francisco in 1893, made the plans for the building and had charge of gathering the exhibits from different parts of the county, and shipping the same to the Fair grounds. His idea for the design for the building was unique, being a fac-simile of an Old Egyptian pyramid, and it attracted constant attention, and drew forth many flattering comments from visitors to the fair.

Mr. Barber was chairman of the Chamber of Commerce committee on coast defense, and spent much time and money in getting the proposition of fortifying Santa Barbara before congress. While promoting this movement, he had a personal interview with Major-General Shafter, then in command of the military and naval forces on the Pacific coast, who gave him forceful letters in support of the measure. The United States senators and members of congress from his state were served with copies of it, and also strong petitions and various other documents, maps and charts of the city and sea coast. General Shafter went still further, and sent a military engineer to the port to carefully study the situation. However, just as favorable action was about to be taken by congress, the chamber, through unwise efforts on the part of a few of its members, defeated the measure by an unsuccessful attempt to get a government building for the post office. Otherwise, strong fortifications would now be in a condition to protect the lives and property of the citizens of Santa Barbara.

In travel Mr. Barber has found a source of recreation and enjoyment and a temporary rest from hard work. His first visit back to the old Ohio homestead was made in 1863, going by Nicaragua and returning by Panama, on the isthmus. In 1887, after years of almost incessant toil, and feeling that he had earned a few weeks of recreation, he took with him his daughters, Ella and Alice (his wife having declined making the trip), and started for the Old World; they went via the Santa Fe route to Kansas City, thence to St. Louis, to Cincinnati, over the Cumberland mountains to Chattanooga, Tenn., taking in the battle grounds of Missionary Ridge and Lookout Mountain, National burying grounds, etc.; through Knoxville and Virginia to Washington, D. C., Baltimore and Philadelphia to New York, joining with the others of Tourgee's party, took passage on the Furnessia of the Anchor Line, and after a pleasant nine days' voyage landed at Glasgow. The morning following the jolly party took the cars for a twenty-mile ride to Lake Lomond, a tourist boat to head of lake almost under the shadow of Ben Lomond, thence by carriages over the hills and through the woods to the head of Loch Katrine, then by boat down this lake past Ellen's Isle and silvery strand to Loch Archery, then by carriages through the Trosachs to the low lands, all made memorable through Scott's poem, Lady of the Lake; on the banks of the Dhune they took cars for Edinburgh, Scotland's great, proud city, where rises Sir Walter Scott's grand monument, superior, architecturally, to any. They were taken high up in the tower of Royal Castle, where Lord Darnley's hirelings murdered Rizzio, Mary Queen of Scots' private secretary,—the blood stains still remaining on the floor,—then to the John Knox house, around Arthur's seat, to the theaters, churches and elsewhere, then on to Dryburg Abbey, where are deposited the remains of Sir Walter Scott, then to Abbottsford, his old home, to Melrose, next to Stratford-on-Avon, visiting the old chamber where Shakespeare was born, then to Carlisle and on to London, taking in the Houses of Parliament, Westminster Abbey, where are the remains of many of England's illustrious dead, including those of Sir Christopher Wren, the great architect; there, too, is a bust of Longfellow, the great American poet. They visited the National Museums, the Tussand Gallery, parks, St. Paul's Church, theaters and other objects of interest, promenaded the Thames embankment, and crossed London bridge, the greatest thoroughfare of its kind in the world. While in London they were visited at their hotel, the Salisbury, by Dr. J. B. Shaw and wife, and a delightful hour was spent over their dinner table; it was a great treat to meet people from Santa Barbara.

From London they proceeded to Rotterdam in Belgium, then to The Hague, to Amsterdam in the Netherlands, then to Antwerp, Brussels, and to the field of Waterloo, once red with the blood of determined warriors; their day there was fraught with profound interest, mingled with sad reflections upon the terrible slaughter. Where was Wellington's headquarters is a pyramid 245 steps in height, surmounted by the British lion—in bronze, thirty feet in length—in commemoration of the great victory by the English and allies. From there on to Cologne, a beautiful city on the banks of the Rhine, its cathedral being the finest specimen of Gothic architecture in the world; then a day's ride up this most charming of all rivers, skirted on either side by a strip of valley, and where were not villages were beautiful residences close upon each other, with romantic hills and mountains in the background, mostly terraced and covered with grapevines, with here and there a habitation; old castles, churches and towers on either side, some laid in ruins by Louis XIV.

They passed "Sweet Bingen" before sunset and spent the night at Weisbaden, then on to Heidelberg with its bursted tower, then to Strasbourg with its immense cathedral (the spire being 465 feet in height), then through Germany and Austria to Lucerne, Switzerland, a beautiful city at the foot of Lake Lucerne, with Mount Pilatus on the west and craggy, precipitous Riga on the south, the summit being nearly six thousand feet above sea level, the ascent being made by a car and coach combined, driven by a powerful engine operating a cog drive wheel, with center track to match it. From its giddy heights the lofty snow-covered peaks of the Swiss Alps could be seen on all sides, with Mount Blanc in the distance, and in sight is a niche in the mountains where stands a monument in commemoration of William Tell. Looking down from this mountain top can be seen the surrounding lakes, little valleys, towns and cities, a beautiful scene never to be forgotten. The shore portion of the city of Zug dropped into the lake nearly out of sight early in 1887. After visiting the Lion of Lucern some thirty feet in length, chiseled from a solid rock in the mountain side, in commemoration of the eight hundred soldiers that were killed while defending the city, they took a steamer on their way to Interlaken, arriving at dark after crossing the Alps by way of Bruning pass, a long and somewhat perilous climb, not knowing what moment an avalanche might crash down upon them, while the rain came down in torrents, the rocky defile trembling from thunder claps, lightning often striking uncomfortably near. This was the most tiresome day of the trip, but after dinner they were greeted by Mrs. J. P. Stearns and daughter Leonora, and a delightful evening was spent. From here can be seen Jungfrau (young wife), carved by nature on a pinnacle of the Alps 13,000 feet in height.

The party went to Lauterbrunnen and Grindelwald by carriages; in making the ascent his daughter Ella came near losing her life, as the carriage she was in narrowly escaped being thrown hundreds of feet down an almost perpendicular rocky cliff. They took cars to Lake Thun, then a steamboat to the foot of lake, then cars to Lausanne at the head of Lake Geneva, then on to Martigny and Chamouni valley, then up to the ice-covered heights of Mount Blanc, the summit rising to 15,870 feet above the sea level; next to the city of Geneva, at the foot of the lake, where a delightful time was had. With reluctance they left the charming old city (that covered for a long distance both banks of the Rhone), and took cars for Paris, the great live city of the world, with its many beautiful boulevards, diverging from the Triumphal Arch, which was built in 1806 to commemorate French victories in Austria and Prussia. They visited Hotel des Invalides under whose great gilded dome (323 feet in height) are the remains of Napoleon Bonaparte, his field marshals and others of France's illustrious dead; at the front entrance, cut in stone, is this, from Napoleon's will: "I desire that my ashes may rest on the banks of the Seine in the midst of the French people whom I have loved so well." They then went to the Palace of Justice, built in the thirteenth century, where was imprisoned Marie Antoinette, just previous to her execution, also Napoleon III. and Prince Pierre Bonaparte; then to the Pantheon, the Temple of Liberty, Notre Dame and scores of other places and objects of interest; thence by carriages to Versailles, with her equestrian fountains and statuary of Louis XIV., art galleries, etc.; then took cars to Dieppe, steamer across English channel to Newhaven and cars again to London; tarried a few days, then back to Glasgow. In her beautiful plaza is Burns' finest monument, besides Sir Walter Scott's and many others; her manufacturing establishments are immense; her buildings are uniformly large and imposing and of the most substantial character.

Taking the steamer Devonia at Greenock, they came down the Clyde, landed at Moville, Ireland, where they took carriages for a long drive in the country, stopping at old castles then in ruins, as were many habitations. This being their last landing place, they took to their ship anticipating (but vainly so) a pleasant voyage to New York. Their ship came near being wrecked off the Newfoundland Banks; she was thrown from side to side, immense seas rolling over her, crushing skylights, water pouring into the ship, men and women crying out in despair all through the long night, enacting scenes terrible to contemplate, even to this day. The captain after remaining on the bridge seventeen consecutive hours, fainted from exhaustion and fell to the deck; after the storm was over the passengers were overjoyed that they had been spared a watery grave. Mr. Barber brought with him souvenirs from the old countries which he prizes very highly, particularly those from burial places of Sir Walter Scott, Burns, Shakespeare, Napoleon Bonaparte, as also from many other noted historic places and ancient cities. His meanderings along rivers, and lakes, over mountains and through ancient cities, with their strange people and stranger habits, will ever live in his memory, and will be the subject of his dreams as age with its infirmities creeps upon him. All should be seen to be fully appreciated. It was on this trip, while at Geneva, that his idea of the boulevard at Santa Barbara was first evolved, and he said to his companions, "Sometime in the near future we will have a boulevard along the sea beach at Santa Barbara." The idea was never lost sight of until it was an accomplished fact. Greatly as it is now appreciated and enjoyed, there were those who—though well-to-do,—dreaded the necessary taxation, and who in strong terms reproved Mr. Barber as the originator of this great public improvement; a few have since apologized for their unkind criticisms.

L. Schiapera Pietro

After having remained abroad from July to September, he returned to New York, and then took his daughters up the Hudson, on to Niagara Falls, along Lake Erie to Cleveland, then to his old home in Nelson, Ohio. It had been thirty-five years since he first left home for California. The intervening years had brought many changes; some of his old friends had removed to other parts, others had departed on that last journey that awaits all; but many were still left to grasp his hand with old time friendship, and extend warm and hearty greetings to him and his appreciative daughters. His own family, kindred, too, had passed away, the last one twenty years previous; his loneliness can well be imagined. It was therefore somewhat in sorrow that he bade a last farewell to the home that had been the scene of many merry-makings while approaching his majority, as well as in his childhood, and turned his face towards the home of his mature years in the far west, passing through Chicago, Omaha, Salt Lake City and Sacramento.

In San Francisco, in 1859, occurred the marriage of Mr. Barber and Mary J. Wheaton, who was born in New Orleans, La., and came to San Francisco in 1854. Four children now living were born of their union, namely: Sylvia S., now Mrs. H. A. Rogers, of Santa Barbara; Ella F., wife of R. M. Wood, and Alice F., wife of W. J. Andrews, all of San Francisco; and Samuel M., who is with his father.

Since the organization of the Ohio Society of Santa Barbara, Mr. Barber has been its President, and on the occasion of President McKinley's visit to Santa Barbara, in May, 1901, he invited Mr. Barber to visit him in his private car, where he received a most cordial greeting; he then presented to the President, from this organization, a souvenir, on one side of which was carved the stars and stripes; with this was an engrossed address, and a roster bearing the names of the members of the Ohio Society of Santa Barbara. In accepting the gift, President McKinley said, "this I will ever keep." By virtue of his office Mr. Barber was delegated to meet with the parent Ohio Society of California in San Francisco, May 18, and take part with it on the occasion of the launching of the battleship Ohio. President McKinley was in the front rank, and with him were the distinguished officers that accompanied him from the east.

For years Mr. Barber has been a constant member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, having joined Yerba Buena Lodge, No. 15 of San Francisco, in June, 1863, and he is now identified with the Veteran Odd Fellows Association of California. He was a charter member of Channel City Lodge No. 232, the name of which was adopted at his suggestion. Formerly he was a member of the Encampment. The degree of Rebekah was conferred on him by its author, Hon. Schuyler Colfax, and he is still a member. Twice he was elected a delegate to the Grand Lodge; for years he was a trustee of his lodge, and for one term was deputy grand master of District No. 54. He is also associated with the Ancient Order of United Workmen, and American Legion of Honor.

In his associations with fraternal organizations, he has done all possible for their upbuilding, and for the promotion of fraternal brotherhood, beneficence and social enjoyment; he has ever had the courage of his convictions, dared to do right, regardless of consequences of a personal nature. His life race is nearly at an end, and he will go hence with gratitude for honors conferred, and with malice toward none.

CAV. L. SCHIAPPA PIETRA. At the ancestral home of the Schiappa Pietra family, in Albissola Marina, province of Genova, Italy, Cavalier Leopoldo Schiappa Pietra was born February 3, 1842, and his education was acquired in the city of Savona. From 1859 to 1866 he was in the employ of the Italian government, with the minister of public works of Italy, but during the year last named he secured a two years' leave of absence in order to visit his brothers, Federico and Antonio, in California. These brothers were men of great enterprise, whose ambitions could not be limited by the boundaries of their native land. In 1849 Federico went to Peru and embarked in the mercantile business at Lima. The favorable reports he sent home induced his brother Antonio to join him the following year, but the prevalence of fever in those equatorial regions rendered prolonged residence inadvisable, and in 1851 Federico came to California, landing at San Francisco, and opened a store at Calaveras; but, being burned out twice, he left that town and settled in San Luis Obispo in 1853. Antonio came to California in 1853 and joined his brother. About 1855 Federico came to Santa Barbara, where his brother joined him a year later, after a visit to all Southern California to select a permanent place. The two carried on a mercantile business in the city. About 1859 they also established a store in Ventura, and the two establishments were conducted with fair profits. Seeking a further outlet for their energies, Federico and Antonio purchased the Juan Sanchez rancho, named the Santa Clara del Norte. The property was more commonly known as Punta de la Loma (Point near the River) and comprised fourteen thousand acres, which was used as a range for their sheep. In 1866 they were joined by their younger brother, Leopoldo, whose intention to return to Italy after a short visit was changed through the death of Federico in 1867. With the hope that he might eventually induce Antonio to return permanently to Italy, Leopoldo remained in California and took up the business interests of his deceased brother. As time passed by he fell under the charm of California climate and decided to remain here.

The Santa Barbara store was closed in 1868, after which the brothers gave their attention to the management of the Ventura business until 1877, when they disposed of it also. Thereafter they devoted themselves to the improvement of the ranch, Punta de la Loma, where they were engaged principally in the sheep business, although also raising cattle to some extent. About 1890 they began to change from the stock business to general farming, raising mostly barley and corn, but, finding this less successful than they had anticipated, they turned their attention to the lima-bean industry, in which product they planted some seven thousand acres, mostly all watered by a ditch. During the dry season of 1871 they gave the squatters permission to work in the opening of this canal, and in this Leopoldo at present owns a controlling interest, being vice-president of the Santa Clara Water and Irrigation Company. A portion of the ranch he has disposed of, and now retains only fifteen hundred acres, with his country residence. Recently nearly seven thousand acres were sold at a handsome figure (over one million dollars) to the California Fruit and Farming Company, Limited, of Manchester, England.

For the first time since leaving the old home years before, the brothers returned to Italy in 1894. During the trip Antonio died of the gripe (resulting from a severe cold contracted in California) at San Remo, Italy, February 2, 1895, at the age of sixty-two years. His death left Leopoldo the sole representative of the family in America and the inheritor of their large and valuable interests in California, but at the same time it gave to him that realization of loneliness which comes to all who outlive their kindred. During a later visit in Italy, in 1899, he was made a Cavalier of the Crown of Italy by King Umberto. Of recent years he has made his home in Los Angeles, where he erected on the corner of Alvarado and Ninth streets a handsome residence, of the Moorish style of architecture.

The lady whom Mr. Schiappa Pietra married was Miss Amparo Arenas, a member of one of the distinguished old Spanish families of California. Her grandfather, Christobal Palomares, came as an officer from Alamos, Mexico, to the presidio of Monterey in the beginning of the nineteenth century and there he married Benedicta Sainz, by whom he had twelve children. A native of Spain, he was a member of a patrician family of that country, and went with his father from the city of Madrid to Mexico. His son, Don Ygnacio Palomares, was one of the owners of San José rancho, where now stands Pomona, Lordsburg, Azusa and other towns of the San Gabriel valley. This vast area of twenty-two thousand three hundred and eighty acres was a Mexican grant conferred on Ygnacio Palomares, Ricardo Vejar and Luis Arenas in 1840. Some years ago, when a transfer of property in Pomona made an abstract of the land necessary, it required the work of six men for ninety days to make the translations of old Spanish deeds into English, and the abstract when completed filled thirty-eight volumes.

The mother of Mrs. Schiappa Pietra was the late Doña Josefa Palomares de Arenas. When she was born, in 1815, the pueblo of Los Angeles was only thirty-four years old. There were no schools, but, being ambitious to learn, she eagerly seized every scrap of paper or printed matter that came wrapped around merchandise in vessels from Spain. When Governor Alvarado established his residence in Los Angeles she obtained a primary reader from his family, and on completing it was compelled to discontinue her studies, as there were no more books. At the age of fourteen years she married Don José Maria Abila, whose ancestor, Cornelio Abila, came from Mexico in 1769, with Padre Junipero Serra, to establish the missions. He acted as custodian for the sacred vessels, had charge of the olive and grape cuttings for the orchards, and was subsequently major-domo at San Gabriel. The members of the Abila family were among the largest land owners of their time. They owned Sausal Redondo, Salina, Laguna Seca, Los Cuervos and Piletas, all situated in what is now the county of Los Angeles.

In 1830 Manuel Victoria was appointed governor of California, but he soon made himself obnoxious to the people by his attempts to overturn civil authority and substitute military rule. In compliance with his orders, José Maria Abila was imprisoned in the cuartel and Don Abel Stearns and José Antonio Carrillo were exiled. The arrest of Abila was an insult not to be borne by a man of his proud nature, and he vowed vengeance on Victoria. An opportunity was soon offered him in the leading of a small force from San Diego against the governor under Pablo de Portilla, comandante of the presidio. Don José Maria Abila joined the insurgents, of whom he was chosen a captain. When they reached the Buena Vista hills they met Victoria with an armed force. Reckless of danger, Abila rushed forward to meet the enemy, and Captain Pacheco was instantly killed by a shot from his gun. He then attacked and wounded Victoria, but received a fatal bullet in his own body from one of the governor's soldiers. Victoria was taken to Mission San Gabriel and to the relief of the people he soon fled from the country. The bodies of the two slain soldiers were taken to the Abila residence, which stood on ground north of the Church of Our Lady of Angels of the Plaza, and there the same hands rendered the last sad rites to both men, lying side by side.

The news of the death of his son-in-law proved a fatal shock to Christobal Palomares, who had been a district judge. A demand for valuable papers was made upon him, which papers he delivered, getting up from a sick bed to do so, but dropping dead as he re-entered his home. This left the girl of fifteen years a widow and fatherless on the same day. Six months later she became the mother of Mercedes, who married Don José de Arnaz, proprietor of the Ventura mission. Four years after the death of Abila his widow was married to Luis Arenas, who was associated with her brother in the ownership of the San José ranch, and also owner of the San Mateo ranch in Sonoma county. With him she removed to the northern part of the state, where the three oldest children of that union were born. From there the family went to Ventura, near the mouth of the Ventura river, where her two youngest children were born. She was spared to a great age and died at her home on South Grand avenue, Los Angeles, in 1901. Of her second marriage were born a son, Frank (who was governor of Lower California in 1868), and four daughters: Mrs. J. M. Miller, Mrs. Louisa Stanchfield, of Spadra; Mrs. Schiappa Pietra, and Mrs. Aurelia Ross, who died in Los Angeles in 1900. The two sons and two daughters of Mrs. Ross are being reared and educated by Mr. and Mrs. Schiappa Pietra, whose own children, Lorenzo Luis and Beatrice Josephine, died in infancy.

CHARLES P. DANDY. As supreme president of the Fraternal Brotherhood, Mr. Dandy has a wide acquaintance in California. Indeed, the remarkable success attending this organization is due almost wholly to his wise judgment and able oversight. Ability of the highest order is required to place such an institution upon a substantial basis, thoroughly guard its interests, and not only secure present protection for its members, but also provide for their future needs. The establishment of the Fraternal Brotherhood is due to Mr. Dandy's sagacity. While acting in the capacity of state commander for California of the Maccabees, he found that $60,000 was being sent out of Los Angeles to different fraternal orders, and decided a local organization could be successfully started. With the assistance of G. S. Bartholomew (since deceased) he founded the order, which was incorporated February 3, 1896, under the laws of California. The first lodge was organized March 17, same year, and is known as Lodge No. 1, of Los Angeles. At this writing (1902) there are eleven lodges in the city, with a membership of twenty-six hundred; and, in addition, lodges have been organized in many cities of California, also in Oregon, Washington, Nevada, Utah, New Mexico, Arizona and Colorado. In one hundred and ninety-eight lodges there is a total membership of thirteen thousand, while $80,000 has been paid out to policy-holders.

The policy of the Fraternal Brotherhood is exceedingly liberal. As an instance of this it may be stated that a member who meets with an accident is given a benefit; if totally disabled, one-tenth of the policy is paid, the same amount being paid each year until the total amount of the policy has been paid. At the age of seventy years the member receives one-tenth of his policy, and he is entitled to receive the balance of his certificate in nine annual installments. If a member is ill, the lodge carries his dues until he recovers and is able to meet his payments. Through the conservative management of the officers the death rate has been kept lower than that of any order or old-line company in existence of the same age as the Fraternal Brotherhood. The supreme lodge officers, to whose wise supervision and keen judgment the success of the organization is due, are as follows: J. A. Foshay, supreme past president; C. P. Dandy, supreme president; Mrs. Emma R. Neidig, supreme vice-president; E. A. Beck, supreme secretary; William Mead, supreme treasurer; W. W. Hitchcock, M. D., supreme physician; and Hon. R. N. Bulla, supreme counselor. The offices are on the fourth floor of the Wilcox building, but it is the intention, during 1902, to erect a lodge building in the heart of the city, on the completion of which the offices will be removed thereto.

Glancing at the personal history of the supreme president, C. P. Dandy, we find that the family is of Irish extraction, and the first of the name in this country engaged in the manufacture of shoes, first in New York, later in Cincinnati. Rev. William C. Dandy, a son of this business man, graduated from Augusta College and became a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, and later became a member of the Rock River conference. For years before retiring he served as presiding elder of the Aurora district in Illinois. His death occurred in Los Angeles, Cal., May 29, 1901, when within two months of eighty years of age. During his long life he had witnessed many changes in our country and had been a firm believer in the gospel of universal freedom, which he preached from the pulpit. During the excitement of slavery days his belief brought him much opposition, and, to be in more congenial surroundings, he removed north. Long before this he had set all of his slaves free. Fraternally he was a Knight Templar Mason. In early manhood he married Mary A. McClure, who was born in Bourbon county, Ky., of a Virginia family and Scotch descent. Like her husband, she was a staunch abolitionist and freed all of her slaves. Like him, too she was an earnest believer in the doctrines of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Her death occurred in Waukegan, Ill., some eighteen years ago. Of her six children, three are now living, namely: William M., of Chicago; Mrs. F. J. Magin, of Evanston, Ill.; and Charles P. The last-named was born in Lexington, Ky., December 25, 1853, and at the age of thirteen left that city for Chicago. His education was carried on in the Northwestern University, but when ready to enter the junior year he was obliged to leave on account of trouble with his eyes. From 1871 to 1878 he was a traveling salesman in Illinois and Wisconsin, after which he was employed as an accountant in Chicago for two years and in Oskaloosa, Iowa, from 1880 until 1887.

Coming to Los Angeles in 1887, Mr. Dandy became interested in mercantile affairs. From 1891 to 1895 he was state commander of the Maccabees, and from 1895 to 1897 served as clerk of the school board, during which time he organized the Fraternal Brotherhood, which order is a member of the National Fraternal Congress. The fact that he is deeply interested in the welfare of Los Angeles is proved not only by his membership in the Chamber of Commerce, but also by his participation in many of the movements that are giving prestige to the city and prominence to its commercial spirit. However, it is principally through his work in the Fraternal Brotherhood that he is known, and this has made his name a power and influence in many parts of the state. On every hand it is recognized that his conservative, yet progressive, policy is winning success for the organization, which has already attained a success remarkable in an institution that has been in existence for less than a decade. The movement, in the hands of one less wise and keen, might have met an early Waterloo, but, guided by his judgment and promoted by his sagacity, it has become one of the substantial organizations of the west.

On Christmas day of 1877, in Elgin, Ill., occurred the marriage of Mr. Dandy and Miss Carrie E. Goodrich, who was born and educated in Chicago. They have two children, William G. and Herman B. The older son, who is now a student in the high school, served from 1898 until 1901 in the United States navy, on board the Monterey and the Oregon, and was in Manila and China during the wars of that period.

EDWIN A. BECK, the supreme secretary of the Fraternal Brotherhood, who was also one of the founders and incorporators of this popular organization, was born in Cass county, Ind., May 1, 1865, and is a son of Alvan and Cynthia (Showalter) Beck, natives of Union county, that state. His grandfathers, John W. Beck and Joseph Showalter, were pioneers of Union county, the former having come from North Carolina. At the opening of the Civil war Alvan Beck offered his services to the Union and was eager to serve in its defense, but was rejected upon medical examination as being not sufficiently rugged to stand the hardships of army life. Most of his life was passed upon a farm in Cass county and there he died. His wife still makes that county her home. Their children are as follows: George E. who cultivates land adjoining the old Cass county homestead; Edwin A.; and Claude D., a farmer adjoining the old homestead.

After having completed the studies of the public schools, at fifteen years of age, Edwin A. Beck entered the Northern Indiana Normal School at Valparaiso, Ind., where he was a student for three years and then graduated. Afterward he became bookkeeper for a hardware establishment in Logansport, Ind., but the confinement proved unhealthful, and two years later he resigned. At the age of twenty he went to Kansas and spent three years upon the plains, engaging in the stock business and general ranching. Just as the boom was about to close, in 1887, he came to Los Angeles, where he has since resided. For four years he was employed by the Los Angeles Railway Company, after which for two years he served as clerk of the township court under Judge Bartholomew. In 1896 he assisted in the organization of the Fraternal Brotherhood and continued as acting secretary until 1899, when he was elected supreme secretary of the order. The growth of this organization is one of the most remarkable illustrations of the possibilities of development of the fraternal insurance business in Southern California, where it has thousands of members.

In national politics Mr. Beck is a Democrat. He was a charter member of Los Angeles Lodge No. 1, Fraternal Brotherhood, and has passed through its chairs. At this writing he is connected, as past officer, with Hermosa Lodge No. 32, now the largest in Los Angeles. Since 1888 he has been connected with the Independent Order of Foresters, in which he has been an officer. Another organization with which he is associated is the Brotherhood of American Yeomen. In the Chamber of Commerce and the Merchants and Manufacturers Association of Los Angeles he is an active and leading member. Socially he is connected with the Jonathan Club.

Mrs. Beck, who bore the maiden name of Florence E. Mellen, was born in Massachusetts and accompanied her parents to Los Angeles in 1878, since which time she has made this city her home. She is a member of the Fraternal Brotherhood and the Ladies Order of Maccabees.

N. Blackstock

JUDGE N. BLACKSTOCK. At the bar Judge Blackstock has a reputation extending through Southern California, while he is prominent and influential in his home city of Ventura. He was born in Asheville, N. C., in 1846, a son of Dr. James G. and Elizabeth A. (Ball) Blackstock, natives respectively of South Carolina and Asheville, N. C., and the former a graduate of Augusta Medical College, in Georgia. The family was founded in America by the paternal grandfather, who was of Scotch descent, and emigrated from the north of Ireland during the latter part of the eighteenth century. He became a prominent member of his community, and a town founded by the family has since grown to important proportions.

With the breaking out of the Civil war Mr. Blackstock enlisted in the Confederate army as a private, and was paroled at Greensboro, N. C., at the end of the war, with the rest of Johnston's army, after seeing some heavy fighting and participating in the sieges of Forts Sumter and Wagner. With the restoration of peace he settled in Tennessee, where he engaged in educational work and studied law. In 1869 he was admitted to practice in all the courts of Tennessee, and in 1881, to the supreme court of the United States. After being admitted to the bar he practiced in Missouri for three and one-half years, with headquarters at Warrensburg, Johnson county, from which point he came to California in 1875. Settling in Ventura, he bought out the office and succeeded to the practice of Judge Hines, and since then has practiced continuously in the local and supreme courts of the state. He has taken a prominent part in many notable cases before the Ventura county courts, where his ability is recognized and appreciated.

At present a Republican, Judge Blackstock voted the Democratic ticket until James G. Blaine was candidate for President. In 1876 the first board of supervisors of Ventura county, among whom was United States Senator Bard, appointed Judge Blackstock a justice of the peace, and during his two years of service he did practically all of the justice business in the entire county. In 1898 he was elected railroad commissioner of the third district, which embraces the counties of Alameda, Contra Costa, Fresno, Inyo, Kern, Kings, Los Angeles, Madera, Mariposa, Merced, Mono, Monterey, Orange, Riverside, San Benito, San Bernardino, San Diego, San Joaquin, San Luis Obispo, Santa Barbara, Santa Clara, Santa Cruz, Stanislaus, Tulare, Tuolumne and Ventura. Not only is he widely known in his profession and as railroad commissioner, but he is also influential in social, fraternal and educational circles. In 1867 he was made a Mason, in 1873 became affiliated with the Knights Templar, and in 1890 was initiated into Al Malakiah Temple, N. M. S., of Los Angeles.

At Newport, Tenn., in 1868, Judge Blackstock married Abbie, daughter of John Smith, of that town. Eight children were born of their union, namely: Belle; James S., who is in the grocery business at Ventura; John A.; Charles, principal of the grammar school at Hueneme, this county; Frank P., who clerks for his oldest brother; Lillian, who will graduate in 1902 from the Cumnock School of Oratory in Los Angeles; Mabel, now a student in the Conservatory of Music at Los Angeles; and Edward M., who is attending school in Ventura. During the Spanish-American war John A. served with credit to himself, being with the First Infantry in Cuba, and subsequently enlisting in the Third Artillery. The family are members of the Presbyterian Church.

A. P. CROSS. An authority on municipal government and improvement, and at present superintendent of the street sprinkling department of Los Angeles, Mr. Cross possesses those fine and stable traits of character which insure admirable citizenship and a consequent well-merited popularity. A native of Ogle county, Ill., near Byron, he was born February 3, 1861, a son of Philip Cross, who was born in Oakland, Mich., and settled in Illinois about 1860. The elder Cross engaged in the mercantile business at Rockford, Winnebago county, and later turned his attention to the profession of law, which he successfully practiced in Rockford, Ill., and Eureka Springs, Ark., where his death occurred. He married Martha E. Pullman, daughter of John Pullman of Syracuse, N. Y., who was born, reared and died in New York state. Among the relatives were the Dewitt and Clinton families of New York. Mrs. Cross, who was born in Syracuse, and is now living in Rockford, Ill., is the mother of four daughters and one son, of whom one daughter is deceased, A. P. being the third child.

Mr. Cross received his education in Rockford at the public schools, and in 1880 went to Little Rock, Ark., where he was employed by the Little Rock Street Railway Company as assistant superintendent, a position which he maintained for two years. Later he removed to Lexington, Ky., and for five years was secretary and superintendent of the street railway system there. After his removal to Los Angeles he accepted the position of superintendent of the Santa Barbara Street Railway Company, and at the same time became interested in a company that bought the road and extended it to the mission and the hospital. At the end of a year he returned to Los Angeles and became superintendent of the Los Angeles, Pasadena & Glendale Railroad (now the Terminal road), and continued thus for two years. After a trip to the east he took the sprinkling contract for the city of Los Angeles, and has continued to hold the same since. His term of service began in the fall of 1892, at which time the city possessed eighty-five miles of graded streets and required forty-two horse sprinkling wagons. Now there are two hundred and sixty-three miles of graded and paved streets, and to properly sprinkle them one hundred and four wagons are required, many of them large, four-horse concerns. Two hundred and fifty head of horses and mules go over the ground twice a day, a portion of the town being sprinkled with greater frequency. In all, the estimated daily travel of the sprinkling wagons is twelve hundred miles.

An additional responsibility was assumed by Mr. Cross in 1893, at which time he established the Pacific Coast United States Mail and Express Company, with a route through Texas, Colorado, California and Oregon, and which operated more stage lines than any firm in California, in all about six hundred miles. The line running between Amedee and Fort Bidwell is one hundred and thirty-five miles long, while that between Amedee and Alturas and Lake View is one hundred and seventy-five miles. Besides there are numerous other lines. Two hundred and fifty head of horses and mules are used for the stage line, and the wagons when lined up extend for about a mile. Mr. Cross is general manager and superintendent of the company, and the headquarters, at No. 1025 San Pedro street, cover a whole block. A staunch Republican, Mr. Cross is active in local and state political affairs, and is a member of the county and state central committees. He is also a member of the Union League Club.

FREDERIC I. BARKER. The life history of Mr. Barker is told in his own words: My father, Francis Barker, was a native of Amesbury, Mass., born January 1, 1799. Three years later his father, Deacon Samuel Barker, moved with the family to Bethel, Me., then forty miles into the backwoods, and settled on one of the beautiful intervalles on the Androscoggin river, opening up a farm and rearing a large family. My grandfather was a tailor by trade; he was in the army during the Revolutionary war; tradition says he made coat and breeches for General Washington. My mother, Nancy Ingalls, was the youngest daughter of Moses Ingalls, Shelburne, N. H., and was born in 1803. Her father was born in Andover, Mass., in 1754, but moved with his father's family in 1770 to Shelburne, an unbroken wild in the White mountain range, settling in the valley of the Androscoggin, opening up a farm and rearing a large family. Five years later, at the breaking out of the Revolutionary war, my grandfather returned to Massachusetts and enlisted in the Twenty-fourth Regiment in General Lee's command. He took part in the battles of Springfield Plains, Monmouth and in the retreat from Long Island. After his discharge he shipped on an armed merchant vessel carrying privateer papers and took part in the capture of several prizes from the enemy. The government granted him a pension and two lots of land. After peace was declared he returned to Shelburne, opened up a farm on the river, married and reared a large family, to whom he gave very creditable schooling, winter evenings, around the old kitchen table. My parents reared six sons and two daughters: myself, the eldest, born in Bethel, Me., October 3, 1824; Nathaniel, Aulina, Albert F., Cullen B., Kate I., Eli W. and H. Clinton. Three of our number have now passed on.

The advantages of the old red schoolhouse were given me, with the exception of the summer terms after I was eight years-old, my father being obliged to keep me out of school to help on the farm. When eighteen I went to Massachusetts and worked on a milk farm in old Lexington two summers, returning home in the fall of each year and attending a term of school at Gould's Academy in Bethel. At the close of each term I was offered a certificate as teacher and taught two winters in the town school. Then I went to Boston and obtained a clerkship in a store, residing there about ten years, enjoying many of the educational facilities of the Hub. In the fall of 1853, finding myself somewhat out of health for want of outdoor occupation, I went west, St. Anthony Falls, Minn., and spent the first winter in the pinerias "barking," coming out in the spring in fine health. The stakes had just been stuck over the river on the Minneapolis town site, and I found employment as a carpenter in work on the three first houses built on the town site in the spring of 1854. It was there that I learned my trade of carpenter and cabinet-maker. Some of my cabinet work received a premium at the first territorial fair in St. Paul. The next spring I made a claim (one hundred and sixty acres) on the Mississippi river, thirty-five miles above the Falls at Monticello, later improving, fencing and building a house.

During the grasshopper plague of 1856 and 1857 I saved a part of my crops and married a wife, but later lost her. Broken in spirit and discouraged by the hard times of 1857, I rented the farm, returned to Boston and again accepted a position in the store.

In September, 1862, I enlisted in Company F, Forty-seventh Massachusetts Infantry, and went into camp of instruction at Camp Stanton, Boxford, thence to Camp Miegs, Readville; December 1 went to Camp Banks, Jamaica, L. I., and on the 21st shipped on the transport steamship Mississippi on her second trip in the Banks expedition to New Orleans. Running down the coast of Florida, without an armed convoy, we were chased for five hours by the rebel cruiser Alabama, so believed. Every effort was made to escape her, and only after she had fired upon us the fifth time and signaled us to heave to or prepare for action did we give up the race. Running alongside, she now displayed her colors the first time—the Stars and Stripes. She proved to be our own blockading fleet, the United States gunboat Magnolia, in quest of news of Burnside's assault on Fredericksburg, occurring just before we sailed. Our voyage was otherwise uneventful, and on New Year's eve we arrived in the river below the city of New Orleans; the next day we ran up the river, landing at Camp Kerney, in the upper suburbs of the city. The regiment had been furnished with a lot of poor rifles, captured from the enemy on a blockade runner, unfit for service in the field, and so we were brigaded with troops held for guard duty and the defense of New Orleans. We occupied various camps—the Lower Cotton Press, United States barracks, Camp Farr and Camp Parapet. Company F was on detached duty most of the time at Lake End, the port of entry and departure through the lines, on Lake Ponchartrain, our guard duties being very exacting and onerous.

After the capture of Port Hudson by General Banks, and the Mississippi river open from the gulf to the north, our term of service having expired, the regiment was sent home by the river, and in September discharged. As the regiment had not been in action, many of the boys were not satisfied and re-enlisted in the Fifty-eighth and Fifty-ninth Veteran Regiment, were hurried to the front, and in the three days' fight in the Wilderness lost a third of their number. Two of my brothers, Albert F. and H. Clinton, were in the army, and we all came out without a scratch, but with badly impaired health. I went back to my place in the store, but in the spring of 1864 returned to Minneapolis and went to work at my trade. The cold winters became more and more objectionable, and in the fall of 1872 I came to California. In San Francisco I was laughed at for coming south, such was the prejudice against Southern California. In San Diego the Tom Scott boom was off and not a nail was being driven. In Los Angeles conditions were not much better, the only work being the new high school building on Fort Hill, where the courthouse now stands. After a few weeks' work I came up to Santa Barbara, arriving on New Year's day, 1873, and have since resided here. The town was crowded with new arrivals from the east; could find no place to lay my head; the old St. Charles (the only hotel) was packed, and also a few boarding-houses; was finally glad to accept quarters in an unfinished garret in the old brick cottage on De la Vina street. The demand for mechanics was great, and I went to work immediately, receiving $4 a day in coin. During my twenty-eight years of residence here

I have managed by industry and frugality to pass the booms and dull times, keeping ahead of my expenses, being employed at bench and cabinet work, largely on fancy redwood mantles, bookcases, sideboards, etc. Often by the pressure of dull times I have been tempted to leave the sleepy old town and seek more thrifty localities on the coast, but the sweet-voiced, alluring siren of Santa Barbara's matchless climate and beautiful location by the sea has bound me fast a true lover.

JOHN HAMILTON CRAWFORD, M. D. Descended from one of Kentucky's pioneer families, Dr. Crawford of Santa Monica was born in Mirabile, Caldwell county, Mo., November 14, 1857. His father, Dr. W. H. Crawford, who was a native of Crab Orchard Springs, Ky., became a pioneer physician of the Platte reservation, and also for many years conducted a large mercantile business. During the Civil war he acted as a government agent and bought and sold hundreds of mules, but at the close of the Rebellion he was cheated out of thousands of dollars by government sharks. However, his possessions were still large, including a stock farm of two thousand acres in Caldwell county, a store, mill and manufacturing business. About 1876 he retired from the practice of medicine, and later to some extent turned over to others his large business interests, but until his death, February 2, 1902, he maintained a general supervision of his affairs, and was active, hearty and energetic. All through his life his actions were governed by the highest principles of honor. Honest to the heart's innermost impulses, he always gave others credit for the same uprightness of character, and, although his confidence was sometimes rudely shaken, yet he retained a faith in others, a belief in their integrity and a trust in their honor which was at once inspiring and stimulating. His wife, whose devotion brightened the struggling years of his young manhood, was sprung to share with him the comforts of life in their old age. Her father was an Englishman, who settled at Pittsburg, Pa., and established the first pottery across the river from that city. Later he settled in Missouri and there died. The children of Dr. W. H. and Elizabeth (Keirns) Crawford are as follows: A. K., of Los Angeles; Mrs. Sallie Clark, of Missouri; Oliver, a farmer living in Missouri; Mollie, who died in Los Angeles; John H.; William T., who is a merchant in Cameron, Mo., and Mrs. Lillie Frazier, of Pittsburg, Kans.

After having started a course of study in the Christian Brothers' College, St. Louis, John H. Crawford decided to take up medicine and so changed his field of study to the American Medical College. From this institution he was graduated in 1879 with the degree of M.D. Desiring further professional knowledge he took a course of lectures in the Eclectic Medical Institute of Cincinnati, Ohio, from which he was graduated in 1882. His first experience in active practice was gained in his old home neighborhood. The fact that his father had recently retired from practice made a professional opening for him, as many families who long had the older man as their family physician now retained the services of the son. When the family removed to Cameron, Mo., he accompanied them, but later settled in Lathrop, where he practiced and also conducted a drug business.

The California boom of 1887 drew Dr. Crawford to this state, and he has since made it his home. For some years he carried on a general practice in Los Angeles, and meantime he was also active in politics, being, like his father, an ardent Democrat. His services as a member of the county and city central committees were of the highest value to the party. At the request of the pension department he consented to reorganize the pension board at the Soldiers' Home, and also, in the fall of 1894, accepted a position as a member of the board, after which he officiated as its treasurer. Shortly after gold was discovered in the Klondike the San Francisco Examiner offered a round-trip ticket to Alaska for the best article of one hundred words, giving reasons why San Francisco was the best outfitting point for the north. The article written by Dr. Crawford was awarded the prize. At first he had no intention of accepting the award, but through the persuasion of his wife was induced to change his decision, and June 11, 1898, he set sail for Dawson on the steamer St. Paul. During the voyage Warren Lamb, a member of the party, was taken ill, and Dr. Crawford cared for him until recovery. After arriving in Alaska the two men went together to Bonanza creek and tried their luck at mining, in which they met with gratifying success. To provide for the long and severe winter they cut about fifty cords of wood and hauled it to their claim. During his stay in Alaska Dr. Crawford gave his attention to mining and did no professional work except of an emergency nature. His return trip was made via Dawson on the Portland to San Francisco in August, 1899, since which time he has engaged in practice at Santa Monica. During his absence in the north he had mailed his resignation as a member of the pension board, but the letter had not reached its destination, and on his return he wrote a second resignation, and this was accepted.

In Lathrop, Mo., Dr. Crawford married Miss Lizzie M. Fitzgerald, daughter of Dr. O. D. Fitzgerald, who graduated from the St. Louis Medical College, and is now a prominent physician in Los Angeles. When a girl Mrs. Crawford was given excellent advantages, including a course of study at the Lexington Female Seminary, of which she is a graduate. Interested in religious movements, she, with her family, is a member of the Episcopal Church and a contributor to various charitable and uplifting works. The children of her marriage to Dr. Crawford are William Oscar, Oliver Maughs and Elizabeth. Among the organizations to which Dr. Crawford belongs are the Young Men's Christian Association, the Santa Monica Board of Trade, the Odd Fellows' Lodge, Modern Woodmen of America, Knights of Pythias, Royal Arcanum and Knights of Maccabees. Personally, he possesses many qualities of mind and heart that win the friendship of associates. His disposition is optimistic and cheerful, and in his circle of intimate friends he displays social qualities of a high order, while his wide experience and travels and his habits of close and comprehensive reading have given him a fund of information that makes him an interesting conversationalist and genial companion.

Z. W. SAUNDERS, M. D. A tireless member of the medical profession is Dr. Saunders, whose services are in constant demand not only in Lompoc, his home town, but wherever physical ills demand attention throughout the whole northern part of Santa Barbara county. For nineteen years he has been an integral part of the growing community, his horse and carriage and personality seeming almost as substantially connected with the general development, as are the buildings which line the thoroughfares and the enterprises which create the spirited commercialism. The early life of this popular physician was spent in Birmingham, Van Buren county, Iowa, where he was born April 25, 1843. In 1858 he accompanied the family to Uniontown, Mo., where his father, who was a cabinet-maker by trade, bought a large tract of land and erected thereon a saw and grist mill, which proved to be a profitable investment. Having visited Lompoc in 1876, he settled here with his family four years later, and died in the town of his adoption in November, 1889, at the age of seventy-three years.

After the building of the mill on the home farm, Z. W. Saunders was connected therewith in the capacity of second engineer. With the breaking out of the Civil war he enlisted at Birmingham, Iowa, in Company H, Third Iowa Cavalry, under Col. John W. Noble, who later became secretary of the interior. During his service of over four years he participated in the capture of Little Rock and many small engagements, and in January, 1863, re-enlisted and became a part of the Sixteenth Corps, operating east of the Mississippi river and taking part in Wilson's raid through Tennessee, Alabama and Mississippi. He assisted in taking the Confederate arsenal at Selma, Ala. After the armistice between Generals Grant and Lee, which terminated the war, he was sent to Augusta, Ga.,

Reverend Henry

where occurred the surrender of General Johnston's army, and was mustered out in that city in 1865. The vicissitudes of war, including illness and wounds, he fortunately escaped. In the fall of 1865 he received a commission from Gen. John F. Phelps as captain of a company of volunteers to serve in the southern part of Missouri, in order to stamp out the guerrilla bands still infesting the country.

After the war Dr. Saunders took a prominent part in the political affairs of Scotland county, Mo. From 1868 to 1872 he served as county assessor, and meantime took up the study of medicine, which he continued in the Missouri Medical College at St. Louis, Mo., and later in the College of Physicians and Surgeons at Keokuk, Iowa. From the latter institution he was graduated in 1874, and, returning to Uniontown, engaged in practice until 1882, when he removed to Lompoc, Cal. In Scotland county, Mo., in 1866, he married Lydia E. Hall, by whom he has five children, namely: Don Carlos, Lewis H., Robert R., Hettie B., wife of Z. J. Harbinson of Fresno, Cal., and Dora Myrtle, a graduate of the Lompoc high school. Dr. Saunders has three brothers living in Lompoc, of whom W. A. and N. T. are engaged in the grocery business, and J. N. is serving as town marshal.

One of the finest and best-equipped drug stores in this part of Santa Barbara county is owned and managed by Dr. Saunders and his son, Don Carlos, the firm name being Z. W. Saunders & Son. The store is on Ocean avenue, and in the rear is the doctor's office, as well as the office of his assistant, Dr. J. Will Graham. For seventeen years Dr. Saunders has been county physician, and he is now president of the board of health, also surgeon for the Southern Pacific Railroad Company. Fraternally, he is associated with the Knights of Pythias, Odd Fellows and Royal Arch Masons. He enjoys an enviable reputation in the community of which he is a member, not only because of his professional skill, but also by reason of the many fine personal attributes which constitute the most laudable and praiseworthy citizenship.

JOHN PERCY LAWTON, an enterprising Englishman, residing in Santa Barbara, combines the traits of substantiality and reliability which are welcomed as distinct additions to the citizenship of any part of the world. He was born in Cheshire May 8, 1864, and is a son of Joseph and Martha (Hodson) Lawton. By his marriage to Miss Hodson Joseph Lawton had ten children, John Percy being the oldest now living and the only member of the family in America. His family is a branch of the Lawtons of Lawton, one of the oldest county families in England.

Mr. Lawton was educated at Felstead, Essex, and then under private tutor. Prior to coming to America he held a commission as captain in the Fourth Battalion Cameronians, "Scottish Rifles." A pleasure trip, undertaken through the United States and to the Pacific coast in 1885, resulted in a constantly growing admiration of American conditions, and upon losing his health in 1892 he renewed his association with the land of his travels and settled in Santa Barbara. In his attractive office, opposite the Arlington Hotel, on State street, he conducts a real estate business, and makes a specialty of working up a sale of large properties in the east. He is a master of property situations, and thoroughly understands all phases of the work for which he is so well fitted. He is a member of the Country Club. Fraternally he is a Mason, being a past master of Prince Alfred Lodge in Cheshire. In politics he is a conservative Republican, while in religion he affiliates with the Episcopal Church. By his marriage to Violet Truman, a granddaughter of Lord Rokeby, there are three children: Gwendoline, Rokeby and Iris.

PEVERIL MEIGS. The founder of this family in America, Vincent Meigs, or Meggs, as it was originally spelled, came from Dorsetshire, England, and settled in East Guilford, Conn., about the year 1637. With him came his son John, who died January 4, 1672. In direct line of descent was John, his son, born at Weymouth, Mass., February 29, 1640, and deacon of the first church in Guilford, from about 1696 to 1713, the time of his death. He took part in the Indian wars. The next generation in this line was represented by his son, Janna, born December 21, 1672. He married Hannah Willard, a granddaughter of Major Simon Willard, one of the heroes of King Philip's war, and the founder of the town of Concord, Mass. Janna Meigs died June 5, 1739, leaving, among other children, a son, Return, who was born at Middletown, Conn., March 16, 1708, and on February 1, 1733, married Elizabeth Hamelin. Their family consisted of thirteen children, the youngest, Josiah, being the one with whom we are concerned. Josiah was born in Middletown, Conn., August 21, 1757, and died in Washington, D. C., September 4, 1822. After graduating from Yale College, he became a member of its faculty. Later he practiced law in the Admiralty court in Bermuda, served as president of the University of Georgia, acted as surveyor-general of the United States and as commissioner of the general land office. January 21, 1782, he married Clara (or Clarissa) Benjamin, a direct descendant of Governor Bradford, of Plymouth. Another of Return's sons, Return Jonathan, was famous in the Revolutionary war, first, as the leader of an expedition against the British at Sag Harbor, Long Island, which was entirely successful; later, as a colonel, distinguished at Stony Point, Quebec, etc., and as one of the founders of the Cincinnati Society. Later he served as governor of Ohio and also as postmaster-general of the United States.

The family of Josiah Meigs consisted of nine children, among them being Henry, who was born in New Haven, Conn., October 28, 1782, and died in New York May 20, 1861. His career was one of exceptional honesty, brilliancy and usefulness. In 1799 he graduated from Yale College, after which he practiced law in New York City, and served as a judge, numbering among his friends such well-known men of the day as Prince, Ward, Astor, Parrish, Lennox, etc. During the war of 1812 he served as adjutant of a corps of seven hundred men in the American volunteers, and was in 1813 elected to the New York legislature. He was a member of the Sixteenth United States congress, recording secretary of the Farmers' Institute, and secretary of the Farmers' Club. As president of the board of aldermen of New York City he was the first to propose the plan to bring Croton water to the city, a scheme that was bitterly opposed, and caused his defeat for re-election as alderman. However, he lived to see the success of the idea and to have the wisdom of his suggestion vindicated. February 19, 1806, he married Julia, daughter of Stephen Austin, of Philadelphia, whose nephew, Col. Stephen T. Austin, founded the Texas colony.

Henry and Julia Meigs had seven children, viz.: Julia Austin; Charles, who died in infancy; Henry; Clara F., who married Richard W. Meade, late commodore in the United States Navy; Theodore Denton, Charles Austin and Eveline. One of the nephews of Henry Meigs was Montgomery Cunningham Meigs, well known as quartermaster general of the Union Army in the Civil war, during which time he superintended the expenditure of about two billion dollars. Of him, W. H. Seward, Lincoln's secretary of state, wrote in an official letter to American ministers abroad, when, in 1867, Mr. Meigs went there for his health: "The prevailing opinion of his country sustains a firm conviction, which I entertain, and on all occasions cheerfully express, that without the services of this eminent soldier, the national cause must either have been lost, or deeply imperiled in the late Civil war."

The father of Peveril Meigs was Charles Austin Meigs, youngest son of the New York statesman, Henry Meigs. Displaying ability in business, rather than in political lines, Charles A. Meigs became cashier of the American Exchange Bank, of New York, and later organized the banking house of Meigs & Greenleaf, which subsequently was conducted under the title of Charles A. Meigs & Son. On Black Friday he suffered the ill fortune of many noted financiers and lost his all. He was then appointed national bank examiner for New York, which position he held until his death. He married Julia A. Van Zandt, who was born at Little Neck, Long Island, and died in New Jersey, leaving four children. Her father, Dr. Charles A. Van Zandt, was a member of a Holland family, and after graduating from the New York Medical College, practiced in Brooklyn.

In New York City Peveril Meigs was born, February 27, 1847, and was reared there and in Brooklyn. On completing his education, which was conducted in some of the best schools of the east, he was first engaged in the firm of Charles A. Meigs & Son. Later, for twelve years, he was with Stephen Van Rensselaer Cruger, the controller of the Trinity Church corporation. Forced to retire from business on account of the failure of his health, he established himself upon the Barrett farm at Punkatasset Hill, Concord, Mass., once the home of Hon. George William Curtis. The change, however, did not prove as beneficial as he had hoped, and a more genial climate was decided upon as imperative. In 1887 he came to California and bought one hundred acres of land on the coast, adjoining Santa Barbara, where he engaged in farming. As a director of El Montecito Manufacturing Company, he tried, with others, to establish a large business in the manufacture of olive oil, said to have no superior in quality in the whole country. However, it was impossible to compete in price with foreign products, greatly adulterated with cotton seed oil; hence the venture proved unprofitable. At a meeting held to decide whether to adulterate the product or close the factory, Mr. Meigs firmly opposed the former course, being ready to sacrifice his stock at any price, rather than stand behind such a project. It is unfortunate that some radical step cannot be taken to prevent cotton seed oil being labeled "Pure Olive Oil."

In New York Mr. Meigs married Miss Rosamond Weston, a descendant of Richard Weston, of the Plymouth colony. Her father, Richard Warren Weston, was a large tea importer and successor to the firm of Goodhue & Co. Mr. and Mrs. Meigs are the parents of five children now living: Peveril; Martin Schenck; Rosamond, wife of Hermann Hall Eddy, of Santa Barbara; Helen and Leonora; a son, Charles Henry, and daughter, Louise, dying in infancy. The older son is a foreign note broker, at No. 40 Exchange Place, New York, while the younger is editor of the Marine Record at San Francisco.

It may be of interest to add that the name Peveril is derived from the surname of a family believed to be connected with that of Meigs, dating back to the earliest days of Norman-English history.

C. H. Sessions

C. H. SESSIONS, president of the Dairymen's Association of Southern California, was born in Southington, Hartford county, Conn., September 14, 1850, and inherits from an interesting ancestry those sterling traits which have made his citizenship honored and successful. Authentic records show that somewhere near the dawn of the eighteenth century four brothers emigrated from Britain to New England, presumably settling in Massachusetts. It is said that one of these brothers had a hand in that great event which convulsed the minds of Englishmen and the waters of Boston Bay and which has since been humorously known as the Boston tea party. The paternal great-great-grandfather, Hon. John Sessions, took his way through the rousing events of his time, and impressed his force of character and attainments upon colonial government. He was born in 1741, and eventually removed to Vermont, and was a member of the colonial congress which met in New York. For two years he was a member of the first continental congress, also was judge of the county court in New York and a member of the legislature of that state, under the administration of the first, or elder, Governor Clinton. The paternal great-grandfather, John Sessions, Jr., was born in Connecticut. In that state the grandfather, Calvin, was born in the year 1799; he settled in Burlington, Conn., where he engaged in the manufacture of cloth.

S. W. Sessions, the father of C. H., was born in Burlington, Conn., and became a manufacturer in Southington, where he continued to live until 1865. He then established a bolt and nut factory at Mount Carmel, Conn., but in 1869 removed his plant to Cleveland, Ohio, and built up the largest business of the kind in America. At the present time he still continues the presidency of this enterprise, known as the Lamson & Sessions Company's plant. He married Nancy Frisbie, a native of Southington, Conn., and a daughter of Samuel Frisbie, who was born in Connecticut, and belonged to one of the very old families of the state. Mrs. Sessions is still living in Cleveland. Of her four children, two are deceased. The daughter, Mrs. F. C. Case, is a resident of Cleveland.

After completing his education in the public schools and Lewis Academy, in Connecticut, C. H. Sessions located in Cleveland in 1869, and went into business with his father, but from the first was handicapped by an unsatisfactory state of health, a misfortune aggravated materially by the inclement winters of the Ohio city. He therefore worked during the summer time and traveled south when the snow began to fly, but even this arrangement did not prove of lasting benefit. As do most who have once visited Los Angeles, he retained delightful impressions of a sojourn here in 1872 and 1873, and of frequent repetitions of the journey here and at Santa Barbara, and in 1884 he decided to make this his permanent place of abode.

The Lynwood Dairy, the oldest wholesale and retail enterprise of the kind in Los Angeles, received its first impetus in 1885, when Mr. Sessions bought seven hundred and twelve acres of fine alfalfa land at Lynwood station, on the Southern Pacific road. The dairy is undoubtedly one of the best equipped in Southern California. There is a large refrigerating plant of three tons capacity. From the first a central place has been established in the city, and this is at present located at No. 117 East Twenty-third street. An enormous business has been built up along retail and wholesale lines, and from his fertile acres and splendidly directed business the owner thereof exerts a wide and progressive influence in all matters pertaining to his interesting and remunerative occupation. Ever since 1894 he has been president of the Dairymen's Association of Southern California, an organization founded in that year for the protection of dairymen from oleomargarine. In carrying out the purpose of the association Mr. Sessions has worked unceasingly, and has been instrumental in securing protection by legislation, and in gaining all around recognition for a body of men who strive to make the dairy business one of the greatest resources of Southern California. In connection with the Farmers' Institute he has been equally active, and his papers read before the association and conventions are listened to with the attention and interest due so earnest a student of economic and agricultural science. In the Chamber of Commerce also he is a valued acquisition, and for three years was a director of its affairs. He is a member of the Union League Club, and is a Republican in national politics.

The marriage of Mr. Sessions and Katherine E. Gould was solemnized in Cleveland, Ohio, Miss Gould being a daughter of William W. Gould, a native of New Hampshire.

LAUREN T. HOLLAND, M. D. Unlike many men of ability in the professional world, Dr. Holland possesses to an unusual degree the capacity for successful financial undertakings, and his acumen and good judgment have extended into many avenues of profit awaiting the opportunity seeker of California. A native of Noble county, Ohio, he was born September 23, 1843, and was reared in Guernsey county, same state. The family of which he is a representative settled at a very early day in Virginia. The paternal grandfather, Archibald, removed with his family from Virginia to Belmont county, Ohio, where his death occurred. His son, Thomas, the father of Lauren T., was born in Winchester, Va., and was a farmer and horseman of Noble county, Ohio, later living in Guernsey county. In 1864 he removed to St. Joseph, Mo., where he engaged in business and where he died, in 1897, at the age of eighty-six years. He married Celestia Ellsworth, who was born in Pennsylvania, of a long-lived family, her father, Isaac, having lived to be a century old. He served in the war of 1812, and was a cabinet-maker in Pennsylvania and then in Ohio, and came of an old Virginia family of Scotch descent. Mrs. Holland, who died in February of 1894, at the age of eighty years, was the mother of six children, four of whom are living, Lauren T. being the second.

Into the otherwise uneventful youth of Dr. Holland came the declaration of war in 1861, and so intense was his patriotism that on several occasions he left school and tried to enlist, only to be brought back by his father. Perseverance finally prevailed, and in June of 1861, at Columbus, he enlisted in Company A, Eighty-fifth Ohio Infantry, and was assigned to detached service. In 1862 he was sent with his regiment after Morgan in Kentucky, and then after Kirby Smith, and was finally sent on the heels of General Price in Missouri in 1863. At the expiration of his term of service at Fort Leavenworth, in March of 1864, he re-enlisted in the Sixteenth Kansas Infantry, and continued to harass Price until the spring of 1865, when they joined the Powder river expedition to suppress the Sioux Indians. In September of 1865 he was mustered out of service at Fort Kearny, and forthwith returned to St. Joseph, Mo.

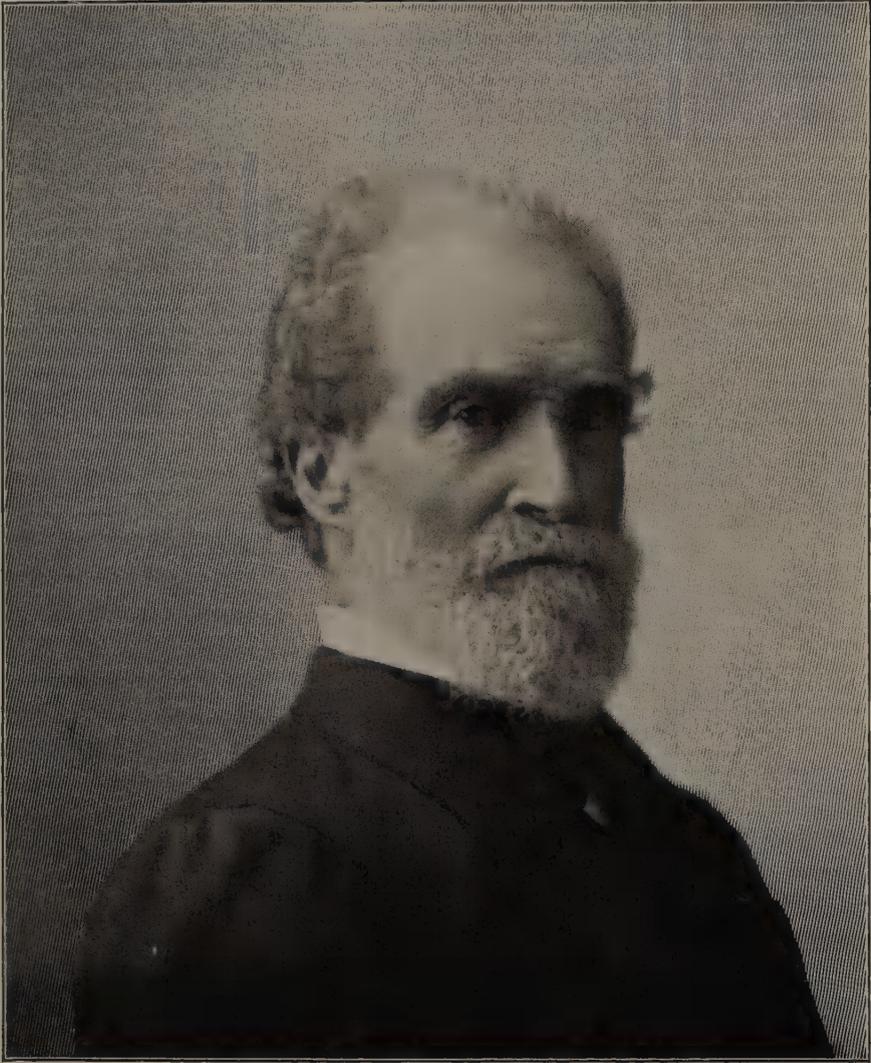

The education of Dr. Holland was begun in the public schools, and previous to the Civil war he studied medicine for a short time with Dr. McPherson of Ohio. For a time after the war he studied under Dr. Jacob Geiger. In 1869 he began to practice in Holt county, Mo., and the following year removed to Troy, Doniphan county, Kans. Ever on the alert to increase his knowledge of his chosen profession, he took a post-graduate course at the Kansas City Medical College in 1875, in 1881-82 attended the College of Physicians and Surgeons at St. Joseph, Mo., and in 1884-85 took a post-graduate course in New York City. In 1870 he was elected coroner of Doniphan county, Kans. Two years later he removed to Wyandotte, Kans., where he practiced medicine, and served for two terms as coroner of the county. In 1879 he removed to Del Norte, Rio Grande county, Colo., where he was almost immediately appointed county coroner for an unexpired term and then elected for another term. In 1880, while on his way to United States Senator Bowen's camp, in the Summit mining district, he was caught in an electric storm, and by reason of the severe exposure partially lost his voice. Nevertheless, he continued to practice off and on until 1884, when he went to New York City for voice treatment and also to take a post-graduate course under Prof. Clinton Wagoner. In 1885 he took a trip to Atlanta, Ga., thence traveled north through Tennessee, and everywhere met with discouraging outlooks. He therefore came to California in 1886, locating at Visalia, Tulare county, where he practiced until 1889, when, owing to continued trouble with his throat, he located in Los Angeles. This proved to be a wise decision, for after proper treatment he regained his health to a large extent, and was now in a position to continue the practice of medicine. In 1892 he was appointed district health officer of Los Angeles, and when the office of county health officer was created, in 1895, he received the first appointment to that important post. In 1898 he was elected county coroner on the Republican ticket by a majority of nearly two thousand over the fusion ticket, and assumed charge of the office in January of 1899. Since then he has devoted all of his time to the duties incident to his position.

Dr. Holland has extensive holdings in both oil and mining. He is a director in the Fairview Gold Mining Company, operating in the Rosamond district, Kern county, Cal.; also a director in the Pinute Hills Oil Company, and has interests in several other companies. Fraternally he was made a Mason in Doniphan county, Kans., in June, 1867; later was a member of the Masonic lodges in the various places in which he resided, and is at present a member of South Gate Lodge in Los Angeles, Signet Chapter, R. A. M.; Los Angeles Council, R. & S. M., as well as the South Gate Chapter Eastern Star, and is past W. P., and belongs with the Los Angeles Court of Amaranth. As a member of the Grand Army of the Republic he is affiliated with Bartlett-Logan Post No. 6, and is past commander of No. 6, chief mustering officer of the departments of Tennessee and Georgia, and ex-medical director of the department of California and Nevada. He is a Republican in politics, and is connected with the Methodist Episcopal Church.

In Wyandotte, Kans., Dr. Holland married Clara C. Rively, who was born in Leavenworth, Kans., and was the first white girl baby born in the town. Of this union there are six children, namely: Frank C., who is in Arizona; Mrs. Beatrice Harris, of Los Angeles; Ethel, Earl R., Harrison H. and Clara Louise.

COL. H. E. HASSE, M. D. In the capacity of chief surgeon of the Pacific Branch, National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, Dr. Hasse has been connected with this institution ever since it was established. At the time he accepted the position, in 1889, and came to the Home he found only twenty or twenty-five beneficiaries of the government here, but so great has been the subsequent growth that the membership is now more than two thousand, and he has been given four associate physicians to assist him in his work. In addition to the duties of this office he is president of the board of pension examiners, having acted in this capacity since 1890.

A. C. Wilson

Born in Freiburg, Saxony, Germany, January 12, 1836, Dr. Hasse was the only child of Edward and Rosalie (Thiele) Hasse, natives of Saxony, the former a son of an inspector of mines in Germany, and the latter a merchant's daughter. On the completion of a university education Edward Hasse entered upon the practice of law in Saxony, but after bringing his family to America in 1845 he turned his attention to farming near Milwaukee, Wis., and later settled at DeSoto, Jefferson county, Mo., where he died. His wife died subsequently in Wisconsin. Of the journey to America Dr. Hasse retains a vivid recollection, for he was a boy of nine at the time, and the unusual event of a four weeks' voyage on the ocean made an indelible impression upon his mind. His education was conducted in the Milwaukee public schools and a private classical academy. When twenty years old he began to study medicine under Dr. Cassion, and later spent a year in the St. Louis Medical College under Dean Pope. In order that he might enjoy the advantage of study under the best minds of Germany, he went abroad in 1858 and took a two years' course in the University of Leipsic. In 1861 he received the M. D. degree from the University of Wurtzburg, after which he spent three months in the University of Prague.

Returning to the United States Dr. Hasse practiced for three months in Milwaukee, Wis. Meantime, however, the war had broken out and he was ambitious to serve his country. In the fall of 1861 he was commissioned assistant surgeon of the Ninth Wisconsin Infantry, and the following year was promoted to be surgeon (with the rank of major) of the Twenty-fourth Wisconsin Infantry, remaining as such until the close of the war. With his regiment he took part in all the forced marches and endured all the hardships of camp life. Among the engagements in which he was present may be mentioned the battles of Stone River, Tullahoma, Chickamauga, Missionary Ridge, Franklin, Nashville, all the battles and skirmishes of the Georgia campaign to Atlanta, Lovejoy Station, Jonesboro, Spring Hill, and Nashville. At the close of the war, in May, 1865, he was mustered out of service. Resuming the duties of practice in Milwaukee, he remained there until 1867, when he settled at DeSoto, Mo., but in 1871 returned to Milwaukee, where he continued the practice of medicine and surgery until 1885. The next two years were spent at Little Rock, Ark., and in 1887 he settled in Los Angeles, Cal., from which point he came to Soldiers' Home two years later.

The marriage of Dr. Hasse united him with Miss Adelaide Trentlage, who was born and reared in Milwaukee. They have five children, namely: Adelaide, who is librarian in the Astor library in New York city; Mrs. Elsa Andrae, of Milwaukee; Hilda, who is an artist in San Francisco; Carl E., a civil engineer of Santa Monica; and Jessie, who is with her parents. The family attend the Presbyterian Church and Mrs. Hasse is a member of the same. During his residence in Milwaukee Dr. Hasse was several times elected county physician, but with that exception always refused proffers of public offices, preferring to allow nothing to interfere with his private practice. From the time he first had the privilege of voting he has supported Republican principles and been thoroughly in sympathy with its platform. His Masonic membership, which originally was in the blue lodge of Milwaukee, is now with the Santa Monica lodge, and he is now connected with Stanton Post, G. A. R., in Los Angeles. One of his noticeable characteristics is a strong vein of humor, which has not only enabled him to withstand the mental and physical depression incident to years of laborious practice and constant contact with suffering humanity, but has also aided him in bringing sunshine and good cheer into the lives of many patients and has thus brightened and blessed countless hearts.

ALBERT C. J. WILSON. As one of the Argonauts who were led to California by reason of the richness of her mines, Mr. Wilson arrived in California August 17, 1850. The voyage had been long and monotonous, having been begun at Wheeling, W. Va., from which point he sailed by steamboat down the Ohio and Mississippi rivers to New Orleans, where he embarked on the brig Zenobia for Greytown. From that place he proceeded to the head of Lake Nicaragua and thence across the country. While on the Zenobia cholera broke out and a majority of the passengers were for abandoning the trip, but Mr. Wilson and others stoutly opposed this and, overruling the captain, they managed to land in Greytown, where the most of the passengers got ashore in the night and the goods were landed in the morning. There the sailors abandoned the ship.

A party of twelve men hired two ox-carts to convey them one hundred miles to the Pacific ocean. This was the second expedition of Americans who crossed the Nicaragua route, and its members landed in San Francisco as soon as did those comprising the first party. At Realjo, on the Pacific coast, Mr. Wilson took the bark Rolla for San Francisco. There were ninety-five men on board, all of whom landed safely in San Francisco, from which point he proceeded to the mines. Provisions of all kinds he found were sold at fabulous prices. For flour he paid as high as $65 per cwt.; other articles were proportionately high. Fortunately, he was successful in his mining ventures, and for several years averaged $8 a day, his work being mainly in the placer mines of Tuolumne county. Conditions were crude and civilization was a far degree from its present high standard. Like everything else, the postal service was totally inadequate to the needs of the people. An instance of this is found in the fact that Mr. Wilson was sometimes delayed two years in receiving letters, which by the time they reached him had extra charges amounting to as much as $6. This was largely due to there being so many men of his own name (Joseph Wilson) in California. To remedy the matter, he applied to the legislature and by an act of that body his name was changed to Albert Calhoun Joseph Wilson.

The Wilsons are of Scotch and English descent. John Wilson, a native of New Jersey, removed to Ohio county, W. Va., and became one of the pioneer farmers of the Ohio river valley. Indeed, when he settled in that region, there was no other white man for many miles along the river. By his marriage to Miss Abrahams, of New Jersey, he had a son, Louis, born in West Virginia, and a lifelong resident of Ohio county, who served during the war of 1812. He married Rosanna Brown, a native of the same county as himself and who also died in West Virginia. Her father, Frazier Brown, was born in Maryland, but died in West Virginia.

In a family of seven children, six of whom grew to maturity, the subject of this sketch was the only son of Louis Wilson, who came to the coast. He was born near Wheeling, W. Va., February 10, 1822, and as a boy assisted in the cultivation of the home farm. At the age of twenty-eight years he left Virginia and came to California, where he had many exciting and narrow escapes while engaged in mining. In June, 1859, when he was superintendent of the Sonora Table Mountain Mining Company, in Tuolumne county, he had a narrow escape. For a time the company had worked at running an incline, but temporarily abandoned the work. On resuming it he was superintendent. He went down first to see if everything was all right, and called out to his men that he needed a pick. Before he could add a word of caution as to how it should be sent down to him, a careless workman threw it so that it struck and knocked out a brace. Immediately the dirt and debris came down in great quantities. Just as the debris caught him he jumped between two posts and a slab, which prevented him from being crushed and also left him a space for breathing. It was six o'clock in the morning when the accident occurred, and twenty-five hours passed before he was released, as the men had to devise means to stop the downward flow of clay pipe and debris before they could dig him out. At times he despaired of being saved, as the posts and slabs were liable to break at any moment, but fortunately they endured the weight of debris and he was finally rescued.

In 1867 Mr. Wilson came to Santa Barbara, where his was among the first American families to settle. He bought three blocks, containing fifteen acres, and forming one of the finest property holdings in the city. The large pepper trees that now adorn the place came from seeds that he planted. The residence was erected under his supervision, and the other improvements represent his personal efforts. In the midst of his various business interests he has nevertheless traveled much. In 1854 he returned east via Panama, and in 1866 again visited the old home, this time taking the Nicaragua route. Although he was reared under slave influences, he has always been a staunch upholder of the Union and an opponent of the slavery system. In politics he is a Republican. While living in the east he was made a Mason, in Wheeling, W. Va. In 1856 he was a representative to the grand lodge, and the same year he represented his chapter in the grand chapter.

In Tuolumne county Mr. Wilson married Margaret A. Calder, who was born in Jefferson county, Ohio, and accompanied her parents to California via Panama in 1856. Three children were born of their union. The only daughter, Katharine W., married Harmon Bell, an attorney of San Francisco, Cal., and they have two sons, Traylor W. and Joseph Samuel, who as the only grandchildren of Mr. and Mrs. Wilson are especially dear to them. Louis was born December 24, 1859, and became a chief engineer in Mexico, but his prospects were blighted by his death, which occurred at Nogales, Ariz., in December, 1886. The other son, George, was born in 1865 and died in Santa Barbara when only seven years of age. Mrs. Wilson's father, James Calder, a native of New Jersey, was the son of a Scotchman, James Calder, Sr., a pioneer of Jefferson county, Ohio. In 1856, accompanied by his wife and five children, James Calder, Jr., came to California, and his was the first train to cross Panama after the riots. Taking the steamer Golden Gate, he landed in San Francisco early in May. Later he engaged in ranching in Tuolumne county until his death. Fraternally he was connected with the Odd Fellows. His wife, Elizabeth, was a daughter of William Wyckoff, and was born in Ohio and died in Tuolumne county, Cal. Of the five children forming their family three are living, viz.: Mrs. Wilson; George, a miner in Tuolumne county; and Henry, also a resident of that county.

W. B. CUNNANE, M. D. One of the widely known and successful physicians and surgeons of Santa Barbara is Dr. Cunnane, who was born in Edinburg, Johnson county, Ind., November 16, 1854. His father, Bartholomew Cunnane, was born in County Mayo, Ireland, and in his youth enjoyed such advantages as come the way of the farm-reared Irish boy. Upon immigrating to America via New Orleans he settled first in Hamilton, Ohio, and then in Edinburg, Ind., later in Missouri, and in 1890 came to Santa Barbara, Cal., where he died in 1900, at the age of seventy-five years. His wife, Margaret (Mullaney) Cunnane, was also born in County Mayo, Ireland, and came of a family for many years connected with Irish history and struggles. Mrs. Cunnane, who is living in Santa Barbara county, is the mother of six children, of whom three sons and two daughters are living. Mary A. is the principal of the Santa Ynez school; Margaret is now Mrs. Lewis of Santa Ynez; John B. is a druggist at Santa Ynez, and Thomas E. is a physician in Ventura.

When about eight years of age W. B. Cunnane accompanied his parents from Indiana to Missouri, settling on a farm near Sturgeon, Boone county. He attended the early subscription schools of that county, but with the later advent of the free schools also availed himself of their advantages and subsequently graduated from Sturgeon Academy. In 1870 he entered the office of the general roadmaster of the Wabash Railroad at Moberly, Mo., and soon afterward took up telegraphy in that office. On gaining a knowledge of the work he was appointed operator on the road between Moberly and St. Louis. He also took a course in pharmacy at the University of Louisiana. For three years he was with the Texas & Pacific Railroad, operating between Marshall and Texarkana, and Sherman and Texarkana. In the mean time, he had been cherishing ambitions for professional life, inspired, no doubt, by the success of his mother's brother, John Mullaney, a graduate of the Columbia Law School, and in time a partner of T. B. Hendricks. This uncle settled in San Francisco, where he practiced law for a time, but later devoted himself to educational work.

The professional aspirations of W. B. Cunnane were directed toward the science of medicine, and he took his first readings with Dr. S. J. Morriss, surgeon for the Texas & Pacific Railroad. In 1878 he entered the University of Louisiana at New Orleans (now Tulare University), where he took the regular three years' course and also the special course in toxicology and chemistry, graduating in 1881. In the mean time his vacations had been spent with the Texas & Pacific Railroad under Dr. Morriss, a special privilege granted because of his services during the yellow fever epidemic. After graduation he practiced in Queen City, Tex., for two years. The year 1883 found him in Santa Barbara county, Cal., and for some years he was the only resident physician of Santa Ynez, where he conducted a drug store in order that he might have on hand a supply of medicine and general medical necessities. This store was afterward sold to his brother, and is still conducted by him. While in Santa Ynez the doctor became prominent in local affairs, served as county physician, was a member and the secretary of the school board, and helped to secure the erection of the new schoolhouse. In 1893 he opened an office in Santa Barbara, and has since carried on a large general practice. The year of his arrival he was appointed a member of the board of examining surgeons for pensions, was secretary of the board, and held the position until his resignation in 1900. For the following few months he enjoyed a complete change, traveling through Arizona, Old Mexico, and other portions of the great southwest, and while in Sonora became interested in a mine, in which he still retains stock. For two years he was physician in charge of the county hospital, and during that time was also health officer.

In Ballard, Santa Barbara county, Dr. Cunnane married Mabel Johnston, by whom he has two children, William Bernard, Jr., and Mabel. The family have a pleasant home at No. 1327 De la Vina street. Mrs. Cunnane was born in Nevada, and is a daughter of W. F. and Mary (McCorkel) Johnston, pioneers of California, the former a cousin of Albert Sidney Johnston. Her mother is a member of the McCorkel family of Virginia, direct descendants of the Calhoun family. In 1853 she started across the plains with a train of emigrants, who were all but wiped out by the cholera. Consumption had threatened to shorten her days, and, hoping the change would prove beneficial, she had decided to come to the far west. Strange to say, she is the sole survivor of that ill-fated train of travelers. She is now approaching the sunset of life, and is interestingly reminiscent of her terrible experiences on the plains and the early days in California. Her home is in Santa Maria, where Mr. Johnston is a large stock raiser and enterprising business man.

While in Texas Dr. Cunnane was made a Mason and identified himself with Lodge No. 49 at Kildare, but is now connected with Lodge No. 242, F. & A. M., at Santa Barbara. Another organization of which he is a member is the Woodmen of the World. Mrs. Cunnane is a member of the Episcopal Church.

J. B. CUNNANE. The well-equipped drug store at Santa Ynez, of which Mr. Cunnane is manager and proprietor, does a large business in the town and surrounding country, and carries a full line of remedies for the alleviation of human ills, as well as stationery and the incidental requirements of all communities. The first store opened by Mr. Cunnane came into being in 1888, and was prosperously making its way among the shoals of business life when overtaken by the disastrous fire of 1894. While the ashes were yet smoldering the plucky owner was evolving plans for a new and better structure, which was ready for occupancy in 1895, and has since met with no serious drawbacks.

Although a native of Indiana, where he was born in 1863, Mr. Cunnane grew to manhood in Missouri, whither his father had in the meantime removed. He was educated at the high school at Moberly, Randolph county, and also graduated at the school of pharmacy in the same town. In 1884 his ambition led him into the west, and for two years he lived at Santa Barbara, later traveling through Montana and Idaho, and permanently locating in Santa Ynez in 1888. The town was then but a small settlement, and he has grown apace with the increase of population and business, and may be said to be one of the pioneers of what is now a bustling and up-to-date community.

The marriage of Mr. Cunnane and Alice Torance, daughter of J. W. Torance, one of the oldest settlers here, was solemnized in 1891, and of this union there are three children, Philip J., Thomas and Margaret. The Cunnane home is a pleasant and refined one, and the visitor from far or near is assured of a hearty welcome, and enjoys the delightful and unostentatious hospitality. Mr. Cunnane is a Democrat in politics, and was appointed postmaster of Santa Ynez in 1894. Fraternally he is connected with the Knights of Pythias, and was the first chancellor of Santa Ynez Lodge No. 212. In 1887 he became identified with the Odd Fellows, and is now a member of the Channel City Lodge No. 232.

T. E. CUNNANE, M. D. A notable addition to professional circles in Ventura is Dr. T. E. Cunnane, than whom there is no medical and surgical practitioner in the town more popular and skillful. Of Gallic ancestry, he was born in Boone county, Mo., May 3, 1866. His father, Bartholomew Cunnane, who was born in County Mayo, Ireland, and crossed the ocean to New Orleans, La., when a mere boy, located in Ohio and engaged in farming, later residing for a time in Indiana, and eventually, in 1866, removing to Missouri, where he again interested himself in farming, until he became associated with the Wabash Railroad as timekeeper. In 1889 he came to California, and up to the time of his death, in 1900, lived in comparative retirement at Santa Barbara. His wife, who is still living, was formerly Margaret Mullaney, a native of Ireland, and is the mother of three sons and two daughters, now living, of whom Dr. T. E. is the youngest son. Of the other sons, Dr. W.

B. is a prominent physician of Santa Barbara, and John B. is a druggist at Santa Ynez.

The education of Dr. T. E. Cunnane was acquired in the public schools of Boone county, and at the high school of Moberly, Mo., from which he was graduated in 1883. His first independent effort at earning a livelihood was as a clerk in Hannibal, Mo., where he lived until 1889. Having decided to devote his life to a mastery of the science of medicine, he repaired to Santa Ynez in 1889 and began to study medicine with his brother, W. B., who was then located at Santa Ynez. At the same time, while studying, he was employed as a clerk in his brother's drug store. In this way he gained much valuable and practical knowledge, which was supplemented by taking the medical course at Cooper Medical College, San Francisco, from which he graduated in 1893. An opening for practice was available owing to the removal of his brother from Santa Ynez to Santa Barbara, and he settled down in the little town of Santa Ynez and built up a large and appreciative business, and before coming away was for some time county physician.

Thinking to better his prospects, Dr. Cunnane came to Ventura in August of 1900, and it is doubtful if any could more nearly realize their expectations. As a general practitioner he is valued for his skill in diagnosis and successful treatment of complicated physical disorders, and for that geniality of manner and rare tact, which wins and holds friends in any walk of life. His many interests extend to social and fraternal organizations, and he is a member of the Masonic fraternity, the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Knights of Pythias. He is medical examiner for a number of organizations and societies and also is a member of the Board of Examiners of the United States Pension Bureau. In politics he is a Democrat.

While living in Santa Ynez Dr. Cunnane married Nellie Blair, who was born and educated in West Virginia, and who is the mother of two children, Eugenia and Virginia.

J. M. STEADE, M. D. Since establishing his home in San Diego in January, 1895, Dr. Steade has engaged in a general practice of medicine and surgery, and has his office in the Peterson block, No. 832 Fifth street. In addition to his private practice, he formerly gave his services as a member of the board of health, and at this writing is instructor of obstetrics in the San Diego Training School for Nurses, which institution he assisted in organizing.

The first representative of the Steade family in America came from England and settled in North Carolina. His son, John, was a native of North Carolina and became a pioneer frontiersman and scout in Kentucky, where he had many thrilling experiences. Next in line of descent was Frank, who was born in Bowling Green, Ky., and became a scout for the government during the Civil war, holding the rank of captain. Some years afterward he died in Oklahoma. His wife, Tallie, was born in Pennsylvania, and now lives in San Diego county, Cal. Her father, William Young, was born in Orange county, N. Y., of remote English ancestry. In early life he moved to Bourbon county, Ky., where he improved a farm. During the Civil war he was a staunch advocate of free-state principles.

Edmund M. Burke

The only child of Frank and Tallie Steade was J. M., the subject of this article. He was born in Fort Scott, Kans., in 1862, and in infancy was taken to Philadelphia, Pa., but at seven years of age returned to Fort Scott, Kans. Afterward he engaged in raising cattle on T 5 ranch, situated on the North Canadian river, in No Man's Land. From boyhood it was his ambition to study medicine, and as soon as the way was opened he turned his attention to this work. In 1887 he was graduated from Cincinnati Eclectic College and in 1894 received the degree of M. D., also from the Cincinnati College of Medicine and Surgery.

HON. EDMUND M. BURKE, the tax collector of Santa Barbara county, was born in the city of Santa Barbara April 15, 1871, and received the rudiments of his education under private tutors in this place. In 1884 he entered St. Vincent's College, at Los Angeles, where he remained until his senior year. The first position of a public nature that he held was the office of deputy county tax collector under his father, and he later served as deputy county assessor. April 21, 1898, he assumed the duties of mayor, to which office he had been elected by the people of Santa Barbara, receiving a large majority. During his term a new charter was adopted which made the age of eligibility to the mayor's office thirty years, and he was therefore ineligible for re-election. Among the improvements made during his administration was the completion of the city water works plant. Streets and bridges were also put in better condition. Other improvements proved his activity as an official and his interest in the city's advancement. On the death of his father, in September, 1900, the board of supervisors appointed him to fill the vacancy in the office of county tax collector, and he is now serving in that capacity, his term to expire in January, 1903.

The Republican party has in Mr. Burke a staunch supporter. With the firmest conviction of the value of party principles, he gives his allegiance to the men and measures for which the organization stands. He has served as chairman of the county convention and been a member of the county central committee, besides which he now represents this county on the state central committee. He is a member of the Santa Barbara Chamber of Commerce. Fraternally he is connected with the Independent Order of Foresters; the Ancient Order of United Workmen; the Foresters of America, in which he is a past officer; the Native Sons of the Golden West, being past president of the Santa Barbara Parlor No. 116; the United Moderns; the Knights of Pythias, Uniform Rank; the Modern Woodmen of America, of which he is consul; Knights of the Maccabees; the Companions of the Forest, and the Elks. From boyhood he has been familiar with the Spanish language, in which he has acquired a knowledge as thorough as that of English. His marriage was solemnized in Ventura and united him with Miss Lorena May Garfield, who was born in Spring Valley, Minn., and by whom he has two children, Lorena A. and Edmund F.

MIGUEL F. BURKE. During the '20s, Captain James Walter Burke, a native of Galway, Ireland, and an officer in the English merchant marine service, visited Santa Barbara. Although he had visited all the principal ports of the world and had once circumnavigated the globe, he had found no spot so fair as this, and he determined to establish his home here. Settling in Santa Barbara, he turned his attention to farming and trading in stock. In Monterey he married Señora Joséfa Boronda, member of an old Spanish family of California. Both lived to be quite old, he dying at seventy-eight and she when seventy-nine years of age. They were the parents of several children, but had only one son, Miguel F. He was born November 23, 1839, in an adobe house on Figueroa street, between State and Anacapa, Santa Barbara. A part of that old house still stands, and adjoins the Congregational Church. It is a notable fact that he spent his entire life in the same locality and died in the block in which he was born.

There being no schools in Santa Barbara when he was a boy, he was sent to Holy Cross College, Worcester, Mass., where he remained until his education was completed, the distance being too great for him to return home during vacations. With the exception of this period at school, he spent his life wholly in Santa Barbara county, and was at various times teamster, clerk and express agent. Among the roads which he opened was the one from here to Gaviota, and in 1871 he assumed charge of Gaviota Landing, where he built a wharf, and for several years he was exceedingly prosperous, but later lost heavily through the depression in real estate. After leaving Gaviota in 1882 he went to Buell Flat and thence to Santa Ynez. In the '70s he was master of road district No. 4.

January 4, 1881, he was appointed supervisor of the third district, and served two years. From 1890 to 1894 he was a member of the common council. For sixteen years he served as county tax collector, being elected six consecutive times. The lowest majority he ever received for the office was forty-nine, and the highest nine hundred and ninety-one. Although a staunch Republican, he had a strong Democratic support, and carried by a large majority Santa Ynez, the banner Democratic precinct in the county. He was filling the position at the time of his death, which occurred September 7, 1900, at the age of sixty years and nine months.

July 16, 1870, Mr. Burke married Ellen M. Murphy, and they had eight children, three now living, namely: Edmund M.; Frank A., a railway mail clerk of San Francisco, and Delphina, Mrs. Otis A. Longley, of Fresno.

J. LEE HAGADORN, M. D. In the midst of a community where the medical fraternity has many representatives with an experience of twenty-five years or more, and with reputations extending far beyond the borders of their home city, it is a noteworthy fact that a number of younger physicians have achieved a success that, in view of all the circumstances, is little short of remarkable. In this latter class belongs Dr. Hagadorn, one of the most successful of the modern school of professional activity. His associations are distinctively with the west. A graduate of a California university, a member of various well-known California organizations and a practitioner of Los Angeles, his success is typical of the opportunities which our coast regions offer to young men of ability.

Descended from a Holland-Dutch family of New York state, Dr. Hagadorn was born in Vassar, Mich., March 1, 1872, and was the youngest of three children, the others, William and Nellie, being likewise residents of Los Angeles. He is a son of Rev. Wesley Hagadorn, a native of South Lyon, Mich., of which his father, a New Yorker, was a pioneer farmer. Reared in the faith of the Methodist Episcopal Church, he was given excellent advantages, attending the University of Michigan and Northwestern University (then known as Evanston Divinity School). His first experiences in preaching were gained as a circuit rider in the lumber regions, where he endured all the hardships attendant upon such work in pioneer days. Later, for twenty-one years, he was a member of the Detroit conference, but finally, owing to ill health, retired from the ministry. He came to California in 1887 with the hope that a change of climate might restore his health, which was seriously impaired. However, the hope was not realized, and a year later, in 1888, he died in Pasadena, aged fifty-six years. His wife, who was Adelaide Leseur, was born in Ann Arbor, Mich., of French descent, and died in 1875.

With such advantages as the grammar and high schools of Lansing, Mich., afford, J. Lee Hagadorn was fitted, on coming to California, to take up the serious pursuits of life, and at the close of three years of study in Professor Parker's school, in 1890 he took up the study of medicine under Dr. Joseph Kurtz of Los Angeles. The same year he matriculated in the medical department, University of Southern California, from which he received the degree of M. D. in 1893, and at the same time accepted an appointment as house surgeon in Los Angeles county hospital. A year later he opened an office in Fullerton, Orange county, but eighteen months later returned to Los Angeles, and for two years was associated with his former preceptor, Dr. Joseph Kurtz. Since then he has practiced alone, and has his office in the Douglas building. In addition to his private practice he has held the position of associate professor of the principles and practice of medicine in the institution of which he is a graduate. The class of 1900 honored him by inviting him to deliver the address in their behalf on graduation day, and his address, which was a plea for the young practitioner, received much favorable mention.

While in Fullerton Dr. Hagadorn met and married Miss Ethyl Priest, who was born in Minnesota and by whom he has a son, Paul. They are connected with the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Los Angeles, in the maintenance of which Dr. Hagadorn assists. Fraternally he is connected with the Uniform Rank, K. of P., and is chancellor commander of Los Angeles Lodge No. 205. Other orders with which he is connected are the D. O. K. K., the Woodmen of the World and Delta Chapter, Phi Rho Sigma, besides which he is examining physician for the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen. In politics he votes with the Republican party.

There is no phase of the medical profession in which Dr. Hagadorn fails to maintain a keen interest. Every development made in the science of therapeutics receives thoughtful study on his part, and he is eager to adopt in his practice such improvements as are of unquestioned value; at the same time he is conservative, averse to any decisions which are not formulated upon actual experience. Both in the Los Angeles County and the Southern California Medical Associations he is an active worker, and before both he has read papers bearing upon important professional themes, while he has also been a contributor to the medical literature of the day through the publication of his articles in professional journals. A few years ago he contributed to the Southern California Practitioner a little screed entitled

"A Bacteriological Tragedy," which has since been copied in some thirty-four medical journals of this country and Europe, and has brought his name into prominence among many to whom he was previously unknown. While his practice is general and his knowledge of every department of medicine thorough, he has made a special study of anæsthesia, and in Southern California has gained a reputation as an expert anæsthetist, his experience in and knowledge of this exceedingly important department of the profession being unexcelled among the physicians of this part of the state.

EDWARD T. BALCH, M. D. Although as early as 1626 John Balch settled in Massachusetts, that branch of the family represented by Dr. Balch of Santa Barbara remained in England until the nineteenth century. The genealogy is traced back to the year 1023 in England, and there are vaults in Westham Abbey where generations of the family's dead were laid to rest. In its original derivation, the name comes from Balkh in Arabia. Thomas Balch, M. D., father of Edward T., was a surgeon in the British navy, but resigned his commission and in 1830 crossed the ocean from England to New York, settling in New York City; however, six years later he returned to his native land, where he later died. His wife, who was born at Salisbury Plains, was a member of the Titford family, of old English extraction; her father lived to be ninety-eight, but she died in middle life, leaving two children, of whom Edward T. was the only son. Born in London, England, June 27, 1827, he was three years of age when his father crossed the ocean to America. After the return to London, he studied under the tutorship of Thomas Stanton, and later spent three years in Oxford. On leaving the university, he made a tour of the Holy Land and India, in company with his tutor, remaining abroad from 1846 to 1849. Meantime he became greatly interested in the people of India and their knowledge of theosophy, telepathy and kindred studies. Under a very learned man, he himself made considerable advance in the occult arts, and it was his desire to remain in India for further investigation, but his tutor, who was an English clergyman, opposed the plan, and influenced the young man to come to America instead.

Crossing the Isthmus of Suez on camel-back and then journeying through the Mediterranean Sea, Dr. Balch finally made his way across the Atlantic to New Orleans, La., landing there in 1849. Some knowledge of medicine he had already gained, and he now entered the University of Louisiana, from which he received the degree of M. D. in 1851. He entered upon professional work in New Orleans, but in 1861 the breaking out of the Civil war and his own openly expressed sympathy with the Union, made the city no longer a safe place of residence, so he went to Weatherford, Tex., where he became interested in the cattle business. However, there he found surroundings as unsafe as in New Orleans. Indeed, so strong was sentiment against him that a plot was formed to hang him on account of his Union sympathies. However, a little girl revealed the plot to him and he hastily fled, crossing the Red river to an Indian village, where for a time he suffered from fever. On his recovery he returned to Texas for his wife. Next he made his way to Louisiana and on to the vicinity of Vicksburg. Arriving on the battlefield of Corinth, he joined the Federal troops, and for the first time since the spring of 1861 felt that he was out of peril. Soon he proceeded to Philadelphia and there met Captain Young, whom he had known in New Orleans. In the fall of 1862 he was commissioned acting ensign on the Adella, in Admiral Bailey's east and gulf blockading squadron, but later he was transferred to the Sunflower, and finally, owing to ill health, was given sick leave, and in February, 1865, was honorably discharged in New York.

After having practiced his profession in the east for some years, in 1871 Dr. Balch settled in Southbend, Wash., where he remained for twenty years, meantime acting as examining physician for the New York Life and Mutual Life Insurance Companies and as health officer of Pacific county. The year 1891 found him in California. For five years he remained in Summerland. On the death of his wife, Sarah (Foster) Balch, whom he had married in 1857, he removed to Santa Barbara, and has since engaged in practice here, now having his office in the Hopkins block. Since coming here he has married again, his wife having been Harriet Noyes, a native of Maine. He has two adopted sons, Edward T. and Byron T. The former, who was educated in the University of Oregon, is a lieutenant in the Thirty-seventh United States Volunteer Regiment, and recently served in the Philippines with Batson's scouts. Byron T. was a member and sergeant of Company M, Forty-fourth United States Regiment.

In 1852, Dr. Balch was made a Mason in New Orleans, of which order he is still an active member. Always interested in matters connected with the temperance cause, he has been identified with the Sons of Temperance, Independent Order of Good Templars and Temple of Honor. Starr King Post numbers him among its active workers and enables him to keep in touch with all Grand Army work. Since becoming a citizen of the United States, he has been a staunch Republican and a firm believer in party principles. He is a member of the Southern California Homeopathic Medical Society. In addition to his private practice, he gives considerable attention to the work of the Santa Barbara Humane Society, of which he is secretary. This society has made prominent the truth that by educating children to a knowledge of the importance of a humane treatment of all animals more can be accomplished than by radical means. Prevention rather than punishment is recommended, the latter being resorted to only in extreme cases.

JOHN H. WILLIAMS. Many wanderers in foreign lands have traced a likeness between the climate, flora and natural advantages of Italy and California, and have thought to reproduce on the Pacific coast at least the beauty of situation of some of the renowned places south of the Alps, albeit shorn of that indefinable charm slowly wrought by the enchanting history of the ages. But it remained for one man to practically test the utility of his dream of a similarity between the coast effects in a bay of Santa Barbara county, and that unrivalled bay which has shrouded the Naples of the old world in unquenchable fame, with its sheen of sky and air, and its view of distant Capri. It is possible that had Mr. Williams lived to further superintend the fulfillment of his expectations, the plans which are now under way, and which but await the touch of a master hand, would have been accomplished; and it is also more than possible that his appreciation of art and architecture and all that contributes to the beauty and refinement of life would have entered into his calculations, and inspired the erection of buildings and homes, the making of parks, the production of flora, in harmony with his ideas of a modern Naples in the western world.

The early life of this loyal citizen, whose death occurred December 15, 1895, and who left behind him so many unfinished plans, was spent in Madison county, Ohio, where he was born in 1841. He early evinced signs of that financial ability so noticeable in his mature years, and when quite young engaged in business in Wall street, New York City. After several years he went to St. Louis and engaged in the lumber business for twenty years with the firm of Williams & Alford. While in the southern city he married in 1874, Miss Alice Paist, the friend and playmate of his childhood, and who was born in Clark county, Ohio, her husband's birthplace having been on the line between Clark and Madison counties. In 1881 Mr. and Mrs. Williams enjoyed the advantages of travel in Europe, and during their two years' absence from America intelligently observed the conditions to be found under old world rule. Upon returning to the States Mr. Williams again engaged in the lumber business in St. Louis, and in 1887 permanently located in California, having spent a number of winters here in the past. On one of these trips Mr. Williams had consulted with the Southern Pacific men, and upon the strength of their representations in regard to a future branch to go through his land, he purchased one thousand acres of the Dos Pueblos ranch for a town site. The entire land was laid out in lots and blocks, and although the railroad men did not fulfill their promise in regard to a line, Mr. Williams never for a moment relinquished his intention of creating here on the Pacific swept coast another Naples, and in furtherance of his desire established a post-office, store, hotel and built several cottages on the west side of the town site. As if in response to a tardy appeal, the embryo town is now visited by the passing trains, but the brain which wearied not while waiting its arrival is beyond the worry and struggle which its advent might have brought him. Strangely like the old, is the situation of the new Naples, with its gradual slope from the sea to the mountains, some two miles inland. The cañon forming the western boundary of the property is a very deep one, down which flows a stream of the purest water for miles around. On the west of the town site Mr. Williams purchased the eighty acres where he lived until his death, and which is now the home of his wife. The house on the estate was formerly the home of Dr. Den, who settled in Santa Barbara county in 1836. It consists of two parts and is located over the cañon, one-half mile from the sea. The buildings lay east and west, side by side, one having been built, no doubt, several years before the other, and at a time when the Indians were very troublesome, for there are no windows except in the roof, and the walls are very thick. The rooms of the other house are large and planned with a view to elegance of furnishings and every possible comfort known at that time, and they are to-day the acme of refinement and a tribute to the artistic appreciation of the owner. In the days of the missions one small room used to be occupied by a priest. The lawns are a perfect forest of flowers, cacti and giant oak trees, and water is piped from Dos Pueblos.

Before his health failed Mr. Williams was known throughout the country as an exceptionally capable lumber merchant, and in his particular line was without a rival. He was beyond all else a man guided by the highest morality and honesty. He never allowed liquor to be sold on his premises. In politics he was an ardent Republican. A great lover of dogs and horses, he spent a great deal of time in their raising, and appreciated their intelligence and comradeship. He was also a breeder of Shetland ponies, a ready demand being found for their sale, as his breed was a fine one. The ponies still continue to graze in the pastures of this ideal Southern home, and only recently Mrs. Williams shipped a car-load east.

Though in perfect sympathy with her husband's plans, it is of course not possible for her to carry them to fruition, although Mrs. Williams is straining every effort to do so. She seems to see a future of prosperity for Naples, as already many people of wealth and national reputations have purchased lots, among others being the actress, Mrs. Langtry. As a tribute to the memory of her husband, Mrs. Williams is erecting on the town site of Naples a beautiful stone church, overlooking the cañon, and a little back from the sea. Here will be a vault to serve as a last resting place for the companion of her childhood and of later years. Everything that money can buy to beautify the temple is unstintingly purchased. Emblematical of his tastes and characteristics, it is to a marked degree. The corners of belfry are Gargoiles representing mountain lions. The head of a dog is on each side of vault door. The inscription for the door of the church is as follows: "This church is erected to the glory of God and His Son Jesus Christ, and in memory of the founder of Naples, John H. Williams." Mrs. Williams is a delightful and amiable woman; a good manager and financier, and no one is more honored, or holds a more abiding place in the hearts of friends and associates.

P. Howe

REV. PATRICK HAWE. In the economy of creation no good deed is ever lost, though its fruition may be long delayed. About 1770 Father Junipero Serra, when on his trip north, looking for the bay of Monterey, passed very near the present site of Santa Monica, and, with his men, camped under an old sycamore tree that still stands near the grounds of the Soldiers' Home. The location was described by him as being about a league from the sea. As these Roman Catholic missionaries beheld the beauty of the location and surroundings they were unconsciously influenced thereby, and two soldiers, dispatched to search for springs, returned with the statement that they had found water whose crystal drops resembled Santa Monica's tears. It being the 4th of May (Santa Monica's day), Father Serra gave the place the name of the saint and held services appropriate to the occasion under the old sycamore tree. It may not be inappropriate to mention that the water supply of the city now comes from these same springs. The party of explorers proceeded northward along the ocean beach, but soon found that the tide and rocks impeded further progress, so returned and went through what is now called Santa Monica Cañon, thence into the San Fernando valley and on to Ventura and further north.

The seed that was sown by Father Serra on Santa Monica's day so long ago has borne fruit in the ministry of Father Hawe. Within a radius of a few miles of the old sycamore tree, which is preserved with the greatest care, there are now four congregations and an academy. Chief among these is Santa Monica's Church, on Third street, of which Father Hawe has been rector since May, 1886. Near by is the Holy Names' Academy, in charge of the Sisters of the Holy Names, and which is one of the philanthropies most dear to the rector's heart. The first Catholic services at the Soldiers' Home were held by him, and he is now chaplain there. To his efforts is due the erection of a Roman Catholic Church at the Home, the funds for which were provided by the government. In addition, he organized a congregation at The Palms and built St. Augustin's Church, which he named in honor of the son of Santa Monica. The ministering to this congregation, which is seven miles from his home church, forms another duty in his busy, useful life. The fourth congregation to which he ministers is at Ocean Park, one mile from Santa Monica, where he recently started a mission church. In his various congregations he has the usual sodalities and societies, to all of which he gives his aid and influence, believing them to be most powerful auxiliaries in promoting the usefulness of the church.

At the home farm of his parents, John and Bridget (Feehan) Hawe, in county Kilkenny, Ireland, Patrick Hawe was born in 1847, being one of seven children. Another brother, John, is also a priest, and is now in the diocese of Dubuque, Iowa. When sixteen years of age Patrick was sent to the Classical academy of the Carmelites, from which he was graduated three years later. Following this he took a five-years' course in All Hallows' College, at Dublin, Ireland, where he graduated in 1872 from the department of philosophy and theology. The ordination service consecrating him to the priesthood took place June 24, 1872, at All Hallows', and was in charge of Bishop Whalen, bishop of Bombay, India. Appointed to the Monterey and Los Angeles diocese, he came at once to California. For two months he assisted in the San Bernardino Church, and for a year was connected with San Buena Ventura Church, also for a similar period worked in the San Luis Obispo congregation. The nine following years were spent under Father Adam, V. G., now of Spain, in the Church of the Holy Cross at Santa Cruz. After a year as assistant to Father Villa at Santa Barbara he returned to San Bernardino, taking charge of the work for a year during the absence of the rector. From there he was sent to Anaheim as rector of St. Boniface's, and while there he built the parochial residence. In May, 1886, he was appointed rector of Santa Monica's Church, and at once came to this city, then a town of about nine hundred people. No pastor had ever ministered to the people here, the work having been sustained by visiting priests.

Under his supervision the parochial residence was built, also the Academy of the Holy Names, the latter having been dedicated February 22, 1901. While his numerous congregations leave Father Hawe little time for other matters, yet he finds leisure for an oversight of the academy, and his interest in its success is intense. Realizing the value of educational work in promoting the welfare of the Roman Catholic Church, he deems no sacrifice too great whereby the prosperity of the school may be promoted, and he knows no higher ambition than to minister to its success and to advance the spiritual welfare of his parishioners. June 24, 1902, in Santa Monica, he celebrated the thirtieth anniversary of his ordination. This was made an occasion of much moment by his many friends, parishioners and visiting priests in Southern California.

WILLIAM HENRY LEWIS, M. D. In an early day in the history of America three brothers bearing the family name of Lewis crossed the ocean from Wales and established their homes in the colony of Massachusetts. From one of them descended James Lewis, a farmer, who during the Revolutionary war commanded a company of patriots as their captain. His son, William C., who for twenty-five years was sheriff of Middlesex county, died in 1861, leaving an only child, William Henry, born of his marriage to Emeline A. Bellows; the latter was a native of Vermont, of an old family there, and died in New Jersey. Their son was born in Groton, Mass., November 30, 1840. When only thirteen years of age he left home to make his own way in the world. Going to New London, Wis., he worked there for two years. On his return to Massachusetts he joined an uncle, who was a physician at Roxbury, and under his preceptorship he gained his primary knowledge of the science of medicine. Later he matriculated in the Harvard Medical College, but soon afterward went to the Jefferson Medical College, in Philadelphia. During the Civil war he received from the governor of Pennsylvania an appointment as assistant surgeon in George Street hospital, where he remained for more than two years, holding meantime the rank of captain in the army. On resigning the position he entered Bellevue Hospital Medical College, from which he was graduated in 1865, with the degree of M. D.

Opening an office in Boston, Dr. Lewis carried on a general practice there for eight years. In 1873 he established his office in the Fifth Avenue hotel, where he remained for five years, meantime building up a practice among a wealthy and aristocratic class of citizens, to whom his skill commended him. Finally, owing to failure of health, he gave up his practice and went to Cold Valley, W. Va., where he remained for three years. On regaining his strength, he established an office in Newton, N. J., where he was city physician, and for fifteen years conducted an important practice. After spending three years in Newark, N. J., he spent eight months in Europe, traveling through England and France, and studying the methods employed in the leading clinics of the old world. With the knowledge acquired by contact with the greatest physicians in the world, he returned to the United States to resume the practice of his profession. He visited various cities with a view to locating, and finally established his home in Santa Barbara, which subsequent experience has convinced him possesses the finest climate in the world. It was with a view to enjoying this climate, as well as the beautiful scenery, that he erected a residence especially adapted for outdoor life and for providing shelter yet giving an abundance of light and fresh air. It had not been his intention at first to engage in practice, but gradually he drifted back to the professional work that had formerly engrossed his attention and in June, 1901, he opened an office at No. 1113 State street, his present location.

In political views Dr. Lewis is a Democrat of the old-line type, a firm believer in the gold standard as best adapted to the commercial and financial development of our nation. While in New York City he was made a Mason and subsequently was raised to the chapter degree. In religion he is an Episcopalian. His first wife, Serene Buffington, was born in Boston and died there, leaving four children, namely: Mrs. Corinna Dinsmore, of Cincinnati, Ohio; Ernst, who is engaged in the real-estate business in Boston, Mass.; Stewart, who graduated from the University of the City of New York with the degree of M. D., and is now a popular physician of Brooklyn, N. Y.; and Gerald, who is with his father. The second marriage of Dr. Lewis took place in New Jersey and united him with Olivia P. Woodford, who was born at Tarrytown on the Hudson. Dr. and Mrs. Lewis have many friends among the most cultured and refined people of their home city.

NATHANIEL STEWART. The sheriff of Santa Barbara county is a member of one of the pioneer families of the west. His father, Archimedes Stewart, a native of Indiana, was a son of John Stewart, of eastern birth, who crossed the plains with his family in 1846, making the trip with oxen as motive power. Becoming the earliest settler at Corvallis, Benton county, Ore., he engaged in raising stock and general products there. In 1870 he leased his ranch and removed to the Willow creek country, in the eastern part of that state, where his stock operations were extensively and successfully conducted. Later he returned to Corvallis, and there he died when ninety-two years of age. The life of his son, Archimedes, was in many respects similar to his own, although he added mining interests to the cattle business. His death occurred, as the result of exposure, when he was fifty-seven years of age. He had married Matilda Grimsley who was born in Ohio, and in 1846 came to Oregon with her father, John Grimsley, a farmer, who died at eighty-eight years. Mrs. Matilda Stewart died when in middle life, leaving four children. Only two survive, our subject's brother being Granville, an expert telegraph operator, who for years acted as manager in various western towns, and is now with the Sunset Telephone Company at San Francisco.

At Corvallis, Ore., where he was born May 15, 1853, Nathaniel Stewart received his education in the public schools and Agricultural College, also the Episcopal Seminary. In 1873 he began ranching near Yreka, Cal., and was there at the time of the Modoc war. When twenty-one years of age he attended the National Business College at Portland, Ore., from which he was graduated in 1874. Taking up telegraphy, he was employed as operator at Yreka, Cal., next at Callahan's Ranch. In addition to representing the Western Union, he also acted as agent for the Wells-Fargo Express Company. In the fall of 1876 he went to Los Angeles as an operator in the Western Union office. His residence in Santa Barbara county dates from April, 1877, when he came to Lompoc as telegraph operator, and here also he was clerk and bookkeeper for J. Rudolph & Co. for three years, and also became interested in the butcher business. In 1881, with a partner, he bought a ranch, and for seven years the two men continued together, meantime buying two other ranches and acquiring altogether three thousand acres. The partnership was dissolved in 1888, and on the division of the property Mr. Stewart acquired the Stevens ranch of eighteen hundred acres which he still owns and which is one of the valuable ranches of the county. Besides conducting this property, he carried on a meat business in Lompoc until 1897, when he sold out.

On the Republican ticket, in 1898, Mr. Stewart was the nominee for county sheriff. The result was a tie, which necessitated a special election. At that time, December 13, he was given a majority of one hundred and forty-seven votes, and in January, 1899, took the oath of office, since which time he has devoted his attention to the duties of his responsible position. On assuming his duties, he moved his family from Lompoc and has since made his home in Santa Barbara. His marriage took place in Lompoc and united him with Mary E. Reed, who was born in Santa Clara county, Cal. Her father, John Reed, was a pioneer of Santa Clara county, of which he acted as county surveyor. Later he held a similar position in Santa Barbara county, where he died. The children of

Mr. and Mrs. Stewart are named as follows: Jessie P., wife of Dr. Stinson, of Santa Barbara; Horace J., a member of the California National Guard, and now employed in the Santa Barbara postoffice; Elsie L., Alma H. and Eva.

During his residence in Lompoc Mr. Stewart was for seven years a member of the board of education and its clerk. He also acted as a city trustee and was serving as mayor at the time of his election to the sheriff's office, when he resigned. His identification with the Republican party has always been close, and at one time he was a member of the county central committee. Fraternally he is connected with the Uniform Rank, K. of P., Woodmen of the World, Benevolent Protective Order of Elks (of which local lodge he is a charter member) and the Ancient Order of United Workmen.

PAUL O. TIETZEN. One of the solid financial institutions of Santa Barbara county is the Bank of Santa Maria, which owes its origin and incorporation in 1890 to the far-sighted ability of Paul O. Tietzen, who has since been its manager. The bank has a capital stock of $100,000, of which $67,000 is paid in. The officers are: William L. Adams, president, and J. F. Goodwin, cashier.

No man in Santa Maria has more thoroughly assimilated American methods and enterprise than has Mr. Tietzen. As his name implies, he is of German nationality, and was born in West Prussia, north Germany, March 20, 1852. His parents, Julius and Adelaide (Elsner) Tietzen, were born and spent their entire lives in the empire, the death of the former having occurred in the spring of 1900. Like the average youth of well-to-do parents, Paul O. received a practical public school education, supplemented by a collegiate training. His first departure from his native shores was as a sailor, in company with his uncle, and during the two years which he spent before the mast he visited England, South America, China, West Indies and the Sandwich Islands, gathering together a great deal of useful information, of incalculable benefit in his later years. After spending some time in New York he came to California in 1870 and became identified with several different firms in San Francisco, and for a short time lived in Prescott, Ariz. Since coming to Santa Maria in 1890 he has been prominent in all of the principal undertakings of the town, and has, besides town real-estate, a fine stock and fruit ranch in the country.

In Guadaloupe, in 1884, Mr. Tietzen married Margaret McHenry, and of this union there are three children, Ida, Hazel and Herbert. The family reside in a palatial home on Broadway, wherein are to be found all manner of modern conveniences, and where hospitality is unstintingly extended. Fraternally Mr. Tietzen is a master Mason at Santa Maria, and he is a charter member of the Independent Order of Foresters. He is esteemed by all who know him, and occupies a prominent place as a citizen of irreproachable integrity and sound commercial astuteness.

COL. WILLIAM W. HOLLISTER. No name is more closely interwoven with the pioneer history of Southern California than that of William Wells Hollister, whose mature years were intimately associated with the development of this region. The second son of John and Philena (Hubbard) Hollister, he was born in Licking county, Ohio, January 12, 1818. Early in 1802 his father had migrated from New England to Ohio and there he remained until his death, at which time his son, William W., succeeded to the management of the estate of one thousand acres. His unusual ability was manifest at this early period, for he soon doubled the area of the estate and also engaged in merchandising. During the summer of 1852 he started across the plains, arriving at San José, Cal., October 3. Deciding at once that here he was offered a fine field for the sheep business, he returned to Ohio, and in the spring of 1853, with fifty men, driving six thousand graded sheep, was again en route to the far west. On this journey he was accompanied by his brother Hubbard and his sister, Mrs. Lucy A. Brown, the latter a woman of exceptional ability and noble character, to whose influence the Colonel was largely indebted for his success. She died April 30, 1893, aged seventy-nine years; Hubbard Hollister, who also possessed a character in many respects ideal, died January 5, 1873, at the age of fifty-three years. There was an older brother, Albert G., who was the equal of the others in every respect, and who died April 24, 1891, aged seventy-nine.

The party drove their sheep from St. Joseph, Mo., to Salt Lake, thence via the Mormon road to San Bernardino, Cal., reaching the latter point with less than one-fourth the original number of sheep. However, the grass, which was growing green and fresh, soon restored strength to the remainder of the flock, and Monterey county was reached without further loss. At San Juan Colonel Hollister became associated with Flint, Bixby & Co., which purchased the famous San Justo ranch and other properties until they became perhaps the largest land holders on the Pacific coast. The San Justo ranch was subdivided and sold to a colony of settlers, it being Colonel Hollister's desire to interest permanent settlers in this region. The colony of Lompoc was also formed through his liberality. Soon after the sale of the San Justo ranch, he settled in Santa Barbara, and from that time until his death he was deeply interested in the development of the city. It is said that he expended $500,000 in and around the city. Every worthy enterprise was sure of his generous assistance. The erection of the Arlington house was rendered possible by his liberality. Santa Barbara College was largely indebted to him. Odd Fellows Hall and Odd Fellows free library received liberal gifts from him. In fact, there was no enterprise of his day that lacked his generous support.

Meantime Colonel Hollister retained large landed and stock interests. His estate, which was named Glen Annie, in honor of his wife, contained 2,750 acres of land. From the wide verandas of his home he could overlook a plantation containing 2,000 orange and lemon trees in bearing condition; 30,000 almond trees, 500 limes, 350 plums, 200 peaches, besides other fruits. In partnership with T. B. Dibblee, he was the owner of San Julian rancho, in the western part of Santa Barbara county, comprising the ranches of San Julian, Salsipuedes, Espada, Santa Anita, Gaviota and Las Cruces. Altogether, the property embraced 100,000 acres, and carried about 60,000 head of sheep and 500 cattle, the annual sales of which aggregated $125,000. The Gaviota wharf is a part of this property, although it is also used for the shipment of produce from the Santa Ynez valley. Built by Hollister & Dibblee in 1875, it is 1,000 feet long, and accommodates a large business, principally in live stock, wool, general merchandise, sacked grain, ranch produce and lumber.

One of Colonel Hollister's principal traits was his kindness to the unfortunate. In him the needy always had a friend. Many a successful man owes his start in life to the Colonel's kindness and timely aid. No one to whom he was known but held him in the highest esteem, and his death, August 6, 1886, was mourned as a public loss. One of those by whom he was most deeply mourned was his friend, J. W. Cooper. Between these two there had been a Damon and Pythias affection from the time they first met, July 1, 1861, at the Zaca rancho. Many beautiful tributes were paid Colonel Hollister by those who had been closely linked to him by ties of closest friendship, but none was more heartfelt than the tribute given by Mr. Cooper on one occasion, when several citizens were speaking of what Colonel Hollister had been to Santa Barbara and its people. For a few moments he was silent, then said: "One day Jehovah said to the angels ministering about the Throne of Thrones: 'This is Sunday on earth, a hallowed day. I will use it by creating a grand object. I will make a good man.' Then all the angels applauded the words and said: 'Make him, Almighty Father, the perfect man, and let us each add the best element of ourselves.' And so, one by one, they brought in turn truth, honesty, generosity, loyalty, honor, integrity, industry, cheerfulness, unselfishness, devotion and mercy, reserving to the Son to add that most precious of all gifts, love for one's fellow-man. Then God took these gifts and all day long modeled and worked as only Omnipotence can work, and in the evening said to all who dwelt in heaven's courts: 'I have done a good work. I have made a good man. But I shall never make another, the ingredients are altogether too precious and scarce. Now, ye angels, take this man to earth and watch over him in all his career.' It was done, and in this way earth received Col. W. W. Hollister."

Geo. P. McLean

GEORGE P. McLAIN. The name of George P. McLain has for many years been associated with various lines of activity in Los Angeles, and as one of the early settlers he has wisely discerned and ministered to the needs of the city of his adoption. Through his veins flows the blood of a noble and patriotic ancestry, best illustrated by the services of the paternal great-grandfather, who was a commanding officer in the war of the Revolution. The first settlers bearing the name in America presumably cast their lot with the Old Dominion state, for there the grandfather, James, was born, in Fredericksburg, and like his father was a soldier, bearing his part of the brunt in the war of 1812, as a sergeant. He was a planter and squire, or attorney, at Fredericksburg, where he spent his entire life as a prominent member of the community. James S. McLain, the father of George P., was born near Fredericksburg, and practiced law in Virginia, and afterwards in Chillicothe, Ohio, where he was county judge. He later settled in Peru, La Salle county, Ill., where he was justice of the peace, and after removing to Duquoin, Perry county, Ill., he continued to practice law, and was judge of the county. He was a man of forceful character and a recognized broad influence in every locality where he lived, and his death, at the age of sixty-eight years, left a void not easily filled in the community. He was prominent in fraternal circles, notably in the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and he was devoted to the interests of the Republican party from Fremont's time.

On the maternal side also Mr. McLain is descended from Revolutionary stock, for his mother, formerly Sarah Graham Luckett, was a granddaughter of Col. Noland Luckett, a planter of Virginia, and a colonel under Washington during the struggle for colonial freedom. His was an unfortunate fate, as he was captured by the British and suffered long imprisonment on the prison ship in New York harbor. Mrs. McLain, who was born in Virginia, was a daughter of Otho Luckett, a native of Virginia, a planter, and a brave soldier in the war of 1812. Mrs. McLain, who died in Los Angeles, was the mother of nine children, two of whom served in the Civil war in an Illinois regiment, George P. being the second youngest in the family and the only one in California. Although born in Fredericksburg, Va., August 26, 1847, George P. McLain was reared in Peru, Ill., whither his father had removed, and he also attended the schools of Illinois, including the State Normal at Bloomington. His youth was practically uneventful until the breaking out of the Civil war, and in September of 1863 he enlisted in Company L, Sixteenth Illinois Cavalry, at Springfield, and saw service in Kentucky and Tennessee. After being mustered out, at Nashville, Tenn., August 27, 1865, he returned to Illinois, but had in the mean time formulated plans which were to be carried out remote from his former surroundings. In the spring of 1866 he started across the plains with four yoke of oxen from St. Joe, freighting via the Platte river to Salt Lake City and thence to Helena, Mont. After spending the winter he returned to Salt Lake City overland with horse teams, but again started overland through Nevada and Colorado, and finally reached Prescott, Ariz., from where he journeyed to Los Angeles, Cal., reaching this city January 2, 1867.

As a means of livelihood in Los Angeles, Mr. McLain engaged as a machinist for Perry & Woodward, and at the end of three years became foreman of the lumber mill of Griffith & Lynch, a position maintained for twelve years. He was then appointed engineer in charge of the fire department of Los Angeles, and started the first engine in Company 1, the organization of which was really due to Mr. McLain's appreciation of its necessity, and his work to accomplish the desired end. For several years he labored faithfully to perfect the department, but when the subject of money consideration changed the character of the enterprise he withdrew his assistance, believing that his services were best directed to other channels. From then until the present time he has turned his best efforts in the direction of politics, and has upheld in no casual manner the best interests of the Republican party. Under the administration of Sheriff A. T. Currier he served as deputy sheriff for two years, after which he became associated with Mr. Lehman as manager of the Grand Opera House, now the Orpheum. In 1891, on account of the death of his wife, he sold his interest in the opera house, and had in the mean time become interested in the bill posting business, which he thenceforth continued as the City Bill Posting Company.

In January of 1889 Mr. McLain was elected councilman from the second ward, and held the office of chairman of the finance committee for one term. The council appointed him a member of the board of fire commissioners for two terms, or four years, and he was for one term a member of the police commission. In 1900 he was elected councilman from the second ward by a good majority, and in January of 1901 took the oath of office. During his exemplary service he has been chairman of the gas and light committee, chairman of the supply committee, member of the board of public works, and member of the new water supply committee. Interspersed through this public service has been numerous attendance at state and county conventions, in all of which Mr. McLain has represented his locality in a most intelligent and tactful manner. He was a member of the executive committee of the state central committee for one term and of the executive committee of the county committee. Fraternally Mr. McLain is identified with the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, of which he was treasurer for thirteen years and re-elected in March, 1902. He is also connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, which he joined in Los Angeles, and the Independent Order of Foresters. He is a member of the Soldiers and Sailors' Republican League, the California Chapter, Sons of the Revolution, and the Los Angeles Pioneers. For many years he was a director in the Union League Club, and is prominent in the work of St. Paul's Episcopal Church.

In Los Angeles Mr. McLain married Guadalupe Billderain, who was born in Los Angeles, a daughter of Don Refugia Billderain, a native of Spain, and an early settler in Mexico. Mrs. McLain, who died in Los Angeles in 1891, was the mother of two children, George B. and Olympia Byrd. Mr. McLain is a man of large impulse and great common sense, and his services in the interests of Los Angeles are of a nature to be forever connected with its greatest prosperity.

HON. HENRY G. WEYSE. The name of Weyse is connected with the early history of Los Angeles, the founder of the family in this city having been Julius G. Weyse, a native of the city of Schleiz Reuss, Germany, and a descendant of an old Saxon family whose history is traced back to the Thirty Years' war. His father, Judge George G. Weyse, was an eminent jurist and acted as privy counsel to the count, besides representing his principality in all the negotiations during and occasioned by the Napoleonic wars. The pressure of professional cares and anxieties proved too great a strain for him, and overwork caused his death.

The natural gifts of Julius G. Weyse were trained and broadened by his thorough education, covering almost fifteen years in colleges and universities in his native land. Through this training under the best educators of Germany he acquired a ripeness of thought as unusual as it was interesting. A gift of poetic imagery had been one of his endowments, and in the expression of beautiful thoughts in appropriate verse he won the applause of his teachers. During youth he had no intention of leaving his home land, but the part he took in the republican movement for the re-establishment of the German empire rendered his continuance there unsafe, and so he crossed the ocean to America about 1836. After visiting various cities in the east, and being made a Mason in Cincinnati, he engaged in educational work at Jefferson City, Mo. Meanwhile his thoughts ever turned fondly toward his native shores, and in 1846 he returned, in time to take part in the revolution of two years later. Again the cause to which he was attached met with defeat and again he was obliged to leave the country.

With others, in October of 1850 Julius G. Weyse engaged the barque McDowd, which rounded Cape Horn and anchored in San Francisco in March, 1851. For a time he mined in Tuolumne county, later engaged in the newspaper business in San Francisco. As early as 1852 he came as far south as San Bernardino, and four years later he settled in Los Angeles, where he bought twenty acres (now the corner of San Pedro and Eighth streets). This property he set out in a vineyard, and on it he made his home until he died in 1863. Much of his time during his last years was given to developing the grape industry in Southern California, and he was particularly interested in the founding and developing of Anaheim. He was also an organizer of the Los Angeles Vineyard Company. While in Missouri he served as captain of a company in the state militia.

The marriage of Julius G. Weyse united him with Caroline A. Lange, who was born at Apenrade, Schleswig-Holstein, and came to San Francisco in 1855. Her death occurred at the Los Angeles homestead in 1887. Three sons were born of this union, the eldest of whom, Otto, a merchant, died in San Francisco in 1893. The second son, Rudolph G., was born in Los Angeles in 1860, and for years has been a business man of this city. October 25, 1890, he married Ada Frances Barrows, a daughter of H. D. Barrows by his marriage to Mrs. Mary Alice Workman. The third son, Henry Guenther Weyse, was born at the Los Angeles homestead in 1863, and, with his brothers, was sent to Gera, Germany, to be educated. Afterward he entered Harvard College, from which he was graduated in 1888, with the degree of LL. B. Since then he has been engaged in the practice of law at Los Angeles, having his office in the Temple block, while he makes his home at Santa Monica by the sea. October 2, 1888, he was united in marriage with Alice Wolfskill Barrows, daughter of H. D. Barrows by his marriage to Juanita Wolfskill, daughter of that well-known pioneer, William Wolfskill, one of the very first Americans to settle in Los Angeles, having arrived here in February, 1831. The only child of Mr. and Mrs. Weyse is a daughter, Mary Alice.

J. C. Bainbridge, M.D.

The abilities of Mr. Weyse were recognized in his election, in 1894, as representative of the seventieth legislative district in the state legislative assembly, where he served during the session of 1895. Since then he has given his attention unreservedly to professional work, in which, through his thorough knowledge of the German language, he is especially qualified to render satisfactory service in behalf of clients of that nationality; while at the same time his splendid English education and comprehensive study of the law enable him to master the intricacies of all cases that are submitted to his judgment and placed under his control.

J. C. BAINBRIDGE, M. D. In a very early day the Bainbridge family came from England and settled in Virginia, where occurred the birth of Dr. Bainbridge's great-grandfather, a private soldier in the Revolution and a major in the war of 1812. He had a brother, Commodore William Bainbridge, who was one of the most conspicuous figures in the naval circles of America during the early part of the nineteenth century. The Doctor's grandfather, E. B., was born near Lexington, Ky., in 1804, and in young manhood removed to Wisconsin, but later settled in St. Louis, Mo., and finally returned to spend his last days at Lexington near the scenes of his childhood. His son, Dr. J. A. Bainbridge, was born in Wisconsin and in 1860 graduated from the Cincinnati Eclectic Medical College, after which he practiced in Troy, Mo., later going to St. Louis. In 1874 he removed to Stockton, Cal., where he conducted professional work some years. At this writing he is a physician in Lathrop and also owns a large grain ranch near that place. Fraternally he is a Mason.

The marriage of Dr. J. A. Bainbridge united him with Mary E. Herold, who was born in Missouri and died in California in 1885. Her father, Thomas Herold, a native of Wurtemberg, Germany, and a graduate in medicine from the University of Wurtemberg, engaged in practice in New Orleans, La., but after a time became interested in business pursuits and for years was extensively engaged in the manufacture of tobacco. With his sons, he started the tobacco factory that is now owned by Drummond & Co., and John Drummond, of this firm, was once employed by W. G. Herold & Co. Besides his other interests, Dr. Herold owned considerable farm property and had boats on the Mississippi. He died on one of his farms in Lincoln county, Mo. In the family of Dr. J. A. Bainbridge were five sons and five daughters, of whom four sons and four daughters attained maturity. Three of the daughters are married. The oldest son, E. D., resides on a ranch in San Joaquin county; B. M. is principal of the Lathrop school; and C. E., a graduate of the California Medical College and of the New York Polyclinic, is now a physician in Sacramento, Cal.

The third in the family in order of birth was J. C. Bainbridge, who was born near St. Louis, Mo., November 23, 1862. His education was conducted in the public schools of Lincoln county, Mo., and the high school of Stockton, Cal., from which he was graduated in 1878. The following year he completed the course in the Stockton Business College and Normal School. In this institution he remained as professor of mathematics, meantime studying medicine under his father. In 1883 he entered the California Medical College of San Francisco, from which he received the degree of M. D. in 1886. The three ensuing years were spent as principal of a school in Sacramento. From 1889 to 1891 he traveled in England, Scotland and other European countries, also visited Buenos Ayres and Chile in South America, returning to San Francisco via New Orleans. Soon afterward he went to Australia, this trip being undertaken for his health, as was also the preceding. From Australia he went to Yokohama via Honolulu, and later sailed on the steamer Queen for Alaska. On the return trip he spent six months in British Columbia.

On his return to San Francisco he became superintendent of instruction at Heald's Business College, where he remained from 1891 until January, 1894. He resigned to re-enter the California Medical College and later studied for almost a year in the New York Polyclinic, taking a special course in diseases of the eye, ear, nose and throat. He then began the practice of medicine in San Francisco. From 1894 until 1899 he had charge of the eye and ear clinic in the California Medical College, holding the position until, hoping that the change of climate would benefit his wife's health, he came to Santa Barbara, since which time he has acquired an extensive practice. One of the special attractions of his office is an X-ray machine, which is the only instrument of the kind in Santa Barbara. He also has special apparatus for eye, ear, nose and throat work. In addition to his private practice, he is physician for the two local courts of Foresters of America, surgeon for the Native Sons and also the Native Daughters of the Golden West, examining physician for the Woodmen of the World, the Fraternal Brotherhood, United Moderns and Knights of Pythias, Uniform Rank, in which various organizations he is a member. For four years he was secretary of the Eclectic Medical Society of California, and is still connected with the San Francisco County Society of Physicians and Surgeons. Various articles have appeared over his signature in prominent medical journals, and a number of these have been copied by professional papers in Vienna and Berlin, where the theories advanced and the conclusions proved have attracted attention from specialists of world-wide fame. Since coming to Santa Barbara he has been initiated into Masonry and is now a member of the local blue lodge and chapter. He is also associated with the Knights of Pythias here and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows in San Francisco. In politics he favors Democratic principles.

During his residence in San Francisco Dr. Bainbridge married Miss Dora A. Waters, who was born in California, and is a member of Alta Parlor, Native Daughters of the Golden West. The two children born of this union are deceased. Dr. and Mrs. Bainbridge are connected with the Episcopal Church and contribute to religious and philanthropic movements. The father of Mrs. Bainbridge, Abraham Waters, was born in England and accompanied his parents to the United States, settling in Richmond, Ill., where he grew to maturity. In early manhood he came to California and here followed the occupation of mineral expert until his death, by drowning, at the age of forty-seven years. In this state he married Susan Pedler, who was born in Halifax, Nova Scotia, and now resides in San Francisco.

HON. JOHN S. COLLINS. At the time of its establishment in 1887 the banking establishment of William Collins & Sons was not only one of the most imposing buildings in Ventura county, but the volume of business conducted behind its doors was proof of its substantial standing in the financial world of California. It had a paid-up capital of $100,000 all owned by the firm, the officers of the institution being William Collins, president; D. E. Collins, vice-president; and J. S. Collins, cashier. The rise of this solid commercial undertaking was the signal for an era of uninterrupted prosperity, and at the present time they do the largest banking business in Ventura county. William Collins, the original president of the company, was one of the sterling pioneers of California, and his death in 1894 removed a man well known for his fine personal attributes, and of prominence because of his ability as a landscape gardener. He was born in Perthshire, Scotland, his father being also a native of that shire, and an agriculturist by occupation. In his youth he learned the art of landscape gardening, and was thus employed in his native land for a number of years. In 1855 he brought his family to Illinois, and at Nashville, Washington county, bought a claim in the forest which he partially improved, but eventually again turned his attention to gardening. In 1860 he located in Carthage, Mo., but when the war devastated the land he lost all that he had, and in 1864 made arrangements to cross the plains to California. Himself and family were among thirty others who started out with ox and mule teams, taking the route through Omaha, Idaho, Washington and Oregon, their course made memorable by the dangers of Indian attack on the North Platte river.

After a year's residence in Salem, Ore., they located in Oakland, Cal., where Mr. Collins had the management of the garden arrangement of Mount View cemetery, and also became superintendent of the park of two hundred acres. He creditably maintained his responsible positions for twenty-five years, until the time of his death. He was superintendent of and owned a half interest in the Amador marble works, with quarries at Amador and Rockland. He was a Master Mason and a Republican, and was chairman of the Republican committee of Alameda county. He married Isabelle Walker, who was born in Montrose, Scotland, and died in Oakland in 1876. There were three sons and one daughter in the family, of whom J. S. is the oldest. The daughter, Mrs. Kate Flint, is a resident of Ventura; D. E. is president of the California Bank of Oakland, and William died at the age of seventeen, in Ventura.

John S. Collins was born in Perthshire, Scotland, May 21, 1849, and was educated in the public schools of Iowa and California, and studied at the California Military Academy, in Oakland. He then entered the University of California and remained until the junior year, when he quit to engage in business, having been elected secretary of the Mount View cemetery, and treasurer of the Amador Marble Company. In 1868 he purchased five hundred and twenty acres of land in Ventura county at $14 an acre, and sold the same after twenty years for $105 per acre. In 1882 he came to Ventura for the second time and became a member of the lumber firm of Saxby & Collins, and upon the death of Mr. Saxby entered the Bank of Ventura, of which he was a stockholder, and occupied the position of teller. Correctly anticipating the need of another bank in the town, in 1887 he established the bank of William Collins & Sons, of which he was cashier. From then until the present time he has been a prominent factor in the development of Ventura, his generosity in promoting all worthy causes, his financial and executive ability, his genial personality and capacity for making and retaining friends, having gained for him an enviable popularity, the foundation of which is embedded in the honest regard of the community.

In 1887 Mr. Collins was elected to the city council, of which he has since been president, and under his capable administration have been effected the most important improvements. Water bonds have been voted and sold, but the abstract title is not yet clear; there is a paid fire department. In 1899 was erected the Collins & Taylor block, than which there is no finer in Ventura county, the dimensions being 50x100 feet, and the material used in construction being pressed brick and granite from the quarries at Rockland. Mr. Collins and his brother, D. E., are still interested in the marble quarries at Amador, and the granite quarries at Rockland. He was made a Mason in Oakland, Cal., and is now affiliated with the Ventura Lodge, No. 214, and with the Chapter and Commandery. In politics a Republican, he is a member of the county central committee, and ex-member of the state central committee. He is a member of the board of trade, president of the Caledonian Club and president of the Street Fair Association.

U. F. Dewall

After coming to Ventura Mr. Collins married Belle Gerry, who was born in Indiana. Of this union there is one child, Belle, who is a graduate of the high school and the wife of Rev. W. G. Mills, of Hueneme. The pleasant home of Mr. Collins is on Poli street.

ULPIANO F. DEL VALLE. The famous Camulos rancho in Ventura is the present home and property of Mr. del Valle, who was born March 2, 1865, in the house where he now resides. The family of which he is a member has a distinctive position among the Spanish aristocracy of California, where it was founded by his grandfather, Antonio del Valle, during the early portion of the nineteenth century. January 22, 1839, Rancho San Francisco was granted to him, containing about eleven thousand five hundred acres of grazing land and three thousand acres of tillable land, the larger part being in Ventura county, although a small portion lay in Los Angeles county. The property now belongs mostly to the estate of H. M. Newhall, of San Francisco. Besides the San Francisco rancho (and at that time included in the same), Antonio del Valle secured the Camulos rancho, a fertile tract of two thousand acres, forty-seven miles northwest of Los Angeles, and in the eastern portion of Ventura county. Upon his death a portion of the estate passed into the hands of his son, Ygnacio, who had come from Mexico in 1825, and who, on acquiring the Camulos, took his family to reside thereon in 1861. From that time improvements have been constantly made, but the picturesque and romantic features of the rancho have been preserved. There occurred the death of the then owner, in March, 1880. Among his five children was Ulpiano F., whose boyhood days were spent on the home ranch and in schools in Los Angeles and San José. After completing his education he clerked for two years in a dry-goods store in Los Angeles, but in 1886 took charge of the estate as manager, himself and brother, R. F. del Valle, an attorney of Los Angeles, being the principal owners. In 1899 he purchased his brother's interest and has since that time been sole proprietor of the estate.

Camulos rancho is a beautiful place. The original reservation has been improved until it is now one of the most productive properties in Ventura county. When the traveler enters the head of the Santa Clara valley, Camulos quickly comes into view. It is situated about two miles above Piru City, and thirty-six miles from the county seat. In altitude it is seven hundred and thirty-three feet above the sea level. There is a postoffice on the ranch and a shipping station for the transportation of produce. The country extending for miles along the Santa Clara river presents a scene of wonderful beauty, full of romantic interest. The family residence, a substantial and spacious adobe house, is almost hidden from view by foliage of tropical luxuriance. Near by is a private chapel, which is a place of especial interest to visitors. Designed for family prayers, in it a lamp has been kept burning for twenty-six years, and in all that time has never been allowed to be extinguished even for an instant.

The oldest water right and richest soil in the valley are to be found at Camulos. Farming is carried on with irrigation, and in that way valuable products are harvested. Large quantities of citrus and deciduous fruits of the highest grade are here produced, also almonds and general farming products. A noticeable adjunct is a drying room for drying fruits, also extensive fruit yards and a sulphur room. Poultry also claims some attention, and there is a flock of forty peacocks, which are not only beautiful but profitable as well. On the ranch is a black walnut tree beneath whose shade one hundred workers can sit at the tables, cutting and paring the fruit. To the world Camulos is best known as the home of the heroine in Helen Hunt Jackson's famous work, "Ramona." Subsequent to the publication of this work, visitors at once began to throng to the rancho, to the amazement of the owners, who had yet to learn of the wonderful interest the romance had awakened.

Politically Mr. del Valle is a Democrat and active in his party, which he has represented as a delegate to county and state conventions and as a member of the county central committee. Besides all of his other activities, he has been interested in the breeding of blooded horses, principally running stock, but he has now relinquished that industry for the raising of fine mules for the market, which work he intends hereafter to make a leading feature of his ranch industry. He is also in the hog raising business and sends to the markets an average of six carloads a year. In spite of the many lines in which he is interested and the many enterprises to which he must devote attention, each department receives personal oversight, and a careful supervision is maintained over all.

PAUL CHARLEBOIS. The excellent judgment, common sense and executive ability of Mr. Charlebois have not only won for him a substantial place among the business men of Ventura, but have also elicited well merited recognition as a politician. It is doubtful if anyone could more conscientiously avail himself of opportunities to advance the public welfare than has been forcibly demonstrated during the various administrations of this honored citizen, who is now serving his second term of four years each as sheriff of Ventura county.

Of French descent, Mr. Charlebois was born in Montreal, Canada, December 8, 1855, his grandfather, Joseph, having been brought as a child from the mother country by his parents. The father, also named Paul, was born in the uncultivated regions of the dominion, and during his long life as a farmer never left the scene of his birth, where occurred his death at the age of seventy-two years. He married Emily Legault, a native of Canada, whose father was a French Canadian. While yet a youth of tender years Paul Charlebois, the younger, lost his mother by death, and when twelve years old began to be practically independent of his father's support. At Ogdensburg, St. Lawrence county, N. Y., he found employment in a mercantile establishment as errand boy, and remained with the same firm for nearly eight years. He also during his stay in New York went on the lakes as freight clerk, and in this capacity visited Buffalo, Cleveland, Detroit, Milwaukee and Chicago. In 1869 he departed for California via the Panama route, and after arriving in San Francisco held a position as clerk in a dry-goods house for two years. Upon removing to Ventura he became identified with the firm of Einstein & Bernheim, and for nearly fifteen years had charge of their hardware and grocery department. He next entered the employ of Leach & Hunt at Ventura, and after nine months bought out the firm. He continued to deal in hardware, tinware, stoves and farm implements until August of 1900, when he disposed of his interests to other parties.

In the fall of 1900 Mr. Charlebois became interested in stockraising, and now has five hundred head of cattle, himself and wife owning about six hundred acres of ranch land. He has a fine home on Chestnut street, and also owns a thirty-acre fruit ranch on the Santa Ana rancho, twelve miles from Ventura, where apricots and prunes are raised.

The political career of Mr. Charlebois began in 1878, when he was elected chairman of the town board and served in this capacity for four years. In 1888 he was elected county treasurer for four years, and in 1894 was elected sheriff, being re-elected after the expiration of his first term of four years. It is needless to say that his administration has met with the approval of those who are best capable of judging of his fitness for the position, and that he has showed an unusual amount of tact, good management and ability to reconcile antagonistic elements. He is variously interested in affairs of the town remote from his business or political interests. Prominent in fraternal circles, he has passed all of the chairs of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and has been district deputy for four years and treasurer of the lodge for sixteen years. He is also a member of Santa Barbara Lodge, No. 613, B. P. O. E.

In 1875 Mr. Charlebois married Agnes Ayers, who was born in Illinois, and came across the plains with her parents and ox-teams when a small child. Her father was a pioneer of Ventura county, and both parents died in the state of their later adoption. The four daughters comprising the family were born in Ventura, and here received their education in the public schools. They are: Blanche, Celia, Emma and Florence.

CAPT. A. W. BROWNE. In these days of anxiety to secure official recognition and of misused confidence in furtherance of personal gain, it is refreshing to know of one who has so utilized the trust imposed in him as to stand in the white light of publicity with an untarnished record. It is therefore a matter of pride with his fellow-townsmen that Captain Browne has not only advanced his own credit but also that of the community which, as a public officer for many years and at present county auditor and recorder, he so conscientiously guards. In the history of Ventura it is doubtful if any occupying the high places within the gift of the people have heard so few dissenting voices raised against their administration.

A resident of Ventura since 1875, Captain Browne came here from Philadelphia, Pa., where he was born February 9, 1852. In formulating his plans for the future his early aspirations were broadened by the admiration which he entertained for his father, N. B. Browne, who was born in Reading, Pa., in 1818, and eventually became identified with the highest professional, governmental, commercial and political life of the Quaker city. A profound exponent of the law, he rapidly arose to posts justified by his administrative ability, and held positions requiring the most exemplary honor and tactful management. He represented his district in the legislature, and under the presidential administration of Abraham Lincoln was postmaster of Philadelphia, and assistant sub-treasurer. After the war he was one of the foremost organizers of the Fidelity Insurance Trust and Safety Deposit Company of Philadelphia, the second company of the kind ever incorporated, and of which he was the first president, holding the position until his death in 1876. He was president of the Union League Club of Philadelphia, and president of the Fairmount Park Commission for many years, and it was during his term of office that they acquired the large tract of land south of the river on George's Hill. He came of an old Pennsylvania family who were Democratic in their political affiliations, but with the breaking out of the Civil war he departed from long cherished traditions and became a strong Union man. Fraternally he was a Mason. When a young man he married Mary Jane Kendall, who was of English descent and born in Reading, Pa. Mrs. Browne, who died in Philadelphia when her third child, A. W., was four years of age, was the mother of four children, all of whom attained to maturity.

Captain Browne was educated at Sanders Institute, a military school in Philadelphia, and at Williston Seminary, East Hampton, Mass. His first effort at earning a livelihood was with the Fidelity Insurance Trust and Safety Deposit Company, with which he remained for five years, and during that time rose from the position of errand boy to that of receiving teller. This position was resigned in the fall of 1873, and the same year he came to Ventura county and bought sheep from Senator Bard, and engaged in the sheep industry in partnership with Levi Taylor, under the firm name of Browne & Taylor. At times they owned fifteen thousand head, divided into flocks of two thousand each. After disposing of his sheep in 1883, Mr. Browne purchased a ranch of five thousand acres on the ex-mission grant, and engaged in the cattle business until 1887, after which for a year he managed the Anacapa hotel in Ventura, in partnership with Mr. Wagner, the firm name being Wagner & Browne.

The political career of Mr. Browne began in 1888, when he was elected county supervisor of the first district, from the duties of which he resigned to accept a position in the office of the county recorder. In 1888 he became deputy county recorder and auditor, and in April of 1892 was appointed recorder to succeed Recorder Jewett, resigned. At the next election, in 1892, he was elected county auditor and recorder for a two years' term, and in 1894 was elected for a four years' term by a large majority. In 1898 he was elected without opposition, and endorsed by both Democrats and Populists, his term to extend until January of 1903.

When the National Guard of California was formed, in 1892, Mr. Browne became second lieutenant of Company E, Seventh Infantry, N. G. C., and was later raised to the rank of first lieutenant. At the end of five years, when the company was reorganized and changed to Company H, he became its captain. During the Spanish-American war he served from May until December of 1898 as captain of Company

H, Seventh California United States Infantry, under command of Colonel Berry, and after the war retired from the National Guard, after nine years of loyal service. He is well known in fraternal circles, and is associated with the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, at Santa Barbara; the Independent Order of Odd Fellows in Ventura, and the encampment, being captain of the canton and patriarch militant; the Ancient Order of United Workmen, and also the Independent Order of Foresters. He owns a farm of four hundred acres, called the Tierra Rajada Rancho, where general farming and grain raising are conducted. His residence is located on Ventura avenue, Ventura.

Captain Browne married Miss Neotia Rice, a native of Yuba county, and daughter of Peter Rice, of Mansfield, Ohio. Peter Rice came to California during the gold craze, and mined for several years, following which he became a toll road builder in the mountains. He later engaged in farming in Ventura county, where his death occurred. To Captain and Mrs. Browne have been born six children, viz.: Albert O. B., who is junior member of the firm of Lane & Browne, in Ventura; Valeria O., who is a member of the junior class at the high school; Nathaniel B., who is a sophomore in the high school; S. Harry, Mary K. and Ruth E.

REV. SHERLOCK BRISTOL was born at Cheshire, Conn., June 5, 1815. Gideon Bristol, his father, was a native of Connecticut, as was also the grandfather, who bore the same name. The latter was a soldier in the Revolutionary war, spending six years in the colonial army and being one of the company chosen to receive the British arms at the final surrender at Yorktown. This company was composed of large men. His ancestors were of English extraction and were pioneers in the Connecticut colony, one of the family being a prominent judge in New Haven. Our subject was born on the same farm as were his father, grandfather and great-grandfather, the land being originally taken by his great-great-grandfather, a native of England. His early life was passed on the homestead, and in the common schools he received his primary education. At the age of sixteen years he attended the Episcopal Academy, and took so much interest in educational pursuits that his part of his father's estate was devoted to his education, he supporting himself meanwhile. In 1835 he graduated from Phillips Academy, Andover, Mass., in 1839 from Oberlin College, and from the Theological Seminary in 1842, teaching meanwhile to support himself.

In 1841 Mr. Bristol was ordained as a minister at Mansfield, Ohio. For some time before his graduation he engaged in evangelistic work, and soon after graduating he accepted a call to Franklin, Ohio. In 1845 he resigned to accept the appointment as financial agent of Oberlin College. Largely through his earnest efforts the college was again placed on a firm financial basis. In 1848 he resigned this position to accept a call to the Second Congregational Church at Fitchburg, Mass., and there remained until 1850, when he was called to the pastorate of Sullivan Street Congregational Church in New York City. At this place he only remained one year, on account of ill health. After a few weeks of rest he received a call from the Free Church of Andover, Mass., which congregation he organized in 1846, and which is now one of the largest of that place. After one year's earnest work at that place, his health again failing him and his physician advising him to give up his profession, he came to California in 1852. The first year of his sojourn here he devoted to hard labor in the mines, and in this way recovered his health. With renewed strength the longing for his work came upon him, and he returned to the east about 1853 and bought a farm near Green Lake, Wis., and while working this farm organized churches at the following places: Dartford, Green Lake and Brandon. For about ten years he served as pastor of these three churches, preaching three times each Sunday, and doing evangelistic work during the winter.

In 1862 Mr. Bristol was again obliged to give up preaching on account of his health. A company of emigrants and prospectors being formed about this time to go to Oregon, he concluded to join them, and they made him the captain of the company. On account of the great danger from Indian outbreaks to travelers across the plains, this company consolidated with several others, and he was unanimously chosen as captain of the consolidated companies. For six weary months they toiled across the plains, and at last safely arrived at Auburn, Ore., about September 1, 1862, having left Ripon, Wis., in March of that year. While stopping for a short time at that place the news of the great discoveries of gold in Idaho reached them, and with many others they at once started for the gold fields. Idaho City was their next stopping place, where for six months they worked in the mines. In the fall of 1863 he went into the Boise Valley, among the Indians, leading a few men, and took up land, soon after founding Boise City, now the capital of Idaho, which was located on his land, and of which he was the principal owner. Many of the streets of Boise City were named by him. A company of United States Cavalry, under Colonel Morey, was sent out in 1864 to build a fort within fifty miles of the mouth of the Boise, and in consequence of his services they exempted from their claims the farm on which he had located, and built the fort adjoining same.

At the close of 1864, his health being fully restored, Mr. Bristol abandoned the frontier and returned to his chosen profession in Wisconsin, where he labored for two years, when he was again compelled to resign his labors, on account of his health. In the fall of 1867 he came to California via the isthmus, and from San Francisco soon made his way to the Santa Clara valley. In the spring of 1868 he bought two hundred acres on the bank of the river, a portion of the Santa Paula y Saticoy rancho, and since that time has devoted his attention to farming. The next Sunday after arriving at his new home he held a meeting in Ventura among the settlers, and later built the Congregational Church of Ventura, of which he was the pastor. He has done much to build up the churches of the community. The governor of the state appointed him as one of a committee of five to separate Ventura county from Santa Barbara in 1873, and he served as chairman of this committee, organizing the county and putting it in good condition. He has now practically retired from public life, but still officiates at many funerals and marriages, and is one of the most regular attendants at the Saticoy Congregational Church, where he has taught a Bible class for twenty-five years. In temperance work he has been and still is very active. During the temperance campaign of 1901 he wrote a column article for eight weeks in succession for the Ventura Free Press, and paid for one hundred copies each week to be sent to those who were not subscribers to the paper.

In addition to his many duties, Mr. Bristol has also been engaged as an author. He has written a volume of three hundred and thirty-six pages, giving his experience as a pioneer preacher on the frontier. This book is still in circulation and is in its third edition. In 1892 he published a book, "Paracletus," or "The Baptism of the Holy Spirit." He has also written extensively for current journals and agricultural papers, and is well known as a writer on spiritual subjects. In addition to this, he has a list of seventy-five regular correspondents, almost all of whom are personal friends. His family consists of four sons and two daughters. The forty acres which now comprise all that is left of the arable land of the old rancho (the rest having been washed away) are principally devoted to the culture of lima beans. The ranch is well improved and makes a pleasant home.

FRANK P. BARROWS. In the whole range of commercial enterprise no interest is of more importance than that which has to do with the sale of general merchandise, and it is in this connection that Frank P. Barrows is best known. A resident of Nordhoff since 1879, his coming here was at the suggestion of physicians who hoped that a change of surroundings would improve his somewhat impaired health.

Duncan Mc Donnell

His plans proved to be wisely conceived, and resulted in complete restoration, so that in 1886 he started the mercantile enterprise since so successfully handled.

A native of Massachusetts, Mr. Barrows was born in 1850, a son of J. F. and Hannah (Cottle) Barrows, natives of Massachusetts. The ancestry on the maternal side had for generations lived at Martha's Vineyard, near Boston, Mass., and in days gone by were prominent in the historical events developed in and around Boston. Mrs. Barrows, who is living with her son Frank P., is eighty-four years of age, and is the mother of five sons and three daughters, all of whom attained maturity, but only two now survive. The other living son, J. Lloyd, is engaged in the commission business at Santa Barbara. Frank P. Barrows received his education at Martha's Vineyard, and graduated from the high school. In 1866 the family removed to Chicago, Ill., where father and sons were engaged in the general merchandise business on East Washington street. The devastating fire of 1871 completely wiped out their business, but they continued to remain in the lake city, and after a short time made enough to repay all debts. Although recuperated financially, the health of the family was incapacitated by the strain of their losses and consequent later application to business, and one by one they came to California, a son, Thomas Barrows, and family, arriving in 1875. One brother especially was greatly benefited by the change, but died three years ago in Claremont. Thomas Barrows, who came to California with Frank P., has a son, David P., who often visits his uncle, and of whom the latter is very proud. A graduate of Pomona college, he was one of the first students to enter that institution of learning, his father being one of the trustees. After graduating from Pomona he also finished the course at the state university in Berkeley, Cal., and Columbia college, New York, and is reaping the reward of his learning as superintendent of public instruction in Manila. This position was secured because of his special erudition as a student of natural history, which chair had been filled by him at Berkeley and by which institution he was sent out on his present mission. He is also a member of the Philippine commission.

In San Francisco in 1881 Mr. Barrows married Julia E. Smith, daughter of S. S. Smith, a pioneer and successful retired merchant of San Francisco. He was born in Connecticut, and married Josephine Childs, also a native of that state. Mrs. Barrows died in September of 1900, and left three sons, viz.: Albert, Stephen and Evert, aged respectively eighteen, fifteen and twelve years, and all preparing for entrance to Pomona college, at the Thatcher school, established at Nordhoff about ten years ago by E. S. Thatcher. Since he first voted for Abraham Lincoln, Mr. Barrows has voted for all the Republican presidents, and is a staunch adherent of his party. Formerly a Congregationalist, he is now a member of the Presbyterian church, the latter having been combined with the Congregational, of which he was Sunday-school superintendent for fifteen years.

DUNCAN McDONALD. As indicated by his name, Mr. McDonald is of a Scotch family. He was born in Glasgow, February 13, 1848, a son of Hugh and Catherine (Cameron) McDonald. His paternal grandfather, Hector McDonald (or Macdonald, as the name was then spelled), was a large sheep-raiser on the island of Mull, shire of Inverness, Scotland, and there Hugh was born and reared, removing thence to Glasgow, where he was employed as a fireman on the Caledonia Railroad, and at the age of twenty-seven years was already a successful and efficient engineer. About that time, however, he contracted a cold which brought on a fatal illness. His wife, who was born at Dumbarton Castle, Scotland, and now resides in Norfolk, England, was a daughter of Major John Cameron, a native of the highlands of Scotland, and for years regimental sergeant major of the Seventy-eighth Highlanders, stationed at Dumbarton Castle. After his retirement from the army he conducted a hotel at Bromalow on the Clyde, remaining there until he died. One of his sons, Duncan Cameron, became a large and successful printer in Glasgow, while his two brothers, also members of the Highlanders, in the Seventy-ninth Regiment, served through the Napoleonic war, from 1812 to 1815.

After the death of Hugh McDonald, his widow was married to Joseph Gray, an engineer on the Caledonia Railroad. Three children were born of her first marriage and five of her second union, the former being John, Jane and Duncan. Jane married and died in Scotland. John, a mechanical engineer, was employed for twenty-seven years by the Japanese government, rising from foreman to superintendent of motive power on the government railroad. Though now practically retired and in receipt of a pension from the government, he still acts as consulting engineer for Japanese railroads, as a member of the firm of McDonald & Crowley, of London. Twice the Mikado has honored him with decorations, these being the Order of the Rising Sun and the Order of the Mirror.

When his father died, Duncan McDonald was only six months old. At the age of five years he was taken from Glasgow to Carnwarth, and four years later to England, his step-father becoming passenger engineer of the Great Eastern, under Robert Sinclair. When ten years of age he was put to work as an assistant in the track department of the Great Eastern road, and at fifteen was apprenticed to the machinist's trade, which he completed. As may be readily imagined, he had few advantages; in fact, his total schooling scarcely exceeded two years, but as he has always been a man of good memory, close observation and excellent mental powers, he has acquired a broad fund of knowledge, far superior to much of the education acquired from textbook routine. At the age of twenty he began firing on the express train between Norwich and London. July 16, 1870, he was promoted to be engineer on the same line, but resigned in November, 1871, in order to engage under the Japanese government for service as a locomotive engineer in Japan. The voyage to that country was made via Suez canal. Arriving at his destination, he was appointed as engineer between Yokohama and Yeddo during the construction of the railroad, and in 1872 he had the honor of taking the Mikado, in a private car, on his first trip between those two towns.

Leaving Japan in October, 1875, he came to San Francisco via the steamer Grand Republic, which crossed the ocean in twenty-one days. With him he brought letters of introduction to Charles Crocker and in this way was at once given employment on the Southern Pacific Railroad as locomotive engineer. For six months his run was between Sacramento and Oakland. When new engines were built, he was given one, which he took to Mojave and ran along the route of construction until connection was made, December 5, 1876, at Laing's. Next he ran a freight train between Mojave and Wilmington, and in 1877 was given a passenger run between Wilmington and Mojave, but, not liking it, was transferred on request to the freight, continuing in that capacity until 1880, when he was given the passenger run between Los Angeles and Mojave. Since 1880 he has been employed continuously as passenger engineer and since 1893 has had the run between Los Angeles and Santa Barbara. During his long experience no serious accident has ever occurred to his train and no passenger has ever been killed, but he has had more than one narrow escape, when fatal results would have ensued had he not retained his coolness and courage. Since 1876 he has resided in Los Angeles, where he has a pleasant home on Buena Vista street.

In Sacramento, Cal., in February, 1876, Mr. McDonald married Miss Emily Fisk, who was born in Norwich, England. They are the parents of seven children, the eldest of whom, John Cameron, is chief clerk for the Mexican National Railroad, with headquarters in the City of Mexico. The two oldest daughters are married, Gertrude being the wife of John Able, and Alice the wife of William Schmitz, of Los Angeles. The other children are at home, namely: Besie, Margaret, Georgia and Harrison. The family are Presbyterians in religious belief.

While living in Norwich, England, Mr. McDonald was made a Mason, and later became connected with Nippon Lodge at Tokio, Japan, in which he served as warden. At this writing he belongs to Santa Barbara Lodge No. 192. He was raised to the Royal Arch degree in Corinthian Chapter No. 52, of Santa Barbara; and to the Knight Templar degree in St. Omar Commandery No. 30, Santa Barbara, besides which he is connected with Al Malakiah Temple, N. M. S., of Los Angeles. Since 1878 he has been associated with the Ancient Order of United Workmen in Los Angeles, being a charter member of Lodge No. 55. Politically he votes with the Republican party. He is a charter member of Orange Grove Division No. 5, B. of L. E., of which he served as past chief two terms and in 1887 acted as delegate of the order to the Chicago general convention.

HON. JOHN H. RANKIN. Through a period covering the history-making years of the nineteenth century, Judge Rankin was identified with the progress of St. Louis, where he was an honored attorney. From an early age his talents indicated that success would be found by a close application to and thorough knowledge of the fundamental principles of the law. His father, William, was an agriculturist by occupation, but his own tastes led him away from the farm and into professional activities. Born in Pittsburg, Pa., in 1820, and a graduate of the Pittsburg Law School, he followed the tide of emigration westward, and about 1842 established himself as a lawyer in St. Louis, where he later formed a partnership with C. S. Hayden. At that day St. Louis occupied a position among the Mississippi valley cities even more important than that of the present time. Railroads not yet having spanned the country, travel was largely by steamer, and the St. Louis docks were constantly crowded with boats from all points, loading or unloading large cargoes, and carrying large consignments of passengers. Perhaps for this reason much of his practice was in connection with maritime laws, and no lawyer in the city was better posted than he in this particular branch of the law. In addition, he had a large civil practice, extending into all the courts.

Perhaps no trait was so conspicuous in the character of Judge Rankin as that of concentration. Nothing was allowed to interfere with professional work. The charms of society which appeal so strongly to many never lured him from his desk, yet he was a genial and companionable man. The fascinations of political life which so many are unable to resist never drew him aside from his work, yet he was a man of public spirit and loyal in his citizenship, a thorough believer in the Democratic party, but, during the Civil war, a strong Union supporter. The inducements and invitations to accept office which lead so many attorneys out of practice fell with him on unheeding ears, yet he was ever ready to exert his influence for friends who were candidates for office. The path which in early years he had mapped out for himself he walked in steadfastly until his death, March 27, 1886. With this remarkable concentration of mind and heart into his chosen profession, it is not strange that his exceptional talents should have brought him a position of prominence among the brightest minds of his home city.

The marriage of Judge Rankin took place in Manchester (now Allegheny City), Pa., in 1847, and united him with Miss Mary J. McKain, daughter of James and Adeline (Kerwin) McKain. Her father, who was of English descent on the paternal side and of German extraction on the maternal side, was born in Marietta, Lancaster county, Pa., and settled in Pittsburg, walking almost the entire distance between the two towns. For some time he carried on business as a hatter in Pittsburg, and his daughter, Mary, was born there. On account of ill health he closed out the business and opened a large greenhouse and pleasure gardens on the Ohio. His boat, the Greenwood, conveyed passengers from Pittsburg to Greenwood Gardens, where visitors were delighted with the artistic taste shown in the arrangement of plants and shrubs. In the raising of flowers he became an expert, and his bouquets were awarded first premiums in many exhibitions where eminent florists competed for honors. Though his life was prolonged to almost ninety-four years, he retained his faculties to the last, and, had it not been for a severe fall six months before he died, he would doubtless have attained an even greater age than he did. Not only was he a remarkable man physically, but his mental attainments were above the average, and the success which he achieved in his business proved him to be a man of tact and resourcefulness. After the organization of the Republican party he gave his support to its principles. At the age of eighteen years he became a member of the Presbyterian Church and continued active in that denomination until his death, serving as elder in Dr. Herron's church, later in Dr. Swift's church in Allegheny City.

The wife of James McKain was of English lineage through her father, and Irish extraction on the maternal side. Her ancestors were among the first settlers of Pittsburg, Pa. She was born in that state, and died in Toledo, Ohio, at seventy-six years of age. In religion she was of the Episcopalian faith. Of her ten children five daughters and two sons attained maturity, and all are still living except one son. They are named as follows: Anne C., widow of Dr. G. S. Walker, who died in Los Angeles; Mary J., Mrs. Rankin; Adeline M., wife of R. H. Lecky, and a resident of Los Angeles; James K., deceased; Emma H., Mrs. Robinson, of Findlay, Ohio; Joseph, of Hastings, Neb.; and Clarissa, Mrs. Robinson, of Bellaire, Ohio. During the Civil war Joseph was for three years a member of a Pennsylvania regiment. James K., who enlisted in a Pennsylvania regiment for nine months, afterward re-enlisted for three years, and remained at the front until the close of the war. Later he engaged in railroading and was accidentally killed on a railroad in Ohio.

Born and reared in Pittsburg, Pa., Mrs. Rankin was given the best educational advantages that city afforded. She remained in her father's home until she went to St. Louis, a bride, to take charge of the home her husband had prepared for her. After his death, not caring to reside in St. Louis, she returned east, spending eighteen months in Toledo, Ohio, and then purchasing residence property in the East End, Pittsburg. In January, 1894, she visited California for the first time and was so delighted with the climate and the beauties of Los Angeles that she at once arranged to establish her home here, buying property on South Flower street. Four years later she built a residence on the corner of Eighteenth and Flower streets. In October, 1896, she selected a site on Twenty-eighth street, and under her supervision was erected the artistic residence which has since been her home. Since coming to Los Angeles she has been associated with Immanuel Presbyterian Church and has been interested in its various organizations, being particularly active in its missionary society, of which she is vice-president, giving liberally to its various missions and also contributing to the general maintenance and charities of the church.

HENRY MILNOR MITCHELL. During his long connection with the professional and horticultural interests of Los Angeles and vicinity, Mr. Mitchell wielded great influence in the advancement of this western metropolis, and few of its citizens have been more deeply mourned in death than he. Both as an attorney and as the incumbent of various offices of trust, he proved himself to be the possessor of fine abilities, coupled with a high sense of his duty as a citizen and his responsibility as a man. To some degree his ability was undoubtedly inherited, for his father, Samuel P. Mitchell, a Canadian, of English parentage, was one of the leading financiers and business men of Richmond, Va., where his position as president of the Planters' Bank made him a power in financial circles, while he also owned a large woolen manufactory that represented an important investment. To his generosity was due the erection of an Episcopal house of worship in Richmond, and he afterward remained one of its most liberal contributors and a member of its vestry. He married Rebecca Klapp, daughter of a well-known physician of Philadelphia, where she was born and reared. Of their union were four sons and one daughter, of whom three sons survive.

The eldest of the family, Henry M. Mitchell, was born at Richmond, Va., December 14, 1846, and was educated in the Virginia Military Institute. During the Civil war he was a member of the Cadets Corps, C. S. A., under General Ewing, and was at Appomattox. At the close of the war he engaged in raising wheat and tobacco in Virginia, and in 1867 taught school in North Carolina, from which state in 1868 he came via Nicaragua to Los Angeles, Cal. His first work here was in surveying and his next that of a reporter on the Los Angeles Star. In 1872 he was admitted to the bar, and seven years later was admitted to the supreme court. Under Sheriffs Alexandre and Rowland he served as a deputy, assisting meanwhile in the capture of Tiburcio Vasquez, a noted bandit. While pursuing a horsethief, Satella, Mr. Mitchell had a narrow escape, and one shot penetrated his hat; however, he was successful in landing his prisoner. In 1877 he was elected sheriff of Los Angeles county, and at the expiration of his term resumed the practice of the law; later, however, serving as under sheriff with J. C. Kayes.

As a pleasant relaxation from the cares of office and professional work, Mr. Mitchell became interested in horticulture, and bought one-half of San Rafael rancho, which he laid out into orchards and vineyards, building an attractive and commodious residence, in which he afterward made his home. To this place he gave the name of Blenheim, but afterward, when for two years the celebrated singer, Ellen Beach Yaw, leased the property, she bestowed upon it the name of Larks' Nest, and views of the homestead, under this title, were published in various eastern magazines. The property is still owned by Mrs. Mitchell, who remained there four years after the death of Mr. Mitchell, then spent two years in Philadelphia, returning to California to make her home with her father, and now resides on Menlo avenue, Los Angeles.

In national politics Mr. Mitchell was a Democrat. On the celebration of the centennial of national independence in Los Angeles he acted as grand marshal. For years he was a member of the volunteer fire department. When Gen. John M. Baldwin was in command of the First Brigade, C. N. G., he served as assistant adjutant-general and chief of staff. Until his death he was a member of the Los Angeles Bar Association and maintained a deep interest in everything bearing upon the profession of law. From the busy cares of his profession he often sought a needed change in exercising his fondness for athletic sports and particularly for hunting. Being an expert shot, he frequently, with a few companions, spent several days in hunting expeditions, and it was at such a time as this, December 7, 1890, while hunting deer in the mountains north of Burbank, he was accidentally shot by a comrade who had mistaken him for a deer. The wound was mortal and he died instantly. His body was brought to Los Angeles and interred in its final resting place by his many warm friends, to all of whom the sad catastrophe had proved a great shock.

October 1, 1879, in Los Angeles, occurred the marriage of Henry Milnor Mitchell and Miss Susan Eleanor Glassell, who was born in San Francisco, a daughter of Andrew and Lucie (Toland) Glassell, natives respectively of Richmond, Va., and Columbia, S. C. Her paternal grandfather, Andrew Glassell, who was of Scotch origin and a native of Richmond, was a planter in the Old Dominion and a soldier in the war of 1812. During his last days he resided with his children in Los Angeles. He was the son of a Scotchman who settled upon a plantation in Virginia. The Scotch ancestors were strict Presbyterians. The original emigrant married into the family of which General Taylor was a member, and their son, Andrew, married Susan Thornton, by whom he had six children. Of these, Andrew was born September 30, 1827, and at the age of seven accompanied his parents to Alabama. In 1848 he was graduated from the University of Alabama, and in 1853 he was admitted to the bar of the supreme court. On coming to California in 1853, he secured a position as deputy United States attorney at San Francisco, and later engaged in private practice. During the Civil war he engaged in the manufacture of lumber near Santa Cruz, but later took up professional work at Los Angeles, where he assisted in organizing the City Water Company and the Farmers & Merchants Bank. In 1880 he retired from practice, and thereafter gave his attention to superintending his landed estate until his death, January 28, 1901. In 1855 he married Lucie, daughter of Dr. H. H. Toland, who was born in Columbia, S. C., and became a pioneer physician of California. He is remembered particularly by reason of his gift to the state of the Toland Medical College, now the medical department of the University of California. The Toland family is of English and Scotch-Irish descent. Mrs. Glassell died in 1879, leaving nine children, all still living but Lucian, who died in 1900. When a girl Mrs. Mitchell was given excellent educational advantages, both in Los Angeles and Oakland, where she was a student in the Convent of the Sacred Heart. Her early advantages and subsequent travels, reading and self-culture have made her a valuable addition to the society of Los Angeles. Her younger daughter, Lucie Milnor, resides with her, and the older daughter, Arline, is the wife of Charles Bedford, of Prescott, Ariz.

Chas Curtis

CHARLES CURTIS. The little town of Carpinteria (Spanish for carpenter shop), with its fruitful orchards and peaceful industrial enterprises, claims no citizen more influential than Charles Curtis, known in the business world as a general merchant, and to his friends and associates as one of the strong bulwarks of the town. He is a native of Clinton county, N. Y., the little town of Mooers having also been the birthplace of his father, Michael Curtis. He was reared in his native place and received a common-school education, supplemented by a considerable knowledge of general business while yet a young boy. When old enough to assume responsibility and take care of himself financially, he engaged as clerk in a general mercantile establishment in Montreal, Canada, whither his family had in the mean time removed.

In 1890 Mr. Curtis departed from Canada and settled in Carpinteria, Cal., where he became associated with Mr. Peterkin as a clerk. He was so favorably impressed with the opportunities which seemed to exist for the worthy and industrious in this Southern California town that he associated himself with J. D. Dyer and bought out the mercantile business of J. A. Young. The firm conducted their affairs under the firm name of Curtis & Dyer for one year, at the expiration of which time Mr. Curtis bought out the interest of Mr. Dyer and has since conducted the business independent of partnership. He carries a fine stock of general necessities, and caters to a continually increasing trade, by no means local, as it extends far out through the county and to the west as far as Summerland.

Many of the interests in Carpinteria have profited by the business acumen of Mr. Curtis, and he is especially interested in the development of oil in the county, being a stockholder in numerous oil companies. He is a member of the Chamber of Commerce, and was instrumental in securing the organization of the same. In the affairs of the Presbyterian Church he is particularly prominent, is an elder and deacon, and takes an active part in the Sunday school as superintendent of the same. He is also further engaged in religious work as president of the Christian Endeavor Union of Santa Barbara county. Politically he is an ardent Republican, and was secretary of the McKinley-Roosevelt Club. In 1898 Mr. Curtis married Susie Tobey, a native of California, and of this union there is one son, Randall D. Curtis.

MILTON THOMAS. To have come to Los Angeles during the days of its pioneer struggles; to have been identified with its history during the formative period of its growth, assisting in the establishment of churches, schools and philanthropic institutions; to have been an important factor in its material progress and its transformation from a small, sleepy and straggling village to one of the foremost cities of the great west; such a life is worthy of record in the annals of local history. Worthy, therefore, of conspicuous mention among the early settlers of Los Angeles is the late Milton Thomas, whose most permanent monument is his work in connection with the upbuilding of the city.

Mr. Thomas was born in Kingston, Ohio, September 19, 1830, a son of John and Jane (Ford) Thomas, natives respectively of England and Ohio. His father crossed the ocean in boyhood, settled upon a farm in Ohio, but later removed to Iowa and afterward became a resident of Kirksville, Mo., where his wife died. At an advanced age he came to California and bought ten acres on San Pedro street, near the corner of Washington, in Los Angeles. This land he set out in an orange orchard and built a residence there, in which he died at the age of seventy years. Of his five children Milton was the eldest. He attended public schools in Iowa and gained his initiatory experience in independent enterprises as a farmer near Burlington, in Des Moines county, later engaging in the nursery and stock business, while he also taught several terms of school. By way of New York and Panama, in 1863 Mr. Thomas came to California, proceeding from San Francisco to Linden, San Joaquin county, where he bought land and engaged in ranching and dairy farming. The year 1868 found him in Los Angeles, a straggling town of four thousand people, inhabiting unattractive adobe houses. Yet there was the same fascination of climate and scenery that still weaves its meshes around the stranger and still lures him into leaving old friends and old associations to enjoy the charm of the city by the twilight sea. A year after coming he bought a lot on South Spring, between Second and Third streets, the present site of Los Angeles theatre. Here he erected a house of twelve rooms, which was the first building put up in that block. One of his next ventures was the purchase of a sheep ranch at the present site of Whittier, and for three years, until selling the property, he carried on a sheep business.

Perhaps Mr. Thomas is best known through his long connection with the nursery business in Los Angeles, in which he continued for twenty-five years. His first nursery was established on Main and Twenty-eighth streets, where he bought a ten-acre tract. Later he became the owner of eighty acres, his headquarters being on Jefferson and Main. After he sold a portion of that tract he returned to Twenty-eighth street and two years later established his nursery on Jefferson street and Grand avenue, buying thirty-five acres. For years he was the most extensive nurseryman in Southern California, and orders came to him from the entire surrounding country, for it was known that he propagated all kinds of trees and kept in stock everything that could be raised in this part of the state. After a long and honorable business career he retired to private life, and four years later passed away, September 19, 1894.

A firm faith in the Christian religion characterized the life and deeds of Mr. Thomas. When he came to Los Angeles only thirteen members of the Methodist Episcopal denomination, with which he and his wife were identified, could be found. The beginning was not encouraging, yet a start was made and from that time forward he was a steady and large contributor to the work. He assisted in building the first house of worship owned by that denomination in Los Angeles, and it is in no small measure due to his encouragement and liberal donations that there are now fifteen churches of his faith within the city limits. His activity as an official in his home church and his contributions to the other church buildings made him one of the most prominent Methodists in the city.

For some years a Republican, the importance of endeavoring to suppress the liquor traffic led Mr. Thomas to ally himself with the Prohibitionists, which was his party in later years. Fraternally he was connected with the Odd Fellows. He was a charter member of the Chamber of Commerce, a member of the California Fruit Growers' Association and the Southern California Horticultural Association.

In Des Moines county, Iowa, March 10, 1854, Mr. Thomas married Miss Elizabeth Archer, who was born in Bond county, Ill., the youngest child of Hezekiah and Mary (Black) Archer, natives of Sangamon county, Ill. Her father, who was a soldier in the Blackhawk war, removed from Illinois to Des Moines county, Iowa, in an early day and bought about two thousand acres of land, from which he improved large and valuable farms. At the time Burlington had only three log cabins. His death occurred in Iowa when he was seventy years of age. The Archer family is of Pennsylvania descent, and more remotely of New England stock. Of his nine children all but one attained maturity, and seven are still living. One son, William, who came to California in 1860, is a retired stockman at Arroyo Grande, San Luis Obispo county. Elisha, who came to this state in 1862, is a capitalist of Salinas. DeWitt, a pioneer of 1860, is a stockman at Lompoc, Santa Barbara county. George died near Salinas and John near Stockton. Another brother, E. G., remains on the old farm in Des Moines county, Iowa.

Two daughters were born to the union of Mr. and Mrs. Thomas. Mary T., who married John Alexander Brown, a resident of Los Angeles, was a graduate of the first class of the Los Angeles high school (1875) and received first honors, also a $50 medal from Governor Downey. Later she was graduated from the San José Normal School, after which she taught school for six years. She died in 1892, leaving two children, Ellen Margaret and Herbert Brown. Laura T., Mrs. A. F. Carter, was graduated from the Los Angeles high school in 1882, and is actively connected with many important public movements in this city. In Ransom Home, of which her mother has been a member of the board of managers for eight years, she too is actively interested. Both are charter members of the Central Women's Christian Temperance Union of Los Angeles, which was organized during a visit made by Frances Willard to the coast. In this Mrs. Carter officiates as secretary, and she has also been president of the Union of Unions, and for ten years its corresponding secretary. Since the first year that Temperance Temple was projected, Mrs. Thomas has been active in this work, and until 1900 she served as a member of the Temple board. Besides these and other activities, she has maintained a supervision of the estate since the death of Mr. Thomas. Recently seven acres on Jefferson street, between Hope street and Grand avenue, have been laid out in lots, under her supervision. Her former holdings south of the railroad have been disposed of, but she retains, among other properties, a ranch of eighty acres near Chatsworth Park in the San Fernando valley. Among the citizens of Los Angeles, and particularly among the pioneers, she is well known, and everywhere she is esteemed and admired for those gentle and cultured traits that have characterized her from girlhood.

ARTHUR F. CARTER. Descended from New England progenitors, Mr. Carter was born in Connecticut January 27, 1854, a son of John R. and Delia (Stockwell) Carter. His father, who was a manufacturer, gave up his business interests in order to serve his country during the Civil war, becoming a member of the Eighteenth Connecticut Infantry. His valor as a soldier was never more marked than in his last engagement, at Piedmont, W. Va., where he was killed in action. His only son, Arthur F., was educated in New England, and in 1875 went to Colorado, where he engaged in sheep and cattle raising at Box Elder Creek, twenty-five miles from Denver. In December, 1881, he came to California, and a few months later settled in Los Angeles, becoming an employe of Milton Thomas. His business qualifications led to his admission into partnership by Mr. Thomas, who gave him entire charge of the nursery until it was closed out. Since then he has given his attention to an oversight of the Thomas estate and various holdings in Los Angeles. May 12, 1886, he was united in marriage with Miss Laura Thomas, and they now make their home with Mrs. Thomas, ministering to her happiness and relieving the loneliness which the death of her husband brought upon her.

HARRISON M. BOWKER. Associated with the beauty of Los Angeles, with the intelligence and culture of its citizens, and with that artistic appreciation without which the city had never challenged the admiration of all who sojourn here, is the name of Bowker, of Ellendale Place. Harrison M. Bowker was born in Hinsdale, Cheshire county, N. H., July 31, 1835, a son of Windsor and Sarah (Osgood) Bowker, and grandson of Asa Bowker, who served in the war of the Revolution. The family is of English descent, and the emigrating ancestors settled in Massachusetts long before the strife for colonial independence. Windsor Bowker was born in Massachusetts, at Phillipston, Worcester county, and was for many years a farmer at Hinsdale, where he was killed in a runaway. He married Sarah Osgood, a native of Wendell, Mass., and daughter of Joseph Osgood, born in Massachusetts, and a tanner and farmer by occupation. Mrs. Bowker, who died in New Hampshire in her forty-ninth year, was the mother of five children, of whom Harrison M. is the youngest but one, and the only living child. One of the sons, Judge John S. Bowker, came to California in 1849, and engaged in mining here and in Nevada. At one time he was county recorder at Reno, Nev., in which city he met a tragic fate at the hands of a criminal whom, as judge, he had decided against. Temporarily he recovered from the assault, although left for dead, but he finally succumbed to his wounds.

Until his eighteenth year Mr. Bowker lived on his father's farm, and in the mean time attended the public schools in New Hampshire. A younger brother being taken sick while attending Oberlin College, Mr. Bowker cared for the invalid and eventually completed his own education at Oberlin. In 1859 he went to Oshkosh, Wis., and at the end of two years to Beloit, Wis., where he worked as bookkeeper in a manufacturing establishment. At St. Louis, Mo., whither he removed in 1870, he held a position as bookkeeper with a wholesale house, and in time became interested in the first grain elevator built in that city, which construction was entirely destroyed during a cyclone. In 1882 Mr. Bowker became associated with Los Angeles, and at the end of two months bought the fifteen acres which has since been transformed into Ellendale Place, considered the most beautiful of the residence places in the city. Four years after purchase the place was laid out with a park in the center, but the park has since been replaced by a boulevard, with the parks on the sides. The property extends from West Adams street south, the lots are two hundred and fourteen feet deep, one hundred and twenty feet wide, and have seventy feet of driveway, leaving twenty-five each side for lawns. Mr. Bowker has also purchased sixty acres of land on Pico Heights, called the Washington and Pico Street Heights tract, east of Western avenue, and extending from Washington to Pico streets. The important thoroughfares in this tract are Oxford, Cambridge and Roxbury avenues and Dorchester and Pellissier streets.

No small share of the development of Ellendale is attributable to the co-operation of Mrs. Bowker, after whom this ideal building place is named, and for whom it is intended as a lasting monument to her graces of mind and character. Formerly Ellen Sanger Currier, she was a native of North Troy, Vt., and a daughter of John Wenneck Currier, also born in North Troy, and granddaughter of Ezekiel Currier, a farmer of the Green Mountain state. John Wenneck Currier was a farmer in Vermont, and afterwards became interested in the lumber business on a large scale. With his six brothers he became a heavy owner of lumbering interests in Canada, and one of these brothers, Joseph Currier, was for sixteen years a member of the Canadian parliament. John Wenneck Currier was an active member and worker in the Baptist Church, and continued to exert a strong influence in that religious denomination up to the time of his death in Vermont. Through his marriage to Mary Butterfield Elkins he became allied to an enviable Revolutionary ancestry, for Mrs. Currier, who was born in Peacham, Mass., was a daughter of Josiah Elkins, a native of Massachusetts, who, with his son, Capt. Curtis Elkins, was at the battle of Plattsburg. The ancestors came from England and Scotland. To Mr. and Mrs. Currier were born eight children, of whom three daughters and one son are living, Mrs. Bowker being the fourth. One of the sons, Hon. J. W. Currier, Jr., of North Troy, Vt., has been representative many times, and during the Civil war served the Union cause as a member of the Tenth Massachusetts Infantry.

Mrs. Bowker was reared in Vermont until her twelfth year, after which she lived with the rest of her family in New Hampshire. In 1867 she removed to St. Louis, and there, as in other places of residence, availed herself of every opportunity for improvement. A great reader, she has also learned much from observation, and has four times visited Europe for study and recreation. The development of Ellendale has proved an inexhaustible source of delight to her, and many of the ideas which have been incorporated in the general plans originated in her artistic brain. Mr. Bowker has been a Republican ever since General Fremont's time, but active politics have entered but slightly in his plans for activity. Formerly a Congregationalist, he assisted in the construction of Plymouth Church, on Lovelace avenue, as a trustee and member of the building committee, but has now changed his allegiance to the Independent Church of Christ. He is a man of liberal tendencies, and has been, and still is, one of the chief factors for progress of Los Angeles.

W. A. BONESTEL. It would be difficult to find a man better versed in all departments of the lumber business than is W. A. Bonestel, manager of large lumbering concerns in Ventura and other points of the state. A native of Greene county, N. Y., in the midst of the beautiful Catskills, he was born March 26, 1848, and is a son of C. D. Bonestel. Until 1861 he lived in his native county, and acquired his rudimentary education in the public schools there. On coming, via Panama, to San Francisco, he continued to attend the public schools, supplemented by attendance at Oakland College until the junior year. In 1867 he had the distinction of being appointed a cadet from Nevada to West Point, and returned east via the Panama route, but instead of entering the academy, he returned to Greene county, N. Y., and remained there until his removal, in 1869, to Decorah, Winneshiak county, Iowa, where he prepared for future emergencies by learning the cooper's trade. This occupation was practically applied until 1881, when he removed to Ventura, his last year in the Iowa town being also devoted to his responsibility as street commissioner, from which position he resigned to come to California.

It was not until locating in Ventura that Mr. Bonestel became seriously interested in the lumber business, and his affairs were at first conducted under the firm name of Chaffee & Bonestel. The yards were managed by himself until the concern was closed out in 1889. In 1891 he was one of the incorporators of the People's Lumber Company, of which his father was president and himself manager. The concern has a large yard in Ventura, which does a large business. In 1898 there was established an additional yard in Oxnard, which, by the way, is the largest managed by the company, and in 1899 a yard was put in working order at Santa Paula, all of which are under the direct control and management of Mr. Bonestel. How well he is adapted to this particular manner of work is evidenced by the enormous output of the combined yards, the large patronage accorded the company in all parts of the county, and the reputation for reliability and solidity which their enterprise has created. Mr. Bonestel is also interested in oil production, and has interests in several prominent and paying concerns. He is a member of the Board of Trade, and was the first vice-president of the same in Ventura. As regards devotion to the welfare of the community, he may be counted on to assist in furthering any just project for improvement.

In Decorah, Iowa, Mr. Bonestel married Mary Riley, a native of London, England, and of this union there are two children: Charles, who is bookkeeper for the People's Lumber Company, and Margaret, who is a graduate of the high school class of 1901. Mrs. Bonestel is a member of and active worker in the Episcopal Church.

L. E. BLOCHMAN. The home of Mr. Blochman in Santa Maria represents all that is cultured and hospitable in this delightful Southern California town. A westerner by birth and training, Mr. Blochman was born in San Francisco, Cal., in 1856, was educated in the grammar and high schools of his native town, and as an initial means of support engaged in educational work. In 1879 he began bookkeeping, for which he is so admirably fitted, and in 1881 associated himself with the firm of Weilheimer & Coblenz (subsequently Coblenz & Schwabacher) in the capacity of bookkeeper and general manager. In connection with his work he has maintained an interest in the upbuilding of this district, has appreciated its possibilities, and grasped its opportunities. The agricultural interests have materially benefited by his investigation and study, and to his efforts in organizing, with others, in 1888, the Gum Tree Growers' Association are due the splendid eucalyptus trees which in places protect this valley from the sea winds. By writing and otherwise he has continually advocated tree planting in the valley and town. For the twenty years that he has resided in the Santa Maria valley he has been a close observer of the weather. He is considered an authority on this subject, and has become associated with the State Weather Bureau. He is a Republican in politics and is a particularly earnest advocate of temperance.

In 1888 occurred the marriage of Mr. Blochman and Ida Twitchell, one of the leading educators of Santa Barbara county. A graduate of the Iowa Agricultural College, Mrs. Blochman was valedictorian of her class, and has since mainly devoted her time to teaching. For several years before her marriage she was principal of the Santa Maria grammar school, and is now English and history teacher of the town high school. In 1886 she was the regular nominee for county superintendent of schools, and would have been elected had it not been for the prejudice against her sex. She has been a member of the board of education for several years subsequently. Few women in the state have a more exhaustive knowledge of botany than has Mrs. Blochman, as evidenced particularly by her exhibit of California plants at the World's Fair. She is a delightful and amiable woman, who has turned her abilities to more than ordinary account, and receives a corresponding regard from her hosts of friends here and elsewhere. In 1891 Mr. Blochman was the first to move to inaugurate the Union high school of the valley, under the new state law for the organization of such district or union high schools. He was secretary for the first five years, to be succeeded by W. L. Adams, equally interested in the educational interests of the community.

MAIN BUILDING, STATE NORMAL SCHOOL, LOS ANGELES, CALIFORNIA

STATE NORMAL SCHOOL. By act of the legislature of 1881 the Normal School at Los Angeles was established as a branch of that in San José and the sum of $50,000 appropriated for the construction and equipment of a building, the city of Los Angeles having agreed to furnish a suitable site. The location selected was a hill which formed a part of the orange orchard of Prudence Beaudry, adjacent to the city, easy of access, commanding a fine view, and uniting beauty of scenery with salubrity of climate. The grounds comprise four acres, approachable from four different directions, and located at the head of Fifth street, fronting on Grand avenue (then called Charity street).

August 29, 1882, the building having been completed, the school was opened, with sixty-one pupils and the following instructors: Prof. J. C. Flatt, vice-principal; Emma L. Hawks, preceptress; J. W. Redway, assistant teacher; Prof. Charles H. Allen being principal of both the San José and Los Angeles schools. In August, 1883, a radical change was made in the management by the appointment of Prof. Ira More as principal, the school having been made independent by act of the legislature. Professor More was a graduate of the scientific department of Yale, and a man of remarkable personality and great decision of purpose. For ten years the impress of his character was stamped upon the institution, and its early establishment upon a substantial basis was largely due to his effective oversight and wise judgment. On his resignation in 1893, the position of principal was tendered to Prof. Edward T. Pierce, who has since efficiently filled it.

In June, 1884, a class of twenty-two graduated from the school, a large number of whom are still engaged in teaching, and rank among the most successful educators of the state. Two of these, Mrs. Frances H. Byram and Miss Kate Brousseau, are connected with the Normal School, the former as principal of the training school and the latter as instructor in psychology and mathematics in the normal department. During the second year in the school's existence, Miss S. P. Monks, Miss Isabella G. Oakley and Mrs. E. J. Valentine were added to the faculty, the first named still remaining as an instructor. In August, 1884, the faculty received important additions in Miss Harriet E. Dunn and Melville Dozier, both of whom have continued to the present time. During 1885-86 Mrs. Mary A. Heath (now Mrs. English) was added to the corps of instructors, and R. L. Kent took the place of Mrs. Valentine in the department of music, his connection continuing until 1893. In 1887 Miss Josephine E. Seaman and Miss Alice J. Merritt became members of the faculty, the former remaining to the present, and the latter resigning at her marriage in 1897. The vice-principal, Prof. J. C. Flatt, withdrew in 1890, and most of the time since the position has been filled by Prof. Melville Dozier, teacher of mathematics. At the same time Prof. C. E. Hutton was elected to the department of mathematics and has also for some years been registrar of the school. The same year witnessed the erection and furnishing of the gymnasium, the charge of which was given to Theodore Bessing, a trainer of athletes. This department in 1896 passed into the capable hands of Miss Sarah J. Jacobs, from the Boston School of Gymnastics, under whose wise guidance it has come to be regarded as an indispensable factor in the symmetrical development of the normal student. From 1893 to 1898 Mrs. Juliet P. Rice was at the head of the music department, and afterward the appointment was conferred upon Miss Jennie Hagan.

When Professor Pierce came to the head of the institution, a recent appropriation by the legislature of $75,000 for the enlargement of the school placed heavy burdens upon him from the first. In the discharge of this and other duties he has proved himself to be self-reliant, tactful, energetic and sagacious, and his service has been alike creditable to himself and profitable to the state. Among the changes which he superintended were the enlargement of the offices of principal and preceptress and of the library; the creation of a physical laboratory, a biological laboratory, a sloyd department; the erection of a new building for a chemical laboratory; the exchange of the old assembly hall for a room whose beauty is second to none of the kind in Southern California; and a corresponding change in the appliances and facilities for work. In 1894 Dr. James H. Shults was called to the department of physics, Miss Mary A. Lathrop to the department of sloyd, and Miss Agnes Cray to that of English. At the same time Mrs. Isabel W. Pierce succeeded Miss Emma L. Hawks as preceptress of the school. On the death of Miss Lathrop, Charles M. Miller, a graduate of the class of 1891, became head of the department of sloyd, and has the distinction of being the first alumnus of the school to be appointed a member of its faculty.

The department of art, organized in 1895, under Miss Ada M. Laughlin, since assisted by Miss Mary M. Smith, has won an enviable reputation throughout the state; and the same may be said of the department of psychology and pedagogy, formerly under Dr. F. B. Dresslar, who, fresh from study at Clark University, organized the department in 1894. After three years of service, Dr. Dresslar was elected assistant professor of education at the State University. The place thus left vacant was filled for the two years following by Dr. C. C. Van Liew, from the State Normal School of Illinois. Upon the resignation of the latter to accept the presidency of the State Normal School at Chico, Cal., Dr. George F. James, of the Chicago University, was called to the position which he has ably filled for the past three years. The position also includes that of superintending the training school, in all of which work Prof. Everett Sheppardson, of the University of Indiana, and Miss Brousseau, who, after graduating from the Normal School, spent two years in special study in The Sorbonne, Paris, have been able assistants for several years.

Realizing the teacher's need of knowledge and training in the important matter of correct use of the voice in reading and speech, a department of voice culture and reading was added to the work of the school in 1895, and Miss Grace S. Jones, of the Emerson School of Expression, was engaged as teacher. Upon her resignation in 1896, the board elected Charles D. von Neumayer, of the School of Dramatic Art, New York, who still holds the place. The growing interest in kindergarten education made it evident that there would soon be a large demand for teachers and to meet this demand President Pierce added a kindergarten department in 1895, at the head of which was placed Miss Florence Lawson, of the Kindergarten College of Chicago, with Miss Bertha M. Andrews as assistant, this being the first kindergarten department to be established under the auspices of the state of California. The recent demand for practical education in the public schools led to the establishment in 1901 of a department of domestic science for the training of teachers in this important subject; Miss Lucy J. Anderson and Mrs. Jessica C. Hazzard, both of whom had received special training for the work, were placed in charge. The Los Angeles Normal School was the third institution of its kind in the United States to include domestic science in its curriculum. In September of 1902 the department will occupy commodious and well-equipped apartments recently constructed for the purpose in the new annex.

In 1897 Prof. B. M. Davis was called to work with Miss Monks in the department of biology. His thorough scientific training has enabled him to raise the work of the department to a high standard of excellence. The English department of the school has won an enviable reputation throughout the state by its thorough work. The following teachers have been mainly instrumental during the past eight years in bringing this about: Miss Agnes Crary, Miss Emma J. Breck, Miss Etta E. Moore, Miss Josephine E. Seaman, Mrs. Mary G. Barnum, Miss Lou Hellmuth, and Mrs. Pierce, the four latter being the present corps of teachers. The department of history and geography has for some years been under the charge of Miss Harriet E. Dunn, history; Prof. James F. Chamberlain, of the Chicago Normal School, geography; and Miss Agnes Elliott, history; the latter is a graduate of the school, with special training of two years elsewhere. The training department has always been one of the most notable features of the school. The children in it have been assigned to the school by the city superintendent, and it has been considered one of the regular city graded schools, although under the direct supervision of the Normal School authorities. Eight regular grades are maintained and it is one of the largest training or practice schools connected with the Normal Schools of this country. It occupies twenty-five school rooms and offices, especially equipped for its work. It has been the policy of the administration to appoint the critic teachers in this department from among the alumni, whenever possible, thus maintaining a unity of purpose indispensable to the highest success. From 1882 to 1891 Miss Martha M. Knapp had charge of the school, which then consisted of but three grades. She was followed by Mrs. Frances H. Byram. Eight years ago, at the reorganization of the Normal School, the training department was enlarged to its present size, placed under the general supervision of the professor of pedagogy, and all of the assistant critics were made of equal rank. Besides Mrs. Byram, who is also acting city principal, the following teachers are now in charge of the critic work: Mrs. Albertina Smith, Miss Carrie Reeves, Mrs. Clara M. Preston and Miss Helen C. Mackenzie.

In keeping with the growth of the school has been the expansion of the library, which now numbers about ten thousand volumes, together with many bound magazines. It is under the able management of Miss Harriet E. Dunn, a member of the faculty, and Miss Elizabeth H. Fargo, a trained librarian. The whole aim of the institution has been to uplift the common schools of the state. There are now about twelve hundred alumni, over ninety per cent of whom have taught in the schools of Southern California, and their success as educators reflects great credit upon their alma mater. In July last, the close of the twentieth year of the school was celebrated by a large body of alumni with appropriate ceremonies, and a history of the school was issued.

The State Normal School at Los Angeles has always been fortunate in its boards of trustees, which have never been governed by partisanship or personal favoritism. The list of local members in the past has included some of the most prominent and public-spirited men in Southern California, among whom were Senator Stephen M. White, O. W. Childs, Hon. George M. Smith, Hon. W. W. Bowers, Prof. Charles F. Holder, A. E. Pomeroy, Gen. John Mansfield, Judge N. P. Conrey, and Hon. T. P. Lukens. The present board consists of the following well-known gentlemen: His Excellency Henry T. Gage, Governor of California, and Hon. T. J. Kirk, State Superintendent of Public Instruction, ex-officio members. Local board, appointed by the Governor: Hon. R. H. F. Variel, president of Board; Henry W. O'Melveny, vice-president, both of Los Angeles; John S. Collins, of Ventura; E. J. Louis, of San Diego; and Lee A. Phillips, of Los Angeles.

Edward T. Pierce

President of State Normal School, Los Angeles.

PROF. EDWARD T. PIERCE, the president of the State Normal School at Los Angeles, was unanimously elected to this responsible position in 1893 by the board of trustees of that institution. Under his energetic leadership new buildings have been erected, the capacity has been largely increased, and the faculty enlarged from thirteen to thirty teachers. Important changes have been made in the organization of the school and the enlargement of the scope of work pursued since he took charge, including a department for the training of kindergarten teachers, the first to be established under the auspices of the state, the art department, well-equipped laboratories, and departments of manual training and domestic science. The most thorough instruction is now afforded to over five hundred students who attend the school. To further promote the welfare of the school, the sum of $23,500 has recently been expended in the erection of another building by which the facilities of the school have been greatly enhanced.

Prof. Edward T. Pierce was born in Meredith Square, Delaware county, N. Y., March 19, 1851. He is the oldest of eleven children (ten of whom were sons) born to J. Washington and Frances Clark Pierce, both of whom are now living in Los Angeles at an advanced age. When he was but eight years of age his father moved to a large farm in the town of Hamden, Delaware county, most of which had to be cleared of the forest that then covered it. There the boy Edward worked on the farm summers and attended first the local school and later the Walton Academy, winters, until he was seventeen. At that age he began to teach winter schools in neighboring districts, continuing three seasons, boarding around while doing so, as was at that time the custom in many places. Carefully saving all that he earned, he was enabled to pay his way through the State Normal School at Albany, from which he was graduated in 1872, after which for several years he had charge of schools in Orangeville, N. Y.; Linden, N. J., and Belleville, N. J. His own efforts also enabled him later to take a thorough course in law, and in 1887 he was graduated from Union University with the degree of LL. B. He dates his residence in California from August, 1881, when he began fruit farming at Sierra Madre, being one of the pioneers of that place. He taught the Santa Anita school for two years, when he became principal of the Pasadena schools, organizing both the grammar and high schools of that city and greatly promoting their welfare through his wise supervision. In 1885 he was elected the first superintendent of schools, and this position he held for four years, during which time he directed the construction of many of the fine school buildings of that city. While actively engaged in this work he was called to Chico, Cal., in 1889, when he organized and established upon a substantial basis in that place the third Normal School of the state, as principal of which he continued until his election to his present position.

In 1887 Professor Pierce married Miss Isabel Woodin, by whom he has had two daughters and one son, the eldest of whom, Ethel Vora, is now living. Mrs. Pierce was born in Dutchess county, N. Y., of one of its oldest families, and received excellent educational advantages. After graduating from the State Normal School at Albany, she entered upon the work of an educator and has been interested in the same ever since, teaching in graded and high schools and the Normal School at Chico. For the past eight years she has been preceptress and a member of the English faculty of the State Normal School at Los Angeles. She is a most efficient aid to her husband in his many responsibilities. The young women of the school recognize in Mrs. Pierce a wise counsellor and a sympathizing friend, who aids them in many ways to attain that high standard of moral strength that should characterize teachers.

The degree of Ph. D. was conferred upon Professor Pierce in 1894 by his alma mater, the New York State Normal College at Albany. Since 1889 he has been a member of the state board of education of California, and is at this writing the oldest member of the same in point of years and service thereon. The State Teachers' Association and the Southern California Teachers' Association find in him an active and interested worker. In connection with the National Educational Association he has been highly honored, having served from 1895 to 1899 as one of a committee of eight members from that body in the preparation of the Report on Normal Schools, relating to the function and needs of these institutions in the United States. In 1899 he was chosen a member of the National Council of Education, which is composed of sixty of the most prominent educators of the United States. Fraternally he was made a Mason in the Pasadena Lodge, and was raised to the chapter there. He is now connected with Southern California Lodge, F. & A. M., of Los Angeles, also of Los Angeles Commandery No. 9, K. T., and Al Malakiah Temple, N. M. S.

WILLIAM NELSON BRUCE, the chief engineer of the Santa Barbara Water Company, was born in Lafayette, Ind., April 13, 1856, a son of William Bruce, a native of Ohio, and also a machinist. For many years the elder Bruce followed his trade in Lafayette, Ind., and during the Civil war enlisted twice, in an Ohio and Indiana regiment. He was wounded and captured and sent to Andersonville, and when liberated was such a total wreck that he did not long survive his freedom. The paternal grandfather, Robert Bruce, was born in Scotland, and upon immigrating to America settled first in Ohio and then in Indiana. The mother of W. N. Bruce was, before her marriage, Ida Doyle, a native of Indiana, and daughter of John Doyle, who was born in New York, and became a farmer in Indiana. Mrs. Bruce, who died in Indiana, was the mother of four children, two of whom are living, William Nelson being the youngest.

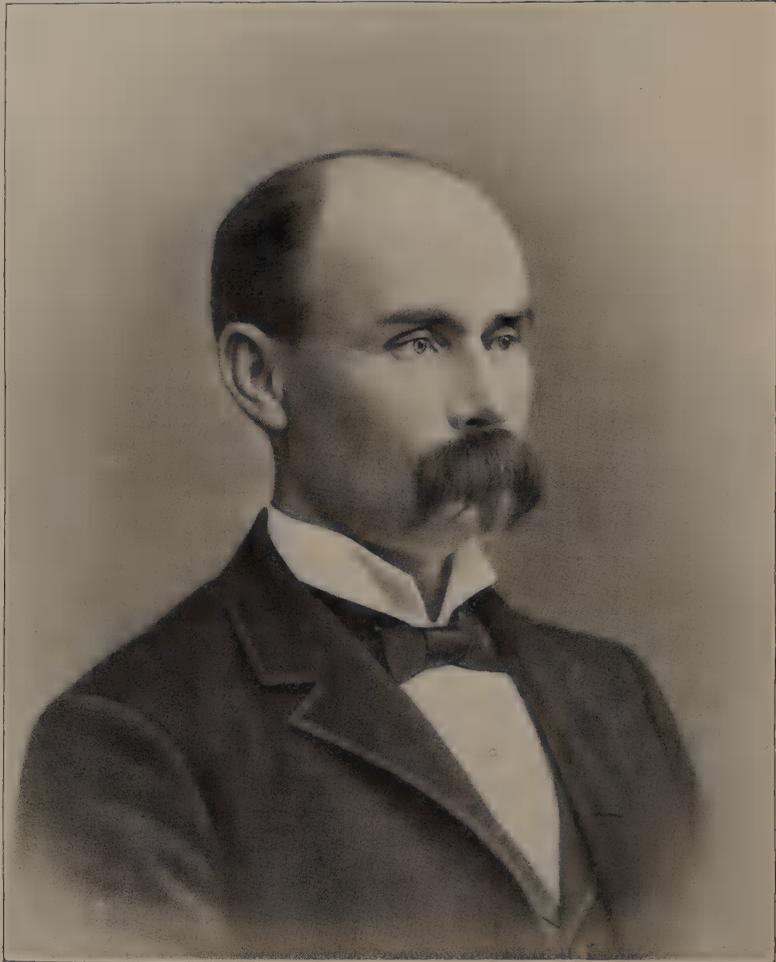

Mr. Bruce was reared in Lafayette, Ind., and in 1867 came to California with his grandmother Doyle and located in Santa Rosa, where he attended the public schools. Later, in Merced county, he engaged in different occupations until grown to manhood. In 1873 he went to Tulare county at the time of the building of the railroad, and in 1875 entered the shops of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, to learn the machinist's trade. He was in time foreman of the Goshen branch, and later was employed on the Southern Pacific coast road at Santa Cruz, and promoted to the position of engineer, his run being between Alameda and Santa Cruz. Afterwards he took up stationary engineering and had charge at different times of the Victor Mills at Hollister, Cal., the mills at Hartford, Cal., and the Grangeville Mills, in Tulare county. In 1883 he came to Ventura and was with the Santa Ana Water Company and the I. Barnard machine shop, until he was appointed superintendent of the Ventura asphalt mine in Devil's Cañon. This position he filled with great credit between 1889 and 1891, and opened the mine for the company. Later he performed a similar service for the Alcatraz Asphalt Company at Lapatera, twelve miles from Santa Barbara, of which he was superintendent for two years. He then went to Ventura as superintendent for the Ventura (now the Weldon) Asphalt Company, and served in this capacity until taking up his present position in Santa Barbara as chief engineer of the water company. The works of the company have been rebuilt since July of 1896, and new engines placed.

In Tulare county Mr. Bruce married Mattie Serles, a native of Illinois, and of this union there are two children: Robert, who is attending the California School of Mechanics and Arts; and Lora. Mr. Bruce is a thoroughly competent engineer, and his services may well be in demand by responsible and cautious firms. He is a Republican in politics, and is fraternally a Woodman of the World, and a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen.

HIRAM BRUNDAGE. One of the successful lemon growers of the Montecito valley is Hiram Brundage, who was born in Ontario, Canada, in 1835, a son of Elijah Brundage, a native of New York, and reared near Lake Champlain. At the age of ten years Hiram removed with his parents to Lake county, Ind., and after seven or eight years went to Ohio, near the Pennsylvania line. At Springfield, Pa., he learned telegraphy, and with the breaking out of the Civil war assumed charge of a gang of men and built the telegraph line from Salt Lake City, Utah, to Fort Bridger, Wyo. In the fall of 1863 he went to the mines in Montana, and subsequently became interested in several good mines in Alder Gulch. The following spring he returned to Pennsylvania and remained for two years, later being sent to Fort Kearney, Neb., as a telegraph operator.

In 1869 Mr. Brundage went to Virginia City, Mont., and later published in Dillon a small paper called the Tribune, in which he still has an interest, and in the fall of 1886 he came to Montecito and purchased the ranch of ten acres upon which he now lives. His fine lemon grove of five acres, covered with healthy fruit-bearing trees, in 1900 produced four hundred and seventeen boxes of lemons. He has improved his land, which was originally quite barren, and has built a commodious residence of redwood, the greater part of the mechanical work being accomplished by himself. He has been active in promoting the interests of the valley, and is keenly alive to its innumerable chances for making a livelihood and securing as beautiful a home and surroundings as can be found in any part of Southern California. He is an advocate of education, and is a trustee of the Montecito school district. Fraternally he is connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows in Montana. Much interested in promoting the cause of temperance, during his residence in Montana he was district deputy for the Good Templars in the southwestern part of the state, where he organized several lodges and kept things stirring along temperance lines. He is prominent in religious matters, and is an active member of the Episcopal Church, having erected the first church of that denomination at Montecito.

E. T. Bryant

The marriage of Mr. Brundage and Miss Holiday occurred in 1859, and ten years later, in 1869, Mrs. Brundage died, leaving four children: Mrs. Teffts; Everett, who is an undertaker at Dillon, Mont.; John, who is a rancher in Montana; and Mrs. Shaw, who lives near Sheridan, Mont. In 1873 Mr. Brundage married Miss Temple, and of this union there are three children: Mrs. Dinsmore, of Serena; William, and R. Claire.

E. T. BRYANT. Among the foremost business men of Santa Maria is E. T. Bryant, of the firm of Bryant & Trott, hardware and implement merchants. He was born in Anoka county, Minn., in 1857, a son of F. M. and Abigail (Trott) Bryant, natives of Maine. The father, a farmer by occupation, removed to the west when his son was yet very young, and remained for a couple of years in Nevada, then residing the same length of time in Napa county, Cal., and in 1869 taking up his permanent abode in Santa Barbara county. He was one of the first settlers to locate in the vicinity of what is now Santa Maria, his claim being three miles from the town, where he conducted farming enterprises up to the time of his death in 1873. He is survived by his wife, who is still enjoying good health, and is in the possession of the majority of her faculties.

Mr. Bryant had the advantage of his father's experienced farming near Santa Maria, and he studied diligently in the public schools. Not content with living a rural existence he decided to put his business ability to account, and in time became interested in the hardware trade. For five years the business was conducted under the firm name of Bell & Bryant, and, when Mr. Bell sold out in 1892, his stock was appropriated by George J. Trott, the firm name being then changed to Bryant & Trott. The firm have a double store on Main street in the hotel building, and are the leading hardware and agricultural implement merchants in the town. They carry a complete stock of necessities along their line, and the courtesy and honesty observed in the conduct of their affairs insure a continuation of their present large patronage. Mr. Bryant has reaped the reward of his industry in Santa Maria, and owns several town lots besides a fine residence property. Although no office seeker he is in favor of the Republican party, but usually votes for the man best qualified to fill the position. He is fraternally a member of the Knights of Pythias.

In 1882 Mr. Bryant married Laura Sharpe, step-daughter of Reuben Hart, and of this union there are three children, Ruby, Lucile and Elwood. Mr. Bryant occupies an enviable place in the community, and is accounted one of the most worthy of those who have aided in placing the commercial interests of Santa Maria on a firm and substantial level.

JOHN McCOY WILLIAMS. Though an unusually young man to have earned such a distinction, Mr. Williams has the reputation of knowing more about the practical manufacture of beet sugar than any man in the west, and perhaps in the country. This is not surprising when it is known that years ago he mastered every detail of a business destined to assume larger and more comprehensive proportions with every passing year, and that his brain has unceasingly striven to improve upon prevailing methods and enlarge the possibilities of his chosen occupation. As general superintendent of the American Beet Sugar Company's factory at Oxnard, he has demonstrated his ability to cope with the large responsibility and the admirable system in organization in connection with the handling of business so interrupted by complete change in the occupation of those employed. During a part of the season six hundred men are engaged in the full operating of the plant, requiring experienced hands and many more than are often available. During the repair season, there is a dropping to less than one-sixth of the former number of employes, and during this period of four months the new crop is planted and ripened. The strictest economy and foresight are called for, as during the planting and ripening of the beets there is no return financially, and everything depends upon the working of the plant and the crop conditions. The factory does not stand alone in the distinction of making sugar from the beets, as the history of the business shows one-half of the making of the product is in the delivery to the factory of a beet suitable for sugar extraction, containing the highest percentage with the least amount of salts, which gives the highest purity and assists the working of the plant, depending upon well tilled and cultivated soil.

Mr. Williams has with him as a co-partner in the great field of the sugar industry, L. Hache, as general manager of the agricultural department, identified with the company's interests in California. Mr. Hache is a Frenchman, who has been with the company since the start of the industry at Chino, and has unlimited experience and ability, and has succeeded in developing the growth of the sugar beet, obtaining the most excellent quality for the manufacture of sugar. He is a man highly esteemed by all associated with him.

The operating season is called the "campaign," and rightly so, because it is one where so much depends upon the careful thought day and night of those in charge of the various departments, such as mechanical, operating, technical department, and control, supplies and production, disposition of labor, and the official assistants, all of which during the repair season is condensed in one or two departments, the business (so to speak) putting on a different coat with more than one pocket during the operating season of the largest factory in the world, with a complete extraction process working exclusively to make white crystallized sugar from the beet. To cope with the inside workings of such a plant requires a man of broad gauge. Associated with J. McCoy Williams in this field of work, in addition to L. Hache, is Hon. Col. J. A. Duffill, who has entire charge of buying and selling and providing for the crop which Mr. Williams works up and delivers. The distinction gained by Mr. Williams at Norfolk, Neb., and Chino, Cal., that of making first standard granulated sugar continuously without remelts, is maintained at Oxnard, and the three gentlemen spoken of identified with the largest interests of the company, have made a reputation in their various lines of work.

To fully appreciate the methods pursued and results achieved at Oxnard a personal inspection is necessary. One is forced to note the close proximity of the plant to the town by the two massive smoke stacks (of seven thousand horse-power boiler house), which extend to such a height that they may be seen for miles around. The buildings are of brick and stone, iron and cement, and the huge boilers with their accompanying machinery are truly wonderful to behold. Two engines of seven hundred and ninety horse-power are located respectively in the beet house and sugar department. Although the process of manufacture is simple in its story of diffusion, clarification, filtering and graining, yet one can scarcely realize the study which determines the working points. You might say from day to day that some detail is changed by the complicated, varying character of the beets grown under different climatic and soil conditions. As these conditions vary often from year to year, there can be no set rule to determine the exact workings of such a plant, all of which requires a thorough diagnosis of the products and sound judgment to improve the work.

The further one progresses the more interested one becomes in the beet-sugar culture, as opportunity is furnished to work out the technical observations which many chemists have made their life study. Works on the subject are especially to be found in libraries in foreign countries. In the United States there is still great opportunity for scientific study for further developing. Sugar from sunbeams, making this lowly and plebeian beet grow to maturity which formerly basked so complacently under California's sun, is not recognized after doing its turn through the processes from beet sheds, where the wagon loads of beets are deposited by farmers handling the same with lifting nets.

They are now deposited into V shaped bins with sluice ways from where the beets are carried by water to the factory washer, there to be elevated to the top of the building, dropping continuously into two automatic scales, weighing one-half ton. Eighty-five tons per hour are often dropped, ton after ton consecutively, and the capacity of such a plant is that of two thousand tons of beets a day, and five hundred wagon loads of four tons each. This makes one continuous stream of farmers who may be seen hauling beets from all directions. The beets delivered from the scales fall on a revolving disc in which are arranged movable boxes set very carefully with corrugated knives, the blades of which are so particularly filed to obtain very long, sharply defined strips from the beets, these strips one-quarter inch in thickness, ranging about six inches long. To understand thoroughly, one must see the process. The beet, full of cells similar to the pores of one's hands, must be sharply cut to allow the perfect process of diffusion, which is simply the sugar leaving the tissues by the continuous circulation of heated water, for the salts which are more closely bound up in the tissues diffuse last, the sugar passing out from sliced beets diffused in bulk of six tons to tank, by means of fresh water which is continually added to take the place of the sweetened water drawn off from each cell, which is freshly filled until this cell last filled becomes now exhausted and is ready to be refilled. They have made then a complete circuit of battery, which means twelve cells full, one filling, one empty, one drawing off juice to saturation. No. 12 becomes finally No. 1, and so on, fresh water having passed through twelve times. The sugar is then entirely exhausted, and the pulp removed is used for feeding cattle, and new slices take the places of the exhausted ones, and with the varying temperature of the battery as the water, lastly juice passes continually from one cell on to the next through the reheaters, one can readily understand how this is correctly named the "pilot house" of the process.

Much depends upon the complete extraction of the sugar with a minimum amount of loss and as little salts as possible, which is entirely controlled by the condition of the knives and the well-regulated temperature of the battery. The juice is then drawn off to the saturation, where it is limed at once and carbonic acid precipitates the carbonated lime, and separation of the lime from the clear juice takes place in the filter presses, where the juice runs through the jute cloths placed over a closed frame with perforations to allow the juice (after passing through the pores) to flow separate from the lime into the next process, the lime remaining in the open frame, held back by the cloth. The juice is now in a clear amber state, ready for the second defecation, with lime and a more complete filtration through the fine pores of duck filter cloth. From this point the juice is brought through the sulphur shower, which brings the juice down to the required lime alkalinity, which it has been carrying in excess on account of the thorough saturating for defecating and complete filtration, and before the juice goes to the evaporator, where it is brought to a heavier density, and from there to the vacuum pans, where graining takes place. The juice has to be very clearly filtered and brought to almost neutrality. At this point, after graining, the juice (in the form of fillmass) (better understood as crystals surrounded by adhering syrups) must now be separated by centrifugal force, and the machines running eleven hundred revolutions per minute throw the syrup out through the perforations of the screen, showing almost instantly the clearing up of the dark mass to a light amber color, with the addition of a watering pot full of water thus giving a clear white sugar. The syrups, having left the mass, are taken back and treated and again enter the process, being made into one standard granulated sugar, of which we find the granulators take a prominent part in the drying of the sugar. They are arranged so as to have a current of hot air passing through the cylinder as the sugar falls back and forth in a cloud like a heavy snow storm. It dries each crystal separate and sparkling, and reaches the sacks perfectly cool and ready for use. From five to seven thousand bags of granulated sugar, of one hundred pounds each, are turned out daily.

The average person, whose relation to the beet-sugar industry is only indirect, does not realize the intense life, the eternal vigilance and careful planning required in every department. The product of Chino demonstrated that beet sugar can be made equal to the standard of refined cane. The success at Oxnard has been even more pronounced, and experts have failed to distinguish between the Oxnard beet sugar and the standard quality of refined cane.

The factory is now consuming from fifteen hundred to two thousand tons of beets daily. This depends upon the richness of the beets, the standard being that of two thousand tons for a fifteen per cent beet. For each increase in percentage means one hundred tons less than the standard capacity, and at one time has worked as many as twenty-four hundred tons of beets daily, and is now turning out several hundred bags of dry granulated per day above the stated capacity reached at the sugar end of five thousand bags. This is eminently satisfactory to the men who have built up the industry, but it is no less so to the men who look after the details, and who are held responsible for the successful operation of the plant. The personal satisfaction that comes from a contract well filled belongs to many men at the factory, who have counted the labor of days and nights as nothing if success could be achieved.

With the commencing of sugar making in 1902, B. O. Sprague assumed the duties of first assistant superintendent under J. McCoy Williams, the post held by Mr. Arendt, now superintendent at Loveland, Colo. Mr. Sprague will have active charge of the day working of the factory, and outline the work in general for the entire operating of the plant under direction of J. McCoy Williams, whose position is becoming more general as the many departments of the plant demand attention in their increased proportion and call for strict economy as the policy of one of the largest, if not the largest, establishments of its kind in the world. Mr. Sprague has been with the company here since the building of the factory. He is a nephew of H. T. Oxnard, and has always been identified with the sugar business. Mr. Sprague understands his work thoroughly and has the confidence of his superiors. He has earned his promotion by attention to business at whatever post he has been assigned, which means at practically every station in the big mill.

W. J. Wayte, an engineer of renown and ability, has recently entered the employ of the American Beet Sugar Company as consulting engineer. The superintendents in charge of operating, and Engineer J. Sailer, of long practical experience at Chino and Oxnard, make a strong combination of earnest and faithful workers in the operating department.

In regard to Mr. Williams and his connection with the beet-sugar industry, we quote the following from the Chino Valley Champion.

"The fact that sugar of standard quality can be made from beets regardless of the purity of the juices is one thing that prior to this year (1899) has been a disputed point. Those who are familiar with the work of the last campaign at the factory in Chino, however, know it to be a verity. This result is the outcome of the technical efforts of Superintendent J. McCoy Williams. To the scientific sugar world this means an increased yield, as the success of working lower products into first quality of granulated sugar has not been accomplished before in the states, and possibly such success for a whole campaign, without making part of the syrups into raw sugar, is unknown in the sugar world. By this means the factory operates without unknown losses, and may still place on the market direct granulated sugar, all of a superior grade. * * * We take pleasure in congratulating Mr. Williams, an American superintendent, on having perfected the new system of treating the juices in process, which we understand differs technically in many details from any ever before used. Mr. Williams is a liberal thinker, active in all departments, and especially popular among the workmen, who highly esteem his fair treatment."

John McCoy Williams was born in Brooklyn, N. Y., in 1870, a son of Edward F. and Ella M. (Miller) Williams, natives of Providence, R. I. For many years his father was interested in the wholesale woolen business, and was associated with the firms of A. L. Libby & Co., A. D. Julyard & Co., and Catlin & Co., being in charge of their mills from time to time. Since his death, which occurred in 1899, his wife has continued to live in Brooklyn. He was a descendant of Roger Williams, the founder of Providence plantation, now known as the state of Rhode Island. By him the religious liberty which now characterizes the American people was advocated in all of its fullness, and for this benefit to the human race his name deserves to be held in everlasting remembrance. He preferred religious liberty among the wilds of America to absolute submission to the ceremonies of the English church as then prescribed by law. Accompanied by his wife, he sailed from Bristol, England, and after a voyage of sixty days arrived at Boston, February 5, 1631. He died in Providence in 1683. Integrity, undaunted courage and prompt decision marked all his conduct. Every man, of whatever clime or color, he regarded as a brother. In all the relations of domestic and social life, his conduct was most exemplary; and over his whole course his piety shed a hallowed luster. He was the first person in modern Christendom to assert in its plenitude the doctrine of the liberty of the conscience and the equality of opinions before the law. Borrowing the rhetoric employed by his antagonist in derision, we may compare him to the lark, the pleasant bird of the peaceful summer, that, "affecting to soar aloft, springs upward from the ground, takes his rise from pole to tree," and at last, surmounting the highest hills, utters his clear carols through the skies of morning.

Daniel, son of Roger Williams, married Rebecca Power, by whom he had seven children. Among them was Pelig, Sr., who had seven children by his marriage to Elizabeth Carpenter. Pelig, Jr., had eight children by his wife, Mary Sheldon. The next generation was represented by Caleb Williams, who married Rachel Barton. Their son, Edward Sheldon Williams, married Susan Foster, and had five children, among them being Edward Foster Williams, who married Ella Eudora Miller, and had five children. Of the seventh generation, Edward Foster Williams was in late life the closest if not the only direct male descendant living, and he has left the three sons, also one grandson, Roger Williams, the latter representing the ninth generation from the original founder in America.

Not only is John McCoy Williams a direct descendant of Roger Williams through his father, but also on his mother's side. The Mayflower brought over some of his maternal ancestors, and later history recorded the arrival of the ship Lyon with Roger Williams and his followers, seeking freedom of thought, which is a characteristic of the states to-day. The youngest son of Roger Williams was Joseph, who married Lydia, daughter of Thomas Olney, Sr. Their son, Joseph, Jr., married Lydia Harrington. The next generation was represented by Jeremiah, who married Abigail Mathewson. Joseph, son of Jeremiah, married Hannah Paine and had four children, viz: Hannah, Mrs. William Woodward; Mrs. Rebecca Alger; Mrs. Sally Miller, and Joseph. Mrs. Sally Miller had seven children, namely: Pardon, Joseph W., Edward Franklin, Sampson, Ephraim, Barton and Cornelius. Edward Franklin Miller and Louisa Hitchcock had nine children, viz.: Henry Franklin, who married Frances Virginia Child; Luke Hitchcock, who married Caroline Amelia Whipple; Edward Franklin, who married Frances Caroline Starkweather; Charlotte Hitchcock, who died young; Charlotte Hitchcock (the second of that name), who married Oren Aldrich Ballou; Louisa, who became the wife of Sylvanus Tingley; George Washington, whose first wife was Harriet Ada Perkins, and his second Caroline Eliza Harlowe; Lewis Jencks, who married Jennie McDonald; and Ella Eudora, who became the wife of Edward Foster Williams. To the marriage of Edward F. and Ella E. Williams there were born five children, viz.: Edward Miller, who died young; John McCoy, of Oxnard, Cal.; Augustus Libby, Roger and Louise Miller. Of these children the second son, John McC., married Lilian Cuthbert Hamilton, by whom he has a son, Roger, who represents the ninth generation of the family in America, on the father's side, and the tenth generation on the mother's side.

John McCoy Williams was educated at the Summit Military Academy and High School of Boston, after which he took a special course in Harvard College, preparing himself for his life work and study. He entered the employ of the American Beet Sugar Company at Norfolk, Neb., first as chemist and later as foreman, graduating through the various departments of their plant until he became superintendent. From there he was transferred to Chino, Cal., as superintendent. When the factory at Oxnard entered upon its second season he assumed its supervision. He has now entire charge of everything connected with the manufacturing department of the establishment, and has taken a prominent part in the general organization and affairs of the company. Endowed with inherited determination and decision, he has had opportunity to develop the same and has aided in the general development of the beet-sugar industry through many channels. Fair treatment and a wide knowledge of human nature have won for him the friendship of the many who are mutually interested with him in the success of the business, and a feeling of kindness and good-will pervades all departments of the giant concern. His discernment has suggested many improvements in the construction of the factory, over those formerly employed at Norfolk, Neb., and Chino, Cal. As previously mentioned, he was the first man in the United States to successfully produce white sugar by perfecting and treating the lower products and mixing back to obtain one standard of sugar; and was the first successful, if not the first superintendent in the United States.

The wife of John McCoy Williams was Lilian Cuthbert Hamilton, of New York, daughter of James G. Hamilton, who has been a prominent member of the Stock Exchange for the last twenty years, and, with his brother, C. K. Hamilton, was an original promoter of the beet-sugar industry. They were direct descendants of a great historical family of English and Scottish origin, dating as far back as the Earl of Leicester, 1190, a family of strong character, determination and integrity; and on the mother's side the well-known Virginia family of Cuthberts, much beloved and esteemed. The Hamilton brothers formed a connection with the Oxnards, who were identified with sugar-making in the east in the early days of the Fulton refinery in Brooklyn. The latter, with their wide and varied experience of years in the sugar business, together with Hamilton, made a combination of experience and capital, with the support of the Messrs. Cutting, of New York, men of financial standing and broad and liberal backers. Henry T. Oxnard and James G. Hamilton have held very prominent positions in the political world in protecting the industry, and are conspicuously identified with the American Beet Sugar Association of the United States and especially the California interests. Their efforts have been recognized and they will long be honored as pioneers of a most important industry. As a result of their labors, the Norfolk plant was followed by the building of the Grand Island factory in 1890, the Chino factory in 1890, Oxnard in 1898, and Rocky Ford, Colo., in 1900. Two years ago the consolidation of these factories took place and the American Beet Sugar Company was formed. With just protection, they will continue to build factories and enrich communities, of which we need no better example than is furnished by Oxnard, Cal. Mr. Hamilton, although not identified with the immediate course of operating, is secretary of the American Beet Sugar Company and a stockholder in the same. His son, Ernest C. Hamilton, superintendent of Chino, and son-in-law, J. McCoy Williams, superintendent of Oxnard, are both in official capacities as directing the affairs of the works in California. Augustus L. Williams, a brother of J. McCoy, was born in Summit, N. J., and educated in Stevens College, and is now one of the assistant superintendents at Oxnard. In 1900 he married Elsie Griswold Ely, of Brooklyn, N. Y., member of the prominent old Ely family of Connecticut. A younger brother, Roger Williams, is connected with the industry at Loveland, Colo., and married Miss Edith Woodruff, daughter of Colonel Woodruff, of San Francisco, formerly located on Governor's Island, New York. A sister, Louise M.

Williams, possessing great personality of character, is prominently recognized in society circles in Boston and New York, and is interested in the orders of Colonial Dames and Daughters of the American Revolution.

There is one grandson, Roger Williams, son of J. McCoy Williams.

L. HACHE. The succulent beet has long held its own as an important member of the vegetable kingdom, and as a sugar producer its claims for recognition are of long standing, but it has remained for Southern California to develop to the full the really valuable sweetness of this particular growth, and to place its merits substantially before the world. That any one man should devote his entire time for ten years or more to the study of any one vegetable, to exhaustively inquire into its habits, the soil in which it is best fostered and grown to maturity, and the cultivation requisite for its best interests, would strike the unthinking as odd. Yet so great is the demand for sugar production, and so great the care required for proper development, that the once humble beet may be said to now be the aristocrat among its fellows and to have withdrawn into an exclusiveness remote from its plebeian former associates, the onion, parsnip and others in the same grade of vegetable society.

If an authority on beets exists in the country, it is embodied in Mr. Hache, who devotes his entire time to a study of the peculiarities and possibilities of the beet. For ten years this earnest student has been superintendent of the agricultural department of the American Beet Sugar Company, at Grand Island, Oxnard and Chino, with headquarters at Oxnard. He carefully observes the methods adopted by the beet farmers of the localities, and has under him four assistants, or field men, whose duty it is to report weekly concerning the prevailing conditions. In turn Mr. Hache reports to the head office in San Francisco, and thus no lax methods are allowed to creep in, and improvement rather than deterioration is the result. The company owns three thousand acres of land at Oxnard alone, one-third of which is planted in beets.

To his primary interest in agriculture Mr. Hache owes his early training in his native land of France, where he was born in 1856, and where he lived until 1890. From his boyhood days he was taught to assist his father on the home farm, and he eventually engaged in farming on his own responsibility, with marked success. Consequently, upon immigrating to the United States, he renewed his association with the work for which he was best fitted by nature and acquirement, and at once found employment with the company, who have found his services of most conspicuous value.

ADOLFO CAMARILLO. The name of Camarillo carries with it the impression of vast stretches of land under one ownership, great agricultural undertakings in the early days of Ventura county, association with the illustrious mission fathers, and encounters with the red men of the plains. From the birth of that oft-recalled pioneer, Juan Camarillo, which occurred in the City of Mexico in 1812, California was destined to profit by his emigration from his native land in 1834. As one of a little colony that started out upon the sea in search of untried lands at Monterey, and that, becoming tired of winds and waves, moored their craft at San Diego, continuing their journey by land, he was filled with hope for a future of realized dreams.

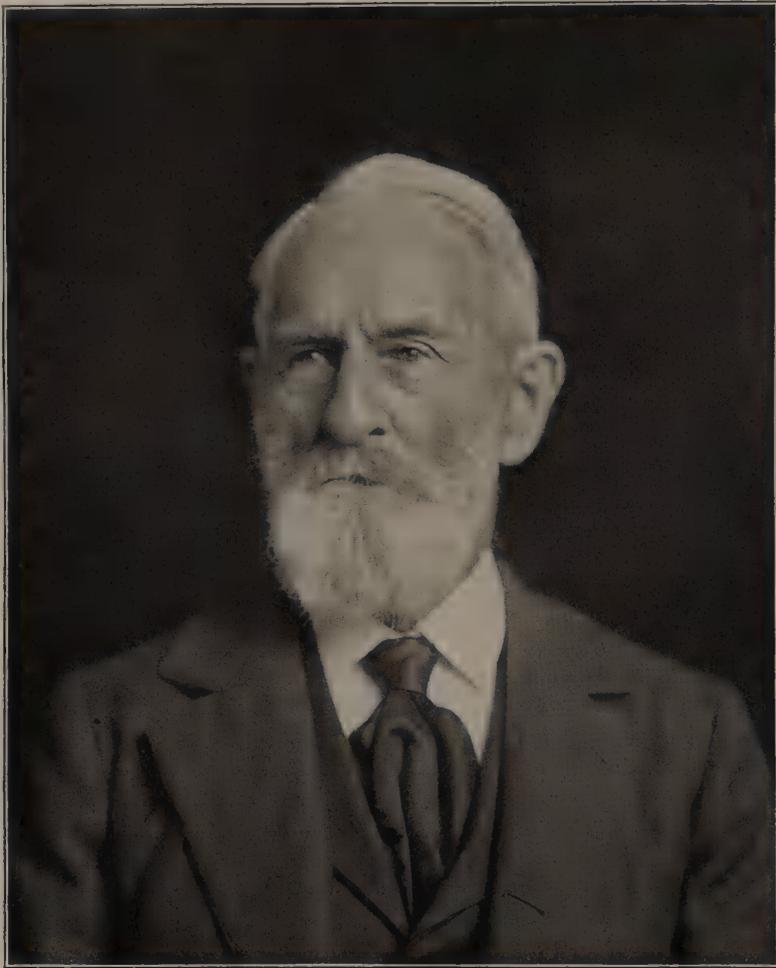

Departing from his companions at Santa Barbara, he became a trader with the Indians between San Francisco and San Diego, disposing of their wares and receiving currency therefor. The hospitable mission fathers gave him a room in which to lodge, and thither came the Indians and transacted their business. With the funds thus realized, amounting to $3,000, he embarked upon a business venture, and opened a store in Santa Barbara, of which he was one of the first merchants. Eventually he removed to Ventura, where he constructed a large adobe house with twenty rooms, one of the first dwellings in the town. Gradually many lands came into his possession, and at the time of his death, December 4, 1880, he had a ranch of ten thousand acres at the head of Pleasant valley, eighteen miles east of Ventura. In the very early days the Bard and Camarillo families were on most friendly terms, and had many business transactions in common. The enormous ranch was left to his two sons, Adolfo and Juan E., and his town property of $40,000 was left to his four daughters, namely: Adelaida, who is Mrs. A. C. Moraga, of Santa Barbara; Maria, Mrs. José de Arnaz, of Los Angeles; Aldegunda, wife of A. F. del Campo, of Ventura; and Arcadia, who married J. J. Mahoney, of San Francisco.

Since the elder Camarillo's death the ranch has not been divided, but is occupied and worked jointly by the two sons. Five thousand acres of the land are tillable. The principal staples raised are barley, beets and beans. The Oxnard branch of the Southern Pacific Railroad runs through the ranch, and Camarillo station is about a mile from the residence of each of the brothers. There is also a good store and post-office, and the Southern Pacific Milling Company has a warehouse on the grounds. Each of the brothers has a separate home, that of Adolfo having been erected in 1893, and still regarded as one of the most beautiful homes in Southern California. Its exterior and interior bear many traces of the workings of artistic natures, with a regard for harmony and convenience, accentuated by modern improvements such as gas, hot and cold water, telephone and call bells. The hedges and lawns are an example of expert gardening, and the roads are invitingly hard, smooth and white. The home is presided over by Mrs. Isabel (Menchaca) Camarillo, who became the wife of Adolfo Camarillo in 1888. They have four children, Rosa, Eva, Isabel and Adolfo. In politics Mr. Camarillo is a Democrat, while in religion, like his ancestors for generations past, he is a member of the Roman Catholic Church.

CHARLES S. CLARKE. Descended from Scotch ancestry, the Clarke family has been represented in America ever since Colonel Clarke crossed the ocean in the Mayflower and settled at Northampton, where his body lies buried. From that day to this the family has not been without a representative in Northampton, and Charles S. Clarke was himself a native of the historic old town. However, he was reared principally in Kirkland, Ohio, where his father, Quartus Clarke, owned and operated a large mill. During the early '40s he and his brother Edward settled in Illinois, and there he engaged in teaching, for which his academic education had qualified him. Later, on account of ill health, he went south, and for a time was interested in a mercantile business in Memphis, Tenn. About 1848 he settled in Peoria, Ill., and began merchandising, but, deciding that a less confining occupation would be beneficial to his health, he disposed of his goods and bought a farm near Peoria. Eighteen months later he returned to the city, where he remained four years, meantime taking an active part in building the railroad (now the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy) running from Peoria to Ellenwood. A subsequent investment comprised a farm twenty-two miles from Peoria, and, settling upon the property, he became interested in raising fruits and general farming products. Meantime he also owned one of the first distilleries of Peoria, but after a time turned the business over to his sons, and they continued to operate the plant until the death of his son, Charles C. Clarke.

The marriage of Mr. Clarke, in Mentor, Lake county, Ohio, in 1846, united him with Miss Melissa M. Randall, a daughter of Elias and Mindwell (Corning) Randall, natives respectively of Rutland county, Vt., and New Hampshire. Her maternal grandfather, Col. Warren Corning, a pioneer of Ohio, purchased a large tract of land in Lake county and afterward sold it out in town lots, Mentor being established on the property. When a young man, Elias Randall settled in Mentor and bought the Corning homestead, where he conducted farm pursuits. His last days were spent in the home of his daughter, Mrs. Clarke, in Peoria, Ill., and his death occurred at seventy-seven years. His wife died in the same city at eighty-three years of age. Both were members of the Christian Church. Of their seven children, three are living, one son, Willard, being a large rancher and a resident of Los Angeles.

A. C. Buffington

A member of a family of wealth and culture, Mrs. Clarke was given excellent advantages in her girlhood and was educated principally in the Ladies' Seminary at Painesville, Ohio. She made her home in Mentor until her marriage, when she left the old familiar surroundings to accompany her husband to Memphis, Tenn., and from there to Illinois in 1849. For many years she was prominently identified with the best society of Peoria, and it was a source of regret to her many friends there when, in 1891, the ill health of a daughter rendered a change of climate necessary. Thereupon she came to Los Angeles and has since made her home at No. 1124 West Adams street, where, surrounded by all the comforts which ample means and artistic tastes render possible, she is passing the evening of her noble and useful life. Only one of her children is with her, a daughter, Mary. The three sons remained in Peoria, where they have long been prominent citizens and successful financiers. Sumner and Chauncey D. are both now somewhat retired from active business cares, although the supervision of their large investments in Peoria engross much of their time. The second son, Charles C., who was head of the distillery and at one time mayor of Peoria, died in that city September 1, 1901. The eldest daughter, Lucy, is the wife of John K. Speed, of Memphis, Tenn.

From the time of establishing his residence in Peoria until his death, which occurred in November, 1890, Mr. Clarke was interested in the building up of the city, and many important enterprises owed their inception to his public spirit. His seventy-six years of life were busily, usefully and happily passed, and he exemplified in his daily conduct and his large charities the spirit of Masonry, of which he was a member. His interest in politics was not active, yet he kept in touch with matters pertaining to the public welfare and cast his ballot with the Republican party after its organization. Among the friends of himself and wife were some of the most influential people of Peoria, their literary tastes, breadth of knowledge, familiarity with art and fondness for all that enhances culture and uplifts the world making them welcomed guests in the most select circles. Among their friends was Col. Robert Ingersoll, in whose beliefs they thoroughly sympathized and whose warm friendship remained theirs until death. Another of their friends was Mrs. Bradley, whose gifts to Peoria in memory of her husband were so munificent as to attract the attention of the entire country. Many charitable organizations, rendered necessary by the rapid growth of the city, received the benefit of their influence and personal contributions. The death of Mr. Clarke and the subsequent removal of his wife to Los Angeles was a source of regret to the pioneer circles of the city, among whose members they had long been honored and prominent.

A. C. BUFFINGTON. No more courageous and hopeful pioneer braved the dangers of the overland trail in 1850 than A. C. Buffington, at present a resident of Los Angeles, and resting from the ceaseless activity which characterized his earlier career in California, and rendered him one of the most eager developers of the latent resources of the state. No distinctive phase of pioneer life, no trials, victories or failures following upon the footsteps of these forerunners of western civilization, but have indelibly impressed their lessons upon his strong personality, and left as their handiwork a typical representative of the creators of the splendid harvests and general well-being of the land of the setting sun.

Although born in Meigs county, Ohio, March 15, 1820, Mr. Buffington was reared on Buffington Island, W. Va. This island, then one hundred and sixty acres in extent, but now a little larger, was the possession of the paternal grandfather, Joel Buffington, who spent the greater part of his life on it, and eventually died there. His son, Joseph, the father of A. C., was born in Hampshire county, Va., and subsequently came into the ownership of Buffington Island, which he devoted to farming and stock-raising. The first keel boat on the Ohio river was operated by him, and he navigated the Ohio and Mississippi rivers for several years. About 1837 he removed to Iowa (then known as Black Hawk's purchase), and located upon a farm near Wapello, Louisa county, where he engaged in farming until his death. His wife, Chloe (Harvey) Buffington, was born in Baltimore, Md., a daughter of William Harvey, a native of England, and later a resident of Baltimore, from which city he removed to the farm upon which he died in Virginia. Mrs. Buffington, who died in Iowa, was the mother of thirteen children, and all grew to maturity. Her youngest son, A. C., at the age of over eighty-one years, is now the only surviving member of the family, although the others lived to a good old age.

In his youth Mr. Buffington learned to farm on Buffington Island, and his education was obtained at the early subscription schools. In 1837 he accompanied the family to Iowa, the journey being made by wagon through Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, and they crossed the Mississippi river at Burlington. He remained on the home farm in Louisa county, Iowa, until twenty-three years old, and assisted in breaking the crude land and developing its hidden richness. As an independent venture he took up a farm at Pella, Marion county, Iowa, which he sold in 1846 to the first Holland settlers of the neighborhood. Another farm improved by him was in the vicinity of Oskaloosa, Iowa, and upon this he lived until he came to California in 1850. In the spring of 1850 a crowd started across the plains with ox-teams, going up the Platte on the north side, crossing the Sweetwater and on to Salt Lake City, where Mr. Buffington saw and heard Brigham Young. They then continued their journey by way of the Humboldt and Carson rivers, and came down Bear river to Sacramento, the trip having consumed five months. On the way they had several skirmishes with the Indians, and lost one man and nearly all of the cattle. Mr. Buffington at once went to the Rough and Ready mines on Deer creek, a branch of the Yuba, where he engaged in placer mining for seven years with considerable success. He then went to Marin county and bought a dairy farm, and for ten years manufactured butter for the San Francisco market. In 1867 he located in San Luis Obispo county, between Cambria and Cayucos, originally owning six hundred and forty acres, to which he added until he had two thousand acres. This fine property was devoted to the dairy and stock-raising business for fifteen years, after which he settled in Orange county, near Newport Corners, and bought another farm. Two years later, in 1884, he removed to Los Angeles and built a fine residence on the University addition, in which he lived for a time, and afterwards settled upon a farm of twenty acres near Burbank. Eventually he permanently settled in Los Angeles, where he is well and favorably known, and has taken a prominent part in the city's growth and prosperity. He still owns twelve hundred acres of land in San Luis Obispo county, and his farm near Burbank.

Mr. Buffington was married in Louisa county, Iowa, to Amanda Layton, a native of Ohio, and who died in Marin county, Cal. She was the mother of ten children: Ceres, who became Mrs. Osgood, died in Marin county, Cal.; Ruth, who is now Mrs. Kuffel, lives in San Bernardino; Marrietta, who is now Mrs. Hill, resides in San Luis Obispo county; Martha, who is Mrs. Fletcher, lives in Kern county; Quincy, who is a dairy rancher, lives in San Luis Obispo county; Louisa died in Marin county when quite young; Isabella also died young; Amanda died in Marin county before attaining her majority; Anne E. became Mrs. Everett, and died in San Luis Obispo county; and Amelia died in infancy. A second marriage was contracted by Mr. Buffington in Marin county, Cal., with Mary E. Chamberlain, who was born in Idaho (where the old Oregon trail crossed the Snake river), where her parents stopped temporarily on their journey to join the pioneers of Oregon.

Her father, Aaron Chamberlain, was murdered in 1849 while returning with considerable money from San Francisco. His watch was recovered by his widow many years later in Oregon and she wore it till her death in San José, Cal. Of the second marriage of Mr. Buffington there were twelve children, viz.: Grant, who was killed by the accidental discharge of his gun while hunting, and who was a student at the university; Thomas Dick, who is living in San Luis Obispo county; Winfield Scott, Ida and Mary, all of whom died in San Luis Obispo county; Grace, who lives in Los Angeles; Celia, who died young; Abram, who is deceased; Charles; Harvey, of San Luis Obispo; Olive Lay and Lillian Gertrude. Charles, Olive Lay and Lillian are living at home. Five of the children died of diphtheria within eleven days in San Luis Obispo county.

During the war Mr. Buffington was an Abolitionist and Republican, and cast his first presidential vote for John C. Fremont. He is now a Prohibitionist, and while in Marin county served on the board of supervisors. While living in Iowa he became a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, later was noble grand of Harmony Lodge at Rough and Ready, and is now a member of Cayucos Lodge No. 300. He is a member of the Church of the Nazarene.

O. P. COOK. The ranching interests of the Santa Clara valley are ably represented by Mr. Cook, who is a man of progressive spirit and keeps abreast with all the developments made in agricultural matters in his community. He was born in Connersville, Ind., February 10, 1860, and grew to manhood on a farm near that place. On attaining his majority he determined to seek a livelihood beyond the Rocky mountains. October, 1881, found him in California, his first location being at Coleta, just west of Santa Barbara, where he leased the Santa Barbara nursery from Joseph Sexton. At the expiration of seven years the nursery was transferred to the Sexton ranch in the Santa Clara valley of the south, where it was conducted for several years on an extensive scale. From fifty to seventy-five acres were in young trees, furnishing both deciduous and citrus fruit stock. For some years this was the only nursery in Ventura county and its business was large and important.

In 1890 Mr. Cook bought forty-two acres comprising a part of the Kile ranch near Montalvo. Resuming the nursery business in his new location, he set out forty acres in nursery stock. For ten years he continued in the same industry, but in 1900, deciding another venture would prove more profitable, he took out his trees and began to raise Lima beans, with sixteen inches of rainfall, crops averaging one ton to the acre. In addition to the cultivation of his own land, he has leased the Truesdale ranch, which gives him control of one hundred and sixty acres. It has been his aim to maintain a high class of improvements on his ranch, which he is ambitious to bring to an ideal state of cultivation. Its value is improved by a well three hundred feet deep, which supplies the entire neighborhood with water.

Mary A Ashley

The marriage of Mr. Cook occurred December 30, 1890, and united him with Miss Maude L. White, of Ventura, Cal. When a mere child she was orphaned by the death of her parents, Benjamin and Margaret White, natives respectively of Virginia and Kentucky. In religion she is connected with the Methodist Episcopal Church South, while fraternally she is an active worker in the Rebekah Lodge, to which Mr. Cook also belongs, as he does also to Ventura Lodge No. 201, I. O. O. F. In politics he has been a lifelong adherent to the principles of the Republican party, and is in thorough sympathy with its doctrines. For individuals and for the government as well, he believes in the policy of expansion. When he came to California it was with no means or friends, but through his persevering industry for twenty or more years he has risen to a position of honor among the people of Ventura county.

MRS. MARY A. ASHLEY. To enumerate the many enterprises in Santa Barbara which have been started and placed on a substantial footing by Mrs. Mary A. Ashley, and to deservedly credit her with the forethought and business ability so readily recognized by those who are familiar with her undertakings, is to follow the untiring steps of a woman animated by the most kindly and humanitarian motives, and gifted with a knowledge of what is needful in a large city to insure comparative comfort in illness, pleasure and profit in health, and sanitary conditions for people in whatsoever walk of life.

The traditions of her people and the early surrounding influences of her life were such as to inspire Mrs. Ashley with broad ideas of existence. Born into the Morrille family January 5, 1819, at Sutton, Caledonia county, Vt., she is of French and English descent. Her father, Dr. Jacob C. Morrille, was a graduate physician, and was a native of Runnymede, N. H. For many years he engaged in practice in Sutton, Vt., but in 1837 located in Hennepin, Putnam county, Ill., and later in Magnolia, Ill. In those early days the claims of civilization were not exorbitant among the pioneers, many crude customs prevailed, which would hardly come up to the expectations of the disciples of medicine at the present time. For his medical services in Vermont, Dr. Morrille received as remuneration all manner of produce, sheep, cattle, maple sugar and wool, having indeed little use for money, except for the tax collector and the United States government, which disposed of profits to the extent of twenty-five cents for a single postage stamp. There were no matches, and on every hearth was kept a continual fire. The life of this pioneer physician was brightened by the companionship of his wife, formerly Mary Baker, who was born in Westminster, Mass., a daughter of John Baker, also of Massachusetts, and in later life was owner of a carding and woolen mill at Barre, Vt. Mrs. Morrille, who came to California in 1870, and died in 1881 at the age of eighty-five years, was the mother of three children, all girls of whom Mrs. Ashley is the only one living.

The education of Mary A. Morrille was acquired at Lyndon Academy in Vermont, and at the age of twenty years she came to Illinois. The journey thence was accomplished in a rather tedious way, and quite at variance with present day methods of transportation. November 1st the family started by stage to Montpelier, then by stage to Burlington, by steamer to White Hall, to Buffalo by way of the canal, and by steamer to Cleveland. An intention to reach the Ohio river by way of the Ohio canal was frustrated, owing to the fact that the canal was frozen over, and they were therefore obliged to finish the route to Illinois by stage to Ohio, steamer to St. Louis, then up the Illinois river to Hennepin, the head of navigation. One wonders how a Wall street speculator would like to spend his time globe circling at this rate of speed.

The marriage of Miss Morrille and Dr. James B. Ashley occurred at Hennepin, June 12, 1839. Dr. Ashley was born in Windsor county, Vt., a son of Jonathan Ashley, who was a native of Massachusetts, and one of the first settlers of Barnard, Vt. He was a farmer by occupation, and married a Miss Osborn, who was born in Vermont. Dr. Ashley was educated at Dartmouth and Castleton Medical School from which he in due time graduated. In 1839 he located in Illinois, and resided in Magnolia, Putnam county, and in Livingston county, owning nearly two sections of land. He lived in Magnolia until coming to California. Owing to failing health he removed to Santa Barbara in 1869, where he built a residence, bought land, loaned money, and lived in the enjoyment of his beautiful adopted town until his death, January 28, 1876, at the age of three score and ten years. He was a Republican in politics, a physician of ability, and a man of high moral standing in the communities in which he lived.

Since her husband's death Mrs. Ashley has continued to live in Santa Barbara, her time more than occupied with the management of her property, of which she possesses a considerable amount, and in the prosecution of those philanthropic enterprises for which she is so well known. She is a spiritualist in religion, and a Republican in politics. About thirteen years ago her fertile brain evolved the project of building the Cottage Hospital, which, without her, would never have been the city pride and model institution that it is to-day. She organized some of the women of Santa Barbara into a hospital association of which she was made president, and which position she continued to hold for ten years, or until the then erected institution was self-sustaining. By means of entertainments and other devices, general interest and donations from those who thoroughly sympathized with her in her work, the money was raised, and the erection began. To-day the Cottage Hospital has a reputation all over the state, and has no superior in its equipment and general management. Another improvement in the city directly traceable to the energy and executive ability of Mrs. Ashley is the city library, for which she had long felt a necessity, and which she ardently worked to institute and maintain. Numerous other undertakings of equal merit and equal universal utility are also the result of her insight and practicability, and it is conceded that her accomplishments in this California town are of the most substantial and lasting kind.

DON GASPAR OREÑA. The life which this narrative sketches began in the pueblo de Oreña, province Sautander, Spain. The home in which the boyhood years of the Spanish youth were passed was one typical of old-world civilization, culture and refinement. The father, Don Lorenzo de Oreña, was a merchant of Cadiz and a captain in the Spanish army during the Napoleonic era. The mother, Dona Maria de Escandon de la Guerra, was a daughter of Juan de la Guerra, a wealthy Spaniard whose life was one of leisure and of participation in the larger movements where the arts and sciences reign and culture abounds.

When only sixteen years of age Don Gaspar Oreña began a life of travel and adventure. A sailing vessel bound from Cadiz for New York had him as a passenger, and from New York he went to Boston, where he boarded the ship Delaware for the Sandwich Islands, via Cape Horn. In five months the islands were reached, and three months later he boarded a ship bound for Monterey, Cal. In this way, while a mere lad, he gained a broad knowledge of men and countries that has since proved helpful to him. The fall of 1840 found him in Santa Barbara, where for a time he visited an uncle. At the suggestion of his uncle he secured a clerkship with a large mercantile establishment in Mexico, but the climate proved unhealthful and he returned to Santa Barbara in two and one-half years. His next employment was as supercargo of the barque Guipuzcoana, owned by Don José Antonio Aguirre, and for about five years he was engaged in trading between California and South American ports, carrying hides and tallow south and returning with a cargo of merchandise. When gold was discovered in California, the Don sold his vessel, and Mr. Oreña engaged in trading on his own account. In 1852 he bought the Rancho de la Espada at Point Conception, comprising fifteen thousand acres, and this land he stocked with cattle, an enterprise that brought him large returns in subsequent years. Meantime other ranches were added to his property, including San Julian ranch of forty-eight thousand acres, which he had bought from the estate of Don José de la Guerra. Indeed at one time his landed possessions aggregated fifty leagues and the brands he adopted were to be seen on cattle throughout that entire country. His herds constantly increased, and the prudent oversight of the business brought excellent financial returns.

Hard times came and his losses were heavy, but he has managed his affairs so that he has gained a competency. Though since 1887 Mr. Oreña has made San Francisco his home principally, his interests in Southern California are so great that necessarily much of his time is spent in this part of the state. Included in his possessions are twenty-five residences which he built in Los Angeles, between Sixth and Seventh, Hope and Flower streets; an entire block of business houses on State street, Santa Barbara; ranches in Ventura and San Luis Obispo counties; Los Alamos rancho, Santa Barbara county, comprising five thousand acres; and Cuyama Rancho No. 1, aggregating twenty-two thousand acres, in San Luis Obispo and Santa Barbara counties; besides various other valuable properties in Southern California. In the management of all of this property he is ably assisted by his sons. The eldest son, Leopoldo de Oreña, was, until his death in 1900, manager of his father's large business interests in Santa Barbara. The second son, Dario, is now superintendent of the ranch here; Orestes is an attorney in San Francisco, while Arthur superintends his father's Santa Barbara interests. A daughter, Anita, died at twenty-four years of age; Serena Rosa is the wife of Wm. De Koch, of San Francisco, and Acacia T., the youngest of the family, resides with her father at No. 779 Geary street, San Francisco. Mr. Oreña's wife, whom he married in 1854, was Senorita Maria Antonia de la Guerra, daughter of Capt. Don José Antonio de la Guerra.

Notwithstanding the accident of birth in a foreign country and of foreign parentage, Don Gaspar Oreña is a patriotic American, intensely loyal to the country of his adoption, and a firm believer in the perpetuity of our national institutions, over which the stars and stripes shall forever float. In his political preference, he is a Democrat. It has never been his desire to occupy public office, and the only position he ever accepted was that of supervisor of Santa Barbara county, in which capacity he served for six years. During all of this time he refused to accept any remuneration for his services, it being his desire that he might donate, gratuitously, to his country whatever of help it was possible to give. Personally he possesses the proud spirit which is his by inheritance from a long line of aristocratic Spanish ancestors, but with it are combined a geniality of disposition and kindness of heart that have won and retained the friendship of his American associates.

FRANKLIN A. COREY. The foreman of the Limonera rancho, which is situated near Santa Paula, Ventura county, came to California in the fall of 1886 from Rockford, Ill., of which city he is a native and near which as a boy he roamed over his grandfather's estate or assisted in tilling the soil of the farm. His father, Alonzo Corey, was a native of New York, but as early as 1828 settled at Edgar, Clark county, Ill., and in 1835 removed to the undeveloped regions of Winnebago county, same state. As the population of the county increased his land rose in value, and his influence also became more apparent. A believer in Republican principles, he was frequently called upon to occupy positions of local trust, and was a prominent man in his community.

In Chicago, Ill., in 1872, Franklin A. Corey married Miss Mary Van Sickler, a native of Canada. In the fall of 1886 he came to the Pacific coast. Settling in the Santa Clara Valley of the South, for eleven years he devoted his attention to raising lima beans, and during part of that time had four hundred acres planted in this vegetable. For several years he had charge of a part of the old Herold rancho, four hundred acres of which were planted in walnuts. Since coming to California he has made the raising of walnuts and beans his specialties. In 1899 he became associated with the Limonera rancho, of which he was made general foreman in February, 1900, and still continues in this position.

At this writing Mr. Corey owns two hundred and fifty bee hives on the Santa Clara river bottom. In 1897 about six tons of honey were produced, and during succeeding years the yield has also been gratifying. Fearing the ravages of the frosts, in 1899 he placed five thousand coal baskets in the company's orchards, thirty-seven to an acre, and on cold nights these were burned, making the entire orchard from six to ten degrees warmer and thus escaping the frosts. At this writing the company has ten thousand baskets on the ranch. He has learned that "eternal vigilance is the price of success," so never abates in the unwearied care given the ranch and neglects not even the smallest detail. In politics he is an interested worker in behalf of the Republican party.

A. M. COX. That neat hostelry in Santa Maria, known as the Hart hotel, has an enviable reputation among traveling men and the general public as a place where one may comfortably abide for a day or week and miss nothing from the conveniences usually to be found only in larger cities. The proprietor, Mr. Cox, is ever alert to meet any requirement on the part of his guests. By his ready tact and accommodating spirit he wins many friends while catering to the comforts of his guests.

Mr. Cox is a native of Sarcoxie, Jasper county, Mo., and was born in 1870. His parents, A. W. and Mary A. (Powers) Cox, natives, respectively, of Hocking county, Ohio, and Missouri, now reside in Santa Maria, Cal. The grandfather, Lewis Cox, was a native of Maryland, and in early manhood moved to Ohio, where he married Anna Bradford, a native of that state. After some time spent upon a farm in Hocking county he moved to Iowa and settled on a farm in Van Buren county. Still later he established his home in Clark county, Mo., and there his death occurred. Afterward Mrs. Cox came to California, where she was married to Dr. Charles Shaug, a pioneer of Santa Maria. During March, 1872, her son, A. W. Cox, arrived in Santa Maria and at once settled on a farm near the town. At this writing he owns four hundred and forty acres of land, much of which is under cultivation. A staunch Republican in politics, he served for four years as postmaster of Santa Maria, and three times has been elected county supervisor, in which office he is still serving. In his family there are three sons: A. M., A. E. and C. B.

For the greater part A. M. Cox secured his education in Carthage, Mo., of whose high school he is a graduate. This education was supplemented by a business course in a college in Santa Barbara, after which he served as deputy postmaster at Santa Maria for five years and engaged in the transfer business for three years. With R. L. Jones as partner, in 1898 he opened the Hart hotel. After a time he purchased his partner's interest, and has since been sole proprietor and manager. Under his supervision the hotel has gained an established reputation as a first-class house, and is fitted out with modern conveniences, including sample rooms and bathrooms. Mr. Cox married Emma, daughter of George Sharp, engineer of the Santa Maria waterworks, and they have a son, Stacy V., a bright and interesting boy.

Progressive in thought and action, Mr. Cox has stood for the furthering of the best interests of his town and the encouraging of its enterprises. In politics he is a Republican and fraternally is associated with the Elks at San Luis Obispo and the Knights of Pythias at Santa Maria. He enjoys the respect of those who know him and is accounted a success in his chosen occupation.

HON. JOHN CROSS. As one of those whose financial ability has placed him in touch with the splendid opportunities of Los Angeles, Hon. John Cross is recognized as a promoter of the city's welfare. Like most men who have risen on their own merit, the youth of Mr. Cross was not exempt from trial and responsibility, and he gained his first impressions of life from the practical surroundings of a farm. A native of Clarkston, Oakland county, Mich., he was born October 15, 1842, a son of John and Catharine (Riley) Cross, natives, respectively, of Somersetshire, England, and New York state. The first American representative of the family was the paternal grandfather, George, also born in Somersetshire, and who, upon immigrating to America, settled near Syracuse, N. Y. Afterwards he removed to Oakland, Mich., of which region he was a pioneer, and where he plied his trade of wheelwright with considerable success; his last days, however, were spent in Syracuse. John Cross was a farmer in Michigan, but removed to Ogle county, Ill., near Lightsville, where his death occurred the same year. His wife, who died when her son John was five years of age, was the mother of seven children, three living, John being the youngest.

In 1854 John Cross, then twelve years of age, removed to Ogle county, Ill., and settled with his brother, Philip, on a farm near Lightsville. The two brothers entered upon a life of ceaseless activity, and, in addition to general farming, operated a threshing machine all over the county. Four years afterwards the younger brother removed to Missouri, the journey from Tipton to Springfield, a distance of one hundred and eighty-five miles, being accomplished by stage coach. In Springfield he engaged in the mercantile business. At the time of secession he was a member of the state militia, armed and equipped for service. Upon being ordered into camp by Governor Jackson, the company split into two factions according to their sympathies, and the Union boys kept the arms. Mr. Cross went to St. Louis, and after the company was recruited he was made captain of Company M, Fourth Missouri Cavalry, and participated in the battles of Wilson Creek, Boonville and Lexington, and then went to Arkansas in pursuit of Price and Shelby. After being mustered out at the end of three years, Mr. Cross was made captain of Company I, Fourteenth Missouri Cavalry, and from then on saw constant service, thirty-two days being passed in the saddle during Price's raid, during which time he did not experience the luxury of taking his clothes off. For the last six months of the war he was stationed on the plains in pursuit of the Indians, and was present at the Indian council in October of 1865, held on the present site of Wichita, Kans.

After being mustered out of service in November of 1865, at Leavenworth, Kans., Mr. Cross returned to Illinois and engaged in the mercantile business at Winnebago. In 1869 he went to Arkansas and became interested in the hotel at Hot Springs. In 1871 he shifted his fortunes to Little Rock and started a livery business, at the same time receiving the United States mail contract for four years. This was the beginning of a stage experience which, from the standpoint of extent and general usefulness, has few counterparts in the west. The general knowledge of Mr. Cross and the resources at his command permitted his entering bids on as many as fourteen hundred routes at one time, and he put in lines throughout Arkansas, Missouri, Indian Territory, Kansas, Colorado, Mississippi and Texas. In Little Rock he constructed the first street car line in the town, completed in 1877, his bid having been chosen out of three submitted. After completion this road was operated by him for eight years, and at the same time built and operated the first street car line in Lexington, Ky.

Owing to impaired health, Mr. Cross sought relaxation from his numerous interests and came to Los Angeles in 1886. Once under the magic spell of climatic and other inducements, he disposed of his interests the other side of the Rockies by telegraph, and with Major Bonebrake bought the Santa Barbara street car line. Under the stroke of his enterprise the system was materially enlarged and extended to the Mission and towards the Cottage Hospital. After selling this road he built the narrow gauge Los Angeles & Glendale road, and afterwards, with Mr. Kerns and friends, organized the Los Angeles Terminal Railroad, of which he was president and general manager, as well as half owner. The road extended to Pasadena and Altadena, and was twenty-five miles in extent, and eventually came into the possession of Mr. Kerns. Mr. Cross then turned his attention to the organization of the Ventura & Ojai Valley Railroad, between Ventura and Nordhoff, a distance of eighteen miles, and after placing it on a paying basis disposed of it to speculators. Since then he has been working on the construction of the Sacramento & San Joaquin Railroad, a standard gauge fifty-two miles long, running up the Sacramento valley, for which the right of way has already been secured. Mr. Cross is the president of the company, and the work of construction will begin in the fall of 1902. In addition to other responsibilities, he is interested in the Pacific Coast United States Mail and Express Company, and is associated with his nephew, A. P. Cross, in the United States mail service in Dallas, Tex., and Colorado Springs, besides holding stock in several stage and mail routes in California, one running between Amedee and Fort Bidwell, a distance of one hundred and thirty miles, and one a hundred miles in length between Alturas and Amedee. In April, 1902, Mr. Cross organized and incorporated the Vallejo, Benicia & Napa Valley Railroad Company, which includes the franchises in all three cities, and contemplates connecting the same by electric lines. Mr. Cross is president of the company.

W. J. Lucas

The delightful home of Mr. Cross, located on the Loma drive, in Colina park, is presided over by Mrs. Cross, formerly Laura L. Diver, a native of Ohio, and whose family settled in Lewis county, Mo., in 1854. Mrs. Cross had two brothers in the Civil war; of these Leroy met his death while fighting for his country, and Amor attained to the rank of captain. As a staunch Republican Mr. Cross has rendered valuable service to his party in Southern California, and during 1897 served as a member of the Legislature from the Seventy-fifth district. He was chairman of the committee on military affairs, and though urged to stand for office in 1898, refused on the plea of business cares. He is prominent in Grand Army of the Republic affairs, and is a member of the Bartlett Logan Post of Los Angeles, and during his residence in Winnebago, Ill., was commander of the post the year after its organization. He is a member of the California Commandery of the Loyal Legion. Mr. Cross is possessed of those sterling personal attributes which secure business success and which win for him also the confidence and good will of all who appreciate his valuable services in the upbuilding of his adopted city.

W. T. LUCAS, M. D. The professional fortunes of Dr. Lucas have been closely identified with the history of Santa Maria, for he has witnessed, since coming here October 16, 1879, the rise in the general interest in the town, the erection of nearly all the houses and buildings, and the starting of the enterprises which have brought it to its present prosperous condition. In the mean time his skill as a surgeon and physician has been amply rewarded, and from the early days up to the present time he has been confidently consulted by a large portion of the population, who are rarely disappointed at his disposition of their cases.

A native of Buchanan county, Mo., Dr. Lucas was born March 18, 1850, a son of George G. Lucas, who was born in Ohio and reared in Indiana, and Sallie (Thomas) Lucas, a native of Kentucky, and at present living at Madison, Cal. The father was a farmer by occupation, and in 1864 migrated to Montana, with "prairie schooners," a hundred head of cattle, and considerable freight. At the time, W. T., who was but a boy, rode astride the hurricane deck of a mule. The family settled in Deer Lodge valley and conducted a butter and cheese dairy until 1868, when they disposed of their interests and removed to near Woodland, Yolo county, Cal., where the father died in 1899. W. T. Lucas was educated in the public schools of Woodland, and in Hesperian College, and for a time taught school in Yolo and Solano counties. In 1874 he entered the Medical College of the Pacific, at San Francisco, from which he was graduated with honors in the class of 1876. For the following two and a half years he practiced at Woodland, Yolo county, and while there had charge of the hospital, and held a professorship in Hesperian College, after which he took up his temporary residence in Guadalupe, Santa Barbara county. While there he served as county physician until his removal to Santa Maria in 1884.

From time to time Dr. Lucas has come into the possession of considerable property, owning a quarter-section ranch and various town lots besides the residence property which he purchased in 1887. In Sacramento county, in 1879, he married Lulu Maupin, daughter of William Maupin, who was killed during his service in the Civil war. To Dr. and Mrs. Lucas have been born two children, Lee Forman and Oreon S. The former, who is twenty-one years of age, has just finished a course of study in Boone's Academy at Berkeley, and will enter Stanford University, with the intention of preparing for the practice of medicine. Oreon S., a daughter of eighteen, is at present in school at Oakland, Cal. Dr. Lucas is a Democrat in politics, and was a candidate for the legislature in 1884, but was defeated with the rest of the ticket. He is prominent in fraternal circles, is an enthusiastic Mason and has the most extensive Masonic library in Southern California. He is a Master Mason of the lodge at Guadalupe, has been a member of the grand lodge for several years, and belongs to the San Luis Obispo Chapter No. 62, R. A. M., and the San Luis Commandery No. 27, K. T. He was past grand master of the state in 1896-97. He is also associated with several benevolent lodges, and is prominent in promoting the cause of education.

CAPT. CHARLES C. DE RUDIO. The genealogy of the de Rudio family is traced back to the twelfth century, when Hercules Nosadanus was knighted by Frederick II. and assumed the title Count Hercules de Rudio. Three centuries prior to the raising of the family to the nobility, a Roman patrician, Hercules, went to Belluno, Italy, as governor under Otto the Great, who was the great-grandson of Charlemagne, and from that time for a period of three hundred years his descendants held authority as governors until Hercules was raised to the title of count. Captain de Rudio's grandfather, Hercules, was jurisdicent count under the empire of Austria, and at the time the revolution of 1796 broke out in Italy he declared himself in favor of the French when the French troops entered Italy. From that day to this the family has always been found on the side of movements for the freedom and independence of all races. The father, Hercules, was born in the state of Venice, Italy, in 1792, and died there in 1874, at the age of eighty-three, having survived all of his generation. During the revolution of 1831 he gave his influence to the movement, following the example of his father. There were seven sons and seven daughters in his family, but only three daughters are living, while of all the sons Captain de Rudio alone survives. The title of count has descended to him, but, titles not being in harmony with the spirit of American independence, he prefers to be known by his military title of captain. His mother was a daughter of Count Fortunato de Domini, a colonel in the Austrian army; she died in 1865 in Italy.

In the ancient city of Belluno, state of Venice, Italy, Charles Camillo de Rudio was born August 26, 1832. Taking up professional studies in 1845, he entered the Austrian Military Academy of Milan, where he was thoroughly grounded in military tactics and the science of war. During the revolution of 1848 he joined the Venetian Legion of the Caccatori della alpi in Venice, but left it in March of 1849 in order to join Garibaldi's Legion in Rome. With that command he served at the front and in various sieges. However, the fall of the Roman Republic and the capture of that city by the French forced him into exile, and he traveled through different European countries. While in England he was married, in Surry county, to Miss Eliza Boothe, a member of a very old family of Nottingham. Her father, William, was a son of William Boothe, Sr., both manufacturers and merchants, while her mother, Jane, who is now eighty-one years of age, was born in Nottingham, her father, John Stuarts, having removed there from Scotland. There were three brothers and one sister in the Boothe family, the latter (Mrs. de Rudio) being the only one in America. Of her marriage to Captain de Rudio four children were born, namely: Hercules A., a graduate of Faribault (Minn.) College and now a mining engineer in Honduras, Central America; Roma Elizabeth, Mrs. Scott, of Los Angeles; Italia Louisa, wife of Lieut. S. E. Adair, of Los Angeles, and Charlotta America, who resides with her parents at No. 1034 South Figueroa street, Los Angeles.

When the Civil war opened in America Captain de Rudio began to be intensely interested in the struggle, his sympathies from the first being with the Union in its effort to free the slaves. He became a member of the Emancipation Society in London, and as soon as possible crossed the ocean to enlist in the army, arriving in this country early in 1864. On the 25th of August, that year, he became a member of Company A, Seventy-ninth New York Highlanders, and later was commissioned lieutenant in the Second United States colored troops. His next assignment was with Company D at Fort Meyer, Fla., whence he was ordered to the mouth of the Caloosahatchie to guard the post at that point. A later transfer was to Fort Meyer, Fla. There one of the videttes was captured by the Confederates, but managed to make his way back to Lieutenant de Rudio, who made preparations to defend the depot as long as possible and then, if need be, destroy it by fire. The next morning the Confederates appeared in a mangrove road, three miles distant. However, they were soon observed to be making a precipitous retreat, the gunboat Honduras having fortunately made its appearance. A few days later Lieutenant de Rudio was complimented upon his tactful conduct at the time. He was anxious to participate in the expedition, but was ordered to remain at his post with thirty-six men. On the return of the expedition he was ordered to Fort Meyer, where he was notified that the post was to be abandoned and he had been selected to remain, with a detachment of twenty-five picked men, for the purpose of destroying the fort after the troops and the property had been conveyed to a safe distance, these precautions being taken on account of the enemy being in the vicinity. With his men the lieutenant carried out orders, and then followed the others away. January 5, 1866, he was mustered out at Key West, Fla. So satisfactory had been his service that General Newton recommended him for promotion to captain, but the recommendation was not carried out.

General Grant, while secretary of war ad interim, appointed Lieutenant de Rudio a second lieutenant in the regular army August 31, 1867, and the latter reported to his regiment at Louisville, Ky., March following. Soon afterward Major-General George H. Thomas selected him to go to Lebanon, Ky., with fifty picked mounted infantry for the purpose of enforcing the civil rights bills and the revenue laws. He arrested the first Klu-Klux in Kentucky. In April, 1869, he was relieved of these arduous duties and ordered to Louisville, thence to Atlanta, Ga., for consolidation with the Sixteenth Infantry. April 17 he was on waiting orders, but the same day received a telegram from the adjutant-general of the Department of the Cumberland (General Whipple), ordering him to report without delay to his headquarters, he having been recommended by General Thomas for transfer to the cavalry. July 14, 1869, he was assigned to the Seventh Cavalry, and soon was ordered to join his new regiment in camp near Fort Hays. From that time until 1889 he participated in the various campaigns of his regiment, chiefly in the west. During a part of this time he was in camp near the present site of Cawker City, Kans., and on leaving was tendered by the people of the valley a vote of thanks for his tireless services in their behalf, also was presented with a paper bearing testimony to his labors, signed by all the citizens. It had been his custom, whenever new people came there to settle, to tender them an escort of soldiers as guards until they had a house built and were in a position to defend themselves in case of attack by the Indians. Stockmen with droves of cattle were also furnished with escorts.

T. G. Gabbott

When the battle of Little Big Horn occurred Lieutenant de Rudio was cut off from his command, and his narrow escape from death brought his name into prominence throughout the entire country at that time. This battle occurred in Montana June 25 and 26, 1876, the white forces being under command of General Custer, lieutenant-colonel of the Seventh United States cavalry. During the retreat which the American soldiers were hurriedly making, he returned for a guidon, and in this way became separated from the command and within range of the Indian guns. Indeed, had it not been for a thick growth of shrubbery, he would have been instantly killed. As he struggled up the steep south bank of the creek, pulling his horse up after him, he saw hundreds of Indians, shooting at the retreating soldiers, who had crossed the Little Big Horn river and reached the hills, thus cutting the lieutenant entirely off from his comrades. Perceiving that he was lost, he determined to cut his way through the Indians, but, as he prepared to mount, an Indian fired at him. The bullet struck the horse, followed by other bullets, which killed the animal. To save his life the lieutenant made a jump for the creek, dropped under the bank, just escaping the balls that he heard whizzing over his head. The appearance of Captain Bennteen's column in the distance caused a dispersion of the Indians and enabled the lieutenant to seek the underbrush for hiding. However, his troubles were by no means over. A record of his hairbreadth escapes during the night that followed could not be presented within the limits of our space. Suffice it to say that his thoughts often turned to his beloved family, whom in his extremity he felt he would never again behold; and with what love and longing his heart dwelt upon them during the dark hours of the perilous night only those similarly situated could understand. About three o'clock on the morning of the 27th he reached the camp of the soldiers and was safe at last. He later participated in the famous campaign of the Nez Percés. September 30, 1877, he was promoted to the office of captain, and participated in all the engagements and services of his regiment.

At the time of the opening of Oklahoma, in April, 1889, Captain de Rudio was at Fort Sill. In 1892 he went to Fort Riley, Kans., and from August, 1893, until October 5, 1895, was at Fort Lane and Houston, Tex. While at Fort Byer, N. M., he was retired by reason of having reached the age limit, sixty-four years, the date of his retirement being August 26, 1896. He came at once to California, and after eighteen months in San Diego settled in Los Angeles, where he has since resided. He is connected with the Grand Army of the Republic and the Southern California Association, Loyal Legion. Since becoming a citizen of the United States he has been an advocate of Republican principles, espousing that party as soon as he came to the country and had studied the principles for which Abraham Lincoln stood. A brave defender of our nation's welfare, he represents the highest type of our adopted citizenship, courageous and resourceful in war, and public-spirited and progressive as a private citizen.

THOMAS GAVEN GABBERT. During the long period of his residence in Ventura county Mr. Gabbert has been closely identified with its agricultural interests and has aided in the development of its material resources. On coming to California in 1883 he settled at Saticoy, and it was not until 1892 that he established his home near El Rio, where he has since acquired extensive and important interests. A large acreage of his farm is devoted to lima beans and beets, for which the soil of this locality is admirably adapted. In addition, he is engaged in grain and stock raising. These various enterprises, together with the ownership of some mining interests, combine to make him a very busy man.

The parents of Mr. Gabbert were Jacob and Mary Jane Gabbert, natives respectively of Kentucky and Indiana, and for many years residents of Madison county, Iowa. It was there that Thomas G. was born, January 11, 1854, and his early boyhood was passed on the home farm, his education being secured in the schools of Winterset and Keokuk, Iowa. At the age of twenty-one he started out for himself and since then he has followed farming and kindred pursuits. His first years of independent work were in Iowa, but since 1883 he has made his home in California. His attention has been given so closely to the development of his place that he has had no leisure for participation in public affairs. Nevertheless, it is his aim to keep posted concerning the problems before the nation and to do his duty as a loyal and law-abiding citizen. His father was a Republican and he was trained in the faith of that party, to which he still adheres. At this writing he holds office as supervisor of the fifth district of Ventura county. Fraternally he is connected with the Masonic order.

In Madison county, Iowa, February 27, 1879, occurred the marriage of Mr. Gabbert to Miss Ella Peters, daughter of A. M. and Jane Peters, who came to California in 1882. To this union the following-named children were born: Myron H., John Raymond, Boyd E., Richard Clarence, Harry and Thomas Arthur.

COL. RICHARD VARICK DODGE. The Dodge family traces its lineage to Holland-Dutch ancestry. Henry Dodge, who was the son of an officer of the Revolution, was born in New York state and became a pioneer attorney of Southern Illinois, but later returned to New York and died there at the age of thirty-eight years. During the war of 1812 he enlisted in the army and was raised to the rank of colonel. His son, Rev. Richard Varick Dodge, a native of Kaskaskia, Ill., was the first white child born in Southern Illinois. He was given exceptional advantages, and, after graduating from Yale College, became a minister in the Presbyterian Church, holding pastorates successively at Springfield, Ill.; Wheeling, W. Va.; Washington, Pa.; San Francisco, Cal. (1872-79), and San Diego, where he officiated as pastor of the First Presbyterian Church until his death, in February, 1885. During the Civil war he was commissioned a chaplain of United States volunteers. While living in Springfield, Ill., he married Sarah Ridgely, who was born in Baltimore, Md., and died at San Diego, Cal., December 6, 1901. When a small child, in 1836, she accompanied her father, Nicholas Ridgely, to Springfield, where he became a pioneer banker and prominent citizen, remaining there until his death at eighty-seven years. In the family of Rev. Mr. Dodge and his wife there were five children, of whom two sons and two daughters are living. One of the family, John M., is clerk of the county board of supervisors of San Diego county. The next to the youngest of the children was Richard Varick, Jr., who was born in Springfield, Ill., September 4, 1851. At the age of seven years he accompanied his parents to Wheeling, W. Va., where he attended the public schools. His education was continued in Washington (Pa.) College, now Washington-Jefferson College. In 1869 he entered the employ of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad and for six months was at work in their shops, after which he completed the machinist's trade in the Chicago shops of the Illinois Central road. His first work on the road was as fireman between Chicago and Champaign, Ill. After four years he was promoted to be locomotive engineer on the same division.

With the intention of settling upon a ranch, Mr. Dodge came to San Diego in 1879. However, his connection with railroading had been too close to be lightly severed, and we find him in 1881 again on the road. When the California Southern was building, he ran the second locomotive between San Diego and San Bernardino, continuing until the washout of February, 1884. His next venture was in the book and stationery business with E. M. Burbeck, the firm name being Dodge & Burbeck. In March, 1894, he was appointed postmaster by President Cleveland, and held the office until March, 1898. On resigning that office he was appointed secretary of the Chamber of Commerce. In May, 1884, he became a private in Company B, Seventh Regiment of Infantry, National Guard of California, and was promoted until finally he became captain in March, 1892, and in the latter office he continued until he was elected lieutenant-colonel January 13, 1900. In May, 1898, he was captain of a company that volunteered for service in the Spanish-American war, his commission as captain being signed by Gov. J. H. Budd. As captain of Company B he remained until the regiment was mustered out, December 2, 1898, after which he returned to San Diego and resumed his duties as secretary of the Chamber of Commerce. On the Democratic ticket, in April, 1899, he was elected city treasurer and tax collector, and at the expiration of a term of two years was re-elected in April, 1901.

The marriage of Colonel Dodge took place in Chicago and united him with Miss Mary A. Millspaugh, who was born in Augusta, Ill. They have two sons, Edgar Varick and Richard Varick, Jr. Fraternally Colonel Dodge is captain and adjutant of the Knights of Pythias, Uniform Rank, a member of the Foresters of America, the Fraternal Brotherhood, the California Commandery of the Loyal Legion, the Veterans of the National Guard of California, and the Sons of Veterans, of which last-named he is past captain. For more than a quarter of a century he has been connected with the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen.

THOMAS H. DUDLEY. In the capacity of manager of the Kinney and Dudley tract, Mr. Dudley is identified with the development of Southern California, and particularly with the advancement of the interests of the region lying near Santa Monica, his home city. He is a member of an old English family, a son of Thomas Melville Strong Dudley, M. D., and a grandson of Rev. William Mason Dudley, A. M., who was vicar of Whitchurch and rector of Laverstoke. Reared in the parsonage of Whitchurch, Hampshire, Dr. Dudley spent the greater part of his active professional life in Leicestershire, where he married Emily Frances Draycott, daughter of Thomas Draycott, a farmer of that shire. They became the parents of three daughters and a son, of whom Thomas H. was next to the oldest, and is the only one in America. In Leicestershire, where he was born October 2, 1867, he received fair advantages at the Queen Elizabeth grammar school. While still quite young the knowledge he acquired of American life and customs inspired him with a longing to try his fortune in the new world. Crossing the ocean in 1889, he settled in Bakersfield, Cal., where he carried on a real estate and insurance business. From there, in 1896, he removed to Santa Monica, where he is now a member of the firm of Kinney & Dudley. After three years in the insurance and real estate business under the firm title of Procter & Dudley, in February, 1899, he took charge of the Ocean Park beach tract, which is now known as the Kinney and Dudley tract. All of the improvements now noticeable here represent the work of the energetic manager. The number of cottages has been increased from fifty to fifteen hundred. The beach has a frontage of one and one-half miles on the ocean, thus affording the cottagers the finest bathing facilities. In the tract there are three hundred acres of land, through which streets have been laid and improved. Domestic water has been secured from wells owned by the Kinney & Dudley Water Company, of which Mr. Dudley is superintendent.

Hein

It has been Mr. Dudley's constant aim to make of the tract one of the favorite resorts of Southern California. To accomplish this desired result he has spared no pains in securing improvements of a valuable nature. To furnish recreation for visitors, golf links, polo grounds and a race track of three-fourths of a mile have been laid out, and each year races and polo contests draw large crowds. A fine bowling alley forms another attraction for those who are fond of bowling. An indispensable accessory is the wharf of twelve hundred and fifty feet. By the granting of bonus and right of way, both the electric railroad and the Santa Fe railroad have been brought to the tract.

Since coming to Santa Monica Mr. Dudley has married Mrs. Mathilda (Brooks) Ryan, who was born in Brattleboro, Vt. When a boy in his English home he was reared in the Episcopal faith and has always adhered to that church. While living in Bakersfield he was actively connected with Lodge No. 266, B. P. O. E. His citizenship is broad, progressive and patriotic. He is an admirer of the American form of government and of our enterprise as a people. Politically his views are staunchly Democratic, and he has rendered his party efficient service as a member of the state central committee and a delegate to state conventions. In 1900 he was elected a member of the board of trustees of Santa Monica, and during his incumbency of the position has been active as chairman of the finance committee and member of the railroad committee. April 8, 1902, Mr. Dudley accepted the presidency of the Ocean Park Bank, which position he now fills. The same month he was elected chairman of the board of trustees of Santa Monica. The close attention he has given to his duties as city trustee indicates his interest in local affairs and the high character of his citizenship. Indeed, it is to such men as he that Santa Monica owes its high standing among the ocean resorts of the Pacific coast.

J. HEIN, a successful contractor, and proprietor of the Los Angeles Ornamental Brick, Stone and Cement Paving Company, was born in Hesse-Darmstadt, Germany, June 5, 1866. His father, Jacob, was a native of the same portion of the empire, and in his native land was a plaster contractor. During the various struggles in which his country was engaged he valiantly upheld the honor of the Fatherland, serving in the war with Schleswig-Holstein in 1866, and in the Franco-German war of 1871. With his wife, formerly Katharine Capito, also of Hesse-Darmstadt, he is living in Brooklyn, N. Y. Of the six children born to them, J. Hein is the third, and he and his sister are the only members of the family on the coast.

Until his fourteenth year Mr. Hein attended the public schools of Germany, and then served an apprenticeship as plasterer under his father. When seventeen years of age he immigrated to the United States, locating in Brooklyn, where he lived and worked at his trade until 1884. In January of 1885 he was sent to California by the United Brass Company of New York, who had a large ranch at Highland, and in the management of this ranch he remained until 1887, and helped to build the first ditch at Highland, known as the Bear Valley Water Company's ditch. In the fall of 1887 he located in Los Angeles and worked at his trade of plastering until 1894, when he branched out into larger activity as a contractor and builder and cement contractor. In addition to building many fine residences and public buildings he has graded and laid out Mathews, Twenty-fifth, Romeo, Forty-seventh, Santee and Victoria streets, and Stanton and Magnolia avenues, besides many others not here mentioned. He is at present putting in the foundation of the R. B. Williamson house at Mist Lake, and is engaged upon many sidewalks and basements and concrete ditches. On a large scale also he is manufacturing ornamental brick and artificial stone on East Seventh street, between Alameda and Mateo, and has a large and increasing trade with the largest purchasers of these materials. His activities also extend to an interest in the oil business, and he has large holdings in different companies. He is a member of the Los Angeles Builders' Exchange, and is prominent in many of the social and other organizations in the city. A Republican in politics, he is fraternally associated with the Masonic Lodge at Los Angeles, No. 42, with the Red Men, and the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks. In Los Angeles Mr. Hein married Minnie C. Karstens, who was born in Schleswig-Holstein, and of this union there are four children: Edward, Minnie C., John C. and Ruby D.

JOSEPH WRIGHT COOPER. The life which this narrative sketches began on a farm near Hopkinsville, Christian county, Ky., June 4, 1826, in the home of John and Elizabeth (Wright) Cooper, natives respectively of Virginia and Kentucky. From their Kentucky home the family moved to Missouri in 1839 and settled in Howard county, soon after securing six hundred and forty acres near Rocheport, on the Monitor river. For a time prosperity rewarded the tireless labors of the persevering farmer, but in 1846 reverses came, followed by the death of the father. This bereavement left the family without a visible means of support, and almost penniless. However, they possessed the stout hearts which are the pioneer's birth-right and heritage. At first the young man was employed on a farm for twenty cents a day, after which he hired land and engaged in farming for himself. It was about this time that he saw his first piece of gold. He had been fortunate in selling a hog for $12.50 (an unusual price in those days) and as payment, among other coins, received a five-dollar gold piece. After admiring the coin for a while, he had it changed to picayunes (valued at six and one-fourth cents) and then, going to an old elm log, he spread out the money in a long continuous row, where, as he has often said, it looked larger than any sum of money he has ever since possessed.

Constant toil, with a remuneration that ill requited his labors, is the record of Mr. Cooper's youth. It is not strange, therefore, that the news of the discovery of gold in California awakened within him an ambition to seek his fortune amid surroundings more hopeful for future success. Accordingly, in April, 1850, with his brother-in-law, John Pipes, and a number of young men, he started across the plains. August 26 of the same year found him in Sacramento, and a week later, with a Missourian, John B. Hill, he proceeded to Stockton, which was at the time the headquarters for notorious gamblers, thieves, and desperadoes,—a town where a man "carried his life in his hands." However, being of a steady disposition and temperate habits, he kept away from the saloons, and instead sought a means of livelihood. Soon he was engaged to drive three yoke of oxen, taking a number of foreigners to the Stanislaus river and bringing another party of men back to Stockton. The trip netted $400, half of which he retained, the other half going to the owner of the team as his share of the profits. The earning of so large a sum of money delighted the ambitious youth and he continued teaming in the same way for a time, but later did a general freighting business for George Hope. On the approach of winter, he was persuaded to give up teaming and go to the mines. With a number of gold-seekers, he drove to the second crossing of the Calaveras river, where timber was cut down and a log house built. While the others were putting up the cabin, he drove the team back to Stockton, turned it over to its owner, and walked back to the camp. About the 1st of March, David Pipes, who had been administrator of the senior Mr. Cooper's estate, arrived at the camp, and, in a talk with the young man the same evening, both decided to return to Missouri, after which they lost no time in setting out for San Francisco. Three days later they took passage for New York via Panama. The ship on which they sailed had eight hundred passengers and a steerage ticket cost $275 in gold. Soon after the ship put out to sea, seasickness attacked the passengers, and Mr. Cooper himself did not escape. Arriving at Panama, they were obliged to walk to the Chagres river, and at Gorgona chartered a boat and hired natives to pull them down the river to Chagres, where they took passage on the Prometheus for New York.

May 2, 1851, Mr. Cooper surprised his brother and sisters by visiting them. Eleven days later, with a pony he had purchased, he started for Boonville, sixteen miles distant. It was his intention to start back to California at once, and for this purpose he sought employment of Peters & McMahon, who were preparing to drive a flock of sheep to the Pacific coast. For these men, Mr. Cooper engaged to work at $8 per month. In a few days all preparations were completed and the party started with twelve thousand sheep, which was the first flock of sheep ever taken across the plains. The march was very slow, owing to the fact that hundreds of the animals began to have soft feet and were scarcely able to walk. Each day it became more and more apparent that California would not be reached that year with the sheep. Not desiring to spend so much time on the road, Mr. Cooper, with a lawyer, Hiram Mills, and a blacksmith, Mr. Holmes, left the others August 27 and started alone for Sacramento, thirteen hundred miles away. During their first day out they met over a thousand Crow Indians, who proved friendly. After a few days, three men, likewise bound for the far west, joined them, and the two parties completed the journey together to Salt Lake City, where they were joined by nine other persons, one of them being a woman. Mr. Cooper was chosen captain of the company.

After a series of adventures, none of which proved serious, Mr. Cooper, accompanied by Holmes, arrived at Diamond Springs, Placer county, October 31, 1851. An old acquaintance from Missouri, meeting him there, offered him an interest in a mine on the American river, and thither he proceeded at once. His first week he averaged $20 a day; the second week, only $60 for the entire time; and the third week, only $20. Discouraged by this poor luck, he returned to Diamond Springs, and thence walked to Stockton. After a brief experience in another mine, he secured work as teamster, at $100 a month, in which occupation he continued for ten months, and then bought four yoke of oxen and a wagon, for which he paid $1,100. In spite of many obstacles and in the midst of many discouragements, he worked incessantly, and was rewarded with excellent financial returns. In the fall of 1853 he paid $800 for a wagon weighing forty-three hundred pounds, and which required ten yoke of oxen to draw it. He named it "The Humboldt." So great was its capacity that on a trip of one hundred miles, between Stockton and Milton, Mr. Cooper at one time took fifteen thousand three hundred and fifteen pounds of freight. In the fall of 1854 he sold his team and wagon for $3,000, the purchaser employing Mr. Cooper as driver for $100 a month and board.

For the second time Mr. Cooper started back east. In company with an old friend, Martin E. Oldham, he took passage for Panama in October, 1855. It had been agreed that, on arrival at Aspinwall, if the New Orleans steamer was not there, they should be allowed to take the New York steamer, but this privilege was later denied them, and they were compelled to wait at Aspinwall for two weeks, when the George Law arrived, and on it they proceeded to New Orleans, thence traveling up the Mississippi on the Etna, and finally Mr. Cooper arrived at his old Missouri home. Like all who have once been under the charm of California associations, he was not, however, satisfied to remain in Missouri, and although he was persuaded to purchase a tract of land in Bates county, Mo., in the spring of 1857, yet the west had cast its spell over him, and he was never again to be contented in his eastern home. It is not strange, under these environments, that he craved another opportunity to come west, and that chance came to him in April, 1858, when he joined with his former employer, Colonel Peters, and with Hubbard Hollister, in a venture to drive sheep across the plains to California. In their flock of twelve thousand, six thousand were Spanish merinos from Ohio, and about a similar number were good American sheep, while a small number were Lesters and Southdowns. Including the three proprietors, there were twenty-two men in the train, and they took with them twenty-five horses and mules, and one hundred head of cattle. About the 1st of July the journey was begun, the old Santa Fe trail being followed through New Mexico and Arizona into Southern California. November 10th they reached Las Vegas. They crossed the Rio Grande a few miles above Socorro. As they proceeded, it became more and more evident that they would be compelled, on account of the condition of the sheep, to remain in the country for some months. The situation was not attractive. Around them were Indians, particularly the fierce and bloodthirsty Apaches. They called upon the Indian agent, Dr. Miguel Steck, and stated their difficulties. Acting on his suggestion, they invited nine Indian chiefs to a feast. The red men accepted the invitation, enjoyed the feast, and afterward smoked the pipe of peace. Remarkable as it seems, it is nevertheless a fact that the sheep men remained among the Indians for eight months, without the least protection, and yet never lost a single animal nor any property.

January 5, 1860, the train arrived at San Gabriel. Soon afterward Mr. Hollister went back to Ohio for his family, and on his return, January 1, 1861, the flocks were moved to the San Fernando valley, where they remained during the balance of the year. In the summer following they were moved to higher lands. Meantime Colonel Peters died and his stock was bought by Thomas Dibblee and Robert Baker, Mr. Cooper himself purchasing some twelve hundred of the graded sheep. At this sale Mr. Cooper met W. W. Hollister, and thus was begun a friendship that was in many respects an ideal one and that continued until death separated the two who in life had been to each other as David to Jonathan and Damon to Pythias.

In the spring of 1862 Mr. Cooper returned to Missouri, but Christmas of that year found him again in California, where he during the ensuing two years experienced all the sufferings and financial reverses occasioned by the great drought. To show the losses he and his associates suffered, it may be stated that in the spring of 1864 they sheared 11,000 sheep, which, with the lambs, made 15,000 head, but when the flocks were counted in 1865 they had only 5,300. All that saved them from financial ruin was the sale of the wool, from which they realized $22,000, this large profit being due to the sagacity of Albert Dibblee, to whom the task of selling was entrusted.

During 1866 Hubbard Hollister purchased the Chorro and San Lusita ranches in San Luis Obispo county and moved there with his family. In 1869 Mr. Cooper made a purchase equally important. From Mrs. Cota he and his partner, Hubbard Hollister, purchased the famous Rancho Santa Rosa, paying for it the sum of $25,000, which was considered an exceedingly large sum for that day. The land contained nothing but an adobe house, with a dirt floor and tile roof. Not a fruit tree had been planted. Not an attempt at improvement had been made. However, the energy of the new comers soon produced results that were gratifying. Originally the rancho was a Mexican grant of 45,000 acres. At present it contains about seventeen thousand and three hundred acres, three-fourths of which it is possible to cultivate. The situation is excellent, being near enough to the ocean to derive the beneficial effects of the fogs, yet not near enough to have its bad features. The land lies seven miles from Lompoc and five miles from Los Alamos. No richer soil could be found in the whole state. By actual measurement, it has been proved that the soil is forty-five feet deep on one of the highest hills. Beans, corn, pumpkins, mustard, flax, sugar beets, etc., together with large crops of wheat and barley, can be raised. The Santa Ynez river runs for eight miles through the ranch, and a number of creeks empty into this river, while large springs are also to be found on the land.

The fruit industry has proved a successful source of revenue to Mr. Cooper. Thirty years ago he planted an orchard, with a general variety of trees, and these have never since failed to bear abundantly. Apples, peaches, pears, plums, nectarines, apricots, quinces, English walnuts, blackberries and strawberries are raised in large quantities. Improvements of all kinds have been added to the place, and it is now equipped with modern appliances to an extent unsurpassed by any ranch in the state. With all of his other enterprises, Mr. Cooper always made his chief work the raising of sheep and the growing of wool, and he was so successful in this that, when he managed the ranch himself, for each of three different years his receipts were $45,000 from the sale of wool, sheep, cattle and wheat.

In the progress of this sketch, nothing has been said concerning the home life of Mr. Cooper. It was in all respects an ideal life. It was his high privilege to enjoy a domestic happiness that is delightful to witness. Mention has previously been made of his friends, W. W. and Hubbard Hollister. There was a third and older brother, Albert G., a resident of Holt county, Mo., and it was his daughter, Frances, whom Mr. Cooper married, July 3, 1871. In the winter of 1872 Mrs. Cooper's father came to California, accompanied by his entire family, and took up his abode in the vicinity of his relatives. After the death of Mr. Cooper's first-born, John Albert, he and his wife were not satisfied to remain on the ranch, where everything reminded them of the bright young existence so suddenly taken from them. They therefore came to Santa Barbara, and soon purchased for $10,000 the residence of Hon. Mortimer

Cook, where he has since remained. Of his children, six are living, namely: Elizabeth, Willie, Lulu, Joseph, Frances and Thomas D. The oldest son is now a student in the University of California. The family circle remained unbroken, save by the loss of the oldest son, until February 11, 1901, when Mrs. Cooper was called from among those to whose welfare her life had been so faithfully given.

Having accumulated an ample fortune, Mr. Cooper in 1885 relinquished some of the interests to which he had been for years devoted. Selling his sheep and cattle to Leon Carteri, he leased to him the Santa Rosa ranch for a period of five years, and at the expiration of that period granted another lease to the same party. However, he still finds sufficient time to engage his attention in the oversight of his various property interests and the placing of remunerative investments. His devotion to his country, too, is such that he has given much time to the furtherance of local enterprises and the development of promising resources. Indeed, to an extent beyond ordinary conception, Santa Barbara county is indebted to this wise pioneer and progressive man. His means have ever been at the service of worthy movements; his sympathy has encouraged men when the final issue was in doubt; his unfaltering courage has been a pillar of strength to those less brave than he, and his faith in the final triumph of justice and right has always proved contagious. His name is known throughout the length and breadth of the county. It is only the stranger from whom the inquiry comes, "Who is J. W. Cooper?" By all the residents he is known and honored as a man of strict integrity, the highest principles of honor, a kind heart that constantly prompts him to acts of charity, and a keen mind that has not only brought him financial success, but has ever been at the service of his friends and his adopted county.

In alluding to his success, it is but a matter of justice to say that the firm friends by whom Mr. Cooper had always been surrounded contributed not a little to the molding of his character as well as the attainment of his large fortune. He himself ascribes much of his prosperity to the associates of his manhood's activities. And perhaps we cannot better close this biography than by quoting his remarks in "A Pastoral Prince" concerning those who labored by his side through many busy and happy years: "All but three of these men have gone to their rest. I am in the afternoon of life myself, and each year I have noticed the shadows of the past grow longer and longer, and of course it will be no great while before my life will be but a shadow itself, a something that has been. I love to sit down and recall the pictures, note the lights and shades, the play of colors and the finished work. I love to think my dear old friends are with me, though I cannot see them: Hubbard, the Colonel and Albert Hollister, forever hopeful, sunny, sweet-tempered and progressive; Colonel Peters, planning for the future which is always in advance of him; Martin Oldham, sturdy, truthful, honest and fearless, a great oak tree that is good to lean against; Nelson McMahan, bold, manly and always reliable, and dear old Auntie Brown (a sister of the Hollisters), forever solicitous for others' comfort. It does me good to recall those stanch old friends and know they have been mine and are yet mine, for with all my heart I believe this, 'Once a friend, always a friend.'"

Wm. G. Dove D.M.

WILLIAM GOWAN DOBIE, D. M. There is no science nor profession which has commanded the attention of talented men to a greater degree than has the science of medicine. Many important truths in this science have been added to the world's knowledge during the past few decades, conspicuous among which is the importance of the study of the science of fine forces. As an exponent of this theory Dr. Dobie of Santa Monica has gained a prominence to which his broad knowledge and extensive researches entitle him. In his work it is his aim to study the patient and the food that is essential to his health, through which means he has accomplished results where medicines had failed. Nature is regarded as the great restorer and the problem to be solved is the bringing of the body back into harmony with this universal physician.

Referring to the genealogy of the Dobie family, we find that it can be traced back to the sixteenth century, when the Dobies of Dobie's Lane were prominent shipbuilders in the seaport town of Leith, Scotland. Dr. Dobie was born in the ancient Scotch city of Dunfermline, where his father, William, and grandfather were both damask manufacturers, while his mother, Agnes, was a daughter of James Mathewson, who was one of the pioneer manufacturers of damask. The latter was the founder of the manufacturing house of James Mathewson & Sons, which is still in existence and has a branch house in New York. William Dobie died in Fifeshire while acting as manager of a large damask factory; his wife died in Kansas City in 1899. They were the parents of six daughters and one son, all but one of whom are in America. The third in order of birth was William Gowan Dobie, who was born June 13, 1855. When seven years of age he was taken to Dollar, Clackmannanshire, and there received an academic education. At the age of sixteen he learned the bleacher's trade in Scotland, completing it in Belfast, Ireland, two years later. For a time he was manager of a large bleachery and later became owner of the Drumbeg bleach works in the suburbs of Belfast.

During 1883 he closed out his many business interests in the old country and came to America, where he became proprietor of a cattle ranch near Raton, N. M. A life more widely at variance with his former interests could scarcely be imagined. In place of the busy factory, with its many operatives, the hum of machinery, and the surroundings of the busy city, there were the loneliness of the snow-capped mountains, the broad expanse of valleys where the sound of human voices was seldom heard, and the adventurous life of a cattleman and rancher. In 1888 he left that territory and came to California, which he has since considered his home. Shortly after coming here he entered the College of Fine Forces, in New York, from which he was graduated in 1893, with the degree of Doctor of Magnetics. Later he took a course in the San Francisco College of Therapeutics, of which he is a graduate and in which he had the advantage of study under Dr. Buchanan. For a time he practiced in Los Angeles, but in 1897 removed to Santa Monica, where he has since practiced his profession. The residence which he built at No. 718 Second street is presided over by his wife, whom he married in Pittsburg, Pa., and who was formerly Mrs. Belle (Todd) Gilman, a native of Toronto, Canada. Nature's is Dr. Dobie's church, and he is one of her fondest worshippers. To him "she speaks a varied language," rich, beautiful and uplifting. As he has been independent in religious thought, so, too, in politics, he has not felt in either of the great parties the realization of his dreams of all men as brethren, consequently he gives his preference to socialism in the broad view of that term.

AUGUSTUS H. DEN. The genealogy of the Den family shows that they are of Norman French extraction, and trace their ancestry back to the Capets of France, who settled in England at the time of Edward the Confessor. A number of the family bore a part in the war of the Crusades. The origin of the name points to some connection with a den of lions, and the coat-of-arms represents a lion rampant and guardian holding a cross. From England one branch of the family went to Ireland, and Nicholas A. Den was a native of Waterford, Ireland, born in 1812. His parents, Emanuel and Katie Den, had several children, among them being Nicholas A. Den and his sister, the talented Miss Mary Den, a contemporary of Victor Hugo. Another daughter, Katie, married James McGrath, of Waterford, Ireland, where he is the successful editor of the Waterford Citizen.

Given the advantages of training at Trinity College and association with people of culture, Nicholas A. Den was prepared in youth for a responsible position in life. His prospects were flattering, for his parents were wealthy, and he took up the study of medicine in Dublin rather from a desire to acquire professional knowledge than from any thought that he would ever need to support himself. However, a sudden change in financial affairs swept away his father's property and left him with the immediate necessity of earning a livelihood. For this reason he went to Nova Scotia, expecting to work for a cousin who was a merchant, but, on his arrival, found that he was little more than a servant and valet. His pride would not brook this change in circumstances, and, finding a ship bound for the far west, he went on board, and in this way, after one hundred and fifty-seven days from Boston, on the ship Europea, he landed at Santa Barbara, Cal., July 8, 1836. Here he was entertained by Daniel Hill, whose daughter he later married. It is worthy of note that he was the first educated English-speaking man in Santa Barbara, and for this reason he was sought for counsel and advice. In time he became a very extensive stock-raiser, and owned the San Marcos, Dos Pueblos, Cuenada del Corral and Tequepis ranches, on which he had about ten thousand head of cattle. During the gold excitement he was engaged in merchandising and the stock business at the mines, in partnership with Daniel Dent, the father of Mrs. Ulysses S. Grant. At the time of his death, March 3, 1862, he was about fifty years of age.

Rosa, wife of Nicholas A. Den, was a daughter of Daniel Hill, who was born in Massachusetts in 1799, and came to California as early as 1822, in command of the vessel Rebecca, engaged in trade with the Sandwich Islands. His parents, Job and Susan (Blanchard) Hill, were lifelong residents of Massachusetts. Settling in Santa Barbara, he first engaged in the mercantile business near the old mission. At the same time he acted as superintendent for the padres in the management of ranches. He was one of the first men from New England to settle here, and subsequent pioneers were always welcomed by him with the greatest hospitality. His heart was large and his generosity great. His daughter, Mrs. Den, died in Santa Barbara in 1884. Her children were named as follows: Emanuel, a stockman of Los Alamos; Nicholas, of Los Angeles; Alfred, who was killed by the kick of a horse when he was twenty-six years of age; William, who died in childhood; Alfonso and Augustus H., both of Santa Barbara; Mary, wife of T. R. More, of this city; Rosa, who died in girlhood, and Mrs. Susan Tyler, of Santa Barbara. A brother of Nicholas A. Den was Dr. Richard S. Den, a prominent old settler of Los Angeles, who died in 1896; another brother, Dr. E. H. Den, died in Omaha, Neb.

At what is now Naples, Santa Barbara county, the subject of this article was born. He was educated at the old mission and Santa Clara College. From youth he has been interested in farming. Rincon ranch, of which he is the owner, comprises four hundred and eight acres, forming one of the finest places for miles around. Its value is enhanced by the presence on the land of the famous asphaltum mine, containing a fine deposit of asphaltum. In addition to this property he has a comfortable residence on Garden street, Santa Barbara, where he makes his home. He is a member of the Chamber of Commerce, in politics a stanch Republican, and in religion a Roman Catholic. He married Miss Winnifred G. Devine, who was born in California and is a sister of Judge Devine, of Sacramento. In 1900 they made a tour of Europe, visiting points of interest and prolonging the trip until they had gained a comprehensive knowledge of European cities and life.

JAMES DUFFY. The superintendent of the San Diego county hospital and farm came to San Diego in March, 1870, from San Francisco, where he had made his home the three previous years. Born and reared in Herkimer county, N. Y., it was in 1867 that he resolved to seek a home in the far west, and accordingly made the trip via Panama, crossing along the route now laid out for the great canal. Entering the harbor at the Golden Gate, he settled in San Francisco, and for three years worked at any occupation that offered an honest livelihood. On coming to San Diego county, he became interested in several mines near Julian, and for about seven years engaged in mining and prospecting. During 1877 he began to turn his attention to farming and fruit growing, and set out twenty acres in an orchard, principally of apple trees. At this writing he owns six hundred acres of good land. Here he devotes himself to the dairy business. He owns a number of fine Jersey cows and has a creamery with a capacity of three thousand pounds of milk per day.

In 1893 Mr. Duffy was appointed superintendent of the San Diego county hospital and farm by the board of supervisors, comprising J. M. P. Rainbow, John Judson, J. A. Jasper, W. W. Wetzel and Arthur G. Nason. It is a fact worthy of note that he has been reappointed by every succeeding board since that time. Since taking charge of the farm and hospital he has made many important improvements, so that the general aspect of the place has entirely changed since 1893. Among the improvements may be mentioned the building of a large barn, the erection of a house for the superintendent, and the putting up of various outbuildings. Through the introduction by him of the system of farming, the institution has been made almost self-supporting. However, it is through the dairy business that the largest financial returns are secured, and butter-making is one of the most important industries of the place. Enough vegetables are raised to supply the hospital table. Everything about the place bespeaks the wise supervision of the superintendent, and it is a fact evident to all that the man in charge of the work is thoroughly familiar with all details.

The political views held by Mr. Duffy are in harmony with the principles of the Democratic party. In 1873 he was a member of the board of supervisors of San Diego county. In 1890 he was his party's candidate for sheriff. However, he is not a partisan in the usual sense of that word, but is fair-minded and broad in his views. That he has the liking of both the leading parties is shown by the fact that his reappointments as superintendent have come both from Republican and from Democratic boards. For twenty-six years he has been identified with San Diego Lodge No. 155, I. O. O. F. He is also connected with the Foresters and the Ancient Order of United Workmen. By his marriage to Mary Jane Taylor, a native of Placer county, Cal., he has six children, namely: Catherine, James, Jr., Charles, Samuel, Agnes and Carl.

ROBERT DUNN. The proprietor of the Duneden hotel at Piru City came to Ventura county from Scotland in 1886. The early years of his life were passed in Edinburgh, Scotland, where he was born in 1844, and where his education was received in its schools. Determined to try his fortunes in the new world, he set sail from Scotland in 1886 and came direct to California. After a few months in Oakland he proceeded to the Newhall ranch in Ventura county, and in 1887 bought a ranch of one thousand acres situated three miles from Piru City. Much of the land was devoted to stock-grazing. One of its most conspicuous improvements was an orchard of one hundred acres. For the work of a general agriculturist he was fitted by his experience in Scotland, where he had been a farmer at the Burdie House Mains, near Edinburgh.

Coming to Piru City in 1899, Mr. Dunn established the town of Duneden, near by, with about seventy inhabitants, and containing a general store, large meat market, hotel, residence, livery barn, lumber and blacksmith shops, and mercantile store, of all of which buildings he is the owner. The store, hotel, livery and blacksmith shop are all under one management, the whole forming a large establishment, and containing modern improvements, including a public telephone. From the ranch six miles distant he brings the water to supply Duneden, and the finest mountain water is furnished the inhabitants of the place. In all enterprises for local upbuilding he is a chief factor. Politically he is a staunch Republican. As trustee of the Piru school district and as a tireless worker in the Methodist Episcopal Church, he is active both in educational and religious matters.

The ranch owned by Mr. Dunn deserves special mention because it is one of the finest in Ventura county. It is underlaid with oil and has been leased to the South Pacific Oil Company. The ranch contains nine hundred and twenty acres of rich mesa land and extends one and one-half miles along the base of the mountain. The roadway is bordered with pepper trees and a driveway leads to the beautiful residence, which is near the foot of the mountain, and surrounded with beautiful flowers, shrubbery and shade trees. Owing to its location the land is exempt from killing frosts. The water right gives great value to the ranch, although during ordinary seasons the deciduous trees do not require irrigation, the soil being remarkable for its ability to retain moisture. In addition to raising fruit Mr. Dunn engages in a general farming and stock-raising business, and also deals extensively in poultry, and has a large apiary. The ranch contains numerous buildings, including barns, blacksmith shops, cottages for the hired men, etc. There are also extensive fruit-drying yards, sulphur houses and all the appliances and machinery necessary for picking, hauling, cutting, drying and marketing a large fruit crop. Competent men manage the various departments of the extensive business.

In Edinburgh, Scotland, Mr. Dunn married Miss Margaret Mackie, a native of Glasgow, Scotland. They have four children, Robert, Thomas, James and Elizabeth.

CAPT. WILLIAM E. GREENWELL. To come in contact with a man who has left the impress of his intellect and his personality upon his locality; or to peruse an account of his useful life, as recorded in the pages of history, is to be helped in a practical way. In a somewhat unusual, but distinctively important, manner, Captain Greenwell aided in the development of California, and, although a considerable period has elapsed since his death, he is well and widely remembered as one of the most distinguished members of the United States coast and geodetic survey. For many years he made his home in Santa Barbara, and through wise investments in property in and near this city he gained a competence that enabled him to leave his family in comfortable circumstances.

Of English ancestry, the son of William Greenwell (who commanded a regiment during the war of 1812), William Edward Greenwell, was born in St. Mary's county, Md., in 1824. After having graduated from Georgetown College, he studied law in the office of Judge Brent, of Washington. His connection with the coast survey began when he was twenty-two years of age, and he first served with Capt. F. U. Gerdes, on the coast of the Gulf of Mexico. In 1855 he was transferred to the coast of California, to take charge of a party, under General Ord. At the outbreak of the Civil war he went east and was stationed at Washington, where he gave his hearty support to the Union cause; for, although himself a southerner by birth and lineage, he was always loyal to the government and to the old flag. In 1863 he returned to California and for many years afterward continued in the coast survey, but resigned some years before his death.

Concerning the captain we quote the following from the United States Army and Navy Journal: "Captain Greenwell was well known for forty years to the public service, but, owing to his having resigned some years ago, his death has not attracted the attention of many friends in the army and navy to whom his loss will be a lasting grief. He entered the coast survey in 1846. Serving first in the party of Assistant Gerdes in Moblie Bay, he continued to work chiefly on the southern coast until 1854, in which year he was transferred to the Pacific coast. On this coast he gave nearly thirty years of his life to the faithful service of his country, in his profession as surveyor and civil engineer, while he made for himself and his family a home famed for its kindly hospitality throughout that beautiful region of Southern California. Here, as the country settled rapidly, he was sought for, far and wide, to give advice to those seeking homes, to render help to the unfortunate, and to place at the disposal of individuals or young settlements his valuable practical experience as pioneer in those regions. To army and navy officers working in his vicinity the assistance rendered by Captain Greenwell's thorough knowledge of the country, and his clear practical intelligence, was invaluable, and their debt of gratitude was made the greater by the warm and kindly hospitality of his lovely family. To have enjoyed the genial company, the faithful friendship, of this simple and noble character, is a privilege and a memory invaluable to those fortunate enough to have classed themselves as his friends. In that once happy home, near the Santa Barbara shore, a devoted wife now mourns his death, supported in her bereavement by two sons worthy of their father's name."

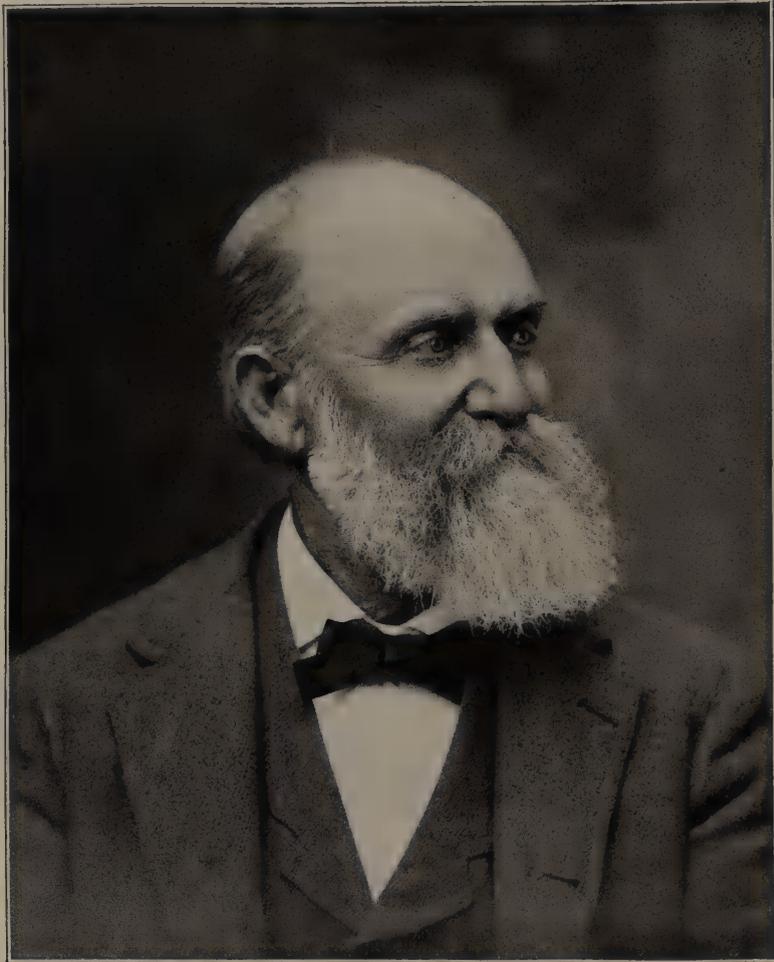

By his first marriage Captain Greenwell had one son, William M., who died in Washington, D. C., in 1898. His second marriage took place in St. Stephen's Church, New York City, December 31, 1862, and united him with Miss Anna C. Cummings, who was born in Washington, D. C. Her parents, Charles and Mary J. (Stephenson) Cummings, were natives of London, England, and there married, after which they came to the United States, settling in Washington, D. C., and Mr. Cummings was employed as a purser in the United States navy until he died. Of his family of four daughters and four sons, Mrs. Greenwell, the youngest, is the sole survivor. One son, Rev. William Cummings, D. D., founded St. Stephen's Church in New York City and remained its pastor as long as he lived. Mrs. Greenwell was educated in the Convent of Visitation at Georgetown, D. C., and has always been an adherent of the Roman Catholic church. Since the death of her husband, she has continued to reside in Santa Barbara, making occasional visits to the east. Of her sons, the oldest, Charles B., is secretary of the Hueneme Wharf Company. He was elected to the state senate of California and has gained distinction through his able service in that body. The younger son, Arthur Cummings Greenwell, is now collector of customs at Santa Barbara. Among the property holdings of Mrs. Greenwell one of the most important is the wheat and bean farm comprising between six and seven hundred acres and situated in Las Posas, Ventura county. Of this ranch Senator Bard, who was an intimate friend of Captain Greenwell, now has charge. In addition, she owns a ranch south of Summerland and a farm of two hundred acres near Hope, Santa Barbara county.

Strength of character was one of Captain Greenwell's most conspicuous possessions. In every respect he was an independent thinker, forming his own conclusions after careful and matured study, unbiased by the prejudices of others. As he was always true to his country and true to his family, so it could not but follow that he was likewise true to his God. Though in no sense of the word a churchman, and having but little sympathy with warring creeds, he possessed that religion which finds in everything the footprints of an all-wise and all-powerful Creator. In the beauties of the region where he dwelt, in the history of the past, and in the mercies of the present, he saw every evidence of a God, and he had little patience with those shallow natures that deny the existence of a Creator whose handiwork may thus be seen on every side and in every era of the world's history.

Courage was another prominent element in Captain Greenwell's character. Fear was absolutely unknown to him. When but a young man, at the risk of his life, he saved some sailors from shipwreck and death. Years later, on a dark and foggy night, when the steamer Senator was driven near the rocks of Point Conception, and when the crew were rebellious and the captain ill, he took command of the vessel, and by his judgment and tact reduced the crew to submission, saved the ship and brought the passengers safely to land. He had the reputation of being the best surfer in the service. His shore duties, also, were performed with equal success. In the mapping out and completing of a practicable scheme of triangulation, he was an expert. He was an excellent mountaineer and never forgot a landmark, hence was peculiarly fitted for his chosen occupation.

After a lifetime of noble and successful application, in an important sphere of duty, Captain Greenwell died at his Santa Barbara home, August 27, 1886, mourned by the large circle of friends to whom his ability and kindness of heart had endeared him, and remembered by all as a man ripe in judgment, prompt in action, versatile in mental capacity, keen in discrimination, and dauntlessly brave and valiant.

John F. Cummings

JOHN F. CUMMINGS. Too much cannot be said in praise of the efforts of Mr. Cummings in the Santa Clara valley, of which he was one of the earliest settlers, having arrived in 1872. This section of the state has no rancher more industrious or capable than he. Under his energetic supervision fields whereon the wild mustard towered to a height of twelve feet have been transformed into fertile tracts that well repay the owner's skillful cultivation. His ability is doubtless inherited, for his father, Hon. James Cummings, who was born in Fayette county, Pa., in 1795, possessed many remarkable characteristics. Though his schooling was limited to four months, through his own efforts he acquired a broad fund of information, was known as a skillful debater and an orator of power. During his active life he farmed near Mansfield, Richland county, Ohio. His fellow-citizens, appreciating his talents, twice elected him to represent the district in the state legislature, and for twenty-eight years he served as justice of the peace. A man beloved wherever known and honored throughout a wide section of country, he passed away, at eighty-five years of age, leaving a record of which posterity may be justly proud. He married Christine McMillan, who was born in Pennsylvania in 1801, and whose ancestors came to America in an early day. In the family were five daughters and two sons, and six of these are living, John F. being fourth. One of the sons, Wilson S., is one of the most prominent men of Fredericktown, Ohio, and owns practically all of the large buildings and enterprises there represented.

In Richland county, Ohio, John F. Cummings was born September 19, 1835. As opportunity offered he attended the public schools of his neighborhood, and his youth was not unlike that of other farm-reared boys. When twenty-five years of age he came to California and worked by the month in the northern part of the state. The money thus saved was invested in land, which he operated on his own responsibility. In 1869 he purchased one hundred and fifty acres of bottom land in Ventura county, and upon this tract took up his permanent residence three years later. For the first few years his crops consisted mainly of barley and feed for hogs, of which stock he averaged six hundred head per annum. His experiments with the cultivation of the lima bean began in 1876, and he was the first in the valley to predict a success in this industry. At first he placed ten acres under the beans, but gradually increased the amount until he utilized one hundred acres, producing about a ton per acre. A portion of the land is in an apricot orchard and a walnut grove, the crops from each being exceptionally satisfactory. In fact, he has met with gratifying success in everything he has undertaken to accomplish on his ranch, and he is conceded to be one of the best and most practical farmers in the valley. Everything in connection with the place is under his personal supervision, and no farm assistant whom the excess of work obliges him to employ works half as hard as this successful agriculturist, who keeps in advance of all improvements and is ever striving to bring about simpler and better methods.

In California Mr. Cummings married Miss Georgia Sweeney, who was born on Long Island, N. Y., being the daughter of a skilled engineer. They are the parents of five daughters and four sons, all of whom are yet at home, and form an interesting family. They are named as follows: Ada B., Madge, Walter W., Esther, Jeanette, Victor, Olga, John F., Jr., and Wilson S.

The interests of Mr. Cummings extend beyond the limits of his ranch and embrace a knowledge of and co-operation with all that is instituted for the benefit of the community. He owns stock in the Santa Paula Home Oil Company, and is a stockholder in the Santa Paula Company's co-operative store. The breadth of mind which characterizes his actions in general is carried into politics, and, although a Republican, he invariably votes for principle rather than party. The county of Ventura does not contain a more eloquent or earnest advocate of temperance, nor a more liberal-minded man as to religious matters. In opening his purse to aid all worthy causes he aids alike the Methodist or Presbyterian or any other denomination of worshippers, believing that all are equally worthy and traveling the same road under different creeds. He is emphatically a thinking man, for his conclusions in all matters are the result of his own profound consideration, wide observation and careful weighing of all sides of a question.

JOSEPH McCULLOUGH GARRETSON. Intimately associated with the pioneer days of the east as well as the west has been the forceful life of Joseph McCullough Garretson, one of the business men of Santa Barbara. He comes of a family who have agreed with Richelieu that there was "no such word as fail" when applied to their respective undertakings, and whose enterprise and capabilities have been exerted for the best good of this country ever since Lord Baltimore sailed away from the shores of England and settled in and named Baltimore county, Md. Indeed, the same craft which buffeted the storms of the Atlantic with the lord of Baltimore as its most distinguished passenger had also as passengers the great-great-grandfather, Shadrack Garretson, and his brother John, who eventually acquired six hundred acres of land at Gooseberry Neck, Baltimore county.

On the homestead at Gooseberry Neck was born the great-grandfather, Job Garretson, and the grandfather, John, the latter of whom incurred the paternal displeasure by enlisting in the Revolutionary war against the wishes of his sire, the feeling waxing so strong that upon his return from the war the house of his childhood memories was no longer a pleasant or profitable place to live in. With the unyielding pride of his race he struck out in the world on his own responsibility and became a planter in Hawkins county, Tenn., where his death eventually occurred. He was twice married, the three sons of the first marriage being Jeremiah (the father of Joseph McCullough), who died in Indiana; George, who died in Cincinnati, and John, who died in Tennessee. By the second marriage there were Madison, Owen, Freeborn and William, all of whom have long since joined the silent majority. Jeremiah Garretson was born in Hawkins county, Tenn., in 1800, and about 1820 settled near Connersville, Ind., where he farmed for thirty years. His former occupation was resumed after removing to the vicinity of Lafayette, where occurred the death of his wife, his own demise taking place in 1855, at the age of fifty-five years. He married Jane McCullough, who was born in Hawkins county, Tenn., in 1799, a daughter of Joseph McCullough, who was born in Scotland, and became a planter in Tennessee. There were eight children in the family, four sons and four daughters, of whom Joseph McCullough Garretson alone survives.

Near Connersville, Ind., where he was born on the old homestead March 4, 1836, Joseph McCullough Garretson attended the subscription schools of his time, the most of his early education, however, being the result of the teaching of his mother, with whom he pored over books in the chimney corner by the light of the hearth fire, during the long winter evenings. This same thoughtful mother was a typical pioneer woman, and such leisure as she could command from the arduous duties around the farm was devoted to spinning and weaving, and such other occupations as fell to the lot of the settlers. In 1859 her son Joseph departed from the home surroundings and went to Fountain county, Ind., where he worked on the farm of Mr. Williams for his board, and for the privilege of attending school during the winter. By 1854, so industrious and frugal had he been that his worldly possessions amounted to the lordly sum of $212.50. With this seemingly colossal fortune he struck out for California, his clothes in a satchel, and his hopes confidently directed toward a future of vast accomplishment. February 22, 1854, he arrived in Lafayette, Ind., from where he took the train for New York City, and March 6 boarded the steamer Ohio for Aspinwall, his passage costing him $170 of his hard-earned money. To get across the Isthmus made further inroads in his finances to the extent of $30, and from Panama he took the boat John L. Stevens for San Francisco, which he reached March 18, 1854. Nevada City being his destination, he visited Sacramento on the way, and upon arriving there had just one dollar left. He remained over night and walked to Nevada City, and after trying hard to sell his blanket for his night's lodging on the way succeeded in having fifty cents left after consummating the deal. In Nevada City he found an old schoolmate, and at once went to work for $4 a day, and at the end of the week had cleared $20. With a part of this he purchased necessary blankets and engaged in mining; later finding his way to Nelson's Point, in Plumas county, on the Feather river, where he was overtaken with rheumatism, and was obliged to substitute clerking for mining for a couple of years. At the end of this time he again began to mine and continued to do so for three years, after which he sold out and went to the Washoe valley, in Nevada, and engaged in ranching and the butcher business. In 1865 he married Miss Catharine McCaleb, a native of Pennsylvania, and continued to live in Nevada until his removal to Santa Barbara county in 1869. The journey hither was accomplished with wagons and teams, and a stop was made at San Bernardino, but the town was too warm and the travelers came up the coast and settled at Carpinteria in 1869, remaining there for a year. Here Mr. Garretson engaged in the dairy business, and in 1870 located four miles west of the city of Santa Barbara, where he became interested in farming and stock-raising. Eventually he located on the place of forty-five acres on what is now Hollister avenue, which he has since improved and built upon and farmed. In 1892 he moved into Santa Barbara and built the store on East Ortega street, in which he now carries on a mercantile business.

The children born to Mr. and Mrs. Garretson are: Charles O., who is teaming in Santa Barbara; Claire Josephine, who is now Mrs. Kirch; Albert Elmer, who died in July of 1900 at the age of twenty-four years; and Mabel, who is living at home. Mr. Garretson is one of the most prominent Masons in Santa Barbara, having become a member of the Forest City Lodge No. 66, and of the Carson City Lodge, and is now associated with the Santa Barbara Lodge No. 192, F. & A. M. He was exalted to the Royal Arch Masons No. 10, Forest City, and was a charter member of the first chapter in the state of Nevada at Carson City. He later became one of the organizers of the Santa Barbara Chapter No. 51, of which he is now treasurer. He is also connected with the St. Omar Commandery No. 30, of which he is treasurer, and he is a member of Al Malakiah Temple, N. M. S., of Los Angeles. Politically he was a Republican prior to 1880, but is now independent.

JOHN W. HUGUS, formerly of Pasadena, was born at Pittsburg, Pa., November 24, 1836, and died in San Francisco, October 10, 1901. In descent the family came from the old Huguenot stock, who settled the French colony in Hesse-Cassel, Germany, whither so many of the French fled after the revocation of the edict of Nantes in 1598. In 1761 his great-grandfather came to America with a brother, William, and settled in Pennsylvania, where his father, Peter Hugus, was born and educated. From Pennsylvania Peter Hugus moved to Canton, Ohio, where he was a merchant in good standing for many years. While in Canton, the boy, John, became intimately acquainted with another rugged Canton boy, William McKinley, and their personal friendship continued throughout their lives. His father's mercantile ventures were not successful, and to repair them he brought his wife and children into the west and settled in Omaha, in the territory of Nebraska, in 1856. Mr. Hugus had two brothers and two sisters. His brother, Charles, was a lawyer of great promise, and owned and published the Massillon News in Ohio. There Mr. Hugus learned the printing trade, which he followed for a number of years, and was employed on several of the prominent newspapers in the larger cities of the west.

In June, 1857, Mr. Hugus moved to Omaha, where the family had preceded him, and followed his trade as a printer until 1861, when he went to Fort Kearney, two hundred miles west of Omaha, to take charge of a post trader's general store there. He soon acquired an interest in the business, and with the money thus earned he removed to Omaha in 1866 and engaged in the banking business. In 1864, at Williamsburg, Pa., Mr. Hugus married Annetta Olivia Rees, who died in 1868 in Omaha. The death of his beautiful young wife was his first great sorrow. In 1870 he went to Fort Fred Steele, in Wyoming, seven hundred miles west of Omaha, where he laid the foundation of his career as a successful merchant and banker. In Wyoming and Colorado he established banks and general merchandise stores, all under the name of J. W. Hugus & Co. Rawlins, Wyo., was the headquarters of the business, and for several hundred miles around Rawlins the merchandising and banking house of J. W. Hugus & Co. supplied the needs of a new and prosperous country, and was, and is today, one of the most progressive and successful merchandise houses in the west. In 1883 Mr. Hugus admitted into partnership with him J. C. Davis, who had been with him for a number of years, and to whom he gave the entire management of their large interests. In the autumn of that year he moved to California, settling in Pasadena, where he bought a large ranch and built one of the fine houses in the foothills near the present Altadena tract. In a few years he transformed the rank growth of grease wood and rocky roughness into one of the finest ranches in Southern California.

In 1873 Mr. Hugus married Sarah Goldsborough Carnan, whose family settled in Indiana at Vincennes, coming there from Maryland, where they were prominent in law. Her father was educated at Harvard and served later as judge in one of the large districts in Indiana. Mrs. Hugus shared with her husband the trials and pleasures of frontier life in Wyoming, and in California she found the great pleasure of her life in dispensing that cordial and generous hospitality in which in her earlier life she had been so well initiated in her own southern home. To them were born two children, Louise Bonner Hugus and Annetta Olivia Hugus. Mrs. Hugus and her daughters were actively interested in the social life of Pasadena, as well as in the church, educational and charitable work. Mrs. Hugus died November 19, 1897, beloved by all who knew her.

Throughout all his life Mr. Hugus was a consistent and sterling Christian of the vigorous and strenuous type, carrying his religion with him in every hour of his life with such dignity and force of character that it made him at once a marked man in any community, and won for him, among men with strong passions in the earlier days of the west, a respect for his personality such as few men attain. He was known all his life as Judge Hugus, a title earned in Wyoming that paid a fine tribute to his character. In the west men of quick impulses and hasty actions felt the process of law too slow to settle differences that the might of the stronger could not at once overcome, and because it grew customary to settle controversies by referring the matter for John Hugus to decide, he acquired the title of Judge, inasmuch as so often he was selected to arbitrate differences by stockmen who would agree to stand by and accept his decision upon controversies affecting their business and social lives. His whole life was identified with the history in the Episcopal Church in Wyoming, Colorado and Southern California. Many tens of thousands of dollars he directly contributed towards building permanent churches, establishing parishes and aiding in maintaining the salaries of missionaries, priests and bishops working in these three states. In the Throop Polytechnic Institute at Pasadena he was a trustee and valued advisor in all its educational work. By his own large endowment to the school and his ability to interest others, he was able through the power of his wealth and individuality to render most material aid to the school in a crisis, which, when passed, placed the institution on a firm financial and educational basis, so it will for all time be a power among the educational institutions on the coast. Mr. Hugus believed himself to be a trustee for the small fortune he accumulated, and that his stewardship could be best managed by his personal supervision during the period of his own best mental activity. In the last ten years of his life he gave over $200,000 to church and educational work, in which he took a personal interest. Much of this he constantly supervised, and many a young man he aided by both helping him with means for his education and by the personal and continued interest he kept up in the young man's life.

Upon the Sunday after his death memorial services were held in San Francisco and Pasadena (Cal.), Rawlins (Wyo.) and in a number of churches in Colorado. His death in San Francisco came suddenly to him while in attendance at the general convention of the Episcopal Church, and so it seemed to fittingly round out a life so long identified in the work of the church. Surviving Mr. Hugus are his widow and three daughters. Less than two years before his death Mr. Hugus married Miss Blanche Bolt, a daughter of Frank C. Bolt, president of the San Gabriel Valley Bank in Pasadena. By his first wife Mr. Hugus had one daughter, Nellie Rees Hugus, who married Victor B. Caldwell, a graduate of Yale and at present cashier of the United States National Bank of Omaha. Louise Bonner Hugus and Annetta Olivia Hugus are his children by his second wife. Miss Louise B. Hugus lives in Los Angeles, and is actively engaged at the College Settlement House, being a resident worker. Annetta Hugus married Albert E. Carroll, a graduate of Harvard and a manufacturer of woolen machinery in Boston, Mass.

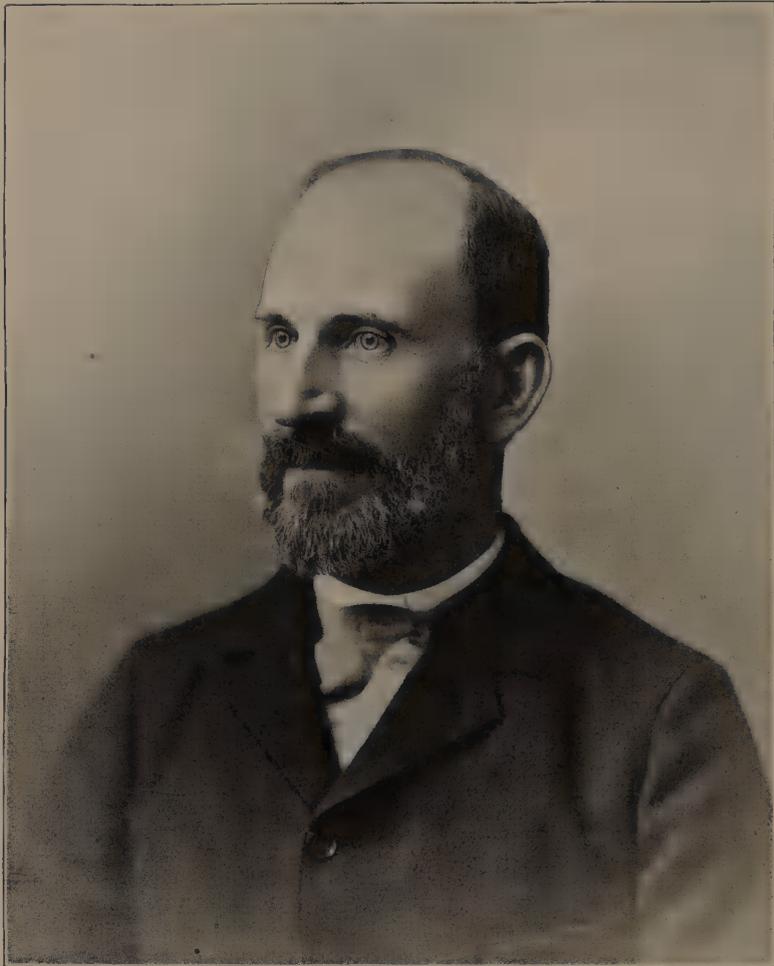

JAMES E. SHAW. In 1892 Mr. Shaw came to Riverside and bought ten acres of raw land under the Gage canal, which he set out in navel and valencia oranges, and which has developed into one of the most prolific groves on the heights. During the year he packs about two thousand one hundred boxes of navels and sixteen hundred boxes of valencias, which are shipped through the local buyers. In 1900 the grove was seven years old, and the returns were $5,342 net above picking, which furnished the best showing of any grove in this section. The land is entirely free from frost, many improvements have been made upon it and a fine residence was erected by the owner in 1899. For several years after coming here Mr. Shaw was engaged in a general nursery business, making a specialty of oranges, lemons and grape fruit, furnishing the new groves with promising young trees. After the years of arduous work he has the satisfaction of knowing that his ranch is valued at $30,000, which nearly approaches his expectations upon first coming here.

Mr. Shaw began in Riverside from a practically small beginning, and he has been interested in all of the enterprises for progress in the town. He has considerable money in the oil district on the Kern river, and is a large stockholder in the Grand Central Oil and Development Company, which owns forty acres in the famous section 4. He is also interested in the development of the oil in section 28, Kern river district.

EDGAR A. HOLLISTER. To be a bearer of the name of Hollister is to claim kinship with much that is important and noteworthy in the history of Santa Barbara county. For, heading the written page of the struggles borne by the pioneers, is the name of Col. William Wells Hollister, whose career is so interwoven with the growth of this region as to seem as much an integral part of it as are the trees and the enterprises which sprang into being at his demand. To his nephew, Edgar A. Hollister, the Colonel bequeathed many of his excellent traits of character, and he is one of the successful and esteemed residents of this locality. A native of Holt county, Mo., he was born October 18, 1851, a son of Albert G. Hollister, who was born in Licking county, Ohio, in 1812, his brother, Colonel Hollister, having been born in 1818. Albert G. was also a noteworthy man, and was the founder of the Hollister Mills on the Nodaway river, Mo., from which state he came to California in 1871 and founded the home where his son Edgar now lives, eight miles west of Santa Barbara, at the foot of the Santa Barbara mountains. Here he lived and prospered until his death in 1891. He married Elizabeth Wickham, who is living with her son, Edgar, and who is the mother of two other children: Frances, now deceased, who was the wife of J. W. Cooper, and Louise, who resides with her mother and brother on the old homestead.

The Hollister ranch consists of four hundred acres, sixty of which are set out in walnuts. The place is well improved, and besides walnuts a general fruit industry is carried on, general farming engaged in, beans, barley, hay and stock being raised on a large scale. Mr. Hollister is a practical agriculturist, and understands how to make his land pay, and how to improve it to the utmost. He is prominent in a general way in the community, and possesses those traits which insure respect and lasting regard. In politics a Republican, he is nevertheless very liberal minded, and believes in voting for principle rather than party.

Alex. Waldie

The first marriage of Mr. Hollister occurred in Goleta in October, 1881, and was with Anna Owen, who died in 1893, leaving four children, Albert G., Owen Edgar, Ethel May and Chester Allen. The second marriage, in 1896, united him with Sallie Baker, of Missouri, and of this union there were two children, William and Robert. Mrs. Sallie Hollister died July 10, 1901.

ALEXANDER WALDIE. Conspicuous among the leading business men of Santa Paula is Mr. Waldie, who, as manager of the Santa Paula Hardware Company, has for some years been intimately associated with one of the town's best known business houses. Born in Scotland, he possesses the characteristics for which Scotchmen are famous the world over, and which make them desirable citizens of any community. When he crossed the ocean in 1866, he settled in Batavia, N. Y., where he remained five years, meantime following the occupation of florist and landscape gardener. Going from there to Titusville, Pa., he followed the same line of work and raised flowers for the markets from 1871 to 1883. During the latter year he came to California and settled in Newhall, Los Angeles county. During the three years he lived in that village he was employed as general secretary of the Hardison & Stewart Oil Company, continuing in that capacity until the company disbanded.

The year 1886 found Mr. Waldie in Santa Paula, with whose oil industry he has been associated since the first year he spent in California. As a stockholder and director, he was closely connected with the workings of the Union Oil Company of California and the United Petroleum Company, and, indeed, he is still active in the same. He held the office of secretary of the Sespe Oil Company at Santa Paula during the whole of its existence, until it was merged into the Union Oil Company. He was chosen treasurer of the new organization, in which he held stock as he had done in the former. In 1895 he was chosen manager of the Santa Paula Hardware Company, which had been incorporated five years before, and he has since given his time largely to the building up of a large trade for the company.

During his residence in Batavia, N. Y., Mr. Waldie married Miss Anna C. Myers, a native of Scotland. The two children born of their union, Archibald and Alice, both died in infancy. They have an adopted daughter, Lillie, who is now the wife of E. D. Bates, of Santa Barbara.

In the Santa Paula Board of Trade Mr. Waldie is a member of the executive committee. Fraternally he is connected with the local lodge of Independent Order of Foresters. The Presbyterian denomination holds his membership and receives his hearty support. For some time he officiated as Sunday-school superintendent and at this writing is honored with the office of president of the Ventura County Sunday-School Association, which office he has held for four years in succession. For some years he has served the congregation as an elder. To all movements for the promotion of temperance he lends his aid, being a member of the Anti-Saloon League and president of the local league connected with the Presbyterian Church. He casts his vote for the nominees of the Prohibition party, and by example and precept casts his influence on the side of temperance. Since coming to Santa Paula he has met with a success that is as gratifying as it is deserved. Through his industry and high principles of honor he has become known as one of the substantial men of the town, and is always ready to assist in movements for its moral, spiritual and educational up-building.

HON. M. A. LUCE. As postmaster of San Diego, to which office he was appointed by his former classmate, President McKinley, Judge Luce has maintained the high reputation established by previous service in other official positions. A resident of this city since 1873, there is probably no citizen who has a larger circle of acquaintances than he, these including not only the pioneers of San Diego, but the young business men of the present day. Two years after he settled in this city he was elected judge of the county court, and held the office until January, 1880, when under the new constitution the present courts were established. In the fall of 1880 he was chosen attorney for the Southern California Railroad, of which he was later elected vice president, continuing in both capacities until the road was built from San Diego to Barstow and into Los Angeles. After resigning in 1887, he spent some time in recuperation, and in 1889 became a member of the law firm of Luce, McDonald & Torrance, which became in 1898 the law firm of Luce & Sloane, the latter partnership continuing to the present. From early manhood he has been a warm admirer of Republican principles, and has never failed to uphold them by his ballot. In 1868 he was an alternate to the national convention that nominated U. S. Grant for president, and he has frequently attended similar gatherings in later days. At one time he was chairman of the county central committee, and he has also been connected with the state central committee, and many times delegate to state conventions. His appointment as postmaster in March, 1898, was therefore not only a tribute from the president to him as a former friend and classmate, but was a worthy recognition of his long advocacy of Republican doctrines and his prominence in the party in Southern California.

The genealogy of the Luce family is traced back to Normandy, whence they accompanied William the Conqueror to England. From that country they early came to America, settling in Massachusetts. Daniel Luce was born in Maine, his father having moved there from Martha's Vineyard. During the war of 1812 he went to the front with the American army. His son, Christopher, who was born near Farmington, Me., settled in Illinois in 1837 and became a pioneer Baptist preacher in Adams and other counties. In 1873 he settled at Poway, San Diego county, Cal., where he died in 1897, aged eighty-nine years. His wife, Sarah, was born at Meredith, N. H., and died in Illinois. She was a daughter of James Pottle, who was of English descent, as was also his wife, a Miss Hoyt. Christopher and Sarah Luce had three sons who attained mature years, viz.: George, who was an attorney in Monmouth, Ill., and died in 1861; William T., an attorney, who died in 1864; and M. A., of San Diego. The last-named was born in Payson, Ill., May 14, 1842, and was reared in Adams, Pike, Hancock and McDonough counties, Ill. In 1858 he went to Hillsdale College in Michigan.

At the opening of the Civil war Mr. Luce determined to enter the army, and as soon as possible volunteered his service. In May, 1862, he became a member of Company E, Fourth Michigan Infantry, which was mustered in at Adrian for three years. Among his first battles were the first engagement at Bull Run, Yorktown, Mechanicsville, Gaines Mill, White Oak Swamp, Malvern Hill, second battle of Bull Run, where, on account of sunstroke, he was obliged to remain in a hospital at Alexandria for a time. Re-joining his regiment, he was at Chancellorsville, Bristow, Rappahannock Station, Wilderness, Spottsylvania, Cold Harbor, Petersburg and minor skirmishes. At Spottsylvania he was made a sergeant. At the expiration of his time, in July, 1864, he was mustered out at Detroit. In 1890 one of his acts of bravery in the war received recognition from the secretary of war by the bestowal of the congressional medal of honor, given him for rescuing a comrade from Michigan, who was wounded and lay under the enemy's fire at Spottsylvania, after they had made the assault.

After his return to Hillsdale College, Mr. Luce earned the degree of A. B. in 1866 and later the degree of A. M. In 1866 he matriculated in Albany Law School, from which he graduated in 1867. Among his classmates there was William McKinley. After his admission to the New York bar he returned to Illinois and entered the law office of Judge Glenn in Monmouth. The next year he opened an office in Bushnell, near Monmouth, where he was city attorney for three terms. From there he came to San Diego in 1873. In addition to his other interests, he is now president of the Golden Hill Land & Improvement Company and president of the Shenandoah Mining Company. During his residence in Bushnell, Ill., he married Miss Adelaide Mantania, who was born in New York. They have three children living: Grace, now Mrs. Wallace Irwin, of San Francisco; Marie H.; and Edgar A., who is a student in Leland Stanford University.

In the Unitarian Church Judge Luce is president of the board of trustees. While General Miles was commander of the Medal of Honor Legion he appointed Judge Luce as judge-advocate of the same. His connection with the Civil war is borne in his memory through attendance at the meetings of Heintzelman Post No. 28, G. A. R., and he was honored by this post in his election as its first commander. Fraternally he is associated with the Knights of Pythias and the Masons, his connection with the latter being particularly important. While in Hillsdale he was made a Mason and is now a member of San Diego Lodge No. 35, F. & A. M., also belongs to the Chapter, Commandery and Lodge Perfection in this city, being a Mason of the thirty-second degree.

R. F. ROBERTSON. Thirty years of close association with the upbuilding and progress of a community gives a man prominence and influence among his neighbors; hence we find Mr. Robertson one of the best-known pioneers of that portion of Ventura county lying near the present site of Bardsdale. After having accumulated a competency through his wise management, he retired from active cares, and August 26, 1901, removed to Los Angeles, and purchased property on East Ninth street. Later he acquired by purchase a comfortable home at No. 814 Golden avenue, and here he now resides, surrounded by the comforts possible in this twentieth century. In moving from Ventura county he left a host of friends there, all of whom pronounced him to be a true friend, an excellent business man and an ideal neighbor, which are three of the best qualifications of an American citizen.

In Hancock county, Ill., Mr. Robertson was born November 17, 1835. He was reared there and in Missouri, and engaged in farming. In the spring of 1862 he crossed the plains with an emigrant train, landing at Honey Lake valley, Lawson county, Cal., where he began farm pursuits. A few years later he went to the mines of Idaho City and secured employment there. In the fall of 1870 he located on Sespe rancho, a portion of which he still owns and which is one of the pioneer grants of Ventura county. Believing the soil to be adapted to fruit-growing, he made some experiments in this direction, and as a result succeeded even beyond his expectations, thus encouraging others to take up the same industry. However, his attention was devoted principally to the raising of hogs and draft horses. For years he noticed evidences of oil on his land, and since 1890 the Union Oil Company has operated, by lease, fourteen oil wells, the oil being of twenty-eight gravity. The homestead consists of three hundred and twenty-five acres. Besides this property, he owns one hundred and sixty acres near by, in Ventura county, also considerable real estate in Los Angeles, and other property, all of which has been accumulated since he came west. He is a stockholder in the South Side Improvement Company, also a stockholder in the People's Lumber Company of Ventura county, and Yellow Bird Mining Company of Arizona, and for years was actively connected with the Pioneer Society of Ventura county. Politically he is a staunch Republican.

Weymouth Crowell

The marriage of Mr. Robertson, in 1874, united him with Mrs. Sarah (Edwards) Hawkins, who died in 1888. The children born of their union are named as follows: Ella, who is the wife of Walter Smith, a merchant in Los Angeles; Permelia; Esther; Owen, now attending the California State University at Berkeley; Thomas, a student in the Los Angeles high school; Emily, a student in the State Normal School at Los Angeles; and Nevla, who attends the high school of Los Angeles. Mr. Robertson has always been a believer in education. Perhaps because he had few educational advantages in boyhood, he has been especially solicitous that his children should receive the best training possible and he has prepared them for the responsibilities of life by giving them a good education.

WEYMOUTH CROWELL. As a contractor and builder Mr. Crowell is well known in Los Angeles, Pasadena, and Seattle, Wash. The occupation to which he is devoting himself does not represent the sum of his activities, nor does it properly gauge his claims for recognition. A man with a large fund of general information gained by travel in different parts of the country, he has assimilated much knowledge of men and events. Of Scotch ancestry, he is one of a family for many years associated with Yarmouth county, Nova Scotia, where he was born April 10, 1864. His father, Weymouth Crowell, Sr., was a native of the same county and spent the greater part of his life in coast fishing on Grand Banks, Newfoundland, but now makes his home on a farm at Glenwood. By his marriage to Elizabeth Gavel, who was born, reared and died in Yarmouth county, he had eleven children, four of whom are living in California, two in the east, while five are deceased. Two sons, Charles F. and William C. are residents of Pasadena.

Until his sixteenth year Weymouth Crowell lived on his father's farm at Glenwood and attended the public schools. In 1881 he went to Townsend Center, Mass., where he worked in a saw-mill, later learned the cooper's trade and afterward studied carpentering, which he followed in different parts of that state and Connecticut. The fall of 1884 found him, after a short stop in Chicago, coming across the continent to Los Angeles, where, failing to find work as a carpenter, he sought other employment. For six months he chopped stove wood at Sierra Madre and later worked at his trade there. Next he went to Pasadena, where he engaged in carpentering. In 1889 he went to Seattle, Wash., where he built the Minor School and many fine residences. Returning to Pasadena in 1894, he engaged in contracting there, and finally established himself in Los Angeles.

A notable experience in the life of Mr. Crowell was his sojourn in search of gold in the Klondike during 1897-98, at which time he and his brother, with two companions, went over the Chilcoot Pass, taking with them five tons of provisions, necessary tools and each a dog. The hardships they endured are scarcely conceivable to those who are unfamiliar with the conditions of the frozen north. By laying off over Sunday they were saved from perishing in a snow-slide, but their provisions were buried ten feet under the snow. For navigation down the Yukon river they built their own boats, sawing the lumber out of large trees by hand, and, going up the Stewart river, hitherto traversed by but few white men, met with disasters discouraging in the extreme. Their raft was smashed going over the rapids on the Mayo river and their packs were scattered broadcast over the water, which necessitated an enforced fast of two days. Arriving in Dawson, three out of the four worked on one of the first claims discovered on Bonanza creek, which they bought a lay on for $5,000. By the hardest of work, putting in eighteen out of every twenty-four hours at manual labor, and keeping at their post for eight months, they secured excellent returns, and returned to California with a fair opinion of the possibilities of a dreary region.

After a visit to his old home in Nova Scotia, Mr. Crowell again engaged in contracting and building in Pasadena, where he built the Dods-worth block, the finest in the city. In Los Angeles he built the Angelus hotel, the first seven-story structure erected there. In the summer of 1902 he built four additional stories to the Grant building, which makes it a seven-story structure. In the fall of 1901 he erected his own residence on the corner of Fifth street and Beaudry avenue, Los Angeles, which is a model of comfort. Fraternally he is connected with Pasadena Lodge No. 702, F. & A. M., in religion is of the Baptist faith, and in politics votes with the Republican party. By his marriage to Ethel May Ryder, a native of Nova Scotia, he has six children: Harold R., Ethel May, Willard W., Florence A., Andrew and Alice Edna.

J. P. KILER. Since establishing his home in Ventura county, in the spring of 1886, Mr. Kiler has been identified with the horticultural interests of this locality. During August following his arrival, he bought twenty-four and one-half acres near Ventura, and on this place he has since resided. His principal crop is apricots, of which he produces five tons per acre each year. To aid him in his work, he has equipped a drying plant, with a capacity for one hundred and fifty tons of green fruit, which, being larger than the amount produced by him, enables him to engage in the drying business for others. Everything about the property bespeaks the care and thrift of the owner, whose ambition it is to bring the land under the best possible cultivation and secure from it the largest crops of which the soil is capable. In addition to this ranch, he owns fifty-two and three-fourths acres near Colton, San Bernardino county, which he purchased in 1895.

In Greene county, Ohio, Mr. Kiler was born in 1843 and there he grew to manhood on a farm, learning the carpenter's trade when he was a boy. At the age of nineteen, in 1862, he enlisted in Company F, One Hundred and Tenth Ohio Infantry, and was assigned to the army of the Potomac, serving under Generals Meade, Sheridan and Grant. One of his first engagements was at Winchester, in the Shenandoah valley, after which he was at Mine Run, the Wilderness and Spottsylvania. In the battle of the Wilderness he was slightly wounded. At a later engagement under Grant, in 1864, at Cold Harbor, he suffered a great misfortune, his left eye being shot out, and afterward he was for a year confined in hospitals at Washington, Little York and Philadelphia, Pa. Upon receiving an honorable discharge from the army at the close of the war, he returned to Ohio.

The year 1867 found Mr. Kiler settling upon a farm in Cass county, Mo., and there he remained for nine years, engaging in farm pursuits. Next, returning to Ohio, he followed the carpenter's trade for three years. In 1878 he went to Johnson county, Neb., and embarked in the general mercantile business in Tecumseh, where he remained seven years, and from that town he came to California in 1886. All movements for the benefit of Ventura county receive his hearty support. He is a stockholder in the Saticoy Water Company, also in the Rothdale Co-operative Company at Ventura. The Prohibition party receives his staunch support and he is a subscriber to all of the well-known papers of his party. In the work of the Anti-Saloon League he has been especially active, but all temperance movements receive his earnest support as well. By his contributions to the Presbyterian Church of Ventura, with which he is connected, he helps to promote the cause of religion in his community. During August of 1898 he assisted in organizing the Ventura County Mutual Fire Insurance Company, of which he has acted as agent for two years. The excellent standing of this company is shown by the fact that he has written up $129,175 in policies from the 1st of January, 1901, to the 1st of January, 1902. The Farmers' Club of Ventura county has him among its members, and he takes a leading part in all of its activities.

In Ohio Mr. Kiler married Miss Letitia Baker, daughter of Nale and Hulda Baker, who were of Quaker ancestry. They have six children: Brinton C. B. and W. L., both of San Francisco; Mrs. May Dunning, of Ventura; Dale, of Indio, Cal.; William and Mary Alice, of Ventura.

W. D. ROBINSON. The career of Mr. Robinson represents the fulfilment of practical aspirations. His efforts have been founded on the pressing needs of the community and fortified by sound business principles and admirable common sense. While he is at present living in Santa Barbara, a large portion of his success is connected with the city of Detroit, Mich., which owes not a little of its prestige to his untiring work and keen foresight.

A native of Shrewsbury, England, Mr. Robinson came to America with his parents when eight years old, and settled in Rochester, N. Y., where his father was engaged in the coal trade. On graduating from the high school, at nineteen years of age he went to Boston, Mass., and became a traveling salesman for a large shoe manufacturing establishment. After building up a large business through Michigan, Indiana, Ohio and Illinois, he proposed to the house the opening of a branch wholesale establishment in Detroit, Mich., which suggestion seemed feasible, and resulted in the incorporation of the firm of Underwood, Cochrane & Co. Of this house Mr. Robinson became managing partner. Under his administration the business increased to the extent of covering the whole western country. At the end of three years H. S. Robinson, a brother of W. D., was taken into the company as partner, and the name was changed to W. D. Robinson, Burtenshaw & Co. The firm built a large shoe factory in Detroit and transacted a business aggregating three-quarters of a million dollars annually. Mr. Robinson continued at the head until his retirement in 1890, after which H. S. Robinson and Mr. Burtenshaw continued the business for several years.

During 1890 W. D. Robinson began to operate in real estate in Detroit, and from that time he vigorously worked to beautify the city. For his success in this work he deserves to be remembered as one of the city's benefactors. He created several subdivisions in the suburbs, and laid out one of the handsomest streets in Detroit, through the center of which was distributed in each block a park sixty feet wide, called Medbury park. This was presented to the city with the proviso that his original plans be in no way allowed to deteriorate and that the beautifying process be kept up indefinitely. He established the building line back twenty-five feet, and this left the unusually large dimensions of sixty feet for park, sixty feet for pavement on each side of the park, and eighty feet for sidewalks and lawns. With a fine appreciation of the originator's laudable project, the city has since taken commendable pride in carrying out his ideas, and the drives, walks and parks are surpassed by few cities. Mr. Robinson also laid out Robinson Terrace, two hundred and seven feet of which are on Second avenue, and one hundred feet on Henry street, the whole constituting the most beautiful three-story terrace in the city. Adjoining this he built his own brick residence, and next to that erected the Richelieu family hotel, an elegant structure three stories high. Numerous other buildings and improvements are attributable to him, especially those on Cass park, all of which he eventually disposed of to other parties. Mr. Robinson was one of the incorporators and directors of the Postal Telegraph Company, which netted him enormous returns. He was also an incorporator and director in the Lake Huron and Michigan Steam Navigation Company, which owned and operated a large fleet of freighters between Buffalo and Chicago. As a director, as well as one of the largest stockholders, he was interested in the Frontier iron works of Detroit, among the largest steam-engine builders on the lakes. He was also managing director of the Hydro-Carbon Furnace Company. Postmaster-General Don M. Dickinson was for years his associate partner in several large business enterprises.

Thos. Bell

Deciding upon an entire change of occupation and climate, in 1897 Mr. Robinson came to Santa Barbara and engaged in the oil business, his field of operation being Summerland. There he purchased the Wilson pumping plant and oil wells. The ownership and management of these wells is vested in the Robinson Oil Company, of which he is general manager. He is interested in oil in the Sunset district on the Kern river; also in the Southern Pacific Oil Company, of which he is managing director; and has besides a large interest in the Hickey-Robinson Drilling Company at Summerland, of which he is finance manager. Broadening his scope of activity still further, he appreciates the prospects for oil in Texas, where he owns valuable oil lands. He is an incorporator and director of El Beaumont Consolidated Oil Company, at Beaumont, Tex., also an incorporator and president of the Guarantee Oil and Refining Company of Spindle Top, Tex. He is a member of the Santa Barbara Chamber of Commerce. While in Detroit he assisted in organizing the Board of Trade. Politically he is a Republican, and fraternally is associated with the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, being a charter member of the Santa Barbara Lodge.

In Rochester, N. Y., Mr. Robinson married Abigail Dyer, who was born in that city, and by whom he has two sons, Charles W. and Edwin S. The former, who is engaged in the oil business, is a director in the North Star Oil Company, an incorporator and director of the Guarantee Oil and Refining Company, and superintendent of the Robinson Oil Company's plant in Summerland. Edwin S. is treasurer of the Southern Pacific Oil Company, treasurer of the Hickey-Robinson Oil Well Drilling Company, treasurer of the Robinson Oil Company, an incorporator of El Beaumont Consolidated Oil Company and an incorporator and director of the Guarantee Oil and Refining Company.

THOMAS BELL. The ranch of one hundred acres, owned and managed by Mr. Bell, is a worthy addition to the many splendid and prolific properties in the Ventura valley. Located two miles northeast of Oxnard, it has been fitted with all modern devices and improvements, fine house, barn, fences, hedges, windmill and pumping plant, for the irrigating of ten acres of lemons. There are also raised many other kinds of fruit for home consumption, as well as general farm produce.

A native of Richland county, Ohio, Mr. Bell was born October 2, 1849, a son of William and Polly (Turbett) Bell, natives of Pennsylvania, and of German descent. He grew to manhood in his native state and county, and was reared to be a practical farmer and good manager. His education was acquired in the public schools, and later in life he added to his original fund of information by wide reading and general observation. With wise discernment for the future he came to Southern California June 5, 1871, and settled in Ventura county, where he worked for Jake K. Gries, in whose employ he continued for seventeen years. Naturally, the faithfulness to trust, indicated by this long retention in one service, would bring its reward, and in 1875 he had accumulated sufficient capital from his savings to purchase one hundred acres of land. So rapid has been his success that he also now owns four hundred and twenty acres in partnership with Mr. Gries, near Springville Postoffice, which is rented out to other parties and is on a paying basis.

Much of his success Mr. Bell attributes to the companionship and sympathetic assistance of his wife, who was formerly Frances H. Rice, of Sutter county, Cal., and whom he married in June, 1887. Mrs. Bell is a daughter of Samuel and Rebecca Rice, the former of whom was an early settler in California. Mr. Bell is a Republican in politics, and has held several positions of trust, among them being the office of supervisor, to which his district elected him in 1892. He is one of the well-known and honored agriculturists of his neighborhood, and his rise in the world is the result of his own ability and determination to succeed. He is one of the prominent members of the Pioneer Society, which was founded in 1873.

W. B. METCALF, treasurer of Santa Barbara county since 1892, was born in Hydesville, Humboldt county, Cal., September 3, 1862. Of English descent, he comes of a family first represented in America by the paternal grandfather, who settled in Massachusetts, where he was engaged in the woolen business. His son, O. D., the father of W. B. Metcalf, was born in Anson, Somerset county, Me., and was a merchant in that state until his removal to California, via Panama, in 1862. The mercantile business was resumed in Hydesville, Humboldt county, Cal., until 1868, when he came to Santa Barbara county and engaged in the sheep business on an extensive scale. His ranch, called Guadaluca, consisted of twenty thousand acres, and the sheep industry flourished thereon until 1877, when a severe drought and the consequent loss resulted in the sale of the property and a resumption of mercantile pursuits. At present retired from active business, Mr. Metcalf is living in Santa Barbara. His wife, formerly Sarah W. Dinsmore, was born in Somerset county, Me. Her father, B. T. Dinsmore, was a lumberman in the east and crossed the plains in the late '50s, settling at Hydesville, where he was interested in stock-raising, farming and mercantile enterprises. In 1868 he changed his field of activity to Santa Barbara county, where he owned a ranch called San Ysidoro, upon which in 1871 he set out the first orange grove of the vicinity, and was successful as an horticulturist and stock-raiser. His useful and industrious life terminated in 1881. He was the father of six children, of whom four sons and one daughter are living.

The education of W. B. Metcalf was acquired in the public schools of Santa Barbara county, and in 1880 he came to the city and entered the employ of the First National Bank. At the end of three years he assisted his father in his mercantile business, and in 1886 became one of the organizers, and the cashier, of the Santa Barbara Savings Bank. Upon the reorganization of the bank a year later as the Commercial Bank, Mr. Metcalf continued to be the cashier, and has held the position ever since. In 1891 the same officers incorporated the Santa Barbara Savings & Loan Bank, Mr. Metcalf necessarily filling a similar position with the new concern.

As a staunch and uncompromising Republican Mr. Metcalf has ever taken a keen interest in the undertakings of his party, and has been prominently before the public since 1892, when he was nominated county treasurer and elected by a large plurality over two candidates. Assuming the duties of his office in January of 1893, he was re-elected county treasurer in 1894, by an increased majority, over the fusion ticket which represented three candidates. In 1898 he was further honored by his fellow townsmen by being re-elected without opposition, his term of office to continue until January of 1903. He is a member of the Chamber of Commerce. Fraternally Mr. Metcalf is associated with Masonic Lodge No. 192, and with the Royal Arch Masons, in which he is past high priest, and with St. Omar Commandery No. 30, K. T., of which he is senior warden. He is especially active in Santa Barbara Parlor No. 116, Native Sons of the Golden West. At the convention of the Native Sons at Santa Barbara in 1901, Mr. Metcalf was chairman of the local executive committee that arranged for the entertainment of the convention guests, and worked for a year previously to raise the $4,000 used in carrying out their plans.

The marriage of Mr. Metcalf and Frances Chamberlain occurred in Cincinnati, Ohio, Mrs. Metcalf being a native of Jacksonville, Ill., and a graduate of the Illinois Female College by which institution she received the degree of A. B. To Mr. and Mrs. Metcalf has been born one child, Stanley.

JARRETT T. RICHARDS. The history of the Richards family in America dates back to the latter part of the eighteenth century, when Rev. Lewis Richards was sent to Virginia as a missionary by Lady Huntingdon. There he married a Miss Custis, a member of the family to which belonged the first husband of Martha Washington. Their son, John Custis Richards, a native of Maryland, engaged in the wholesale mercantile business in Baltimore, but died in Chambersburg, Pa. Next in line of descent was John Custis Richards, Jr., M. D., one of the most influential physicians of his day and locality. Born in Baltimore, June 1, 1812, he was thirteen when he became a pupil in Bel Air Academy. In 1830 he matriculated as a sophomore in Yale College, where he continued his studies until the close of the junior year, but was then called home by the extreme illness of his mother and brother, who shortly afterward died, leaving him the only survivor of a large family. Turning his attention to the study of medicine under Dr. Samuel Baker, professor of anatomy in the University of Maryland, he afterward entered the University, from which he received the degree of M. D. in 1834. The early years of his professional life were passed in Baltimore, where he not only had a private practice, but also engaged in hospital work and was dispensary physician for a time. The confinement of city life proving too exhausting, in June, 1837, he removed to Chambersburg, Pa., where he soon built up a large practice and became a prominent citizen. His character was typical of the gentleman of the old school. Possessing the highest principles of honor, he was incapable of a mean act or an unkind deed. His devotion to Christianity was shown not alone by his membership in Falling Springs Presbyterian Church, but also by every act of a noble life. During the Civil war he acted as surgeon in charge of the hospital at Chambersburg, and in 1863 was appointed on the staff of the surgeon-general, as one of the volunteer aid corps of surgeons of Pennsylvania. July 3, 1864, when Chambersburg was burned, he and other prominent citizens were captured and held for ransom, while threats were made to burn the city if a certain sum was not paid. The price being refused, the city was burned, the prisoners turned loose, and he hurried to his home, vainly hoping he might be in time to save something, but the effort was futile, and indeed he barely had time to escape from the burning city. Later he returned and assisted other citizens in the rebuilding of the town. He was an organizer of the Franklin County Medical Society, of which he was long a valued member. His death occurred June 11, 1874. We are indebted to the Records of the Pennsylvania Medical Society for the above sketch of the life and ancestry of Dr. John Custis Richards.

In Chambersburg, Pa., where he was born November 1, 1843, Jarrett T. Richards received his primary education. Exceptional advantages were his, for he was privileged to study on the continent from 1861 to 1863. On his return he entered Columbia College, from which he was graduated in 1866, with the degree of LL. B., receiving at the same time the second prize in municipal law. During the same year he began to practice in New York in the office of Brown, Hall & Vanderpool, after which he spent sixteen months in Erie, Pa., and in 1868 came to California, arriving in Santa Barbara November 3. From that time to this he has engaged in professional work and is now the oldest practitioner in the city. Meantime he has been active in local affairs, and in 1875 served as mayor, while at another time he was city attorney. In 1879 he was one of the Republican candidates for justice of the supreme court, but the fusion between the Democrats and the Workingmen's party, caused the defeat of the whole Republican ticket, with one exception. As a citizen, he was pronounced in his opposition to railroad subsidy, which he helped to defeat, saving the county from bonds and debt. As an attorney, he has been prominent in the litigation in this and Ventura counties during all the years of his residence in California. He is connected with the Santa Barbara Chamber of Commerce, is connected with the State Bar Association and for some time served on the state central committee of the Republican party.

R. H. PINNEY. The executive and business ability of Mr. Pinney has contributed in no small degree to the upbuilding of many important enterprises represented in Pasadena. Preceded by a many-sided career in different parts of the middle west, he came to California in 1885, and has here availed himself of opportunities which have not only netted him large personal returns, but have placed many others in comfortable circumstances. Possessing the gifts of insight and enthusiasm himself, he has also the faculty of transmitting his plans to others, and thus enlisting their sympathy and co-operation.

A native of Woodhull, Steuben county, N. Y., Mr. Pinney was born November 10, 1847, a son of William H. and Sarah (Henck) Pinney, natives respectively of New York and Pennsylvania. The paternal grandfather, Ovid, was a man of force and determination, and accomplished much during the course of his well-directed life. He was born in New York, and for many years was a broker in Albany and Buffalo, which cities owe much of their subsequent prosperity to his efforts in the early days. He laid out many of the important parts of Albany, and otherwise contributed towards its substantial growth. Upon his removal to Minneapolis, Minn., he became identified with the pioneer real estate interests of that city, where his death occurred. His son, William H. Pinney, was for many years a farmer in New York state, removing at a later period to Redbank, N. J., and still later to New Brunswick, N. J. In the latter city he represented the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York, and still later represented the same company in Cincinnati, Ohio. He was very successful in the Buckeye state, but finally disposed of his business there and removed to Fort Scott, Kans., where he engaged in the banking business. About 1894 he came to Pasadena, where he lived in retirement until his death in 1898. He was a man of firm convictions, a staunch Abolitionist, a Republican, and a devoted member of the Universalist Church. Of the seven children in his family who are still living Mrs. V. E. Farmer and Lou M. are residents of Los Angeles; George H. is a broker and real estate dealer of Los Angeles; H. J. lives in Pasadena; and Chas. W. is engaged in the banking business at Caldwell, Idaho.

Until his tenth year R. H. Pinney lived in New York, and then accompanied the rest of his father's family to New Jersey. He was educated in the public and private schools of New York and New Jersey. In 1865 he removed to Cincinnati, Ohio, and soon after spent a year on a farm near Berlin, Sangamon county, Ill. He was afterward assistant postmaster of Berlin, and in time postmaster, and at the expiration of his term of service associated himself with the firm of Hayden & Ransom, a large mercantile firm at Jacksonville. After three years he removed to Lincoln, Neb., and engaged in clerking, and was for a time steward of the "old Atwood House," and later the new Hotel Steward of that city. In the fall of 1872 he built the first building in Fairmont, Fillmore county, Neb., fifty miles west of Lincoln, and started the first store in the place. The embryo hamlet was called Hesperia, but with the advent of the railroad the name was changed to the more practical one of Fairmont. Mr. Pinney became the first postmaster of the town, holding the office for many years, and in time becoming one of its most prominent and influential citizens. He owned a large stock farm and started an implement business in connection with his general merchandise store. He secured a large mail contract from the government, between Columbus, Neb., and Belleville, Kans. He also engaged in the brokerage business, and was justice of the peace for many years.

During this time Mr. Pinney represented the Equitable Loan and Trust Company of Omaha, Neb.; Newark, N. J., and Boston, Mass., placing for them many hundreds of thousands of dollars, taking as security the beautiful farms in Fillmore and York counties, at such reasonable rates of interest as to enable him to establish a very remunerative business. But on account of ill health of his family he was forced to a more sunny climate. In the spring of 1885 he located in Los Angeles. Two years later he disposed of his business in Fillmore county and later he sold his farm upon which he had been raising fine stock, and upon settling in Pasadena engaged in the real estate business. This venture proved a costly experiment and he withdrew, the loser by $40,000. The following year, in 1888, he started a feed and fuel business, in which he made a success. This was disposed of in 1899, that he might devote all of his time to the Mutual Building and Loan Association, in which he was a director, and of which he was appointed secretary. This association has done a great deal for Pasadena, and by reason of its practical methods has made it possible for many to own homes who would otherwise be unable to purchase them. Mr. Pinney is also a member of the firm of Pinney & Nash, dealers in real estate, insurance and loans, through whose hands have passed some of the most important deals in the history of the city.

The mining and oil resources of California have been recognized by Mr. Pinney to no small extent, and in the former capacity he is interested in the Imperial Mining, Milling and Smelting Company, at Imperial. In 1901 he organized the Revenue Oil Company, bought forty acres of land near Bakersfield, Cal., and incorporated the company. This property has proved a profitable investment, and the six wells sunk produce about ten thousand barrels per month, which has enabled the company to pay dividends. Mr. Pinney is secretary of this company. He fills a similar position with the Amazon Oil Company, operating upon forty acres of land in the Kern river district, where also there are six pumping wells. He organized and is secretary of the Hickler Oil Company, owning two hundred and seventy acres of oil land near Piru, Ventura county, adjoining a producing property. He is a member of the Pasadena Board of Trade and of the Merchants' Protective Association.

In Lincoln, Neb., Mr. Pinney married Rose T. Ballard, who died in Pasadena, leaving three children: William H., who was a student in the public schools of Pasadena and of the University of Southern California, and is now advertisement writer for Hale Brothers, of San Francisco; Frank V., who was educated at Throop Institute and Los Angeles Business College, and is vice-president of the Arizona Newspaper Publishing Company, with headquarters at Bisbee; and Zola L., now the wife of Harry J. Royal, of Los Angeles, Cal. The second marriage of Mr. Pinney occurred in Pasadena, and was with Katharine L. Tower, a native of Massachusetts. Mr. Pinney is associated with the Royal Arcanum, the Knights of the Maccabees, and the Fraternal Brotherhood. Since his boyhood days in Illinois he has been an active worker in the Methodist Episcopal Church, and in Fairmont, Neb., he helped to organize the Methodist Episcopal Church of that town. In Pasadena he is connected, as steward, treasurer and secretary of the executive committee, with the First Methodist Episcopal Church, and was a member of the building committee when the magnificent new edifice was erected. In politics he was a Republican, but since 1887 has been allied with the Prohibition party. He is a staunch advocate of temperance, not only as the term is applied to intoxicants, but in the general affairs of life.

IRA O. SMITH. During the last eighteen years of his life the city of Los Angeles claimed the citizenship of Ira O. Smith, who for a time came and went in the busy marts of trade, later retiring to a merited rest from former activity. A stately personality, carrying under a reserved demeanor a splendid business capacity and unimpeachable integrity, he had a nature which drew its chief inspiration from the appreciation and good-will of intimate friends, and from the love of those gathered around his own fireside.

W. A. Conway

The keynote to his character was his love of home, and his business success was bounded on all sides by the strictest honor. His death, May 8, 1901, removed one of those who constitute an undercurrent in the community of never-varying strength.

Like so many who find in the City of the Angels a pleasant place in which to spend their mature years, Mr. Smith came here crowned with a reputation as one of the most successful and progressive pioneers of another part of the country, his efforts having been directed to the upbuilding of Michigan. A native of Victor, Monroe county, N. Y., he was born in January of 1827, and when eleven years of age removed with his parents to Flint, Mich. His father was one of the founders of Rochester, N. Y., and a promoter of the Erie canal. In a state renowned for its lumbering opportunities, his son naturally became interested in this line of occupation, and at the age of twenty went to Grand Haven, Mich., where he was thus engaged for five years. In the midst of an almost impenetrable forest he purchased the well-known Black Lake mill, and bent his energies to not only operating the same, but to clearing the surrounding country, making roads, and transforming the wilderness into a business center. It is not surprising that his reward was equal to his labor, and that in 1862, after disposing of his milling interests, he had to show for his pains a considerable fortune. After removing to Muskegon, Mich., his pronounced business insight found vent in connection with the Muskegon Booming Company, the largest lumber organization in the state, of which he eventually became president. As proof of his good management it is only necessary to state that the stockholders received an annual dividend of twenty per cent. While amassing a large fortune in Muskegon, he held numerous official positions in the city, and was successively elected county clerk, registrar, supervisor and alderman, filling these offices of trust with singular regard for the best interests of the community. After removing to Ashland, and engaging in the manufacture of lumber with a former partner from Michigan, the goddess of fortune still continued to direct his undertakings, and to retain him as one of the favored sons of toil.

Upon removing to Los Angeles Mr. Smith decided to retire from business activities, although after a time he became a director in the Citizens' Bank, and in this capacity was associated with leading business men of the town. Two months before his death, owing to long continued rheumatism, he retired from the bank association, and was thereafter confined to his home. During his life here his favorite recreation was duck hunting, at which he was an expert. He was a member of the Masonic fraternity and a Knight Templar. Mr. Smith was twice married, and is survived by his wife, who was formerly Mrs.

Sarah (Barry) McDaniel. He was the father of Mrs. Minnie L. Gardener, deceased, formerly the wife of Judge William Paul Gardener, since deceased, leaving three children: Minnie L., Ira O. and Paul Gardener, residents of Los Angeles, at No. 636 West Adams street.

JOSHUA A. CONAWAY. Like so many of the pioneers who sought the golden possibilities of the far west, Mr. Conaway came hither in the long and tedious way that fell to the lot of the greater portion of the emigrants of those days. Leaving his Missouri home in 1853, he crossed the plains via the overland route with ox teams, and suffered many deprivations and dangers. Upon locating in Amador county, on the Mokelumne river, he engaged in the occupations of farming and stock-raising, to which in youth he had become accustomed. For nearly seventeen years he lived on different ranches. From Amador he removed to San Joaquin county and secured the title to government land, which he improved and planted in various fruits and a vineyard. Surrounded by the comforts obtained by his industry, he remained there for twelve years. Eventually coming to Ventura county, he homesteaded a claim. Very unjustly he was obliged to pay the Southern Pacific Railroad Company for the land. However, he had the privilege of retaliating, for when the company desired the right of way through his property he made them pay twice as much for the land as his neighbors received for theirs, and in this way he received his money back.

From time to time Mr. Conaway added to his possessions by the purchase of more land, until he now has six hundred and twenty acres. At first he raised sheep and other kinds of stock, as well as wheat and barley. Of later years he has handled cattle, horses and hogs, and engaged extensively in general farming and fruit raising. He erected a convenient and comfortable home, put up a substantial barn and instituted modern and labor-saving improvements. This varied line of business was carried on until 1894, when he formed a stock company, composed of the members of his family, called the Conaway Company, Incorporated, of which he was president and general manager. This novel idea has been the subject of much favorable comment on the part of Mr. Conaway's neighbors and friends, who recognize the many-sided advantages it is possible to develop therefrom. The farm is a monument to the patience, skill and good management of the owner, every tree and shrub having been planted by himself, while every advance made has been of the most substantial kind.

The early life of Mr. Conaway was spent in Monongalia county, W. Va., where he was born April 4, 1830. From there he accompanied his parents to Monroe county, Ohio, and later to Tyler county, W. Va. Of Irish descent, his paternal great-grandfather came to America before the Revolution, and for many years the descendants lived in West Virginia. Eli, father of Joshua A. Conaway, was born in Virginia, east of the Blue Ridge mountains, and his wife, Mary (Baker) Conaway, was born, of Welsh descent, in the same locality. Of their nine children Joshua A. was the sixth. He received his education in public schools, and when twenty years of age removed to Iowa, where he farmed in Linn county. Next he tried his luck in the Wisconsin pineries. At the end of two years he settled in Ashley, Pike county, Mo., where he was overseer on a plantation, and later ran an engine in a lumber establishment.

In 1859 Mr. Conaway married Miss Elizabeth J. Blamey, who was born in England, and died in Ventura county January 25, 1894. Ten children were born of their union, eight of whom are now living. The eldest, Mary, is the widow of H. S. Adney and publishes the Antelope Valley Gazette, which was founded by her husband. Alice and Ethan W. are deceased. The others are named as follows: Austin, of Los Angeles; Charles W., of Santa Monica; Jennie B., wife of Charles Gilday; Albion N. T.; Lulu V. and Lelia V. (twins), the former the wife of F. W. Kent and the latter Mrs. J. R. Black; and Benton Conaway.

Since coming to Ventura county Mr. Conaway has been prominent in the affairs of his adopted locality, and in politics especially has taken an active part in undertakings of the Democratic party. In this capacity he has been a director in the Cienega school district. As one of the supervisors, elected in February of 1873, he took an active part in the organization of Ventura county, also systematized the board that built the courthouse and jail, and was otherwise instrumental in securing important improvements in the building up of the county. In 1880 he was elected county assessor, in which position he has served for seven years. His influence upon the moral tone of his neighborhood has been pronounced, and as steward and trustee of the Methodist Episcopal Church, he has been foremost in many good works. His well-known views on the temperance question have been fearlessly maintained, and it is a generally recognized fact that his life and deeds bear out in their entirety his expressed convictions.

CHARLES E. SHERMAN. In November of 1869 Charles E. Sherman, ex-farmer, dairyman, miner, stage driver, and general business man, arrived in Santa Barbara with seventy-five cents in his pocket, and no experience in the business which was to be his occupation. He located on the corner which he has since purchased and rented a small building, and for three months bought meat of his brother-in-law, after which he began to buy his own cattle and do his own slaughtering. In 1870 himself and Mr. Eland built a slaughter house, and in 1872 formed the partnership which has lasted ever since. From the start they had two markets, and have since had three and four retail markets, besides carrying on a large wholesale trade. Adjoining the city they have a ranch of three hundred and sixty acres. They own a steam sausage plant and steam rendering works, and make about the finest bacon in the state. While the railroad was being built they ran a slaughter house at Gaviota and supplied the railroad gangs with meat, running four-horse teams to supply the demand. The contract was a very heavy one, and the trip between Gaviota and Point Concepcion a trying one, but the firm filled their contract to the letter and were said to furnish the finest meat ever eaten by the men. The firm also deal in shipping cattle and sheep to Los Angeles, and have bought the original corner where they first started business.

Back to Revolutionary days the Shermans trace their descent, the original home of their forefathers having been in England. Charles E. Sherman was born in Bellevue, Jackson county, Iowa, in 1843, a son of George Sherman, who was born in Addison county, Vt., and came to Iowa in 1840 with the paternal grandfather Sherman. He had previously married Eliza Morgan, of Vermont, who died in Iowa in 1854. As one of the early pioneers of Bellevue Mr. Sherman took an active interest in the development of the town, and for many years ran the ferry across the Mississippi river. He subsequently turned his attention to farming nine miles from the town, and there occurred his death in 1854. There were three children in the family, of whom Caleb came to California in 1850. He engaged in mining and other occupations for several years in different parts of the state, eventually settling in Santa Maria, where he was one of the brightest lights in the profession of law. He became assistant state's attorney, and was also a notary public. He died in the city of his adoption in 1900, his busy and useful and brilliant life being sadly missed from the favorite haunts that had known him so many years. Adelia, the daughter of the family, married Mr. Turner, and died in Stony Point, Cal.

At the age of eleven years Charles E. Sherman was left an orphan. He began to work on a farm, and in return for chores and general services received his board and clothes and the privilege of occasionally attending the public schools. This was continued for six years, and in 1859 he decided to go west to Pike's Peak, but changed his mind in favor of California and started the day after. The journey was undertaken via Panama, and in New York he boarded an ocean craft the character of which may be determined from its name, "Rolling Moses." Arriving in San Francisco he went to Petaluma, where lived his brother, and then went to school for one winter in Bloomfield. He left Iowa with $100, but was obliged to borrow $200 more to get here, and this amount he borrowed of his uncle, Charles Morgan, at Bloomfield, and sent it back to the man who had befriended him. In return he worked for his uncle. He engaged in threshing and teaming at Redwood for two years, and then went into partnership with his brother at Bodego Corners, Sonoma county. They ran a hotel which was sold out in 1863, when they went to Nevada, intending to engage in the livery business at Austin. However, the best-laid plans are subject to change, and the light rigs which they took with them for future business were on the way traded for mules, and the mules eventually traded for twenty-five milch cows. Of course there was nothing to do but go into the dairy business with the cows, and for this purpose they took up a ranch and meadow, and did a flourishing business near Austin and Jacobsville, Nev. For a gallon of milk they received from $1.50 to $2.50. For further gains they cut about seventy-five tons of hay which sold for from $100 to $150 per ton. The next year the price of milk went down to fifty cents a gallon and they no longer deemed it expedient to continue in the dairy business. After disposing of their interests, Mr. Sherman entered into partnership with some men in the livery and feed business, but owing to the business laxity of his partners the common fund soon disappeared, and in 1865 he left with a span of horses and a wagon and returned to Bloomfield, Sonoma county. He drove a stage for Lou Miller from Petaluma to Duncan's Mills, and in 1866 returned to Iowa, via Nicaragua, and engaged in the livery business at Bellevue for two years. There he married Cecilia Savitz, who was born in Pennsylvania, and died in Santa Barbara in October of 1899. In 1868 he brought his wife to California, via Panama, and drove the stage again between Petaluma and Duncan's Mills until coming to Santa Barbara in 1869.

Politically Mr. Sherman has been prominent in Santa Barbara, and for many years was a member of the Democratic county committee. In 1879 he was elected sheriff of Santa Barbara county, and assumed control of the office in January of 1880, serving for two years and ten months. For one term he served in the city council from the fourth ward. Fraternally he is associated with the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, and the Ancient Order of United Workmen. He is a member of the Chamber of Commerce. Mr. Sherman has one son, George C., who is proprietor of the California market in Santa Barbara.

J. BERT SAXBY, D. D. S. One of the most popular and successful dentists in Southern California is J. Bert Saxby, a resident of Santa Barbara since 1896. A typical westerner in enterprise, character and training, he was born in Ventura, December 29, 1870, and is a member of a family long identified with New York state, and of English extraction. The paternal grandfather was born in New York, as was also I. T. Saxby, the father of J. Bert. The elder Saxby was for many years prominent in commercial circles of New York City, and in 1852 migrated to California via Panama, settling in Nevada City, where he engaged in mining. From 1862 until 1868 he lived in San Francisco, and in the fall of 1868 removed to Ventura, which was henceforth the scene of his most ambitious efforts. Heart and soul he became interested in the up-building of the city, and many of the largest of the early enterprises here represented were directly due to his executive and financial ability. At first engaged in the stock business, he later devoted himself to commercial matters, and organized the first lumber business of the town, known as Saxby, Walton & Co., later as the Saxby & Collins Company. Mr. Saxby was also a director in the Bank of Ventura, and up to the time of his death, in 1885, at the age of fifty-eight years, was active in the management of his affairs as a business man and enterprising citizen. He is remembered as one of the staunch supporters of the town of his adoption, and his character and attainments fully justified the esteem and confidence in which he was held.

The mother of Dr. Saxby was formerly Frances Johnson, who was born in Genesee county, N. Y., a daughter of J. B. Johnson, a native of the same county. J. B. Johnson was an attorney in New York and transferred his legal practice to Nevada City, Cal., in 1850, starting across the plains with ox-teams in 1849, the journey consuming eight months. He subsequently re-crossed the plains twice, his family joining him in 1856. He became a judge and district attorney at Nevada City, and attained to renown as a capable exponent of law, some of his most prominent cases being large mining litigations. His professional career continued until the time of his death in 1890; his wife died at Nevada City in 1894. There were seven children in this family. Mrs. Frances (Johnson) Saxby was the mother of two children, of whom Frank G. is a resident of Ventura.

Dr. Saxby attended the public schools of Ventura and was graduated from the high school at Oakland, Cal., this instruction being supplemented by a course at Heald's Business College in San Francisco, from which he was graduated in 1890. He then returned to Ventura, and having decided to devote his life to the profession of dentistry, entered the office of Staire Brothers for preliminary instruction. In 1893 he entered the Baltimore Dental College (the oldest dental college in the country), and was graduated in 1896, with the degree of Doctor of Dental Surgery. His subsequent location in Santa Barbara he has since had no cause to regret. He is a member of the Southern California Dental Association, is variously interested in the fraternal, social and professional interests of the town, and is an honored and popular acquisition to the general affairs of Santa Barbara. Fraternally he is a Native Son of the Golden West, and is associated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, having been originally a member of the Franklin Lodge No. 2, of Baltimore, Md., of which he is past grand master. Politically he is a Republican, and in religion a member of the Congregational Church.

In Nevada City, Cal., occurred the marriage of Dr. Saxby and Miss Hattie Hook, who was born in Nevada City, and is a daughter of John Hook, a merchant of Nevada City, who is still living and came from Wheeling, W. Va., in 1851. To Dr. and Mrs. Saxby have been born three children: Bernice Twilley, J. Bert, Jr., and Donald Thorndyke Saxby.

HON. C. A. STORKE. The first representative of the Storke family in America came from Holland in 1660 and settled on the Connecticut river. During the colonial period they mostly engaged in seafaring pursuits. From Connecticut John Storke moved to Chemung county, N. Y., but later went to Yates county, the same state, where he was a pioneer farmer. His son, Orson, a native of Chemung, N. Y., moved to Oshkosh, Wis., in 1849, and there engaged in farming until his death, in 1855. He had married Electa Tompkins, who was born in Clyde, N. Y., and whose father, Calvin Dean Tompkins, was a builder in that town. The record of the Tompkins family is traced back to the time of George II in England. On coming to America they were given a grant of land embracing all of Staten Island, and for several generations this property descended, by entail, to the oldest son. During the time of the Revolution the then owner advocated Tory principles, for which his estate was confiscated and forever lost to the family. However, the younger sons removed to New Jersey, remained there permanently, and one of that branch, Dr. Jacob Tompkins was a surgeon in the colonial army during the Revolution. During the winter at Valley Forge he died from the exposures and hardships of that memorable time. His son married a Miss Dean, whose father, Daniel Dean, a native of Holland and a Baptist minister, came to America prior to the Revolution, and served in that war as a private, receiving a wound at Yorktown from which he died. Mrs. Electa (Tompkins) Storke makes her home with her son, C. A., in Santa Barbara, and is now seventy-nine years of age. Besides this son she has one other, Eugene, who was graduated from the Chicago Homeopathic Medical College, and is now practicing in Minneapolis, Minn.

In Penn Yan, N. Y., C. A. Storke was born November 19, 1847. His earliest recollections cluster around Oshkosh, where he attended the public schools. At eight years of age he began to set type in a newspaper office conducted by his uncle, W. C. Tompkins, with whom he remained some years. When only fifteen he was made foreman of the Appleton Motor. A year later he enlisted, in February, 1864, in Company G, Thirty-sixth Wisconsin Infantry, and was mustered in at Madison, Wis. Assigned to the Second Corps, army of the Potomac, he arrived at the front in time to take part in the battle of Spottsylvania. Later he was at North Anna and Totopotomy. June 1, 1864, at Cold Harbor, four companies of his regiment, numbering two hundred and forty, entered the battle, and one hundred and sixty-nine were left wounded on the field. He and eleven others of his company were captured and sent to Libby prison, thence to Andersonville, where he remained until September 30, 1864. Next he was transferred to Savannah, then to Milan, Ga., afterward to Blackshear, that state, and finally to Florence, S. C., where he was paroled in December, 1864. During his imprisonment his weight had been reduced to ninety-five pounds and eight of the twelve comrades had succumbed to their sufferings. On his return to the Union lines, he remained in the parole camp at Annapolis and in St. Louis until the close of the war, and was mustered out at Madison, Wis., May 26, 1865.

Returning home, Mr. Storke entered Kalamazoo College. He matriculated in Cornell University at its opening in 1868, and was graduated in 1870, with the degree of A. B. After teaching in Adelphi Academy, Brooklyn, N. Y., in 1872 he came to Santa Barbara as professor of mathematics in Santa Barbara College. The following year he resigned and went to Los Angeles, where he founded and for six months conducted the Los Angeles Herald. On selling it, he began the study of law under Charles E. Huse, and was admitted to the bar in 1875, since which time he has practiced law in Santa Barbara. Meantime his activities in the Democratic party have made him prominent. At this writing he is chairman of the county Democratic central committee, and formerly he served on the state central committee. In the fall of 1882 he was elected a member of the assembly. Two years later he was a candidate for the state senate and carried his county, but was defeated by Republican majorities in other portions of the district. In 1888 he was again elected to the legislature, where he rendered valuable service in the interests of the people. In 1898 he was appointed district attorney for the balance of the term. In December, 1899, he was elected mayor on an independent ticket, and took the oath of office January 1, 1900, to serve for two years. During his administration among the most important improvements have been the completion of the city water system and the building of the new high school. It was his privilege, as mayor, to welcome President McKinley to Santa Barbara, and the entire community aided him in making this occasion one never to be forgotten.

L. A. Maulhardt.

Since coming to Santa Barbara, Mr. Storke has been made a Mason, and is now connected with the chapter and commandery here. Several times he has been commander of the Starr King Post No. 52, G. A. R., and frequently he has served on the staff of the department commander. He is a member of the Chamber of Commerce. In his family there are three children: Thomas More, Mattie M. and Alice. The son is a graduate of the Leland Stanford University and is now proprietor of the Santa Barbara Independent.

ALBERT F. MAULHARDT is one of the leading citizens in his county, known and esteemed for his fine qualities and achievements, chief among the latter being his successes not only in experimental agriculture and invention of machinery, but also in the introduction and promotion of commercial enterprises, which in some instances not only doubled the value of local real estate, but in one case in particular the taxed values of the entire county increased two-fold within a year as the indirect result of his efforts for the public welfare. While other prominent men lent their aid in securing the magnificent sugar factory at Oxnard (second largest in the world), Mr. Maulhardt is credited with the lion's share of the work; every local newspaper and all important newspapers in Southern California making extended reference to his untiring efforts in this direction, and it is unanimously conceded that, had his efforts been wanting, Ventura county would likely still be without the enterprise. He early grasped the advantages which would accrue from the presence in the community of such a large factory, the benefit to the farmers and to commerce, the rise in values of land, the increase of railway facilities, and numerous other advantages that he saw were bound to come to his community with the introduction of such a large undertaking as the plant of the American Beet Sugar Company at Oxnard. To show his public spirit, we will give one incident in his efforts to secure the beet sugar industry for his locality: In order to convince the farmers of the profits and benefits in this new crop and industry, and to show to the manufacturer the adaptability of the local soil for such production, as well as the willingness of the farmers to produce sugar beets, he saw the necessity of some one to carry on an extensive experimental beet test under very conservative supervision, and proceeded, at a loss to his own business, to personally secure over two hundred and fifty acres in small lots (half an acre to five acres) in over two hundred different locations in the valley and had nine-tenths of it planted by his own men to insure proper work, going about it at times, giving private instruction as to the care of the test, besides giving lectures on the subject at various meetings and through the press. On one occasion, seeing a test neglected by a neighbor, he sent his own men to attend to it at his own expense. The result of those tests was marvelous: in many instances from twenty-five to thirty-five tons of beets per acre were produced, with an average of over eighteen per cent sugar, and in a number of cases sugar beets containing a maximum of thirty-two per cent sugar were obtained. The effect of such a test was quickly made manifest when some fifteen thousand acres were pledged under a seven-year contract to grow sugar beets and a two-million dollar plant was erected by the Oxnards to convert the beets into sugar. He was also instrumental in securing the erection of the bridge over the Santa Clara river (one of the longest and finest in Southern California), an undertaking brought forward in public elections on different occasions, but which had always failed theretofore to secure the necessary support for its erection. He has also successfully organized the farmers into unions and associations at various times to promote the proper marketing of the crops and for the establishment of facilities for the general welfare.

That the American farmer is a vital force in the country's development, all will acknowledge; for upon his understanding and success hangs the fate of, not many, but all, enterprises. The hand of the progressive farmer of to-day is guided, from the sowing to the harvesting of the crop, by the scientific deductions of some master agriculturist who has studied with infinite care the possibilities of the soil and the workings of nature. No more earnest student of agriculture has brought his intelligence and common sense to bear upon the land than Albert F. Maulhardt, who has added to his farming enterprises all the manifold incidentals which make the difference between a progressive and non-progressive farmer. As an authority on agricultural matters in general he is not exceeded in the scope of his influence, and from far and near those who desire the benefit of his conclusions call upon him with the assurance that they will be benefited thereby and be placed in touch with the most approved and scientifically thought out ways and means; so much so that when it was being agitated as to whether apiarism in connection with lima bean culture would result in detriment to the latter, Prof. E. J. Wickson of the University of California corresponded with Mr. Maulhardt to learn the results of his investigations upon this subject, and was informed that bees were no benefit in connection with the raising of lima beans.

Not the least of his achievements in the development of the country is his solution of the question of water supply for irrigation, at all times an important item in Southern California. He has been, and in fact is, at the head of the artesian irrigation water agitation in the county, and has accomplished more than anyone else in this line. When, some years ago, he was confronted with the danger of a dry year and no visible opportunity to secure water for irrigation, with his characteristic energy and independence of action he at once cast about for an outfit to drill large wells for himself, as there was no machine in the county equipped to do such drilling as he desired. He got some ideas of a rig together from here and there, and went to work improving on them and making his own mechanical drawings of such parts as he desired and were not procurable. These were immediately made to his order by iron works in Los Angeles, and soon he had a very fair rig at work with many new and improved features, at the very start drilling a ten-inch hole to a depth of as much as one hundred and sixty-six feet in one day. With this machine he developed about six hundred miners' inches of water on his home ranch in time to irrigate and produce six thousand bags of limas on some three hundred and fifty acres (besides other crops), which beans he sold at five cents, owing to shortage of supply caused by a dry season. He has also developed artesian water on his other farming interests, amounting in all to about two thousand acres. His practical demonstration of success caused land in the immediate vicinity to increase in value, and he has since been operating his rig constantly, and at the time this article goes to press is running two steam rigs night and day in the development of an artesian water system for the irrigation of a district comprising over fifteen thousand acres, which with this water system will become valuable beet land.

While the subject of this sketch was first drawn into mechanical pursuits by the demands of his own business, at the same time these demands called into play a natural inventive faculty and genius for machinery, which in his case is quite marked. For example, his steam-drilling rig is his own invention, and contains many unique features of great superiority over the standard rig in use by others for artesian drilling, and he has made it the subject of an application for patent. This is not the only evidence of Mr. Maulhardt's mechanical ingenuity, as he has invented other things, one of which deserves special mention. It has been said that there is no less than six thousand models pertaining to plows in the patent office in Washington. Mr. Maulhardt holds letters patent to No. 690067, issued under date December 31, 1901, covering sixteen distinct claims on so well-known an implement as the plow, which has been used for thousands of years in every part of the world, and on which one would think that no further improvements could be made. His invention comprises the combination of a sub-soil, gang and sulky plow, which is in use in the community and which he is arranging to place on the market in the near future, with some of his other inventions.

His parents were Anton and Margaret (Bietenholz) Maulhardt, natives of Germany and Switzerland. His father came from Germany in the early '60s and settled in Contra Costa county, where he engaged in agriculture and sheep-raising. In the beginning of the '70s he removed to Ventura county and bought tracts of land near Hueneme, his land at the time being practically wild and uncultivated. Success attended his efforts in his adopted country, and his death, some ten years ago, removed one of the honored and prosperous land owners of the community. His wife, whose death occurred ten years previously, was the mother of two children: A. F., and Lydia, now the wife of F. O. Engstrum, a prominent contractor, doing an extensive business in Southern California. Albert F. was born in Contra Costa county in 1872, and was educated in Los Angeles colleges, his education comprising a knowledge of German, Spanish and English. He is a member of several secret fraternities, but has never taken any part in political affairs. In 1901 he married Jennie, the eldest daughter of A. W. Buell, a pioneer of Santa Barbara.

E. C. TALLANT. Prominently connected with the commercial, political and humanitarian undertakings of Santa Barbara is E. C. Tallant, secretary of the Hollister estate, chairman of the county board of supervisors, and a resident of Santa Barbara since 1874. A native of Wheeling, W. Va., he was born March 14, 1858, and is of English descent. His father, Henry, was born in Lincolnshire, England, and when a boy came to America with his three brothers, and settled in Wheeling, where they engaged in the real-estate and dry-goods business. They later removed to Chester, Pa., and after a few years settled in Baltimore, Md., conducting their wholesale dry-goods business under the firm name of Tallant Brothers, with headquarters on Hanover street. This association was amicably continued for eight years, when the business was sold out and Henry Tallant located with his family in Santa Barbara, where he is now living in retirement, at the age of eighty years.

He married Caroline Eoff, who was born in Virginia, a daughter of Dr. Eoff, one of the old and prominent physicians on the Ohio. The German physician married Miss Quarrier, of Virginia, whose father served in the Revolutionary war. The great-grandfather Eoff was also a soldier in that war. Mrs. Tallant, who died in Santa Barbara in 1896, was the mother of ten children of whom E. C. is fifth. The father and his brothers during their residence in Wheeling, W. Va., took an active part in securing the non-secession of West Virginia, thus aiding in securing one state for the Union.

The education of E. C. Tallant was acquired in the public schools of Pennsylvania and Baltimore, and in St. John's Episcopal School. He also attended Roanoke College, at Salem, Va., for two years, and after coming west attended Santa Barbara College for a year. His entrance into the business world was as a clerk in the grocery establishment of P. M. Newell, with whom he remained for five years, after which he purchased an interest with Mr. Newell, and subsequently bought him out entirely. He then engaged in an independent grocery business on State street, and also became agent at Santa Barbara for the Southern Mill & Warehouse Company, now the Southern Pacific Milling Company, with whom he remained for three years.

In 1896 Mr. Tallant resigned the management of the milling company to accept his present responsible position with the Hollister estate management, his duties as secretary being by no means a light task, for the late W. W. Hollister was one of the most successful of the pioneers of Santa Barbara county, and left, among other possessions, five ranches and large city real estate holdings. The interests of Mr. Tallant extend beyond his immediate secretaryship to various undertakings in the town and county, and he is a director, and was one of the organizers, of the Santa Barbara Lemon Growers' Exchange. He himself has a lemon orchard of twelve and a half acres in the Montecito district, which is under irrigation and has been developed from raw land. He was one of the organizers of the Chamber of Commerce in May of 1899, and was one of the first board of directors. Politics have claimed considerable of his attention, and in the fall of 1898 he was nominated on the Republican ticket for county supervisor of the second district, and elected over three candidates by a large majority. In January of 1899 he took the oath of office, his term of service to extend to January of 1903. In January of 1901 he was elected chairman of the board of supervisors, and he is also at present chairman of the Republican county central committee of Santa Barbara county.

In San Francisco Mr. Tallant married Martha

Dillon, who was born in New Orleans, La., and educated in San Francisco, in which latter city she became interested in educational work. Mrs. Tallant is a woman of broad culture, and is one of the vital forces of the city in educational and humanitarian work. She is especially interested in kindergarten work, is a prominent member of the Kindergarten Association, and a director of the same, and was one of the most enthusiastic of those who secured the erection of the kindergarten school building, which is now incorporated into the general school system of Santa Barbara. In her capacity as president of the Associated Charities Mrs. Tallant has accomplished most gratifying results, and has been of great assistance to her husband in formulating plans for bettering the conditions of those requiring city assistance. An effort has been made to investigate such cases as applied for help, with the object of aiding those really in need, and of exposing fraudulent applicants. So successful has this truly wise precaution proved that, after all needful aid had been rendered, and positions secured for those who were willing and able to work, the county has been saved at least $7,000. The idea of investigating all applications for help occurred to Mr. Tallant when he first became a member of the board of supervisors, and since then the plan has been adopted, with few exceptions, of giving provisions and clothing instead of money. This is in accordance with the views of the most advanced philanthropists, who recognize the self-respect underlying the principle that money received should be at the expense of an equivalent in work on the part of the recipient. Mr. and Mrs. Tallant are the parents of two children, Percy E. and Harold C.

THOMAS O. TOLAND. A fair proportion of the legal complications that arise in Ventura are satisfactorily and skilfully adjusted by Thomas O. Toland, who possesses a wide understanding and practical knowledge of the science of law. He was born in Alabama in 1856, a son of James and Mildred A. (Street) Toland, natives respectively of South Carolina and Virginia. His father settled in Alabama in 1845, and still lives on the old homestead in his adopted state, near Bluff Springs in Clay county; the mother, whose father settled in Alabama in the early '30s, died when her son, T. O., was a child. Of the same family was Dr. H. H. Toland, founder of the Toland Medical College in San Francisco, which he afterwards donated in its entirety to the state of California, and which is now the medical department of the State University.

The education of Mr. Toland was prosecuted in Munford Academy, at Munford, Talladega county, Ala., and for one year he attended the University of Virginia. January 1, 1875, he came to California, and entered the University of California, from which he was graduated in the class of 1878. His university days were spent in distinguished company, for among those who formulated high aspirations within the walls of the famous university and started forth into the world of actualities at the same time were Judge Daingerfield, of the superior court of San Francisco; A. F. Morrison, of the firm of Morrison & Cope, attorneys, of San Francisco; and F. W. Zeile, president of the San Francisco Mercantile Trust Company. After graduation, Mr. Toland became a student in a law office in San Francisco, also studied at the Hastings Law College and was later admitted to the bar after coming to Ventura county. In 1882 he removed to Hueneme, Ventura county, and taught school for a year, and in 1883 continued the same occupation in Santa Paula, where for three years he was principal of schools. Continuing to live in Santa Paula he opened a law office there, and soon after became a member of the real estate firm of Guiberson & Toland, which partnership was later dissolved, Dr. Guiberson going out, and C. N. Baker taking his place. Under the firm name of Toland & Baker this arrangement was amicably continued until May, 1890, when Mr. Toland came to Ventura, and purchased the library and business of L. C. McKeeby, who had been appointed internal revenue collector, and removed to Los Angeles.

Mr. Toland has continued to practice in Ventura and has, at the same time, taken a most intelligent and active interest in the undertakings of the Democratic party. His general fitness for office has been variously recognized by his townspeople. In 1888 and 1890 he ran for district attorney, but with unsatisfactory results, although he was far ahead of his ticket. However, in 1892 he was elected to the district attorney's office and served for one term. In 1896 he was appointed city attorney and held the office for two years, or until January of 1898. In November of 1896 he was elected to the assembly for one term of two years, and in July of 1898 he was nominated for member of the state board of equalization in the fourth district of California, which district comprises twenty-three counties, and is bounded on the north by San Mateo, Stanislaus, Santa Clara, Mariposa, and Mono. Although the district was five thousand Republican he was elected by three thousand five hundred, his term of office extending to January 1, 1903. The political services of Mr. Toland have met with a deserved appreciation on the part of his compatriots, and he is especially remembered for the wise and aggressive course which he adopted in connection with the opposition to the Southern Pacific Railroad in the sixth congressional district in the celebrated Patton-

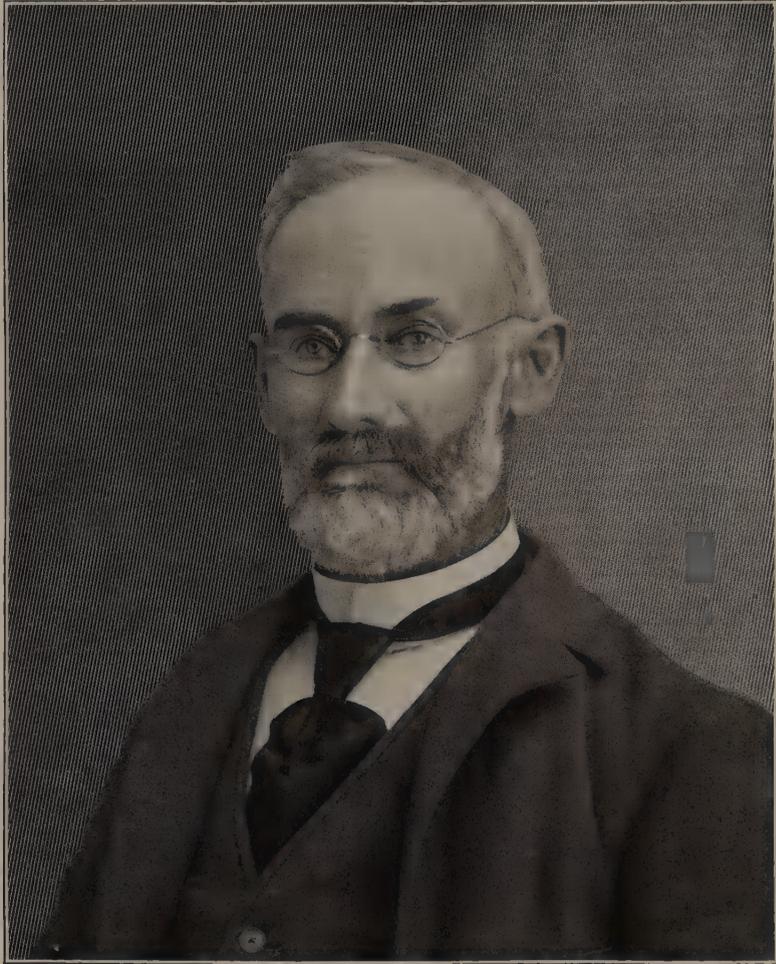

Rose contest for the Democratic nomination for congress in 1896.

In 1900 Mr. Toland married Carrie, daughter of G. W. and Sarah Fleisher. She was born in Pennsylvania and in 1883 settled with her parents at Santa Paula, where her father became a prominent oil man. Mr. Toland is fraternally associated with the Odd Fellows, the Knights of Pythias, and the Masons, and took the Shriner's degree in Los Angeles in April, 1900.

JAMES ROBERT McKEE. It may well be a matter of pride with Mr. McKee, of Bardsdale, that three of his great-grandfathers were active participants in the American struggle for freedom, in which Great-grandfather McKee lost his life during the Kings Mountain campaign. Necessarily patriotism is a prominent element in the characters of the present-day representatives, who, together with this inheritance of loyalty, have also a heritage of those other qualities that tend to the forming of an ideal manhood. Through the efforts of J. R. McKee, a genealogical chart has been compiled, which traces the record of the family in a direct line from four ancestral families and gives a record of successive generations from the date of the families' arrival in America, about 1750, to the beginning of the twentieth century. This work has been largely a labor of love and self-sacrificing effort, and entitles the compiler to grateful recognition from the McKees of future generations.

The residence of Mr. McKee in California dates from January, 1887. Born in Butler county, Ohio, June 21, 1854, he is a son of William and Louisa (Stipp) McKee, both natives of Kentucky, but from early years residents of Ohio. He received the rudiments of his education in the public schools of Butler county, after which he matriculated in Monmouth (Illinois) College, from which he was graduated in 1874 with the degree of B. S. His education completed when he was a little less than twenty years of age, he was ready to start out into life's activities. For two years he acted as city editor of the Independent, a daily paper published in Richmond, Ind. In this way he not only gained a knowledge of journalism, but also of those broader fields of general activity which, in his editorial capacity, he was obliged to master and thoroughly acquaint himself with.

On coming to California, Mr. McKee was connected with the Los Angeles Times for a brief period. For two years he served as deputy recorder of Los Angeles county, which position he filled with credit to himself, revealing the possession of qualities that fitted him for reliable work as an accountant and bookkeeper. Along a similar line of activity he was engaged in the real estate and loan business in Los Angeles. During 1890 he became associated with

G. W. Faulkner

Hon. Thomas R. Bard, United States Senator from California, and since then he has made Bardsdale his home, having charge of the senator's business matters at this point, and acting as superintendent of the South Side Improvement Company (Senator Bard, president). In addition he officiated in organizing the Fillmore Citrus Fruit Association and was chosen its first secretary, besides which he is now one of the heaviest stockholders and also a director.

August 18, 1891, Mr. McKee married Miss Grace Farnsworth, of Los Angeles, her father, R. L. Farnsworth, being a retired attorney of St. Paul, Minn. Two daughters, Margery and Dorothy McKee, form the family. Fraternal Mr. McKee is connected with the Sons of the American Revolution, his membership being in the San Diego chapter of this patriotic society. In the political affairs of his town and county, he takes an active part as a Republican, an advocate of clean politics, and has frequently served as a delegate to local and state conventions. A study of the principles of the Republican party brings him into hearty accord with the same, for he is a firm believer in the protection of home industries, believing that the tariff on incoming products from the old world should be such as to protect the infant industries of our far western region. For five years he has been a member of the Santa Paula Union high school board, in which he has served as clerk and president. It was his privilege, in an official capacity, to present their diplomas to the graduating class in 1900. When it is considered that he came to California in January, 1887, without friends or means, and now stands among the representative men of the Santa Clara valley, it not only proves him to be a man of enterprise and ability, but also indicates the possibilities offered to such men by our great western state.

GEORGE W. FAULKNER. So many enterprises in Ventura county have profited by the enterprise and business ability of Mr. Faulkner that it is almost impossible to correctly estimate the extent of his services or his share in bringing about the present prosperity. He arrived in California in 1875 with a very small financial foundation on which to mold the future, and after spending a short time in San Francisco January 1, 1876, he came to Ventura county and bought a ranch in the Santa Clara valley. Seventy-five acres of the property formed a portion of the old Santa Clara del Norte ranch, on the south side of the river, where El Rio now stands. For three years he conducted farming enterprises and a small orchard there. In the spring of 1879 he purchased one hundred and fifty acres, where he now lives. At the time the place had but scant improvements compared with those which are now the admiration and pride of the county. Following a general farming industry until 1883, he then began to set out deciduous fruits. He was among the first here to raise apricots, of which he now has twenty-five acres. To him belongs also the distinction of raising the first soft-shell walnuts in the valley, twenty acres being devoted to this nut, and the average yield being about sixteen tons. One hundred and twenty-five tons of apricots, thirty tons of sugar beets and an equal quantity of beans are more of the averages quoted.

In keeping with his progressive spirit, Mr. Faulkner built in 1894 the largest and finest rural home in Ventura county, in which no modern convenience has been neglected, the house throughout being piped and wired for gas and electricity. A favorite social center of the county, hospitality is here meted out most graciously, the honors of the house being dispensed by Mrs. Faulkner (née Rhoda S. Seymour) and her sister, Miss Lou H. Seymour, both graduates of Baldwin University, class of 1872. Mrs. Faulkner was born in Ohio, and is a daughter of Rev. S. D. Seymour, of the North Ohio conference of the Methodist Episcopal denomination, and at the time of his death a resident of Texas. The children born to the union of Mr. and Mrs. Faulkner are all graduates of the high school, and the daughters are attending the University of Southern California.

Until coming to California Mr. Faulkner lived in Richland county, Ohio, where he was born August 16, 1846. His father, George Faulkner, was born in England in 1806, and came to America in 1835, settling on a farm in Richland county, where the remainder of his life was spent. He married Julia A. Green, a native of Franklin county, Ohio, and a daughter of William and Martha (Stanton) Green. Her mother was a relative of Secretary of War Edwin M. Stanton. William Green, who served his country in the war of 1812, built the third house in the township in which he lived, and was a prominent pioneer. There were six children in the parental family, George W. being fourth. He received his education in the public schools and spent his youth on the home farm.

Among the various interests which command the attention of Mr. Faulkner may be mentioned his association with the organization of the People's Lumber Company, of which he was one of the original board of directors. In 1897 he assisted in organizing the Santa Paula Co-operative Company's store, of which company he is now president. To his wise judgment, in his official capacity, and to the capable supervision of the manager, D. W. Huffman, largely belongs credit for the fact that the company, which began with a capital of $500, is now doing a business of about $50,000 per annum. For several years Mr. Faulkner was a director of the Santa Paula Fruit Packing Company. He helped to organize the Saticoy Walnut Growers' Association and the Santa Paula Walnut Growers' Association, of which latter he is now president. Formerly, for years, he served on the board of directors and as secretary of the Farmers' Canal and Irrigating Company. He is a stockholder in the Riverstreet Irrigating Company. In partnership with his brother, he owns eighteen hundred acres of land at Fillmore, where he has twenty acres in fine oranges.

Politically Mr. Faulkner is a Prohibitionist, and his influence has ever been exerted on the side of municipal purity and the abolition of the saloon. He is a member of the Anti Saloon League. In educational matters he is active, and for two terms served on the high school board. In church circles he is well known. He has been one of the foremost in his locality in maintaining the Methodist Episcopal Church, of which he has been a member for thirty-five years, and a lay delegate for a long period. He assisted in organizing the church of that denomination in Santa Paula, and is a trustee and steward in the same, as well as Bible class teacher. No citizen of the county enjoys to a greater extent than he the confidence and esteem of his fellow-townsmen, nor are any more thoroughly in touch with the needs, aspirations and successes of the community.

MRS. JULIA F. WILLIAMS. Fidelity to duty has been the keynote to the lifework of Mrs. Williams. First an assistant to her husband, who was the lighthouse keeper on Santa Barbara Point from 1856 to 1860, and since 1865 as the incumbent of the position herself, she has been true to every duty and has maintained an unceasing vigil in seeing that the beacon light is always kept burning. It is a remarkable fact that for over thirty-six years she has not been absent from the lighthouse even one single night; and, indeed, the only time she ever remained away over night since taking the position was once in April, 1865. Believing that she is doing merely her duty and nothing more, she has asked no reward for her long and faithful service. Some years ago she was solicited to assist in forming a society that had for its object the pensioning of lighthouse keepers after a certain number of years of service; but, when approached, she said that she did not want a pension for doing what was her duty and therefore would not give her influence toward the proposed organization.

At Campo Bello, New Brunswick, across from Eastport, Me., Mrs. Williams was born July 12, 1826. Her father, Cadwallader Curry, a native of St. Andrews, of Welsh descent, owned six stores, carrying different lines of goods, at Welsh Pool, and also owned vessels in the trans-Atlantic trade. He died very suddenly and the large estate he left was, by unjust means, wrested from his family. His wife, who bore the maiden name of Julia Mitchell, was born in North Yarmouth, and died in Massachusetts. Of their six children four daughters and one son are living, and all but Mrs. Williams reside in Sharon. She was next to the oldest of the family and was reared in Eastport, Me., where she became the wife of Albert J. Williams, in 1848. Mr. Williams was born in Waterville, Me., a son of Col. Johnson Williams and a grandson of Dr. Obadiah Williams, an old settler of Waterville. He was reared to a knowledge of merchandising, in which he assisted his father. In 1849 he came to California via Panama and for eight months engaged in business at the isthmus, thence going to Calaveras county, Cal., where he had a ferry and a hotel. Deciding to remain in the west, he wrote his wife to join him here, and in February, 1853, she began the long journey, traveling via steamer from New York to Aspinwall, then across the isthmus (where the railroad had not yet been built) and from there proceeding by steamer to San Francisco.

For some years Mr. and Mrs. Williams resided in San Francisco, where he carried on a painting business. He was particularly fitted for artistic work, and was both a fine penman and skilled in devising original designs for signs, etc. In August, 1856, he was appointed by President Franklin Pierce as lighthouse keeper at Santa Barbara, the appointment having been secured through the influence of his brother, Hon. Bion Bradbury Williams, who was then member of Congress from Maine. The first incumbent of this position, he lighted the first lamp in the lighthouse December 19, 1856, and it is fitting that Mrs. Williams through all of these intervening years should have continued so faithfully the work that he began. At the expiration of four years, he resigned his position and settled upon a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres, where he built a residence and turned his attention to the sheep business. In February, 1865, Mrs. Williams received the appointment as lighthouse keeper from Commodore Watson, inspector of lighthouses for the San Francisco district, and she has since devoted herself to the work, Mr. Williams meanwhile carrying on work at the painter's trade until his death, in 1882, at the age of fifty-seven years. They became the parents of six children, as follows: Mrs. Helen F. Maxfield, of San Diego, Cal.; Ada C., who died at fifteen years of age; Bion Bradbury, an architect and builder, in Santa Barbara; Mrs. Julia C. Baker, of Seattle, Wash.; Albert C., who is a dairyman near Santa Barbara; and Franklin S., a farmer in Santa Barbara county. Mrs. Williams is identified with the Congregational Church at Santa Barbara and is a life member of the Home Missionary Society, in the work of which she is deeply interested.

H. C. Richardson

CHARLES H. McKEVETT. Numerous interests have occupied the time and attention of Mr. McKeveitt during the progress of his successful career in Santa Paula. While most widely known as the president of the First National Bank of the town, his executive and financial ability has penetrated and developed many enterprises of equal moment in the general growth of his adopted city and has secured for him an enviable reputation as a man of business discretion, as well as unquestioned moral integrity.

The ancestral home of the McKeveitt family is in Scotland, the first emigrating member being the paternal grandfather, Alexander, who came to America when a boy, and settled in New York. There was born his grandson, Charles H., in Cortland county, October 3, 1848, as were also his parents. When old enough to assume responsibility, he found a field for occupation in the oil business in Pennsylvania, first as an employe, later as a contractor to drill wells, and still later as an independent operator. Through application he gained a wide knowledge of the business, and for a period of fifteen years he continued to successfully manipulate oil affairs in Clarion, Butler, Warren and McKean counties, and as the result of his labors amassed a considerable fortune. Desiring a complete change of climate and surroundings, he visited California in January of 1886, and selected Santa Paula as his permanent residence, although at the time it was destitute of railroad advantages, and contained in all but about two hundred residents. He immediately purchased four hundred and twenty-four acres of the Bradley and Blanchard rancho, his land extending from near the center of the town out into the country. A portion of this land has since been subdivided and sold, and at the present time he owns three hundred acres planted in oranges, lemons, apricots, and devoted to general farming.

In 1887 Mr. McKeveitt organized the Santa Paula Lumber Company, and was president of the same until its consolidation with the Ventura County Lumber Company, since which he has been general manager of the combined companies. In 1888 he organized the Santa Paula State Bank, of which George H. Bonebrake was president; Mr. McKeveitt, vice-president, and J. R. Haugh, cashier. September 23, 1889, the bank was converted into the First National Bank of Santa Paula, at which time Mr. McKeveitt was elected to his present position of president. He is also interested in oil production to the extent of being secretary and treasurer of the Graham Loftus Oil Company, which organization has seventeen wells in Fullerton, Orange county, and he also owns interests in several other oil companies. He is a director and the treasurer of the Limoneira Company, owners of a ranch of four hundred acres, upon which are raised principally lemons, but also oranges and walnuts. He is also vice-president of the Santa Paula Water Company.

In 1873 Mr. McKeveitt married Alice Stowell, a native of Pennsylvania, and of this union there are three children, two of whom were born in Pennsylvania, and the third, a daughter, was born in Santa Paula. Mr. McKeveitt is a Republican in national politics, and is very popular in fraternal circles, being associated with the Santa Paula Lodge No. 291, F. & A. M.; with Ventura Chapter, R. A. M.; with the Knights Templar Commandery, Al Malakiah Temple, N. M. S., and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. In 1890 he further increased the possibilities of Santa Paula by laying off a portion of land north of the railroad, and in 1900 built a fine bank building which is in every way a credit to the town.

HENRY CLAY RICHARDSON. One of the enterprising owners and managers of ranch property in Ventura county is H. C. Richardson, whose property lies near the village of Oxnard. He was born in Warren county, Mo., March 20, 1844. For many years his life work was carried on in connection with that of his father, John Richardson, an interesting character and a man of successful undertakings. He was born in New York in 1796 and participated in the war of 1812, his last work in that connection being in the mail service in Boone county, Mo., which continued to be his home for several years. During his residence in Missouri he married his first wife, and she died there. Later he married Lucy Benson Wright, who died at the home of her son, Henry C., October 5, 1898.

The family settled in Grant county, Wis., in 1845, where H. C. Richardson received his education in public schools. In 1860 he accompanied the other members of the family to California, the journey being made by the overland route with ox-teams and wagons. The father, mother, ten sons and two daughters remained in Shasta county for a short time, thence removed to Sacramento county, and from there to Stockton, returning soon to Sacramento county, where the father died in 1868. The others later removed to Santa Barbara county and were among the earliest white settlers of that region. It was at Carpinteria, that county, Mr. Richardson was united in marriage, November 3, 1868, with Augusta Isabelle, daughter of William and Elizabeth (Vance) McFarland, both of whom died in Missouri when their daughter was a child. An aunt of Mrs. Richardson, Sally G. Vance, died at the Richardson home, November 11, 1901, aged ninety-three years and seven days. To the union of Mr. and Mrs. Richardson have been born seven children, namely: John V., a rancher, who married Alma Hickson and has one child, Mildred A.; Lucy, Mrs. C. Cox, of Sutter county, who has a son, Byron; William, who married Miss Emma Cook and has one son, Henry, the family living on the Broome ranch, owned by Mrs. Frances Broome, of Santa Barbara; Mrs. Sallie Reno, of Oxnard; Herbert, Arthur and Albert, who are at home. The oldest son resides on Chapedra's ranch between Saticoy and Springfield.

In 1891 Mr. Richardson came to his present ranch near Oxnard and has since successfully conducted the same. He is the possessor of nearly forty acres of land, upon which he has erected a commodious and comfortable house, and a well-arranged and substantial barn. His varied interests demand the renting of more land in the neighborhood, so that he superintends a considerable acreage. As a rule, his crops are good, hence he has gained a fair degree of financial success. In politics he is a Socialist and a strict party man. His parents were stanch workers in the Baptist Church and he is in sympathy with the work of that denomination, as indeed he is with all movements for the benefit of mankind, but he is not identified with any church. He is well and favorably known in the farming communities of the two counties of Santa Barbara and Ventura, and his business and personal integrity is well established in every community where he has made his home.

REV. PETER WALLISCHECK, O. F. M. The president of St. Anthony's College at Santa Barbara was born at Wiesloch, Baden, Germany, April 4, 1852, and was brought to America in the spring of 1854. During his boyhood he lived for a time in Ohio, but mostly in Illinois. In the fall of 1868 he began to study for the Franciscan Order at St. Joseph's College, Teutopolis, Ill., and in that same place he entered the Franciscan Order December 21, 1871. At the close of the novitiate, January 3, 1873, he gave his attention to his studies in St. Francis Solanus College, Quincy, Ill. His philosophical studies were pursued in the monastery at Quincy, Ill., and his theological studies at St. Louis, Mo., from 1877 to 1880. In the latter city he was ordained priest, June 22, 1879, by Archbishop Patrick John Ryan, D. D., LL. D., of Philadelphia, then coadjutor of Most Rev. Archbishop P. R. Kenrick, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo.

In the summer of 1880 he was sent to St. Joseph's College, at Teutopolis, Ill., as a professor but the following year on account of poor health a change of location became necessary. For this reason he was sent to St. Francis College, Quincy, Ill., in the summer of 1881. From there, June 27, 1896, he was sent to San Francisco, and on the 18th of August, same year, was transferred to Santa Barbara, where, from that time on, he has been engaged in preparing young men for the priesthood in the Franciscan Order.

A. L. LINQUEST, superintendent of the Santa Barbara County Hospital, was born in Skara, Westrejutlan, Sweden, October 15, 1860. The paternal grandfather was a soldier in the Swedish army, and after returning to civilian life engaged in agriculture until his death. The father, John, was born in Sweden, and farmed for the greater part of his life, his death occurring in Sweden at the age of seventy-seven years. By his marriage to Greta Anderson, who died in Sweden, he had five children, three of whom are in America and two in Sweden. Alfred lives in Santa Clara county, Cal.; Christine remains on the old homestead; Gustav is in the transfer business in Santa Barbara; and Carl is at the old home.

A. L. Linquest was educated in the public schools of Sweden, and in 1875 came to Santa Barbara, whither he had been preceded by his uncle, Edblom, two years before. Almost immediately his lines were cast in pleasant places, for he entered the employ of Col. W. W. Hollister, and served in this capacity for eighteen years. In time he became foreman of the Glen Anna ranch, and was engaged in horticulture and the dairy business, and after the colonel's death he continued in the employ of Mrs. Hollister. In 1890 he resigned to accept a position as superintendent of the Dixie Thompson ranch at Ventura, his responsibility extending over twenty-four hundred acres, of which fifteen hundred acres were planted in lima beans. In 1892 yet another change was made to the Hollister employ, as superintendent of the Santa Anita Ranch, containing seventeen thousand acres devoted to stock-raising enterprises. In May of 1896 he resigned from this position and took a trip back to the scenes of his childhood in Sweden, sailing on the City of New York from New York to Southampton and Göttenburg. After a sojourn of two months he returned to California and to his former position on the Santa Anita ranch, holding the same until 1897, when he entered the employ of the Los Angeles Street Railway Company. In April of 1898 he took a trip to Alaska on the steamer Alaska, going up the Kobuck river for about four hundred miles, prospecting and mining during the summer and winter.

In January of 1901 Mr. Linquest was appointed superintendent of the county hospital at Santa Barbara, by the board of supervisors, and has since given entire satisfaction in his management of the affairs of the institution.

Robert Bell

The capacity of the hospital is thirty rooms, and the location commands a fine view of the ocean. Mr. Linquest is prominent in the Republican party and in fraternal circles, being a member of the Santa Barbara Masonic Lodge, No. 242, the Royal Arch Masons, St. Omar Commandery, and Al Malakiah Temple, N. M. S., besides which he is connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. He was married in Los Angeles April 18, 1898, to Amanda Erika Saunders, who is also a native of Sweden. Mrs. Linquest is a member of the Rebekahs.

ROBERT BELL. One of the most successful ranchers of Ventura county is Robert Bell, than whom his community has no citizen more honored or enterprising. He was born in Richland county, Ohio, May 27, 1842, and comes from one of the oldest American families, and one known for the sympathy, harmony and good fellowship existing among its members. His grandfather, Robert Bell, was a soldier in the war of 1812 and assisted in guarding Perry's fleet while it was being built on Lake Erie. The parents, William S. and Polly (Turbett) Bell, were born in Pennsylvania, and the former was reared in Ohio. In 1898 they came to California, and here their respective deaths occurred within forty-eight hours of each other, the incident suggesting in its conclusion the many years in which they had lived together, unselfishly sharing the joys and sorrows that came their way. They reared to health and usefulness two sons and two daughters, the latter living in Ohio, while the sons, Thomas and Robert, are ranchers in Ventura county, the former owning a fine ranch near Oxnard, while the latter is a rancher near Camarillo.

The education of Robert Bell was acquired in public schools. The first important incident that disturbed his otherwise uneventful youth was the breaking out of the Civil war. This brought to the surface the innate patriotism that he possessed and inspired him to enlist in Company C, Twentieth Ohio Infantry, Seventeenth Army Corps. For three years he served his country, being mustered out at Columbus, Ohio, in 1864. Soon after the restoration of peace he came to California and settled in Yuba county, where he worked on the Virginia ranch. During 1871 he came to Ventura county, where the next year he married Rebecca L., daughter of Peter and Isabelle Rice, pioneers of California from Ohio, both of whom ended their days on their son-in-law's ranch. The children of Mr. and Mrs. Bell are Polly, Bertha and Walter, of whom the two younger are school students. The family are connected with the Episcopal Church.

The ranch which has been Mr. Bell's home ever since he came to Ventura county is a portion of the Las Posas rancho, embracing 26,623 acres, granted to José Carillo May 15, 1824, and confirmed to José de la Guerra y Noriega, being held by him and his heirs until 1876, when it was sold to a company. Las Posas lies about twelve miles east of Hueneme, within sight of the ocean, in the southern part of Ventura county. The Simi ranch adjoins it on the east, the Calleguas on the south, the Santa Clara del Norte on the west, and a range of mountains on the north. Grains and semi-tropical fruits succeed here, barley, wheat, corn and beans have been successfully grown without irrigation, while there is also much grazing land.

In partnership with Peter Rice, one of the successful pioneers of Las Posas rancho, Mr. Bell bought from Hon. Thomas R. Bard eleven hundred and thirty acres of the ranch, but afterward transferred the property back to its former owner. Mr. Bell now cultivates five hundred and fifty acres of this property, and all is devoted to barley and beans, in the cultivation of which he is an expert. The railroad runs through a corner of the ranch, and there is a depot for the accommodation of passengers. In national politics he votes with the Republican party, but, while interested in public affairs, he has never entertained political aspirations, his tastes inclining him toward business and domestic affairs rather than toward politics.

ST. ANTHONY'S COLLEGE. It has always been the greatest desire of the Generals of the Franciscan order at Rome to uphold not only the provinces established in different parts of the world, but also the individual houses or monasteries belonging to these provinces. The Most Rev. Father General, Bernardino a Portu Romatino, O. F. M., was not less solicitous in this regard. He especially desired that the missions in California, established by the pioneer missionaries of the Franciscan order, should be preserved, if human zeal or energy could prevent them from falling a prey to the elements and vandalism. But, alas! only one of the twenty-one once flourishing missions remained in the possession of the padres. This was the mission at Santa Barbara. Should it also be abandoned and crumble into ruin? No! Divine Providence watched over this relic of the pioneer missionaries. It was not to fall into utter decay, as did most of the twenty-one Franciscan missions in California. The Most Rev. Father General requested the provincial of the Sacred Heart province of St. Louis, Mo., to take charge of the Santa Barbara mission. After the matter had gone through its legal proceedings in Rome, the Santa Barbara mission was duly incorporated in the Sacred Heart province of St. Louis, Mo. This was done in 1885.

As time passed on, it became obvious that, if the Franciscan order was to maintain a permanent footing in California and to return to its original splendor it would be necessary that young recruits should be procured and educated, not as had hitherto been done, in Quincy, Ill., or Teutopolis, Ill., but in California itself. It was therefore decided at the chapter which convened in St. Louis, Mo., July 22, 1896, at which Very Rev. Michael Richardt, O. F. M., presided, that a house for classical studies should be erected at the Old Mission in Santa Barbara with Rev. Peter Wallischeck, O. F. M., as its first rector or president. At the historic Old Mission, St. Anthony's College had its beginning. This beginning was indeed a humble one, because besides the president there was only one professor, Rev. Felix Raab, O. F. M. The college then comprised two classrooms, one dormitory, one dining room, and two apartments for the president and professor respectively. The cook of the padres did also the cooking for the students, of whom there were eleven. The college was formally opened September 22. On the 26th of October Rev. Mathias Rechsteiner, O. F. M., was added to the staff of professors.

It soon became obvious that the apartments occupied were inadequate for the purpose. It was therefore decided that plans should be devised and proposed to the Very Rev. Michael Richardt, O. F. M., according to which a second story was to be added to the L of the mission building. The architect of the province, Bro. Adrian Wever, O. F. M., made the plans for the superstructure, and the Very Rev. Michael Richardt approved them. These plans arrived at Santa Barbara on the 11th of June, and on the 18th the work of remodeling began. The building was sufficiently completed so that the second scholastic year could be opened September 13. The college faculty was again increased by the arrival of Rev. Onesimus Lunney, O. F. M. The number of students had increased to twenty-six. It very soon became apparent that the apartments at the Old Mission would not long be sufficient to accommodate the ever increasing number of students. Consequently new plans were made for the erection of a large and commodious building, the present St. Anthony's College. In April, 1898, the Very Rev. Theodore Arentz, O. F. M., who had been elected provincial at St. Louis, Mo., the year before, came to California, and at a meeting held at the Old Mission April 8, the necessity of a new college was considered. At this meeting, which was presided over by the Very Rev. Theodore Arentz, O. F. M., and attended by Very Rev. Kilian Schloesser, O. F. M., commissary of California and Arizona; Rev. Peter Wallischeck, O. F. M., the president of the college; and the professors, Rev. Mathias Rechsteiner, O. F. M., and Rev. Felix Raab, O. F. M., the necessity of a new building was considered. The former provincial had chosen Fruitvale, near Oakland, as the place where the college was to be built, but after mature discussion, at the meeting mentioned, it was decided that the college should be erected on Mission Hill at Santa Barbara.

The architect of the province, Bro. Adrian Wever, O. F. M., was again called upon to make a sketch of the proposed college. It happened that the architect was at Santa Barbara at this time, and he, in consultation with the president of the college, drew up plans which finally resulted in putting up the present building. Excavations were commenced August 25, 1898. Here many obstacles had to be surmounted on account of the hardness of the soil, and on several occasions the contractor of the excavations, A. L. Pendola, was anxious to give up the work. Being assured again and again, however, that he was not to lose anything on the contract, he resumed the work. When plow and pick no longer made any headway, they had recourse to powder. Holes were drilled every three or four feet apart and charged with giant-powder. After weary and toilsome weeks the excavations were sufficiently advanced so that the first stone for the structure could be laid on the 10th of October. The first stone was blessed and laid at 3:40 o'clock by the Very Rev. Kilian Schloesser, O. F. M., commissary of California and Arizona, in the presence of Rev. Peter Wallischeck, O. F. M., the faculty and students of the college. The work necessarily went on slowly owing to the lack of necessary funds. In consequence of this the corner-stone could not be laid until June 13, 1899. This ceremony was performed by the Right Rev. George Montgomery, D. D., bishop of Monterey and Los Angeles, in the presence of a great multitude of people. The Right Rev. Bishop delivered the English sermon and Edmund M. Burke, mayor of Santa Barbara, addressed the people in Spanish. The work now went on as the means would permit. But it was not until January 8, 1901, that the building was ready for occupancy. The first divine services were held in the college chapel on the same day. Rev. Peter Wallischeck, O. F. M., was celebrant and St. Anthony's College choir sang a beautiful four-voiced mass arranged by Father Xavier Zettel, O. F. M., who also presided at the organ.

The solemn dedication of the college was celebrated April 25, 1901. Solemn high mass was celebrated in the Old Mission by Very Rev. Hugolinus Storff, O. F. M., provincial of the Sacred Heart province of St. Louis, Mo.; Very Rev. Theodore Arentz, O. F. M., commissary of California and Arizona, was assistant priest; Rev. Maximilian Neumann O. F. M., pastor of St. Boniface Church, San Francisco, was deacon; and Rev. Victor Aertker, O. F. M., pastor of St. Joseph's Church, Los Angeles, was sub-deacon. The Rev. Raphael Fuhr, O. F. M., pastor of St. Anthony's Church, San Francisco, was master of ceremonies. The Right Rev. George Montgomery, D. D., bishop of Monterey and Los Angeles, was in the sanctuary, assisted by Very Rev. J. A. Linn, C. M., president of St. Vincent's College, Los Angeles, and Rev. Polydore J. Stockman, pastor of Na. Sa. de los Dolores Church of Santa Barbara. The Right Rev. Bishop delivered the dedication sermon to a large audience. After the solemn services in the church a procession was formed, headed by the Santa Barbara military band. Having arrived in front of the building the Right Rev. Bishop said the prayers for the dedication or blessing of the college. The clergy and laity then went to the chapel, where the bishop gave benediction with the Blessed Sacrament. After benediction the choir sang "Holy God, we praise Thy name," in thanksgiving for all the favors God had bestowed upon the new St. Anthony's College.

The new building is 155x50, with an L, 32x60, running northward. The style is in keeping with the so-called mission style. The structure is of solid stone. The purpose of the college is to prepare young men for the priesthood in the Franciscan Order. These young Franciscans are to perpetuate on the Pacific coast the work of the pioneer missionaries.

PROF. O. S. WESTOVER. After years of successful experience in the curio business in various towns of the west, in 1892 Professor Westover opened a store at Santa Monica and this he has since conducted, maintaining a business which, for diversity of collection and interesting features, has no superior on the coast. The building which he occupies stands on the beach and was erected by him, while he also superintended the building of his home on Third, near Arizona street. In addition to his business at Santa Monica he is interested in a store at Ocean Park and at one time conducted a curio business in Pasadena and Los Angeles.

O. S. Westover was born in Fayette county, Ind., October 11, 1832. He was one of seven children and is the eldest of three now living. A brother, Charles, lives in Placerville, Cal. Another brother, Fleming, was a member of an Iowa regiment during the Civil war and for many years afterward lived at the Santa Monica, Cal., Soldiers' Home, where he died. The father, Hiram, a native of New York and member of a New England family, became a farmer of Fayette county, Ind., and later settled in Huntington county, same state, afterward removing to Union county, Iowa, and finally to Denver, Colo., where he died. His wife, Minerva Campbell, was born in Maine and died while the family were en route from Indiana to Iowa. She was a daughter of Daniel Campbell, a cousin of Alexander Campbell, the pioneer in the organization of the Christian Church.

When the family settled in Iowa O. S. Westover was twenty years of age and afterward he taught a subscription school, meantime enduring all the discomforts of "boarding round." In 1852 he taught a singing school in Union county, and when twenty-three years of age was elected justice of the peace, serving for one term. In 1862 he crossed the plains to Pike's Peak with cow-teams, and engaged in mining at Central City, Black Hawk, Russell's Gulch and Lake City. It was during his residence in Colorado that he began to collect curios and thus became interested in the business which he still follows.

About 1870 he started in business on Laramie street, Denver, and from there in 1882 came to Los Angeles, Cal., and opened a curio establishment on Spring street, this being one of the first of its kind in the city. Later he established himself in similar business at Ogden and Salt Lake City, returning to California and starting his present store in 1892. In the various places where he has made his home he has made a specialty of collecting anything connected with the history of the locality. He has many interesting and curious specimens in his collection, which well repay careful study and examination.

The first wife of Professor Westover was Lucinda Lewis, who was born in Indiana and died in Iowa. Two daughters were born of that union, one of whom, Dora, died in Osceola, Iowa, when twenty-two years of age. The older, Mrs. Cynthia May Westover Alden, is president-general of the International Sunshine Society, an author of national prominence, and for some time has been on the editorial department of the Ladies' Home Journal. She is a graduate of the State University of Colorado. In addition to her writings, she often enters the lecture field and her services are in frequent demand for public work of this nature. Her office in New York City is at No. 96 Fifth avenue.

Professor Westover married his second wife, Isabelle Cornelius, in Iowa. She was born in Indiana. By this marriage there are three children, namely: Mrs. Gracie Westover Carrillo, of Santa Monica; Walter Ritchie Westover, who is in charge of the Indian curio department at Wanamaker's store in New York; and Maude, who died at four years of age. Professor Westover is a Republican, with Prohibition tendencies, being a firm believer in the restriction of the sale of all intoxicants. He has been an officer of the Good Templars' lodge and a member of the grand lodge and has also been connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows.

J. F. MENDENHALL. The successful business career of J. F. Mendenhall, culminating in his present responsible position as superintendent of the city parks of Los Angeles, is worthy of emulation, and in its scope for identification with the future upbuilding of the city offers many possibilities. A native of the vicinity of Carmel, Hamilton county, Ind., Mr. Mendenhall was born June 26, 1844, a son of Ira and Martha (Phelps) Mendenhall. The ancestral connections of the Mendenhalls are first authentically located in Germany, from which country some bearing the name emigrated to England, and from the island home three brothers came to America. One of the brothers returned to Albion shores, and the two remaining located respectively in Virginia and North Carolina. As far back as can be traced they were Quakers in religious affiliation, and the paternal grandfather, Benjamin, who was born in the Old Dominion state, was one of the most ardent of this particular organization. He was one of the very early settlers of Greene county, Ohio, where he owned and ran an oil mill, and he was also one of the first to settle in Hamilton county, Ind., which he reached by team through the almost primeval woods. Settling in the wilderness a little north of where Indianapolis now stands, he experienced all of the trials of early Hoosier life, the Indians being particularly dangerous. His son, Ira, was born in Spring Valley, Greene county, Ohio, and became a farmer in Indiana, where he died about twenty years ago. His wife, Martha (Phelps) Mendenhall, was born near Hillsboro, Highland county, Ohio, a daughter of John Phelps, who settled in Ohio, and later removed to Indiana, where he founded the town of Carmel. He was of English descent, and his first American relatives settled in the south. Mrs. Mendenhall, who died at the home of her son, J. F., in 1898, when eighty-one years old, was the mother of one son and three daughters, of whom J. F. is the only one living.

Until his eighteenth year J. F. Mendenhall lived on the home farm, and attended the district schools. In 1864 he went to Indianapolis and spent three years in clerical work in the office of the Northwestern Farmer, and afterwards spent a winter in Columbus, Ohio. Upon returning to Indianapolis he entered the banking establishment of Fletcher & Sharpe, and for eight years held the position of teller of the bank. As an independent venture he then started in the seed business, and for six years catered to a large patronage in the sale of wholesale and retail farm and flower seeds. In June of 1886, he came to California and located in Los Angeles, and engaged in the real-estate business for two or three years, and was then employed in the city assessor's office and the office of the tax collector. Following this was his appointment of secretary of the park commissioners to succeed P. A. Howard, a position which he maintained with credit from January of 1895 until January of 1901. This responsibility was resigned at the time to accept the superintendency of the city parks.

The Los Angeles park system, than which no finer exists in the United States, is maintained at a cost of about $60,000 annually, and the number of acres which delight the eye and satisfy the artistic appreciation of the most fastidious is about four thousand. The department was organized in 1889, in which year the State Board of Forestry donated fifty thousand trees, mainly eucalyptus. There are more than five hundred foreign trees and plants in the various parks. Animals also abound, and birds in great variety, many of which have been donated to the city by people interested in these playgrounds of the people. Artificial lakes have been added to collaborate with nature in completing a perfect whole, and these are supplied with water from the river and from the city reservoirs. Twelve parks compose the entire system: Westlake, Eastlake, Elysian, Hollenbeck, Echo, Central, Prospect, Plaza, St. James, South, Griffith, and the City Hall grounds. Of these Westlake park is the most popular in the city, and all that the mind of man can conceive of in landscape gardening is suggested in its most entrancing form. Beautiful and rare trees and flowers, swans and pelicans and storks, rowboats and sailboats, band concerts, fireworks, and special entertainments draw people by the thousands, and hold them with the indefinable charm which surrounds places of this sort in Southern California. It contains thirty-five acres, ten of which are covered by the lake, and is kept up at an annual expenditure of over $10,000. The name of Dr. E. A. Bryant is inseparably associated with this ideal retreat, for he it was who conceived and carried out the first improvements, planted the first tree, and launched the first boat. Eastlake Park, containing fifty-six acres, with a lake of eight acres, has conservatories which cost about $5,000, filled with tropical plants and gorgeous flowers. Throughout the grounds are over three hundred varieties of rare trees, some of them valued as high as $400. Among the plants and flowers in the greenhouses may be mentioned orchids, gloxinias, one hundred varieties of imported Belgian azaleas, and there are over three hundred varieties of cacti. The animals form the nucleus of a really fine zoological collection. Hollenbeck Park was named for Mrs. Hollenbeck who contributed ten of the twenty-six acres comprising the grounds. Here also are many methods of amusement, and the aviaries, in which are kept parrots, canaries, Australian pheasants, quail and large numbers of tropical birds, form an interesting study to the hundreds of visitors. Central Park, in the center of the city, is beautifully improved, and, guarding the main entrance, is the Spanish cannon captured during the war with Spain at Santiago, Cuba, and presented to the city by General Shafter, its captor. Another item of interest in this park is the imposing monument erected by the city in memory of the soldier lads of the Seventh California Infantry who gave their lives for the cause of freedom in Cuba. One of the most interesting of the parks of the city is the Plaza, which was used by the Dons as a public meeting place when Spanish supremacy was acknowledged in California, and here were held the cock-fights and usual Spanish amusements, and here also was the public market place. Close by is the old Mission church, on North Main street, which was founded in 1818. Elysian Park, one of the most notable of the public amusement centers of Los Angeles, contains five hundred and thirty-two acres of land, and enormous sums of money have been spent in its improvement. Fremont Gate and the winding boulevard cost the popular subscription of $27,000, and gave employment to over one hundred men. In the spring of 1889 thirty-seven thousand trees, donated by the State Experimental Station at Santa Monica, were set out at an expense of about $1,800. The nursery department of all the parks is located in the western end of this park, and the Botanical Gardens, at the head of Chavez ravine, contain the most complete collection of rare and beautiful plants and trees to be found in any of the other parks. Here is the tree which has made California the envied of all her sister states, the Sequoia Gigantia, and the Sequoia Sempervirens, or Redwood, as well as the Juniperus Procera, the latter the only specimen ever imported from western Africa. Elysian Park is maintained at a yearly expenditure of $12,000, and twenty men are constantly employed. Besides those mentioned there are Echo Park, with its boats and other means of amusement; Prospect Park, with its rare trees, among them the cinnamon tree and palms; St. James Park, with its one acre of fine improvements; South Park, with its partial improvements, but great promise; Griffith Park, containing three thousand and fifteen acres, donated to the city by Hon. Griffith J. Griffith, and containing many fine specimens of the native live oak trees of California, but which is as yet unimproved; and Sunset Park, also unimproved, and at present used for oil purposes.

Percy O. Buell

H. J. Buell

The marriage of Mr. Mendenhall and Helen McVickers occurred in Indianapolis, Mrs. Mendenhall being a native of Dayton, Ohio, and a daughter of Acher McVickers, a merchant tailor of Indianapolis, and one of the early settlers of that city. Mr. and Mrs. Mendenhall have one child, Edith, who has a decided talent for vocal and instrumental music. Mr. Mendenhall is a staunch Republican, and invariably votes that ticket. He is a charter member of the Indianapolis Board of Trade. Like his ancestors, he is religiously affiliated with the Society of Friends. No more public-spirited man has promoted the all-around well-being of Los Angeles, nor does any enjoy to a fuller extent the confidence and good-will of all who know him.

PERCY O. BUELL. Upon the broad and fertile acres of the old homestead in Chittenden county, Vt., which for more than a century had provided food and shelter for the ancestors of the Buell family, Percy O. Buell was born September 10, 1876. The same rambling and commodious farmhouse had also witnessed the birth of his father, H. J. Buell, who farmed the old place on an extensive scale and brought to perfection its possibilities for growth. In connection also he had a dairy scientifically conducted, and rose to a prominent place, as had his forefathers in Chittenden county. In 1884 he disposed of the landmark with its old-time associations, resigned the office of first selectman and came to Santa Barbara county, Cal., buying a ranch in Montecito valley. He engaged in raising hay and grain with considerable success, and in 1888 bought out Wheeler's store at the Montecito postoffice and worked up a large trade in a general mercantile line, continuing the same until his death, January 15, 1899. The constantly increasing population and demand justified him in enlarging his store from its original 16x20 to 25x60 feet. He was highly esteemed in his adopted county, and his business sagacity and honest dealings caused him to be widely known throughout Southern California. His time was divided between his ranch and store, and his application to business and desire to please won him a deserved success. His marriage to Elsie Whitton, a native of Vermont, was blessed with six children, four of whom are living: Percy O., Ada E., Arthur W. and Lester H. Mrs. Buell is still living, and with her children resides at Montecito.

Of his native state of Vermont Percy O. Buell has little remembrance, for he was a mere boy when his parents came to California. He was educated in the public schools of Santa Barbara county, and while quite young was initiated into the general merchandise business in his father's store. Since the death of the elder Buell he has continued to manage the affairs of the store with gratifying success, and from time to time introduces such modern and improving methods into his business relations with the public as to keep him in touch with the best commercial element of his county. More and more the surrounding agriculturists and home residents are appreciating the benefits in their midst of a well-kept and up-to-date establishment, which thoughtfully supplies their needs at prices compatible with the best interests of all concerned. Mr. Buell is a wide-awake member of society, and has the confidence of all who know him. Fraternally he is a member of the Knights of Pythias, Uniform Rank.

JAMES CLINTON LEWIS. Twenty-five years after he first came to California, Mr. Lewis established his home in Los Angeles, in May, 1895. In September of the same year he purchased from R. W. Wood the mercantile business on Vernon and Central avenues, in South Los Angeles, and he has since conducted a growing and important trade on this corner. During 1901 he erected a business block, 27x90 feet, and two stories in height, in which building he has since carried a large and complete stock of general mercantile supplies. A vacancy occurred in the South Los Angeles post-office in 1895 and he was appointed to fill the same, assuming the duties of the office on the 1st of January, 1896, and holding the commission until this locality was incorporated with Los Angeles proper. Corresponding with this change, the South Los Angeles office became Station K of the Los Angeles office, September 15, 1897, and he was chosen superintendent of the station, which position he has since held, the station now being in his new business block.

In Merthyr-Tydvil, county of Glamorgan, Wales, Mr. Lewis was born July 3, 1856, a son of Thomas and Sarah (Hussey) Lewis, natives respectively of Pembrokeshire and Monmouthshire, England. His mother, who was a daughter of Richard Hussey, died in 1885. His father, who was reared to a seafaring life, but early began to mine in Glamorganshire, came to California via Panama in 1863 and engaged in placer mining for some years, but is now living on a farm in Sierra county. Three of his children are in the same county, the fourth and oldest being James C., of Los Angeles. He began to work in rolling mills when ten years of age. October 6, 1870, he started for California, via New York, Aspinwall and Panama, and after a voyage of six weeks arrived in Sierra county November 17. The following year he attended school for eight months, and this is all the schooling he ever had. From 1872 until the fall of 1876 he clerked for Kleckner Brothers at Port Wine, Sierra county. Next he was employed as bookkeeper in the Bank of Ukiah, in Mendocino county. In 1879 he resigned the latter position and began prospecting at Hayden Hill, Lassen county, Cal., but soon became a clerk at Adin, Modoc county, later acquiring an interest in the business and continuing as part owner for some time. In 1886 he sold his interest, but continued with the new firm for three years, after which, until 1892, he served as justice of the peace, notary public and collector. His next location was Paisley, Ore., where he was clerk in a general store, remaining there until his removal to Los Angeles.

While living in Lassen county, in 1883, Mr. Lewis married Miss Lillie M. Kelley, who was born in Sacramento county, this state. They have one child, Harriet May. At this writing Mr. Lewis is a member of the state Republican central committee, representing the seventy-second assembly district. His connection with the Masonic order dates back to his residence in Ukiah, Cal., when he was made a Mason in Abel Lodge No. 146, F. & A. M. Later he was for two years secretary of Adin Lodge No. 250, and from 1884 to 1889 master of the same. At this writing he is connected with Pentalpha Lodge No. 202. He was raised to the Royal Arch degree in Lassen Chapter No. 47, later was high priest of Acacia Chapter at Adin, and is now a member of Signet Chapter No. 57, R. A. M., in Los Angeles. A further promotion in Masonry made him a Knight Templar in Lassen Commandery No. 13, with which he is still connected.

JOHN LONGAWA. Having been one of the pioneers of California, Mr. Longawa is well posted concerning the development of this state, and no one is more interested than he in its advancement along every line of material, educational and moral progress. He is of Canadian parentage. His father, Paul, who was a native of the province of Ontario, took part in the Canadian rebellion as a McKinzie supporter, and consequently left that country and settled in the states. His last years were passed on a farm near Malone, St. Lawrence county, N. Y., and his wife, Sophia, also a Canadian by birth, died in the east. Of their nine children, four are living, John being the only one of the number in California. He was born on the homestead near Malone, N. Y., March 18, 1842. At the age of twelve years he began to learn the trade of a carriage painter, and in this he continued at home until 1863. On the 12th of July of that year he took a steamer at New York for Aspinwall, then crossed the isthmus, and from there journeyed on the Golden Gate to San Francisco. Immediately after his arrival in California he began to work at his trade. Successively he had shops in Marysville, Sacramento and San Francisco, after which he spent two years in Virginia City, Nev. Returning to Sacramento, he remained there until 1876, at which time he settled in Santa Barbara.

Since coming to this city, Mr. Longawa has been proprietor of a painter's shop, first located on Cañon Perdido, near State street, in a building erected under his supervision; but in 1899 he removed to No. 107 West Cañon Perdido street. In connection with this enterprise, he has a livery business, which he started in 1893 and which he now conducts at the same address with his carriage painting shop. The Club livery is one of the old established enterprises of Santa Barbara, and its proprietor has built up an excellent trade through his uniform reliability of transactions and accommodating disposition. It is said that, while in San Francisco, he was regarded as one of the best carriage painters in all of that city, and his success in striping was so remarkable that he was often called "John the Striper" by the other men in the trade.

The Republican party always receives the stanch support of Mr. Longawa, who is a firm believer in its principles. Fraternaly he is connected with the Independent Order of Foresters and is a charter member of No. 613, B. P. O. E. After coming to Santa Barbara he married Miss Mary Walsh, who was born in Toronto, Canada, and came to this county in 1875. They are the parents of three children: Fred, John and Sophia, the daughter being the wife of Thomas Goux, of Santa Barbara.

CAESAR EUGENE LATAILLADE. Ever since 1892 Mr. Lataillade has represented the third ward of Santa Barbara in the city council, where he is now chairman of the committee on public buildings and the streets and plaza committee. This is not his first experience in municipal affairs, for as early as 1874 he was elected councilman, and re-elected each succeeding year until 1878, when he resigned on going to Europe. During his first year in the council the city hall was erected, and recently he served on the committee that built the water tunnel, the city water works and secured most of the street grading and sidewalk improvements.

