Born in Santa Barbara, December 7, 1849, Mr. Lataillade is a son of Arnaud Cæsar Lataillade, who was born in San Jean de Luce, South France, in 1819, a son of Thomas Lataillade. When eighteen years of age he went to Mexico with two brothers, and, as supercargo of a schooner, worked his way from South America and the Mexican coast to California. His first trip to Santa Barbara was made in 1841, on the brig Choto, with $10,000 worth of goods. On his second trip the value of the goods was $80,000. At various times he acquired ownership of various tracts of land, including the following ranches: La Zaca, four thousand acres; Corralde Quate, thirteen thousand acres; Cuyama (1st) and Cuyama (2d), seventy thousand acres. The two first named ranches he stocked, and in 1848 sold one-half interest to Gaspar Orena, with whom he continued in partnership until his death. December 22, 1848, he was appointed French consul at Monterey by James K. Polk, the then president. April 12, 1849, he was killed by the accidental discharge of a gun. His body was interred in the old mission.

In 1848 a family of thirteen were murdered one night in San Miguel mission by five strangers, two of whom were Germans, one Irishman and two Americans. Word was received by Arnaud C. Lataillade that the men were coming his way. Gathering together fifteen men, he went north a few miles to intercept them, but they escaped by the foothills. On his return to Santa Barbara, he heard that they were passing Montecito. Again summoning the fifteen men, he started in pursuit and overtook them at the present site of Summerland. One of the pursuing party overtook one of the murderers, but, before he could capture him, an American murderer killed him with a shot gun. Another murderer, fleeing, threw himself into the ocean and was drowned. Four were captured, brought to Santa Barbara, confessed their guilt, and were shot on West De la Guerra street, three hundred feet west of State street. In April of the next year, Mr. Lataillade started with one thousand head of cattle for the mines in the north, while his partner, Mr. Orena, was gathering stock. While arranging his affairs here, on the eve of starting, he found one of the chimneys of his gun faulty, so he took a barrel from an old gun that one of the murderers had carried, went with it to a blacksmith and, while the blacksmith was at the forge, he, never supposing the gun was loaded, put the old barrel in the fire. It was discharged into his groin and he died thirty-nine hours afterward.

The mother of our subject was Maria Antonia De la Guerra, who was born in Santa Barbara. After the death of her first husband, she became the wife of Gaspar Orena. She now resides in San Francisco, Cal., but still retains valuable property in Santa Barbara and Ventura counties, an entire block in the city of Santa Barbara, and real estate in Los Angeles. Of her first marriage were born two children now living: Maria Antonia, at home; and Caesar Eugene. Her father, Don Jose Antonio De la Guerra, a native of the north part of Spain and the son of wealthy parents, went to Mexico as a captain in the Spanish army, and in 1801 located in Santa Barbara, Cal., where he married Miss Maria A. Carillo. From the Mexican government he bought a grant to forty-eight thousand acres at San Julian, one hundred thousand acres in Ventura county, and Los Pasos Rancho, having in all over fifty Spanish leagues. He laid out De la Guerra square and built the historic mansion, with plaza, around which cluster so many memories of early days. Here he died in 1858.

In Santa Ynez College and the first free school in Santa Barbara, the subject of this article received his education. He learned the plumber's trade in San Francisco and for eight years carried on a hardware business on State street, Santa Barbara, but finally sold out to Roeder & Ott. In 1878 he visited the Paris Exposition and spent a year in France and Spain, meantime meeting many relatives he had never before seen. After his return he took charge of the property and ranches, but some years later withdrew and in 1885 settled in Santa Barbara, since which time he has been a notary public and dealer in real estate. He is a staunch Democrat and a worker in the county committee.

DANIEL GIBLER. Horticulture is the principal industry of Pomona, and the raising of oranges and lemons the specialty of most residents. Indeed, this statement is true not alone of Pomona and the adjoining villages of Claremont, Spadra, North Pomona, etc., but of the most fertile sections of the entire county of Los Angeles. One of the successful horticulturists of the county is Daniel Gibler, whose orchard lies between Pomona and Claremont. On this place, which is known as Rosemont, he has made his home since December, 1892, meantime busily engaged in the cultivation of the land and the care of his trees. He owns ten acres, a part of which is in oranges, the balance being planted to lemons. He has another orchard of fifteen acres of oranges in San Bernardino county, Cal. His methods of cultivation have proved successful, as is evidenced by the appearance of his land. Besides the management of his property he has been vice president and a director in the Indian Hill Citrus Union, but at present is not officially connected with the same.

THOMAS H. BUCKMASTER. This prominent walnut grower, builder and contractor, and vice-president of the Home Oil Company, came to Whittier in August, 1894, and has since conducted the various enterprises in which he is interested in a way which reflects credit upon himself and the community in which his lot is cast.

Among the vast number of resources of California may be mentioned the quite recent discovery of oil, which has opened yet another avenue of industry and speculation for the dwellers in this state of plenty. Mr. Buckmaster became interested in the departure almost at its inception and was one of the organizers and incorporators of the Home Oil Company, and is at this writing vice-president of the same. For the first year he served as manager and has since been a member of the board of directors. On his ranch in East Whittier are grown walnuts and oranges, and as an horticulturist and walnut grower he has been very successful. Fraternally he is associated with the Ancient Order of United Workmen. With his family he is a member of, and active worker in, the Methodist Episcopal Church. He is regarded as one of Whittier's reliable and progressive citizens, and during his sojourn here has won the confidence and esteem of all who know him.

W. H. LAYNE. As one of the walnut growers near Saticoy, Mr. Layne has been identified with the interests of the Santa Clara valley since he came here from Texas in 1891. He was born in Washington county, Texas, August 10, 1850, and is a son of Robert and Martha (Thompson) Layne, natives respectively of Missouri and Alabama. In 1836 his father became a pioneer of Texas, settling in Washington county and taking up a tract of land, to the cultivation of which he devoted his remaining years. While he was still a young man his life work was ended. His wife had settled in Texas before the war for Texas independence, and her brother, Ancil Thompson, died while a soldier in the Texan army.

Such education as was possible to obtain from local schools Mr. Layne enjoyed when a boy in his native county. However, his education has been obtained principally in the great school of experience. When starting out for himself, he settled on a ranch of fourteen hundred acres, where he engaged in raising sheep and selling wool. From a small flock he increased his sheep until they numbered twenty-five hundred head. In 1891 he came to California and settled in Ventura county, buying a walnut orchard of forty-two acres. The trees which were then a year old, were of the Santa Barbara soft shell variety. Since coming here he has acquired a thorough knowledge of walnut-growing, and has been an active worker in the Saticoy Walnut Growers' Association. Much of his time has been devoted to the improvement of his property. He makes his home on the ranch, where he has a small, but cozy and comfortable house. Water for all purposes is supplied by a private water plant of twenty horse-power gasoline engine, furnishing twenty-four miners' inches.

The marriage of Mr. Layne united him with Miss Lulu Goode, who was born in Lake Charles, La. They are the parents of three sons, namely: William Robert, who is a graduate of the class of 1900, Ventura high school, and now attends the Mark Hopkins Institute of Art, a branch of the California State University; Louis Walker and Edwin Forrest, who are at home.

In educational matters Mr. Layne is active, being now a member of the board of trustees of the grammar school in Saticoy and the high school at Ventura. Politically he is a Democrat. One of the local enterprises with which he is connected as a director is the Saticoy Co-operative Store. Fraternally he is a member of Ventura Lodge, F. & A. M. In religious views he is a Presbyterian, and the church of that denomination in Saticoy has the benefit of his services as a trustee.

HENRY N. RYAN. To attain to so honored a place in the community as has Henry N. Ryan is to live worthily and improve the opportunities within reach of one's ability and industry. Without doubt the surroundings of his youth had much to do with formulating those principles of truth and honesty which are the keynote of his character and which have helped him in surmounting difficulties and attaining to his desires. A native of St. Charles county, Mo., Mr. Ryan was born in December of 1825, his father, Henry, being a native of Ireland, and his mother, Catherine (Smelser) Ryan, a native of Georgia. Henry Ryan settled in Missouri at a very early day, and after his son's birth the family removed to St. Louis, which at that time was but a little village with no immediate prospects of developing into a city. After two years they returned to St. Charles county, Mo., which continued to be their home until Henry N. was about eleven years of age. After removing to Alton, Ill., the parents died, and Henry N., then but twelve years old, faced the problem of self-support. He manfully put his shoulder to the wheel of necessity and applied himself to learning the trade of harness-making, thereafter working at the same until 1847.

In the hope of finding a better field for the future Mr. Ryan removed from Illinois to Independence, Mo., and was diligently applying his trade when the war with Mexico broke out. As became a loyal youth he enlisted in the war in Company A., Donaldson's regiment, Captain Waldo commanding, and went to Mexico by way of Santa Fe, returning through Texas. While in the service he participated in the battle of Sacramento and several others, and the regiment was at El Paso for a month, eventually being discharged at New Orleans. After the war Mr. Ryan returned to Independence, Mo., where he opened a shop, which was sold out before many months in order that he might join a friend in an overland trip to California. Mr. Moody and himself got together the necessary provisions, a wagon and a team of oxen, and started out, their journey being enlivened by meeting a train of emigrants whose destination was similar to their own. However, they left the train behind, and when yet many miles from their goal Mr. Ryan left Mr. Moody and the oxen, came on ahead, worked two weeks for some money with which to defray necessary expenses, then walked back a hundred miles to rejoin the oxen and his friend. They staid at Feather river and engaged in mining until 1853, when Mr. Ryan came to Santa Cruz and began ranching, continuing that occupation with good results until 1876, when he settled in Lompoc. In one year alone in Santa Cruz he raised six thousand sacks of potatoes, but was unable to sell a bushel.

In the mean time Mr. Ryan had many times visited Lompoc, and had on one of his trips invested in eighty acres of land. This, and later purchases amounting in all to two hundred and twenty acres, in three ranches, is still in his possession, although the country property is all rented out. He has a beautiful southern home on the corner of Ocean avenue and L street, Lompoc, built a few years ago, with every idea of comfort and convenience, and he also has another house in the town, besides other town property.

In Santa Cruz, in 1866, Mr. Ryan married Mary Seitz, who was born in New York state, and of this union there was one child, a daughter, who died at the age of nineteen years. In national politics Mr. Ryan is a Democrat, and first voted for Zachariah Taylor. He has never desired political office, his numerous interests taking up all of his time and attention.

FRANK KAHLES. The genial and enterprising manager of the Crocker-Sperry ranch at Montecito, has had an extended career as an horticulturist, agriculturist and landscape gardener, and thoroughly understands every department of the work to which he is devoting his life. He is a native of Bavaria, Germany, and in that country learned the art of landscape gardening. Upon immigrating to America in 1871, his services were utilized by the most exclusive and particular appreciators of his art in New York, and he laid out the grounds for D. A. Kane, afterwards being superintendent for H. Have-meyer on Long Island. This position he filled for ten years, and then came to California, where he was at first employed as head gardener for Charles Crocker in San Francisco, having full charge of his grounds wherever located. In 1895 he came to his present home at Montecito.

The Crocker-Sperry ranch consists of three hundred acres, the greater portion of which is devoted to lemon culture, the whole comprising the largest lemon ranch in Santa Barbara county. Mr. Kahles is in complete charge of the growing, shipping, packing and selling, and all of the work is done on the ranch. His wide knowledge of horticultural matters has brought him prominently before the public, and has resulted in his appointment as president of the Santa Barbara Horticultural Society. His work in connection with the ranch of which he has charge has been truly remarkable, for when it came under his management it was very much run down and in a discouraging condition. He has placed it on a paying basis, and transformed it into a model of its kind without a superior in the county. He is the inventor of the distillate spray, a device for removing the scale from the trees, and which is now recommended by the state board of horticulture.

In fraternal circles Mr. Kahles is connected with the Knights of Pythias lodge of New York, the Independent Order of Odd Fellows in San Francisco, the Masonic blue lodge in San Francisco, the Royal Arch Chapter and Knights Templar Commandery at Santa Barbara.

JOHN CHARLES FREMONT. The celebrated "Pathfinder," whose name gained world-wide fame during the nineteenth century, was born in Savannah, Ga., January 1, 1813, being a son of John Charles and Anne B. (Whiting) Fremont, natives respectively of France and Virginia. During boyhood he lived with his widowed mother at Charleston, S. C. From 1833 to 1835 he was a teacher of mathematics on the sloop-of-war Natchez, and later became assistant to Capt. W. G. Williams of the United States topographical engineers. In 1838 he explored the country north of the Missouri river. July 8, 1838, he was commissioned second lieutenant of the topographical engineer corps. October 19, 1841, he married Jessie, daughter of United States Senator Thomas H. Benton of Missouri. May 2, 1842, he left Washington, D. C., in charge of an expedition to survey beyond the Rocky Mountains by the south pass, and explored the Wind river mountains. One of the members of the expedition was Kit Carson.

In May of 1843, with thirty-nine men, Mr. Fremont set out to find a path to the Pacific ocean. September 6, 1843, they came in view of Great Salt Lake. In the depth of winter they crossed into the California valley. Early in March of 1844 they reached Sutter's Fort in Sacramento, and on the 24th of the same month started back, reaching Kansas July 1, 1844. The third expedition in which General Fremont was engaged took place in 1845 and brought him to Monterey, the old capital of California, whence he proceeded to Tiamath Lake. Receiving orders from Washington to defend the United States interests in California and to protect American settlers, he acted so promptly that in a short time he had wrested Northern California from Mexican rule. July 4, 1846, he was elected governor of California. January 13, 1847, he concluded articles of capitulation with the Mexicans by the treaty of Cahuenga, which left the territory in the possession of the United States. In 1849 he was elected United States Senator from California and took his seat September 10, 1850, the day after California was admitted as a state. At the expiration of his term he and his family spent two years in Europe.

The fifth expedition of General Fremont across the continent to California began in September of 1853. Three years later he was made the champion of a new political party whose rallying cry was "Free soil, free speech, freedom and Fremont." At the Republican national convention of June, 1856, he was nominated for president. In 1858 he returned to California. At the outbreak of the Civil war he was made major-general, in command of the western department of the regular army, with headquarters in St. Louis. In March of 1862 President Lincoln gave him command of the mountain district of Virginia, Kentucky and Tennessee. In 1878 he was appointed governor of Arizona, which office he held for three years. In 1890 he was made a major-general of the regular army by act of congress. His death occurred July 13, 1890, while on a temporary visit in New York City. During the same year his widow was granted a special pension by congress. Another gift, indicative of the regard in which she was held, came to her from the women of California, being a charming residence in Los Angeles, where she still resides.

The memories of Mrs. Jessie Benton Fremont extend back to the early days of Washington history. When thirteen years old she attended a dinner at the White House, given by President Van Buren in honor of his son. A year later she attended a great state dinner given by the president in honor of the Russian minister, Bodisco the Splendid, and his sixteen-year-old bride. This marriage between a bridegroom of sixty-five and his young bride was the most gorgeous ceremony Washington had ever witnessed, and Jessie Benton was one of the bridesmaids, Mr. Buchanan (afterward president) being the attending groomsman. At the age of sixteen she eloped with John C. Fremont, whom she married in opposition to the wishes of her father; however, the latter soon relented and welcomed the young couple back to his home and affection. When she decided to join her husband in California in 1848, she sailed from New York for Panama, encountering many perils and hardships. Every sort of unexpected misfortune overtook her, but with splendid courage she persisted in her purpose of joining her husband, of whom she had received no news for months. She was more dead than alive when finally she reached San Francisco, where she had the joy of seeing her husband there to greet her. Of California as she found it in those days, she tells entertainingly in a little volume, entitled, "A Year of American Travel." Others of her well-known works are "Souvenirs of My Time," "A Sketch of Senator Fremont," "Story of the Guard" and "Will and Way Stories." At this writing she is engaged in the preparation of her autobiography, in which will be fascinating glimpses of a romantic and picturesque past.

CRAWFORD P. TEAGUE. As early as the fall of 1878, when the now flourishing town of San Dimas was known as Mud Springs, Mr. Teague, with two of his sons, settled at this place, becoming a pioneer of a new and unimproved section of country. He was at the time a member of the Mound City Land and Water Association, located at Azusa, which had purchased over four thousand acres of the Dalton homestead at Azusa and an undivided one-third interest in the San José rancho; also the addition in the San José rancho, making 13,666 acres. The corporation made the first payment of $35,000 on the land, and then, within a year after buying the property, went into liquidation. Being thus thrown upon his own resources, Mr. Teague leased a tract of land at Mud Springs (now San Dimas), on which he remained for some years. In the spring of 1887 he purchased thirty acres, a part of the old San José tract, and to the development of this he gave his attention, setting out a large number of citrus fruit trees and paying close attention to their care and growth. Since 1881 he has been a resident of San Dimas.

JOHN LANE. A master workman, Mr. Lane has the reputation of being one of the most practical and successful plumbers in Southern California. The many intricate phases of his particular occupation, upon which depend the general health of a city and the existence or non-existence of sanitary conditions, have been studied by this artisan, who, with his fellow workers, is entitled to credit for his intelligent comprehension of the occupation.

A native of Cardiff, Wales, Mr. Lane was born December 9, 1858, and is the youngest son in a family of seven children, of whom five are living. His father, Thomas, was born in Bristol, England, and was a chain maker by occupation. In this connection he was associated with some interesting undertakings, among others being the fact that he manufactured the chain which successfully launched the Great Eastern, at the time the greatest craft ever floated upon the waters. He immigrated to America in 1869, and brought his family via Panama to California, where his death occurred at Haywards, Alameda county. He married Elizabeth Spriggs, who was also born in Bristol, and who is now living in Oakland, Cal.

John Lane came to America with the rest of the family, and upon settling in California, received his education and home training at Haywards. At the age of fifteen he was apprenticed to a plumber and tinsmith for three years, and afterwards continued to work for the firm for four years. He was then employed by the Pacific Improvement Company, that built the Southern Pacific Railroad at Salida, and as teamster worked all the way down to King City. He was then sent to Saugus as teamster for a month, and in 1881 located in Los Angeles in the employ of the plumber, A. H. Langley. In 1885 he located in Ventura in the plumbing business, and has ever since had charge of all the principal city work in his line. He was for a time engaged with Charlebois & Co., as foreman of their plumbing department, but resigned that position in 1900, and started the business of Lane & Brown, with offices located at the corner of Santa Clara and California avenues. The firm have charge of all the sewer work of the city, and have managed the plumbing in the large buildings and principal residences.

In Los Angeles Mr. Lane married Lucy E. Tappiner, a native of San Francisco. Of this union there is one child, Bessie. Mr. Lane is associated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and the Independent Order of Foresters, in which latter organization he is a past officer. He is a member of the board of trade, and of the State Association of Master Plumbers. He owns considerable property in Ventura, and has just finished building his fourth residence. His efforts and admirable traits of character have gained for him many friends, and the good will and esteem of the community in which he lives.

ROBERT McFADDEN. Although a many-sided projector, the commercial standing of Mr. McFadden is best gauged by his interest in the lumber business, in the pursuit of which the greater part of his life has been spent. As the general manager of the Newport Wharf & Lumber Company, of which he was one of the incorporators and chief promoters, he exerts a wide influence upon the trade throughout the region affected by his jurisdiction, and is one of the best informed men on the subject in the state. His first experience in the line was acquired at a comparatively young age in his native state of New York, where he was born in Delaware county August 25, 1845. Of Scotch ancestry, his parents, John and Effie (Lamont) McFadden, were natives of Scotland, and were successful, well-to-do people in the country of their adoption.

After removing to California Mr. McFadden was for a number of years a member of the firm of McFadden Brothers, lumber dealers and shippers, and later on engaged independently in the lumber business. While in partnership with his brothers the firm facilitated their business by building the steamer Newport, which was used for many years as a freighter plying between Newport and San Francisco, and was known as a reliable and safe seagoing craft. During his residence in Santa Ana Mr. McFadden has at times been interested extensively in real estate, particularly during the early growing years of the town. In furthering the interests of the town he became one of the incorporators and builders of the Newport Railroad, running between Santa Ana and Newport, and from the latter place to what is now Smeltzer Station in the peat lands. Of this railroad company he served as a director and vice-president for several years. Interesting to note is the fact that this pioneer lumberman of the region bored the first artesian well in what is now Orange county, which at the time was justly regarded as an important advance in the development of the limited water supply. The well is located two miles south of Santa Ana, and was the forerunner of many similar borings through erstwhile baked and parched soil.

Scarcely an opportunity afforded in Orange county seems to have escaped the practical attention of Mr. McFadden. He is a scientific horticulturist, and besides oranges, raises English walnuts, and owns a productive vineyard. A dairy is among his well-managed and profitable ventures, as well as a farm devoted to general agriculture. In a city where beautiful homes are the rule rather than the exception, his own residence is one of the finest and most attractive.

MAJOR GEORGE H. BONEBRAKE was born in Eaton, Preble county, Ohio. His early years were spent upon the ancestral farm, and he attended the village school two or three months each winter. When seventeen he entered the Otterbein University at Westerville. After six years of hard study he was graduated, and so proficient was he in Latin and Greek, German and French, that he was immediately elected professor of languages in an academy in a neighboring town. A man not possessed of great ambition would have found enough in the duties of his position to absorb all his energies. Prof. Bonebrake found time simultaneously to study law. In 1862 he volunteered as a private in an Indiana infantry regiment. By the close of the war the private had won his way to be major of his regiment, with the brevet of lieutenant-colonel.

Major Bonebrake returned to Indianapolis and formed a law partnership with his former instructor under the style of Brown & Bonebrake. About the same time he married a former schoolmate, Miss Emma Locke. In 1869 he was made cashier of the Citizens' Bank at Noblesville, Ind. He held this position until 1878, when, consumption attacking the health of Mrs. Bonebrake, the family came to California, hoping the climate might restore her. The hope was vain. The insidious disease had obtained too firm a hold; she declined little by little, finally dying. In accordance with her request, she was laid to rest beneath California's sunny skies.

Too energetic of mind to be idle long, Major Bonebrake soon went into business with all the intensity of his nature, and for nearly twenty years he stood in the foremost ranks of the little army of courageous and enterprising men who have so marvelously developed the resources of this section and built up the city of Los Angeles. Away back in the early '80s he was instrumental in tearing away the old shanties at the corner of Spring and First streets and replacing them with the handsome bank building. Directly afterward he was the main spirit in replacing the old Spring street brick school with the magnificent Bryson-Bonebrake block. During all this time he was one of the active financiers of this section. His masterly hand was busy in organizing bank after bank in the towns as they have grown and multiplied, until he became a director in half a score of these institutions, being vice president of most of them, as well as president of the Los Angeles National. Every bank which had the advantages of his wise direction proved a gratifying success. Meantime he established carriage repositories all the way from here to Puget Sound. He was also a successful patron of horticulture, planting, owning and supervising numerous groves of walnuts, olives, lemons and oranges.

JONATHAN BAILEY. To Mr. Bailey belongs the distinction of being the first settler of what is now Whittier. As president of the Pickering Land and Water Company he came to the present site of the town in May, 1887, and established his home in the midst of a field of barley, his nearest neighbor being two miles distant. He continued as president of the company for two years and for some years afterward officiated as vice-president, in both of which capacities he did much to secure the development of the place and interest people in investing in property here. Naturally, therefore, he has a wide acquaintance throughout this section of the state. His first trip to California was made in 1875, when he brought an invalid son, E. F. Bailey, to this state, hoping that the change of climate might prove beneficial, and the result proved that the step was a wise one. Four years later he again came to the Pacific coast, remaining for a short time. His permanent removal to the state was in 1885, and for two years he resided in Los Angeles, after which he came to his present home in Whittier. Since then he has been identified with many of the movements originated to promote the welfare of the town.

JOHN G. PRELL. It is with a feeling of justifiable pride that Mr. Prell narrates his experiences in the early days of the Santa Maria valley, of which he was one of the first settlers and in which he built the first house. When he first came here in 1868 he took up a quarter section of land, six other people having taken up the same amount. However, no one had as yet built a house, and he paid a man $35 to haul sufficient lumber for a cottage from San Luis Obispo. November 7, 1868, the home was ready for occupancy, and the following year the family took possession. From then until the present time Mr. Prell has demonstrated his right to be accounted one of the most substantial and public-spirited citizens of this part of Santa Barbara county, his industry and correct knowledge of farming having been rewarded with unflinching crops and a corresponding reward for labor invested. To his original purchase of a quarter section have since been added varying amounts from time to time, so that now he owns five hundred and sixty acres of land, all tillable, and devoted largely to beets, beans, barley and general produce, as well as stock-raising. The whole constitutes as fine a property as one would care to see, with a commodious and comfortable home, equally convenient and modern barns, and the best procurable implements on the market.

A native of Germany, Mr. Prell was born in Prussia February 5, 1837, and was reared on a farm and educated in the public schools. At the age of fifteen he was apprenticed for three years to learn the trade of cooper, and when eighteen years of age accompanied his mother, three brothers and one sister to America, his father having died in 1855. They settled on a farm near South Bend, Ind., where John G. worked at brick molding, being one of the youngest in the family, a fact which necessitated his leaving the parental roof to hustle for himself. In 1860 he became possessed of the westward fever, and of the possibilities of mining near Pike's Peak, Colo., but his success there was not such as to justify him in experimenting in mining for more than a few months. Going further west he engaged in placer mining near Placerville for a short time, and later, in the quest for a desirable permanent location, visited San Francisco and San José. In the spring of 1861 he went to Los Angeles and was there one summer, when it had but three brick buildings—the Temple block, Presbyterian Church and United States District court. He returned to San José, where he remained until the spring of 1866. Overcome with longing for the familiar faces of his family near South Bend, Ind., he repaired thither and bought a farm in Jasper county, Mo., hoping to there realize his expectations for a prosperous and comfortable home. Somewhat disappointed in this regard, he retraced his steps to California in 1867, and the following year settled in the Santa Maria valley, as heretofore stated.

At Rolla, Mo., Mr. Prell married Eliza Powers, a native of Ohio, and to this couple were born four children: John S.; Lillie, now Mrs. Cook, of the Santa Maria valley; Blanche and Laura, who are at home. A Republican in politics, Mr. Prell departed from the traditions of his party during the last election on account of his affiliation with the free silver platform and voted the Democratic ticket. For nearly forty years he has been a Mason, having joined that organization in Santa Clara, and he has been a member of the Odd Fellows since 1858. In religious belief he is a Unitarian.

FRANK M. CHAPMAN, of Covina, is a native of Illinois, having been born in Macomb, McDonough county, of that state, on the first day of the year 1849. He is the eldest of a large family of children born to Sidney S. and Rebecca Jane Chapman. His father was born in Ashtabula county, Ohio, in 1826, and was a descendant of one of three brothers who came from England to Massachusetts about 1650. He went to Macomb when a young man, and in 1846 was united in marriage with Rebecca Jane Clarke, the eldest daughter of David and Eliza (Russell) Clarke, natives of Kentucky and early pioneers of central Illinois.

Mr. Chapman's boyhood was passed at Macomb. Here he attended the common schools and engaged in various occupations until he answered the last call made by President Lincoln for soldiers. He enlisted in Company C, One Hundred and Thirty-seventh Illinois Infantry. Though a mere boy in years he was accepted, and with his regiment went south, where he remained until after the close of the war, when he was honorably discharged.

Upon his return home Mr. Chapman engaged at clerking in a store until 1868, when he went to the neighboring town of Vermont and engaged in business for himself. After the great fire at Chicago in 1871, there being a great demand for bricklayers in that city, and having learned that trade with his father, who was a builder, he went there, and for a while was foreman for a large building firm. Then for a time he engaged in building and contracting in that city, when he again drifted into mercantile life. This he followed with varying success until he began the study of medicine. Entering the Bennett Medical College in Chicago, he was graduated with the class of 1877.

Though by nature well adapted for the medical profession, yet a business life seemed more attractive to Mr. Chapman; at least it offered a better outlook for getting on in the world. We therefore soon find him closing his Chicago office and joining his brother Charles at Galesburg, Ill., and engaging in the publishing business. This enterprise proved successful, and with his brother he was soon able to return to Chicago and start a publishing house. Prosperity attended this enterprise and the business grew until Chapman Brothers (as the firm was known) erected their own building and owned a large printing plant. For a dozen years the firm of Chapman Brothers did an extensive and prosperous printing and publishing business, at the same time erecting several large buildings in Chicago. The firm invested heavily in hotel enterprises during the World's Fair held in that city, and, as is well known, the financial panic of 1893 crippled the great fair and likewise every enterprise in any way dependent upon it.

On the 2d of December, 1894, Mr. Chapman landed with his family in California, taking up his residence in Los Angeles. Here he lived for a year, when he came to the Palmetto ranch at Covina. Since taking up his residence here he has been identified with almost every local enterprise inaugurated by its people, and is regarded as one of the substantial and highly respected citizens of the community.

Mr. Chapman was united in marriage with Miss Wilhelmina Zillen in 1886. To them have been born four children: Frank M., Jr., born July 17, 1888; Grant, June 11, 1891; Grace, October 18, 1895; and Clarke, February 21, 1898. Mrs. Chapman was born in Friedrichstadt, Schleswig-Holstein, Germany, July 2, 1861. She is the daughter of Wilhelm Ferdinand and Louise (Fencke) Zillen, and came with her father to the United States in 1866.

Politically Mr. Chapman has been a life-long Republican, and has taken more or less active part in politics. He has been sent as a delegate to various county and state conventions, and was elected to represent the twenty-fifth ward in the Chicago city council.

WILLIAM D. ELLIS. The history of the dwellers of the San Gabriel valley would be incomplete without mention of William D. Ellis, who, although not one of the old residents of the locality, is one of the best-known and most influential. He owns a ranch one mile west of San Dimas, consisting of thirty acres, devoted principally to orange culture. On this place he has made his home since 1896, meantime giving his attention closely to its improvement.

The year 1883 found Mr. Ellis in Pomona, Cal., which at that time was a mere hamlet, with a few scattered houses here and there and with no noticeable prospects for the future. He was one of the pioneers to whom the city owed its first start and the fact that it is now in so flourishing a condition. In 1896 he moved to San Dimas and settled on the ranch he now owns and cultivates. He was one of the prime movers in organizing the Artesian Belt Water Company, in which he is now a director.

GEORGE H. WATERS. While much of the fruit raised in California is shipped to the market in its fresh state, it has been found impossible to get the entire products to the distant points of shipment before the process of decay begins. Hence, the canning and drying of fruit has become one of the most important industries of the state. It is this occupation which Mr. Waters successfully follows. He is the principal member of the firm of G. H. Waters & Co., of Pomona, who have made a specialty of the following brands of canned goods: Orange Blossom, Mocking Bird, Chrysanthemum and California Poppy. In addition to these brands, which are their leaders, they have nine other brands on the market, most of their product being sold in eastern cities. During the busy canning season they furnish employment to about four hundred hands, which makes their industry one of the largest of its kind in all of this fruit-growing region.

JOHN ROWLAND, a pioneer of Los Angeles county, was born in Maryland, and in early manhood settled in New Mexico, where, as a partner of William Workman, he engaged in mining at Taos. In 1841 he and his partner set out for California, in company with John Tete, Santiago Martinez, Thomas Belarde and others. The next year they returned to Taos for their families. On coming to California the second time they were accompanied by B. D. Wilson, D. W. Alexander, John Reed, William Perdue and Samuel Carpenter, all of whom became residents of Los Angeles county. Rowland & Workman obtained a grant of La Puente rancho, comprising forty-eight thousand acres, and there they settled and spent the balance of their lives.

In 1869 Messrs. Rowland and Workman divided their rancho and about a year afterward Mr. Rowland settled up his estate and divided the ranch among his heirs, giving to each about three thousand acres of land and one thousand head of cattle. His last years were spent on the ranch, and he died at the old homestead, October 14, 1873, aged eighty-two years.

CHARLES J. VERNON is associated with some of the enterprises that are contributing to the prosperity and progress of Whittier. Coming to this place as early as 1887, he was a pioneer in the establishment of new industries in the then new village and erected the second store building that was put up here. Forming a partnership with his brother, W. A., under the firm name of Vernon Brothers, he embarked in a general mercantile business, and the partnership continued actively until 1891. Meantime, in 1888, he established the Whittier cannery, and organized the company having charge of the plant, he himself being chosen secretary of this company. After three years in the office of secretary, in 1891 he was made manager of the plant. In 1893 the name was changed from its corporate title of Whittier Canning Company to the Whittier Cannery, under which title business was transacted until 1900, when it became a part of the California Fruit Cannery Association. At the time the name was changed he was made manager of the new concern, and from 1893 to 1900 he served as manager of the Whittier Cannery. During the latter year he was given a similar position with the California Fruit Cannery Association. Under his able supervision the canning business grew from an output of eleven hundred cans the first year to about one million and five hundred thousand cans in 1899, constituting three hundred and seventy-five car loads of canned goods. During the busy season employment is furnished to about six hundred hands.

G. B. TAYLOR. A native of Huntsville, Ala., Mr. Taylor was fourteen years of age when he accompanied his father, John E., from that point to East Tennessee. Near Chattanooga, that state, on the 4th of July, 1846, he married Miss Nancy A. Donohue, who was born in Monroe county, Tenn., her father, Charles, having come there in an early day from his birthplace near Rockbridge, Va. Her grandfather, Capt. James Donohue, a native of Ireland and a captain in the Revolutionary war, belonged to that class of pioneers and Indian fighters to whose fortitude and dauntless courage the development of our country is due. In the development of his plantation in Monroe county success came to Charles Donohue. Large crops rewarded his painstaking industry and wise judgment, and in 1844 he raised the largest quantity of produce of any planter in Tennessee. As the years passed by he accumulated thousands of acres of land and hundreds of slaves. His cattle "fed upon a thousand hills." He counted his possessions in land and stock almost as far as his eye could scan from his comfortable plantation house. Politics, too, engaged his attention, and he was a prominent Democratic leader. During Indian fights he served as major. Though himself a man of peaceable disposition, yet the destruction of property by the savages and the murder of helpless women and children roused his instant wrath, and he left no stone unturned to rid the neighborhood of these miscreants. To his attractive southern home came prominent men from all sections, who were glad to accept his hospitality and to consult with him concerning measures of moment. Possessing the hospitable disposition that is pre-eminently a southern trait, his latchstring always hung on the outside, and there was a glad welcome for everyone, whether stranger or friend, whether rich or poor. His life was not prolonged to old age, but ended when his daughter, Nannie, was eleven years of age. His wife, Margaret, who was born in Rockbridge, Va., and died in Tennessee, was a daughter of Capt. Joseph Ware, an officer in the Revolutionary war and a pioneer settler of Monroe county, Tenn.

In a family of twelve children, ten of whom attained maturity and two are living, Mrs. Taylor was the youngest and the only one to settle on the Pacific coast. She was born May 11, 1831, and in childhood attended female seminaries at Athens, Madisonville and Cleveland, remaining in school until her marriage to Mr. Taylor, who was at the time a resident of Hamilton county, Tenn., near Lookout mountain. After a short time there and a year in DeKalb county, in 1850 they settled in Cook county, Tex., but suffering from fever there they soon removed to San Antonio. In 1852 they started for California, coming by the Nicaragua route. After two years in Sonora they went to what is now Merced county and settled upon a large stock farm, later removing to Tulare county and thence to San Luis Obispo, where they engaged very successfully in cattle and sheep-ranching for eleven years. In 1870 Mr. Taylor moved his stock through Ventura county to Rock Creek, Los Angeles county, but the following year took the herds and flocks to Ventura county and purchased the Canon Diablo grant, comprising nine thousand five hundred and twenty-two acres, with six miles of coast frontage and containing over six hundred acres of tillable land. Here he found fine grazing for the stock and was enabled to successfully prosecute the business of a stockman. The ranch is as fine as can be found in the county and contains improvements that greatly enhance its value, besides having deposits of asphaltum of superior quality. On this place Mr. Taylor died January 1, 1897, and the following year the sheep and cattle were sold, since which time Mrs. Taylor has rented the ranch and made her home in Ventura. Among her property interests is one-half ownership in the Collins & Taylor block, the largest and finest business building in the city, and in addition she owns other property. She is the mother of three children, of whom the daughter, Mrs. Alice Grubb, resides in Carpinteria, while the sons, Charles and Edward, are in Ventura.

During the long period of Mrs. Taylor's residence in California she has witnessed remarkable changes. A half century has passed since the vessel on which she sailed cast anchor at the Golden Gate. Few of the pioneers of early days remain to enjoy the prosperity of the present, and those few find a source of enjoyment in meetings of the California Pioneers' Society. Mrs. Taylor is identified with this association and interested in its work. Though many years have elapsed since she left the home of her youth, she shows the effects of southern training and ancestry. Intensely devoted to the country of her forefathers, she takes a just pride in the hospitality, the chivalry, warm-hearted kindness and culture that gives the southerner prestige throughout the world and makes a visit to a typical southern home an event never to be forgotten.

REV. EDWARD P. GRIFFITH. Occupying a conspicuous position among the Roman Catholic priests in Southern California is Father Griffith, who, in December, 1899, received the appointment of rector of St. Boniface Church in Anaheim, St. Joseph's Church in Santa Ana and St. Anthony's Church in Yorba, since which time he has devoted his attention closely to the oversight of these three charges, maintaining his residence in Anaheim. The churches are doing excellent work and have the usual sodalities and other organizations, including St. Boniface Association at Anaheim and St. Joseph's Society at Santa Ana. In addition, there is an orphan asylum for boys at Anaheim, which has about two hundred boys, under the oversight of fourteen Dominican sisters. A large academy and dormitory have been erected to provide for the physical comfort and the mental training of the lads, who are being reared under the most painstaking supervision and with every effort to prepare them for life's activities.

In Clare-Morris, County Mayo, Ireland, Father Griffith was born November 29, 1866, a son of Martin and Ann (Noone) Griffith, also natives of Mayo and still residents of that county. The mother is a daughter of Michael Noone, a farmer, and the father was both a farmer and a merchant, and for a time acted as superintendent of the county poor farm. The national schools at Clare-Morris furnished Edward P. Griffith the rudiments of his education. At an early age he displayed unusual mental gifts and it was therefore decided to give him special advantages. For five years he was a student in St. Jarlath's College in Galloway, Ireland, where he completed the classical course, and then for four years he studied philosophy and theology in Maynooth's College in County Kildare. He was ordained to the priesthood of the Roman Catholic Church in Dublin, Ireland, at All Hallows' College, by Rt.-Rev. Bishop Donnelley, and was at once assigned to the Los Angeles diocese.

After coming to the United States Father Griffith was for a year assistant pastor of the San Bernardino Church and later filled a similar position in San Luis Obispo for a year. Next he was transferred to the Church of the Nativity of the Blessed Virgin at Visalia, where he remained as assistant pastor for two years and as pastor for another two years, meantime also ministering to St. Luis' Church in Tulare. From there he came to his present charges, in the oversight of which his time is fully occupied.

HOMER W. JUDSON, a successful horticulturist and walnut grower, and president of the Los Nietos and Ranchito Walnut Growers' Association, is a native of Bristol, Elkhart county, Ind., where he was born May 2, 1848. His parents, Lemon and Philena (Bacon) Judson, were natives of Vermont. In 1856 the family moved from Indiana to California and cast their lot with the very early settlers of Sonoma county, and engaged in farming and stock-raising. Here Homer W. was reared on his father's farm, and educated in the public schools of the county. In the fall of 1875 he left Northern California for what is now called Orange county, and settled at Tustin, where he lived until 1887, busily engaged in growing oranges and apricots. He soon after moved to Los Angeles county, on the ranch which is at present his home. Of the one hundred and forty acres, about one hundred acres are under English walnuts. Mr. Judson takes great pride in his well-developed ranch, and is entitled to vast credit for the perfection of its management.

Mr. Judson married Martha Stanley, of Sonoma county, Cal., and of this union there were seven children, six of whom are living. In political matters Mr. Judson is a Republican, and has been identified with many of the enterprises for the improvement of his town and county. Greatly interested in education, he has served for several terms as a member of the school board and as trustee of the Pico school district. He is also a director of the Los Nietos Irrigating Company, and secretary and treasurer as well as director of the Rincon Irrigation Company.

DEWITT L. DAVENPORT. Since February, 1886, Mr. Davenport has been a resident of Pomona. Arriving here, he bought land and set out an orange grove. The following year his family joined him. During the years that have since passed he has gained a thorough knowledge of the raising of fruit, particularly oranges (his specialty), and it is said that no one in the entire county is more successful in this industry than he. His first purchase consisted of two tracts of land, one of which is now owned by Alexander Moncrieff, and the other is owned by H. B. Hottel and S. W. Arbuthnot. Later he bought some land at Cucamonga, which he afterward traded for his present property, and another piece of property near by. The latter he gave, as part payment, to Mr. Joy for his

P. B. Cool

Glendora ranch, and this property he sold a year after its purchase to C. C. Warren. In 1892 he bought a sixty-acre ranch in San Diego county, on which he set out forty acres to olives, peaches and prunes. This property he has since sold. In 1897 he bought from J. C. Callicott a nine-acre ranch on the Kingsley tract, near his home place. He now owns and cultivates fifty-five acres of orange land, all bearing. The success he has had in orange-growing has made him an authority on the subject in his locality. He believes four watchwords must be observed in raising oranges, "fertilization, cultivation, irrigation and fumigation," and without due observance of each of these no one can hope to succeed. It is one of his theories that no pruning should be done, but that the limbs should be allowed to grow naturally, as the tree is kept warmer in winter when the limbs hang over and touch the ground, and a hard wind does less damage to fruit and tree, also the top then represents a larger bearing surface (this principle has special reference to the Washington navel orange). Once in three years he fumigates his orchard by the tent and cyanide process. Every detail of the business is given the closest attention, and it is to this fact that his success may be attributed.

MRS. SARAH M. COOL. Side by side with the brave and ambitious men who came to California in the early days, most patiently endured the perils and hardships of the overland trail, and cast their lot amid the discomforts and vague possibilities of the Pacific coast, are the women who accompanied them hither to stand as sentinels of encouragement on their desolate hearthstones, and mingle their hope and zeal and sympathy with the intoxicating sunlight and balmy air of the land of their golden dreams. Whether as matrons or children they faced the vastness of the plains, wonderingly awaiting the happenings of each succeeding dawn, with its possibility of storm and flood and disease, and the approach of murderous Indian faces or beasts of prey, there was instilled into their minds and hearts a largeness of purpose and an unflinching devotion without which the present civilization of California had never been accomplished. Of all who have experienced the vicissitudes of the almost primeval conditions and are now spending their days amid the fulfilled expectations of Los Angeles, none is more worthily enshrined in the hearts of the people than is Mrs. Sarah M. Cool, widow of Rev. P. Y. Cool, one of the pioneer Methodist Episcopal clergymen of this state.

A native of Cleveland, Ohio, Mrs. Cool was, before her marriage, Sarah M. Aram, whose most remote ancestors are first heard of in England, in which country the paternal great-grandfather, Joseph, was born and eventually died. Eugene Aram, whose rueful and tragic life Bulwer Lytton illuminated with the touch of his genius, yet who is by many supposed to have been a creation of the novelist's brain, lived in reality, and was a great-great uncle of Mrs. Cool. The paternal grandfather, Mathias, was also born in Yorkshire, the birthplace of his father, and he was thrice drafted for military service in the wars between France and England, but found a substitute for his service. In 1806 he brought his family to Geneva, N. Y., where he lived on a farm, and where he left his plow in other hands to shoulder a musket in the war of 1812. He was a member of the Methodist church, and New York continued to be his place of residence up to the time of his death.

Capt. Joseph Aram, the father of Mrs. Cool, was born in Geneva, N. Y., and when old enough to shoulder responsibility became a dairyman in the vicinity of Cleveland. Owing to precarious health he decided to try his fortunes in the west, but at the time of setting out with his family had little thought of ever reaching California. Rather he headed towards Oregon, starting in May of 1846 with an ox-train and numerous other emigrants, this being the first wagon train to cross the plains. At Green river they met Kit Carson, who persuaded them to go to California on account of the delightful climate. For a time they traveled with the party of which Mr. Donner was a member, and which met such a sad fate at what is now known as Donner's lake. Their immunity from a similar death was owing to the fact that they followed Mr. Carson's advice and got "The Truckee Guide," an old and reliable Indian, to take them through before the severe storms set in. The party remaining behind died of exposure and lack of food, but the old Indian with his wise knowledge of the country hurried them over the mountains to safety. Arriving at Fort Sutter in October of 1846 the party met General Fremont, who was in search of able-bodied men, and Mr. Aram enlisted as captain and was detailed to take the party to Santa Clara. He afterwards continued to serve under Fremont until the close of the Mexican war, and the sword which he wielded so bravely in the service is now one of the treasured possessions of his daughter, Mrs. Cool. In the spring of 1847 Mr. Aram took his family to Santa Cruz, going almost immediately to Monterey, then the capital of California. He became a man of influence and force in the early administration of California, and was a member of the first constitutional convention that met in Colton hall and framed the first laws of the state. He was also a member of the first state legislature. In 1849 he moved with his family to San José, where he carried on extensive nursery operations until his retirement from active life, and where his death occurred in March of 1898, at the age of nearly eighty-eight years. For many years he was a member of the city council of San José, and was one of the chief promoters of the welfare of his locality. Up to the end of his life he retained possession of his splendid faculties, and was as deeply interested in the political and other undertakings of the state as when he first sat among the framers of its laws. His many fine traits of character drew to him distinguished friendships, for he had an intimate knowledge of Fremont, and was more than a passing friend of the great silent soldier, General Grant.

On the maternal side Mrs. Cool is descended from the Wrights of New England, who in turn claimed kinship with the Huguenots of France. Her mother, formerly Sarah Ann Wright, was born in Rutland, Vt., as was also her paternal grandfather, Edwin. Mrs. Aram stood the hardships of the journey over the plains with wonderful fortitude. When the party arrived at Santa Clara the emigrants were taken ill with camp fever, a species of typhoid, and nearly every family lost a member. The disease was so prevalent that there were not enough well ones to take care of the invalids. At that time Mrs. Aram lost a little son, George, who was but ten years of age, and this left four other children, viz.: Sarah M.; Jennie, who is now deceased, and who married Mr. Pomeroy, formerly of San José, but now of Los Angeles; Mattie, who died in San José; and Hon. Eugene Aram, who is a prominent attorney of Sacramento, and an ex-member of the state legislature.

Mrs. Cool was but a child when the family fortunes were shifted to the west, and she was reared and educated in San José, her first teacher at school being Rev. Mr. Willie, who is still living in Benicia, Cal. She also received instruction from her mother, and for a time had a private tutor. She retains vivid impressions of the early days of San José, and says that the Indians were kind to them, as were also the Spanish women, but that the men were treacherous and not to be depended on. In fact, the English consul, Mr. Forbes, informed them of a deep laid plot to massacre them, a plot which was fortunately discovered in time for frustration.

The marriage of Miss Aram and Rev. P. Y. Cool occurred in San José, August 28, 1855. Mr. Cool was born in Cayuga, N. Y., of remote German ancestry, was educated at Auburn College, and came to California in 1850, via Panama. For a time he engaged in mining, but eventually turned his attention to teaching in Ione City, and in 1853 was ordained in the Methodist Episcopal church. After his marriage he continued to preach in the Old Conference in Northern California for twenty-one years, between 1853 and 1874. He was the organizer of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Santa Barbara in 1868, and built the first house of worship in the place, also built churches all over the state. After the Santa Barbara charge he was presiding elder for the Santa Barbara district, and in 1874 came to Los Angeles as pastor of the First Methodist Episcopal Church to succeed Rev. Mr. Hough, which position he held for a year. This church was then located where the old Fourth Street Methodist Church now is. Mr. Cool was afterward pastor of the church at San Diego for a year, and for the same length of time served the church at Compton, after which he retired from the ministry, but often supplied temporarily vacant pulpits. He was a man of broad education and liberal tendencies, and an emphatic supporter of educational institutions in the state. One of his chief responsibilities was the University of Southern California, of which he was a founder, also a member of the board of trustees up to the time of his death, November 6, 1882. He was a staunch Republican, and held many offices of trust in the county, and served for a term as superintendent of education in Santa Cruz county. In political affiliation he was a Mason. Mr. Cool devoted his life to the cause of the oppressed and suffering, and his utterances and example were based on broad and humanitarian lines, far removed from cant and perplexing vagueness. The good that he accomplished in California can hardly be estimated, and was limited only by the length of years accorded him for work in his chosen vineyard.

Since the death of her husband Mrs. Cool has lived in the university part of the city, where she has purchased the southwest corner of Jefferson and Wesley streets and erected the largest block in the addition. This building is two stories high, and in ground dimensions is 60x100 feet. The city contains no more enthusiastic advocate of higher education, and the University of Southern California has continued to be her special pride, and the object of her greatest and most practical solicitude. Financially and otherwise she has contributed towards the success of this model institution. However, this represents but one of her many worthy interests. She is active in promoting the welfare of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and is a member of the executive board of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, and of the Eastern Star. Politically she is a Republican, and is a firm believer in the suffragist platform for women. She is one of the substantial, moral and intellectual agencies in this city of gifted women and large club and humanitarian enterprises, and many friends have risen up to appreciate and rejoice in her manifold gracious personal attributes.

WILLIAM FRANCIS EDGAR, M. D. After having graduated from the medical department of the University of Louisville, Dr. Edgar was commissioned assistant surgeon in the regular army March 2, 1849. Soon afterward he accompanied a regiment of mounted rifles across the plains, and assisted in garrisoning a military post in the heart of the Shoshone Indian country. Afterward he was stationed at The Dalles for a year, and thence came to California. In the spring of 1852 his command was ordered into the Yosemite valley to punish the Indians who had massacred a party of miners. In 1854 he was ordered to Fort Redding, and later assisted in establishing Fort Tejon. One night, while answering a summons to assist a wounded man at the fort, his horse fell and he was severely injured, being unable to walk or speak for four months. As soon as able to travel, he was sent east on a furlough, and at the expiration of his leave of absence reported at Jefferson Barracks. With the Second Cavalry he was ordered to Texas and thence to Florida, later taking some invalid soldiers to New York. In 1857 he returned to Fort Miller, whence he accompanied troops to quiet Indians in Oregon. After being stationed at the Presidio in San Francisco and at Benicia for a time, he was ordered, in 1858, to join an expedition from Los Angeles to the Colorado river, against the Mojave Indians. This was his first visit to Los Angeles and the first night here he slept at the Bella Union hotel, which was then a two-story adobe.

The expedition proceeded, via Cajon Pass, to the Colorado, where it subdued and punished Indians who had massacred whites, and then returned to Cajon Pass. Later a much larger expedition was organized by the same and other officers and marched to the Mojave country. To this force the Indians surrendered and a treaty of peace was made. Part of the command remained to garrison Fort Mojave and the other part returned to Los Angeles county; the officers of the command camping at Compton. Dr. Edgar was ordered to San Diego, where he remained until November, 1861, and then, with the balance of the regular troops of the coast, was ordered east to participate in the Civil war. He was for some time with the army of the Potomac and was promoted to surgeon (with the rank of major) in Buell's army in Kentucky, where he organized a large general hospital in Louisville.

Next he was made medical director at Cairo, Ill. However, the uncongenial climate caused a partial return of the paralysis and rendered him unfit for duty. He was ordered before a retiring board at Washington, D. C., and on examination was retired from active service. After recovering from the effects of a surgical operation he was assigned to duty in the medical directors' office in the department of the east. During part of the time he was a member of the board that organized the Signal Corps in Washington. At the close of the war he closed up the hospitals of his department. He was then ordered to return to California and in 1866 was stationed at Drum Barracks, Los Angeles county, where he remained for three years. Failing health obliged him to seek a furlough and for a year he rested. During that time (in January, 1870) Congress passed a law which provided that officers retired from active service should be relieved from all duty. The passage of this law placed him on the retired list. He remained on his ranch at San Geronio for some years and then came to Los Angeles, where he engaged in the practice of his profession. In 1881 he sold a portion of his ranch and in 1886 disposed of the remainder, after having owned it since 1859. The ranch was first owned by the well-known trapper, Pauline Weaver, of pioneer fame.

In March, 1866, Dr. Edgar married Miss Catharine Laura Kennefer, of New York, who survives him, making her home in Los Angeles. Dr. Edgar spent his last year retired from the active duties that had filled his younger years, and enjoying that rest from professional and business cares which he so richly deserved. He died August 23, 1897, mourned by the host of friends who honored and admired him for his high ideals, his genial disposition, broad knowledge and his varied intellectual attainments.

W. S. COLLINS. A native of the vicinity of Connersville, Fayette county, Ind., Mr. Collins was born November 17, 1863. He came to Riverside in 1889, and purchased a ranch which he set out in oranges. The real-estate business held out superior inducements which were readily taken advantage of, and he was also interested in loans on an extensive scale. He purchased property in different parts of the town and erected many residences, perhaps fifty in all, which have been sold to purchasers. Aside from his ranch, which is a fine orange property, he has set out about a hundred acres in oranges. In the spring of 1901 he built a home on the corner of East Seventh street and Comer avenue. The majority of the building has been the result of the organization, in 1900, of the Real Estate, Loan and Building Company, of which Mr. Collins has since been manager. To a large extent he is interested in mining in Nevada and Colorado.

The oil industry has furnished an added responsibility for Mr. Collins, and he is substantially involved in its development. As one of the promoters of the Grand Central Development Oil Company, and as secretary of the same, he has been instrumental in bringing about splendid results. At one time he individually owned the property of the Aladdin Oil Company, of which he is the incorporator, and now the president, and which is being rapidly pushed and developed. He is also a promoter and the vice-president and manager of the Kern Oil Developing Company. The Kern Western Oil Company is also due to his promotion and organization, and he owns eighty acres of land in the middle of the district, which is at present in process of development with bright prospects.

The manifold interests of Mr. Collins extend to various kinds of manufacture, and he is general manager of the Western Duryea Manufacturing Company, which turns out automobiles and motive power, the headquarters of the company being located at Los Angeles. Also he is president of the Bennett Smokeless Furnace Company, the works of which are in Detroit, Mich., and the headquarters at Los Angeles.

HON. S. N. ANDROUS. During his early life Mr. Androus was a business man of Flint and Detroit, Mich., and he was also a soldier in the Union army during the entire period of the Civil war, rising to the rank of major. Closing out his interests in Michigan in 1886, he came to California and has since made Pomona his home. He is the owner of an orange orchard comprising thirty acres, north of Pomona. The oranges on this place are of a fine variety. The trees were planted by him and he had personally superintended their care and development. The place attracts the attention of visitors, and its well-kept appearance indicates the thrift of its owner. The house is of the Spanish type of architecture that is so admirably adapted to this section of the country.

Besides the management of his horticultural interests, Mr. Androus has other important interests. For several years he was vice-president of the People's Bank of Pomona. Interested in everything pertaining to education, his service of four years as a member of the Pomona board of education has been helpful to the public-school interests. The Republican party receives his stanch support and its candidates his vote. He has been honored by his party in election to positions of trust and responsibility. In 1892 he was elected to represent his district in the state assembly and his service was so satisfactory that two years later, on the expiration of his term, he was chosen to serve in the state senate. Believing a public office to be a public trust, during his incumbency of these positions he devoted his attention to the faithful discharge of his duties. His keen intuition, sound judgment and broad knowledge made him a power in the halls of legislature. His record was that of an able legislator, and during his term of service he gained the confidence of the people to an extent seldom surpassed. After his retirement from the senate he filled no political office until July, 1899, when he was appointed postmaster of Pomona for a period of four years.

S. O. HOUGHTON was born and reared in New York City. At the age of eighteen he enlisted in the First Regiment of New York Volunteers, commanded by Col. J. D. Stevenson, which was mustered into the service of the United States in July, 1846, for the war with Mexico. He came with his regiment around Cape Horn, and after a six months' voyage arrived in San Francisco, March 26, 1847. Soon afterward he accompanied the detachment of his regiment, commanded by Lieut.-Col. H. S. Burton, to Mexico and there participated in numerous conflicts with Mexican troops. In December, 1847, when in his twentieth year, he was promoted to a lieutenantcy, having gone through all the intermediate grades, and was made adjutant of his command. At the close of the Mexican war he returned to California, arriving here in October, 1848. Shortly thereafter he went to the gold mines and remained about one year, mining, trading and transporting provisions and supplies for the miners. He had received a commercial education and was thoroughly conversant with the French and Spanish languages, and this training proved of great value to him in the early years of the American occupation of California. He was one of a party of four who were the first to dig gold in the famous mining district of Sonora, in this state. In 1849 he settled at San José, where he remained until 1886, and then removed to Los Angeles, his present home.

In 1852 Mr. Houghton took the official census of Santa Clara county, in 1852-53 was deputy recorder, and in 1853-54 served in the city council of San José, over which body he presided. He was clerk of a senate committee of the first legislature of California and in 1854 served as deputy clerk of the state supreme court. In 1854 he was deputy tax collector, and in 1855-56 held office as mayor of San José. For five years he served as a volunteer fireman of his city. He organized the Eagle Guards, one of the first independent military companies in the state. He was ordnance officer on the staff of Major-General Halleck, and during the period between 1857 and 1866 held seven military commissions. During the war of the Rebellion he drilled a company of infantry and another of light artillery for active service in the army.

In 1857 Mr. Houghton was admitted to the bar, and for a number of years made a specialty of settling titles to old Spanish land grants before the United States courts. In the Forty-second Congress of the United States he represented the then first district of California, and in the Forty-third Congress he represented the fourth district. While congressman he secured a liberal appropriation for the inner harbor at San Pedro and work on the same was then begun.

During the administration of President Arthur he was appointed a member of the commission to investigate and report upon the condition and management of the United States mint at San Francisco, his associates on the commission being ex-United States Senator and ex-Secretary of War Ramsay, of Minnesota, and ex-Governor Young, of Ohio.

NICHOLAS LINDENFELD, M. D. One of the most gifted of the sons of Germany whose wealth of adaptability absorbed and utilized the opportunities of the early days of California, and whose superiority touched into brightness and success various avenues of activity, the most momentous of which was the profession of law, was Nicholas Lindenfeld, or Dr. Lindenfeld as he was commonly known. Descended from ancestors who cherished national tradition and devotion to that exalted culture of which the Teutonic mind is capable, he was born near Dieburg, Hesse-Darmstadt, Germany, January 17, 1843, and was educated at Mainz and the university at Giessen. From the latter seat of learning he secured a medical diploma, and, aside from a regular classical and scientific course, perfected himself in geology and mineralogy. Thus equipped with unusual mental training, he sought a fitting field of effort, and upon locating in Rochester, N. Y., at the close of the Civil war, built up a successful and appreciative medical practice.

Ambitious of the best possible in his environment, Dr. Lindenfeld came to California in 1875, and from the very first seemed to realize the future greatness of Los Angeles. So keen were his perceptions and so accurate his estimates that at the present time many recall prophecies that then seemed vague and barely possible. For a time he applied his knowledge of geology and mineralogy in the mines of the county, and was so impressed with the prospects of Colorado that he repaired hence in 1880, intending to make that his permanent home. During the great boom at Leadville he was one of the first on the scene, and he afterwards as enthusiastically tried to wrest a fortune from the hidden stores near Pueblo. After two years of mining in Colorado his experience did not justify continued residence in the state, and he therefore returned to California and became superintendent of the Kelsey mine at San Gabriel. After some years of varied success and failure he opened an office in the Temple block and devoted himself to real estate and insurance, and was also a notary. In the mean time he spent his leisure moments in studying law with F. K. Howard, and after being admitted to the bar in 1883 began to practice law with Judge Taney, with whom he remained until 1888. He then became a partner of Enoch Pepper, an association amicably continued up to the time of his death, May 9, 1899. He was one of the most erudite of the counselors in law who have maintained the legal prestige of this city, and he had a large clientage among the prominent and wealthy members of the community. He attended to all of the legal business of the German consul at San Francisco, and many large corporations enlisted his services in adjusting their differences. He was particularly modest and conservative, and those who appealed to him felt instinctively that their case rested in safe and reliable hands. Nor did he ever disappoint their expectations.

So expansive a nature as that possessed by Dr. Lindenfeld must needs reach out and touch the many interests by which he was surrounded, and he therefore was responsible for the success of many enterprises and for the development of many resources. He seemed to grasp the needs of those who, like himself, were struggling for the best the world contained, and he felt the limitations of many who had been less fortunate and successful. To those who desired land and were yet unable to meet a single heavy outlay he came as a discerning and helpful friend, and was the first in the city to lay out lots to be purchased on the installment plan. He laid out the Pioneer building lots in East Los Angeles, and was one of the promoters of the Pioneer Association. Politically a Republican, he was active in local and state matters from the first of his residence in the west, was a delegate to many conventions, and served on many committees. Fraternally he was associated with the Knights of the Maccabees, and he was for many years a member of the Chamber of Commerce. He lived very near to the heart of nature, and to him the mountains and mines and sunsets and plains were eloquent with interest, and told a story all their own. With a keen and trained eye for the why and wherefore of things, he discerned beauty and utility where others saw but the commonplace and uninteresting. He was the soul of honor, and the highest type of the universal gentleman.

In Rochester, N. Y., Dr. Lindenfeld married Catherine Baker, November 6, 1866. Mrs. Lindenfeld was reared in Rochester, and is a daughter of Frank Baker, who immigrated from France when a young man and settled in New York, where he engaged in the mercantile business until his death in 1867. In his native land he had been a linen weaver. The mother of Mrs. Lindenfeld was formerly Johanna Larson, who was born near Sarlouis, Prussia, a daughter of Daniel William Larson, who was one of the first settlers of Rochester, N. Y. Mrs. Baker, who died in New York March 4, 1865, was the mother of two children, and of these, John Baker is in the employ of the New York Central Railroad Company and lives in Rochester. Nine children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Lindenfeld: Harriett M., who is a graduate of the normal school and her father's former assistant, and is now in the office of the recorder of Los Angeles county; Charles N., who is a resident of New York City and a graduate of the Manhattan College and of the Columbia Law School; George J., who is an attorney and is in the Philippine Islands; William J., who is mining in Arizona; Emma, who is now Mrs. Pingree, of Los Angeles; Caroline F., Lillian A., Hortense A., and Marie A., at home. The Lindenfeld home in Los Angeles, on South Hope street, is one of the delightful and hospitable places of the city, and there the most gracious tact and good-fellowship are lavishly dispensed. The appreciation of culture which was the distinguishing characteristic of Dr. Lindenfeld during his capable and well-directed life has been handed down to his sons and daughters, and was always shared by his wife, who is one of those broad-minded and sympathetic women who adorn and improve any community that is honored by their association.

CALEB E. WHITE. Few of the men now living in Pomona have been identified with the history of California for a longer period than has Mr. White. He was one of the '40ers who were led to cast in their lot with the then unknown west at the time of the discovery of gold here. Since that time he has made his home in this state. The wonderful improvements that have brought this state to a foremost position among the great commonwealths of America he has witnessed and aided, and he deservedly occupies a position among the public-spirited pioneers to whose self-sacrificing efforts the organization and development of the state may be attributed. When nineteen years of age he started for California, being one of a party of fifteen who purchased the brig Arcadia, and sailed from Boston to San Francisco via the straits of Magellan. After a tedious voyage of two hundred and sixty-three days, they sailed through the Golden Gate October 29, 1849.

In 1850 Mr. White embarked in the general mercantile business in Sacramento, as a member of the firm of Haskell, White & Co. However, this firm was dissolved in a short time. Subsequently he engaged in the nursery business on a ranch on the American river, and also for seventeen years was a member of the firm of White & Hollister, in the nursery business. At a later date he became interested in sheep-raising, having a sheep ranch at Florence, Los Angeles county. The year 1880 found him a pioneer of what is now the city of Pomona. He was one of the prime movers in securing the organization of the city, and served as a member of its first board of trustees. He has become one of the well-known horticulturists of the region. His place consists of seventy acres, of which sixty acres are in orchard. In addition to the management of this property, he has for ten or more years served as vice-president of the People's Bank of Pomona.

OSCAR MORSE, operator of the Santa Barbara Electric, Gas and Power Company's works, was born in Nevada county, Cal., April 6, 1864. His father, Ezra Morse, came from an old New England family, and was a shoemaker by trade. In the early '50s he settled in Nevada City, where he plied his trade, and in 1871 came to Santa Barbara with the intention of starting a shop there. His plans, however, miscarried, for while in San Francisco he contracted typhoid fever, which terminated fatally two weeks after his arrival in Santa Barbara. His wife, formerly Martha Holt, of Mississippi, and who died in Santa Barbara in 1891, was the mother of two children, of whom Oscar Morse is the only survivor.

When his father removed to Santa Barbara from Nevada county, Oscar Morse was a lad of seven years. He attended the public schools of his adopted city, and received his earliest impressions of life and work from the activities here represented. In 1873 he went back to Nevada county and engaged in teaming for a few years, and after his return in 1881 remained in the employ of the old gas works for eighteen months. He then engaged in ranching, and was later with the Santa Barbara Water Company for two years. In 1889 he became identified with the Santa Barbara Gas Company, beginning at the bottom and working his way forward until he became chief operator of the works. Since the change of the company to the Santa Barbara Electric, Gas and Power Company he has had entire charge of the gas plant, and his services have met with approval of those who placed him in his present responsible position. Mr. Morse is independent in politics, and takes an active interest in city affairs.

HON. DUMMER KIAH TRASK. The birth of D. K. Trask occurred in Cincinnati, Ohio, July 17, 1860. Soon after the breaking out of the Rebellion his parents removed to Maine. There he grew to manhood, attending the common schools of Jefferson, Me., and the Nichols' Latin school, and later being graduated from the Waterville Classical Institute, at the head of which renowned seat of learning Dr. J. H. Hanson then stood. For several terms young Trask engaged in teaching in his home state, but finally yielded to his growing desire to see something of the far west, where he believed greater opportunities for success awaited him. In 1882 he arrived in Stockton, and, after spending the summer in the harvest field, and subsequent to his successful standing in the teachers' examination, he was offered the principalship of the Linden public schools, where he taught for a period. He served as a member of the San Joaquin county board of education.

Thus, well launched in the educational field, he established the Stockton Business College and Normal Institute, where he trained and instructed large classes of students and over two hundred teachers. Besides having charge of the college, he was preparing himself for admission to the bar. He sold his interests in the college in order to give his undivided attention to the profession of his choice. He was admitted to practice by the supreme court of the state, at San Francisco, in July, 1890. In the following September he came to Los Angeles, where he opened an office. Within a short period he built up a good practice, and was employed in many important matters. In no measure did his interest in the cause of education languish, as was shown when he served on the city school board in 1893 and 1894. In 1898 he was appointed judge of the superior court of Los Angeles county, and is acting in that capacity at the present time. In his political affiliations he is a strong ally of the Democratic party.

BRADNER W. LEE. Born in East Groveland, Livingston county, N. Y., in 1850, Mr. Lee received his education in public schools and by means of a course of private study. From New York, in 1871, he went to Mississippi, where he prepared for the legal profession under the preceptorship of his uncle, Col. G. Wiley Wells, then United States district attorney, northern district of Mississippi, subsequently a member of Congress from that state, and later United States Consul-General to Shanghai, China. Mr. Lee was admitted to the bar in that state in 1872, after which he held the position of assistant United States attorney for seven years. On resigning that position he came to Los Angeles in 1879 and associated himself with Judge Brunson and Col. G. Wiley Wells in the law firm of Brunson, Wells & Lee. On his arrival in this county he was admitted to practice before the state supreme court, April 30, 1879, and when the United States circuit and district courts were organized for Southern California, he was admitted to practice in them. At the time of the election of Judge Brunson to the bench of the superior court, the firm was reorganized under the name of Wells, Van Dyke & Lee, Hon. Walter Van Dyke being a member thereof, who after a time was elected to the judicial bench, has since served as judge of the superior court, and is now associate justice of the supreme court. Since then Mr. Lee has been associated with different partners, being for a time a member of the firm of Wells, Guthrie & Lee, later the firm of Wells, Monroe & Lee, next that of Wells & Lec, and upon the admission of Judge Works, ex-justice of the supreme court, the name became Wells, Works & Lee. On account of failing health, Colonel Wells finally retired from practice, and since then the title has been Works & Lee, the senior member being Hon. John D. Works. During almost the entire period of his residence in Los Angeles, Mr. Lee has participated in its prominent legal contests, and he has been connected with some of the most noted litigations in the history of the state.

FRANK E. MORRILL, the postmaster at Montalvo, Ventura county, who is also engaged in the general mercantile business at this place, was born in Canterbury, N. H., July 8, 1833, being a son of Hon. David Morrill, member of congress from Merrimac county, N. H., and one of the leading men of his state. Under the influence of such a father, his boyhood training was received and his education acquired. At eighteen years of age he left the home where he was born and reared and went to Worcester, Mass., where for two years he worked in the pistol factory of Allen & Thurber. In 1853 he came via the isthmus to California, and at once made his way from San Francisco to the mines at Nevada City, where he mined until 1860, at the same time acting as proprietor of the Mechanics' Hotel. In 1856 this hotel was burned, but he at once rebuilt the structure and resumed business.

Trading his property in 1860, Mr. Morrill acquired a farm in Yuba county, which, under its present title of Bonanza ranch, is said to be worth at least $100,000. It comprises over one thousand acres, three hundred acres now being in fruit. In 1875 he disposed of the property to the Excelsior Ditch Company, who named it the Bonanza. The same year he purchased a ranch in Penn valley, Nevada county. The old Gassoway ranch (by which name the property was known) comprised three hundred and twenty acres, largely in pasturage, but to some extent under cultivation to grain. The improvement of this land proved a profitable employment. Through his efforts, in 1890, the Excelsior Ditch Company extended its ditch to his land, allowing him to secure water from the main ditch. This proved of great benefit to him. Thirty-five acres of his land he planted in grapes, twenty acres in fruit, and forty acres in red clover and alfalfa.

On the occasion of being a second time bought out by the Excelsior Ditch Company, in 1892, Mr. Morrill returned to his old home in New Hampshire, where he celebrated his father's ninety-fifth birthday anniversary, and also visited the World's Fair in Chicago. Returning to California, in the fall of 1893 he settled at Montalvo and bought out the general store owned by Mr. Grassi, since which time, with his son, C. O. Morrill, he has successfully carried on a general mercantile business. Several of the best houses in town are owned by him. In addition to his store, he has built and now conducts a livery and feed stable. In July, 1899, he was appointed postmaster, which position he has since filled with credit to himself and satisfaction to his fellow-citizens. In all of his enterprises he has had the assistance of his wife, a lady of ability and resourcefulness, and at present taking charge of the Montalvo hotel. She is the mother of eight children, namely: Mrs. Ella Miller, Frank W. Morrill, Mrs. Sarah Miller, James D., Charles O., Mrs. Mary Sanborn, George E. and Edwin M. Morrill.

In the local work of the Republican party, Mr. Morrill is active. In all ways he is ready to assist in the upbuilding of the community and the advancement of Montalvo's interests. For more than twenty years he has kept his membership in in the Nevada City Lodge, A. O. U. W. Besides his property in Ventura county, he is still the owner of one hundred and forty-five acres in Yuba county, on which are raised oranges, apples, pears, prunes and other varieties of fruit.

J. C. F. MILLER, whose skill as a builder and contractor has evolved some of the finest residences and public buildings in Santa Barbara, was born in Auburn, Christian county, Ill., October 30, 1858. His father, Henry Clay Miller, was born in Ohio, and worked at his trade of cabinetmaker there, and after his removal to Mount Auburn, Ill. During the Civil war he served in an Illinois regiment until the restoration of peace, after which he returned to his old home neighborhood in Illinois and lived there for two years. He then removed to Macon, near Decatur, and bought a farm, upon which he lived until settling at his present home in Leavenworth, Kans. The paternal grandfather was born in Pennsylvania, of German descent, and lived for many years and finally died in North Liberty, Ohio. The mother of J. C. F. Miller was Elizabeth (Botkin) Miller, a native of Ohio, and daughter of Isaac Botkin, a native of West Virginia and a farmer in Ohio. Mrs. Miller, who died in Illinois, was the mother of eleven children, eight of whom are living, J. C. F. being the sixth and the only one in California.

Until eighteen years of age Mr. Miller remained on his father's farm and attended the district schools. In 1876 he removed to Marion county, Kans., and after staying for a year returned to Illinois and learned the carpenter's trade in Macon county. In 1882 he went to Oregon, and at the end of two months proceeded to Walla Walla, Wash., and worked at his trade, returning in 1883 to Chicago, Ill., where he remained for six years. During that time he was foreman for E. L. Lord, and had a responsible position. In 1889 he came to Santa Barbara and worked as a carpenter until 1892, when he branched out into building and contracting, which he has since followed. He built his own residence in Oak Park, and among other creditable undertakings attributed to him are the residences of Dr. Doremus and Dr. Strong, the Bond residence, the Washington school; and at Montecito, the residences of General Strong and Mrs. Boynton, an addition to the Waterman residence, and the Country Club and cottages.

In Santa Barbara, February 12, 1891, Mr. Miller married Bertha Elliott, a native of Wisconsin, and daughter of Ezekiel Elliott, who was born in New York state. Ezekiel Elliott was a contractor and builder, and early settled at Lone Rock, Wis., where he was engaged in farming, and became prominent in the community. He came to Santa Cruz, Cal., in 1875, and engaged in horticulture, and then removed to San Francisco, where he manufactured kindling wood. Later removing to Alameda, he engaged in the wood and coal business, but in 1883 came to Santa Barbara and was engaged in the stock business on the San Nicholas and Anacapa; however, he is now in practical retirement. He married Phoebe Vincent, who was born in New York, a daughter of Joseph Vincent, also a native of New York. To Mr. and Mrs. Elliott were born two sons and two daughters, of whom Mrs. Miller is the youngest. Joseph V. Elliott is a contractor in Santa Barbara; Anna M. is the wife of Mr. Humphrey of Santa Barbara; and Ray is a carpenter by trade. To Mr. and Mrs. Miller has been born one child, Vivian Iole. Mr. Miller is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and is a Republican in politics.

W. H. AKERS. In many journeyings in many lands one would find few travelers who have seen as much of the world as has Mr. Akers, or who have as intelligently observed and laid up stores of information from various parts of the world. A native of Hackettstown, N. J., he was born of parents also natives of the eastern state, and was educated at the Newport Naval Academy. In 1865 he entered the merchant marine, sailing from New York to Aspinwall, and the same year to San Francisco by way of the Horn. Later he made many trips around the Horn, and in 1867 entered the employ of the Pacific mail service, making several trips to Panama. He followed the uncertain fortunes of the sea until 1885, and in the course of his travels went around the world several times. On many of the ships in which he sailed he held rank as first officer, and his sea-faring existence was not marred by either serious accident or great peril.

J. C. Hawes

In 1885 Mr. Akers sought a terra firma existence, and lived in San Francisco until 1892. In May of that year he came to the Montecito valley and bought the ranch which he now owns, and upon which lemons are raised extensively. Improvements have been brought about on the property, and in 1892 the owner erected a pleasant rural home in which his family are comfortably housed. He devotes all of his time to the ranch which has proved a source of profit and successful experiment. In keeping with his enterprise Mr. Akers entertains an interest in the development of his locality, and is an ardent promoter of education. In politics a Democrat, he is now serving his second term as trustee of the Montecito school district, and has been a member of the Democratic general committee for some time, and also a delegate to numerous county and state conventions. He is a member of the Episcopal Church, and a trustee in the same, and is fraternally associated with the Santa Barbara Lodge, No. 613, B. P. O. E., and a charter member of the lodge. In 1889 Mr. Akers married Miss Gillard, a native of New Zealand, and they have four children: Weston, Mollie, Helen and William H., Jr.

FELIX C. HOWES. The founder in America of the family which was represented by the late Felix C. Howes of Los Angeles, bore the name of Thomas Howes and was a native of England. About 1637 he set sail from his home land for the strange country beyond the ocean, the tedious voyage across which consumed many weary weeks. Arriving at Plymouth Rock, where recently the Pilgrim Fathers had first set foot upon American soil, he proceeded from there to Salem, Mass., which afterward continued to be his home. By his marriage to Mary Burr, who came from Norfolk county, England, he had three sons, James, Thomas and Jeremiah, all of whom proved to be noble men and the worthy ancestors of a large and prosperous posterity. Ebenezer, son of Jeremiah, had a son, Thomas, born in 1699, who married Deborah Sears. Their oldest child, Moody, born in 1724, married Hannah Snow, who died in July, 1758. In search of more fertile land he moved from Yarmouth to Putnam county, N. Y., in 1748, and purchased a tract of six hundred acres from the Indians. Not a furrow had ever been turned in the soil. The land was in the condition of primeval nature, and his was the task to clear, till and cultivate. On that place he spent the remainder of his life, dying in 1806. Of his first marriage there were four children. In 1759 he married Sarah Ellis, by whom he had nine children. Of these Samuel, born in 1768, had three sons, Exenetus, Bailey and Francis, all of whom became prominent citizens in their respective communities and bore an honorable part in agricultural pursuits and progressive movements. Of these sons Bailey, who was born in 1802, became a successful farmer, cultivating a homestead which is now the site of the Croton reservoir. Of his marriage to Mary Cole of New York there were three sons born, namely: Oscar, who was an instructor in the University of Chicago and died in that city; Byron, a banker, and a veteran of the Civil war, who died in St. Paul; and Felix Cary, who died in Los Angeles. It is the last-named of these sons who forms the subject of this article.

In Putnam county, N. Y., Felix C. Howes was born May 15, 1838, and there he received such advantages as local public schools and academy offered. His course in life was determined when he was twelve years old, when, after having received a check for certain work he had done, he went into a bank to cash it. He often afterward declared that he then resolved to become a banker, and the tenacity with which he adhered to that resolution is shown by the record of his later years.

In 1854 he went to Hastings, Minn., joining a brother, with whom, after some years spent in clerking, he engaged in the banking business. During the Civil war he was in the government employ as a clerk in the commissary department, and accompanied General Sherman through Georgia to the sea. On his return to Minnesota he resumed the banking business at Hastings. Removing to St. Paul about 1873, he became cashier for the Marine Bank, but, finding the winters of that northern city too severe, he resigned in 1875 in order to seek a more genial climate. In search of a suitable location he traveled along the Pacific coast, visiting many towns and cities, and noting everywhere the remarkable improvements that had been made on the coast. Being pleased with Los Angeles, he decided to make his home in this city, and accordingly purchased one hundred and sixty acres on West Jefferson street (now within the city limits). This tract he placed under cultivation to oranges. About 1883, in connection with Major Bonebrake, he organized the Los Angeles National Bank, of which he continued to be cashier and a director until his death. This institution has a paid-up capital of $500,000 and is one of the most solid and substantial banking institutions of the city. In addition to his intimate connection with its early history and upbuilding, he was interested in many different enterprises for the progress of the city.

Though he was never a partisan nor an office-seeker, yet his interest in politics was deep and abiding, and the Republican party owes much to the counsel and sympathy of such men as he. Despite his varied interests and the consequent demands upon his time he was always accessible to those who desired his counsel.

In St. Paul, Minn., September 21, 1866, Mr. Howes married Mrs. Clara (Sanborn) Emery, who was born in Waterville, Me. Her father, Daniel Sanborn, was a native of New Hampshire, and accompanied his father, Theophilus, to Charleston, Me., settling upon a farm. His education was received principally in Waterville College, after which he became a law student. Admitted to the bar, he soon attained eminence as a practicing attorney and won his way gradually to a foremost rank at the Bangor bar. For many years he was probate judge in Penobscot county, and it is said of him that his service on the bench was as creditable as that at the bar. Fair and impartial in his decisions, wise in his rulings, extensive in knowledge of the law, he was admirably qualified for the work of jurist. In the midst of his professional and official duties he found time to maintain his membership with the Odd Fellows and Masons. In 1882, when seventy-one years of age, he died at his home in Bangor, Me. The family of which he was a member has a lineage that can be traced back to the days of William the Conqueror, the Sanborns having accompanied that famous Norman in his memorable expedition to England.

The girlhood years of Mrs. Howes were passed in Maine, with the exception of four years during President Buchanan's administration, when her father was connected with the Boston custom house. The family then resided at Charlestown, a suburb, and she attended the high school of that town. About 1865 she went to Hastings, Minn., where she married the following year. In religion she is a Congregationalist, which was the religious faith of many of her New England ancestors. Wherever she has made her home her influence has been given to movements tending to advance educational, religious and benevolent interests. Her children have been the objects of her ministering care, and two of them survive to make happy the afternoon of her life, these being Mrs. Flora Howes Farwell and Miss Clara Frances Howes. The former, who is a graduate of the Los Angeles high school and state normal, is the wife of Lyman Farwell, an architect in this city. Two other daughters have been taken by death, the second, Carrie, dying in childhood; while the oldest, Marie, wife of Dr. Merritt Hitt, died at Cayucas, Cal., in 1892.

A. A. ALLEN. Few men on the Pacific coast are better equipped for the manipulation of large insurance interests than is A. A. Allen, attorney-at-law, and special Southern California agent and manager for the Northwestern National Insurance Company of Milwaukee, Wis. Preceded by years of practical experience as a lawyer, politician and insurance man in a thriving town of North Dakota, Mr. Allen came to Los Angeles in 1889, and has since been an integral part of the prosperity of the city. A native of Clyde, Wayne county, N. Y., he was born January 11, 1855, and is the youngest in a family of five children born to Ovid and Sarah (Smith) Allen, for many years residents of Wayne county. Latter-day members of the family recall with pride the life of the paternal great-grandfather, who was born in France, and served with Lafayette in the Revolutionary war. Ovid Allen was a contractor and builder in Wayne county, but eventually carried on his chosen occupation in Coldwater, Mich., where terminated his well-directed life.

After completing his preliminary education in the public schools of Coldwater, Mich., Mr. Allen entered the law department of the University of Michigan, and at the expiration of a year went into the office of Jonas H. McGowan, member of congress, and a prominent lawyer of Coldwater. In 1879, the year after being admitted to practice at the Michigan bar, he removed to Jamestown, N. D., and entered upon a practice destined to assume gratifying proportions. There he was district attorney for several years, justice of the peace, mayor of the town, county superintendent of schools, and member of the board of education. In connection with his law practice he carried on a successful insurance business, and yet found time to assume innumerable social and general obligations, the fulfillment of which brought a deserved popularity and high personal regard.

After locating in Los Angeles in 1889 Mr. Allen engaged principally in the insurance business, and has worked up a large patronage in fire insurance. Since 1897 he has been the special agent and adjuster for the Northwestern National Insurance Company of Milwaukee. He has been admitted to practice in the supreme court of California. He is a director in the loan and real-estate enterprise of R. W. Poindexter, and a stockholder in the West Coast Land and Water Company. His political successes experienced in Jamestown, have found a counterpart in Los Angeles, where he has a recognized Republican influence. In December of 1900 he was honored by being elected from the sixth ward to the council by a majority of one hundred and twenty-five, in a Democratic ward of four hundred majority, and he was the first Republican elected to that position in eight years. In January of 1901 he took the oath of office, and has since served as chairman of the finance committee, as member of the board of public works, member of the gas and light committee, and the supply and building committee. He has also been a member of the special water committee appointed to organize a plan for conducting the new city water plant. He is a member of the Union League Republican Club, and of the county central committee. Fraternally he was made a Mason in Jamestown, later took the degrees of Royal Arch and Knights Templar; and is a member of South Gate Lodge in Los Angeles. The Woodmen of the World, Fraternal Brotherhood and Independent Order of Foresters also claim him as a member. In religious associations he attends the Immanuel Presbyterian Church.

In Jamestown, Mr. Allen was united in marriage with Miss Claire E. Winslow, who was born in Pennsylvania, and is a daughter of R. M. Winslow, formerly a lumberman in Wisconsin. Mr. Allen has an enviable standing in Los Angeles, and his optimistic personality and social tact have won for him a host of friends. In his special line of work he has few equals in Southern California, and as a councilman he has shown himself intelligently alive to the best interests of the community.

ISAAC MILLER. The farm of Isaac Miller in Santa Barbara county originally comprised a portion of the site upon which Santa Maria is now built, but at the time of his first occupancy of the land the idea of the future settlement had hardly taken shape, and it is doubtful if its present standing in the county was deemed even a probability. From his youth Mr. Miller has followed the occupation of farming, and his ancestors for many years were successful tillers of the soil. He was born in Scott county, Va., in 1828, and lived in that state until 1844. Isaac Miller, Sr., was born in Virginia, as was also his wife, Rebecca (Barker) Miller. In their family were seven children, of whom Isaac, Jr., was sixth. Parents and children removed to Missouri in 1844, where they lived until 1850, at which time father and son crossed the plains to California, by means of ox-teams, their journey lasting five months from the time they started from the county seat of Miller county, Mo., on May 5th. In 1853 the mother, oldest brother and two oldest sisters also crossed the plains and joined the previous travelers, and together they went to the Russian river, Sonoma county, where for eight or ten years they lived on a ranch. The youngest son in the family came west in 1857.

After Isaac Miller, Jr., began to make his own way in the world, for nearly twenty years he mined in different parts of Nevada and California. He was eleven years in Nevada, where he was the founder of Star City, in Humboldt county. There he built a hotel and was easily recognized as one of the leading and representative citizens. He was district recorder of the Star City district and also conducted an assayer's office for several years, but finally sold out and came to Santa Barbara county. In 1872 he came to where Santa Maria is now located and bought a quarter section of land, upon a part of which the first store of the embryo town was constructed, which store, now used for a bakery, has been removed from its original site, and a large general store constructed in its place. In all Mr. Miller sold about twenty acres in town lots, the grammar school being upon one of the lots. Upon his own place he has the most advanced improvements, and farms on a large scale, the orchard, which for years bore prolifically of various kinds of fruits, being now utilized for the purpose of raising beans and beets. In connection with his other work he has dealt considerably in real estate, and is recognized as an excellent business man. He is a Democrat in politics, and has been a Mason for twenty years, being at present a Master Mason of the Santa Maria Lodge No. 262.

The marriage of Mr. Miller and Anna Roberts occurred in 1866, and of this union were born the following-named children: Ida, deceased; Isaac, who is clerking in a dry-goods store; James H.; Minnie, who is now Mrs. Thomas Barrett, of San Luis Obispo; George, and William.

GEORGE ALEXANDER. The business and social traits which have procured for Mr. Alexander an enviable prominence in whatsoever part of the country he has elected to reside, have conspired to render him also a valuable acquisition to Los Angeles, of which he has been a resident since 1887, and in which he is appreciated for his commercial acumen. A résumé of his life were most incomplete without due mention of his courageous and meritorious career as a soldier during the Civil war, his many hazardous experiences at that time qualifying him to interestingly divert the listeners at many camp-fire reunions.

Of sturdy Scotch ancestry and birth, Mr. Alexander claims Glasgow as his natal city, and was born in 1839, his father, William, being also a native of Scotland, and a farmer by occupation. The family immigrated to America in 1850 and settled in Chicago, Ill., removing in 1856 to near Toledo, Iowa, where the father took up government land sixty miles from the railroad. He continued to live here for many years, and eventually died while on a visit to Chicago, Ill. He was a Presbyterian in religion, and an upright, successful farmer. His son, George, was the oldest in a family of four children, and was ten years of age when brought to Chicago. His education was acquired principally in the public schools of Chicago and he afterwards engaged in independent farming in Iowa. In August of 1862 he enlisted at Muscatine, in Company E, Twenty-fourth Iowa Volunteer Infantry, his regiment being remembered as a fighting regiment, with a splendid record, and known also as the Temperance and Methodist regiment. He was sent to different camps in Arkansas, and in 1863 participated in the siege of Vicksburg, the battles of Point Gibson, Jackson, and Champion Hill. The latter was one of the most terrible of the battles of the Vicksburg campaign, and of the four hundred and seventeen who entered the fight one hundred and ninety-five were killed or wounded or captured, thirteen meeting the last named fate. After the surrender of Vicksburg Mr. Alexander was taken ill and sent north, after which he rejoined his regiment at New Orleans, and in 1864 took part in the Banks expedition up the Red River. From New Orleans they went by transport to Washington, and under General Sheridan were at the fore in the battles of Winchester, Fisher Hill, Cedar Creek, and many skirmishes, later going to the relief of Sherman's army at Savannah, which town they succeeded in holding for two months. They then went north to Goldsboro, N. C., and after several skirmishes returned to Savannah, and were sent inland one hundred and forty miles to protect government property and capture Jefferson Davis, who had fallen into the hands of the Unionists two days before. After two months the regiment was mustered out at Savannah in July of 1865, and were honorably discharged at Davenport, Iowa, in August of the same year, having served in all about three years.

After the war Mr. Alexander settled in Belle Plaine, Iowa, and engaged in the grain business with Twogood Brothers, now of Riverside, afterwards successfully conducting an independent grain business until 1874. He then continued the same line of business in Toledo, Iowa, for a year, and next removed to Dysart, Iowa, where he was also interested in grain until January of 1887. In Iowa he was prominently connected with the political undertakings of the Republican party, and held a number of important and responsible positions. In 1887 he located in Los Angeles, and was interested in a feed mill for two years, and in 1892 was appointed deputy street superintendent for two years. During that time he built three houses, and greatly improved his lots and property. In 1895 he was appointed deputy county recorder for four years, under E. C. Hodgman, and in 1899 was re-appointed deputy street superintendent, a position which he creditably filled until his nomination as supervisor. In the fall of 1900, Mr. Alexander was nominated supervisor of the second district on the Republican ticket, and elected by a majority of ten hundred and fifty-two over a popular Democratic candidate. The oath of office was administered in January of 1901, his term of office to be four years. As a supervisor his services are giving satisfaction, and he is intelligently in touch with the requirements of the office. He is an ex-member of the city and county central committees, and had been a delegate to many conventions. Fraternally he is associated with the Masons, having joined that organization at Belle Plaine, Iowa. He is a charter member of South Gate Lodge No. 320, and was raised to the Royal Arch Masons in Vinton, Iowa, and is now a member of the Signet Chapter No. 57 in this city, and also Los Angeles Commandery. As a member of the Grand Army of the Republic he is connected with the Bartlett Logan Post. In religion he is a member and trustee of the Central Methodist Episcopal Church. While living in Iowa, in 1862, Mr. Alexander married Annie Yeiser, a native of Ohio, and whose family were among the pioneers of Iowa. Of this union there are two children, Lydia, who is living at home, and Frank, who is a business man in Los Angeles.

WILLIAM ALEXANDER. Preceded by years of conservative commercial experience, William Alexander came to California in 1883, and has since been an integral part of the business and social life of Santa Barbara. The sense of strength felt in speaking his name is in no wise contradicted by the attainments of the man himself, who, before all else, is a Scotchman, to whose inherited sagacity have been added that breadth of mind and liberality of thought to be found only in those who have seen much, thought more, and observed from all standpoints. A great reader, of ready versatility, and a successful man, it is not surprising that he has many friends, and that his standing in the community of this and his native land is an enviable one.

A native of Montrose, Forfarshire, Scotland, Mr. Alexander was born September 26, 1826. His father, Samuel, was born near Montrose, and was a linen manufacturer by occupation, importing his flax from Riga and Archangel. The paternal grandfather, William Alexander, was a preacher, and married a Miss Murray. The mother of William Alexander, Margaret (Dickson) Alexander, was born in Kincardine-Shire, a daughter of John Dickson, a representative of a family for many years devoted to agriculture. Mr. Alexander was educated at Montrose Academy, the regular course of which institution he had finished when fifteen years of age, after which he attended higher classes at the same place. The business experience, to the rigor of which he attributes the foundation of his success in life, was acquired in the Bank of Scotland. His apprenticeship and later service meant strict attention to business and hard work with little diversion, serving in several of that bank's agencies.

After seventeen years of service in the Bank of Scotland, Mr. Alexander received an appointment in the Bank of British North America, and eventually embarked in business, under the name and style of Blaikie & Alexander in Toronto, representing clients in both England and Scotland, and doing a successful business.

When the Toronto Stock Exchange was organized, Mr. Alexander was one of the charter members and was elected the first president, but declined the honor of serving because of business reasons. On account of impaired health he decided upon a trip to California, having learned from Meteorological statistics that here was to be found a most equable climate. After three months' investigation of prevailing conditions he made arrangements to dispose of his interests in Toronto, and telegraphed his family to join him in his new found home. Since then he has been prominent particularly in building circles, having spent many thousands of dollars in erecting houses and other buildings, among the latter being the Alexander block.

At St. Andrews, Scotland, Mr. Alexander married Jessie B. Todd, who was born in Fifeshire, a daughter of George Todd, one of the most prominent farmers of the locality. Of this union there are eight children, and one of the sons, W. Murray, is a business man of Toronto, Canada. Mr. Alexander is a member of the Chamber of Commerce, and is conservative in politics. He is a member and worker in the First Presbyterian Church and has been a ruling elder in that denomination ever since a young man.

WILLIAM F. SPRING. For the long period of about twenty-nine years Mr. Spring was identified with the rise of Montecito valley to its present place among the most beautiful and fertile parts of Southern California. He was born in Muskingum county, Ohio, July 22, 1837, his father, George Spring, being presumably a native of Pennsylvania, and removing, when a young man, with a colony of Pennsylvania Germans to Muskingum county, Ohio, all the settlers being unable to speak any language but their native tongue. George Spring married Susan Story, and together they reared their family and improved their land in Ohio, and were among the respected and enterprising members of the community.

Left fatherless at the age of twelve, Mr. Spring continued to live on the homestead in Muskingum county, and as opportunity offered attended the little log school house in the neighborhood. In 1855 he removed to La Salle county, Ill., and worked by the month until the breaking out of the Civil war, when he enlisted in Company C, Forty-fourth Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and served until shortly before the close of the war. His regiment was a part of the army of the Cumberland, and took part in the battles of Pea Ridge, Mo., in 1862, the siege of Corinth, and Stone River, at which last named encounter he received a wound in the leg and was confined in the hospital at Albany, Ohio, for five months. Upon recovering he joined the central service, and was duly discharged at the expiration of his term. He then re-enlisted as a veteran in the same regiment, became sergeant, and was wounded in the first battle of Resaca, which forced him to spend a time in a hospital at Chicago, and then was honorably discharged in the spring of 1865.

Upon returning to his home Mr. Spring conducted a drug store, express office and post office in La Salle county. In 1866 he married Mary E. Abbott, a native of New York state, and whose father, Orren Abbott, was a soldier in the war of 1812. The paternal grandfather was a Revolutionary hero, having been with Washington at Valley Forge. A brother of Mrs. Spring, O. L. Abbott, came to California in 1867, and for years was a prominent lawyer in Santa Barbara. In 1873 Mr. Spring came west with his family and located in Montecito, and the next year bought a ranch at the foot of the hills, and engaged in the apiary business. This proved a successful and profitable venture, and he usually had as many as two hundred colonies of the Italian variety of bees. He also raised small fruits on his farm, and in 1893 sold out his property and bought the Blaisdell farm which has since been his home. Many improvements have been made on the new possession, and the land is chiefly devoted to lemon and berry culture. The Spring family were one of about twelve of those who originally settled in the valley, and who have materially aided in the general improvement. Much of his success Mr. Spring attributed to the sympathy and assistance of his wife, whose good judgment and sound common sense have aided over many a difficulty, and suggested a bright and hopeful rather than a discouraging state of affairs.

The children born to Mr. and Mrs. Spring are: Arthur L., at home; Charles M., in Santa Barbara county; Roland F., who is living at Montecito; and Cora L., who is the wife of W. A. Phillips. In politics Mr. Spring was an intelligent and conservative socialist. He was a Mason for many years, and soon after coming here became associated with the Starr King Post, G. A. R., in which latter organization he was very active. He served as trustee of the Montecito school district, and was in favor of all possible educational advantages. Mr. Spring was well and favorably known among the pioneers of the valley, and contributed his share towards the burdens and enduring the hardships of pioneer life.

The death of Mr. Spring occurred suddenly August 25, 1902, heart failure being the immediate cause. His death was a loss to the community of which he was a leading citizen and pioneer. In every movement for the development of this region he was always a working participant, especially in the organization of agricultural and horticultural societies for the dissemination of knowledge to promote fruit culture of all kinds, as well as movements to build up the farming interests of the locality. In belief he was a liberal Spiritualist, a large, kind-hearted man, possessing sound judgment and sterling integrity, and honored and respected by all. For three weeks before his demise his home had been the scene of a reunion of the brothers and sisters of his wife. Although very feeble, he entered most enthusiastically into the spirit of the occasion. One after another had taken their leave and the last of the guests was about to depart when suddenly that always unexpected guest, Death, entered the home and Mr. Spring peacefully passed into eternity.

JAMES V. AKEY. Especially in that part of Los Angeles formerly known as Vernondale and later as South Los Angeles is the name of J. V. Akey, well known and influential. Coming to Vernon district in 1887, later he established the first general mercantile establishment on Central and Vernon avenues. At that time Vernondale postoffice was one-half mile east. It was superseded by the South Los Angeles postoffice, the station for which was in his store. At a still later date this postoffice was annexed to Los Angeles as Station K and as such continues to the present. From the spring of 1888 until 1894 he carried a line of merchandise, hardware and drugs in a building on the northwest corner of Central and Vernon, but during the latter year disposed of his stock, excepting the drugs, to N. W. Woods, after which he devoted himself to the management of his pharmacy in a store near by. In 1897 he planned and built the first brick block this side of Seventh street, it being a two-story structure, 45x88, with basement. The first floor is utilized for a pharmacy, as is also the basement, while the second floor is a hall adapted to lodge and society use. In addition, he built frame stores adjoining, so that he has erected altogether a frontage of eighty-five feet on Central avenue. Besides his drug business, he is interested, with C. B. Bennett, in the Vernon grocery, one of the largest on the avenue.

Mr. Akey represents the third generation of an English family in America. His father, James B., a native of Pennsylvania, learned the merchant tailor's trade in that state, but after going to Defiance, Ohio, on account of ill health, he turned his attention to farming. In 1864 he removed to Michigan and settled near Burroak, St. Joseph county, where he engaged in farming until he died. He had married Mary E. Yates, who was born in Pennsylvania and died in Michigan June 25, 1901, at the age of seventy-nine years. Her father, William Yates, was born in Pennsylvania, of Scotch Irish descent, and became a merchant of Bryan, Ohio. In the family of James B. Akey there were four children, namely: W. B., who came to Los Angeles in 1882 and was instrumental in getting Central avenue through and extending Vernon avenue; Robert, who occupies the homestead in Michigan; James V.; and Alice, who remains at the old Michigan home.

In Defiance county, Ohio, James V. Akey was born November 15, 1853. When the family moved to Michigan he was about eleven years of age. While still a mere boy he entered his brother's store at Colon, Mich., and remained there eight years, meantime learning the trades of pharmacist, jeweler and undertaker, for this was one of those country stores wherein are kept different varieties of stock and various industries are conducted under one roof. Finally he bought out his brother, after which he continued alone for five years. During his residence in Colon he was township treasurer for two terms, township clerk three terms, and at the time of his removal was filling the office of justice of the peace. In the fall of 1887 he disposed of his interests in Michigan and came to California, where for a few months he was employed in his brother's real estate office, after which he entered business for himself. Besides his various store buildings, he owns a home on Central avenue and other residence property, all representing his accumulations since coming west. As a business man he is keen, energetic and vigorous in action, and while recognizing the rights of others, he expects from them the same courteous recognition of his rights. Justice is with him the motive power of action and has ruled his life. He is a member of the State Pharmaceutical Association and in other ways has kept in touch with general activities in his special line of business. In the Republican party he has been a worker on local committees, while fraternally he is connected with the Modern Woodmen of America, the Order of Pendo and the Masonic Order, having been initiated into the blue lodge and chapter in Colon, Mich., and the Commandery of Sturgis, Mich., of which he is still a member. By his marriage to Miss Lillie E. Hollinshead, of Colon, Mich., and who was born in Indiana, he has one daughter, Mary Vernon.

REV. J. BOYD ANDREWS. Though not an old man at the time of his death in 1899, having attained to one less than three score years, Mr. Andrews accomplished a world of good during his ministrations in the Presbyterian church, to the interests of which he devoted all of his years of activity. His benevolent disposition and innumerable acts of kindness are retained in the minds and hearts of the thousands to whom he eloquently indicated a life of serenity and goodness, and whom he persuaded to adopt in their daily intercourse the uplifting principles of Christianity.

J. Halladay

A native of Lamont, Pa., Mr. Andrews was born in 1840, and received in his youth admirable educational advantages. He studied at Lafayette College, Easton, Pa., and at the Northwestern Theological Seminary in Chicago, from which he entered the ministry of the Presbyterian Church. Following his graduation he preached at Columbus, Wis., and at Appleton, of the same state, in which latter city he organized and built the first church of his denomination. An excess of zeal and consequent strain upon his mental and physical well-being resulted in his resigning the pastorate at the end of six years, and removing to Hebron, Ill., near the Wisconsin state line. In 1888 he came to Carpinteria, Cal., and at once evinced the almost superhuman vitality and activity which had characterized his efforts in the middle west. He built up the church and placed it on a substantial footing with others of the denomination in the county. For a short time he officiated in the church of Santa Maria, Santa Barbara county, and for three years had a pastorate at Santa Cruz, where he accomplished excellent results in building up the church. Combined with a natural felicity and eloquence of expression, Mr. Andrews possessed a genius for organization, which, perhaps, was the special claim for recognition in summing up his work. He rarely failed in reviving spiritless congregations, and infusing the necessary enthusiasm for a continued interest when the work passed into other hands.

August 1, 1882, Mr. Andrews married Elsie West, who was born and educated in Wisconsin. To Mr. and Mrs. Andrews were born three children, Donald, Jean and Helen.

DANIEL HALLADAY. Upon the establishment of the Commercial Bank of Santa Ana, in 1882, Mr. Halladay was chosen to occupy the position of president, which office he filled for a number of years, and since then he has acted in the capacity of vice-president. In addition to his connection with this concern he was a promoter and incorporator of the Bank of Orange, of which he has officiated as a director since its organization. At one time he was also a director of the Orange County Savings Bank. When the project of furnishing Santa Ana with gas for illuminating purposes was proposed, he promoted the plan and assisted in incorporating the Santa Ana Gas Company, of which he became a director. Another enterprise which he assisted in inaugurating was the Santa Ana, Orange and Tustin street railway, and he served as a director of this company.

In Marlboro, Vt., Mr. Halladay was born November 24, 1827, a son of David and Nancy (Carpenter) Halladay, also natives of Vermont, the former being a son of Daniel Halladay, who was a New Englander by birth. When twelve years of age Daniel Halladay accompanied his parents to Springfield, Mass., where the family resided several years, later settling in Ware, the same state. His education was received in public schools. When nineteen years of age he began to learn the trade of a machinist, which he followed as apprentice and journeyman for six years, and during the latter half of this time he was foreman in the American machine works at Springfield, Mass., and the machine works of Seth Adams & Co., in South Boston, Mass. From South Boston he returned to Springfield, resuming his former position as foreman in the American machine works. While there he had charge of the construction of the caloric engine, which was invented by John Ericsson, the famous designer of the Monitor. Upon its completion the engine was exhibited at the World's Fair in London, England, in 1851, Mr. Halladay having been sent to England for the purpose of superintending its exhibition and also its erection in the Crystal Palace in which it was placed among the American exhibits.

On his return from England, Mr. Halladay became a partner in a machine manufacturing concern at Ellington, Conn. In a short time, however, he removed to South Coventry, Conn., and engaged in the manufacture of machinery there under the title of the Halladay Wind Mill Company. The greater part of the machines turned out by the company were his own inventions, for from an early age he had shown himself to possess considerable inventive ability. In 1863 the plant and business were moved to Batavia, Ill., where he made his home and conducted the business until his removal to Santa Ana, Cal., in 1880. Meantime, under his energetic and wise supervision, the business at Batavia had assumed large proportions, and when wishing to retire from the manufacturing business, he disposed of his interest in the plant, it was at a satisfactory figure. Since becoming a resident of Santa Ana, he has had agricultural and horticultural interests, but his attention, as before stated, has been principally given to the banking business. Fraternally he is a Mason, and in politics has always supported the principles of the Republican party. His home in Santa Ana is presided over by his wife, who was formerly Susan M. Spooner, of Belchertown, Mass., a member of an old family of New England.

HENRY MILTON AMES. The Ames family was identified with the early history of Connecticut. When the tide of emigration was moving westward from New England, Leonard Ames determined to seek a home for himself and family in the then west. A native of Litchfield, Conn., and a farmer near that city, he had married Minerva Peck, and at the time of their reremoval they were the parents of two children. The little family journeyed in an ox-cart, drawn by two oxen, and in this primitive conveyance they crossed over into New York and traveled as far as the town of Mexico, Oswego county. The discovery of a fine large spring led Mr. Ames to locate there. Buying two hundred acres of heavily timbered land, he at once began to build a log house, the family living in the wagon until the cabin was ready for occupancy. Next he turned his attention to clearing the land and placing the soil under cultivation. Being a man of great energy, he succeeded in making of his farm a valuable estate, and with increasing prosperity he built for his family a frame house. This, in turn, became inadequate to their wants, and in 1835 he built a stone residence which still stands, and in which he and his wife died. A man of staunch convictions, he was an abolitionist and a firm opponent of the system of slavery. In politics he voted the Whig ticket. His wife was the first Methodist who settled in Oswego county and the first meeting ever held by that denomination in the county was held in her little bedroom.

The youngest and the only survivor of the thirteen children of Leonard and Minerva Ames is Henry Milton Ames, born in Oswego county, N. Y., March 30, 1824. As a boy he attended Mexico Academy, which his father had assisted in establishing. In 1837 he went to Oswego, where he was employed in the manufacture of plaster and cement and operated a mill for that purpose. Later he engaged in building vessels. A subsequent enterprise was the forwarding and commission business, in which he forwarded goods that had come from New York City to Oswego by canal boats, transferring them to his vessels and shipping them west on the lakes. Through these various enterprises, Mr. Ames acquired a thorough knowledge of several different lines of business, and he now turned his attention to a line somewhat different from any in which he was previously interested. Becoming the head of the private banking house of Ames, Howlett & Co., he continued until 1855, and in the meantime established a reputation as a financier of unusual ability. On severing his connection with the bank, in 1855 he established the Ames iron works of Oswego. Into this business, in 1870, he took his brother Leonard, also Isaac L. Merriam, but the following year, owing to failing health, he found it advisable to seek a more equable climate, and therefore disposed of his interest in the plant, which, however, is still known as the Ames iron works. While he was proprietor of the Ames Manufacturing Company, they manufactured portable engines, which found a large sale throughout the entire country and hundreds are still used in the coast states.

Since 1871 Mr. Ames has been a resident of California and for some years made his home in the northern part of the state, where he became interested in the stock business. Purchasing a ranch of sixteen hundred acres in Shasta county, he stocked the place and in time became the owner of very important interests. To facilitate the disposal of his cattle, he turned his attention to the slaughtering business, and built the first slaughter house and started the present Butchertown at Oakland. Subsequently he built other slaughter houses, also erected various warehouses, a hotel, and buildings for the promotion of his business. He was the first to slaughter beef at Salt Lake and ship the same in refrigerator cars to Oakland for the San Francisco market. Another industry in which he engaged about the same time was the manufacture of beet sugar, for which purpose he leased a sugar refinery at Isleton, near Sacramento, but a year's experiment with the plant convinced him that the beets in that damp soil grew too large and coarse a fibre, and therefore the percentage of sugar was too low to be manufactured.

The year 1882 witnessed the arrival of Mr. Ames in Southern California. It might be supposed by many that, having led a very active life, he would now retire from all business interests and, in this delightful climate would pass the afternoon of existence in quiet retirement. But those who would form such opinions certainly could know little of the activity of the man. The exercise of his talents in various forms of business enterprise is with him inseparable from existence. He is happiest when busiest, hence has allowed increasing years to bring him no lessening of responsibilities. On coming to this part of the state, he bought two hundred acres near the San Gabriel Mission, for which he paid $17 an acre, and this he disposed of, during the boom, for $300 an acre, receiving a total of $60,000 for the whole. He then came to Los Angeles, where he now makes his home at No. 4517 Central avenue. The laying out of tracts in city lots and the improvement thereof have taken much of his time and attention of recent years. Under the title of H. M. Ames subdivision of Vernon, he laid out forty acres on Central avenue and Vernon street. He also bought sixty acres of the Glassell tract near the Los Angeles city limits, which he platted in lots that sold readily at private sale and auction. To facilitate settlement thereon, he became interested in a company that built a street car line from the Santa Fe depot to the city limits on the Glassell tract, thereby bringing the lots into easy access from the business center. The irrigation system that he established on the tract is still in use. At this writing his attention is given principally to the refining of oil, owning, with two partners, the Pacific oil refinery near the Santa Fe Railroad.

MATT H. ARNOLD. One of the prosperous farmers in the vicinity of Ventura is M. H. Arnold, a resident of California since 1852, and a farmer in his present locality since 1868. He was born in DeKalb county, Ill., February 16, 1844, and is a son of Cutler and Emily (Hough) Arnold. The family of which he was a member comprised the following children: Henry, deceased; LeRoy, deceased; Matt H., Eugene, a farmer; Edward, of Fillmore, Cal.; George, who is engaged in farming near Hueneme; Mrs. Emma Pitcher, of Hueneme; and Mrs. Fannie Baxter, of Los Angeles. The maternal ancestors were pioneers of Connecticut and Massachusetts and moved from New York to Illinois. The paternal ancestors became identified with Connecticut and Vermont in an early day. Cutler Arnold, who was a son of Nathan Arnold, was born in Ohio in 1818, and in 1849 made the long journey overland to California. During 1868 he settled on a farm in Ventura county, where the subsequent years of his life were passed. He died in 1892.

In addition to a public school education Matt H. Arnold was privileged to attend Oakland College. His first efforts to earn a livelihood were in teaming on the frontier, hauling merchandise between California and Idaho and Nevada. Ever since eight years of age he has been identified with California history, his father having sent east for the family in 1852. When the family came to Ventura county in 1868 he accompanied them, and settled in the valley near Hueneme. From that time until 1877 the three sons, Eugene, Edward and Matt H., conducted farm operations in partnership, but finally the property was divided and each started out alone. Since then and until November, 1902, Matt H. has been farming on his four hundred acre ranch two and a half miles east of Hueneme, which he still owns, raising stock, barley, corn, lima beans and sugar beets, in about the order named, as he became acquainted with the adaptability of the soil. In November, 1901, he bought the Thurston place near Ventura, which is a portion of the Santa Paula y Saticoy tract and contains eighty-eight acres principally devoted to the raising of beans. The ranch is well improved and the house occupied by the family is large and comfortable.

In 1877 Mr. Arnold married Eliza Perkins, a native of Maine and a daughter of T. E. Perkins, who now resides in Los Angeles county. Of this union there are four children; Ralph M., Chester, Joe and Alice. When the Ocean View district was formed near Hueneme, Mr. Arnold was elected one of the school trustees and held the position for fifteen years, during which time the first school house in the district was built. Fraternally he is associated with the Ancient Order of United Workmen. Always a staunch Republican, he has served as a member of the county Republican central committee and has been active in party matters. His worth as a citizen was early recognized and his influence in political matters was felt by all who came in contact with him either in local gatherings or committee work. In 1890 he was nominated for county supervisor and received the election in the autumn of that year, after which he served until 1894, meantime giving his support to all measures for the benefit of the county.

HON. THOMAS A. RICE, a typical representative of a distinguished southern ancestry, occupies a place in Ventura county warranted by his numerous capabilities, his unblemished integrity, and those admirable traits of citizenship everywhere recognized as productive of sound government and municipal purity. Of English descent, the family of which he is a member was first represented in America by the paternal great-grandfather, who emigrated from England and settled in North Carolina. The grandfather, Archibald, was also born in North Carolina, and married Miss Richmond, whose ancestors founded the town of Richmond, Va. To this couple was born William (the father of Thomas A.), who married Louise Ish, of Tennessee, the daughter of William Ish, also a Tennessean. Besides Thomas A., there were in the family six other children, who profited by the prosperity and good fortune of their father, William. The family came to California when Thomas A. was ten years of age, he having been born in Jackson county, Mo., at Independence, January 24, 1849. The journey west was made overland, and the belongings of the family were augmented by one thousand head of cattle, successfully driven over the plains, and which formed the nucleus of large stock-raising enterprises later conducted in Merced and Contra Costa counties. In the latter county the family owned two thousand acres of land. William Rice was a fine and courtly southern gentleman, whose death in 1885 left an irreparable vacancy in the hearts of all who had been the recipients of his bounty, the possessors of his friendship, or the rejoicers in his good fortune and genial personality.

Well fitted for future responsibility through educational advantages acquired at a private school, Thomas A. Rice embarked upon his first independent venture as manager of the farm of four hundred and seventy acres left him by his father. This beautiful and finely developed bottom land was located three miles from Oxnard, and to it has been added by more recent purchase until the acres composing it aggregate nine hundred. A more thoroughly up-to-date property cannot be conceived of, a truly splendid ranch, with a whole village of ranch houses of modern construction, as well as a school house. The residence on the ranch is worthy of its surroundings, is built after the most approved plans, and is fitted with electric bells, gas, hot and cold water, and most artistic and harmonious finishings. Beautified to the extent of the landscape gardeners' art are the grounds of this luxurious Southern California home, and surrounding hedges add that touch of intimacy and seclusion in keeping with the social standing, tastes, and requirements of those who live upon its fertile acres, and are an integral part of this development of nature. Although at the present time the fertile lands are rented out with the exception of a twenty-five acre walnut ranch, Mr. Rice still has a general supervision over his property, and no one more than he awaits the prolific harvests which never fail in their mission or depart from the uniformity of their abundant measure. In addition to a general farming industry there were raised in 1900 six hundred acres of beets, and there is always maintained in the pastures a fine showing of blooded horses, both driving and draft.

Possessing an inborn capacity for noting and improving the surrounding opportunities, it is not surprising that Mr. Rice should appreciate the advantages in the sugar-beet industry, and should assiduously work for the accomplishment of the best results. Before Oxnard became the headquarters for one of the largest (and by far the best appointed) factories in the world, he worked incessantly for weeks to make it possible to have the factory located here, by securing the requisite guarantee of ten thousand acres devoted exclusively to beet culture. How admirable was this forethought has been repeatedly demonstrated, and the presence in its midst of this really wonderful manufactory has increased the value of land one hundred per cent. One hundred acres accommodate the enterprise. This land was formerly owned by Mr. Rice but was sold to the Beet Sugar Company. He still owns two hundred and fifty acres located on either side of the factory, and which is devoted to the raising of beets. In addition to his other activities he is a director and large stockholder in the Bank of Oxnard.

Formerly presiding over his ideal rural home was the first Mrs. Rice, nee Lilian Flournoy, of Santa Clara county, and daughter of Thomas Flournoy, of Danville, Contra Costa county. Mrs. Rice, who died in 1897, was the mother of four children, viz: Blanche, who is a graduate of Mills College, class of 1900; Madge, who is attending Mills College; Alvin, who is attending St. Mathew's School, at San Mateo; and Merrill, who is at Mills and is preparing for college. Beyond all else save the splendid training in their home, Mr. Rice values the best possible education for his children, and he is prepared to develop and encourage the latent talent, and furnish any advantage for culture and improvement. Exemplified is his theory of broad-minded progressiveness by the advantages afforded his daughter, who, upon her graduation from Mills College, accompanied Mr. and Mrs. W. G. Patterson and daughter on an extended European tour which included Japan and other Oriental countries. In 1899 Mr. Rice married Virginia Moriarty, of San José, and the wedding journey combined the pleasures incident to the occasion with the responsibility as delegate to Honolulu, in the capacity of horticultural inspector, appointed by Governor Gage.

In politics Mr. Rice is a Democrat, and in the latter '80s served for a term as county supervisor. In November of 1890 he was elected state assemblyman, and had the unusual honor of running three hundred votes ahead of his ticket. At the last state convention of the Democratic party he declined the nomination for lieutenant-governor. He is at the present time horticultural commissioner of the state of California. Mr. Rice has taken an active part in the Masonic history of Southern California. He was made a Mason in Hueneme, and is now a member of the Ventura Chapter and Commandery and Mystic Shrine, Al Malakiah Temple, of Los Angeles. The precepts and teachings of the noble order Mr. Rice has exemplified in his daily intercourse with his fellowmen, and he stands to-day as a typical embodiment of a progressive American citizen.

B. FRANK DENNEY BITHER. There is a tradition in the Bither family to the effect that many generations ago a boy was stolen from his home and placed on board a ship bound for America. The child was so small that he could give no intelligible account of himself, nor did he know his name. However, he displayed such a desire to bite everyone who came near him that he was called Bither, and in this way the family name originated. The family was early established in Maine, where was born and reared Tyler Bither, a farmer of Aroostook county, who in 1854 braved the perilous voyage to California via Cape Horn and for a few years mined there. A later enterprise was the hotel business, after which he improved a farm near Hill's Ferry. In the fall of 1876 he settled near Montalvo, Ventura county, and bought one hundred acres, he subsequently cultivated about three hundred acres of adjoining land. On selling that property he came to Santa Barbara and in 1888 bought the Santa Barbara soda works. At first he was a member of the firm of Coffman & Bither, but in 1892 he bought his partner's interest and thereafter continued alone until he died, in January, 1899. Fraternally he was an Odd Fellow and in politics a Republican. His wife, Sarah J., was a daughter of Moses Ward, who died at ninety-one years. She was born in Massachusetts, removed thence to Maine, and died in Santa Barbara. Of her nine children all but two grew to maturity and six are now living, all in California.

The youngest son in the family, Ben Frank Denney Bither, was born in Stanislaus county, Cal., near Hill's Ferry, November 3, 1869. In the fall of 1888 he came to Santa Barbara and entered the employ of Coffman & Bither, where he remained a few years, meantime gaining a thorough knowledge of the business. In 1891 he settled upon a farm in Ventura county. Returning to Santa Barbara two years later, he was foreman for the asphalt company for two years, after which he became manager for his father in the soda works. On the death of his father he became sole proprietor and as such has continued since. In the works are manufactured all kinds of soda, which are shipped to adjoining cities and also sold in large quantities in the home town. The plant at No. 512 Garden street is modern in every respect and is fully equipped with the appurtenances of first-class works. The success that has attended the business is largely the result of unwearied application on the part of the proprietor, who gives his entire time to the building up of the plant.

Fraternally Mr. Bither is connected with the Foresters of America and the Fraternal Brotherhood. November 26, 1895, he married Miss Henrietta Bertha Rood, who is the only survivor of the two daughters of Noble and Martha (Edwards) Rood, natives respectively of Kent county, Mich., and New York state. The first of the Rood family to remove from New England was her grandfather, Zebulon Rood, a native of Vermont and a pioneer farmer of Michigan. Her father, also, was a farmer and lived near Big Rapids, Mich., where she was born. When sixteen years of age he enlisted in Company A, Fourth Michigan Cavalry, and served mostly as a scout. In a battle his horse was shot under him and he was thrown senseless in a ditch, where he was captured by the Confederates. For eleven months he was a prisoner in Andersonville, not being released until the close of the Civil war. Later he settled in Texas, where he was a farmer and merchant. From there he came to Santa Barbara in July, 1889, where he and his wife now make their home. Mr. and Mrs. Bither have two children, Edgar Rood and Barbara.

CAPT. HENRY G. BURTON, M. D. While America was still an unsettled wilderness the Burton family crossed the ocean from England and identified themselves with the pioneers of Connecticut. When war was declared against the mother country Elijah Burton was among the brave patriots who bore arms in the cause of independence. After the close of the war he removed from Connecticut to Vermont, accompanied by his family, which included a son, Nathan. The latter became judge of Bennington county and one of the most honored men in all that region. He married Charlotte, daughter of Dr. Josiah Graves of Connecticut, who served as sergeant in the Revolutionary war and later became a physician in Vermont, where he died. In the family of Judge Nathan Burton was a son, J. G., who in early life followed farming. The possession of superior ability brought him into prominence among his fellow-citizens, and he was honored by them with election to important positions. One of his first offices was that of selectman, later he became a member of the legislature, and finally was elected to the state senate, where his service was that of a broad-minded patriot and able statesman. By his marriage to Ruth, daughter of Titus Sheldon and a native of Rupert, Vt., he had three sons and three daughters, all of whom are living but one daughter. One of the sons, Capt. Titus Sheldon Burton, came to California in 1856 and engaged in merchandising in the vicinity of Marysville and Downeyville, but now makes his home at Weber Lake, this state. During the Civil war he raised Company I, of the Eighth California regiment and served as its captain in California from 1864 to 1865.

The youngest child of Hon. J. G. and Ruth Burton was Henry Guild Burton, who was born at Rupert, Vt., October 27, 1846. He was educated in public schools, the Burr & Burton Seminary of Manchester, Vt., and Fort Edward Collegiate Institute at Fort Edward, N. Y., from which he was graduated. At the age of twenty years he began to study medicine with Dr. J. H. Guild of Rupert, and later matriculated in the medical department of the University of the City of New York, from which he was graduated in 1869. During subsequent years he has endeavored to keep posted in all developments made in therapeutics, and as an aid thereto he took a course of lectures in the Post-Graduate Medical School of New York City in 1881 and 1882 and again in 1891 and 1892. His initial experience as a practitioner was gained in Benson, Vt., and in the adjoining town of Castleton.

Under appointment by President Grant, August 5, 1876, Dr. Burton became assistant surgeon, with the rank of first lieutenant, in the United States army. Five years later he was raised to the rank of captain, and continued in the service without interruption until February 5, 1892, when he was retired on account of disability. During his active service he was from 1876 to 1880 stationed at Fort Bowie and Fort Verde, Ariz. From there he was transferred to the department of the east and until 1883 was stationed in New York state, at Forts Niagara, Wadsworth, and Hamilton. From that time until 1887 he was in the department of Dakota, at Forts Abraham, Lincoln and Assiniboin. His next station was Plattsburg Barracks, N. Y., where on account of illness he was given a furlough of eighteen months. On returning to duty he spent a year at David's Island in New York. Later, for some months, he was stationed at Vancouver Barracks, Wash. In December, 1890, he was transferred to San Diego Barracks on account of ill health and remained there until his retirement in February, 1892. At the expiration of his long service with the government he took up private practice in San Diego. A year later he went to San Francisco as instructor in ophthalmology and otology in the San Francisco Polyclinic, and continued there until January, 1897, when he was appointed first assistant surgeon of the Pacific Branch, National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and since then he has been identified with the work at the Soldiers' Home. In Benson, Vt., in 1869 he married Mary L. Clark, who was born in New Jersey. While in Castleton he held membership with the Congregational Church. His political views are in accord with Republican principles. He is a member of the Sons of the American Revolution at San Francisco, and along the line of his profession is associated with the San Diego County Medical Society and the American Medical Association.

LOMBARD CONKLIN. Foremost among the honored pioneers of Montecito is Lombard Conklin, who was born in Tioga county, N. Y., in 1828, his parents, Jacob and Joanna (Armstrong) Conklin, being also natives of Tioga county. He received a common school education in his native state, and in 1843 removed to Fort Wayne, Ind., at which time that now flourishing town was too insignificant to command the dignity of a railroad station. Taking up engineering, he followed the occupation for many years. In 1856 he came west by way of Panama and up the coast to San Francisco, eventually locating at Diamond Springs where he became engineer of the saw mill. When the chill of winter caused a lull in the sawmill industry he turned his attention to the mines, and some experiences not planned by the management fell to his lot. In the winter of 1857 he was buried in the hydraulic mines at Dutch Flat, and was completely covered with dirt for some time before relieved from his uncomfortable position.

In 1860 Mr. Conklin changed his field of activity to the Comstock mines in Nevada, and also worked in the Aurora mines, as engineer in the mines and quartz mills. While he filled this position in the Union mill Samuel Clemens (better known as Mark Twain), was an employe of the mill for several days. After five years in Nevada Mr. Conklin took a trip of investigation and engineering to San Francisco, Gold Hill, Silver City and Virginia City, and in 1868 came to the Montecito valley and purchased a ranch of seventy acres. This land originally was sold for forty-eight cents per acre or $25.00 for fifty-two acres. It formerly belonged to the Pueblo Indians, and was densely covered with oak trees. The trees have now been removed, and Mr. Conklin raises hay, stock, and fruit, and has a fine lemon orchard of Eureka lemons, selling his fruit to the Santa Barbara Lemon Exchange. There is also an orchard where all kinds of fruit are grown, and the house and outbuildings are of a high order of construction, and quite in keeping with the natural thrift of the owner. Not quite convinced of the desirability of a permanent residence on his farm, Mr. Conklin disposed of the same in 1873, and removed to Sonoma county, Cal., where he farmed with indifferent success for three years. He then came back and re-purchased his original possession, and has since had no desire to wander from his abundant harvests and well-tilled acres. In July, 1901, he revisited Sonoma county, Cal., and found that the country had not kept pace with the improvements in Santa Barbara county, and that real estate had increased but little in value in the last quarter of a century.

Mr. Conklin keeps in touch with all advance in the horticultural line, and is likewise interested in all that concerns the general improvement of the valley. In politics he is a Republican, but has held no office except that of trustee of the school district, which he filled for several years. He is an active member of the Santa Barbara Congregational Church, and has been a teacher in the Union Sunday School for several years. A liberal-minded gentleman, he is esteemed by all who know him, especially by those who have for years enjoyed his friendship.

BENJAMIN W. DUDLEY. During the long period of his residence in the Santa Clara valley Mr. Dudley has gained many friends and a high place among the ranchers of his locality. Of eastern birth and extraction, he was born at Canaan, Grafton county, N. H., May 12, 1844, and is a son of Timothy B. and Elizabeth K. (Davis) Dudley, the former a native of Vermont, but for many years a resident of New Hampshire. In 1855 the family removed to southeastern Iowa, and five years later settled in Fond du Lac, Wis., where they made their home during the Civil war. Being a firm believer in Union principles, Benjamin W. Dudley proved his patriotism by his enlistment in the Federal army in 1864, at which time he became a member of the First Wisconsin Cavalry, army of the Cumberland, under Colonel Harnden. One experience of war times which he has never forgotten was in connection with the capture of Jeff Davis, in May, 1865, his company having the honor of finding the Confederate general when he was in hiding. At the close of the war he was mustered out at Nashville and returned to his Wisconsin home.

Going to Lee county, Iowa, in 1869, Mr. Dudley embarked in the meat business at Denmark. While there he often heard of California and the opportunities which it offered aspiring and energetic men. Finally he decided to seek a home in the far west, so closed out his interests in Iowa. Via the Union Pacific Railroad he arrived in California in 1875. Shortly after his arrival he bought forty acres of the Santa Paula y Saticoy rancho in Ventura county, but soon went further north in the state. Returning in 1877, he afterward added one hundred and sixty acres of land to his forty-acre tract, and for the past eight years has held a trust deed given in such a way that should he see fit, he can hold the same during the balance of his life. The ranch forms one of the best improved places in the valley. For a time he followed general farming, making a specialty of wheat and barley, and he also had live-stock in considerable numbers. He was a pioneer in the walnut-growing industry and has now thirty acres in the soft-shell variety. In addition, he has forty acres planted in lima beans, in which industry he was also a pioneer. Since the organization of the Saticoy Water Company, he has officiated as its secretary and much of the time has also acted as manager. A promoter of the system of sprinkling the country roads, he has thus enhanced the comfort of the people of the valley. Another way in which he has benefited the community was through the introduction of an ordinance (which was passed) prohibiting the growth of the morning glory until seed time, and thus he rid the locality of what was rapidly becoming a pest.

As a candidate of the Republican party Mr. Dudley has been elected to various local offices. In 1883 he was chosen justice of the peace and held the justice court for the Saticoy district. From 1887 to 1891 he served as supervisor and during two years of the time was chairman of the board. Before his last election the saloons of Ventura county paid only $64 per year (due each quarter); believing this sum far too low, he introduced a high license ordinance, which was passed, thus giving the county $600 per annum in advance. In recognition of his perseverance in securing the passage of this ordinance he became known as the "daddy of high license." The board of supervisors in 1894 appointed him commissioner from Ventura county to the San Francisco midwinter fair. In educational matters he is warmly interested. Besides being for six or more years a director of the district school, he is also a member of the union high school board of education of Ventura.

In Wisconsin Mr. Dudley married Gertrude Newell, who died there, leaving a daughter, who is now Mrs. Carrie N. Nugent, of Chilton, Wis. His second marriage took place in California, within one-half mile of his present home, and united him with Miss Carrie L. Smith. Four children were born of this union, Laura Alice, Mary E., Oscar L. and Ethel I. The family are identified with the Ventura Congregational Church. Fraternally Mr. Dudley is a charter member of Cushing Post No. 44, G. A. R., of which he was elected commander in January, 1901, and has filled other offices. He is one of the directors of the Rochdale Co-operative store. Always active in temperance work, he is president of the Anti-Saloon League of Ventura county and was one of the main promoters of the test case of L. Serf vs. Ventura county. With but limited means when he came to this county, besides which he was hampered by ill health, not only has he regained his health, but he has also been successful in his undertakings, and now occupies a place among the prosperous ranchers of Ventura county.

W. F. WICKENDEN. The mercantile interests of Los Alamos are well represented by W. F. Wickenden, one of the successful and enterprising general merchants of the county of Santa Barbara. A westerner by birth, training and education, he was born in San Luis Obispo, June 5, 1861, a son of Frederick Wickenden, who came to this county in 1889, and still is a rancher on a very extensive scale. His education was acquired in the public schools, supplemented by a course at St. Mary's College, from which he was graduated with honors in 1882. For a number of years he afterwards lived on his father's ranch, and learned to be a practical and scientific farmer.

An early adaptability to general business convinced Mr. Wickenden that he would find his greatest sphere of usefulness and success in that field, and in 1889 himself and brother, J. D., opened a general mercantile establishment in this town. Their plans were wisely laid and their honest financial methods and correct estimate of what would be generally required secured for them an extended patronage, not only in the town but in the surrounding country. In addition to their general trade they for many years furnished the Alcatraz Mining Company with provisions, an important item of profit in itself. The responsibilities of Mr. Wickenden were increased in 1899 by the death of his brother, J. D., on April 29th, since which time he has been the sole owner of the business, and has greatly increased his stock. He has now added hardware and agricultural implements to his general necessities, and contemplates branching out even further as the demand increases. His establishment is a well conducted, neat and orderly place, where goods may be bought at a figure consistent with reasonable profit, and of the best quality procurable. In addition, the owner thereof has another store at Garey, run on much the same lines, but less extensive.

The marriage of Mr. Wickenden and Margaret Sauer occurred in San Luis Obispo in 1883. Mr. Wickenden is a believer in the higher education, and is giving his children every advantage within his power. The three oldest are now attending high school. A staunch Democrat, Mr. Wickenden had never desired public office, although often called upon to fill positions of trust. When twenty-one years of age he was a candidate for county recorder, and was defeated by only fourteen votes. Fraternally he is associated with the Ancient Order of United Workmen, Lodge No. 219, at Los Alamos. He is a man of fine principle and unquestioned integrity, and is highly regarded by the community in which he lives.

JAMES H. CRANE. This citizen of Ventura, who is now enjoying a well-earned relaxation from business cares, was born in Caldwell, N. Y., January 7, 1824. The family of which he is a member is of Scotch extraction, the first emigrants from their native land having settled in New Jersey, where they became prominently identified with the growth of their respective localities. Major Nathaniel S. Crane, the father of James H., was born in New Jersey, and became one of the wealthiest men in his county, if not in the state. He was a railroad contractor, and built the Morris canal and the Erie Railroad, and was incidentally a farmer and successful financier. By meritorious service during the war of 1812 he was raised to the rank of major, and his whole life was filled with worthy undertakings, quite in keeping with his powerful physique and mentality. He died in New Jersey at the age of eighty-four years. Twice married, he raised six children by each marriage. The mother of James H. Crane was July Hedges, who was born in Connecticut and died in New Jersey.

Inheriting his father's business ability, James H. Crane began at a comparatively early age to earn his own living, and in New Jersey, where he was reared and educated, engaged in farming and stock-raising. His weather eye, open for opportunities, foresaw the waiting chances in the west, and in 1852 he boarded the good ship Daniel Webster, in New York harbor, and made the trip to San Francisco, via Nicaragua, Leland Stanford being a fellow passenger. Arriving in California he engaged in mining on the North Fork of the American river, at Uniontown, but soon forsook the uncertainties of mining for the occupation of freighting. With a team of six fine horses, and a wagon which bore the inspiring name, "Pro Bono Publico," he began the conveyance of goods and chattels over the rough country roads, and into the mining camps. In 1855 he returned to New Jersey, taking the same route by which he came and finding his way back to Caldwell, N. J. There he engaged in many enterprises, all equally successful. His responsibilities included large real estate transactions, traffic in farms, horses, stock, and loans, the carrying on of mercantile business, and the supervision of the management of three or four farms. He also owned land in Mont Clair, where he was prominent in business circles, and where he held numerous local offices.

In 1887 Mr. Crane returned to California and located in Ventura, where for a time he engaged in real estate and loans, but from which he eventually retired. He has a pleasant and hospitable home on Poli street. His wife was, before her marriage, Abbie D. Harrison, and is a native of New Jersey, and a relative of William Henry Harrison. To Mr. and Mrs. Crane have been born two children, Ella, and William, who died at the age of almost two years. Ella, the wife of Thomas Gould, and the mother of two children, Thomas C. and Olive Gould, is a floriculturist of national reputation; her petunias are said to be the finest in the world, and the demand for them has extended to all countries.

THOMAS A. CRAVENS. Prominent among those who for years enjoyed to the utmost the advantages to be found in Southern California, and whose declining days were brightened by the consciousness of having well performed their part in developing her resources, was Thomas A. Cravens, whose latter life was centered in the beautiful Carpinteria valley, and whose death February 29, 1888, at the age of sixty years, removed a worthy citizen, a staunch friend, and a loving husband and father.

Until his twenty-first year Mr. Cravens lived in Marion county, Ala., where he was born in 1828, a son of Dr. Jesse P. and Lucretia (Curry) Cravens, the former of whom was a prominent physician in Alabama. Dr. Cravens stood high in professional circles in the south and made a success of the calling for which he was so well fitted. He also was an appreciator of the climate of California, and he spent four years here with his son, T. A., his death occurring in 1886, at the home of another son, M. Cravens, in Texas. Thomas A. was the oldest of eight children, and he was reared on the old homestead and received a practical education in the public schools. In 1849, when twenty-one years of age, he shared the popular excitement over the discovery of gold in California, and braved the perils of an overland trip across the plains through Mexico and Arizona to San Diego, from where he took a small boat to San Francisco.

On the American river Mr. Cravens engaged in placer mining with fair success. Later he engaged in the lumber and milling business at Eureka, owning his own mills and carrying on a large business. For several years he farmed in Sonoma and Santa Cruz counties, and in 1869 came to the Carpinteria valley, and bought sixty-nine acres of pueblo lands, covered with brush and live oaks. His industry soon wrought a wonderful change in the appearance of things, and, cleared of the timber, the land stretched into broad fields whereon were planted lima beans, among the first in the neighborhood. To this farm he gave his undivided attention until his death, and the improvements and general well being were a source of continued pride to him. His public spirit was never questioned, and he generously contributed toward the maintenance of any just and worthy cause. A strong Democrat, he took an active part in the undertakings of his party in Santa Barbara county. He was ambitious in promoting the cause of education while serving on the school board and assisted in building the school house. He was a Knight of Pythias, and was chancellor of his lodge.

Like so many men who come into a new country and endeavor to make a place for themselves in the community, Mr. Cravens owed much of his success to the assistance of his wife, who was formerly Elizabeth J. Humes, a native of Missouri, and daughter of David B., a native of South Carolina. The father emigrated to Missouri about 1826, and came over the plains to California in 1852, locating near Marysville, Yuba county, where he lived for twelve years, removing thence to Santa Cruz county, where his death occurred in 1884. He was an influential man, and successful as an agriculturist. To Mr. and Mrs. Cravens were born the following children: Kittie, who is the wife of John Bailard, of Carpinteria; Lulu, at home; Fannie, who is married to Lawrence Bailard; Thomas, a resident of Sonora, Mexico; George, a farmer in the Carpinteria valley; Mark, who is working the home farm; and Archie, who is at El Rio, Ventura county. Since her husband's death Mrs. Craven has proved her ability as a manager, and has not only kept the place in good order, but has made extensive improvements thereon. The farm is now composed of one hundred and twenty-six acres. Among the products of her land are walnuts, to which twenty acres have been planted, and there is also a family orchard. Besides these she raises large quantities of beans and corn. She has a pleasant home and is liked and respected by all who know her worth.

ROBERT DEVINE. A life filled with many thrilling experiences in mining camps and on the frontier has been crowned by an old age of comfort, and in the twilight of his useful existence Mr. Devine is enjoying a deserved relaxation from the cares that once engrossed his time. The ranch which he owns and occupies consists of fifty acres of valuable land at Tropic, a portion of which he bought in 1882, later acquiring the balance of the property. Deciduous fruits and figs are here raised, but his specialty is the raising of grapes and thirty-eight acres are planted in the finest varieties that California can produce.

To those acquainted with Mr. Devine it is always a pleasure to meet him when he is in a reminiscent mood and hear him tell of incidents connected with the pioneer days of California or of his childhood days in county Tyrone, Ireland. He was born October 30, 1834, and is the eldest among three, and one of the five children of Robert and Sarah Margaret (McGrevy) Devine, who were born in county Tyrone. His education was secured in the national schools and he grew to manhood on a farm. In 1855 he set sail on the Great Western from Liverpool and after six weeks arrived in New York. From that city he proceeded on the Illinois to the Isthmus of Panama, which he crossed on the railroad, and then came up the Pacific on the Golden Age, which anchored in San Francisco January 13, 1856. At once he set out for the mines at Shasta, Trinity county, later going to Siskiyou county and mining on the Sacramento river. During 1862, when the Salmon river excitement drew thousands of miners to Idaho, he started for that region, going Irish tandem (one foot before the other) and engaged in mining and prospecting there. He was among the first hundred who, under Capt. Jeff Stanford, went into Boise City. All of these men were heavily armed, as a protection against hostile Indians, who had killed many white men shortly before their arrival. Their watchfulness was continued all during their prospecting days, for the red men were constantly on their trail.

As a prospector Mr. Devine met with many hardships and was often in great peril. At one time he and several comrades were on the buffalo hemp, for four days without food, and their sufferings were increased by the fact that the snow had blinded them. Despair seized upon them. Their hopes of rescue grew fainter with each passing hour. Finally, as they roamed around sightless, they heard the bleating of a flock of sheep and followed the sound until they came up to the shepherd, whom they entreated to sell them a sheep. Meeting with a rough refusal, Mr. Devine (the only one of the party who was able to see) shot one of the sheep and proceeded to cook it, afterward paying the herder $10 for the animal. Strengthened by partaking of the meat, the men gained courage and soon found their way back to camp. More than once when far away from food and shelter, Mr. Devine has given his horse his last loaf of bread, in order that the animal might be sustained until they reached civilization. Of those days it is his testimony that more sympathy existed between the rough, uneducated miners than can be found in the more polished society of today. The latch always hung on the outside. Hospitality was unstinted and warm. Doors and windows were never locked, yet robberies were almost unknown, and the confidence reposed in strangers was seldom violated.

Abandoning the placer mines in 1873 Mr. Devine came to Southern California and settled in Los Angeles, after which he engaged in prospecting at Mojave and Soledad until he came to his present ranch. In Los Angeles he married Miss Eleanor G. Chapman, who was born in Ontario, Canada. They have four living children, Robert, Lela, Mabel and Florence. One daughter, Janet, died at two months, while another, Jean, who was a graduate of a business college, died at twenty-two years of age. The family are connected with the Episcopal Church at Tropic. Ever since becoming a citizen of the United States Mr. Devine has voted with the Democrats and he has done considerable work on the town committee of the party, besides which he has served as trustee of school No. 10 in Tropic district. In order to visit his father and other relatives, in 1867 he returned to Ireland via the Nicaragua route, Santiago de Cuba and New York, and spent a month in renewing the associations of youth; but, while loyal to his native land, he returned to California firm in the faith that no region approaches this in the opportunities which it offers men of energy and determination.

THOMAS H. ELLIOTT. There are few if any people now living in Santa Monica whose settlement in this city antedates that of Mr. Elliott, a pioneer of September, 1876. As is generally known, this city was founded by United States Senator John P. Jones and Col. R. S. Baker, who began the erection of a wharf and hotel in March, 1875. For some years the growth of the town was slow, but it was steady, and thus Mr. Elliott found sufficient encouragement to inspire him to remain here. With the exception of a few years (principally spent in the mines of Mono county) he has continued to make Santa Monica his home to the present day, but has not limited himself to the occupation in which he first engaged. As proprietor of a store on Third street he was actively interested in business for some years, later was in the teaming and transfer business, and in 1901 opened a feed and fuel store on Third street, which he now conducts.

In Crawford county, Pa., Mr. Elliott was born November 10, 1836, being the oldest child of John Elliott by his marriage to Mrs. Mary (Porter) Cowan. The first eighteen years of his life were spent in Pennsylvania, whence in 1854 he accompanied the family to the central west, and found employment at the carpenter's trade. In March, 1855, he accompanied them in another removal, this time to Kansas, where his father died in April, 1860; thirty-five years later the wife and mother died in Santa Monica, Cal., when eighty-seven years of age.

By her first marriage she had three children, two now living, and by her second marriage eleven children were born, seven surviving. One of the latter is Robert P. Elliott, of Santa Monica, who is represented on another page.

As a carpenter Thomas H. Elliott was employed in the construction of the first sawmill in Valley Falls, Kans., and helped to saw the lumber used in building the pioneer houses of that locality. For seventeen years he followed his trade in the same locality, and meantime, during the war, he served in the Kansas state militia and under Captain Cowan went out against Price. From Kansas he came to California in 1875 and almost constantly since then he has been identified with Santa Monica's business interests. From the organization of the Republican party he has been a believer in its principles. Among the most thrilling recollections of his life are those connected with the strife between the free-state and pro-slavery advocates in Kansas, where more than once his pronounced abolition views brought upon him the enmity of southern sympathizers. While he was living in Kansas his marriage occurred, Miss Sarah A. Wiser of Jefferson county becoming his wife. She was born in Center county, Pa., and came west with Benjamin Wiser, her father, who was a Kansas pioneer. Born of their union are the following children: W. W., who is a contractor in Prescott, Ariz.; Mrs. Mary A. Hull, of Santa Monica; Artie, deceased; Katie, I., wife of A. F. Johnston, a prominent merchant of Santa Monica; A. P., engaged in the building business at Prescott, Ariz.; Elva, a correspondent of the Los Angeles Herald; and Mrs. Gracie G. Rogers, of Santa Monica.

JAMES F. HEARTWELL. The Heartwell family is of eastern ancestry. Hon. J. B. Heartwell, who is the father of James F., was born in Geneva, N. Y., and there grew to manhood and engaged in the banking business. Later, removing to Des Moines, Iowa, he became prominent in banking circles there.

Born in Des Moines, Iowa, in 1873, James F. Heartwell was six years of age when his parents removed to Hastings, Neb., and there he received a public school and collegiate education, also the training in business which fitted him for contact with the world's activities. Together with his brother, Charles L., in 1891 he purchased forty acres of orange land on Center street in Highgrove, Cal. Immediately afterward they set out the land in citrus fruit. The orchard is known as Altamesa grove (meaning "high tableland"), and is the first tract set out under the Riverside Highland Water Company's system. At the present time it is one of the finest groves under that system. Thirty acres are in oranges and ten in lemons. The annual output averages twelve thousand boxes. The oranges are a high grade of navels. The buildings are of modern and convenient construction. The grove is surrounded by a beautiful hedge, three sides of which are of cypress and the fourth of eucalyptus.

MRS. EMMA C. HARDACRE. The romantic history of California during the early days of its Spanish settlement has attracted the attention of many able writers, less famous, perhaps, than the celebrated Helen Hunt Jackson, whose romance "Ramona" is the most powerful of all the works that depict past conditions in this region. In times past, however, the initials "E. H." were only little less known than those of "H. H." and many gained their first accurate impressions concerning western life through the articles appearing, in various newspapers and periodicals, under this signature. Having gained the cosmopolitan knowledge that only wide travel imparts, the writer was admirably qualified to depict incidents and scenes in an interesting manner, and her articles embraced descriptions of almost every point of interest in our entire country. The possession of literary gifts drew to her the friendship of well-known authors, among them Mrs. Jackson, whom she met for the first time on the occasion of her first visit to California, and when Mrs. Jackson was gathering material for "Ramona." The friendship thus formed continued until the death of Mrs. Jackson, whom it was Mrs. Hardacre's privilege to visit in her home at Colorado Springs and accompany her in many expeditions to places her facile pen made famous, particularly Cheyenne mountain, where, amid the wild and lonely surroundings, she drew the inspiration for many of her prose and poetical productions, and where finally, at her request, her body was laid to rest.

Mrs. Hardacre is a member of the Chamberlain family that traces its ancestry to the Mayflower and were early residents in Massachusetts. Her grandfather, Timothy Chamberlain, Sr., was born in Salem, Mass., and engaged in contracting in that state and in New York City, but after settling in Morgan county, Ill., he engaged in raising silk worms, owning a mulberry grove three miles southeast of Jacksonville. He was past eighty at the time of his death. His wife was a daughter of Capt. Thomas Dennis, an officer in the Revolutionary war. Their son, Timothy, Jr., also born in Salem, engaged in farm pursuits in Illinois and later became a merchant in Jacksonville, where he died at more than eighty years of age. It is from him that Mrs. Hardacre inherits her love for literary pursuits, as he possessed ability as a descriptive and narrative writer.

The mother of Mrs. Hardacre was Letitia Howells Buckley, who was born in Illinois and there died. Her father, James Buckley, was a native of New Jersey and a pioneer of Illinois; her mother was a member of the Howells family, of Newark, N. J. Mrs. Hardacre was one of five children, the others being named as follows: May, wife of Leslie Kellogg, of Santa Barbara; Nettie, wife of William L. Mason, of Denver, Colo.; Fannie, wife of W. B. Metcalf, of Santa Barbara; and Dennis B., a resident of St. Louis, Mo. Mrs. Hardacre was given excellent advantages in her girlhood, and is a graduate of Jacksonville Academy. October 1, 1863, she became the wife of George W. Hardacre, who was born in Troy, Ohio, and after coming to Illinois studied law under Judge Thomas Springer. For some years he carried on a general practice in Bloomington, but later went to Cincinnati, where he has acquired large property interests and has become known as an able and successful lawyer. In addition to his property in Ohio, he has interests in San Diego, Cal. For years he has been a leading Republican of Ohio, and, during his service of two terms in the Ohio state senate, he formed the acquaintance of almost every prominent worker in his party. Fraternally he is a Knight Templar Mason.

From the time that Mrs. Hardacre first saw California, in 1876, she was interested in the state. Its history, its resources, its climate and its people all attracted her; and although in succeeding years she traveled much, her old affection for the far west still remained. In 1875, as a correspondent of the Louisville Courier-Journal, she wrote the first letters from the coast for that paper. Not only did her work prove satisfactory to Henry Watterson, the editor, but it attracted the attention of Wilbur F. Story, of the Chicago Times, which at that time was one of the most influential and most widely-read newspapers in the United States. Mr. Story wrote, offering her $40 per week as descriptive writer on the staff of the Times. She accepted the position and, in the interests of the paper, traveled through the entire east, after which she spent eighteen months as Washington (D. C.) correspondent of the Times, during the administration of R. B. Hayes. After three years with the Times she accepted a place on the New York Herald, and, as correspondent traveled with the government survey in Montana and Utah, going through the Black Hills, Wind River mountains, and Yellowstone Park, which at that time had not been made a national park. While there the Indians scattered the members of her party, and for weeks each feared for the fate of the other. Finally the Indians were driven out by soldiers, and visits to the region were then attended by less danger. On resigning from the Herald Mrs. Hardacre went to Cincinnati, where she wrote regularly for the Commercial Gazette, under Murat Halstead. Among her other articles was one on the cliff dwellers, published in Scribner's; and one that appeared in the same magazine in July, 1878, entitled "The Wild Woman of San Nicolas Island," which narrated the history of a woman who had been alone on the island for eighteen years and was finally rescued by Captain Nidiver. At this writing she is engaged in the preparation of a work giving in detail the history of the early inhabitants of Santa Barbara, as well as other California towns.

The permanent removal of Mrs. Hardacre to Santa Barbara was hastened by a sunstroke that rendered further residence in Cincinnati impossible, and, in her search for a location where the climate would prove beneficial, she found this city offered exceptional advantages, and in 1891 came here. The many interests of Mr. Hardacre in Cincinnati render impracticable a present change of residence, but it is their hope at some future time to have a home in Santa Barbara, where the twilight of their lives may be passed. Their daughter, Winifred, who is a graduate of Georgetown Convent, is now the wife of Frank Maguire, a merchant of Santa Barbara.

Various organizations of a literary and journalistic nature number Mrs. Hardacre among their members. At the time that Dr. Belle Reynolds was president of the Woman's Parliament of Southern California, she served as its secretary and is still a member. She is a charter member of the Cincinnati Woman's Press Club and at one time was connected with the Woman's Press Club of Southern California. At this writing she is a vice-president of the Santa Barbara Natural History Association. For nine years she has been secretary of the Cottage Hospital Association, in which important work she is deeply interested. The principles of the Republican party have always received her support, but in all her reportorial work there has been no display of partisan spirit. Her writings have been for the people, irrespective of political faith or religious creed. Since she suffered sunstroke she has been forced to relinquish much of her work, but she still wields a ready pen and still finds descriptive writing one of the greatest pleasures of her life.

MOSES HOSTETTER. On coming to Santa Monica in 1893, Mr. Hostetter purchased twenty acres, to which he later added fifty-four acres, and still later seven more acres, but he has since disposed of fifty-four acres, so that his possessions now aggregate twenty-seven acres, the tract lying one and one-half miles southeast of the city. During 1893 he also bought his homestead on Lake and Beach and erected a commodious residence overlooking the ocean. Besides carrying on horticultural pursuits, he is filling every duty as a citizen and maintaining a warm interest in measures for the development of his home town. During the four years (1896-1900) of his service as a member of the board of trustees, he served as chairman of the police committee and the fire and light committee, besides acting as a member of others. During his term the sewer system was built, which has added so greatly to the welfare of the town, and in this measure he was deeply interested.

The Hostetters are an old Pennsylvania family. Joseph Hostetter, who was born in Somerset county, that state, became a pioneer of Holmes county, Ohio, where he improved a farm and remained until his death at sixty-six years. During the early days he and his family were once driven back toward Pittsburg by the Indians and were forced to find refuge in the blockhouse. His wife was Susan Mast, who was born in Pennsylvania and died in Ohio. They had ten children, all but three of whom attained mature years. The following are now living: Daniel, who is eighty-six years of age, and makes his home in Tuscarawas county, Ohio; David, of Kearney, Neb.; and Moses, of South Santa Monica, Cal. The last named was born in Holmes county, Ohio, August 23, 1823. His schooling was obtained in a log building, with a mud and stick chimney, and containing the crudest furniture, such as slab benches and a writing desk that ran along the wall. During early manhood he taught for two months, but with that exception devoted himself closely to farm work. In 1846 he removed to Owen county, Ind., and settled in the midst of a heavily timbered country, where he cleared ten acres and planted a crop. However, finding the climate unhealthful, he decided to leave, and in the fall moved to Green county, Wis., where he improved a farm near Springgrove. The year 1849 found him a pioneer of Winneshiek county, Iowa, where he took up a claim and improved a farm. So prosperous were his undertakings that he finally acquired more than seven hundred acres of valuable land. During the forty-four years of his residence in that county he helped to build the first schoolhouse, held various local offices, served as a member of the county central committee of the Democratic party, and as a delegate to local and state conventions; also for years was president of the Home Fire Insurance Company, in the organization of which he assisted. While living in Wisconsin he married Miss Mary Brandt, who was born in Ohio. Their only son, William M., is a resident of South Santa Monica. In Iowa Mr. Hostetter was initiated into Masonry by being made a member of Union Band Lodge No. 66, A. F. & A. M. Personally he is a man of integrity, perseverance and determination, and the competence which he now enjoys is the merited result of years of earnest and unremitting industry.

JOHN M. NIDEVER. By his intelligent industry and devotion to the welfare of Santa Barbara county, Mr. Nidever has gained the esteem of acquaintances and a fair competence as well. He was born in Arkansas, and is a son of John and Polly (Vernon) Nidever. His father, a Pennsylvanian by birth, crossed the plains from Texas to California in 1853, and settled in Santa Barbara. On the hill where now stands the Biehl mansion he built a house, and afterward gave his attention to the stock business, with gratifying success. At the time of his death, May 31, 1873, at the age of seventy-six years, he was quite well-to-do, as fortunes were reckoned at that time. His wife had died August 19, 1871, at the family home in Santa Barbara. They were the parents of thirteen children, of whom the following survive: Ebenezer, of El Monte, Cal.; John M., whose home is near Carpinteria; Mrs. Nancy Keezer, of New Mexico; Mrs. Mary Vance, of Santa Barbara; Jacob, living in Ventura; Mrs. Rebecca Chaffee, a resident of Ventura; and Henry, whose home is in Orange county. Three others, George, Jackson and David, of Santa Barbara, reached maturity, but are now deceased.

When the family came to California, John M. Nidever was only a boy, hence his life has been mostly passed in the far west. In 1864 he bought a ranch in Carpinteria valley and now owns one hundred and fifty acres at Serena, all of which is under a high state of cultivation. His special products are beans, hay and grain. In the large orchard are grown many kinds of fruit for home consumption. Mr. Nidever is thoroughly conversant with the best methods of conducting a farm, and his intelligent oversight is responsible for the uniformly excellent crops and the many evidences of prosperity by which he is surrounded. In a general way he has accomplished much pioneer work and has given his influence to the schools and other aids to progress.

In 1862 Mr. Nidever married Martha Jane Callis, a native of Texas, and daughter of Henry B. and Lucinda (Robinson) Callis. Her father was born in Virginia, grew to manhood in Kentucky, and died when en route from the latter state to Texas. In 1852 Mrs. Lucinda Callis came to California, making the trip overland and enduring innumerable privations and hardships. Finally, after a journey of nine months, she arrived in Montecito, where she was, with one exception, the only white woman in the place. In her long trip across the plains she was accompanied by her stepson, William Callis, and her three children, Robert A., Thomas C. and Martha Jane. Of her sons, the only survivor is Robert A., who lives in Ventura county. This noble and courageous pioneer woman died at the home of her daughter, Mrs. Nidever, January 29, 1895, after eighty-five useful years. To the union of Mr. and Mrs. Nidever thirteen children were born, ten of whom are living, namely: George F.; John H.; David T.; Jacob D.; Vernon M.; Martha Ella, who is the wife of Johnson Stewart; Lucy, who married James Lewis; Delia, wife of Glen Hickey; Idella and Grace, at home.

HENRY NIEMEYER. From the time of his arrival in California in 1873 until his death in 1891, Mr. Niemeyer was identified with the vineyard interests of the vicinity of Los Angeles. Born in Prussia in 1820, he learned the merchant tailor's trade in boyhood and followed the same for some years. When twenty-two years of age he came to America. After a short sojourn in Cincinnati, Ohio, he went to Guttenberg, Iowa, where he conducted a merchant tailoring establishment. From there he came to California and embarked in the wine manufacturing business, buying a vineyard on Central, between Ninth and Twelfth streets. Somewhat later he bought a tract in the Eagle Rock district and also planted it in grapes.

At Guttenberg, Iowa, April 28, 1866, occurred the marriage of Henry Niemeyer to Mrs. Mary Anne (Weber) Schmees, who was born in Bavaria, September 20, 1836. Her father, Nicholas Weber, who was a weaver in Bavaria, brought his family to America in the spring of 1837 and followed gardening in Cincinnati for eight years. In 1845, while Iowa was still a territory, he settled at Guttenberg and began to farm near that town. The remainder of his life was passed in that place. His wife, Catherine (Roth) Weber, was born in Bavaria and died in Iowa. Of their one son and four daughters, Mary A. was second and she alone of all the family now lives in California. Of the voyage to America she has no recollection, being only an infant when the family spent sixty-four days on the ocean, finally landing in New Orleans. In the schools her education was limited, but in that great school of experience, usefulness and labor, she had an abundant education, and thus were developed traits of kindness, good will, energy and perseverance which have stood her in good stead through all of her life. When sixteen years of age she left her father's home for that of her husband, becoming the bride of John Schmees, a native of Hanover, who came to America about 1845, and for a time was cutter in a tailoring establishment in St. Louis. In 1852 he settled in Guttenberg, where he was proprietor of a merchant tailor shop until his death in 1861. Three children were born of this marriage, two of whom are living, namely: William N. Schmees, who resides with his mother at Verdugo; and Mrs. Salome E. Obdulia Delaney, of Los Angeles. To the union of Mr. and Mrs. Niemeyer were born four children, now living, viz.: Elenora, Mrs. Markey, of Los Angeles; Atalus, proprietor of a winery on Central avenue, Los Angeles; Catherine, Mrs. May, of Los Angeles; and Linus, who enlisted in the First California Heavy Artillery and was sent to the Philippine Islands, where he served until the expiration of his term of service.

At one time Mr. and Mrs. Niemeyer had ten acres in Los Angeles, six being in vines and the balance in an orchard. Of this they gave thirty feet to Central avenue and a similar amount to Twelfth street, and also gave sixty feet to Eleventh street. In the possession of Mrs. Niemeyer is retained three and one-half acres on Central, between Ninth and Eleventh streets, and on this property stands the family residence. In addition she owns Eagle Rock vineyard, comprising fifty-eight acres, of which forty-one are in vines, producing wine and table grapes. The property is under the personal supervision of Mrs. Niemeyer and its thrifty appearance proves her careful and capable oversight. The name "Eagle Rock" was given by Mr. Niemeyer on account of the proximity of the tract to the famous Eagle rock. At the time they bought here there were no orchards below except one owned by Mr. Crow, and no attempt had as yet been made to raise grapes, the entire land for miles around being used as a sheep range. All of the subsequent improvement she has witnessed and has contributed thereto by the capable supervision of her property, thus encouraging others in making similar investments. In religion she is a member of Cathedral parish of Los Angeles.

REV. JOSEPH NUNAN. The pastor of the Church of Our Lady of Refuge at Castroville, Monterey county, was born in San Francisco, Cal., March 29, 1871. His father, Edward C. Nunan, was a native of Ireland, and came to America with several brothers about 1849. At that time the discovery of gold in California was attracting emigration to the Pacific coast and in 1850 he joined the hosts of Argonauts journeying via the Isthmus of Panama to the regions where gold had been found. Accompanying him were his brothers, Matthew, Thomas, James and John. For ten years he engaged in mining in Placer county, and afterward settled in San Francisco, where he was prominently identified with local commercial interests until his death in 1889. Of the five brothers who shared the hardships of the voyage across the Atlantic and the later expedition to California, only two are living, Matthew and James. The former for many years served as sheriff of San Francisco county. The marriage of Edward C. Nunan united him with Mary Raycroft Capithorne, who was of English parentage and came to America during the '50s. Her marriage occurred in San Francisco, where she died in 1875, leaving one son, Joseph, and two daughters. One of the daughters is now in the Sacred Heart convent at Oakland.

The early education of Joseph Nunan was acquired in St. Mary's College, which was at that time located in San Francisco, but has since been removed to Oakland. After having completed the classical studies he took the post-graduate course in the same institution. Later he became a student in St. Bonaventure's Theological Seminary, and completed the studies of that institution. The service of ordination, at the expiration of his divinity studies in 1893, was held in Buffalo, N. Y., Bishop Ryan presiding. For eighteen months after completing his theological studies Father Nunan was engaged as assistant pastor of the Plaza Church, Los Angeles. Afterward he went abroad and studied church law for a year at Toledo University, in Spain. Upon returning to Los Angeles he resumed his labors as assistant at the Cathedral. In November of 1896 he was transferred to Santa Barbara as assistant rector of the Church of Our Lady of Sorrows, where he remained for five years. In 1901 he was promoted to the pastorate of the church at Castroville and has since made this city his home.

Father Nunan is a member of the Native Sons of the Golden West. Those who know him well speak highly of his many noble traits of character, his intellectual attainments and his many qualifications for effective work in the Roman Catholic ministry. Nor is his popularity confined to his own denomination. Among Protestants he numbers many friends, who respect his devotion to duty, his desire to promote the spiritual welfare of mankind and his tireless labors in behalf of his church.

ROBERT ORTON. To the pursuit of his occupation of milling Mr. Orton brought a wide understanding and a practical experience covering many years. The city of Ventura was the scene of his business activity for a considerable period before his death. A native of Genesee county, N. Y., Mr. Orton was born March 23, 1834, a son of Roger B. and Clara (Bicknell) Orton, the former of Scotch descent and born in New York, and the latter of French and English extraction, and born in Utica, N. Y. When a small boy he removed with his parents to Ohio, and from there to Iowa, where he learned the milling business with his father at Burlington, after which they removed to Augusta, Iowa, and built their first saw mill in the midst of the forest. Their efforts were rewarded by a large patronage, the mill being devoted for the greater part to sawing black walnut, which brought as high as $10 a thousand feet. For many years this mill continued to be a busy center of activity, until the moving spirit of the enterprise, the elder Orton, died in Augusta in 1852, at the age of fifty-two.

In 1853 Robert Orton looked for new fields of activity, and removed to the west, locating in Volcano, Amador county, Cal., where, with two brothers, he engaged in placer mining for three years. They averaged an advance of about $200 per day during their stay in Amador county, and finally disposed of their holdings at a profit. Mr. Orton then came to Gilroy, Santa Cruz county, and milled for a large firm, after which he located in Watsonville, where he bought a mill and operated the same from 1860 until 1870. While living in Santa Cruz county he was elected sheriff and served for ten years, and during that time succeeded in arresting some desperate characters. One man he followed for eleven hundred and eighty miles, and, single-handed, arrested him in a saloon, lodged him in the jail at Salt Lake City, and took him by train to Ogden and on to California. Mr. Orton next settled in San Luis Obispo county, and again went into the milling business. In partnership with E. W. Steel he built a one hundred barrel flour mill and operated it for two years, when he disposed of his interest to Mr. Steel. After returning to Watsonville, Santa Cruz county, and operating a mill for a year, he sold out and removed to Ventura.

The mill at Ventura in which Mr. Orton is interested and which he manages so successfully was established by Willits, Chilson & Daily, and was afterwards bought by Clark & McGuire, and later by L. J. Rolls & Fargo. They eventually consolidated and took stock in the Santa Ana Water Company, on the Ventura river, three and a fourth miles from Ventura, and Mr. Orton assumed charge of their enterprises in 1887. The mill is of the flour, feed and grist variety, and is the only mill in the county, and consequently has the trade for many miles around.

Near Watsonville, Santa Cruz county, in 1861, Mr. Orton married Elizabeth Hunt, a native of Missouri, and daughter of John and Julia Hunt. The Hunt family came to California in 1852, crossing the plains with ox teams, after which the parents removed to Bakersfield. The father still lives, aged eighty-three; the mother died when seventy-seven years of age. To Mr. and Mrs. Orton have been born five children, viz.: Fred, who for many years worked with his father, from whom he learned the milling business; Edgar, an electrician; Emma J., Mrs. William Orr, who is the mother of two sons and one daughter, and whose husband is a miller by trade and an agriculturist by present occupation; John, who is engaged in running the pump station for the city of Santa Barbara; and Lucius, who is fifteen years of age and living at home. Mr. Orton affiliated with the Republican party. Fraternally he was associated with the Masons as a Master Mason, with the Odd Fellows, the Red Men, and the Ancient Order of United Workmen. His death occurred May 21, 1901, and was recognized as a distinct loss to his community.

B. F. SPENCER. The town of Nordhoff is fortunate in the possession of one who embodies so many admirable traits of citizenship as does B. F. Spencer, who came to California in 1874, and whose hopes and ambitions have been centered in the southern part of the state since the following year. At first a resident of San Francisco, he later went to San José, and located in Ventura February 23, 1875. A carpenter by trade, he successfully followed the same in Ventura until 1882, and, after his removal to Nordhoff, until 1889. He then started a lumber yard for Woodbury & Co., which has the distinction of being the first and only one ever conducted in the place, and the circumstances surrounding its rise to prominence and success were such as to discourage those less stout of heart and less determined to succeed. All of the lumber for the yard was hauled by team from Ventura, a method of transportation quite remote from that which is at present employed. The venture proved a benefit to the town and owner, and in the manner of its conduct filled a long felt want. The name of the company is now the Ventura County Lumber Company.

Not content with the somewhat circumscribed lumber business, Mr. Spencer branched out into real-estate in 1896, and has since been equally successful in this line of activity. He has been prominent in the public eye for many years, and held a number of important official and other positions. A Republican in politics, his first vote was cast for Abraham Lincoln in 1864, and he has since neglected no opportunity to vote the Republican ticket. He was appointed postmaster under Benjamin Harrison's administration, and filled the office to the satisfaction of all concerned, and he was further honored by his fellow townsmen by being nominated for county supervisor in 1884, for which office he was unfortunately defeated. He is fraternally associated with the Masons, having joined that organization in Illinois in 1864, and he is a member of the Grand Army of the Republic at Ventura, a charter member of Post No. 44. No more ardent friend of education lives in the county. He has been foremost in projecting improvements of all kinds, and was one of the principal leaders in bringing about the erection of the new school building in 1895. This school cost $8,000, is two stories high, and has four school rooms and one assembly hall. Mr. Spencer was also active in securing the Nordhoff branch of the Southern Pacific Railroad, which has done so much toward the later development of the town.

The early life of Mr. Spencer was spent near New Lexington, Ohio, where he was born in 1843, a son of Edward and Mary (Fowler) Spencer, natives respectively of New York and Maryland. The father was a farmer during the greater part of his life, and was one of the pioneer developers of Ohio. There were five children in the family, four sons and one daughter, of whom B. F. was the oldest. At the early age of fourteen years he left the familiar surroundings in Ohio and removed to Bushnell, Ill., where he lived until the breaking out of the Civil war. He enlisted April 15, 1861, in Company A, Sixteenth Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and took part in the battle of New Madrid and Tippinville, at which latter conflict his regiment captured more prisoners than they had men in the brigade. He served in Mississippi, Tennessee and Alabama, and during the last few months of the war was laid up in a hospital with pneumonia, and unable to re-enlist. At Nashville, Tenn., in June of 1864, he was honorably discharged from the army, and at once returned to his home in Illinois, where he lived until his removal to California in 1874.

At Lincoln, Neb., in April of 1872, Mr. Spencer was united in marriage with Rosie Purchas, and of this union there are five children: R. M.; Jennie, now the wife of J. R. Bald; Herbert; B. F., Jr.; and Maud M.

CHARLES H. PEARSON. One of the enthusiastic advocates of the Los Alamos valley is Charles H. Pearson, who has here found a field for his activities, and has been equally successful as a blacksmith, general merchant, and rancher. In fact, he is one of the pioneers of the town of Los Alamos, having been interested, from the time of his arrival in the fall of 1870, in the general growth of the place, to which he has contributed no small share.

A native of Canada, Mr. Pearson lived in the northern country until his fifteenth year, receiving his education in the public schools, and learning the trade of blacksmith. In the United States he lived for a time in Vermont. He arrived in California in 1871, and for a few years traveled through different parts of the state, endeavoring to decide upon a permanent location. For three years he served as a clerk in Guadalupe, leaving there in 1879, and coming to Los Alamos. He first went into the blacksmithing business with a firm here, and then for three years ran his own shop. In 1886 he started a general merchandising business, and built his own store on the corner of Bell and Centennial streets. He has a complete line of general merchandise, and a trade in accord with his enterprise, honest business methods, tactful manner, and great desire to please.

From time to time Mr. Pearson has come into the possession of city and country real estate, and he has erected a very pleasant home in Los Alamos, surrounded by shade trees which were set out by himself. He has large holdings in the country, owning two hundred and fifteen acres adjoining the town, and a quarter section eight miles out. He also owns other country property, raising thereon principally wheat and barley, which invariably result in excellent crops. He has been very active in promoting the educational facilities of his town, and has been a school trustee and clerk for many years. To him this locality contains all that one could desire of resources, climate, soil and general advantages, and he expects to spend his remaining days in the sunshine and happy optimism of his surroundings in this part of the state. He maintains that there is plenty of wood, water, oil and all that is needful for the carrying on of general enterprises. He is a Republican in politics, and is a notary public, but has never indulged in political longings. Fraternally he is associated with Lodge No. 224, I. O. O. F., at Guadalupe, Cal. In 1891 Mr. Pearson returned to the land of his birth and married Nettie Spafford in August of that year. To Mr. and Mrs. Pearson have been born two children: Nettie Elizabeth and Agnes Marion.

C. W. RASEY, county recorder of Santa Barbara county, was born in Washington county, N. Y., in 1856, of Scotch and Holland-Dutch descent, and was a son of a Civil war soldier in the One Hundred and Twenty-third Infantry from New York. When a mere boy he learned telegraphy with the Western Union Telegraph Company, and was employed as an operator in northern and eastern New York. From there he went to Denver, Colo., in 1878, and for two years was employed by the Denver & Rio Grande Railroad Company. Going to California in 1881, he was employed in the general offices of the Central Pacific road in San Francisco, where he held a position of responsibility and trust.

During 1887 Mr. Rasey came to Santa Barbara, where he has since made his home, and with the interests of which he has been closely identified. At first he held a position as ticket agent for the Santa Fe road, continuing in that capacity until he resigned to accept the office of county recorder. In 1894 he was nominated on the Prohibition ticket. This fact would not seem indicative of much hope for success, and, indeed, he was the only one on that ticket who was elected. His selection for the office was a tribute to his personal popularity and to the appreciation in which he is held by the people of the county. His term of four years began in January, 1895. In the fall of 1898 he was elected, as an independent candidate, by an increased majority over his first election, and is still filling the office, his term to expire in January, 1903. This county was organized in 1850, and in 1873

G. V. Garcelou,

Ventura was cut off, reducing Santa Barbara county to its present limits. In the recorder's office may be found complete records, embracing altogether three hundred or more volumes, and the oversight of these records makes the recorder a busy man indeed.

In Glens Falls, N. Y., Mr. Rasey married Miss Alice E. Whedon, who was born in Rutland county, Vt., and by whom he has two daughters, Mabel A. and Dorothy W. During his residence in San Francisco Mr. Rasey was made a Mason and is now connected with both the blue lodge and the chapter, besides which he is associated with the Ancient Order of United Workmen, Woodmen of the World, the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, and the Sons of Veterans. A member of the Baptist denomination, he is now serving as a trustee of the church at Santa Barbara. All public matters pertaining to the welfare of Santa Barbara receive attention from Mr. Rasey, who is connected with the Chamber of Commerce and one of the members of the board of directors, and as such has rendered valuable services to the city of his adoption.

GEORGE WILLIAM GARCELON. As a director of the Southern California Fruit Exchange, vice-president of the Riverside Fruit Exchange and president of the Riverside Heights Fruit Association No. 10, Mr. Garcelon is closely identified with the citrus fruit industry in this locality. Throughout California he is often alluded to as the "father" of the lemon industry in the state, nor have his labors been less constant in behalf of orange culture. Since he came to Riverside in 1872 he has engaged in horticultural pursuits.

Born in New Brunswick, March 18, 1832, Mr. Garcelon is a son of Harvey and Charlotte (Sutherland) Garcelon. He was reared in New Brunswick, where he attended a private school. At twenty years of age he went to Lewiston, Me., where he carried on a drug business for twenty-four years. Having a fondness for floriculture, he engaged in raising greenhouse plants and in this way began to long for a more southern climate. Impelled by this desire to seek a more genial climate, in 1872 he came to California and bought nearly thirty acres at Riverside where he still resides. Most of the land he improved, part of which is twenty acres on Brockton avenue.

As previously intimated, Mr. Garcelon was one of the first who made a scientific study of lemons. He noticed that a lemon tree needs constant care, because it is a continuous bearer and the lemons therefore have to be gathered regularly. As the oranges are annual bearers, people neglected the lemon trees for the others. However, at that time even oranges were not raised in Riverside, as it was reported that nothing could be done with them in this locality; but he set out some trees, gave them every care, and finally was rewarded by having them bear an abundance of fruit. The first citrus fruit fair in the world was held in his house, which was the first plastered building in Riverside. When the fair was held specimens of oranges were brought from other localities for comparison, the various specimens were numbered by a committee appointed to prepare them, and the verdict of those present was a surprise, as the Riverside oranges were pronounced the best.

Meantime, Mr. Garcelon being interested in lemons started to work in that business. At first he budded on a lemon seedling, and it was not until after an unfortunate experience of several years that he learned lemons, to be successfully grown, should be budded on orange stock. At first lemons were gathered only once a year, which resulted in unmarketable fruit and put a damper on the industry. Undiscouraged, he continued his experiments, and finally attained success. It was the custom to award premiums on the fruit, and although his lemons were pronounced good by an inexperienced committee he received only the seventh prize at the Riverside fair. However, at a state citrus fair in Los Angeles the following week, the same fruit was exhibited, and he was awarded the first prize of $100 for best exhibit of lemons and $50 for best box. The state horticultural board was so interested in his success that they had him prepare an article describing his modus operandi in the lemon industry, and 16,000 copies of this pamphlet were published and scattered broadcast at the state's expense. At the World's Fair in 1893 he had charge of the Riverside citrus exhibit in the horticultural building, exhibiting there oranges from Riverside and also lemons and oranges from his own ranch. The foreign experts employed by the managers of the fair claimed that his exhibit of lemons was a fraud, saying they had tested them and found them so much better than any lemons they had ever tasted from California that they believed he was attempting to impose on them by exhibiting foreign fruit. This admission of excellence was what Mr. Garcelon wanted, for he could easily prove that it was a genuine California product. He received a medal and diploma from the manager of the World's Fair. Since then he has continued to advocate the raising of lemons, and the result is that people began to give more care to this branch of the citrus industry. No one is more interested than he in the recognition of Riverside's fruit as among the best in the market. During the long period of his residence here he has become so fond of the place that he is not satisfied to have it "second best" in anything, hence he works constantly to raise the standard of the citrus industry and secure for the valley, products that will attract universal attention and command high prices.

W. H. PECK. The genial and popular manipulator of the United States mail at Lompoc is one of those pioneers whose lives are full of interesting happenings, and who have found in the sunshine of California much that they sought after leaving their homes in the east. He was born in Kent county, Mich., in 1838, and up to his seventeenth year lived in his native state, the first nine years of his life being spent on his father's farm. He then lived in Grand Rapids, Mich., where he attended the public schools and graduated from the high school, thereafter applying himself to learning the trade of tinner. His father, Orson Peck, was born in New York in 1812, and has been a merchant for the greater part of his life. He is now living at Lompoc, and is by far the oldest man in this valley. He married Lydia Hunt, who also was a native of New York state, and who died in Lompoc in 1875. In the family were nine children, but only two survive, the daughter, Mrs. Lydia J. Baldwin, being a resident of Oklahoma.

Upon starting out in the world for himself, Mr. Peck went to Kansas in the spring of 1857, settling on a farm in Coffey county, where he remained until 1861. With the call to arms for three hundred thousand volunteers for the Civil war, Mr. Peck and his two brothers, Theodore Frelinghuysen and Henry Clay Peck, and his father, enlisted, the former, his father, and Henry Clay serving in the same regiment. He enlisted in Company E, Fifth Kansas Cavalry, General Clayton commanding, and was at Little Rock and Pine Bluff and engaged in general scouting. The family sustained the loss of one of the sons, Henry Clay, during the war, and all served with courage and distinction, as became loyal citizens. With the restoration of peace Mr. Peck returned to Kansas, and in Burlington established a hardware business, which he conducted until 1870. The country was wild, and he used to frequently hunt buffalo in what is now Oklahoma. After leaving Kansas he spent a year in Montana, going from there to British Columbia, thence, in 1871, down the coast to California. After settling in Santa Cruz he worked at his trade of tinsmith for three years, removing to Lompoc in 1874. Here he opened another hardware store in partnership with his father, conducting his affairs under the firm name of O. Peck & Son. For thirteen years this enterprising little store continued to supply the demand for tinware and its accompaniments, and became an integral part of the commercial life of the settlement. During that time W. H. Peck repaired to San Diego during the boom, but, instead of an anticipated gain, lost heavily. He also spent some time in Old Mexico, and went to Cleveland county, Okla., for two years, and then, returning to Lompoc, continued his former occupation of hardware business.

An ardent Republican in politics, Mr. Peck is following in the footsteps of his father, who has ever acknowledged allegiance to Republican principles. He was appointed postmaster during McKinley's first administration and has since satisfactorily sustained the position. A Mason for thirty-three years, he is a Royal Arch Mason and past master at Lompoc, and a charter member of the lodge. He has been an Odd Fellow for twenty-seven years, is past grand, and a charter member of the Lompoc Lodge. He is also a member of the Eastern Star, a charter member of the Grand Army of the Republic, and is associated with the Continental League at San Francisco. At Santa Cruz, in 1872, Mr. Peck married Frances Peck, a daughter of Henry Peck, one of the Forty-niners of California.

EDWARD F. REILLY. A membership in the Native Sons of the Golden West is Mr. Reilly's by reason of his birth in California. His father, Michael J., was one of the pioneers of '49, and came from New York City around the Horn in a sailing vessel to San Francisco, thence going to the mines. For a year he engaged in freighting up the Sacramento river, after which he turned his attention to mining. Later he bought a ranch in Yuba county, where he engaged in raising stock. After eleven years on that place he removed to Nevada City, Cal., and opened a wholesale and retail hay and grain business, which he conducted for some years. Coming to Ventura in November, 1874, he was thereafter principally interested in the buying and selling of ranches. It was here that he died in 1879. His wife was also one of California's pioneers, but instead of making the trip by water, as did he, she crossed the plains in 1850, from her birthplace, Cook county, Ill., and settled in Oregon, later removing to California, where she now resides in Ventura. She bore the maiden name of Eliza J. Finley. In her family there are five children, viz.: W. H., who was sheriff of Ventura county for two terms and is now engaged in ranching here; George A., and Edward F., who are partners in business; Mrs. Mamie McFarland, of Ventura; and Mrs. Hattie B. Wood, of Wheatland, Cal.

Near Marysville, in Yuba county, this state, Edward F. Reilly was born March 2, 1864. At the time the family settled in Ventura he was ten years of age. For a time he studied in the public schools, after which he was a student in the University of Southern California for almost three years, leaving at the junior year in order to take a course in Woodbury's Business College at Los Angeles. From the latter institution he was graduated in 1887. He then went to San Francisco, where he studied embalming with the California Undertaking Company for two years. On his return to Ventura in 1889 he began to lay plans for a business of his own, and the following year organized the firm of Reilly Brothers, which has since conducted an undertaking business. As a funeral director he has no superior in the entire county. As opportunity offered, he has interested himself in other business enterprises along the same line. He started the firm of Reilly & King in Santa Paula, also the undertaking establishment of Reilly & Boynton at Oxnard, both of which have been successful; and at one time he was a partner in the firm of Reilly & Wessel at Redlands. In 1896 he was appointed county coroner and public administrator to fill a vacancy, and in 1898, on the Republican ticket, without opposition, he was elected to these offices, which he now fills. The Republican party receives his staunch support, and at one time he served on the county central committee. Fraternally he is connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the Ancient Order of United Workmen, the Rebekahs, and Lodge No. 214, F. & A. M., in which he was made a Mason. His marriage was solemnized in San Luis Obispo county, Cal., and united him with Miss Agnes Short, who was born in Watsonville, Cal., and by whom he has one daughter, Frances.

J W Churchill

JOHN WESLEY CHURCHILL. If years of practical experience and intelligent observation and study along any given line of occupation count for aught, Mr. Churchill certainly holds high rank among the foremost oil developers of the country. His activities have at times been centered in nearly all of the oil localities of the United States, and he has brought about the development of this now generally diffused commodity in many states where its existence was hitherto unsuspected. Generally speaking, his life and successful career contains innumerable lessons worthy of emulation, for the long way between the time when a sturdy urchin of twelve took to the tow path of the Pennsylvania canal in order to earn his own living, up to his present enviable position in the community of Santa Barbara, argues an enormous amount of natural grit, augmented by a farsighted discernment of opportunities.

Of English ancestry, Mr. Churchill was born at the head of the west branch of the Susquehanna river, Indiana county, Pa., June 10, 1840. His paternal grandfather, who was born in England, settled in New England, later in Elmira, N. Y., and served during the war of 1812. He must have been a man of high moral courage and general ability, for his sons developed into useful members of society, two of them being prominent as ministers in the Presbyterian Church. His son, John L., the father of John Wesley, was born in Elmira, N. Y., in 1800, and devoted the greater part of his life to the stock and lumber business. In time he removed from Indiana county to Freeport, Pa., and engaged in the ice business, which subsequently proved his Waterloo. He worked up a large ice trade with the south, shipping the ice down the Allegheny river on rafts and barges, but unfortunately his last trip was retarded by the low water, and he thus lost more than he had ever made in the ice business. His last days were spent in Arkansas, where he died of sunstroke at the age of seventy-eight years. Like his clergyman brothers he inherited or acquired literary tendencies, and was a poet of no mean order, having a correct ear for rhyme and a facility of expression quite in keeping with his metrical and harmonious thoughts. He was twice married, the mother of John Wesley being formerly Maria Hazlette, a native of Etna Valley, Pa., and a daughter of Rev. John Hazlette, who was born in the north of Ireland, and married a Scotch lady. After coming to America Rev. Mr. Hazlette preached for many years in the Wesleyan Methodist Church, and three of his sons followed in his footsteps and became ministers in the same church; also a son-in-law. He died in Indiana county, Pa., as did also his wife. Of the two marriages of John L. Churchill there were thirteen children, and four of the sons served during the Civil war. Philander M. served in a Pennsylvania regiment, and now lives in Indiana county, Pa.; Samuel was a member of the Eighth Pennsylvania Reserves and was killed at Fredericksburg; while James M. was in the marine brigade operating on the lower Mississippi river, and died in Bradford, Pa., in 1900.

The life of John Wesley Churchill opened into a rather cheerless and responsible childhood, which was spent until his tenth year in Indiana county, Pa., after which he went to Freeport, and at the age of twelve began to work on the tow path of the Pennsylvania canal. In 1860 he arrived in West Virginia with large hopes in the oil wells of that section, and diligently went to work to drill wells with the drill by hand with a spring pole method. In June of 1861 he volunteered in Company F, Seventy-eighth Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, for three years, and was sent to Louisville, Ky., where he operated in the army of the Cumberland under General Thomas. He participated in the battle of Green River and many other skirmishes, and was among the first troops who took the Hermitage, General Jackson's old home. The regiment was in the front at the battles of Stone River, Perryville, Shiloh, Tullahoma, Chickamauga, Big Shanty, Peach Mountain, siege and battle of Atlanta, then back under General Thomas. At the expiration of the three years they served voluntarily on an expedition and were mounted, and went out with three days' rations, but staid for fifteen days. During that time they were obliged to live on the country, and as may be imagined, the fare was not such as to superinduce corpulency. They were after Colonel Forrest, and the expedition wound up with the battle of Nashville, Tenn., after which they returned home and were mustered out at Kittanning, Pa., in December of 1864, having been in the army three years and three months. During the service Mr. Churchill was never absent from duty for more than twenty-four hours and was never laid up in a hospital. Nevertheless he still retains reminders of pretty close calls, for his clothing was perforated with shot, his gun shot in two, his knapsack riddled, and his canteen dented beyond all recognition. At Stone River also he received a bayonet thrust through the hand.

In January of 1865 Mr. Churchill went to Pithole City, Venango county, Pa., and engaged in the oil business. From then on he was interested in drilling wells all over the state, often keeping as many as ten rigs going at the same time; nor were his operations confined to Pennsylvania, for he went into West Virginia, and was one of the first to drill for gas in Ohio, perfecting the first wells at Cleveland, and in Indiana. In the Hoosier state he carried his operations over all the state in search of gas and oil, and succeeded in working the first and only oil well in Terre Haute. He later successfully drilled in Illinois and Michigan, and in 1895 came to Los Angeles, Cal. The following year found him in Summerland where he helped to develop the wells, his sons also carrying on contract drilling at that place, where they bored one hundred wells, Mr. Churchill himself drilling twelve successful wells, and nine that proved to be practically worthless. He became closely identified with the general affairs of Summerland, and purchased considerable property which has since been disposed of. In his recent operations in Ventura and Santa Barbara counties, his work has been facilitated by the assistance of his sons, and six modern steam drilling outfits.

Since May of 1899, Mr. Churchill has made Santa Barbara his home, and his residence is a pleasant and hospitable place. Mrs. Churchill was formerly Jennie L. Kiebler, a native of Westmoreland county, Pa., and her marriage to Mr. Churchill was solemnized August 23, 1866. Mrs. Churchill is a daughter of George Kiebler, who was born in Salem township, Westmoreland county, Pa., and was a manufacturing cooper and farmer by occupation. He removed to North Washington township, where he engaged in farming, later locating in Freeport, where he was a manufacturing cooper, and subsequently returning to North Washington township, where his death eventually occurred. He married Elizabeth Singer, who was born in Dauphin county, Pa., and died in North Washington township. She was the mother of nine children, four daughters only attaining maturity. To Mr. and Mrs. Churchill have been born six children, viz.: David Lawrence, who is in the oil business in Los Angeles and is a contract driller, his only child, Lida M., residing at present with her grandparents; Samuel Clifford, who is also in the oil business in Los Angeles; Lida Clothilda, who is living at home; Frank G., who is with his father in the oil business; John Ernest, who died at the age of eight years; and Eva May, who died at the age of seven years. Mr. Churchill is a staunch upholder of Republican institutions and principles, and he is fraternally a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen, and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. He is a member of the George H. Thomas Post, G. A. R., at Indianapolis, Ind. Mrs. Churchill is affiliated with the Lutheran Church.

LEONARD JOHN ROSE, Jr. The pen of a novelist, searching the San Gabriel valley for incident with which to embellish the thread of his story, would find in the life of Leonard John Rose, Sr., sufficient material for all his needs. He was born in Germany in 1827, and immigrated to America for broader opportunities. As a member of the General Beal train of emigrants, he came to California in 1860, the little band being the first to cross the trail mapped out by the courageous general. At Gila Bend, Ariz., they were attacked by the Indians, and a number of their party killed, Mr. Rose himself being twice shot. He finally settled in the San Gabriel valley, his material aids to future success consisting of his wife, three children and two mules. In this famous valley he established the ranch which is to-day a monument to his industry, and which is still known by the old familiar name of Sunny Slope. Upon its fertile acres were grown for years one thousand acres of grapes, around which was centered a great wine industry, consignments being shipped to the extreme east and to all parts of the country. Besides his own grapes he bought all that could be found through the length and breadth of the valley, and converted the same into nectar, the aroma and bouquet of which brought a wide reputation. The other nine hundred acres comprising the ranch were devoted to various agricultural interests, but more than all to the raising of the finest thoroughbred racing stock, among them the great Stamboul. At one time alone, Mr. Rose, Jr., took eighty-seven head to New York, the average price received being $2,700. This great ranch of one thousand and nine hundred acres was sold to an English syndicate in 1887 for two hundred and seven thousand pounds, and the former owner thereof passed his declining years in Los Angeles, where his death occurred May 17, 1899. He was a man of great strength of mind. The soul of honesty himself, he was equally exacting on this score with other people, and allowed no one to take advantage of a business contract. At one time a New York firm of wine merchants tried to swindle him out of a large consignment of wine, but he personally undertook to settle the matter, and made the long journey to New York, which consumed seven months, and collected every cent of the debt. His occupations as wine merchant and stockman, combined with his chivalrous nature and interesting personality, drew to him many friends among the wealthy and influential, among others being John Mackay, who used to make the California ranch his headquarters, and was the owner of one of his host's finest trotters, Sweetheart. In his passing away Mr. Rose left behind him many kindly memories of generous deeds. He married Amanda M. Jones, after whom the town of Lamanda Park, San Gabriel valley, was named.

A worthy successor of his father, Leonard John Rose, Jr., was born in the San Gabriel valley June 11, 1862, and graduated from the Saint Augustine Academy, Benicia, in 1878. He soon became associated with his father in business, and as a partner in the wine industry spent five years in New York, looking after the interests at that end of the line. When his father's ranch was sold in 1887, he came to Ventura, and in 1888 purchased two hundred and sixty acres of land two miles from Oxnard, and also bought other property, speculating in real estate and cattle. In 1894 he located where he at present lives, and built one of the most palatial rural homes in the county, beautified to the extent of the landscape gardener's art, and surrounded with hedges and groves. Two hundred acres are in walnuts, fifty in beets, and enough oranges are raised for home consumption.

In 1885 Mr. Rose married Fannie, a daughter of J. B. Fargo, a wholesale liquor dealer of San Francisco. Of this union there are four children: Martha True, Hinda Alice, Fargo Fenton and Gilbert Blackman. In national politics Mr. Rose is a Republican, and he is fraternally associated with the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks.

MATTHEW H. ANDERSON. During the year 1876, among the men who came to Ventura county to identify themselves with its interests was Mr. Anderson, whose former home had been near San Jose, and who is now living three miles west of Santa Paula, on the Telegraph road between Santa Paula and Ventura. A native of Allen county, Ohio, born in 1844, he was reared near Lima, that state, but in 1874, accompanied by his mother and sisters, removed to California. Settling near San Jose, for two years he conducted a fruit farm there.

At the expiration of that period he settled in the southern part of Ventura county, and two years later he bought fifty acres here and set out an apricot orchard. Soon afterward he began to raise lima beans, being a pioneer in the industry that has since grown to be one of the most important in the community. Finding the raising of beans more profitable than fruit-growing, he replaced his orchard with the lima beans, of which he now raises seventy-five acres, besides having thirty acres to sugar beets each year. The beans yield about one ton per acre and sell at from three to four cents a pound. The beets yield from sixteen to twenty tons per acre. Twelve acres of the ranch is under walnuts. The property has been greatly improved under the constant and diligent care of the owner, and now one who had not seen it from 1878 to 1902 would not recognize it as the same property.

After coming to Ventura county Mr. Anderson married Miss Victoria Rendal, who was born on Prince Edward Island and educated in New York state, and was one of the early teachers in Santa Paula. They have two children, Neil and Elisabeth, both at home. The family are connected with the Presbyterian church. Realizing the value of adequate irrigation facilities, Mr. Anderson became a stockholder in the Farmers' Irrigating Company, with which he was connected for several years. During past years he voted with the Republicans, but he is now independent in local and national politics. Enterprising and successful, he has not been content with gaining prosperity for himself, but has taken an active part in plans for the upbuilding of the community and has contributed of means, time and influence to many enterprises.

WILLIAM J. BRODRICK was born in Cambridge, England, January 2, 1847, the son of an officer in the English army. After having received a fair education, he left England in 1865 and crossed the ocean to New York, thence going to Chile and Peru, and finally, in 1869, settling in Los Angeles, where he embarked in the insurance business, as a representative of a number of the standard old-line companies. On the organization of the Main Street and Agricultural Park Railway Company, he became an officer of the same, was soon chosen its president and continued in that position until his death. Other enterprises also received his encouragement, sympathy and assistance. On the founding of the Los Angeles City Water Company, he became a member of its board of directors and at the time he died was filling the offices of vice-president and auditor. The Metropolitan Building and Loan Association received the benefit of his ripened judgment during his service on its directorate, as did also the Puente Oil Company. For some years he was also connected with the Crystal Spring Land and Water Company, in which he was elected to the offices of vice-president and auditor.

While thus maintaining close personal relations with a number of private and public enterprises, from which he accumulated a competency, Mr. Brodrick did not neglect the duties of citizenship, nor was he lacking in the development of social qualities, for through membership in the California Club of Los Angeles and the Jonathan Club, he participated in much that contributed to making his home city one of the most delightful, socially, on the entire coast. The two organizations especially established to promote the commercial progress of the city, the Board of Trade and Chamber of Commerce, numbered him among their members. His realization of the need of Los Angeles for adequate protection from devastating fires led him to accept a position on the board of fire commissioners, where he remained for four years. Though not a partisan nor actively connected with political affairs, he yet believed firmly in Democratic principles and kept posted concerning the problems confronting our nation. During his participation in insurance affairs, he was a prominent member of the Fire Underwriters' Association of the Pacific.

High ideals governed Mr. Brodrick in all of his actions. His was the far-seeing discrimination, the sagacity of judgment and the honesty of purpose that are conspicuous attributes of our noblest citizens. Though English by descent, birth and education, there was something essentially American in his life and character. Indeed, he was a typical Californian, hospitable, energetic, honorable and brave, and the spirit of western push and enterprise was a prominent ingredient of his nature. While he achieved considerable success in business he also gained that which he valued far more—the respect and confidence of his fellow-citizens, and his death, October 18, 1898, was regarded as a loss to the city whose progress he had stimulated and whose development he had aided.

May 8, 1877, Mr. Brodrick married Miss Laura E. Carlisle who was born in Los Angeles, a daughter of Robert S. and Francisca Williams Carlisle. Her father, a native of Kentucky, was of Virginian family and English lineage. When a boy he went to Mexico, and from there came to Los Angeles, where he married in 1857. Later he became the owner of Chino ranch of fifteen thousand acres, where he engaged extensively in stock-raising, residing there until his death, in 1865. Since then his widow has made her home in Los Angeles, having a residence on the corner of Flower and Washington streets. They were the parents of two sons and two daughters, all of whom are living except one son. Mrs. Brodrick, who was next to the youngest, received an excellent education at Laurel Hall in San Mateo county, from which she was graduated at seventeen years of age. Soon afterward she became the wife of Mr. Brodrick, and of their union four children were born, Francisca, Anita, Lucy and Eugene Carlisle.

JACOB DIETERICH. Of all the occupations which Southern California offers to the lovers of nature none is more consistently adapted to the prevailing conditions than floriculture and nursery development. It is generally conceded that Jacob Dieterich is one of the most intelligent florists of Los Angeles, and he is the only one to import direct from Europe, his specialty being the cultivation and importation of choice decorating plants from all parts of the world. Among them may be mentioned the bay or laurel trees, sago palm from Mexico and Japan, and tree ferns from Australia.

In earliest childhood Mr. Dieterich took intense delight in cultivating flowers and improving plants. On his father's farm near Studtgart, Wurtemberg, Germany, he learned much of use in later years, for his parents, Martin and Margaret (Reiche) Dieterich, were practical tillers of the soil. The youngest of the four children in the family, Jacob was apprenticed when fourteen years of age to a florist in Studtgart, and at the same time he attended evening school, and learned botany and landscape gardening. On account of good behavior his term of service was reduced from three to two and one-half years, after which he worked independently, and was especially devoted to decorating. Later in Erfurth, the large seed-growing district, he was employed by J. C. Smith, known the world over as "Flower" Smith, and after a year he traveled through Eastern Switzerland, working as a florist and picking up additional information. Upon returning to his home to stand draft for army service he drew free, and so returned to Switzerland and found employment on a nursery and fruit-tree farm for a year.

In 1887 Mr. Dieterich came to America and at once crossed the continent to Los Angeles, where he was employed as a florist and landscape gardener for a year, and was afterwards employed by the Central Park Floral Company, being in charge of their uptown store for a year. He then went with O. W. Childs and had charge of his place for a year. By this time he had gained a fair acquaintance in the city, and formulated plans for the future. In 1892 he located at his present place, Nos. 1142-1146 Wall street, which at that time had no improvements and hardly suggested the teeming industry prevailing today. He owns four lots, each 50x150 feet, and on these has been built greenhouses after the most modern and approved plans; he also has his own waterworks. He makes a specialty of raising plants for decoration, such as pine trees, palms, laurel and bay trees, and ferns, and has worked up a large business in imported trees and plants. From Belgium he brought the first bay trees to California, and this is but one of the innovations which his forethought has provided for the city of his adoption. So successful has he become that his goods are in demand all over Southern and Northern California, Arizona, Old and New Mexico. In July of 1901 he took as a partner F. Huston, the florist, and since then the affairs of the firm have been conducted under the name of Dieterich & Huston. Mr. Huston formerly owned three acres at Sixteenth street and San Pedro avenue, which he had planted to roses, carnations, palms, etc., and which is kept and cultivated by the firm.

In Los Angeles Mr. Dieterich married Ida Hafen, who was born in Utah a daughter of Conrad Hafen, born in Switzerland. Mr. Hafen emigrated to Utah in 1860 and to Los Angeles in 1869 and up to the time of his retirement engaged as a farmer and wine grower. Mrs. Dieterich, who was educated in Los Angeles, is the mother of three children, viz.: Martha, Martin and Viola. Mr. Dieterich is a member of the Nurserymen and Florists' Association of Southern California, and from the time of its organization, in the spring of 1901, has been treasurer of the association. Fraternally he is associated with the Independent Order of Foresters, Maccabees and Independent Order of Odd Fellows. He is a member of the German Methodist Episcopal Church and a generous donator to its support. The Chamber of Commerce numbers him among its members. He is unexcelled in his line in Southern California, and Los Angeles is the gainer by his public spirit and his botanical knowledge.

DAVID HENRY IMLER. The equable climate of Southern California has attracted families from every part of the United States, thus giving to this region a citizenship not surpassed by any section. Among those who were led by climatic considerations to cast in their lot with the people of Tropicco was Mr. Imler, who, after a long and successful business career in Colorado, finding himself injuriously affected by the high altitude of that mountainous state, removed to California in 1897 and purchased three acres in Tropicco, where he has since made his home. The land is planted in citrus and deciduous fruits and vegetables for family use, Mr. Imler not having taken up horticulture as an industry, but only to supply his table with every variety of product the soil and climate produce. Among his property interests in California is a large dairy south of Los Angeles, which he rents to tenants. For the convenient management of his real-estate and oil interests, he opened an office in Los Angeles and makes frequent trips to the city. He is now superintendent of the clay department of the Pacific Cut Tile Company of Tropicco, in which he is also a stockholder.

The Imler family is of German extraction, having come from Hamburg to Pennsylvania. During the Civil war Henry Imler, a young man of about twenty-eight years, enlisted in the Union army and served with valor until he was killed in the battle of Gettysburg. His wife, Elizabeth, is still living, and is active and strong, at sixty-seven years of age. Like her husband, she is of German extraction. Three sons comprised their family, two of whom, Cyrus and Samuel, remain on the old Pennsylvania homestead. The third son, David Henry Imler, was born in Bedford, Bedford county, Pa., October 31, 1863, and remained on the home farm until fourteen years of age, when he went with a party of men to South America and for three years engaged in the cattle business. Unfortunately the outbreak of the rebellion in that country proved disastrous to their interests and they returned with less than they had at first. When seventeen years of age Mr. Imler went to Colorado and was employed in the building of the Chicago & Rock Island Railroad from St. Joseph, Mo., to Colorado Springs, Colo. His services proving valuable as an engineer he was retained for four years on different divisions, and was one of the first engineers connected with the building of the railroad on Pike's Peak, later working in the construction of the Colorado Midland Railroad and tunnel. During all of this time he had been interested in grub-staking and prospecting, and met with the usual experiences of miners in alternate successes and reverses.

Together with John Lane and J. E. Hunter as partners, Mr. Imler located the Orphan Bell group on Bull mountain, Cripple Creek. Four claims were located and developed, and these were sold for $450,000. The same men owned other claims and, while developing in 1893, they opened an office in Colorado Springs and organized a company of which Mr. Imler was chosen secretary. The latter became heavily interested in the brokerage business, which he conducted with Mr. Hutchinson until obliged to leave Colorado for a lower altitude, in September, 1897. However, he still retains various interests in dividend-paying companies in that state, the present success of which is largely due to his wise judgment in locating mines.

By the marriage of Mr. Imler to Miss Adelaide Hickman, a native of Indiana, he has two children, Eugene and Marjory. During his residence in Colorado he took an active part in local politics, as a worker in the Republican party, but of recent years he has been less active. A disciple of Masonry, he has taken all of the degrees, including the York and Scottish Rite, up to the thirty-second. He is not connected with any denomination, but contributes to the maintenance of the Methodist Episcopal Church, of which Mrs. Imler is a member. All measures having for their object the benefit of the people receive his support. To all subjects presented to him he brings the cautious and keen judgment that have characterized him in private business affairs. Personally he is genial, companionable and whole-souled, generous in disposition, liberal in contributions to worthy movements, and a citizen whose standing in Tropic is the highest.

J. A. MATHIS. To the mechanical and constructive ability of Mr. Mathis are due many of the substantial structures in Southern California. Possessing a knowledge of the artistic as well as substantial, of harmonious blendings and convenient arrangement, his name is associated with all that is lasting in the realm of building. A native of Louisville, Ky., he was born September 6, 1863, and was reared and educated in his native town. From a boy he became familiar with carpenter's tools, for his father, Mitchell Mathis, was one of the best-known contractors and builders of Louisville. The elder Mathis was born in Alsace-Lorraine, and immigrated to America with his mother when a young boy, settling in Louisville, where he was educated and grew to manhood. Subsequently he engaged in running a flour mill, and about 1887 removed to Los Angeles, Cal., where he is living in retirement. His wife, formerly Catherine J. Brown, who was born in Baltimore, Md., and died in Los Angeles in 1897, was the mother of four children, J. A. being the youngest of the three now living.

After having mastered the trade of carpenter under his father's able instruction, J. A. Mathis worked for a couple of years in the flour mill, and in 1883 began carpentering in Los Angeles. So successful was he that in 1891 he branched out into building and contracting, since which time, in partnership with Mr. Haupt, he has made a name for himself among the city's ambitious constructors. Among his most creditable undertakings may be mentioned the Jacoby building, the Lighting Company's building, the Raphael residence, the residences of F. C. Wolf and Rev. A. M. Hough, the Godins and Jepson homes, and that of S. K. Lindley, the new Telephone building and the residence of Col. John E. Stearns of St. James Park. He has also built the gas holder at Pasadena, and his superiority in ecclesiastical construction is best evinced in the erection of the First Methodist Episcopal Church, which cost $80,000, and is considered one of the finest in the state and the most perfect in Southern California. The home of the Mathis family in Los Angeles is at No. 1936 Santee street. Fraternally Mr. Mathis is associated with the Masons, South Gate Lodge No. 320, at Los Angeles, and was raised to Los Angeles Chapter No. 42, R. A. M.; also is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, Golden Rule Lodge No. 160.

W. H. PIERCE, an influential citizen of Los Angeles, was born in Delaware county, N. Y., December 28, 1859, and is a son of J. Washington and Frances (Clark) Pierce. The ancestry of the family is authentically traced far back into English history, and among the descendants who lived and prospered after removing to New York state, the paternal great-grandfather is recalled with particular pride, because of his personal worthiness and his military services during the Revolutionary war. Daniel, the paternal grandfather, was born in Dutchess county, N. Y., and became a farmer in Delaware county.

J. Washington Pierce is a native of Dutchess county, N. Y., and in early life learned the blacksmith's trade, in connection with which he carried on a farm in New York. Although passed beyond the age limit and exempt from obligation during the Civil war, he volunteered in the One Hundred and Forty-fourth New York Infantry, and saw much of the terrible side of war. He continued to live in New York state until 1896, when he removed to Los Angeles, and has since enjoyed the leisure due his active career. He married in Delaware county Frances C. Clark, daughter of Charles Clark, a native of Connecticut, and a pioneer farmer of Delaware county. Mrs. Pierce, who is sixty-nine years of age (ten years younger than her husband) is the mother of ten sons and two daughters, of whom eight sons and one daughter are now living, W. H. being the fifth. One of the sons, E. T. Pierce, is a prominent western educator, and is principal of the State Normal at Los Angeles; Dr. Clarence Pierce is a police surgeon, and F. E. Pierce is veterinary surgeon for the city of Oakland and inspector of food supplies.

The youth of W. H. Pierce was uneventfully passed on his father's farm in New York, and his education was acquired in the district schools and at Walton Academy. In 1880 he came to Sacramento, Cal., and in partnership with his brother, R. W., engaged in the general merchandise business under the firm name of Pierce Brothers for two and a half years. He then had an experience at ranching for about a year in Southern California and during the following year operated a general mercantile store in Calaveras county. In 1884 he permanently located in Los Angeles. The livery business upon which he embarked was first conducted under the firm name of Pierce Bros., and afterwards as Pierce Bros. & Co., still later being changed to Pierce & Wheat. The enterprise was the pioneer of its kind in East Los Angeles. In 1897 Mr. Pierce disposed of his livery interests, and the following year proved the beginning of his meritorious political career, and his inestimable services in promoting Republicanism. In December of 1898 he was nominated councilman for the first ward, and elected by a large majority. The year 1900 witnessed his re-election to the same office. From 1900 to 1902 he was a member of the finance and sewer committees, and chairman of the bridge and water supply committees, and also served as a member of the special committee to organize and put in operation the new city water plant. At times he has served on the county and city committees. In these various opportunities to serve the best interests of the community Mr. Pierce has shown judgment and keen knowledge, and his administration was free from personal ambitions, or desire for financial gain at the expense of public confidence.

In Los Angeles, in 1886, Mr. Pierce married Mary Newton, a native of Saybrook, Middlesex county, Conn., and a daughter of Dr. Sterling C. Newton, who was born in Hartland, Conn. The paternal grandfather, Isaac Newton, was also a native of Connecticut, and was a farmer in the vicinity of Hartland. Sterling Newton was a graduate physician and practiced his profession first in Saybrook and afterward in Hartford, locating in Los Angeles in 1884, where he died in June of 1894. He was a man of leading characteristics, and served in the state legislature in Connecticut in 1861 and 1879. In Los Angeles he was well known and prominent, and accomplished great good for the city. In company with others he founded the East Side Bank (now the Bank of Commerce), and was the president thereof for several years. In political affiliation he was a Democrat. In his young manhood he married Gertrude Tinker, who was born in Toland, Mass., a daughter of Edward L. Tinker, a native of Westfield, Mass., and a tanner by occupation. The Tinker family was represented among the soldiers of the Revolutionary war. Mrs. Newton is now a resident of Los Angeles, and has but one child, Mrs. Pierce, who was educated in the Young Ladies' Institute in Windsor, Conn. To Mr. and Mrs. Pierce were born three children, Sterling Newton, Gertrude Frances and Helen May.

Mr. Pierce is associated with East Side Lodge No. 325, I. O. O. F., also the Fraternal Brotherhood and the Fraternal Aid. He is a charter member of the East Side Baptist Church, and contributes to the maintenance of this and other worthy claims upon his generosity.

FRANK RADEMACHER. Mechanical and inventive ability is a distinctive characteristic of Mr. Rademacher, chairman of the examining board of stationary engineers of Los Angeles and chief engineer of the Maier & Zobelein brewery. Since he entered upon the duties of the latter position, June 15, 1891, the plant has been enlarged and machinery has been introduced which he invented, including the Rademacher friction power transmission, patented. The peculiar advantages derived from the use of this invention, which can be applied to any engine, are that both space and friction are saved. The oil burning malt kiln, which he invented and patented, has been in successful operation in this brewery since 1895. Another of his inventions, patented in 1891, is the Rademacher heater and condenser for condensing steam from the engine and returning it to the boiler. More recently he has applied the oil-burning system to the factory of Bishop & Co., where it has proved a great success, the capacity of the ovens having been increased three-fold. The electric light plant was put into the brewery under his supervision. Two Lansing iron works engines, with combined horse-power capacity of five hundred, and two boilers of two hundred and fifty horse-power each, have been installed by him. During this time he has also designed and built a thirty-five ton refrigerator machine for Simon Maier, to be used in the slaughter house, and this has proved as successful as his other devices and improvements.

Near Westphalia, Clinton county, Mich., Frank Rademacher was born September 20, 1856, the oldest among the six children of Frank and Sophia (Vonck) Rademacher. His grandfather, Frank Rademacher a native of Westphalia, Germany, brought his wife and four children to America in 1835 and became one of the first settlers in Westphalia, Mich., where he bought land containing a dense growth of beach and maple trees, and situated one and one-half miles east of the village. He opened the first tavern in the township, and continued to live there until his death, which occurred in 1868, at the age of eighty-four years. After the family settled in Clinton county one of his sons, Bernhard, started a hotel in Westphalia, later conducted a hardware business, and built the first brick house in the town, also a large brick store.

A native of Westphalia, Germany, the father of our subject became a farmer of Westphalia, Mich., whence, in 1869, he removed to Osage Mission in Kansas and twenty-three months later settled in Milwaukee, Wis. Returning to Westphalia, he later removed to Reno, Mich., and entered and cleared forty acres, later carrying on a hotel in Muskegon county. His wife was born near Cologne, Germany, a daughter of Gustav Vonck, a nobleman of Germany and large landed proprietor. In 1854 she settled in Michigan. After her death in Grand Rapids, Mich., her husband made his home among his children, and is now in California with his son and namesake.

Being the oldest member of a family whose parents were poor, the subject of this sketch was obliged to work early and late when a boy in order that he might assist in supporting the family. From nine years of age he worked on a farm, and his earnings, though small, were of the greatest assistance to his parents, who were ill and unable to do much. When fourteen years of age he was apprenticed to the machinist's trade in Milwaukee, Wis., in the machine shops of E. P. Ellis, and during his four and one-half years of service the first large pipe for the city water works was cast in these shops. As fireman on a lake vessel, Ironsides, he remained on the lake for two seasons, and then was promoted to be second engineer. A later position was with Thompson & Smith's mills as chief engineer. After eight months he became mechanical engineer for the Lansing Iron and Engine Works, where he continued seven years, meantime erecting plants for the company all over Michigan and in adjoining states. His residence in Los Angeles dates from August 28, 1887. Finding a strike among the machinists he turned his attention to other work, taking a contract to grade a road, and then securing employment in the Baker Iron Works. After three years and four months, he resigned in 1891, in order to accept the position of chief engineer in the Maier & Zobelein brewery, where he has since remained, distinctly the "right man in the right place."

In Lansing, Mich., Mr. Rademacher married Miss Nellie Eddy, who was born in Clinton county, Mich., a member of a pioneer family of that state. They have one daughter, Isabelle. After coming to Los Angeles he was made a Mason in Los Angeles Lodge No. 42, F. & A. M., in which he is past master; he is also connected with Los Angeles Consistory, Scottish Rite, and Al Malakiah Temple, N. M. S. Among other organizations to which he has belonged is the United Order of Druids. About 1897 he was appointed a member of the examining board of stationary engineers, and on the organization of the new board was chosen its chairman, which responsible place he has since filled. As president he is intimately associated with the workings of the National Association of Stationary Engineers of California No. 2, to which he owes special allegiance as a charter member. An honor was conferred upon him in 1900, when he was elected a delegate to the national convention in Milwaukee, and in this gathering he bore an interested part. Anything that pertains to his chosen occupation receives his earnest attention, and particularly so if it promises any improvement over plans heretofore used, for, both through his own inventions and those of other thinkers, he is solicitous to secure the highest possible development of the department of engineering.

FRANK WALKER. A résumé of the men whose abilities have resulted in lasting good to Los Angeles would be incomplete without due and deserved mention of Frank Walker, a citizen whose adaptability has found an outlet in several avenues of activity throughout the west, aside from his chosen occupation of building. It may be said that practically the whole of his business life has been spent west of or in the Rocky mountain districts, for when twenty years of age he left his home, within eighteen miles of Niagara Falls, where he was born March 29, 1843, and henceforward the old familiar surroundings knew him no more. His parents, Francis and Elizabeth (Hudson) Walker, were sturdy Canadian pioneers, and reared six boys to years of usefulness, Frank Walker being the youngest and the only one in California.

The journey west was accomplished by Mr. Walker via Panama, on the steamer Ocean Queen to Aspinwall, and aboard the Golden Age to San Francisco, arriving there May 7, 1864, twenty-four days after leaving New York. Arriving in the country of his great expectations, he engaged in lumbering for a time near Eureka, Humboldt county, Cal., and afterwards went to Big Bend, near the headwaters of the Columbia river, in British Columbia. In Idaho he helped to build the first mill on the famous Poor Man mining claim at Silver City, and upon going to Nevada he had charge of mills on the Carson river, near Silver City, for about three years. In 1870 he located in San Francisco and engaged in building and contracting, and in 1873 changed his location to Santa Barbara, where he erected some of the first brick buildings in the town. Among other constructions due to his ability may be mentioned the Odd Fellows' building, the city hall, the Stearns building, and many private residences. In Santa Barbara he also constructed the first street railway, from the wharf to the Arlington hotel. In search of more prolific fields he journeyed to Old Mexico in 1879, and in San Antonio engaged in mining and also built and operated a mill for the San Antonio Mining and Milling Company. Not content with Mexico as a permanent abiding place, he removed a year later to Tombstone, Ariz., where he became prominent in the upbuilding of this then wild mining center. He built the first waterworks in the town, and also furnished plans and had charge of the construction of the court house, one of the finest in the territory, as well as the city hall. He built numerous business houses, and while still in Arizona furnished the architectural plans for several other buildings, both public and private.

In 1885 Mr. Walker became identified with Los Angeles, and was fairly successful as a general contractor and builder until 1892, when he removed to San Francisco, and remained until 1897. Upon again locating in Los Angeles he looked after his previously acquired interests here, and continued to build on a somewhat less extensive scale. In the mean time he had shown commendable activity in the Republican party, in the principles and issues of which he had great faith up to 1895. He has since affiliated with the Democrats, and to this party owes his election to the city council in 1900, as representative of the Third ward. In January of 1900 he took the oath of office, and has been chairman of the Zanza committee, a member of the land committee, and of the water supply committee. Fraternally he has been associated with the Santa Barbara lodge and chapter of Masons, and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, both lodge and encampment. Frank H. Walker, the son of Mr. Walker, was educated at the Leland Stanford University, and is now private secretary to the president and general manager of the Frisco Road, with headquarters in St. Louis. The life efforts of Mr. Walker have not only resulted in the establishment of an enviable commercial and social reputation, but have as well brought in their train a deserved financial standing.

COL. JOHN HENRY MILLS. The close of a busy and useful life covering seventy years came to Colonel Mills in Monrovia, May 22, 1893, shortly after he had established his home in this city. He was born in Johnstown, Montgomery county, N. Y., June 26, 1823. His mother was a daughter of Judge Allen of Rhode Island, who was descended from Ethan Allen of Revolutionary fame. The education of Colonel Mills was secured principally in the seminary at Amsterdam, N. Y., from which he was graduated. At the age of fifteen years he became an apprentice to the machinist's trade, at which he served the regular time, and later was an employe of the Altena Fire Insurance Company. When thousands of gold-seekers were enduring untold hardships to reach the mines of the Pacific coast, he joined these Argonauts and in 1852 arrived in San Francisco. From there he proceeded to Forest City, where he began gold and silver mining. In 1859 he went to Nevada, where he took the first contract for tunnel work in the noted Comstock mines and helped to develop the same.

During the long period of his residence in Nevada Colonel Mills was one of the most distinguished public men of the state, which benefited immeasurably by his able services. Before the formation of the state government he was colonel on the staff of Major-General Van Bocklin, and afterward held the same position under Governor Blasedell. During the Civil war he raised a company of home guards. The Republican party had in him one of its most loyal supporters, and in return honored him by calling him to positions of trust and responsibility. Twice he was elected to the Nevada legislature, and served for one term as speaker of the house, in which position it is a matter of record that his decisions were just and his rulings in accordance with the best parliamentary codes. Three times he was offered the nomination for governor, but always declined the honor. For six years he was superintendent of the Orphans' Home, for several terms served as mint commissioner of construction, and was also commissioner for the construction of the state capitol. Another office which he held was that of federal assessor, which he resigned to accept that of elector at the second election of President Grant, when he was the messenger of the electoral college to carry the vote to Washington.

Retiring from public life, in 1884 Colonel Mills removed to Portland, Ore., and from there came to Monrovia, Cal., early in 1893, hoping to enjoy many years of health and happiness here, but three months later he was stricken with heart failure and died almost instantly. His body was interred in Live Oak cemetery at Monrovia. While his residence here was but short, he had won many friends, who had been attached to him by his geniality of manner, generous disposition, broad intelligence and high character, and the community was a unit in regretting his demise.

In Grace Episcopal Church of San Francisco, in 1863, Colonel Mills married Miss Elizabeth Cook, who was born at Fort Plains, Montgomery county, N. Y. In a family of three sons and three daughters she was next to the youngest. Her parents, Judge Henry and Adelia (Empie) Cook, were natives respectively of Fort Plains and Fry's Bush, N. Y. The latter was a direct descendant of Major-General John Coopman of the Revolution and Capt. Jacob Empie, who was killed at the battle of Areskeny before the birth of Mrs. Mills' grandfather. Her grandfather, John R. Cook, was born in the Mohawk valley, a supposed descendant of the duke of Wellington. Throughout active life he engaged in farming pursuits, also took a warm interest in politics as a Jacksonian Democrat and an associate of Martin Van Buren during the latter's campaign for president. Among the local offices he held were those of county clerk and collector. At the time of his death, which occurred in Clay, N. Y., he was ninety-seven years of age.

From his eastern home, where he had been a leading lawyer and gentleman farmer, Judge Henry Cook went to California in 1851, residing first in San Francisco, next in Amador county, then going to Nevada, from there returning to San Francisco. His last days were passed in Carson City, Nev., where his body lies buried in the Masonic cemetery. He had been high in Masonry, having all the degrees up to and including the thirty-second and the Mystic Shrine. An active member of the Republican party, he served on its central committee and received from it election to the state legislature. The education of Mrs. Mills was principally obtained in the Fort Plains high school. Travel and culture have added to the knowledge acquired from books, have broadened her mind and deepened her interest in humanity. Since the death of Colonel Mills she has continued to reside at Mills Views, the homestead of twelve acres, which, under her capable supervision, has been transformed into one of the most beautiful estates in Monrovia. Fruits of various kinds have been set out. Eighty trees have been budded to Valencia oranges, while the balance of the orange grove is in Washington navels. There are besides a few trees of lemons, plums and peaches. The orchard is irrigated by a private water right of one inch of water with a four-inch pressure, furnishing abundant facilities for keeping the land in excellent condition, and thus solving a problem that is often the most serious a western horticulturist confronts.

MAJOR BELLE L. REYNOLDS, M. D. Through her paternal ancestors Dr. Reynolds traces her lineage back to Robert I. of Scotland, and, more recently, to John Alden and Priscilla, of Mayflower fame. Many years ago, during the days of King Robert II. of Scotland, the life of that monarch was on one occasion saved by the presence of mind of Archibald Campbell McKonnochie, of the McKonnochie branch of the Campbell clan. The king was being attacked by a wild boar and his life was in great danger, when the Highlander saved him by shooting an arrow through the animal's head. In recognition of the act, the king gave him the crest which the family bear to-day, and the family name was changed to McKomber, later to Macomber. The crest contains a boar's head rampant, having an arrow of appropriate colors, and with three right hands coupled, holding bunches of arrows. The motto is, "He hath sent and he hath rewarded."

Five brothers of the Macomber race came to Massachusetts from Scotland, and from them those of the name throughout the United States descend. Ebenezer Macomber, a farmer of Massachusetts, served in the war of 1812. His son, Kingsley Macomber, was born in Salem, Mass., and became a manufacturer of sewing silk in Northampton, that state. Removing to Iowa in 1855, he settled in Lewis, Cass county, where he transformed a tract of wild land into a valuable and fertile farm. Meantime he made a number of trips to Pike's Peak and the west, the most of these being made between 1858 and 1861 by mule trains. At the time of his death he was eighty-three years old. He had married Martha Alexander, a native of Massachusetts, and a daughter of Elisha and Phila (Cooley) Alexander, both born in that state. The former, who was of Scotch lineage, was a large land owner and capitalist. Mrs. Alexander was a daughter of Abner Cooley, of English descent, and who served as a captain in the Revolutionary war. Five children comprised the family of Kingsley and Martha Macomber, namely: Arabella (Dr. Belle Reynolds); H. K., who graduated from a medical college in New York, afterward served in the Second Iowa Cavalry during the Civil war and is now a practicing physician of Pasadena, Cal.; John K., ex-city attorney of Des Moines, Iowa; George, who died in early manhood; and Frank J., an attorney in Lewis, Iowa. It is noteworthy that all of the sons graduated from the Agricultural College at Ames, Iowa. Dr. Belle Reynolds was a student in the Ladies' Collegiate Institute at Worcester, Mass., having returned there from Iowa in order to complete her education.

In Lewis, Iowa, April 19, 1860, Arabella Macomber became the wife of William S. Reynolds, who was born in Springfield, Mass., his father, H. S., having been a merchant in that city. After graduating at Easthampton, Mr. Reynolds engaged in business in his native town, but shortly after the discovery of gold in Pike's Peak he started across the plains with a mule train. However, he soon returned, and in the fall of 1860 settled in Peoria, Ill., where he engaged in the drug business. At the call for troops in 1861 he was one of the first four young men in Peoria to enlist, his first enlistment being for three months. Subsequently he was mustered in as orderly sergeant of Company A, Seventeenth Illinois Infantry, for three years, and at a later date was promoted to be first lieutenant in rank, acting as adjutant of his regiment. His last service was as an aide on staff duty. Among his engagements were the following: Fredericktown, Mo., Forts Henry and Donelson, Pittsburg Landing or Shiloh, first battle of Corinth, Iuka, Holly Springs, Milliken's Bend and siege of Vicksburg. From the first Mrs. Reynolds accompanied him in the field. At the battle of Pittsburg Landing she was in camp when the battle began at seven o'clock in the morning, and for one week afterward she assisted in caring for the wounded in the hospitals and on the boats. A work by Frank Moore, of New York, entitled "Women of the War," has a chapter from her diary. It would be impossible to convey to one not familiar with the horrors of war an adequate conception of the hardships she underwent, the sacrifices she was called upon to make, and the quiet heroism she constantly displayed. But all of these hardships she endured uncomplainingly, and all of these sacrifices she made cheerfully, receiving abundant reward in seeing many wounded soldiers made comfortable by her kindly care and the dying moments of many brave lads cheered by her presence.

At the close of that memorable week, Governor Richard Yates of Illinois chartered a boat, Blackhawk, to come south for the wounded. On this boat were many physicians, among them being two surgeons from Peoria, Ill., who were acquaintances of Mrs. Reynolds. Being completely worn out, her husband and Dr. Guth suggested that she return home, and she consented to go, but all the way up the river she continued her ministrations to the wounded men. On her arrival at home every one was eager to meet her and hear from her lips the story of that disastrous battle, from which few had escaped to tell the tale. The suggestion was made that she should receive a commission, and Governor Yates ordered his private secretary, John Moses, to make out a commission as major, dated from April 7, presented April 16, 1862, with the governor's signature attached. It is noteworthy that she is the only woman who has ever received a commission as major from the governor of any state. After an absence of ten days she rejoined the regiment, where she continued doing all in her power to promote the comfort of the soldiers, but wearing neither uniform nor shoulder straps, nor drawing one dollar of pay.

On the expiration of Mr. Reynolds' term of enlistment they returned to Iowa and settled on a farm. In 1870 they removed to San Francisco, Cal., and the following year went to Hong Kong, China, where Mr. Reynolds acted as vice-consul, but returned to San Francisco in 1872. In 1878 she became interested in medicine. This is doubtless an inherited family taste, for one of her brothers and four of her father's brothers were physicians. Entering Hahnemann Medical College in Chicago she continued there until her graduation in 1880, after which she practiced in Chicago until 1893. During her residence in that city she was an assistant to the president of Hahnemann Medical College, with whom she practiced for ten years. At the same time she was connected with the Chicago Clinical Society, the American Institute and the State Society.

Since 1894 Dr. Reynolds has resided in Santa Barbara, where she has her office on Garden and Sola streets, and carries on a general practice, with a specialty of diseases of women and children. Her military history does not end with the Civil war, but extends over into the conflict with Spain. In April, 1899, she was sent to the Philippines by the National and California Red Cross Societies, and was the only woman on the ship Senator that carried seven hundred men of the Thirteenth Regiment. After a voyage of four weeks, the vessel landed, and she remained on the islands for one year, acting as distributing agent and at the same time teaching in the government school. In April, 1900, she returned to California on the Sheridan and immediately resumed her practice in Santa Barbara. In the work of the Ladies of the G. A. R. she maintains an interest as an active member. From childhood she has been a staunch Republican. Her family were Abolitionists of the strongest type, and she has always remained loyal to the principles of freedom and loyalty to country, which have been her creed since childhood. In religion she is an Episcopalian, and while in Manila aided in the work of that church, where her membership still remains.

GUSTAF STROME. During the progress of the Swedish-Franco war the Strome family became transplanted from its original French soil to the bleaker land of Sweden. Carl Strome, a blacksmith, served in the Swedish army; his son, Carl Frederick, not only engaged in blacksmithing, but also followed the trades of gunsmith and coppersmith, and was in many respects a man of inventive genius. The wife of Carl Frederick Strome was Christine Catherine Manson, who was a member of an old Swedish family and died in Los Angeles, Cal., at seventy-two years of age. Born of their union were seven children, of whom a daughter died in Sweden and a son died in New England. Four daughters and one son are living, all of whom but one daughter reside in California. The only surviving son, Gustaf, was born near Linköping, Westaharg, Ostergötland, Sweden, August 9, 1845. Since attaining his majority he has changed the family name from Strome to Strome, in order to secure an accuracy of pronunciation that had been previously impossible.

When thirteen years of age Mr. Strome was apprenticed to the painter's trade at Askersund, under an uncle, with whom he remained for five years, meantime learning every department of painting and decorating. Following the expiration of his apprenticeship he worked as a journeyman painter. In June, 1867, he came via Hull to New York on the steamer City of London. Proceeding at once to Chicago, he followed the carriage painter's trade as foreman for a large house in that city. In 1869 he went still further west, spending a short time in Republic county, Kans., and thence going to Junction City, where he joined Custer's command as a teamster in the expedition against the Cheyennes and Arapahoes. Following the route of the troops, he was in the Indian Territory and Texas, and witnessed the battle of Camp Supply on the Canadian river, as well as other battles and skirmishes through that region and in Kansas and Nebraska. At the expiration of six months, the campaign having closed, he was discharged. The experiences of those days will always linger in his memory as among the most interesting and thrilling of his life, and there is no portion of his eventful past which he recalls with greater pleasure than that period with Custer on the frontier. Settlements were few; little effort had as yet been made to cultivate the land and open up farms. The broad stretches of prairie offered no signs of life save the herds of buffalo, which were then numerous, but which, through the thoughtless cruelty of sportsmen, have since become practically extinct.

After a short time as a contracting painter in Junction City, Mr. Strome went to Abilene, Kans., where he had many narrow escapes during the days of Wild Bill. Two years later he returned to Junction City, and afterward, with a partner, followed contracting in that city as well as Abilene, later being similarly occupied in Council Grove, Kans. The great fire of Chicago in 1871 made an opening for workmen in that city, and he went there in January of the following year. For two years he followed contract painting at Highwood and engaged in business in various suburbs on the Northwestern Railroad, returning to Kansas in 1878 and settling in Newton, thence going to Wellington, Sumner county. January of 1882 found him in San Diego, Cal., and during June of the same year he came to Los Angeles, where he is not only the pioneer contracting painter, but also the pioneer Swedish gentleman. Among his contracts have been those for many large public buildings, including the Byrne, Hellman, Bradbury and Bryson blocks. Sign work has been one of his specialties and his success in it has been noteworthy. His business location is No. 605 S. Spring street, while his residence is at No. 1547 Council street. While living in Chicago he was married, in the suburb of Highwood, to Miss Mathilda Seline, who was born in Brooklyn, N. Y., of Swedish descent. They have two sons, Karl Otto and Leo Albin.

From the time that he cast his first presidential vote for U. S. Grant in Chicago, in November, 1872, up to the present time, Mr. Strome has been a pronounced and staunch Republican and a believer in every plank of the party's platform. The Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce, which has been such an important factor in the growth of this city, numbers him among its members. On the organization of the Builders' Exchange he became associated with it as a charter member. While living in Kansas he was initiated into the Independent Order of Odd Fellows at Wellington, and is now connected with Los Angeles Lodge No. 35, also with the Veterans' Association of Odd Fellows of Southern California. Personally he is a genial, companionable man, who has a host of warm friends among his associates, and whose life has been such as to win for him the confidence of acquaintances.

HON. MEREDITH P. SNYDER. The Snyders settled in North Carolina during the colonial era. Meredith P. was born at old Lexington Court House, in that state, October 22, 1859. Through his own efforts he secured the means necessary for a collegiate course and attended college for a time, but did not graduate. In 1880 he came to Los Angeles, where he has since made his home. After clerking in a furniture store for a time, he accepted a position with the B. F. Coulter Dry Goods Company, and for four years was in charge of the drapery department. He then turned his attention to the real-estate business, in which he engaged for eight years. Afterward, for a similar period he was at the head of the M. P. Snyder Shoe Company, a business that is still successfully carried on, though under different management.

In 1890 he was elected a member of the police commission, and was re-elected at the expiration of his term. Two years later he was elected to represent the second ward in the city council, where he took an active part in movements for the benefit of the town. So high did he stand in the city and such was his prominence in the Democratic party, that its members nominated him for the office of mayor in the fall of 1896 and he was elected by a large majority, taking his seat in January, 1897, and serving efficiently for one term, at the close of which he re-entered the real-estate business. In 1900 he was again elected mayor. His record as mayor has been an excellent one. While exercising a controlling influence in local affairs, this influence has been used only for the best purposes and for the good of the municipality. He believes in good government, and in the exercise of his personal power as mayor he has never betrayed the best interests of the city, but has proved himself cool-headed, courageous, energetic and indefatigable as an official. Beyond question his administration has contributed to the progress of the city. His reasons for political action have always been based upon sound common sense. When he vetoed the freight-carrying franchise whereby the electric companies might have carried freight through the heart of the city, he did not veto the measure because the people wanted him to, or because he felt any desire to injure those corporations, but because he did not think that any city should grant such extensive powers to any one, corporation, individual, or any public body. This is but a single instance taken to illustrate a certain phase of the mayor's career, and yet it is illustrative of the entire character of the man. He met the issue fairly and squarely, and decided it on a basis of sound common sense.

FITCH C. E. MATTISON, M. D. Since establishing himself in professional practice at Pasadena in 1898 Dr. Mattison has gained a reputation as a skillful and reliable physician, who combines accuracy of diagnosis with promptness of treatment. Always ambitious to keep at the fore front of the profession, in 1900 he returned east and took a course of lectures in the Johns Hopkins Medical College. At the same time further opportunity for professional research was given him through his appointment as a delegate from the American Medical Association to the International Medical Congress in Paris, to which city the Paris Exposition was at the time drawing thousands of visitors. While in Europe he had the privilege of spending some time in hospitals and clinics both in Paris and London, where he became familiar with the work of the foremost surgeons of the world. As his tour was a pleasure trip as well as a professional opportunity, he traveled through Germany, Italy and France, and visited points of interest in the British Isles, returning to the United States after five and one-half months abroad.

The founder of the Mattison family in America came from Scotland to Baltimore, Md. His son, Capt. John J., who was born at Annapolis, Md., became a captain in the trans-Atlantic trade. Next in line of descent was Samuel J., a native of Baltimore and for years a merchant on Broadway, that city. Removing to Kentucky, he shortly returned to Baltimore, where he engaged in business until his retirement. During the Civil war he was a lieutenant in the First Baltimore Light Artillery, C. S. A., and was twice wounded in battle. He married Catherine C. Jennings, who was born in Philadelphia and now makes Baltimore her home. Her father, Richard Jennings, a native of England, followed the gunsmith's trade in Philadelphia, and before and during the Civil war was in charge of the government arsenal at that city. Subsequent to the war he conducted business in New York City and Staten Island. His death occurred in Cleveland, Ohio, when he was eighty-five years of age. The lady whom he married was a native of England and a cousin of John B. Gough, the famous temperance orator.

In the family of Samuel J. Mattison there were two daughters and eight sons, of whom one daughter and seven sons are now living. The oldest son, Fitch C. E., was born in Louisville, Ky., May 4, 1861, and received his education in public and private schools of Annapolis and Baltimore. Until 1881 he assisted his father in business, but during that year he went to Chicago and became interested in a drug business, also began the study of medicine. In 1885 he entered the College of Physicians and Surgeons, from which he was graduated in 1888, and since that time he has taken several post-graduate courses in Chicago. For ten years after graduating he had his office in Hyde Park, Chicago, but climatic considerations induced him to settle in Pasadena, which decision he has had no occasion to regret. While in Chicago he married Miss Helen H. Blake, who was born in Chicago and died in Pasadena in 1899, leaving a daughter, Bessie E.

An enumeration of the organizations with which Dr. Mattison is identified includes the Los Angeles County Medical Society; the Southern California Medical Society, in which he has been honored by election as president; the Pasadena Medical Association; American Medical Association; also the Cook County and Illinois State Medical Societies, with which he was actively identified prior to coming to the Pacific coast. In social organizations he holds membership in the Valley Hunt and Twilight Clubs. Since coming to Pasadena he has been made a Mason in Corona Lodge and is also connected with the chapter and commandery in this city, besides which he is associated with the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks.

L. F. WEBSTER is one of the enterprising citizens of Ventura and a well-known contractor and builder. His biography records the life efforts of a man who has attained prominence through the exercise of those substantial traits of character which are the fundamentals of reliable citizenship, and which enable their owners not only to grasp, but also to create, opportunities. He was born in Oberlin, Ohio, November 17, 1842, and lived in his native state until 1851. His father, LaFayette Webster (named after the immortal General LaFayette), was born in Utica, N. Y., and became a farmer near Oberlin, Ohio, where terminated his industrious career. The paternal grandfather, Miles, was born in Connecticut, and while a soldier in the war of 1812 was wounded at the burning of Buffalo. His years of activity were filled with the combined occupations of farming and school teaching, and his principal places of residence were Utica, N. Y., and Elyria, Ohio. The mother of Mr. Webster, Emeline (Holly) Webster, was born in Ohio, her parents having removed there from Washington county, New York. She was of English descent, and died in Ventura in 1898, at the age of eighty-four years. Of the four boys in the family, L. F. is the second; La Roy died in Ohio; La Torry is a farmer at Carpinteria, Cal., and served in the Civil war in Company B, Second Iowa Infantry; and La Omri is a farmer at Put-in-Bay, Ohio.

The greater portion of the early education of L. F. Webster was acquired in Wisconsin, his father having removed to the vicinity of Madison in 1851. He attended the public schools and the University of Wisconsin, from which institution he decamped at the breaking out of the Civil war, having neglected the formality of stating his intentions to his superiors. In September of 1861 he volunteered in Company B, Second Wisconsin Infantry, and served in the army of the Potomac until July of 1862, when he was mustered out for physical disability. After a return to Ohio he re-enlisted at Columbus in 1863 in Company M, Third Ohio Cavalry, and was through the entire campaign of Sherman with the McPherson corps, and served until July 22, 1864. On this well-remembered day himself and three others on advance guard ran into a couple of rebel regiments and were captured and sent to Andersonville, where they remained for over nine months, or until April 1, when they were taken to Vicksburg and paroled. He then returned home and was mustered out at Columbus, June 26, 1865. In direct contrast to the horrors of his imprisonment at Andersonville was the escape from the impending doom of the Sultana, the ill-fated explosion of which was heralded all over the country. From Vicksburg he was expected to go on this boat, but instead was sent on board a hospital ship, and thus was spared for future years of usefulness. His death, however, was chronicled in the press of the day, and his friends supposed him to be a victim of the catastrophe.

With the restoration of peace Mr. Webster returned to Ohio and engaged in the grape industry at Put-in-Bay Island, and also engaged in educational work. While here he married, October 27, 1869, Harriet Brackett Haskin, who was born in Hannibal, Oswego county, N. Y. Mrs. Webster, who is one of the prominent women of Ventura, is of English descent, and comes of a family who were political refugees from England to Wales. They eventually settled in New England, some of them removing to Vermont, where the paternal grandfather, Heman, was born. He was a farmer in later years in New York, and also a merchant tailor, and married in his young manhood Nancy Weller, daughter of Dan Weller, one of the soldiers of the Revolutionary war. The great-great-grandfather Weller was also a soldier in the Revolution. The father of Mrs. Webster, Dan Weller Haskin, was born at Fort Ann, Washington county, N. Y., and became a farmer in Oswego county. In 1862 he removed to Columbia county, Wis., and died at Fall River, Wis., in 1871. He married Hannah Brackett, who was born in Pittsfield, Mass., a daughter of James Brackett, also a native of Massachusetts. James Brackett married Anna Flower, a member of the Flower family which claim the late Governor Flower of New York and were represented by Major Lamrock Flower and his son, Major William Flower, in the Revolutionary war. The Bracketts were represented in America and Massachusetts as early as 1634. The bearers of this name have ever distinguished themselves in peace and war, and have been particularly prominent in molding the political thought and tendency of their time. The great-grandfather, Nathan B., followed the fortunes of Washington through the Revolutionary war, and his descendants fought courageously in the war of 1812 and the Civil war. Mrs. Haskin, who died at Skaneateles, N. Y., was the mother of three children, namely: James Heman, who is the proprietor of the Revere House at Ventura; Mrs. Webster and Truman Harrison, who died in Columbus, Wis., at the age of thirty years. Mrs. Webster was educated at the public schools in New York, and when seventeen years of age began to engage in educational work, and during the twenty-three terms of her service taught in New York, Ohio, Indiana, Wisconsin, and California. She has taken a leading part in various forward movements in Ventura, and was president of the local Woman's Suffrage Society for one term. She is a member of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union and the Woman's Relief Corps. To Mr. and Mrs. Webster has been born one child, Capt. H. B. Webster who is ex-editor of the Ventura Signal, captain of the Ventura Sons of Veterans, and has one child, Morris La Fevre. He was formerly the owner of a little schooner plying between Ventura and the islands of the channel, engaged in seal fishing and freighting. The maternal heart of Mrs. Webster has extended to the needs of other children than her own son and there are several whom she has reared and trained into paths of goodness and usefulness who also call her mother.

In the spring of 1871 Mr. Webster left Ohio and came to Santa Barbara, Cal., where he became interested in contracting mason and cement work, and also engaged in farming. In 1876 he purchased a ranch on the Santa Ana and extensively engaged in ranching, grain raising and building, and in 1886 came to Ventura, which has since been his home. Among the notable constructions which are monuments of his skill as a builder and contractor may be mentioned the Avenue bridge, Padre Juan bridge, of Santa Clara county, and most of the foundations of the best residences and buildings in Ventura. The interests of Mr. Webster are by no means self centered, for his help and support may be counted on for the furthering of all wise schemes of improvement. He has been prominent in the political undertakings of his town and county, and on the Republican ticket was elected marshal of Ventura, which position he held for two years. He is one of the best-known members of the Republican Club, and was president of the same in 1896. Fraternally he is associated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the Encampment, and the Canton, and is a member of the Grand Army of the Republic, Cushing Post No. 44.

THOMAS BONES. The family represented by this citizen of Los Angeles is of English origin. He was born in county Sussex, England, November 1, 1842, and in 1848 was brought to America by his parents, Thomas and Mary (Buss) Bones, natives respectively of Sussex and Kent. The family consisted of ten children, all but one of whom attained mature years, and eight are still living, three of these being residents of California, while the others are making their homes in Wisconsin. In order of birth they are Mary, Thomas, William, Ellen, George and Edward (both of Los Angeles), Arthur and Anna. The grandfather, Arthur Bones, was a native of Sussex and for more than forty-five years served as sexton of the church at Sailhurst; he lived to be ninety-six years old. The father, on coming to America, settled in Madison county, N. Y., but in 1867 removed to Vernon county, Wis., and there died at fifty-eight years of age. Throughout all of his life he followed farm pursuits.

The boyhood years of Thomas Bones were passed principally upon a farm in New York. During the Civil war he desired to enlist in the Union army and volunteered his services, but was rejected on account of crippled wrists. When twenty years of age he started out in the world for himself, his first venture being as a farmer in the county of Madison, N. Y. In 1865 he removed to the vicinity of Hillsboro, Wis., which was then a new country, with few improvements and a sparse population. Immediately after his arrival he bought a tract of raw land, to the clearing of which he resolutely set himself. One of his first improvements was the building of a house, which, though of logs, was homelike and comfortable. Under his energetic oversight forty acres were cleared and improved. In 1872 he removed to Rochester, Minn., and three years later, on account of his wife's health, he came to California to make his home. For a year he engaged in the manufacture of lumber at Redwoods, after which he came to Los Angeles and followed carpentering for three years. His next venture was as a farmer on the Rossecrans tract, where he bought three hundred and twenty acres and has since conducted extensive farm pursuits. Besides cultivating the land that he owned, he rented lands and engaged in grain and hay growing. Under his capable management the property proved remunerative and, though now rented to other parties, is still a source of considerable revenue to him. In 1894 he came to Los Angeles and erected the residence at No. 1002 West Jefferson street where he has since resided. Politically he has voted with the Republicans in every community where he has made his home, and his support of the principles of the party is as ardent now as it was in his early manhood, but he has never identified himself with local politics nor has he ever cared to hold office. While living in Minnesota he was married near Rochester to Miss Martha C. Murdock, who was born in Rutland county, Vt., and accompanied her parents, Henry and Eunice (Hatch) Murdock, to Wisconsin in a very early day, later removing to Minnesota, where she was reared and educated. A son, Henry Harvey, has been born to the union of Mr. and Mrs. Bones. The family stands high in the various communities where they have lived, and number many intimate friends and well-wishers among their acquaintances both east and west.

JAMES D. CLAPP. Tracing the ancestry of the Clapp family, we find that they were identified with the early history of New England. Nathan, the father of J. D. Clapp, was a native of Connecticut, where he grew to manhood and married. When J. D. was a child of two years, the family settled in York, Livingston county, N. Y., and there his boyhood years were uneventfully passed. While educational advantages in those days were exceedingly meager, he was so diligent and ambitious that he acquired an excellent education, principally through attendance in the Wyoming (N. Y.) Academy, a well-known institution of that day. He was especially talented as a penman, and his fine writing always attracted attention and praise. For a time he taught penmanship in Temple Hill Academy, at Geneseo, N. Y., but later he turned his attention to the mercantile business. Ill health prevented him from joining the army and aiding the government in securing the downfall of slavery. During the war he made his home in Hazel Green, Delaware county, Iowa, but later returned to Livingston county, N. Y., and established himself upon a farm. However, not finding himself benefited by the change, he determined to come to California, where he hoped that the balmy air and sunshine would restore his health. The year 1871 found him in Riverside, where he soon regained his health to a considerable degree. Attracted by the place, he decided to cast in his fortunes with it, believing that in time the then village would become a populous city. Nor was his faith misplaced. He lived to see Riverside one of the best-known fruit sections of America, and had the satisfaction of realizing that he had been a factor in securing this desired result.

Immediately after coming to Riverside, Mr.

Clapp bought twenty acres on Brockton avenue, which he set out in oranges of various kinds, as well as other fruits. In 1883 he bought two and one-fourth acres on Ninth street and erected a residence that is now occupied by Mrs. Clapp and her daughter, Miss Helen. Here his last days were quietly and happily passed, and here his death occurred, March 23, 1896, when he was seventy-eight years of age. His various enterprises had brought him prosperity, and he was able to surround his family with all the comforts of existence. During his entire business career he never showed the recklessness of investment sometimes found among men. On the other hand, he was very conservative, arriving at decisions only after having carefully weighed every side of the question, so that when he had made up his mind regarding any venture he seldom had cause to afterward change his opinion.

MAXWELL K. BARRETTO. The city marshal and tax collector of Santa Monica is one of the early settlers of the town, having come here in the spring of 1886 a few months before its incorporation as a city. The family of which he is a member, established a home in New York in a very early day and succeeding generations have been identified with the state. His father, Francis, was born in New York City and spent his entire active life as a merchant of that metropolis, where he died at an advanced age. Maxwell K. Barretto was a native of New York City and received his education in its schools, remaining there as a business man until 1876, when he removed to California. He established himself in the then insignificant hamlet of Los Angeles, whose American population was still quite small. Looking about him for a suitable occupation and location, he saw the possibilities of ranching and became interested in lands near Downey. He made a specialty of the dairy business and owned a large number of milch cows. About 1875 his brother, F. J., had settled in Southern California and the two were associated together for three years, when they separated their interests, and the brother died about 1887.

As deputy sheriff Mr. Barretto served under W. R. Rowland and James C. Kays. On coming to Santa Monica he was made constable and in 1888 was elected to the office of marshal, which he held continuously until 1894. During that year he resigned in order to accept a position as deputy collector of customs in charge of the sub-port of Port Los Angeles. This position he filled until the fall of 1897, when a change of administration caused him to resign. In the spring of 1898 he was elected marshal and ex-officio tax collector, and two years later was re-elected to the office, which he still fills. He is a leading Democrat in Santa Monica and has been a member of the county central committee. In religion he is of the Episcopalian faith. The Knights of Pythias, Independent Order of Foresters, Foresters of America and Independent Order of Odd Fellows (in the last-named of which he is a past officer), have enrolled the name of Mr. Barretto in their membership lists. His long service as marshal proves the confidence which the people have in his integrity and faithfulness as an officer.

O. N. CADWELL. From a comparatively small beginning when he started out to make his own way in the world at the age of twenty-one, Mr. Cadwell has steadily advanced in his knowledge of agriculture and business in general, until to-day he is one of the successful ranchers of the Carpinteria valley, and enjoys the regard of all his associates. He was born in Allegany county, N. Y., in 1830, his parents being Erastus T. and Abigail (Phillips) Cadwell, natives respectively of Connecticut and New Hampshire. He was reared on his father's farm and educated in the public schools, and when nineteen years of age went to Ottawa county, Mich., where he bought a farm and cleared it from timber and brush. His efforts here were fairly successful, and he remained in Michigan until 1858, when he sold out and came to California, via Panama to San Francisco. Upon locating in Lake county he pre-empted a government right on land, and was among the first to raise any kind of crops in that part of the state.

In 1868 Mr. Cadwell removed with his family to Carpinteria, and bought thirty-three acres of timber land which he cleared at a great expense of time and labor, and to which he later added until he now owns nearly three hundred acres. The land is devoted to fruit culture in the main, although general farming is engaged in to some extent, and he raises a great many walnuts. He was among the first to set out an orchard in the Carpinteria valley, and among the first to realize the extent of the possibilities of this part of the country. That success has attended the improvement of his chances is owing to his indefatigable energy and persistent application to business. As proof of his confidence in the continued prosperity of the county, and his intention to make this his permanent abiding place, he has invested in real estate in different towns in the county, notably in Santa Barbara.

Mr. Cadwell is prominent in the general activities of the community in which he lives, and his common sense opinions and ability have made him a valuable addition in connection with several of the most important enterprises of the county. He is a member and director in the Santa Barbara County Horticultural Society, and is recognized as having at his disposal the results of a profound research along horticultural lines. He is affiliated with the Masonic order at Santa Barbara.

CHARLES GRIMES. It has been the good fortune of Mr. Grimes to succeed beyond his expectations in the California enterprises in which he has been interested, and few have more readily adapted themselves to western opportunities for advancement. Nor can it be said that his youth held more than ordinary inducements to make the most of himself, for he comes of humble parentage, and was second in a family of eight children, all of whom were obliged to shift for themselves at an early age. The family of which he is a member have for many years been connected with Montgomery county, Md., where his paternal grandfather was a farmer, living to be ninety-five years of age. His father, Charles H. Grimes, was born and died in Montgomery county, and during his years of activity was a shoemaker by trade. His mother, formerly Sarah Ann Hobbs, was born and died in Maryland, and of her eight children six are living, Charles, and the oldest son, W. T., being the only ones on the coast.

Charles Grimes was born in Montgomery county, Md., September 20, 1859, and was reared on the paternal farm. When twenty years of age, in 1879, he removed to Dallas, Tex., and for a year was employed on the construction of the Texas Pacific Railroad. He afterward went to Fort Worth, Tex., where he worked on the construction of the Missouri Pacific Railroad, and in 1881 worked on the Burlington & Missouri Railroad, from McCook, Neb., to the Hegler ranch in Colorado. Owing to the strike of 1882 he returned to Baltimore, Md., and found employment for a year as foreman for the Granite Company at Woodstock, and was then engaged on the construction of the Baltimore & Maryland Railroad out of Baltimore. In October of 1885 he came to Pasadena in the employ of his brother, who had started a cigar, pool and billiard enterprise in 1883, and continued in this capacity until resigning in February of 1891. During the same year he started an independent business along the same line on South Fair Oaks avenue, and disposed of the same to R. H. Gaylord in 1897. On a small scale Mr. Grimes then engaged in the restaurant business on South Fair Oaks avenue, and so good an investment did this prove that he has since found it necessary to several times increase the capacity of his establishment, and is now most advantageously located in a new building called the Ward block, on South Fair Oaks. To his original business he has added cigars, four pool and billiard tables, and two bowling alleys. The Grimes restaurant and amusement center is popular, and nets its proprietor a handsome yearly income.

In partnership with Mr. Sturtevant, Mr. Grimes is doing business in the tourist accommodation line, and as Sturtevant & Grimes has gained a reputation as entertainers and caterers to the pleasure seekers of this region. They are especially interested in promoting Martin's Camp and Wilson's Peak, the latter above the clouds, and replete with grand and inspiring views of the surrounding mountain ranges. The firm supply burros, tents, and all necessities for an ideal camp existence, and the grounds are well fitted with rustic seats, chairs and hammocks. Unfurnished tents may be had for $1.50 for one person, or $2.50 for two persons; and furnished tents for $5.00 a week, or $12.00 a month. At the camp stores provisions, fresh fruits, vegetables, meats and bread are furnished at reasonable rates, and a laundry is also available for guests. Sixty head of burros are owned by the firm, and plenty of games and opportunities for hunting and fishing add to the attractions of these typical southern California resorts.

In Pasadena Mr. Grimes married Florence E. Black, a native of Ohio, and of this union have been born two children, Zillah and Gladys. Mr. Grimes is popular in fraternal circles in California. Made a Mason in Pasadena in 1895, he is a member of Pasadena Lodge No. 272, F. & A. M., the chapter, and commandery, and Al Malakiah Temple, N. M. S. He is also a member of the Woodmen of the World, the Knights of the Maccabees, the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, and Uniform Rank, Knights of Pythias, in which latter he has officiated as district deputy. Mr. Grimes is a Democrat in politics, a member of the Board of Trade, and a member of the Merchants' Protective Association. He is the owner of a finely improved ranch of five acres on Allen avenue, which is under navel and late Valencia oranges. This property is fitted with a well pumped by a gasoline engine, the only well in the valley which can be pumped with a long stroke.

WILLIAM ALEXANDRE THOMPSON. Though of Irish parentage, Mr. Thompson is of Scotch descent, his paternal grandfather having been a native of Aberdeen, Scotland. His father, William, who was born near Londonderry, Ireland, settled in Ontario about 1839, bringing with him his wife, Sarah (Curtis) Thompson, and their three children. Thereafter he gave his attention to the improvement of farms, the buying and selling of lands and the raising of stock, and met with encouraging success until the age of fifty-two years, when he was accidentally killed by being thrown from his horse. His wife was born near Derry, Ireland, and now makes her home in Nebraska.

Both were reared in the Presbyterian faith and became communicants of that church. They had seven children, namely: Sarah A., of Denver, Colo.; James and Mathilda, who live in Ontario; Eliza, residing in Iowa; Margaret, of Ontario; William A., of Tropic, Los Angeles county, Cal.; and Rebecca, a resident of Litchfield, Neb.

On the home farm at Mitchell, Perch county, Ontario, William Alexandre Thompson was born August 22, 1853. When he was eleven years of age his father died, and afterward he remained with his mother until he was eighteen. The next two years were spent with an uncle, John Curtis, on a farm. About 1872 he came to the states, but fifteen months later returned to Ontario and spent a year at home. His next location was Shell Rock Falls, Iowa, where he engaged in farming for two years. During that time, at Cedar Rapids, he married Charlotte Minshull, who was born in England and died in California. Two children were born of this union, namely: Arthur Russell, a farmer and stockman in Nebraska; and Lottie May, who also lives in Nebraska.

As a railroad man Mr. Thompson gained his first experience in Canada in November, 1876. A year later he became foreman on the Grand Trunk Railroad at Flint, Mich. Two years later he was transferred to Blue Island, Ill. After six months he was promoted to be assistant roadmaster on the Chicago division, which position he held nearly two years. He then accepted a position on the Canadian Pacific, but after only a month resigned. In 1884 he became foreman for the Southern Pacific road at Tulare, Cal., from there was transferred to Bakersfield, next to Caliente and later to Fresno. In 1888 he was appointed roadmaster of the Fresno division, and in June of the following year was transferred to Yuma, Ariz. While there he married Miss Vena Louise Ewing, who was born in Flint, Mich. The only child of this union is Adeline Ewing Thompson.

The location at Yuma not being agreeable, Mr. Thompson resigned and went to Bealville, Cal., as section foreman, from which place he was transferred to Los Angeles, in December, 1893, as foreman of section 45, San Joaquin division. In this capacity he has been retained to the present time, having charge of six miles and its siding. As a railroad man he has been painstaking and energetic. In 1895 he built a residence in Tropic, where he has since made his home, and at this writing he is erecting another house here. His interest in educational matters has led him to accept an appointment as a member of the Tropic district school board, and during the six years he has held this office he has been very helpful in advancing the interests of the school. Politically he is a staunch Republican. While living in Illinois he was made a Mason in the Blue Island Lodge, and now holds membership in East Gale Lodge No. 290, in Los Angeles. Personally he is a genial and companionable man, who numbers a host of friends among the people of Southern California.

ABNER RUSH. This veteran of the Civil war, now residing in Santa Barbara, was born in Berlin township, Trumbull county, Ohio, February 1, 1832. The family is of German descent, and the paternal grandfather, John, was a native of Pennsylvania, removing to Youngstown, Ohio, where he owned and managed a farm up to the time of his death. Eli Rush, the father of Abner, was born in Westmoreland county, Pa., and was eighteen months old when his father settled in Ohio. His education was received in the Youngstown schools. In 1846 he settled in Pike county, Ill., where he farmed for two years. His next locations were, successively, Sangamon and Morgan counties, Ill., and Nebraska, in which latter state his death occurred. His wife, Jane (Parkhurst) Rush, was born in Ohio, of Scotch descent, and died in Kansas. She was the mother of two sons and four daughters, of whom one son and three daughters are living, Abner being the third in order of birth.

Until his fourteenth year Abner Rush lived in Ohio, and then accompanied the family to Illinois, via the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, settling at Perry opposite Naples. After studying in local schools, he began to teach, following that occupation for three years. Later he engaged in the mercantile business at Elkhart, Ill., and then at Springfield, same state. In Illinois, in 1856, he married Ellen Perkins, who was born in Indiana of Kentucky parentage and was a cousin of ex-Senator Saunders of Nebraska. A son of this union, John T. Rush, is living in Portland, Ore., and was for years connected with the Northern Pacific Railroad Company. Also, two daughters of this union are now living, one in Lincoln, Neb., the other in Kansas. In 1862 Mr. Rush volunteered in Company A, One Hundred and Fifteenth Illinois Infantry, at Springfield, and was made fourth sergeant. He served in Kentucky until he was taken ill with valvular heart trouble, and was obliged to remain in the hospital until his honorable discharge, in March of 1863, for the same trouble. Returning to Springfield, for a short time he engaged in the mercantile business, and afterward became interested in fire insurance, traveling in that capacity over Illinois and Missouri for about four years. Removing to Lincoln, Neb., he engaged in teaching school and later in commercial enterprise. In 1882 he removed to Santa Barbara, Cal. Between the years 1887 and 1894 he lived on a ranch in Montecito valley, afterward returning to Santa Barbara, where he now makes his home. He was the first lecturer in Santa Barbara county for the Farmers' Alliance and Industrial Union, and was one of the organizers of the Farmers' Alliance. In politics he is independent, though inclining to the principles of the People's party.

The second marriage of Mr. Rush took place in Los Angeles June 22, 1884, his wife being Mrs. Emma F. Seaverns, a native of Watertown, N. Y., and a daughter of Truman and Meriel (Graves) Murray, also natives of New York. Her paternal grandfather, Ichabod Murray, was born in Vermont, and married Lois, daughter of Lieutenant Doty, a soldier of the war of 1812. The record of the Doty family is traced back to the historic Mayflower, and its members participated in the Revolutionary war. Truman Murray was the youngest of twelve children, and became a brick and stone mason and contractor. Removing to Wisconsin in 1844, he settled in Beloit, thence went to Jefferson, and about 1857 settled in Galesburg, Ill. During the Civil war he served as drum major in an Illinois regiment, but was honorably discharged by reason of physical disability. After the war he lived for a time in Aurora, Ill., then went to Pawpaw, Mich., and in 1872 came to California. He died in Santa Barbara in 1879, at the age of seventy-four years. Fraternally he was a member of the Masonic order. His wives were all natives of New York. Of the first union two children were born, one now living. A half brother, William T. Murray, served in the Civil war and is now living in Peoria, Ill. Mrs. Rush was born in 1842 and was six days old when her mother died. She was reared in Wisconsin and Illinois and received her education in Lombard University. In May of 1872 she came to Santa Barbara and in the fall of the same year was married to Henry H. Seaverns, of Dorchester, Mass., who came in 1848 to California via Cape Horn. During the days of gold he mined in the northern part of the state, but finally bought a ranch in Montecito, where he died in 1876. Of this union there was one child, Alice, who is now Mrs. H. C. Jenkins, of Carpinteria. To Mr. and Mrs. Rush have been born two children, Pearl and Amy Ruby.

H. L. COFFMAN, M. D. A thorough medical course, embracing the study of the profession in all of its branches, has qualified Dr. Coffman for successful practice in Santa Monica, his chosen field of labor. In deciding to make this profession his life work, it was his ambition to equip himself thoroughly, and he entered upon his studies with all the ardor and determination of youth. During 1896 he was a student in the University of Southern California, but the following year transferred his attention from its literary course to its medical department. In 1898 he matriculated in the Medico-Chirurgical College of Philadelphia, from which he was graduated in 1901. Meantime he had secured considerable professional experience in local hospitals and now has a diploma from the Philadelphia Lying-in Charity. Immediately after graduating he came to Santa Monica to enter upon active practice, and in addition to this he has also become interested in horticulture. As president of the company that owns Rancho Del Mar, he has been engaged in improving the land and has set out eighty acres in soft-shell walnuts. The ranch lies three miles from town and will undoubtedly in time become one of the valuable properties of the coast region.

Four generations of the Coffman family were born in Virginia, whither the original ancestors came from Holland. Various members took part in the colonial and Revolutionary wars, and patriotism has always been a family characteristic. Charles A. Coffman, the Doctor's father, was born in Botetourt county, Va., October 25, 1833, a son of Samuel Coffman, who was a planter near Lynchburg. When fifteen years old he went to Illinois and was employed as a guard in the state penitentiary at Alton. In 1851 he started across the plains with wagons and ox-teams, and after a perilous journey of six months landed in Marysville, where he mined. Returning to Virginia in 1859, he married Mary Elizabeth Hampton, who was born in Bedford county, that state, August 30, 1839, and died in Los Angeles in 1870. They became the parents of four children, namely: Frank A., born November 24, 1861, now a horticulturist of Rivera; Mattie, Mrs. H. S. White, of Rivera; Edgar C., born September 20, 1864, now a large walnut-raiser of Rivera; and Harry L., who was born in Sacramento, Cal., October 1, 1866, and is now a physician of Santa Monica.

Accompanied by his wife and one brother, in 1860 Charles A. Coffman returned to California with a train of emigrants. On his arrival in Marysville he resumed mining and freighting, doing much hauling from Sacramento and Marysville to Carson City and the Comstock mines in Nevada and also into Idaho. In 1868 he sold out his freighting business and in the fall of 1869 came to Los Angeles. From 1877 he lived on a tract of land at Ranchito until his death, October 11, 1898. The two hundred and fifty acres that he improved were largely devoted to walnut-raising, and he was one of the very first men in Southern California who took up the growing of soft-shell walnuts as a probable remunerative industry. Almost one hundred acres were in this product, in the raising of which he was remarkably successful. He assisted in organizing the Walnut Growers' Association of Southern California and afterwards served as a director until his death. Politically he always voted with the Democratic party, and in fraternal relations he was connected with the Odd Fellows. To those pioneers of Los Angeles county who survive his name brings up feelings of deepest regard for his many manly qualities and regret that he has gone from among his former associates.

As success rewarded the efforts of C. A. Coffman it became possible for him to surround his family with every comfort and give to his children the educational advantages of which he had been deprived. His older sons adopted the occupation in which their father had met with such unusual success; but the youngest son early showed professional aspirations and was therefore given a liberal education, graduating from the Los Angeles high school in 1884. For some years afterward he devoted his attention to the improvement of a twenty-acre ranch of walnuts, but he never lost sight of his cherished desire to become a physician, and finally entered the profession. He is a member of various professional societies, and is also connected with the Southern California Orange Growers' Association. For many years, under Mr. Scott, he served as horticultural inspector. His political views bring him into sympathy with the Republican party, and in fraternal connections he is a member of the Independent Order of Foresters. His marriage, in Santa Monica, united him with Nellie, daughter of James M. Orr, of this city. They have one son, Earl. The family attend the Presbyterian Church, of which Mrs. Coffman is a member.

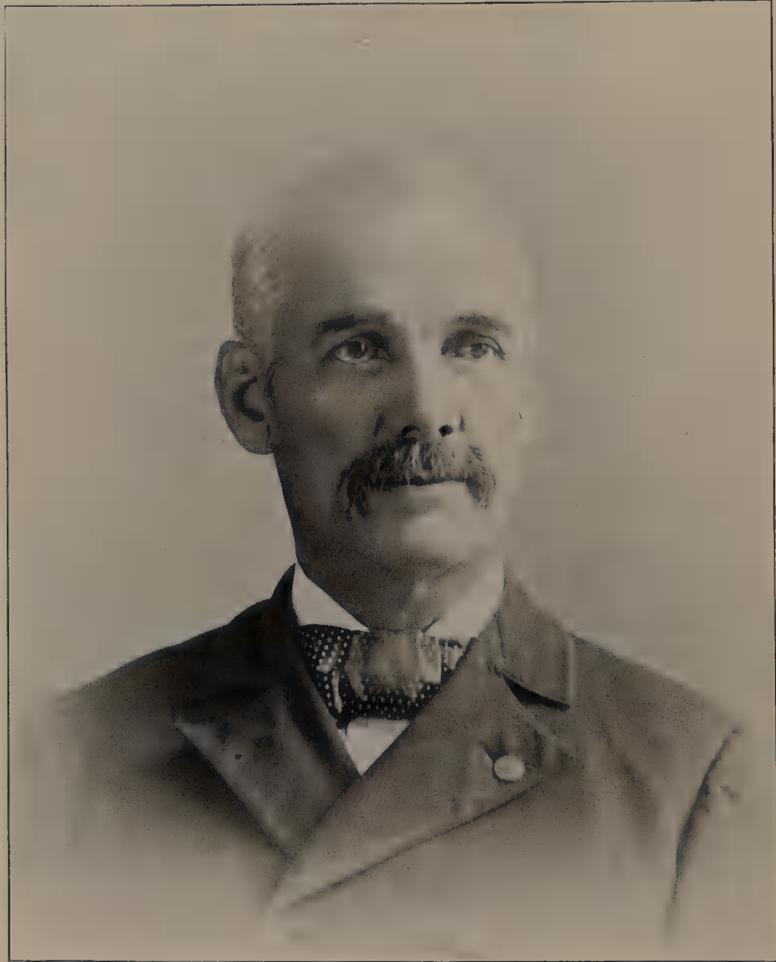

NEAL CALLAHAN. This successful and popular hotel man of Santa Barbara was born in Buffalo, N. Y., November 25, 1869, a son of Timothy Callahan, for many years a grain merchant of Buffalo, and later one of the clerks in the surrogate office. His mother, Mary (Hughes) Callahan, was born in Ireland, and was the mother of thirteen children, eight of whom attained maturity, and five are now living. Until his twelfth year Mr. Callahan lived in Buffalo, N. Y., and then removed to Cleveland where for five years he engaged in tile setting. He then became clerk for Mr. Brennan, of the Empire Hotel, and later filled a similar position at the Oxford. Following still further the fortunes of Mr. Brennan, he came to California in 1889 as clerk of the Hoffman House in Los Angeles, returning again with his employer to Cleveland, where he remained until locating in Santa Barbara in 1894, as manager of the New Morris House. In 1899 himself and sister, Mrs. Brennan, sold the New Morris House, after which Mr. Callahan went to San Francisco and for a short time there engaged in the hotel business. Upon returning to Santa Barbara he ran the Langham for seven months, and then took up the management of the Mascarel and New Morris in partnership with his sister, Mrs. Brennan. In the combined hotels there are one hundred and twenty-five rooms, the rates at the Mascarel being from $2.00 to $2.50 per day, and at the New Morris, $1.50 to $2.00 per day. Both hotels are conducted on first-class principles, and one may be comfortably housed and well fed in the midst of the most agreeable surroundings.

In Cleveland, Ohio, Mr. Callahan married Jennie Hawks, who was born in Ravenna, Ohio. Mr. Callahan is a Democrat in politics, and is a member of the Chamber of Commerce. Fraternaly he is connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the Independent Order of Foresters, and is one of the charter members of the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, of which he was one of the organizers and is the present treasurer. Mr. Callahan has a bright future before him in the hotel business, and he is a worthy successor of that other hotel man, John Brennan, who is so well remembered by his hosts of friends, and under whose wise and conservative instruction he received his first lessons in the art of successfully entertaining the migrating public.

ISAAC M. CLARK. Though principally known as one of the most scientific and successful farmers in the Lompoc region, Mr. Clark has several just claims for distinction, not the least of which is a mechanical ability practically demonstrated by several useful inventions. Among these is a spray for destroying insect pests on fruit trees, known as the I. M. Clark coal oil and lye wash spraying process, which also stimulates the growth of the tree, and has been offered by him to the United States Government department of agriculture. It was patented in 1901. Another invention is a device to prevent a baby chair from tipping over. This ability is undoubtedly inherited from his father, Abraham Clark, who was born in New York state, and during early life was a practical mechanic, in later life turning his attention to farming. He first came to California in 1852, and in 1856 removed his family to Alameda county, where his death occurred in 1876, at the age of seventy-four years. He married in his young manhood Leah Spear, a lineal descendant of the original owner of Trinity church, New York City.

The seventh in a family of ten children, nine of whom are still living in California, I. M. Clark was born in Monroe county, Mich., January 16, 1845. His impression of the place of his birth is rather vague, for he was but ten years of age when the father, mother and eight children made the trip to California. He therefore owes his education to western schools, and that substantial agricultural training so usefully and successfully applied in his mature years. His earliest laudable ambition was to possess a farm of his own, and to become through the exercise of his own energies one of those capable and practical tillers of the soil, upon the efforts of whom depends the prosperity or depression of the whole country. The first decided change that entered his life was in March of 1865, when he enlisted at San José in Company E, First California Volunteer Cavalry, under Captain McElroy, having previously spent three years as a member of the Home Guard. The regiment was sent to Arizona and the chief duty of Mr. Clark was as escort with the paymaster, in which capacity he rode in all three thousand miles. When the year was up he was honorably discharged at Drum Barracks, Los Angeles, in 1866.

After the war Mr. Clark traveled over the state in search of a desirable permanent location, and in 1868 settled in the Pajaro valley with his brother, W. G., near Watsonville. Later they purchased a stock farm of nine hundred acres in San Benito county, and became extensively engaged in the raising of hogs and horses, the partnership amicably continuing until 1878, when Mr. Clark became the agent for Major J. L. Rathbone. His duties and responsibilities were varied, and extended to the management of the major's large ranches, and to the sale of his lands. In 1885 Mr. Clark gave up this line of work and decided to go into an independent business, removing the same year to Lompoc, where he purchased eighty acres of land to which was soon added ten more acres, the whole lying at a corner of the town. This property has been so well developed that it has few superiors in the neighborhood, and has netted its owner more than fair returns for labor and capital invested. A comfortable and pleasant residence adorns the ranch, and modern and convenient barns and outbuildings have from time to time been erected. The best procurable implements make light work of the raising of crops, beans being a staple article, but a specialty is also made of all kinds of fruit, particularly apples.

The subject of mining has of late years been prominently connected with Mr. Clark's money making ventures, and it is safe to predict that he will in the future have the same good luck which has attended him in the past. He has interests in the Kramer mining district in San Bernardino county, the results of which are already gratifying. The mines are located nine miles south of Kramer, and there are to be found gold, iron, silver, and lead. He also owns another quarter section in the district where oil wells are being developed. For his interests in Kramer Mr. Clark is indebted to the suggestions made him by his wife's brother, D. T. Duncan, who is the efficient and successful manager of the Kramer mining property.

In 1879 Mr. Clark married Juliet C., daughter of Mrs. A. E. Duncan, a native of Missouri, and who came to California when one year old. Mr. and Mrs. Clark have adopted Vida Fern, who is four and a half years old. A Republican for many years, Mr. Clark espoused the cause of the Democratic party in 1896, since which time his votes have been in sympathy with the latter party. He is affiliated with the Presbyterian Church, and is a member of the Grand Army of the Republic.

CAPT. ALEXANDER C. DRAKE. There is no portion of the life of Captain Drake concerning which he has greater reason to be proud than the period of his service in the Civil war, when, as captain of Company I, Eighth Maine Infantry, he led his men in more than one decisive engagement. He was born at Plymouth, Penobscot county, Me., February 27, 1840, his parents being Richard and Lucinda (Cooper) Drake, natives respectively of Unity and Plymouth, Me. His maternal grandfather, Alexander Cooper, was a farmer by occupation and of English descent. The paternal grandfather, Richard Drake, Sr., was born in Bridgewater, Mass., of English ancestry, and was a soldier in the war of 1812. Removing to Maine, he settled at Unity, Waldo county, where he engaged in farming and the manufacture of brick. Through much of his active life Richard, Jr., was a farmer at Detroit, Somerset county, Me., and there his death occurred; his widow still makes that place her home. Of their ten children Alexander Cooper Drake was second in order of birth. The others now living are as follows: Mrs. Clarissa Harding of Detroit, Me.; Herbert L., a tanner of Mellen, Wis.; Mrs. Emma Rich, of Auburn, Me.; Richard, and Mrs. Vina Cook, both of Detroit, Me. There were three sons in the Civil war: Alexander C.; Alvin, of the First Maine Cavalry, who died of yellow fever in Florida after the close of the Rebellion; and William Hannibal, who served in the United States navy until his death, which occurred during the war at Brazier City, La.

Leaving the home farm at seventeen years of age, Alexander C. Drake began to learn the tanner's trade in Detroit, Me. When the first call came for volunteers, April 25, 1861, he was the first man to volunteer from his home town, enlisting as a private. When his company was ready to go, the illness of many of its members caused another company to be sent first, and so several months passed before he had any experience of war. September 7, 1861, he was mustered in at Augusta, becoming a private in Company D, Eighth Maine Infantry, and serving four years in that regiment. Sent south, the men were placed in defense of Washington, and thence were sent on an expedition to Hilton-head, S. C., assisting in its capture. For two years they were stationed at different points in South Carolina, after which Mr. Drake returned to Maine on a furlough. In the spring of 1864 he joined the army of the James, and took part in the battle of Drury's Bluff, Cold Harbor and the siege and capture of Petersburg, also witnessed the surrender of General Lee at Appomattox Court House. His first promotion came to him May 12, 1864, when he was commissioned second lieutenant of Company D at Bermuda Hundred. During the same year, on the 21st of November, he was raised to first lieutenant of the same company, and January 23, 1865, received a commission as captain of Company I, Eighth Maine Infantry, in which capacity he continued until he resigned July 6, 1865, at the close of the war. His predecessor as captain of Company I was Capt. William M. McArthur (a relative of Gen. Arthur McArthur), who was promoted to the rank of a colonel of the regiment, and at the close of the war was brevetted brigadier-general. While at Bermuda Hundred, Captain Drake was twice injured in the battle, May 20, 1864, but the force of the ball was lessened by reason of it striking the gun first.

On taking up the pursuits of peace when the war ended, Captain Drake became a grocer in Bangor, Me., but soon returned to Detroit, that state, where he carried on a grocery and also acted as postmaster. On selling out, he removed to Bangor, but later became interested in a milling business in Detroit and manufactured lumber extensively. His next occupation was that of contracting and building at Bangor, and from there he went to Boston to take up similar work. In 1886 he came to California, and for fourteen years engaged in the building business in Pasadena, meantime building and selling perhaps twelve houses. Since 1900 he has been retired from business activities. For some four years he was county deputy assessor, and he has also been city deputy assessor for some time. He was married in Bangor, Me., in 1865, his wife being Miss Georgiana S. Andrews, who was born at Corinna, Penobscot county, Me.

The political views of Captain Drake bring him into active sympathy with the Republican party. In religion he is a Universalist and a deacon in his church. While in Maine he was made a Mason at Newport and now holds membership with Pasadena Lodge No. 272, F. & A. M., also is connected with the Royal Arch Chapter and Eastern Star at this point. In the latter organization his wife is an interested worker, and in addition is connected with the Women's Relief Corps. The days of his war service are kept in memory through his active participation in the affairs of John F. Godfrey Post No. 93, G. A. R., of which he has officiated as commander, and he has also been honored by the position of aide-de-camp on the staff of the national commander, General Lawler.

H. R. MULLER. The spirit of enterprise which has dictated the career of Mr. Muller, and his ability to apply himself to the work at hand, have resulted in a large measure of success, and gratifying returns for labor and money invested. He was born in Prussia, Germany, June 24, 1824, and was reared and educated and engaged in business for several years in his native land. In 1850 he immigrated to the United States, and two years later came to California and located at Hangtown (now Placerville), where he became interested in placer mining. After a few years he lived for a time at Volcano, Amador county, and in 1853 established a tanyard between Volcano and Jackson, which establishment is entitled to the credit of having tanned the first sole leather in California by the old hemlock bark process. For four years the tannery did a large and successful business, after which it was sold to other parties. Mr. Muller then went into the wholesale liquor business in partnership with John Tripp and later started a wholesale brewery enterprise, which continued until 1860. During that year he went to Virginia City, Nev., when that place was just started. There he rented an old established brewery and made beer for two years, after which he sold out and bought the William Tell House, and much other town and country property. The hotel was fitted up and rented, and in 1865 the owner thereof started with three heavy wagon loads of liquor for Salt Lake City, but, upon being refused the right to sell, he went to Montana and speculated for a while, and finally returned to Virginia City, Nev.

The partnership of Muller & Tripp lasted until 1862. Mr. Muller engaged in mining for many years and in 1869 located a gold and silver mine in Pioche, Nev., and subsequently sold the mine for $30,000. After spending a year in San Francisco, he came to Santa Barbara in 1875, and bought property upon which he erected a brewery. For over twenty years he manufactured steam beer, and he now owns the building and much other property as well, including a ranch at Eagle Canon. In 1898 he came to Summerland and leased land on royalty, upon which he sunk seven wells averaging two hundred feet deep, and which realized about fifteen barrels a day. As the possibilities unfold and the prospects brighten, Mr. Muller is convinced that this is indeed the opportunity of a lifetime, and one of those ever appearing chances to profit by the wonderful workings of unfolding mother nature.

In politics Mr. Muller is a Democrat, and takes an active interest in local undertakings. He is one of those reliable and capable German-Americans who benefit the communities in which they live, and are foremost in all that makes for the advancement of their neighborhood. A great and intelligent reader, he keeps posted on all current literatures and happenings the world over, and is a delightful and instructive companion. He was married at Virginia City in 1867 to Nina Bernard who is now deceased.

JUSTIN PETIT. While very few French people are to be found in California, those residing in the state are in every way upholding the dignity of their native land and reflecting credit upon its citizenship. Mr. Petit was born in the department of Fresne, St. Mame's (Haute-Saône), France, November 18, 1851, and in childhood was brought to this country by his parents, John B. and Elizabeth Petit, settling upon a farm in Clearfield county, Pa. At the close of the Civil war the family came west as far as Kansas, settling on a farm in Douglas county, where the mother died at the age of sixty-one years. Surviving her for a long period, the father came to California and in 1894 died at the home of his son, Justin, when about eighty-five years of age. In the family there were eight children, four of whom are living, namely: Mrs. Henrietta Roussey, of Santa Paula; Mrs. Annette Laurent, of Oxnard; Frank and Justin who are farmers of Ventura county.

The larger part of his schooling Justin Petit received in Kansas. After leaving school he began to farm and this occupation he continued in Kansas for some time. Returning in 1876 to Clearfield county, Pa., he worked in the timber and saw mills for four years, his brother, Frank, operating a saw mill there. November 21, 1878, is a well-remembered date in his life, for on that day he arrived in California. Starting out as a farmer, he rented a portion of the Colonial ranch. As his means increased he acquired land by purchase. His first purchase consisted of one hundred and sixty acres which he bought from Hon. Thomas R. Bard. At this writing he owns a homestead of two hundred acres near Oxnard, Ventura county; also one hundred and sixty acres six miles southeast of his home; and one-third interest in eight hundred and seventy acres on the Semi grant. The improvements of his home ranch were made by him personally, and it is due to his persevering industry that the property is to-day counted one of the most valuable ranches in the village. Among his specialties are lima beans, sugar beets, grain and deciduous fruits. He has a lemon orchard that bears every year, although the land is not under irrigation. The home ranch is valued at $300 an acre, and a farm in his wife's possession near Oxnard is valued at the same price. In 1896 the family residence was erected, and it stands to-day as one of the finest farm homes in Ventura county, where it was also the first farm residence lighted by electricity.

The marriage of Mr. Petit occurred in Ventura county in 1884 and united him with Miss Frances Kaufman, who was born in Minnesota and came across the plains with her parents in childhood. They have a family of seven children, namely: Mary E., Alfred J., and Anna C. (twins), Edward William, Joseph B., Ida and Jessie. While in sympathy with many of the Democratic principles, Mr. Petit is independent both in national and local politics, and in casting his vote is not influenced by party bias. In many respects his success has been remarkable. When he came to Ventura county he had no means and was obliged to rent land at first. From that somewhat discouraging beginning he has worked his way forward to a position among the most successful farmers of the county.

BENJAMIN F. PETTIS, now the postmaster and a general merchant of Goleta, has led an eventful life and overcome obstacles that would have discouraged a less courageous and persistent man. He was born in Madison county, N. Y., November 22, 1833, and lived in his native county until thirteen years of age. His education was limited in the extreme, for the choice was left to himself of work or school, and in his immaturity he chose the former as the possible lesser of two evils. At the early age of nine therefore, he entered a woolen factory, and there worked until thirteen years old, and when fifteen he was apprenticed to a blacksmith and followed the trade as long as he remained in New York. In 1855 he removed to Michigan and received the contract to get out lumber for a large planing mill which he eventually helped to erect in Chicago, and from then on his course was westward by different stages as opportunity permitted. From Fort Leavenworth he came over the government trail to Salt Lake City, and then to Carson City, driving six yoke of government oxen, at the time that Johnson was sent by the governor to regulate the Mormon troubles. For a time he did the blacksmithing and shoeing for Major Chorpeneing who had the government contract to carry mail from Sacramento to Salt Lake City, and finally arrived in Carson City two years after leaving Leavenworth.

At Carson City Mr. Pettis suffered some of the inconveniences attached to being financially broke, but finally things looked up when he secured a job at prospecting for a certain judge, and was promised $75 per month. The jurist, however, before the first month had expired, disappeared entirely from the scene. Nothing daunted, the would-be prospector secured a position with the management of a pack train over the mountains between Carson City and Placerville for a year, and in 1863 had gotten so far ahead in worldly goods that he was in a position to purchase a half interest in a blacksmith shop with a Mr. Mead. After two years he went to Alpine county, Cal., where he remained until 1872, and during that time improved the opportunities for prospecting and made considerable money, but made the mistake of putting it all back into the same line. He finally left this unsatisfactory method of making and losing money and came to Goleta with the six or seven thousand dollars saved from the experiment. There was at the time a small shop here, and this Mr. Pettis purchased, and until 1896 did a large business in the blacksmithing line. The shop was then turned over to his son, who has since continued to run it.

About nine years ago Mr. Pettis was appointed postmaster of Goleta, and built a store which he rented for four years, or until he gave up blacksmithing. He then took charge of his store, and has since continued in this capacity. He owns considerable town property, and has built a fine home with all modern conveniences, including a water plant. He is prominent in all affairs of the town, and possesses the true western spirit of progress. Politically he entertains broad views, has nearly always been associated with the Republican party, but of late years has regulated his vote according to the qualifications of the parties seeking office, rather than to any party preferences. For two years he served as justice of the peace, to which he was elected on the Republican ticket. He is affiliated with the Odd Fellows, and is a charter member of the Webster Lodge, at Markleeville, Alpine county, and was for eight years secretary and treasurer of the same.

In 1870 Mr. Pettis married Mary J. Brockman, daughter of Israel and Elizabeth (Carieger) Brockman, and a sister of Nick Carieger, a very wealthy Californian. Of this union there are the following children living: Frank B., who learned the blacksmith's trade of his father and succeeded him in business in Goleta; Maud, at home; Ralph, who is a resident of Prescott, Ariz.; Ethel and Alma, both at home. The children have been given every possible educational advantage, and the oldest daughter spent four years in the State Normal School. Mrs. Pettis died in January of 1894.

JUAN SAVE. The Oak Park dairy near Santa Barbara is one of the model establishments of its kind, and has reached its present condition of remuneration through the enterprise and thrift of its owner and manager, Juan Save. A native of the vicinity of Toulouse, Haute Gerome, France, he was born March 19, 1843, a son of Pedro and Katie (Chanfraou) Save, natives of the locality, the father born in 1816. The parents spent their entire lives in France, industriously working their farm, and conscientiously rearing their family of four children, two of whom have immigrated to America.

Juan Save was reared on his father's farm and was educated in the free schools of his native land. The first important event in his life was his immigration to America in 1861, his departure being taken from Havre in the Saxonia, which landed in New York. He immediately re-embarked on the steamer Aspinwall for the Isthmus of Panama, after which he came by steamer to San Francisco, and engaged as assistant in a dairy. In 1867 he located in Santa Barbara and was interested in teaming and running a dairy until 1885, and then turned his attention exclusively to the latter occupation, in which he has since been so successful. Interesting to note is the fact that his original dairy aspirations were strengthened and put into execution by the possession of but one cow, and that the milk was distributed to customers by being carried around on horseback. Gradually he increased his herd, and in time purchased a delivery wagon, and now has about forty cows and a large trade in Santa Barbara. For pasture he rents over a hundred acres of land and keeps there his growing stock, and besides he owns a quarter section of land near La Cruces, forty-three miles from Santa Barbara.

Mrs. Save was formerly Francisco Botiller, a native of Santa Barbara, and a member of an old Southern California family of French descent. Eleven children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Save, viz.: Katie, who is now Mrs. Moullet, of Santa Barbara; Francisco, who is the wife of Mr. Manent, of Santa Maria; Peter, who is a resident of Stockton, Cal.; John, Jr., who is assisting his father with the dairy; Pasqual, who is living in the Eagle Canon; Louis, who is a resident of Los Angeles; Teleciana, George, Viatrix, Celia and Lorenzo. The five last-named children are living at home. Mr. Save is a Republican in national politics, and is fraternally associated with the Ancient Order of United Workmen.

W. J. SHERRIFF. Typical of the opportunities offered by California to men of intelligence and ambition is the success achieved by Mr. Sherriff, who has taken an active part in the improvement of Los Angeles, his present home, and has also contributed materially to the development of the resources of Ventura county, where he is a large property owner. He came to this state in 1887 from Pittsburg, Pa., where he was born in 1841 and with whose business interests he was associated. While still a mere boy he turned his attention to mechanical pursuits, being of that turn of mind, and thus he early gained practical knowledge along a valuable line.

The first event of great importance in the life of Mr. Sherriff was occasioned by the outbreak of the Civil war. Being of a patriotic spirit and just the age to render his country effective service in the army, he offered himself to the Union cause. In 1862 his name was enrolled in Company I, One Hundred and Forty-second Pennsylvania Infantry, with which he went to the front and bore a share in the army's activities. At the battle of Gettysburg he was seriously wounded, and was thus prevented from seeing any more active service, but forced to remain in the hospital until the war ended. On being honorably discharged he returned to Pittsburg and became interested in business pursuits. In time he was chosen president of the J. B. Sherriff Manufacturing Company of Pittsburg, manufacturers of brass and iron products, their specialties being engines, boilers and steam supplies. While having his business headquarters in Pittsburg he made Allegheny City his home.

REV. AND MRS. JOHN H. STUNTZ

After coming to California Mr. Sherriff resided in Los Angeles for two years. For some years afterward he alternated between Pittsburg and California, retaining the position of president of the J. B. Sherriff Manufacturing Company until 1896, when he sold his interest in the business. Meantime he had become a ranch owner in the west, having in 1891 established himself on a ranch near Santa Paula, Ventura county, comprising one hundred and twenty acres. Lemons, apricots and other fruits are the principal products of the land. In addition, he owns three hundred acres on the south side of the river, suitable for stock-grazing. He is a stockholder and the auditor of the Santa Paula Co-operative Company, and owns property in that town. The improvement of his ranch represents years of assiduous labor, but its present appearance repays in ample measure the toil expended upon it. The orchard of fifty acres is one of its most attractive features, and there are also excellent buildings and other improvements. In September of 1901 he removed to Los Angeles, where he has improved Sherriff's Place on Washington, between Toberman and Union streets. At this location he owns one and one-half acres and is now erecting fourteen residences, his own home being at No. 1032 West Washington street.

For years Mr. Sherriff has been a leading worker in the Christian Church. When he lived in Ventura county he was one of the largest contributors to the building of the church at Santa Paula. For two years he was a director of the Santa Paula Young Men's Club, in the organization of which he assisted. All temperance work receives his hearty support, and he has been especially active in the Anti-Saloon League, being president of the society in the First Christian Church. Politically he is independent, voting for the men rather than the party. His army service was later held in memory through his active participation in the work of the Union Veteran Legion, Camp No. 1, of Pittsburg. In 1865 he married Charlotte Seiferheld, by whom he had two children, Charlotte Sarah, deceased, and William S., and they also have an adopted daughter, Florence I. In the work of the Christian Church Mrs. Sherriff is, like him, very active and deeply interested, and since she identified herself with that people in 1855 she has been a constant worker in their behalf. Not only religious measures, but all matters for the general good of the community in which they live, receive the support of Mr. and Mrs. Sherriff, and they have unselfishly contributed to worthy movements of the wealth they have accumulated, no helpful beneficence being denied their support.

REV. JOHN H. STUNTZ. During the Revolutionary war, among the Hessian soldiers hired by King George was Conrad Stuntz, who came to America to fight the patriots. No sooner, however, had he landed in this country and studied the merits of the case than his sympathies were warmly enlisted on the side of the feeble colonies fighting for independence. He was among the first to desert the British army and offer his services to the Americans. Washington, finding that he was trained in military tactics, detailed him to train the raw recruits, and during all of the war he gave his time to this duty, receiving no pay whatever for his services. General Washington, believing that such disinterested labors were worthy of reward, presented his case to congress, which granted him eight hundred acres of land in West Virginia. His sweetheart from Hesse crossed the ocean to join him, and on their marriage they settled at this farm. Their son, George, was born on the 4th of July, 1789, the date of the adoption of the American constitution. Inheriting a love of country and a patriotic spirit, it was natural that he should enlist in the war of 1812 and uphold the dignity of American arms in that conflict. He settled on an unimproved farm in Erie county, Pa., where he remained until death. He was one of the founders of Alleghany College at Meadville and was keenly alive to the importance of excellent educational advantages. For more than fifty years he preached in the Methodist Episcopal Church, having been ordained as a local minister.

Next in line of descent was Erastus R. Stuntz, who was born in Pennsylvania and there died in 1842, having spent all his life in that state with the exception of a short time with an uncle, John Stuntz, in St. Clair county, Ill. While living there he was bereaved by the death of his wife, Mary (Walrath) Stuntz, who left three children, the youngest of whom, John H., was only fourteen months old. The daughter, Catherine M., is now the wife of L. D. Benton, of North Pasadena. The older son, George Erastus, was a soldier in the Fourteenth Wisconsin Infantry and was severely wounded at Shiloh. As sergeant he entered the First Minnesota Cavalry for the Sioux war, remaining in the army until the Indians were subdued. For many years he was a government surveyor and civil engineer, making his headquarters in Duluth, where he died.

While his parents were living at Lebanon, St. Clair county, Ill., John H. Stuntz was born in 1838. Early orphaned, he was reared in different homes, but principally near Albion, Erie county, Pa. Never having known a home of his own, he was influenced to marry while still a mere youth of nineteen years and six months. His marriage occurred in Cattaraugus county, N. Y., February 17, 1858, and united him with Miss Laura Emeline Rhoades, who was born in Erie county, Pa., a daughter of Justus and Emily (Parlin) Rhoades. The Rhoades family was among the early English settlers of Connecticut, and there Justus Rhoades was born and reared: His father moved from that state to Madison county, N. Y., where he entered three hundred acres of land, and he himself settled in Genesee county, where eight of his children were born. From there he took his family to Erie county, Pa., where the two youngest children were born, and there both he and his wife died. All but one of their ten children attained maturity, Mrs. Stuntz being the youngest of all. Her brother, Albert, was a soldier in a Pennsylvania regiment during the Civil war; another brother, Rev. Harlin C. Rhoades, was a pioneer Methodist minister of the Pacific coast and now resides in Los Angeles.

When seventeen years of age John H. Stuntz began to teach school, receiving $17 a month and "boarding round." After two years of teaching he attended Richmond College in Jefferson county, Ohio, for one winter, and after his marriage resumed teaching, receiving $24 a month. During 1860 he attended Alleghany College, staying there until his funds were exhausted, when he began to work in the oil regions. Returning to college in 1861, he enlisted from there with many other college boys in the Alleghany College Volunteers, and July 21, 1861, was mustered in at Harrisburg for three years, as a member of Company I, Tenth Pennsylvania Reserve Corps. Though the fife was an instrument as yet beyond his control, his captain said, "John, you must be the fifer," and he consented to fill the place. Among the battles in which he was present may be mentioned the following: Drainesville, December 20, 1861; seven days' battle in front of Richmond, including Mechanicsville, Gaines Mill, Charles City Cross Roads and Malvern Hill; South Mountain, Md.; Antietam, the bloodiest single day's battle of the whole war; second battle of Bull Run; Bristow Station; Fredericksburg and Gettysburg. While carrying a wounded man from the battlefield at Gettysburg, following the same line of work in which he had engaged all during the long night in his endeavor to relieve the sufferings of the wounded and meantime crossing again and again the line of danger, he slipped on a cobble stone and fell. The man, who weighed about one hundred and seventy-five pounds, was on his back and fell on him, injuring him for life. One of the vertebra of the spine was broken, leaving a splinter next the spinal cord and so seriously injuring him that he has never been free from pain since. For some time he was obliged to remain in the hospital, and as soon as able to go around, he assisted in hospital duty and detail work. At the close of his three years' term two regiments of veteran volunteers were formed from the Pennsylvania Reserves, Comrade Stuntz re-enlisting in Company K, One Hundred and Ninety-first Pennsylvania Veterans, in which he remained until the close of the war, when he was mustered out at Washington, D. C., in June, 1865.

At the time of enlisting Mr. Stuntz had commenced to study for the ministry, but the four years he anticipated devoting to this study were given to his country. In the fall of 1865 he went to Minnesota and the following year became a frontier preacher in the Methodist Episcopal denomination, meantime studying the regular theological course, at the close of which he was ordained. The constant pain resulting from his war injury, together with the arduous labors of a circuit rider, affected his health to such an extent that he was obliged to seek another climate and occupation. Coming to California in 1876, he settled on a twenty-acre ranch four miles east of Anaheim, and engaged in the raisin business. After four years he removed to Alhambra, where he spent eleven years on a small ranch. Since then he has made his home in Pasadena, where he occupies a residence on Kirkwood avenue, near Cedar street. Being totally disabled, he does not engage in work of any kind. Fortunately he possesses a very sunny and cheerful disposition, with a faculty of looking on the bright side of life, and so, in spite of his continued illness, he has derived more pleasure from existence than many of rugged health, but pessimistic temperament. Though not permitted to carry out his original plan of becoming a life worker in the ministry, yet his cheerful acceptance of his lot and his brave endurance of suffering have preached many a sermon more eloquent than words. His interest in the Methodist Episcopal Church has never waned, nor has he lost a spirit of comradeship for all who once wore the blue. He is connected with the J. F. Godfrey Post No. 93, G. A. R., is a staunch believer in prohibition and for twenty years has been an honorary member of the Women's Christian Temperance Union. Of the latter organization his wife was formerly president and is now vice-president-at-large and superintendent of three departments. She is an active worker in the Ladies' Aid Society and other organizations of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He is a member of the National Association of Civil War Musicians. In the encampment of California and Nevada Mr. Stuntz represented his post and he was also elected in 1902 to represent the department of California in the national encampment at Washington, D. C. From her early childhood Mrs. Stuntz has evinced the gift of a musician and composer, and, while she is not situated so that it can be developed, yet she has accomplished much in spite of obstacles. In the midst of daily household cares many of her musical compositions have come from a surcharged heart and brain, and they are then hastily transcribed, to be laid aside perhaps for months. When brought to sight a theme is suggested, and line by line the words are framed to suit the melody, after which the harmony is composed on the organ. Among her compositions are the "Mother's Lullaby," and a hymn to the same melody, entitled "Come to Me, Jesus," "Christmas Song," "Santa's Good Will Visit," and the "Home Where I Was Born."

S. L. SHAW. While Mr. Shaw's claims for recognition in the business world are based largely upon his superiority as an architect, builder and contractor, he is none the less appreciated as one of the most enterprising and resourceful of the citizens who have helped to build up the moral, intellectual, and general municipal well being. As a builder and contractor he has erected many of the most important buildings in the town of Ventura, which has been his home since 1868. His skill in his chosen life work has been fostered ever since he was old enough to handle tools, under his father's experienced instruction. The elder Shaw, Jesse A., was born in Massachusetts, and in his young manhood settled in Vermont, where for years he was a contractor and builder. He eventually removed to Dartford, Green Lake county, Wis., and there conducted his trade until 1867, when he took up his residence in Monterey, Cal., where he continued to build and contract in partnership with his son, S. L., until his death in 1900, at the age of seventy-three. His career was embellished by patriotic services during the Civil war in a brigade band. He married Eliza Locke, also a native of Vermont, and a daughter of Ira Locke, who died in Wisconsin, and who married Miss Putnam, a direct descendant of Gen. Israel Putnam. Mrs. Shaw resides in Ventura, Cal., and is the mother of two children, S. L., and Floyd P., who is in the soda water business.

S. L. Shaw was born October 7, 1849, in Bennington county, Vt. He was six years old when his parents moved to Wisconsin. Until his eighteenth year he lived in Green Lake county, that state. Following in the footsteps of his father, he became an expert carpenter, and as a preliminary lived in Monterey county between 1867 and 1868, where he put his skill to the practical test. In 1868 he accompanied his father to Ventura, and subsequently joined him in partnership, succeeding to the entire business upon his father's retirement from active life.

Among the many fine structures which owe their creation to the constructive talent of Mr. Shaw may be mentioned the Powers residence, the Salari residence, that of Mrs. Sexton Leech, the Poli street school, the grammar school, the high school, the Bard Hospital, besides numerous other residences and public buildings. In fact he is the largest builder in the town, and brings to the conduct of his affairs a keen knowledge of the fundamentals of construction, and an innate appreciation of the substantial, artistic and beautiful. Personally he owns several residences as well as his home, and is also the possessor of a ten-acre ranch three miles out of Ventura. He is the friend of education and all improvement, and was elected to the school board in 1886, and has continuously held the position ever since, and has, as well, been clerk of the board. In the fall of 1897 he was elected city trustee on the Republican ticket. His reelection followed in 1899 and 1901, when he received the largest vote of anyone on the ticket.

Twice married, Mr. Shaw was first united with Alice Henderson, who was born in Grass Valley, Cal., and died in Ventura, leaving two children, Edgar M., who is a mason in Grass Valley, and Jesse Bert, who is with his father in the contracting business. Mrs. Hettie Shaw, the present wife of Mr. Shaw, was born in California, and is the mother of two children, Frank and Daisy.

JAMES BARRON SHAW, M. D. Dr. Shaw was born in London, England, November 4, 1813, the son of a Scotch father and an English mother. As a boy it was his ambition to enter the navy, but this choice being opposed by his mother, he selected the medical profession. For nearly three years he studied under Dr. Nichol of Inverness, after which he spent four years in University College of London. In April, 1836, he received the degree of M. D. from Glasgow University, and in August of the same year became a member of the Royal College of Surgeons, London. During the following winter he studied surgery in Paris.

Being the possessor of ample means, Dr. Shaw decided to make a tour of the world instead of beginning active practice. In 1842, while in Calcutta, he was appointed assistant surgeon in an Indian regiment about to leave for China, and with this regiment he served until the treaty of Nankin was signed, returning to Calcutta in 1843 and thence going back to England. The year 1844 found him in Hong Kong, where he practiced his profession until coming to California. The discovery of gold led him to embark for the new world, and he arrived in San Francisco July 3, 1849. Going to Sacramento, thence to Mokelumne river, and from there to Dry creek, Tuolumne county, he soon found himself not adapted to mining, so resumed professional work. The winter proved to be a severe one, and he decided to go to Mexico, where he had friends and relatives. When ready to start for Mazatlan, he met Don Pedro Carrillo, a cultured man who had been educated in Boston and was then living at Santa Barbara. His advice led Dr. Shaw to come to this city, where he arrived January 6, 1850, and soon began to practice his profession. From May, 1852, until May, 1853, he was in Mexico, Honolulu and San Francisco, returning to Santa Barbara at the latter date. For sixteen years afterward he had charge of Santa Cruz island, with an area of 54,000 acres, and formerly a penal settlement of the Mexican government.

Embarking in the sheep business, Dr. Shaw bought two hundred ewes, but the shearing yielded very inferior wool. He then bought one thousand sheep just arrived from the east and took them to the island. Success attended him in this venture, and he continued for sixteen years, when, on the sale of the business, he turned over to the purchasers fifty-four thousand head of sheep and a large number of cattle and horses. During the last year he managed the island the gross proceeds were over $50,000. Before the island was sold he had bought over twenty-two thousand acres of land on the ranchos of La Laguna de San Francisco and Los Alamos, and these he stocked with sheep from Santa Cruz island, but the management of a sheep industry on the mainland proved far more difficult and less profitable than on the island, and he gradually sold off his flocks and invested the proceeds in graded Shorthorn or Durham cattle, selecting imported bulls famous for beef and dairy purposes. After a time he sold much of his land, retaining, however, about six thousand acres, the management of which he found sufficient to engross his attention. After years of connection with stock-raising activities he practically retired from business cares, giving over to the charge of his only surviving son the supervision of the ranch and the management of the stock interests.

SOLON SMITH. The possibilities of the Carpinteria valley have inspired successful effort on the part of the majority who have settled upon its fertile acres, and Solon Smith is no exception to the rule. One of the fine farms in this section of the county is evidence of his untiring energy and thorough understanding of the best way to conduct a ranch, and has gained for him a reputation second to none as a practical farmer and enterprising member of the community. Although born in Hanover, in the central part of New Hampshire, in 1842, he was reared in Kendall county, Ill., whither his parents removed in 1844. The occupation of the present is by no means a pastime, for he was brought up on his father's farm, and to his lot in early life fell the duties and diversions of the average farmer's son.

In 1863 Mr. Smith left Kendall county and migrated to California via the Isthmus. He spent four years in Northern California and Nevada, farming during the summers in the Sacramento valley, and logging during the winters in the lumber camps. He then returned to Illinois and farmed until 1884, when he returned to California and bought pueblo lands in the Carpinteria valley. He now owns sixty-two acres of well tilled land, and raises grain and fruit, making a specialty of lima beans. On his farm he has made many improvements, and has a pleasant residence as well as fine barn and outhouses.

In Kendall county, Ill., Mr. Smith married Amelia Bronk, a native of Illinois, and of this union there are three sons: Allen David, who is a farmer in Carpinteria; Lennis Leonard, who is engaged in the oil industry in Summerland; and Roy. All of the boys are interested in oil, and Allen is widely known as an oil well driller. Although independent in political affiliation, Mr. Smith has held a number of offices in his locality. In November of 1892 he was elected justice of the peace on the People's party ticket, and was re-elected in 1894 and in 1898, and is now serving his ninth year as justice for the first township of Santa Barbara county. His administration has been well received, and he is a prominent factor in local and state politics, having been a delegate to several county and state conventions. For several years he has been a school trustee of the Ocean school district, and has ever taken an interest in educational matters.

SAMUEL L. SMITH. The rise to prominence of the little town of Nordhoff is inseparably associated with the enterprising efforts of one of its most honored citizens, Samuel L. Smith. Long before the railroad came through he settled at Matilija Hot Springs, six miles up the mountain, and drove the stage from there to Ventura. With the advent of the railroad, his occupation gone, he came to Nordhoff in 1896 and purchased the livery stable which he still owns and manages. He has some fine turnouts and excellent horses, and does a large business driving tourists through the mountains. His responsibilities were increased in 1897, when, on the 15th of October, he was appointed postmaster of Nordhoff, a position which he has filled with credit to himself and to those who placed him in office. He has materially improved the mail facilities during his administration, and among other advances has introduced a telephone in the main office which connects with all of the towns in the county.

Previous to coming to Southern California Mr. Smith lived in Oregon, his birthplace having been at North Yamhill, Yamhill county, Ore., where he was born in 1857. His parents, W. C. and Delia A. (Laughlin) Smith, were natives respectively of Illinois and Missouri, and were farmers during their years of activity. The father died in 1872, and the mother still lives in Oregon. There were eight children in the family, Samuel L. being the third. He was educated in Oregon, and in time occupied a prominent place in the community, and served as deputy county sheriff of Yamhill county for two years. He was urged to run for sheriff, but at that time had decided to leave the state, and turned his prospects over to an uncle, who was defeated for the office. For ten years he lived in the city of Portland, and he also for a time ran a livery stable there with success. Other occupations also engaged his attention, and for four years he was a Pullman car conductor on the Union Pacific and Northern Pacific Railroads.

The marriage of Mr. Smith and Mary M. Houghton occurred in Portland in 1893, and to this couple have been born two children, William Mavor and Helen Clare. Mr. Smith has housed his family in a comfortable home erected by himself since his appointment as postmaster, and he is the owner of other property than his livery barn and home. He is a Republican in politics, and has been active in the affairs of his party, ever since he cast his first presidential vote for Grant. For twelve years he has been a member of the Portland Hassolo Lodge No. 15, I. O. O. F.

ARTHUR T. NEWCOMB, M. D. The exceptional advantages enjoyed by Dr. Newcomb in the acquirement of his medical education and his later practical and helpful knowledge gained in the government service as physician and surgeon, abundantly qualify him for successful professional work. His removal to Pasadena in 1899 did not bring to him his first knowledge of the city, for he had spent two months of each summer from 1894 to 1898 in this vicinity and had thus become favorably impressed with the opportunities offered to a medical man. In 1902 he completed an office on North Marengo avenue, where he has reception and consulting rooms and a laboratory fitted out with all modern surgical equipments, the whole forming a complete and satisfactory environment for a progressive physician.

Descended from English ancestors identified with Connecticut from an early day and pilgrims on the Mayflower, Dr. Newcomb was born at Homer, Cortland county, N. Y., December 8, 1871, and is the eldest of a family of four, now living. His father, Frank, a son of Samuel Newcomb, was born in Broome county, N. Y., and became a merchant in Homer, where he still resides. During the Civil war he was a member of the Tenth New York Cavalry. His wife, Elizabeth Thurston, was born in Broome county, N. Y., and is living at Homer. Her father, Alfred Thurston, who was a member of one of the oldest families of Broome county, attained to the age of ninety years. The early education of Arthur T. Newcomb was received in public schools, after which he attended the Cortland Normal School. On leaving there he assisted his father in business for a year, and then took a course of study in Wells Business College at Syracuse. Desiring to take up the study of medicine he began to read with Dr. H. A. Bolles, of Cortland, under whose oversight he acquired his primary knowledge of therapeutics. From there he went to the Baltimore Medical College and remained in that institution until his graduation in 1893. The following year was spent in the medical department of Johns Hopkins University, where he took a post-graduate course. At the same time he acted as demonstrator of nose, throat and chest diseases in the Baltimore Medical College and had charge of the clinic. In 1894, entering the government service, he accepted an appointment as physician and surgeon at Fort Mojave, Ariz., an old abandoned fort that is now used as an Indian Industrial school. During the four years of his service as physician at the fort he also practiced in every part of Mojave county. Different epidemics occurred meantime, all of which he successfully treated. In addition to treating the school children and employes, he took charge of the whole tribe as physician, so that his time was wholly taken up with professional cares. During the summer, when the school was closed, he came to Pasadena. On resigning the position in 1898 he returned to Baltimore, where he took a post-graduate course in Johns Hopkins University, and later studied bacteriology and microscopy in the University of Chicago. He is a member of the Medico-Chirurgical Society of Maryland, also the Pasadena Medical Society, and maintains a warm interest in all organizations for the benefit of practitioners, as well as the various medical journals published in their interests.

Among the people of Pasadena a high position is occupied by Dr. Newcomb and his wife, the latter being a daughter of Samuel Stratton, one of the well-known pioneers of the city. While professional duties engross his attention to the exclusion of officeholding, they do not prevent him from keeping posted regarding politics and casting a straight Republican ticket at all elections. Movements for the benefit of the city, including the Board of Trade, Young Men's Christian Association, and Americus Club, of which he is surgeon, number him among their members and adherents. Fraternally he is connected with the Foresters and Knights of Pythias, in the latter of which he is chancellor commander. The First Methodist Episcopal Church of Pasadena, with which he is identified, has the benefit of his generous contributions and practical sympathy, as, indeed, do other societies for the bettering of mankind and the promotion of the city's progress.

LOUIS SPADER. The Spader family originated in the ancient town of the same name in Holland. During an early period in American history, they identified themselves with the colonies, and have since been associated with the growth of our nation. The paternal grandfather of Louis Spader married a daughter of Jeremiah and Maria (Bergen) Vanderbilt, both of whom represented old and aristocratic families of New York. Vanderbilt avenue in Brooklyn was named in honor of Mr. Vanderbilt, who was one of the largest property owners in that vicinity. His grandson and namesake, Jeremiah Vanderbilt Spader, was born in Brooklyn, and in early life entered upon the lumbering business, in which he engaged during all of his active years. At this writing he is retired from business and makes his home on a ranch in California owned by his son, Louis. For his wife he chose Margaret Moore, who was born in New York City and is now living in California. Her father, Baltis Moore, a native of New York, and of Scotch and French ancestry, made tobacco manufacturing his principal occupation in life, and was connected with a leading firm in that line in New York. His wife was a member of the Gilbert family, of his home city.

In the family of which Louis Spader was third in order of birth there were six children, all but one of whom are still living. One of the sons, Vanderbilt, is an attorney in New York City, and another, Clinton, is engaged in the real-estate business in Brooklyn. The birth of Louis Spader occurred in Brooklyn June 28, 1858. His studies were conducted for some years in a private school, with a view to entering Columbia University, but, deciding that he preferred to embark in business at once, he opened a real-estate and brokerage office at No. 145 Broadway, New York. Shortly afterward he was united in marriage with Clara McNell, who died at the country home of her parents in Tenafly, N. J.

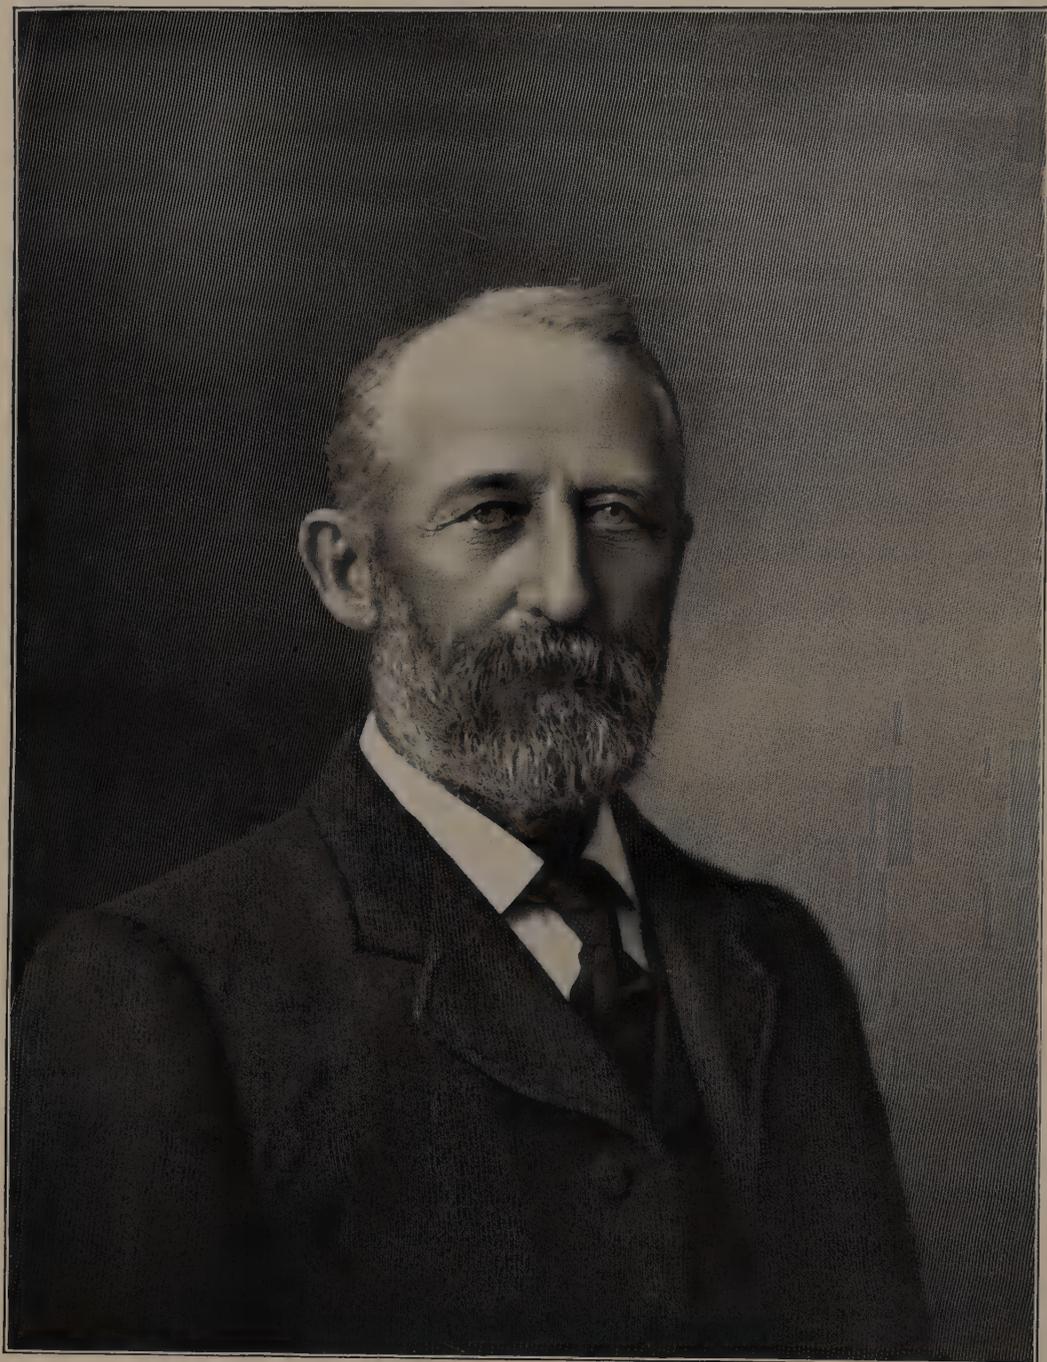

The immediate cause of Mr. Spader's removal to California was the failure of his wife's health, which he hoped might be benefited by the ideal climate of the Pacific coast. In 1889 he came to the Ojai valley, purchased land, developed water, and began active ranching pursuits. One of his early acquired interests was as stockholder and director in the Ojai Valley Water Company, of which he served as secretary and vice-president at different times. The name of the corporation has since been changed to the San Antonio Water Company. The venture has proved to be successful. Under the company's ditch over two hundred acres of orchards are watered. For some years all went well with Mr. Spader. The seventy-five acres which he had planted principally in navel oranges produced a steady revenue, and the remainder of the four hundred acre ranch also gave increasing profits each year. However, through the dishonesty of his partner, he lost the entire investment; but, though personally he was a loser, through his judicious efforts the valley received a permanent impetus as an orange-growing section. He was one of the first to plant a large orange grove, and the oranges that he raised compared favorably with the choicest products of the Riverside and Redlands groves.

At this writing Mr. Spader owns a ranch of ninety-six acres one mile northeast of Nordhoff. Fifteen acres of the land are under oranges. On this property he has a pumping plant of six-horse power, which furnishes a steady flow of water and provides the requisite means of irrigation. The ranch is superintended by his father, Mr. Spader himself having made his home since December, 1900, in Santa Barbara, where he is a member of the firm of Wilson & Spader, real estate, insurance and loans, at No. 1035 State street. In politics he has from his youth been a believer in Republican principles and a supporter of its candidates, both for local and national offices. Mr. Spader was married a second time, his wife being Miss Henrietta Wheeler, who was born in Montclair, N. J., but was reared and educated in Montgomery, Ala. Mr. and Mrs. Spader are members of the Episcopal Church of Santa Barbara.

W. R. SMITH. The hardware and agricultural implement enterprise of McAdams & Smith is one of the sound commercial undertakings of Lompoc. For a town of the size it could hardly be excelled as far as completeness of stock and extent of trade is concerned, for their store at the corner of Ocean avenue and First street has a large patronage, and is increasing its business every year. The management aim to sell all goods at a reasonable figure, and to maintain that integrity and courtesy without which no business is a success.

A native of England, Mr. Smith was born in Yorkshire in 1872, and received in his native land a common school education. When but fourteen years of age he came to America, and in 1886 to California, where he toured the state for a desirable location, finally locating in Lompoc which has since been his home. He here learned the trade of tinner with E. R. Tutt, and in 1898 opened a business in partnership with Mr. McAdams. This arrangement has since been amicably continued, both gentlemen thoroughly understanding their business, and being in touch with the general demand of the public for their goods. Mr. Smith is variously interested in the fraternal organizations in which Lompoc abounds, and is associated with the Knights of Pythias Lodge No. 57, the Foresters of America, and the Woodmen of the World, of which he is a charter member. In politics he is a Republican.

Mrs. Smith was formerly Cyrene Shoults, daughter of J. W. Shoults, formerly of Lompoc, now of Los Angeles, Cal. To Mr. and Mrs. Smith have been born three children: Marian, Clifford and Leslie Smith.

JAMES McFADDEN. Few of the residents of Santa Ana have been identified with its history for a longer period than has Mr. McFadden. Coming to the present site of the city as early as 1868, he purchased an interest in the Rancho Santiago de Santa Ana, an old Spanish grant, which he developed and improved and a portion of which still remains in his possession. In 1874 he established his residence permanently in the city, to whose growth and progress he has since been a constant contributor, and with whose history his own has been closely identified. During that same year of 1874, in connection with his brother Robert, he embarked in a general shipping business between San Francisco and Newport, and built a freight vessel, known as the Newport, which conveyed freight between the two places named. From the time of the incorporation of the Newport Wharf and Lumber Company, in which he materially assisted, he has continuously served as president of the same, and much of his time is given to a supervision of its interests.

In Delaware county, N. Y., Mr. McFadden was born September 4, 1833, a son of John and Effie (Lamont) McFadden, natives of the Isle of Butte, Scotland. In public schools and Delhi Academy he gained a fair education, and later he taught in his native county. During 1864 he came from New York City via Panama to California, and after a residence of several years in the northern part of the state, came to Santa Ana, as already stated. His sound judgment led him to identify himself with movements for the benefit of his locality, among these being the Santa Ana and Newport Railway, of which he was the promoter and incorporator. On the establishment of the company, he was chosen the first president, and continued in the office until the railroad was sold, during the latter part of 1898.

Not only in Santa Ana, but throughout all of Southern California, the name of James Mc-Fadden is always mentioned with esteem. This is the result of a lifetime of earnest endeavor and unremitting vigilance in every affair of business or private connection. As a public-spirited citizen he has promoted every vital interest of Orange county. Long before its separation from Los Angeles county, he had labored effectively for the best interests of Santa Ana and vicinity, and for years he advocated the creation of Orange county, a plan which, when realized, inaugurated an era of prosperity hitherto unequalled in Southern California.

HENRY LAING STAMBACH, M. D. One of the prominent and successful members of the medical profession in Santa Barbara is Henry Laing Stambach, who was born in Philadelphia, Pa., February 11, 1857. His father, George G. Stambach, was born in Paxinos, Northumberland county, Pa., and eventually settled in Philadelphia, where he was one of the first hatters and furriers (1845) in the city, having his store at No. 710 North Second street, and from 1861 at No. 826 Arch street. After his death, in 1876, the business was conducted by his son, John A., who carried it on until his retirement. As the name indicated, the Stambach family came originally from Germany, the emigrating ancestor being Phillip von Stambach, from Alsace Lorraine, who settled on a large tract of land in Pennsylvania. He was a Lutheran, and in his zeal to promote the interests of his religion established the first Lutheran church in Northumberland county. The mother of Dr. Stambach was formerly Sarah French, who was born in Trenton, N. J., of English descent, and was left an orphan at an early age. She was the mother of ten children, seven of whom attained maturity, and her death occurred in Philadelphia in 1884. Of the children, John A. is living in Philadelphia; Mahlon D. served during the Civil war and is living in Louisville, Ky.; George died in Philadelphia; Dr. Anna M. graduated in medicine in 1857, and died in 1872, in Aiken, S. C.; Dr. Ida is practicing in Santa Barbara; and Carrie is now Mrs. Nixon, of Santa Barbara.

The education of Dr. Stambach was acquired in the public schools of Philadelphia, and in 1876 he began the study of medicine with Dr. Rufus Sargent, subsequently entering Hahnemann Medical College, from which he was graduated March 10, 1879. He then spent a year in the hospital, and in 1880 went abroad for further study, pursuing a course at Göttingen, and also studying at Vienna for eighteen months. He traveled over Europe, familiarizing himself with the art, architecture and history of the old world, and gaining useful professional knowledge in the different centers of medical and surgical activity. In the fall of 1881 he again touched American shores, and at once engaged in practice in Philadelphia.

Coming to Santa Barbara in 1885, he located at No. 15 West Victoria street, and engaged in a general medical practice. He is among the foremost in homeopathic circles in the city, and is at present or has been in the past associated with all of the important organizations in the state and county. He is a member of the California State Homeopathic Medical Society, the Southern California Homeopathic Medical Society, of which he is ex-president and ex-secretary; the Pennsylvania State Homeopathic Medical Society, and the International Hahnemann Association. Until his resignation he was a member and director of the Chamber of Commerce. Politically he is a Republican, and fraternally is associated with the Woodmen of the World, of which organization he is medical examiner.

In Santa Barbara Dr. Stambach married Helen W. Knight, who was born in Reading, Mass., a daughter of Francis H. Knight, member of the firm of Goldthwait, Snow & Knight, of Boston. Mr. Knight came to Santa Barbara in 1879, and was engaged in the furniture business until his death in 1901. To Mr. and Mrs. Stambach has been born one child, Henry L., Jr.

WALTER OSCAR STEWART. If enterprise and industry count for aught, Mr. Stewart has before him an unusually bright prospect. Undismayed by a misfortune which deprived him of his available possessions, he is again pushing his way to the fore, and, as depot agent and postmaster at Somis, Ventura county, is faithfully discharging his duties to the public. He was born in Ventura county July 16, 1873, a son of Oscar A. and Fredericka (Seipp) Stewart, the former of whom was one of the first settlers of Ventura county, and is now a resident and rancher two miles south of Camarillo.

After finishing his education in the public schools, Mr. Stewart took possession of the agency at Somis in September of 1900, the station having been started just a year before. In connection with his other work he is learning to be a telegraph operator. A year ago Mr. Stewart built a store and stocked it well with general merchandise, his successful management of the same being brought to an abrupt ending by a disastrous conflagration, which burned about ten thousand dollars worth of possessions. He resumed business at Somis in March, 1901, Senator Bard having erected the building in which Mr. Stewart carries on his business. About a year ago Mr. Stewart was appointed postmaster, and his hands are therefore well filled with the discharge of his varied interests.

The marriage of Mr. Stewart and Mary Ann Sebastian, sister of John Sebastian, of Camarillo, occurred at Springville in 1896. Of this union there is one child, Reta Violet, who is now four years of age. The parents of Mr. Stewart were born respectively in Michigan and Ohio, and had five children, all of whom are in Ventura county, Cal. Mr. Stewart is a Democrat, as are all the members of his father's family, and he is a member of the Native Sons of California.

HUGH WARRING. Well known among the ranchmen of Ventura county is Mr. Warring, who came to Buckhorn from Santa Clara county in 1869. In the latter county, near San José, he was born September 23, 1857, and is a son of Benjamin F. Warring. Coming to Ventura county with his parents when he was twelve years of age, he grew to manhood upon the Buckhorn ranch, and in 1881, starting out for himself, bought a tract of unimproved land near the home ranch. For a time he conducted a general farming business, but later turned his attention to the raising of oranges, lemons and olives, and to-day has one of the finest fruit orchards in the valley. Certainly due credit should be given him for having developed a raw piece of land into a thrifty fruit ranch. It has been said that he may be termed a public benefactor who causes two blades of grass to grow where one grew before. Measured by this standard, he has been a benefactor to the people of Ventura county and has proved himself a public-spirited citizen.

In 1890 Mr. Warring became interested in developing oil in Hopper cañon. He served as secretary of the Fortuna Oil Company, which drilled sixteen wells. At the present time he owns several hundred acres of land showing oil seepage. His oil interests include the position of president of the Hopper Cañon Oil Company, of which he was an organizer. He is among the largest stockholders in the Tapo Oil Company, which owns eight hundred acres of oil land, a portion of the Tapo ranch. In several other oil companies he is also a stockholder. Gold mining has received some attention from him, and he is a stockholder in the Yellow Bird gold mine in Arizona. The Fillmore Citrus Fruit Association numbers him among its stockholders. Since starting out in the world for himself, at the age of twenty-three, he has been successful in his varied undertakings.

The marriage of Mr. Warring, in 1881, united him with Miss Alice Conaway, daughter of Joshua A. Conaway. Four sons were born of this union, Edwin, Floyd, Alfred and Lester, to whom the death of Mrs. Warring, June 18, 1896, was an irreparable loss.

While Mr. Warring has numerous business activities, they do not prevent his participation in local affairs. Indeed, we find him prominent in measures for the benefit of the Republican party and for the general advancement of his community. For one term he served as justice of the peace at Buckhorn, and has also served for some years as a member of the school board. At times of elections he has been called upon to serve on the election board, and he has also more than once been connected with the Ventura county central committee.

BENJAMIN F. WARRING. The distinction of being the first white settler at Buckhorn, Ventura county, belongs to Mr. Warring, who arrived here from San José September 30, 1869. He was born in Tioga county, N. Y., March 9, 1829, and his parents, Hudson and Rebecca (Sherman) Warring, were also natives of that state. While he was still quite small his mother died and his father went away. He was then taken into the home of Mr. Slocum, a farmer, with whom he remained until he reached his majority. In 1851 he came, via the isthmus, to California, and at San José joined a sister, Mrs. Grinnell, who had gone there as a missionary in 1849. Near San José he purchased one hundred and sixty acres of land, where he remained for eighteen years, meantime raising grain and other farm products. Accompanied by his family, in 1869, he came to the Santa Clara valley, then Santa Barbara (now Ventura) county, and homesteaded his present farm of one hundred and sixty acres, which afterward became known as Buckhorn ranch. This name was given for the following reason: During the first few years of his residence in Ventura county he spent most of his time hunting deer and bear, which were very plentiful in the mountains. The bucks' horns he nailed to a board, which he placed over his gate. For miles around his place became known as the ranch with the bucks' horns, and this was shortened in time to the Buckhorn ranch. It was a resting place for the travelers and prospectors, who always found a hearty welcome there and plenty of provision for man and beast. When the railroad came through in 1887 a side track was built and a flag station established, which was known as Buckhorn. Later a postoffice was established here, so that finally, after having for many years traveled sixty miles for his mail, Mr. Warring is now able to get it at his own door.

During the first few years on his present place Mr. Warring's principal crops were hay, barley and wheat, but gradually he set out a family orchard, which to-day comprises forty acres, principally in apricots. A drying plant is operated in connection with the orchard. The water right, from Hopper cañon, which Mr. Warring developed himself, flows sixty miner's inches under four-inch pressure, furnishing plenty of water for the ranch. Indeed, the improvements are all first-class, and he has just reason to be proud of the place, as representing the result of his energy and perseverance. During the '80s he took up or leased land at Hopper cañon (formerly called Arroyo cañon) and put down about twelve oil wells, producing eight hundred barrels per month. In 1899 he sold his interest to the Fortuna Oil Company, which he had organized. The Tapo Oil Company, of which he is a member, owns eight hundred acres of oil land on the Tapo ranch, where his son, I. Hudson Warring, is developing oil, having organized the Tapo Oil Company.

In San José, in 1854, Mr. Warring married Miss Missouri Easley, and afterward their family included five children: Isaac Hudson, of Santa Paula; Elihu, of Buckhorn; Walter, who resides with his parents; Mrs. Emma Wilson and Miss Lottie Warring, who are deceased. During the Civil war Mr. Warring was a member of a local cavalry company at San José. The Republican party has always received his firm allegiance, and for many years he served as school director. Both as ranchman and oil producer he has been successful, and among the residents of his community none is more highly respected than the owner of Buckhorn ranch.

LOUIS JOSEPH LEGRAND. California, whither turns instinctively the thought of the landscape gardener in America, as expressive of the endless possibilities of a nature loving calling, has reflected in its parks and driveways, its fragrance and riots of glorious color symphonies, the fulfilled ambitions of some of the most appreciative and intelligent master artists in the world. And in thus attributing much of the charm of this richly endowed state to the co-operation of the landscape gardener, it is but a step from generalities to personalities, for in singling out those who have attained to the greatest results in collaborating with nature one is forced to the admission that many are called but few chosen. One whose mind is most finely attuned to the harmonies of nature, and who has developed its latent resources and blended its utilities, is L. J. Legrand, superintendent of Calvary cemetery in Los Angeles, and chief instigator of the intricate and bewildering beauty of the city parks.

In his youth Mr. Legrand received every advantage calculated to inspire his best efforts. He comes from Belgium, a country which numbers among its chief charms prolific horticultural and floricultural resources. A native of the Province of Liege, near the city of that name in western Belgium, he was born June 21, 1853, a son of Francois and Rosalie (Hermann) Legrand, natives of the same province. The father was a farmer by occupation and served with distinction in the Belgium army, but he is now dead, as is also his wife. Their nine children are, with the exception of L. J., living in their native land. After completing his education in the public schools of Liege, Mr. Legrand attended the Horticultural College in Vilvorde, north of Brussels, for two years, and then entered the horticultural department of the University of Ghent, where he took a full course and was graduated in 1874. For the following eight years he engaged in business in Ghent, and during that time propagated principally species of ferns and palms, but was also interested in house plants and in fibrous root plants. Only those who have visited in their travels the markets of that picturesque city of Ghent, and have seen the wealth of blooms possible of production in the wonderfully rich soil, are capable of appreciating what a Mecca for the florist would be this particular part of Belgium. And thus it happened that Mr. Legrand built up a large business of more than local importance, for he eventually shipped to all parts of the world on a wholesale scale, and in the interest of his increasing trade made annual trips to England, Holland, France, Germany and Switzerland.

Placed thus in touch with the most intelligent and exacting trade in the world, Mr. Legrand decided to test the possibilities of a newer but nevertheless resourceful country, and upon landing in America in 1884, chose California on account of its climate and natural advantages. For the first three months in Los Angeles he engaged in business with Stengel, and afterwards took up landscape gardening, and the following year, 1885, was made superintendent of the Los Angeles parks. Almost immediately he began the work of improving the general aspect of the city, and laid out the Sixth street and Plaza parks, and later the Eastlake Park of fifty-two acres and the Westlake Park of thirty-five acres. A still later undertaking was the arrangement of Elysian and Prospect parks, and his labors in this capacity extended for the time being over a period of six years. After resigning from the city service he was installed as chief landscape gardener of the Whittier Reform School, for which he accomplished most satisfactory results, and at the end of two years returned to Los Angeles, where, owing to the death of Mr. Tomlinson in 1893, he was reappointed superintendent for one term. He accomplished the landscape work of Hollenbeck and Echo parks, and the first year planted forty thousand trees in Elysian Park. The planting of these trees, many of which were on the hills, caused a great deal of criticism to emanate from the columns of the conservative press, which predicted all kinds of disaster, even prophesying that Mr. Legrand would have to carry ground up to the top of the hills to make the trees grow. The grounds, which to-day appear like a forest, and cast a grateful and alluring shade from the swaying branches of trees whose doom was foretold by the press, plainly establish the fact that the planter, and not his critics, understood what he was about. After the expiration of his term Mr. Legrand stepped out of his position to accommodate the candidate of the incoming party, which differed from him politically. He then went about laying out some of the most attractive places in the city, and at present he is engaged in the arrangement of the grounds of Lyman Stewart, on the corner of Lucas and Twenty-sixth streets, a fine place covering five acres. He also laid out the Hollenbeck home grounds, the Childs grounds, on Adams and Arlington streets, and others worthy of note.

In the meantime, about five years ago, Mr. Legrand was made superintendent of Calvary cemetery, which has developed under his skill into one of the ideal cities of the dead, and which contains one hundred and forty-four acres of land. About one-fourth of the property is fenced and improved, and it is continually assuming a more finished aspect. In this, as in his other undertakings, Mr. Legrand has earned the keen appreciation of the thousands who have benefited by his plans for the redemption of the city, and in his steadfast approach towards the best of his calling has disarmed the hostile criticism of the less confident. As in all undertakings of actual worth and oftentimes surprising and unusual advancement, the element of competition and rivalry plays an important part, but, unlike Mr. Legrand, all are not content to abide the decision, awaiting the maturity of their plans. In this he has shown the culture and tact to be expected from a member of one of the finest and oldest Flemish families, and whose advancement has extended into many fields beloved of the student and remote from his immediate occupation.

June 1, 1876, while living in Ghent, Mr. Legrand married Caroline Wallem, a native of Ghent, and daughter of Charles Wallem, an artist painter whose work brought him more than local renown, and who was celebrated all over the continent. Her paternal grandfather was a native of Belgium and a merchant during his active life, while his wife was born in the same province. Four children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Legrand: Henry, a resident of Los Angeles; Fernand, assistant superintendent under his father; Martha, educated at the Convent of the Visitation at Ghent; and Paul, living with his parents. In his work Mr. Legrand has found an able and appreciative assistant in his cultured wife, who has the instincts of the artist, the hospitality of the Belgian born, and the womanliness which wins and retains many friends.

MADISON THORNBURGH, to whom is due the distinction of being the first real-estate man, the first insurance agent, the first justice of the peace, and the first notary public of Santa Maria, has been connected with the town of his adoption to an extent which renders those who came after him his debtors and sincere appreciators of his work in behalf of progress and enterprise. Of sturdy Quaker stock, he was born at Hagerstown, Wayne county, Ind., in 1835, a son of John Thornburgh, a native of Newmarket, Jefferson county, Tenn., where he was born in 1809. The mother, Elizabeth (Hunt) Thornburgh, was born in Gifford county, N. C., and died in Indiana many years ago. The paternal grandfather, Henry, who was of German descent, was born in North Carolina in 1773, and in 1824 migrated to Indiana, where he bought a large tract of government land and farmed during the remainder of his life. He was a devout Quaker, and invariably sat at the head of the early day meetings at Richmond, Ind. John Thornburgh was known as "John the Saddler," a nickname which resulted from his occupation. He removed with his family to Iowa in 1874, and built the Redfield woolen mills, in Dallas county, Iowa, and in 1870 came to Ventura county, Cal., and lived at Rincon Point for a year. He then took up land where is now the site of Santa Maria, but which was at first called Central City, the present name being substituted by a committee of citizens called together for the purpose by Mr. Thornburgh, in 1883. This early pioneer died in the midst of his successes in December of 1895, having played well his part in the east as well as the west, and having been successful as a farmer and merchant, which latter occupation he engaged in for a few years during the '70s. In his family were eight children, three of whom are still living, Madison being the second child. The others are: Sophia B., who is the wife of S. B. Jones, of Santa Maria; and Jesse, a courageous soldier during the Civil war, and at present a resident of Santa Maria.

While the store of the elder Thornburgh was doing a flourishing business during the '70s, his son, Madison, was a trusted clerk, and rapidly rose to a knowledge of every detail of the business. He later branched out on his own responsibility, and became interested in insurance, real estate, and in holding the various political offices for which he has showed such an especial fitness. Scarce an enterprise which has arisen with the influx of population but has received the benefit of his support and the advantage of his financial and executive ability, one of his most conspicuous undertakings being the organization of the school district, he himself being clerk of the board for eight years. He has ever since taken an active interest in educational matters. He was one of the committee that helped bring the sugar refinery to Santa Maria, the value of which has been repeatedly demonstrated to the satisfaction of the most casual observer.

In his allegiance to the Republican party Mr. Thornburgh follows the example of his forefathers, not one of whom ever voted the Democratic ticket. He has served as justice of the peace and notary public, and has been postmaster of Santa Maria since May of 1898. Out of a little hole in the wall he has evolved a service of dignified proportions, and has a fine office in which the postal affairs are conducted. As evidence of his success Mr. Thornburgh has come into the possession of a large amount of real estate, and in connection therewith is the interesting fact that, when in the real-estate business, he was instrumental in defeating the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad regarding the reservation between Ventura and San Francisco, and restored to the people every alternate section between these points. He has seen every building put up in this town, and feels a natural pride in being to such an extent a participator in its present prosperity. In addition to his town property he owns two thousand acres in the county.

Mr. Thornburgh has been thrice married, the present Mrs. Thornburgh having been, before her marriage, Victoria Woodward of Santa Maria, daughter of Prof. Charles Woodward, who built and for twenty years maintained the Salem College organ. To Mr. and Mrs. Thornburgh has been born one daughter, Ruth, who is now eight years old. By a former marriage to Mary Laubach, of Iowa, there is one son, Frank, who, until a short time ago, was deputy postmaster under his father. Fraternally a Mason, Mr. Thornburgh is the veteran of his order in this state, and is now a charter member of Hesperion Lodge, No. 264, of Santa Maria. While justice of the peace at Santa Maria, the jurisdiction of Mr. Thornburgh extended over an area greater than the state of Rhode Island.

J. J. STREETS, D. V. S. The necessities, disposition and unquestioned nobility of that wonderful friend of man, the horse, is by no one better understood and appreciated than by Dr. Streets, the capable and popular veterinary surgeon of Ventura. So intimate has been his association with these almost human helpmates, and so profound his research in connection therewith, that he is regarded as one of the best authorities in Southern California, and as such is a member of the veterinary board of California, to which he was appointed by Governor Gage in 1899. Quite in keeping with his standing in the community, he has the finest and largest livery stable in the town, in connection with which is maintained a veterinary hospital with modern equipment, where the physical ills of the modern Pegasus are conscientiously and skillfully treated. The livery business is conducted under the firm name of Streets & Foltz, and the large patronage is proof of its reliable business tactics.

To the conduct of his business Mr. Streets brings a most thorough preparation, having in his youth been favored with fortunate educational training. A native of Crete, Will county, Ill., he was born September 9, 1863, a son of John W. Streets, who was born in Delaware. The father went to Will county, Ill., when a young man, eventually settling at Woodstock, McHenry county, where he engaged in educational work. He finally returned to Will county, where he died. The mother, formerly Martha J. Williamson, was a native of Crete, Ill., and a daughter of John Williamson, a pioneer of Will county when Chicago was a trading post. He was a native of the north of Ireland, and of Scotch descent. His wife, Lucinda Williamson, was born in New England. The parents were farmers during the greater part of their lives, and were pioneers and prominent citizens of Crete, Ill. The mother, who died in Woodstock, had two children, the other son being Frank, who is now a merchant at Woodstock, Ill.

While being reared in Will county, Ill., Dr. Streets studied at the public schools at Naperville, and eventually was graduated with high honors from the State Agricultural College at Ames, Iowa, in 1887, having taken the three years' course. He was valedictorian of his class, and was appointed house surgeon during his third year. Subsequently he entered the American Veterinary College, in New York City, and upon his graduation in 1888, received the degree of D. V. S. He later engaged in practice in Aurora, Kane county, Ill., and in 1891 located in Ventura, Cal., which has since been the scene of his activity, and the beginning of his excellent work as the only graduate veterinary of the town.

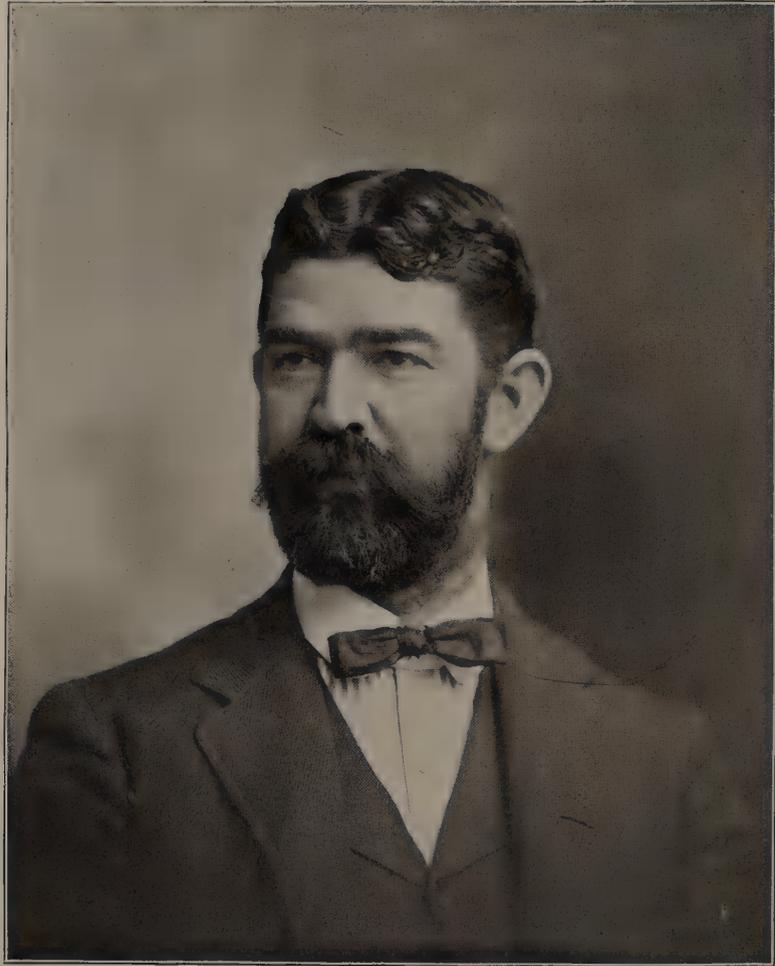

After coming to Southern California Dr. Streets married Alice C. Drucker, a native of San Francisco, and a member of the association called the Native Daughters of the Golden West. Of this union there is one daughter and one son, Margaret and James. Dr. Streets is a member of the Fraternal Aid and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, is past officer of the encampment, and past officer and scribe of the canton. He is prominent in the affairs of the town, and his many admirable claims as a public-spirited citizen are fully appreciated by the community of which he is so valuable an acquisition. As a Republican, he has been active in local and county affairs, and is an ex-member of the county central committee. He is a member of the State Veterinary Association and has been stock inspector of Ventura county ever since his location in the county.

EDWARD M. WAGNER, who is a large land owner and harness and saddle manufacturer of Ventura, was born in Oshkosh, Wis., October 19, 1851. His father, William, was born in Trier, Alsace-Lorraine, and immigrated to America in 1846, settling in Milwaukee, Wis., where he engaged in the mercantile business. He eventually removed to Oshkosh, Wis., where he became prominent in the affairs of the town, and built the first opera house there. This structure became the victim of a disastrous conflagration, as did its successor, but the third building remained a successful monument to the enterprise and good management of its owner. He conducted a general merchandise business, and continued the same until the breaking out of the Civil war. As captain of Company B, Third Wisconsin Cavalry, he served his country throughout the war, in the army of the west, and was honorably discharged after the expiration of his term of service. He continued his interests in Wisconsin for a time, and January 4, 1875, located in Ventura, Cal., and managed the Palace and other hotels until his appointment as a government officer in the mint at San Francisco. At the expiration of six years he resigned this position and retired to Ventura, where he died in 1898, at the age of eighty-two years. He was prominent in fraternal circles, and was a member of the Masons and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and was also associated with the Grand Army of the Republic. In his young manhood he married Anna Gansen, who was born in Germany, and died in Ventura at the age of sixty-seven years. The Gansen family came from Holland, and were political refugees to Germany, on account of which the name was changed from Jansen to Gansen. There were eight children born to Mr. and Mrs. Wagner: John B., who has been deputy auditor of Ventura county for about sixteen years; E. M., who is living at Ventura; A. J., who is a resident of Stockton, Cal.; Mrs. Emma Benchley, who is living at Fullerton, Cal.; Julius K., who is in San Francisco; Mrs. Annie Cross, of Salem, Ore.; William, Jr., who is a resident of Ventura; and Ernest, who is a miner in the Klondike.

The education of Edward M. Wagner was acquired in the Oshkosh public schools and Oshkosh Academy, and in 1874 he came to Ventura with his father. For many years he was associated with his brother, A. J., in the management of the Palace Hotel, and his interest was eventually disposed of to his brother, after which he engaged in the ranching business. At present he is the owner of one hundred and ninety acres of land, all tillable, a portion of which is irrigated, and which is rented out in tracts. The management of this property and also that of Mrs. M. C. Solari, of over two thousand acres, is a large responsibility and consumes considerable of Mr. Wagner's time. In 1887 he engaged in the manufacture of harness and saddles, and has a well-equipped store on Main street. In business circles he is regarded as one of the substantial men of the town, and his success has been entirely the result of application and the practice of the highest financial ethics.

Mrs. Wagner was formerly Elvira Solari, who was born in Ventura and educated at Santa Clara College. She is the oldest daughter of Augustus Solari, and is the mother of one son, Orestes Edward. In political circles Mr. Wagner is well and favorably known, and as a staunch Democrat has served on the county central committee. He is associated with the Ancient Order of United Workmen, is one of the Sons of Veterans, and is a member of the Board of Trade. With his family, he attends the Mission Church.

J. R. Allison

JAMES R. ATCHISON. The association of Mr. Atchison with the Los Angeles Electric Railway Company dates from December 1, 1898, when he accepted a position as chief engineer of their plant and he still continues in the same capacity, although the title has since been changed to that of superintendent of power plants. For use in the city plant there are now two engines of fifteen hundred horse power; one of one thousand; one of six hundred and one of three hundred; while the capacity of the three engines in the Pasadena plant is respectively six hundred, four hundred and fifty and two hundred and fifty. In addition to this the company owns another plant on Mount Lowe, which is utilized in operating Mount Lowe Railway.

Mr. Atchison was born in Lebanon, St. Clair county, Ill., June 14, 1861, the second of three sons comprising the family of James and Anna (Johnston) Atchison. His father, who was of Scotch-Irish descent, was a native of Pennsylvania and early removed to Illinois, where he followed the millwright's trade. A strong abolitionist, he was staunch in his support of the Union and during the war was in the government employ, but died before peace was declared. In 1868 the widowed mother, accompanied by her three sons, came to California, first settling in San Francisco and from there removing to Bangor, Butte county, where she still makes her home. Her oldest son, Thomas, is employed in the police department of San Francisco, while the youngest, John B., is in the United States mail service.

When a boy of seven years, James R. Atchison accompanied his mother across the plains, via the railroad, to California, where he attended school two years. From that time until he was sixteen he lived in Bangor. On his return to San Francisco, he was apprenticed to the machinist's trade, remaining in the Pacific iron works for four years. His first employment, after completing the trade, was at Battle Mountain, Nev., where he was engineer at the mills for nine months. Returning to San Francisco, he was employed in the Phoenix shop as a machinist, and later worked in other shops, including those of the Southern Pacific Railroad. In November, 1885, he came to Southern California, but did not remain at that time, going on to Arizona, where he was engineer in the Silver King mine. His next position was as superintendent of a twenty-stamp mill in Sonora, Mexico, where he remained seventeen months. On account of an accident which prevented him from using his hand, he resigned the position and went to Tucson, Ariz., but it was some time before he was in a condition to resume work. Returning to Los Angeles about 1888, he was employed in the Southern Pacific shops, later in the Baker iron works, afterward in the Fosmir iron works and then was given charge of the engine room of the Los Angeles Electric Company. A later position was that of chief engineer of the Ice and Cold storage Company of Los Angeles, where he remained a year, meantime thoroughly renovating and remodeling the plant. On resigning that place he became superintendent of the power plants of the electric railroad, which responsible position he has since filled with the utmost efficiency.

Since settling in Los Angeles Mr. Atchison has married, his wife being Louise M. Marshall, daughter of Scotch parents who became pioneers of Eldorado, Cal., where she was born. The fraternal associations of Mr. Atchison include membership in Pentalpha Lodge, F. & A. M., in which he was made a Mason; the Independent Order of Foresters; Knights and Ladies of Security, and Los Angeles Lodge No. 135, I. O. O. F., his connection with the Odd Fellows dating from his residence in San Francisco. He is a member of the National Association of Stationary Engineers. Though not an office holder nor a leader in politics, he is a pronounced Republican, and always gives his support to that party's principles. In keeping with his ideals of citizenship, he interests himself in movements for the benefit of Los Angeles, particularly, as may be supposed, in such plans as indicate the attainment of transportation facilities superior to those enjoyed by any city of like size in the United States.

ROBERT A. TODD. Prominent among the young men who wield an increasing and important influence in the public affairs of Los Angeles stands Robert A. Todd, member of the common council from the eighth ward. Mr. Todd is a Californian by birth, and was born in San Bernardino March 5, 1870. His father, Asa, who was born in the vicinity of Lexington, Ky., accompanied his family to Missouri in childhood and settled upon a large farm, where later horses and cattle were raised in large numbers. In 1853 he crossed the plains on mule-back, traveling alone almost the entire distance and following the northern route. Arriving in the west, he began to work in mines, and soon had gained a fortune in placer mining, but lost it in quartz mining. As a wheelwright in the employ of Gen. Phineas Banning, he came to Southern California, working first in Wilmington and then in Los Angeles. For many years, however, contracting and building have engrossed his attention, and, although now sixty-nine years of age, his activities have not lessened nor his vitality become impaired. Of his marriage to Mary Rhine were born three sons, namely: Robert Asa and Earl B., both of Los Angeles; and Willard, who is now in the Kern river oil district.

Near the famous natural bridge which has given name to one of Virginia's villages in Rockingham county, Mrs. Todd was born and reared. Her father, Isaac N. Rhine, also of Virginian birth and of German descent, became a pioneer farmer of Missouri, and about 1866 came to California overland, with ox and mule team, and accompanied by his family. The trip was made via Salt Lake to Lytle creek and thence to San Bernardino, where Mr. Rhine took up farm pursuits. At the time of his arrival he was offered, for a dollar an acre, five hundred acres in Los Angeles, out from Main and Twelfth streets, but refused, owing to the absence of water; instead, he purchased land at Downey, where an abundance of water could be secured, and there he engaged in agricultural pursuits until his death, at seventy-two years.

From the age of two years Robert A. Todd was reared in Los Angeles, where he attended the grammar and high schools and was graduated from Woodbury's Business College. While still a boy he became interested in journalistic work, and for a time was employed on the old Los Angeles Tribune, later being connected with other local papers, and then for three years was editor of the Tucson Star, at Tucson, Ariz., during the governorship of L. C. Hughes. On returning to Los Angeles, he became city hall reporter for the Evening Express, continuing as such until his selection by Mayor Snyder as his private secretary, shortly after his election as chief executive in December, 1896. During the entire first administration of Mr. Snyder, the responsible position of private secretary was held by Mr. Todd. In 1898 the Democratic party nominated him for councilman from the eighth ward and he was honored with the largest majority ever received by any candidate in the ward. Two years later he was re-elected by an increased majority. In spite of the fact that the council is strongly Republican, he has received due recognition, and during his first term was one of the members of the committee on public works. During his residence in Arizona he was also active in Democratic matters, and for a time was a member of the Pima county executive committee, besides serving as a delegate to county conventions and secretary of the territorial convention. These various positions, together with his close study of matters political, have given him an insight into public affairs not always possessed by men many years his senior. Every phase of politics has received attention from him, and all those problems which contribute to the prosperity or retard the progress of a nation have been thoroughly studied by him. Under these circumstances, there is little doubt that the future holds many positions of trust and responsibility for him, and it may be safely predicted that his name will become in time a power in his party throughout the state.

In Los Angeles Mr. Todd married Miss Minnie Reinert, whose parents, Edward and Margaret Reinert, were early settlers of this city. His fraternal connections include membership in Los Angeles Lodge No. 42, F. & A. M., and Ramona Parlor No. 109, Native Sons of the Golden West, of which he is past president.

HARRY C. ALLEN. The fact that he has been a resident of Pasadena since 1887 has brought to Mr. Allen a thorough knowledge of the progress of this city during the most important period of its history, while his constant interest in horticulture has given him a richness of experience in the industry which has made Southern California famous throughout the world. During the years of his identification with the city he has improved the beautiful suburban place, Allendale, consisting of thirty-two acres, where, among the restful live oak trees, can be seen the possibilities of this favored clime. Mr. Allen has proven the success of orange growing and as well every variety of citrus and deciduous fruits.

The Allens were among the early settlers of Massachusetts, where William H. Allen, a resident of New Bedford, was interested in the whaling industry. From that state William H., Jr., after having graduated from Harvard College, removed to Illinois, and settled at Grafton, Jersey county. During later years he became one of Grafton's leading men. His splendid educational equipment, combined with fine native gifts and fostered by travel and self-culture, fitted him to be a leader among men, and in recognition of his many exceptional qualities the voters of his district elected him a member of the Illinois state senate, where his services were of such an order as to give him a distinguished place among the able men of that body. For thirty years he engaged in the banking business at Grafton, also for a time served as judge, maintained important manufacturing interests, and, all in all, was perhaps the leading citizen and business man of the town. The last seven years of his useful life were passed in Pasadena, Cal., where he died in 1898, aged eighty-four years. When a young man he married Maria M. Mason, who was born in Edwardsville, Ill., and who survived him only four years, dying in Pasadena in 1902, at the age of eighty. Her father, James Mason, was at the time of his death territorial land commissioner of Illinois.

In the family of William H. Allen, Jr., there are six children, three of whom reside in California, one son, W. H. (the third to bear that name), being president of the Title Insurance and Trust Company in Los Angeles. The fourth among the children was H. C. Allen, who was born in Grafton, Ill., July 31, 1850. His education was received in public schools and Christian Brothers College. For a time he was connected with the Grafton Manufacturing Company and also aided his father in the management of his banking affairs, but in 1882 left home and went to the south, looking for a suitable location. After several years spent in the southern states, he drifted gradually toward the far west, and in 1887 settled in Pasadena, where he has since made his home. By his marriage to Miss Harriet McCord, of Chicago, he has three children: Elsie, Clifford and Averic.

BENJAMIN S. VIRDEN. The expectations of Mr. Virden upon first coming to Oxnard and starting the pioneer drug business of the place have been more than realized, and to such an extent has his business advanced that he moved into a fine brick store, 25x65 feet in dimensions. The appointments of this new structure are in every way worthy of the enterprise and progressiveness of the owner, and the manifold wants of those who patronize the store will be readily met in the future as they have been in the past.

A native of Jackson, Miss., Mr. Virden was born March 7, 1866, and when a child was taken to Delaware, where he grew to manhood and received his education in the public schools. Later he returned to his old home, and afterwards spent many years in the south. He came to California in 1889, and engaged in the drug business at Santa Paula, and has since then lived in Ventura county. For six years he was in the drug business at Saticoy, and from there removed to Oxnard in 1899. He has among his other possessions one of the prettiest homes in the town, which was erected by himself with an eye for the artistic, comfortable and hospitable.

In all matters pertaining to the general welfare Mr. Virden is foremost, and his assistance may be relied on to further any wise and promotive cause. He was married at Ventura in 1892, to Josephine Kelly, who has proved a helpmate indeed and of valuable assistance in formulating and carrying out his plans to a successful issue. Three children have blessed this union: Hazel Courtney, Ruth Maria and Benjamin, Jr. In national politics Mr. Virden is a Democrat, and in religious matters is affiliated with the Episcopal Church. Identified with the Masonic order, he was made a Mason in Hueneme Lodge, also belongs to Ventura Chapter No. 50, and Ventura Commandery No. 18.

CAPT. WILLIAM G. WATERS, the president, manager and largest stockholder in the San Miguel Island Company, comes from a prominent family of English descent, who have been represented in America since the beginning of the eighteenth century. The paternal great-grandfather, Jonathan, came from Sutton, and the grandfather, Cornelius Waters, was born in 1749, and married Sybil Gardner, daughter of Isaac Gardner, of Brooklyn, Mass. He was a clergyman in the Congregational Church. The next in succession; George Washington Waters, father of Capt. W. G., was born in Ashby, Mass., July 4, 1798, and engaged in a manufacturing business in Gorham, Me., until his retirement from active business life. During the years of his activity, in Massachusetts, he raised a company of militia of which he was captain, and afterwards he was elected colonel. His latter days were spent in well-earned leisure on the Pacific coast, and his death occurred in San Francisco December 14, 1885. He married Sarah Forbes, who was born in Greenfield, Mass., May 30, 1798, and died in Newton, Mass. She was the mother of twelve children, six of whom attained maturity, and three are now living, Capt. W. G. Waters being the only one in the west. One son, John, was in the Thirty-sixth Massachusetts during the Civil war, and is now a resident of Braintree, Mass.

The youth of Captain Waters was spent in Gorham, Me., where he was born August 14, 1838. At a very early age he evinced forceful and independent traits of character, and when but fourteen started out alone to earn his own living in the busy marts of the world. As a preliminary he engaged as a clerk in Boston, Mass., devoting to studious application whatever scant leisure came his way of evenings, and for many years he continually added to the nucleus of an education thus acquired. His clerkship ended, he entered the Lawrence locomotive works as an apprenticed machinist, but after learning the trade, his health being impaired, he engaged in the provision business at Clinton, Mass. In 1861, at the first tap of the drum, he enlisted in Company C, Fifteenth Massachusetts, under Col. Charles Devens, and participated in the battles of Ball's Bluff, October 21, 1861; Second Bull Run, Fair Oaks, Antietam, Harper's Ferry, the two battles of Fredericksburg, and numerous other important engagements. In 1862 he was commissioned first lieutenant, and was honorably discharged in the fall of 1863, on account of physical disability, brought on by exposure and the vicissitudes of war. The ravages wrought by the strife were deep seated, and it was not until 1876 that he regained his normal splendid health. After the return of peace he was elected captain of his regiment, and commissioned by Governor Andrews of Massachusetts.

In spite of his uncertain health Captain Waters entered the employ of the Whipple File Manufacturing Company, at Ballardvale, Essex county, Mass., as master mechanic, and was afterwards with the Montauk iron and steel works, at Mott Haven, N. Y. He then became identified with the Boston Daily Advertiser, of which his brother Edwin was half owner, and for several years was in charge of the press department. In 1877 he was solicited by Mr. Simonton to become superintendent of the Morning Call, of San Francisco, and in this capacity put in the first Rapid Perfection press on the coast, and was paid the highest salary of any machinist and newspaper man in California. The erection of the press was begun in the fall of 1877, and it was in working order March 7, 1878, after which Captain Waters continued the superintendency until his wife's failing health necessitated his removal to Santa Barbara, in the fall of 1887. He here bought an interest in the San Miguel Island and engaged in the stock business, organizing and incorporating the San Miguel Island Company, of which he has since been manager, president and chief stockholder. The company has made many improvements on this island, having built a road, a residence five hundred feet above the sea level, also barns, sheds, and a wool house. There are thirteen thousand acres in the island, and fine merino sheep and full blooded Jersey cattle are raised.

Captain Waters married Minnie Richardson Scott, a native of Waban, Mass., and who came to San Francisco in 1861, her death occurring in Santa Barbara January 17, 1890. Captain Waters is a Republican in political affiliation, and is prominent in Masonic circles, having joined that organization in 1864 in Massachusetts, where he was a member of the Meridian Lodge. He is now associated with the Santa Barbara Lodge No. 192, and has been raised to the Royal Arch Masons of San Francisco, and Golden Gate Commandery No. 16. He is a member of the Jonathan Club of San Francisco. Personally he is a typical Massachusetts man who is also a representative Californian, embodying the fine and imposing physique, inspiring health, and strong mentality of the most favored sons of the state of the Pilgrim Fathers.

WARREN LACY WATERS. In the estimation of Mr. Waters the possibilities of the Montecito district offer a strong inducement to all who appreciate the wonderful beauty of nature here unfolded, and who desire a soil which, for undeveloped fertility, has no superior in the state. His own home is a delightful spot in which to live and work out one's expectations, overlooking the sea with its changeful moods, and in view of the Channel Islands. There is plenty of water for irrigation, a fine house offers a comfortable home, and all modern improvements have been instituted for the carrying on of general farming, and in particular lemon growing. The owner of this ranch came here in 1891, and has since bent his efforts to perfect and improve his land, and he hopes in the future to profit by the workings of nature.

An easterner by birth and training, Mr. Waters was born in Hartford, Conn., in 1853, a son of E. W. and A. C. Waters. On the paternal side the family have long been identified with Connecticut, and many of the happenings of historical moment in the early days of the state bear the impress of their achievements. In the dark days of the Revolutionary war there was one Benjamin Waters, who came from Connecticut, and distinguished himself while defending the cause of the oppressed colonists. W. Lacy Waters was educated at Hartford, Conn., and at the National Deaf Mute College, Washington, D. C., from which he was graduated in 1873. He then went to New York City and engaged in various occupations until 1891, when he came to Southern California and bought where he now lives in sight of the ocean.

Through his marriage to Annie Trumbull Isham, May 19, 1891, Mr. Waters became associated with the old Trumbull family of Connecticut, the greatest glory and pride of which was Jonathan Trumbull, at one time governor of Connecticut, and secretary to George Washington. Mr. and Mrs. Waters have no children, but their home is a pleasant one, and they are among the respected and enterprising people of their neighborhood.

THOMAS WEALES. This old settler of Santa Barbara was born in London, England, July 3, 1848, and is a son of Thomas and Alice (Toby) Weales, also natives of London, and members of old families there. In 1850 the family came to America and settled in Brooklyn, N. Y., where the father followed the painter's trade during his remaining active years. At the time of his death he was seventy-five, while his wife was forty-eight when she died. Their only child, Thomas, was reared in Brooklyn and learned the trade of a baker and confectioner, which he followed there for a time. Not meeting with the hoped-for success, in 1870 he came to California, where he believed, under better conditions, he would gain the prosperity he desired. After a year in San Francisco, he came to Santa Barbara in 1871. At once he opened a bakery and confectionery store on State street, and for twenty-five years he was proprietor of the California bakery, at No. 636 State street, being much of that time a partner in the firm of Earley & Weales. At the time he sold out, he was the oldest business man, in one line of business, in the entire city.

The enterprise with which Mr. Weales is now connected, as a member of the firm of Mahon &

B. L. Babler

Weales, is a brick manufacturing business devoted partly to the manufacture of pressed brick and the plant is the largest in Santa Barbara. In return for their energy and wise judgment, the proprietors have gained a prosperity that is truly deserved. While devoting himself to private business affairs, Mr. Weales has not overlooked the needs of his home town, but has always been a friend of local institutions and a believer in a wise and constant system of improvements. Politically he is a staunch Republican. After coming to Santa Barbara he was made a Mason in Lodge No. 192. His marriage took place in San Francisco and united him with Miss Alice Heath, who was born in Brooklyn, N. Y., of English parentage, and is a member of an old family in England.

B. L. BALSLEY. As a practical architect and builder Mr. Balsley has been associated with the growth and development of Santa Monica since 1896 and meantime has superintended the construction of various public buildings and private residences. Mr. Balsley is a descendant in the third generation of a German who settled in Connellsville, Pa., and his father, H. C., was born in that city, going from there to Zanesville, Ohio, where he followed the trade of a cabinet-maker. In 1849 he settled in Marshall, Ill., where he first followed his trade, but later turned to contracting and building. His wife, Hester Ann Smith, was born near Zanesville, Ohio, of a New England family, and is still living at Marshall at a very advanced age, having long survived her husband. They were the parents of ten sons and one daughter. Four sons served in the Civil war, viz.: John H., a contractor of Danville, Ill., who was a member of the Seventy-ninth Illinois Infantry; Francis C., a soldier in an Indiana regiment, who later became a contractor in Illinois and died there; B. L., who was a member of Company I, One Hundred and Thirty-third Indiana Infantry; and J. Henry, who served in the Sixty-second Illinois Infantry and afterward died in Danville, Ill.

In Zanesville, Ohio, B. L. Balsley was born November 22, 1846. He was educated in the public school and academy of Marshall, Ill., and in that town acquired an early knowledge of cabinet-making and carpentering. During May, 1864, he was mustered into the Union service at Indianapolis, Ind., and took part in the battle of Nashville under Thomas. At the expiration of his time he returned to Marshall, where he became foreman for a contractor and builder. Going to Terre Haute, Ind., in 1866, he began the study of architecture under Samuel Reese, with whom he remained for five years, meantime acting as his superintendent of building. On starting out for himself he went to Chrisman, Ill., where he became the principal builder.

Seven subsequent years were spent in Danville, Ill. During 1882 he settled in Fort Scott, Kans., where he built the Inter-State hotel, Perry Van Fossen's building, New Bauer, Klingbiel and Schwin blocks, and scores of residences. Many important contracts were also filled by him in Joplin, Mo., including the drawing of plans for and the building of the Baptist Church, at a cost of $32,000. When he came to California he at once settled in Santa Monica, where he has his home on the corner of Utah and Eleventh streets. Among the residences erected by him in this city are those of W. S. Vauter and George Hutton, while in the line of public buildings the high character of his work is evidenced in Vauter's Bank building.

The marriage of Mr. Balsley took place in Marshall, Ill., and united him with Miss Sophiana Hodges, who was born in Clark county, that state. They are the parents of five children: Martin Edgar, a plumber in Santa Monica; Dr. John Allen, a graduate of the medical department of Northwestern University, Evanston, Ill., and now a professor in that institution; Benjamin Randall, who is engaged in the plumbing business in Santa Monica; Minnie Ellen, and Florence Alice, a successful music teacher in this city. The family attend the Methodist Episcopal Church. In former years Mr. Balsley was quite active in Grand Army affairs and his interest in the organization continues undiminished to the present. While living in Kansas he was initiated into Masonry in the Fort Scott lodge, and is now connected with the blue lodge of Santa Monica. His chapter degree was received in Fort Scott and since coming to California he has held membership in Signet Chapter of Los Angeles. He is also a member of Los Angeles Commandery No. 9, having been made a Knight Templar in Fort Scott, Kans.

REV. SALMON R. WELDON. By the hosts of friends drawn to him by noble characteristics, and by the many business and other associates who profited by his unusual executive and financial ability, Salmon R. Weldon is remembered as one of the representative citizens of Santa Barbara, and one of the truest-hearted gentlemen who ever struggled against the discouraging condition of years of impaired health. Of Puritan-English descent, his ancestors were sea-faring men, and owners of vessels. His father, Jonathan, was born near Barnstable, Mass., and was an educator during the forepart of his life, at one time being principal and owner of an academy at Providence, R. I. Later he became a pioneer of the region around Rockford, Ill., at what is now Winnebago, where he improved a large farm, and where his death occurred at the age of seventy-seven years. His wife, Mary (Davis) Weldon, was born in New England, and was of Welsh descent.

Born at Keene, N. H., December 3, 1823, Salmon R. Weldon was reared after his twelfth year on his father's farm near Rockford, Ill., and was educated at Jubilee College, in Illinois. His earliest aspirations were toward the ministry of the Episcopal church, and his theological training was acquired at Gambier, Knox county, Ohio, after which he was ordained in Chicago by Bishop Whitehouse. For seven years he was rector of the Zion church, at Freeport, Ill., and then, owing to failing health, became rector of Saint Paul's church, built by Jay Cook, at Put-In-Bay, Ohio. His efforts were there handicapped by physical disability, and at the end of four years he came to California, hoping to benefit by the delightful climate and the change, but was never after able to realize his expectations of doing good in the church. He nevertheless did a great deal of missionary work which was less arduous than the responsibility of a church, and in 1872 located in Santa Barbara, where he continued for a time his ministrations. His death occurred May 31, 1887.

Mr. Weldon's advice was a boon to all who hesitated on the brink of some important undertaking, for his keen insight, comprehensive grasp of all sides of a question, and ability to gauge the ultimate result were truly startling in correctness. Not the least of his power was the sterling integrity which influenced all of his decisions, and which actuated all of his undertakings in life. In Santa Barbara he was one of the prime organizers and vice-president of the Santa Barbara County National Bank, and he was also interested in and vice-president of the First National Bank. With Mr. Calkins he bought a ranch of two thousand acres in Ventura county, about five miles from Ventura, which is one of the finest cattle ranches for miles around. His extreme youth had also its compensations, for while on the farm in Illinois he patented the first seeder ever invented; the patent, however, rests with Mr. Gorham, for, after the improvement of his health and his return to the ministry, he left to that gentleman the management of the patent and its manufacture. It has since been known as the Gorham seeder, and has been extensively used.

At Winnebago, Ill., Mr. Weldon married, January 1, 1853, H. Loraine Gorham, who was born in Rutland, Vt., a daughter of Alonzo Gorham, also of Vermont. The paternal great-grandfather, Seth Gorham, was born in Connecticut, and settled in Vermont after his service in the Revolutionary war. The mother of Mrs. Weldon was formerly Mercy Humphrey, of Vermont, the member of an English family who early settled in New Hampshire and later in Vermont. The parents were pioneers of Winnebago, Ill., and both died in the state of their adoption.

Mrs. Weldon was one of the first pupils of the Rockford Female Seminary (now college). To Mr. and Mrs. Weldon were born two children, now living, W. R. H., who is a business man of Santa Barbara, and Jane A., also a resident of Santa Barbara.

NAOMI WHEELAN. The advance along all lines of endeavor to meet the demand created by the multiplicity of tastes represented in even small communities, has not found the artistic instinct in the west undeveloped, or indifferent as to its place among refining and progressive influences. Practical and at the same time graceful and beautiful effects are evolved from the artistic faculties of many who recognize the need of straying from beaten paths if necessary, to draw the attention, by force of the unique and satisfying, from the hardening and depressing commercialism of the time. Miss Wheelan has been one of those who recognize the power and utility of things interesting and pleasing to the eye, and while the particular groove in which she accomplishes her mission is not original with herself, she is nevertheless the first to manufacture and introduce art work in burnt leather to the residents of Santa Barbara, and her studio opposite the Arlington on State street has samples galore of the best possible procurable effects in this now justly popular and much demanded novelty. It is doubtful if any in the country have attained to higher excellence along this line, or meet with a more gratifying appreciation. Under Miss Wheelan's skillful management a wholesale as well as retail business is carried on, and her productions are in demand from one end of the state to the other. This is a particularly creditable and worthy showing, as it was as late as 1898 before the artistic project was formulated and put into execution.

The family to which Miss Wheelan belongs on both sides were prominently connected with the city and surrounding country of New Orleans, La., to which region her father, Hon. Peter Wheelan, emigrated from Ireland with his parents when nineteen years of age. He was there engaged in the foundry and machine business, but in 1850 came to California, via Panama, and was for several years interested in mining. To a helpful extent he was instrumental in starting some entirely new enterprises in the west, and among his other accomplishments was the putting up of the Alta Press, and the erection of the Wheelan Flour Mills, the first manufacturing flour mill in San Francisco. He is now with the Southern Pacific Milling Company, of San Francisco. As a staunch and uncompromising Democrat, he has held several responsible political positions, among others being those of supervisor and state legislator, the latter office having been held for two terms.

On the maternal side Miss Wheelan is of German descent and is by inheritance connected with the aristocracy and nobility of the empire. Her mother, Catherine Frances Baker, was born in New Orleans, a daughter of John Henry Baker, a large planter of Louisiana, and who came to California in 1856. They located on and named Baker's Beach, where John Henry Baker farmed one hundred and eighteen acres of land until the latter part of 1856. Mrs. Wheelan's grandmother was a Von Sitler, wife of Count Von Sitler, a man of many millions, and a most eccentric nobleman. A firm adherent of the Catholic faith, he would brook no departure from his belief on the part of any member of his family, and when his sons disregarded his wishes and followed the leadings of conscience to the Protestant church, he retaliated by loaning all of his money to the German government for ninety-nine years. The time limit of the loan expired in 1856, and, the baron's vengeance accomplished, steps are now being taken to divide the property among the rightful heirs, of whom Miss Wheelan is one. Mrs. Wheelan did not live to profit by the distribution of the baronial gold, but died in Santa Barbara in 1893, leaving two children, of whom Miss Naomi is the younger, the son being F. H. Wheelan.

A native of San Francisco, Miss Wheelan is a graduate of the Mills Seminary, and in 1890 came to Santa Barbara with her mother, and bought a ranch of twelve acres in Montecito, known as the Casa del Mar, or House by the Sea, which still remains in her possession. In 1898 she started in the burnt leather industry, since which has followed her fine and uninterrupted success. Miss Wheelan has hosts of friends in Santa Barbara, and possesses the faculty of making and retaining friendships wherever she might elect to live.

HON. B. T. WILLIAMS. So long ago that no record has been kept of his emigration, an ancestor named Williams departed from the home of his forefathers in Wales and, it is supposed, settled in Virginia. When the yoke of English tyranny became intolerable to the colonists, some of his descendants bravely shouldered the musket and followed the martial fortunes of Washington through Valley Forge and the Revolutionary war. The great-grandfather, Thomas, went from Virginia to Kentucky with Daniel Boone, and in the Blue Grass state the paternal grandfather, another Thomas, was born, and eventually married Nancy Boone, a niece of the great Indian fighter. The grandfather, Thomas, was one of the foremost early educators of Kentucky, and for more than thirty years held the chair of mathematics in the University of Kentucky. He was a graduate of the College of Virginia, and thirteen of his sons graduated from the Kentucky institution which so profited by his years of tireless service.

Dr. J. S. Williams, the father of Judge Williams, was born in Pemberton county, Ky., and received his general and medical education in the University of Kentucky. He subsequently located in Chillicothe, Mo., and in Scotland county, that state, married Amanda M. Downing, a native of Virginia, and daughter of Henry Downing of Virginia, one of the early settlers of Scotland county. He continued his medical practice in Missouri until 1853, when, with his wife and six children, of whom Judge Williams was the youngest, he came overland to California with ox teams, via the Platte and Humboldt route, to Placerville, and located in Santa Rosa, Sonoma county. He worked up a good practice in the west, and was equally successful in Santa Rosa and in San Diego to which he removed in 1869, and where his death occurred in 1880, at the age of seventy years. His wife, who was the mother of seven children, four of whom are living, died in Santa Barbara in 1898. Of the two sons born to her, William Thomas attained to distinction as a member of the California bar, was ex-district attorney of Santa Barbara, and was said to be the most lucid and forceful prosecutor that Los Angeles county has known. His professional services in California covered a period of thirty-four years, and his death occurred in July of 1900, while still maintaining his office of assistant district attorney of Los Angeles county. Of the daughters of the Williams family three are living in California and one resides in Texas.

Judge Williams was born in Mount Vernon, Mo., December 25, 1850, and was educated in the public schools and graduated from the academy of Santa Rosa. His preliminary knowledge of law was acquired in the office of Judge William Ross, of Santa Rosa, and he was admitted to the bar in Sacramento in 1871. As the first practicing lawyer in Ventura, he sprang into rapid prominence, and in 1873 was elected district attorney, and re-elected in 1875, after which he resumed a general practice. In 1884 he was elected judge of the superior court of Ventura county, his re-election following in 1890 and in 1896, the opposing Democratic party failing to make any nomination against him. Possessed of a clear-cut logical mind, stored with the most exhaustive legal lore, he has impressed his practical erudition upon the law history of this county, and has gained a reputation for equitable rulings, just decisions, and a thorough adaptation to the requirements and amenities of a great profession. Not less impressive than his mental acquirements is a physical development the harmonious proportions of which carry out the Greek idea of reflection between the material and the intellectual, a blending of forces, neither of which is overshadowed by the other. Six feet six inches in height, and weighing nearly three hundred pounds, he is an expression of health, correct living, and high thinking, and withal one of the most genial and approachable of gentlemen.

The delightful home of Judge Williams is graciously presided over by Mrs. Williams, whom he married in Santa Barbara, and who was formerly Irene Parsons, a native of San José, and daughter of Jacob Parsons, who came from Illinois to California during the days of 1849. Mrs. Williams is a graduate of the San José Normal, and has engaged in extended educational work. Of the children born to Judge and Mrs. Williams five are now living: John T., who is a graduate of the Hastings Law School and is now practicing in San Francisco; Irene, who is a graduate of the Los Angeles Normal, class of 1901, and now engaged in teaching; Paul, Kate, and Benneta. Judge Williams became a Mason in Los Angeles, and is now a member and past master of Ventura Lodge No. 214, and Chapter No. 50, R. A. M. He is also a member of the Knights of Pythias, the Independent Order of Foresters, and the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks.

P. J. WILSON. Were any additional proof necessary to convince the citizens of Los Angeles of the large hearted and disinterested enterprise which animates the career of Mr. Wilson, it would be readily found in his splendid service to the city as supervisor of the fourth district. Since he assumed control of his office in January of 1901, subsequent to his election on the Republican ticket in the fall of 1900, after a hard fight with five other candidates, and an overwhelming majority of twelve hundred, he has steadily advanced the best interests of his district, and is constantly improving upon previous methods of management. Foremost among the noticeable advancements is his idea of oil sprinkling of the roads, the patent sprinkler for the same owing its origin to the inventive talent of himself and J. W. Earle. The machine is operated something like the regulation water sprinkler, water being substituted by the more lasting and satisfactory oil, and the roads the following day are gone over with the harrow. This process is continued during April, May and June, and the results have more than justified the expectations of the promoters of the innovation. As chairman of the county farm committee, he has devoted his administration to saving the county money, and to placing it where the best possible results may be achieved. In other ways also Mr. Wilson has served the Republican party, and he has been a delegate to various conventions ever since he came to California, and is an ex-member of the county committee. As a politician of the broad and liberal sort, he has never used as a means of personal advancement at the expense of public interest, the various offices to which his ability has called him, and he enjoys to an exceptional degree the confidence of the community at large.

A native of Caledonia, Columbia county, Wis., Mr. Wilson was born January 26, 1859, and is a son of James Wilson, who was born in Glasgow, Scotland, and came to America with his father, another James, who located in Decorah, Columbia county, Wis. The grandfather Wilson is remembered as one of the most helpful and earnest of the Wisconsin pioneers, who unflinchingly faced the dangers and vicissitudes of the forests, in the midst of which he hewed himself a farm and reared a family to years of usefulness and success. On Tolan creek, on the old state plank road, he built and managed the Wilson hotel, long one of the hospitable inns in the then wild country. The latter years of his life, however, were spent in comparative retirement at Poyette, Wis., where his death occurred. James Wilson, the father of P. J., was a very prominent man in Wisconsin, the greater part of his life being spent in the vicinity of Lodi, where he had a large farm and raised short-horn cattle, and engaged in general farming. The last four years of his life were spent in California, although his death occurred in Wisconsin June 7, 1900, while on a visit to the former scene of his activity. He was a Presbyterian in religion, and a man of extended moral influence in the business walks of life. As a Republican he took an active interest in the party undertakings of his neighborhood and for sixteen consecutive years was commissioner of Columbia county, and chairman all of that time. He married Isabella McKenzie, a native of Aberdeen, Scotland, a daughter of Peter McKenzie, one of the early settlers of Decorah, Wis., where he died at the age of seventy-five years. His wife, who died in 1888, was the mother of four sons and three daughters, four of whom are now living: James P., who is an attorney at Leadville, S. D.; P. J.; S. W., who is with the United Wholesale Grocery Company of Los Angeles; and W. J., who has charge of P. J.'s mercantile business.

Mr. Wilson was educated at the public schools of Lodi, Wis., and after graduating from the high school, assisted his father in the management of the home farm. At the time he was the oldest child at home, and he remained there until his removal to California in 1884, being the first of the family to come west. In Los Angeles he secured a position as foreman of the Park Station warehouse, and was subsequently superintendent of the same for six years, a position which he resigned to engage in the mercantile business at what was then Park, but which is now University Station, at the junction of Vermont and McClintock streets. Here he built the first store in the neighborhood and started the general merchandise business in which he has since been engaged. He also built a residence at the point, and at the time there was but one car line running there, an old horse car making a leisurely trip about once an hour. The locality is now visited by three of the best lines in the city, and general business activity has correspondingly increased. He also became interested in starting the Union public schools, and was one of the first board of trustees who secured the erection of the eight-room house, which marked the beginning of what is now the banner district of the city.

In Los Angeles Mr. Wilson married Carrie M. Barrows, who was born in Connecticut, and is a daughter of J. A. Barrows, one of the pioneer hardware merchants of Los Angeles, and at present retired. Mrs. Barrows, who was educated in Los Angeles, is the mother of two children, Hazel J. and Juanita.

J. SALTER. It was the privilege of Mr. Salter to spend his boyhood years upon the Isle of Wight, where he was born. Thus he had the advantage of a climate and scenery scarcely surpassed by California itself. Indeed, within the very narrow limits of the island he found all kinds of scenery in miniature, with an environment so attractive that it remained, until her death, the favorite home of Queen Victoria. Born in 1852, he was twelve years of age when apprenticed to the builder's trade, and under the supervision of expert masters acquired a thorough knowledge of stonemason work and carpentering. Seven years were spent as an apprentice, at the expiration of which time he was qualified to engage at the trade for himself, and accordingly proceeded to London, where he remained about three years. Returning to his native island, he took up contracting and building. However, the island was too small to afford constant employment of the nature he desired, and he therefore determined to seek work in the United States. During 1888 he crossed the ocean to New York and the continent to California, settling in Pasadena.

As is generally known, the boom had faded at that time and the reaction that set in threw hundreds out of work, crippling business of all kinds. Around Pasadena alone five hundred men were idle, anxious for work of any kind. It seems, therefore, under these circumstances, remarkably fortunate that Mr. Salter was able to secure employment within two weeks after his arrival, and it is surely noteworthy that from that time to the present he has been kept steadily busy at contracting in general mason work. Among the contracts he has filled may be mentioned those for the Gill and Iver houses, and the residences of Walter Watkins and Mrs. James Smith. Giving his attention closely to his chosen occupation, he finds no time for participation in politics, and is not connected with any fraternal organizations except the Woodmen of the World. In religious views he is a Presbyterian. The residence which he built on Waverly Drive is presided over by Mrs. Salter, who was Miss Hannah Jane Harvey, a native of the Isle of Wight. They have two daughters: Mrs. Ellen Jane Tyler, of Pasadena; and Kate Anne, who is at home.

GEORGE M. WILLIAMS. The six hundred acres of land owned by that enterprising agriculturist, George M. Williams, has been utilized by him in about all of the ways possible in this wonderful part of the state. His undoubted success and land holdings are quite remarkable when it is known that he started with practically nothing but a supply of inexhaustible grit and determination, and patiently awaited the reward of his labors. His property is distributed in different parts of the county, at Goleta and elsewhere, one hundred acres comprising the home place near Santa Barbara. The orchard contains one hundred and fifty acres, and here are raised apricots, peaches, walnuts, besides a vineyard which covers twelve acres. He has a fine house, and a barn 58x70 feet in dimensions, and all modern improvements aid in the carrying on of his enterprises. On one of his farms north of Goleta irrigation is accomplished from an exhaustless spring, that in winter and summer continues to pour forth its crystal clear water. The situation of the farm three miles from town is convenient, as Mr. Williams markets all of his fruit and garden truck at Santa Barbara. He makes a specialty of beans, of which he has a uniformly excellent crop.

In 1872, in Santa Barbara, Mr. Williams was united in marriage with Eliza Towne, a native of California, and of this union the following children were born: Georgie, Mary, Fannie, Birdie, Edith, James G., and Charles. Mr. Williams votes with the Democratic party, but he believes in voting for the best men and measures regardless of party. He is fraternally associated with the Masons at Santa Barbara, with the Odd Fellows and the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks.

ROYAL WISWELL. So long ago that no authentic record has been kept of their emigration, the Wiswell family settled in Vermont, where was born the paternal great-grandfather, Samuel, who courageously espoused the cause of the colonists and bravely fought for their release from British tyranny. The son of the Revolutionary hero, the paternal grandfather, was also born in Vermont, as was John Wiswell, the father, who married Ada Willard.

The earliest youth of Royal Wiswell was spent in southern Vermont, where he was born September 2, 1815. He was reared on his father's farm on the Connecticut river, and attended the early subscription schools. In 1839 he removed with his mother and the rest of the family to Illinois, locating in Knox county, where the mother died in Galesburg at the advanced age of ninety-nine years and fourteen days. After his mother's death, Mr. Wiswell became a farmer in Warren county, and extensively raised stock and general produce. In the fall of 1879 he left the farm in charge of his son and removed to Galesburg, where he lived in practical retirement. In the spring of 1886 he decided to benefit by the splendid climate of California, and after a few years of residence in Carpinteria located on a small ranch of thirteen acres near by, which has since been his home. Though not engaged in business affairs, he attends to the management of his ranch, which is well improved and put out in walnuts and general fruits. He has erected a beautiful home, and enjoys to the fullest extent his horticultural pursuits, and the peaceful success which is his after years of anxious toil.

In 1844 Mr. Wiswell married Julia Burgess, who died in 1864, leaving five children, three of whom are living: Ada, who is the wife of Ray Boydston; Newell, who is a farmer in Kansas; and Rose, who is the wife of Zac Lescher. The second wife of Mr. Wiswell was formerly Mrs. Sarah (Wood) Moore, who died after coming to California. In 1890 Mr. Wiswell married Mrs. Malinda (Burton) Kelly, who, through her marriage with Mr. Kelly, had nine children, of whom Mrs. Elizabeth Sutton resides in Summerland and William Kelly in Carpinteria. In politics Mr. Wiswell is a Republican, but has never desired official recognition.

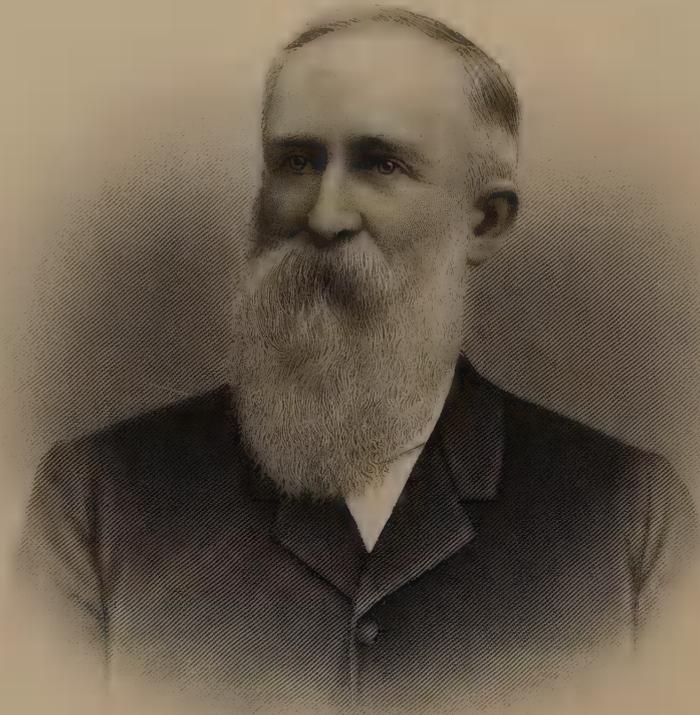

HARRY WOOD. For fully nine hundred years the Wood forefathers have been born and reared, and have lived their busy lives and passed to their reward in the town of Knutsford, Cheshire, England. Without exception, the male members of the family have followed the occupation of iron manufacturing, the paternal grandfather, Thomas, having been particularly active and successful. Knutsford was also the birthplace of John Wood, the father of Harry, who had a large machine shop and foundry, and manufactured iron and agricultural and other implements. He died in England in September of 1899. The mother, Sarah (Hope) Wood, was born in Knutsford, a daughter of Major Hope, who followed the occupation of general merchant. Mrs. Wood, who died in England in 1868, was the mother of seven children, four now living.

The oldest in his father's family, Harry Wood was born in Knutsford June 1, 1856, and was educated in the public schools. From a small boy he learned the trade of machinist, determined to sustain the family reputation for excellent work. Nevertheless, seafaring ambitions were strongly commingled with those of mechanics, and in 1873 he put out to sea as one of the engineering crew of the Allen Line Steamship Company, and in this capacity crossed the Atlantic, and went to Portland, Me., Montreal and Quebec. For four years he continued with the steamship line as second assistant under Chief Engineer Rankin, one of the finest engineers that ever manipulated an engine. This training was of immense benefit to him in innumerable ways, and admirably fitted him for taking charge of his father's business in Knutsford, which he did for two years, or until his immigration to America in 1877. In the United States he located in Detroit, Mich., where he was employed as machinist for different works, thence going to Fort Wayne, Ind., where he worked in the machinery department of the Bass Manufacturing Company's works. He then went south to Tennessee, and later to Dallas, Tex., as chief engineer for the American Cotton Oil Company, and during the four years of his superintendency he managed to build up their works and increase their business. Upon tendering his resignation in 1889 he received the highest recommendations from the firm. Before leaving Dallas he spent nine months building up the electric and steam apparatus of Sanger Brothers' store, which concern covers a whole block. This firm also gave him excellent testimonials which, while thoroughly merited, were particularly pleasing because of the satisfaction which their appreciation gave him.

Mr. Wood went to Seattle, Wash., from Dallas, Tex., and there put in the machinery for the Union Trunk Line, and for the Home Electric Company, with which latter concern he was chief engineer for a year, after which he was with the Domestic Heat, Light and Power Company as chief engineer for over a year, or until his removal to Santa Barbara in 1896. Here he was employed by the Pacific Surety Company to overhaul and rebuild the plant at the Arlington Hotel, a process which required five months, and then he was with the Consolidated Electric Company, of Santa Barbara, as chief engineer and electrician, to build their plant and put in the machinery and electrical apparatus. He also superintended the construction of the line, put in the engines and boilers and started the plant, continuing later in his capacity as chief engineer until February of 1899, when he resigned to engage in business for himself. He has thoroughly up-to-date machine works, with all modern appliances, located at No. 19 East Cota street, and it is needless to say that after all of his responsible experience he is one of the best manipulators of mechanical and electrical devices in the state.

Mrs. Wood was formerly Miss M. A. Thompson, of New York, and a native of Ireland. She is the mother of six children, now living: Helen M., Ada May, Harry Elmo, William Hope, Charles David and Mary Elizabeth. Mr. Wood is a Republican in political affiliation, and is fraternally connected with the Knights of Pythias, the Elks, of which he is a charter member in Santa Barbara, and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. He is a member of the National Association of Stationary Engineers, Santa Barbara Lodge No. 5. In religious belief he is an Episcopalian.

WILLIAM H. SPURGEON. The family represented by Mr. Spurgeon, of Santa Ana, has been identified with American history for several generations, and is of English extraction. During the residence of Granville and Lovina Spurgeon in Henry county, Ky., their son, William H., was born October 10, 1829. When a mere infant he was taken to Indiana and thence, in 1840, accompanied the family to Missouri, where he was reared. At the age of fifteen he became a clerk in a mercantile store at Alexandria, Mo., where he was employed for several years. Shortly after the discovery of gold in California, he came to the far west. During much of the four years that he spent in California, he was employed in the gold mines of the Sisqua mountains in the northwestern part of the state, in which enterprise he was successful. In 1856 he made the homeward voyage via Panama, on shipboard to New York City, and thence to Missouri. The year after his return home he became connected with a mercantile business at Athens, Mo., where he remained several years.

The second journey made by Mr. Spurgeon to California was in 1865, when he accompanied his father and other members of the family across the plains to Napa county, Cal. In 1867 he went to Los Angeles and during his brief residence there his wife, Martha (Moreland) Spurgeon, a native of Kentucky, died. Shortly afterward he returned to Clark county, Mo., and from there, in 1869, came to Santa Ana, Cal. On arriving for the third time in California, he purchased seventy-six acres of the old Santiago de Santa Ana grant, a Spanish grant which originally contained sixty-two thousand acres. Immediately after buying the tract, Mr. Spurgeon proceeded to lay out the town of Santa Ana, employing for this purpose Mr. Wright, a well-known surveyor and civil engineer. The name which the town bears was given it by Mr. Spurgeon in honor of the old grant. Later in the same year, 1869, he built a small house of redwood and in this he opened a general store. In addition to his other interests, for a series of years he acted as agent at Santa Ana for the Wells-Fargo Express Company. For some years he also filled the office of postmaster. After the incorporation of Santa Ana as a city, he was chosen a member of the first board of trustees and served as president of the board.

The Democratic party has always had a staunch adherent in Mr. Spurgeon, and he has been chosen by his party to occupy various posts of honor and trust. Notable in his life-history was his service as a member of the twenty-seventh session of the California state assembly, where he represented his section of Los Angeles county (Orange county at that time having not been organized). For one term he served as a supervisor before the partition of Orange county, and after the organization of this county he was again elected supervisor, during this term serving as chairman of the board.

Mr. Spurgeon married Miss Jennie English, a native of Missouri. Five children were born of their union, namely: Grace; Lottie, who is deceased; Mary; William H., Jr.; and Robert G. The two surviving daughters and both sons make their home in Santa Ana.

THOMAS D. WOOD. While making his home in Santa Barbara, Mr. Wood has become prominent as a manipulator of oil at Summerland and as president, treasurer and manager of the Duquesne Oil Company. He comes of a family for many years identified with the largest iron manufacturing concerns in Pennsylvania. In McKeesport, Allegheny county, Pa., he was born July 13, 1857, being a son of W. Dewees and Rosalind (Gilpin) Wood, natives respectively of Pennsylvania and Delaware. The mother was a daughter of Richard B. and Ann (Porter) Gilpin, Quakers in religious belief, and among her relatives was ex-Governor Gilpin of Colorado, a cousin. Pronouncedly Quaker have been the members of the Wood family in America, the emigrating ancestor having been James Wood, who came from England about 1735, at the time of William Penn, and was a worthy follower of this famous colonist. The great-grandfather, James Wood, a large manufacturer of sheet iron, was the first to manufacture imitation Russian sheet iron, his process having been later perfected by his grandson, W. Dewees Wood. This early manufactory was at Conshohocken, near which town the paternal grandfather, Alan Wood, was born. In time the latter followed in his father's footsteps as to occupation.

W. Dewees Wood did not depart from the example set by his father and grandfather, but rather sought to excel them in the manufacture of iron. However, the scene of his activity was shifted from Conshohocken to McKeesport, Pa., where he founded the W. Dewees Wood Company and carried on a large business. The firm with which he was connected has since been merged into the United States Steel Corporation. At the time of his death in 1899, he was seventy-two years of age. His wife (mother of T. D. Wood) died in Pittsburg in 1883. They are survived by four sons and three daughters, Thomas D. being the fourth. Two of the sons, Richard and Alan W., live in Pittsburg, while George W. is in Denver, Colo.

The education of Thomas D. Wood was acquired in McKeesport and at the Western University of Pennsylvania in Pittsburg, from which he was graduated in 1876, with the degree of Ph. B. He then entered Cornell University for a special course in chemistry, preparatory to engaging in the iron business in which he achieved marked success. As a member of his father's firm, that of W. Dewees Wood Company, he became also a director and the superintendent, holding the latter responsible position for nineteen years. Finally, on account of his wife's health, he resigned his position in 1896 and came to California, which state he had visited two years before. While living in Pittsburg he married Mary Craige, who was born in Pennsylvania, and is the mother of five children.

The Duquesne Oil Company, of which Mr. Wood is president, treasurer and manager, and R. H. Herron, of Los Angeles, vice-president, is one of the largest oil concerns at Summerland, has twenty-seven wells, and is ranked among the most prominent companies now developing oil in that section. In his home city Mr. Wood is identified with various social organizations and is a member of the Santa Barbara Chamber of Commerce. He is a member of the American Institute of Mining Engineers, fraternally is connected with the Royal Arcanum and the Masonic order, and in politics gives his support to the Republican party.

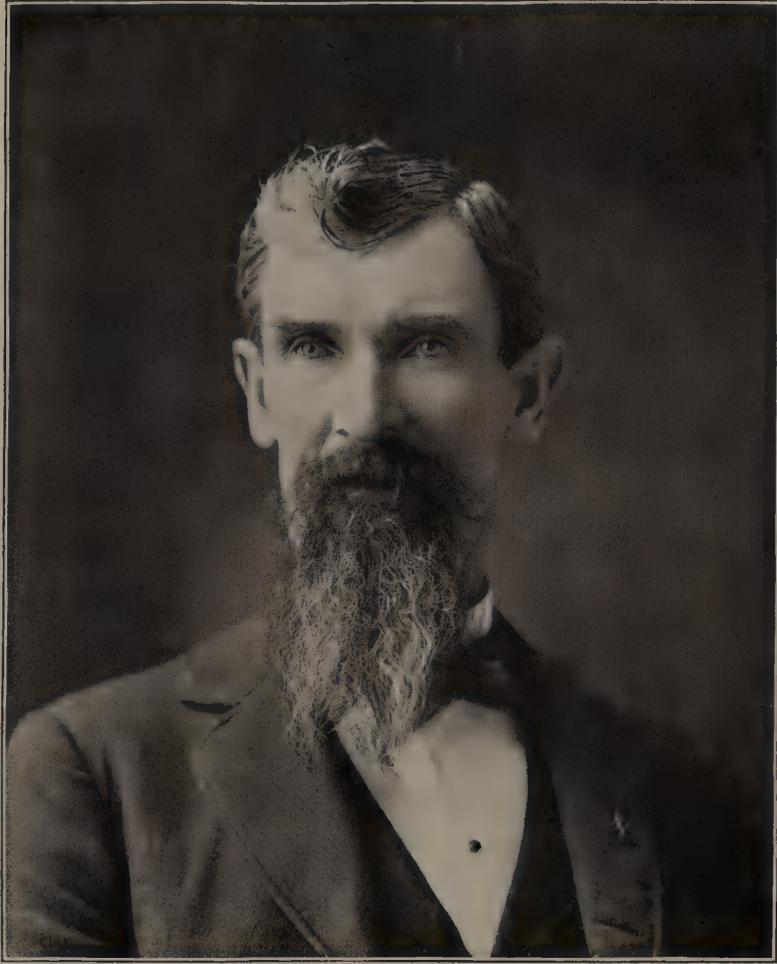

HON. H. A. BROUGHTON, LL. B. From an early period in the history of New England the Broughton family has been identified with its growth and history. Dr. Amos W. Broughton was a native of Vermont, but early in life removed to New York and afterward made his home in Tonawanda. He was a graduate of homeopathy and adhered to that school of medicine through all the years of his professional activity. His son, William Wallace Broughton, was born and reared in Tonawanda, and inherited the high mental endowments of the race, his talents evincing themselves particularly in the line of journalism. In 1875 he founded the Lompoc Record, of which he has since been the editor. In addition, he organized the Lompoc Temperance Colony and was instrumental in drawing many permanent residents to that valley. Elsewhere in this volume appears a sketch of his life, and further mention of the family may be found in the biography of George A. Broughton, M. D., of Oxnard, who is one of his sons.

The wife of William Wallace Broughton was born in Fort Wayne, Ind., and in 1856, when eight years of age, crossed the plains with her father, George Anthony, who was a native of Saratoga, N. Y., and a blacksmith and machinist. He was an own cousin of Susan B. Anthony and also of Colonel Anthony, one of the pioneers of Leavenworth, Kans. After establishing his home in California, he engaged in the manufacture of lumber and also became a pioneer machinist of Santa Cruz, where he was afterward an influential citizen. His father, Asa Anthony, was a native of New England and became a farmer in New York. The family is of Quaker descent.

The eldest of eight living children, Howard A. Broughton was born in Santa Cruz, Cal., October 6, 1863. When twelve years of age he accompanied the family to Lompoc. At the age of eighteen he began to teach in the school where he had been a pupil, and for three and one-half years continued there, saving his earnings to pay his tuition in college. He then took the regular law course in Hastings College of Law, University of California, from which he was graduated in 1888, with the degree of LL. B. One of his preceptors while at that institution was Hon. A. A. Sargent, ex-United States senator and ex-minister to Germany, and during that time he had the privilege of acting as Mr. Sargent's private secretary. After graduating he assisted his father and also engaged in practice in Santa Barbara county until 1891, when he removed to Pomona and has since carried on practice in this city. Besides his private practice, he acts as attorney for the First National Bank, the Kingsley Tract Water Company and the Chino Rancho Company. After coming to this city he married Miss Jennie L. Means, who was born at Grand Island, Neb., and received her education at Brownell Hall, Omaha.

The Republican party has no member more staunch in his allegiance to its principles than is Mr. Broughton, and his high standing is indicated by his service as a member of the state central committee. It was also proved, in 1900, by his election as representative of the seventy-first district in the legislature, at which time he received the largest majority ever given in the district. During the legislative session of 1901 he was chairman of the committee on corporations and a member of various other committees. Among the measures which he supported especial mention belongs to the franchise bill providing for the sale of municipal franchises. At the time there was much discussion and dispute as to the merits of this bill and it was bitterly opposed by some, but its wisdom has since become apparent to all. The feature of the bill which merits especial praise is the sale of the franchise to the highest bidder, together with the return to the city, after five years, of two per cent of the gross proceeds. Another legislative enactment in which he was interested was the passage of the architects' bill, which established a state board of architects and provided for an examination of all seeking to enter this occupation.

In the Unitarian Church of Pomona Mr. Broughton is a member of the board of trustees. Two prominent organizations of Los Angeles (the Union League and University Clubs) number him among their members. He was made a Mason in Lompoc Lodge, F. & A. M. After coming to Pomona he assisted in organizing Pomona Parlor No. 174, Native Sons of the Golden West, of which he has since officiated as president. He is also connected with the Woodmen of the World, the lodge and encampment of Odd Fellows, and is the first exalted ruler of the newly organized Lodge of Benevolent Protective Order of Elks at Pomona.

HON. A. J. BELL. The family represented by Mr. Bell of Ventura was founded in the United States by his father, Andrew, a native of County Donegal, north of Ireland, who settled in Philadelphia at fourteen years of age and served an apprenticeship to the glass-blower's trade. That occupation he subsequently followed in the same city. During the Seminole war he served in Florida under Gen. Zachary Taylor. When the discovery of gold in California led thousands of ambitious men to the far west, he crossed the plains with an ox-train from Independence, Mo., and engaged in mining on the American river for four years, thence returning to Kansas across the plains. He did not again see California until 1884, when the "iron horse" brought him over the broad stretches of country to a land that bore little resemblance to the scenes of the thrilling experiences of early days. While living in Philadelphia, he married Eleanor Baxter, also a native of County Donegal, and of Scotch descent. She came to America with her father, Robert Baxter, a tanner and currier, who settled in Wilmington, Del. In 1860 she was killed in Norristown, Pa., by being accidentally run over by the cars. Of her four children that attained mature years, three are living, A. J., being the only son and the only member of the family in California.

The early years of A. J. Bell's life were passed in Pennsylvania. He was born in Philadelphia March 15, 1848, and grew to manhood in Norristown. The death of his mother threw him upon his own resources and he secured employment on a dairy farm, later worked on the Schuylkill canal between New York and Philadelphia. At the first call for volunteers, he was ready to respond, and notwithstanding his extreme youth, he was accepted. September 16, 1861, he became a member of Company C, Fifty-first Pennsylvania Infantry, which was mustered in at Harrisburg, Colonel Hartranft commanding. Among the battles in which he participated were the following: Roanoke Island, N. C., in February, 1862; Newberne, N. C., Camden, N. C., second battle of Bull Run; Chantilly, Va.; South Mountain, Md.; Antietam, Md.; Fredericksburg, Va.; Chancellorsville, Va.; thence transferred to the western army, and taking part in the battles of Vicksburg and Jackson; afterward ordered back to the army of the Potomac, and dispatched from Cincinnati to Lexington, Ky., and thence to Cumberland Gap. Afterward, at Knoxville, Tenn., his command was besieged for two months by Longstreet, and he was in engagements at that place and Campbell Station and Leonore Station. January 1, 1864, he veteranized, and after a furlough of thirty days returned to the army of the Potomac, after which he was in the battles of the Wilderness, Spottsylvania and North Anna. In the engagement at Cold Harbor, June 3, 1864, he was captured, and after two weeks at Libby prison was taken to Andersonville, where he remained until November 29, and was then paroled with ten thousand sick and wounded. His capture was only after a desperate struggle, indicative of the brave spirit of the man. He had been ordered to hold a certain position at all hazards. With a little band, he remained there all night and until 1:30 in the afternoon of the next day. Finally, only six men were left in the company, and they fell into the hands of the enemy, he being the last of the six to succumb. Three of the number escaped from Andersonville.

Under a general order in March, 1865, Mr. Bell was honorably discharged from the volunteer service. On the 17th of the same month he volunteered in Hancock's Veteran Reserve Corps, Fifth United States Volunteers, Company A, and was sent to the plains, being stationed successively at Forts Leavenworth, Kern, Julesburg, Collins, Hallock, Kearney, guarding overland trains and keeping back the Indians. Meantime he took part in various fights with the red men. October 11, 1866, he was mustered out at Fort Kearney, after a service of five years and two months. Returning on a construction train to Omaha, he there took a steamboat, and from St. Joe traveled by rail to St. Louis, and thence to Philadelphia.

After some years in farm pursuits in Montgomery county, Pa., in 1872, Mr. Bell went to St. Louis. The next year he was married at Pleasant Hill, after which he farmed in Cass county, Mo. In 1875 he came to California and bought land in the Santa Ana valley which is tributary to the Ojai valley, which he improved. From there, in 1886, he moved to Los Posas, and continued farm pursuits until his election as tax collector, when he moved to Ventura in the spring of 1893 and built a residence on Harrison avenue. His first election as tax collector was in the fall of 1892, when he received one hundred and fifty-three majority. In 1894 he was re-elected, for a term of four years, receiving a majority of six hundred and fifty. His majority, in 1898, was one thousand over the fusion ticket and was the largest majority ever received by any candidate for a county office. His present term will expire in 1903. For years he has been a Republican leader, a member of the county committee and a frequent delegate to state conventions. In 1900 he was elected a delegate from the Sixth Congressional district to the National Republican convention in Philadelphia, and at that memorable meeting was appointed a member of the committee that went to Washington and presented President McKinley with a gold badge.

After coming to California Mr. Bell was made a Mason in Lodge No. 214 at Ventura. He is past officer in the lodge and encampment of Odd Fellows, holds membership with the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks at Santa Barbara, and is a member of the Society of the Army of the Potomac. In the organization of the Southern California Veteran's Association he was an active factor and has since served as its commander. A member of Cushing Post No. 44, G. A. R., of Ventura, he is its past commander, and has acted as aide to different department commanders, being now on the staff of General Mott, and past mustering officer, department of California. When the Spanish-American war broke out, his old zeal and enthusiasm was at once aroused. He wrote to the secretary of war, tendering his services in any capacity whatever, no matter how humble. In reply he received a very cordial, pleasant letter, calling attention to his past services for the government, but stating that the quota for the war was already more than filled, and hence his services could not be utilized.

By the marriage of Mr. Bell to Miss Rachel Fox, a native of Knox county, Mo., there were born six children, namely: Lewis Albert, of Ventura; Eliza Eleanor, an assistant in Mr. Bell's office; Zeletta Edith, now in Colorado; Lorenzo D., Grover and Ruby.

F. DE WITT CRANK, M. D. Of the physicians now engaged in practice at Pomona none has been connected with the professional life of the city for a longer period than has Dr. Crank, whose residence here dates from December of 1883. During the long period that has since elapsed he has gained a reputation for broad professional knowledge, an ability to trace disease to its remote and often hidden cause and a wise discrimination in the selection of remedial agencies for the treatment of varying troubles to which the flesh is heir. After coming here until 1885 he was associated in practice with Dr. Howe, but the latter finally retired from practice, and he has since been alone, having his office in his residence in Gary street.

Dr. Crank is a grandson of a merchant who served in the war of 1812, and who traced his genealogy to Germany, where the name was originally Cronk. James D., a son of this soldier-merchant, was born at Hudson, N. Y., and became a merchant in Geneseo, that state, but later removed to Cincinnati, Ohio, and in 1876 became a pioneer of Pasadena, where he improved a ranch and engaged in horticulture. His death occurred in Pomona many years after his wife, Eliza, had passed away in Cincinnati. She was a daughter of Dr. Jabez Dake, a physician of Amsterdam, N. Y., and a member of a family whose principal representatives have been physicians for many generations. Indeed, at this writing there are thirty-eight connections of the Dake family who are physicians. Among her own children two sons became physicians, these being F. DeWitt of Pomona and C. D., of Cincinnati. Another son, J. F., who was a soldier in the Civil war, has since been engaged in business in Los Angeles.

F. DeWitt Crank was born in Geneseo, N. Y., October 19, 1859. He attended the grammar and high schools of Cincinnati, Ohio, and after graduating came to California, in April, 1876. Two years later he returned east and matriculated in the Cincinnati Medical College, from which he was graduated in 1880 with the degree of M. D. Desiring to gain added knowledge in order that he might more successfully follow his profession, he entered Hahnemann Medical College and remained until his graduation in 1882. Next he took a course of lectures in the Post-Graduate College of Cincinnati, and for eighteen months, while engaged in graduate work, he also acted as interne in the Cincinnati hospital. The practical experience he there gained proved of inestimable value to him when starting out for himself. All through his active life he has been a reader of medical journals and a close student of every development made in the science; hence he keeps fully abreast with the times. After coming to Pomona he was chosen the first health officer of the town and held the office until he resigned. Among the professional organizations to which he gives allegiance are the Southern California Homeopathic Medical Society, of which he is a charter member; the American Institute of Homeopathy and the California Homeopathic Medical Society.

In Pasadena occurred the marriage of Dr. Crank to Miss Jessie Banbury, who was born in Marshalltown, Iowa, and is a graduate of the Pasadena high school. Her father, Col. Jabez Banbury, was born in Cornwall, England, March 4, 1830, and at eleven years of age accompanied his family to America, settling at Gambier, Ohio.

In the fall of 1851 he went to Iowa City, three years later removed to Marshalltown, and there engaged in the building business and in merchandising. July 15, 1861, he enlisted as first lieutenant of Company D, Fifth Iowa Infantry, under Gen. John Pope. December 26, 1861, he was promoted to be captain, and later was commissioned major, commanding the regiment during the battle of Corinth. April 23, 1863, he was commissioned colonel of the Fifth Iowa Infantry, and had charge of the brigade at Lookout Mountain. September 28, 1864, he was honorably discharged near Atlanta. For some years afterward he continued to reside in Marshalltown, but December 20, 1873, he and his wife arrived in Los Angeles, Cal. After visiting various points in Southern California, he decided to locate where Pasadena now stands, and purchased an interest in the San Gabriel Orange Grove Association, of which he was a director for eight years. He built the first residence on the colony grounds and moved his family into it March 10, 1874. For four years he was city treasurer of Pasadena, also county treasurer of Los Angeles county, and for two years was a member of the legislature. By his marriage to Sarah Elmira Dunton, who was born in Worthington, Ohio, in 1834, he had three children, of whom two (twins) are living, viz: Mrs. Jessie B. Crank, of Pomona, and Mrs. Jennie B. Ford, of Pasadena. Dr. and Mrs. Crank have two children, Yvonne and Elma. The family are connected with the Unitarian Church.

GUSTAVUS BAGNARD. While for two years after coming to Pasadena, in 1888, Mr. Bagnard was employed as foreman on the Terminal Railroad and for one season engaged as foreman for the Pasadena Packing Company, his principal work has been as foreman for the Pasadena Improvement Company and as superintendent of the Rubio Cañon Land and Water Association. The former organization was incorporated in 1893 and has been the means of securing valuable improvements that have greatly increased the price of real estate in the vicinity. As superintendent he has charge of eight hundred acres of land in Altadena, two hundred of which are in grapes, eighty in oranges and lemons, five in apricots, and the balance in barley. In addition, he is personally interested in horticulture, and has improved about fifteen acres in oranges, lemons, grapes, apricots and peaches, making a specialty of fine table grapes. When he came to this vicinity the water company had only two small tunnels, and now they have fourteen, the largest of which is four hundred and twenty-five feet in length. Wells have been dug near the mountains, from the last of which they have twenty-three miners' inches flow of water. The reservoirs were useless at the time of his arrival, but the two large ones now in use provide an adequate supply of water, and are connected with miles of piping to the mountains. Besides being superintendent of the company, he is secretary and a director in the same.

The parents of Mr. Bagnard, Lambert and Cilinie (OINET) Bagnard, were born near Sedan, France, and the latter died in Muscatine, Iowa. The former settled in New York City in 1852, and there engaged in the manufacture of willow baby carriages. About 1860 he removed to St. Louis, Mo., where he followed the same occupation. After the war he settled in Washington, Iowa, later going to Lone Tree and from there to Muscatine, in each of which localities he followed farm pursuits. In 1888 he came to California, since which time he has made his home in Altadena. Of his three sons and one daughter, the youngest, Gustavus, is the only one in California. He was born in New York City June 5, 1853, and attended public schools in the various places where his father lived, but after the age of fourteen years he gave his attention wholly to work, and had no education other than that which is offered by the school of experience. During 1882, when starting a farm for himself, he began to be interested in small fruits, and on his place, two miles northwest of Muscatine, had many fine apple and cherry trees. From there he came to California in 1888 and has since lived in Pasadena and Altadena, where he has been superintendent of the water company since December 15, 1890. In politics he votes with the Republican party and in religion is a believer in the doctrines of the Christian Church. In coming to California he was accompanied by his wife, whom he had married in Muscatine, and who was Miss Emma Beltzer, a native of Columbus, Ohio, of German descent. They are the parents of four children, namely: Lionel L., who is engineer for the Rubio Cañon Land and Water Company; Flossie B., Bertie P. and Roy.

S. F. DAVIS, M. D., of Pomona, is a grandson of George Davis, an Englishman, of remote Welsh descent, and for many years a farmer of Connecticut, where he died. Charles L., son of George Davis, was born in Connecticut, and during early manhood carried on farm pursuits there, but later settled in Batavia, N. Y., and finally, about 1856, took up land in Tama county, Iowa, after a brief period of residence in Kalamazoo, Mich. Agriculture formed his life occupation and when seventy-three years old he died on his Tama county farm, where also occurred the death of his wife, Polly Ann (Thorp) Davis, aged eighty-three years. The latter was descended from Welsh ancestry and belonged to an old-established family of New York. Born in Batavia, she received her education in the Ladies' Seminary there, of which she was a graduate, and afterward she taught school for six years, and until her marriage. Eleven children were born to her union, all but one of whom attained mature years and nine are now living, S. F. being the sixth. One of the sons, Charles, enlisted in Company C, First Iowa Infantry, and died while serving in the Civil war.

Dr. Davis was born in Kalamazoo county, Mich., December 15, 1854, and received his early education largely in the district schools of Tama county and the Toledo (Iowa) Academy. At the age of eighteen he began to teach, his object being to earn the funds necessary for a collegiate education, and to his credit be it said that his medical education was paid for by his own carefully hoarded savings. In 1876 he entered the medical department of the University of Iowa, from which he was graduated March 4, 1879, with the degree of M. D. He began the practice of medicine at Gladbrook, where he continued three years. His next location was St. Paul, Neb., where he built up a good practice among the people of the vicinity, remaining there until 1885, when he removed to Pomona, Cal., his present home. His office is located in the Brady block. He is connected with several local orders, besides the Southern California Homeopathic Medical Society. In addition to his practice he finds time to superintend the orange ranch of ten acres which he has improved.

In Gladbrook, Iowa, Dr. Davis married Ida M. Rice, who was born in Tama county of New York parentage. After completing common school studies she was sent to an Iowa academy, from which she was graduated, and for a time prior to her marriage she engaged in teaching school. Dr. and Mrs. Davis have four children, namely: Roy C., who is a graduate of the Pomona high school, class of 1902; Pearl A., Helen and Irma.

THOMAS J. DE HUFF. The family represented by Mr. DeHuff, of Pasadena, is of French-Huguenot lineage on the paternal side, while his maternal ancestors were of German origin. His parents, Henry and Mary (Fager) DeHuff, were natives respectively of Lancaster and Berks county, Pa., and the former, who for many years followed the occupation of a locomotive engineer on the Pennsylvania Lines, died in Patterson, Pa., while the latter died in Harrisburg, Pa. Of their eight children Thomas J. and three sisters are living; another son, Hiram, who was a soldier in the Forty-sixth Pennsylvania Infantry, was accidentally killed while engaged as a locomotive engineer. Thomas J. DeHuff was born in Philadelphia, Pa., April 7, 1853, and at three years of age was taken by his parents to Patterson, Pa., where later he attended the public schools. When eighteen he began an apprenticeship to the plasterer's trade, which he completed in Altoona, Pa. From 1877 to 1879 he followed his trade at Canon City, Colo., where he also engaged in prospecting. For one season he was employed at Buena Vista, after which he worked at his trade in Colorado Springs and from there came to California in 1882. The first twenty months in this state were spent at his trade in Los Angeles, from which city he came to Pasadena, where he bought and built on Green street, later sold there and bought other property, and now makes his home at No. 304 Kensington place. Since coming to Pasadena he has followed contracting and building, and has made a specialty of cement, brick and plastering, having had contracts for this work on Elks' Hall, Bentz block, Union Savings Bank, residences of Mrs. Burdette, B. F. Ball, James Clarke, etc., all of which have been executed with painstaking care and recognized skill.

In Spokane, Wash., Mr. DeHuff married Miss Emma Edith Rosch, who was born in Sterling, Ill., and by whom he has two sons, Paul A. and Kenneth E. In Pasadena Lodge No. 272, F. & A. M., Mr. DeHuff was made a Mason, and he is still active in the work of the same, besides which he is connected with the Knights of Pythias and the American Mechanics. The First Christian Church of Pasadena has in him one of its most earnest supporters, and through his services on the board of trustees and the board of deacons he has been instrumental in advancing the cause of the church as an agency for the spiritual upbuilding of its community. Politically he supports the Republican party.

W. STANTON NEWTON. The Newton family was established on Long Island in a very early day and many generations continued to reside in Suffolk county. Sanford Newton, father of W. Stanton, was born in Smithtown, and made his home there until 1881, when he settled in Lena, Stephenson county, Ill. The following year he became a pioneer horticulturist of Pomona, Cal., and the sixty acres here that he brought to a high state of cultivation were ultimately sold at a fair profit, and thereafter he lived retired. He was called to his final reward March 2, 1902, aged seventy-eight years, and was buried in Smithtown, his old home. He married Anna, daughter of Richard Gould, a farmer of Long Island. She was born at Smithtown and died there in 1875, leaving two sons, Harry and W. Stanton, the former of whom remains at Smithtown.

The first fifteen years in the life of W. Stanton Newton were passed at Smithtown, where he was born November 9, 1866. His education was such as the local schools afforded. Having early acquired an excellent knowledge of the mercantile business, when he went to New York in 1881 he readily secured employment as salesman in a wholesale store. In 1883 he joined his father in Pomona, Cal., and assisted in bringing the ranch under cultivation. Three years after coming here he bought a livery business on Second street and from a very small beginning built up an established trade. After seven years in the same location his success justified him in the purchase of a new building, the City stables, on Main and First streets. The entire structure is of brick, with a fine front on Main street, and the interior arrangements are conducive to a satisfactory and systematic management of the business. All kinds of vehicles are kept in the livery, and it is the proprietor's constant aim to conduct the business in such a manner as to win and retain the patronage of the people of Pomona. He is a member of the Board of Trade, in politics is a believer in Republican principles, and as a citizen favors all worthy public-spirited projects. The Fraternal Brotherhood of Los Angeles numbers him among its members.

The marriage of Mr. Newton took place in Pomona and united him with Nellie Fowler, who was born in Woodland, Yolo county, Cal., her parents having crossed the plains from Missouri in 1851 and settled in the county where she was born. In religion she is of the Unitarian faith. The two children of this union are named Sanford and Theresa.

STEPHEN M. DAVIDSON. Unusual interest is attached to the lives of the California pioneers of the '50s, and to this class belonged the late Stephen M. Davidson of Los Angeles. He was mostly of Scotch and English origin, and more directly of southern ancestry. He was born in Johnson county, Tenn., June 8, 1830, the youngest among the nine children of Thomas and Nancy (Ingraham) Davidson, natives of Tennessee. In an early day his father removed, with the family, in a "prairie schooner," to Johnson county and later cleared and improved a large farm on the Missouri river, where he engaged in raising grain and hemp. The mother was kidnapped when only three years of age and though her parents spent their fortune in trying to find her they did not succeed until after she was married and had three children. As a girl her lot in life had been an unhappy one and her experiences unpleasant. Her maturer years were filled with the cares of a large family, whom she endeavored to train for positions of usefulness in the world.

Reared in Missouri and receiving only such advantages as the pay schools, infrequently held, afforded him, Stephen M. Davidson owed his subsequent success to no peculiar opportunities which his early days offered. After the death of his father he continued on the farm with his mother, but in 1852 started out in the world for himself. During that year he, Mr. Mitchell and family started across the plains, with ox-teams and cattle. After he had gone one hundred and fifty miles west of Kansas City he met a party crossing the plains to the coast, and among them were Rev. Joab Powell and his daughter, Mary. Meeting under these unusual circumstances and attracted to each other by qualities of honor, nobility and uprightness, Mr. Davidson and Miss Powell soon became engaged, and on the 5th of December, of the same year, they were united in marriage near Scio, Ore.

Taking up and improving a tract of land, Mr. Davidson engaged in the cattle business and farming. As prosperity came to him he increased his holdings, until his ranch was a very large one. In addition to its management, for four years he owned and operated a sawmill and manufactured lumber. Ill health, resulting from overwork and exposure, obliged him to seek a change of climate, and in 1868 he settled in San Luis Obispo county, Cal., and bought four hundred and forty acres five miles from Cambria, where he raised stock and general farm produce. Out of this land he evolved one of the finest farms along the coast, and for many years he found pleasure and profit in the supervision of the property. On selling out in 1882, he came to Los Angeles county and became a large purchaser of land, including a farm of eighty acres near the city limits of Los Angeles, another farm of eighty acres three-quarters of a mile from the limits, and one-half interest in a third farm of one hundred acres in the same vicinity.

Especial credit belongs to Mr. Davidson for his connection with the dairy business. In 1876 he brought from Missouri the finest herd of Jersey cattle that had as yet been introduced into San Luis Obispo county, and thus he founded a dairy unexcelled in all that county. His cattle he brought with him to Los Angeles county, and in this way proved a benefactor to the dairy industry here. Besides dairying, he raised fruits and farm produce. In 1891 he bought a residence on Eleventh and Figueroa streets, and there his death occurred, April 14, 1897. When only nine years of age he was converted and after about sixteen he was an active member of the Baptist Church. He was a charter member of Central Baptist Church of Los Angeles and prominent in its upbuilding, serving for years as a deacon. At the time of his demise he was church treasurer, and his last day of life was partly devoted to the raising of funds for the church work. Denominational educational institutions received his staunch support, particularly the Baptist College near West Lake, which he assisted in founding and building up.

Near Independence, Mo., Mrs. Davidson was born, a daughter of Rev. Joab and Annie (Beeler) Powell, natives of Tennessee. Her grandfather, Joe Powell, was a descendant of English ancestors who settled in Virginia, and was himself a planter of Tennessee and a pioneer of Jackson county, Mo. Farming was the occupation which Joab Powell followed for a livelihood, but much of his time was devoted to preaching the Gospel and the good that he accomplished can never be estimated. Cheerfully he gave his services to the cause of the Baptist Church, asking for no money, but content if he saw souls brought closer to the Lord through his patient efforts. Many owed to him their first start in a Christian life. In 1852 he started with his family across the plains and after a journey of six months, to a day, arrived at his destination, immediately beginning to carry on a stock and grain farm and also to do missionary work for the Baptist Church. Many congregations were organized in Oregon through his efforts, and many churches, now in excellent condition, owe much to his pioneer ministrations. When seventy-two years of age he entered into his reward. His wife, who was a daughter of Adam Beeler, of German descent, died in Oregon at seventy-two years of age. They were the parents of fourteen children, all but two of whom attained maturity and six are now living. One of these was Mrs. Davidson, who was a young girl when she made the eventful and fatiguing trip across the plains. Born of her marriage were the following-named children: Jennie N., Mrs. Clark, who resides near Fullerton, Cal.; Theodosia, Mrs. Lillard, living at Norwalk; Ellen, Sarah, Julia and Lydia, who are at home with their mother; Peter, who died July 20, 1893, and Stephen, who died August 16, 1892, both of whom were promising young men; and Rosa, Mrs. Shumate, who died in Los Angeles December 30, 1893. Since the death of Mr. Davidson, his wife has maintained a supervision of the property interests and has maintained a warm interest in the Baptist Church, to the promotion of whose success he gave so freely of time, influence and means. The family are connected with this same congregation and take an active part in many of its benevolences and societies.

SAMUEL HAZARD HALSTED. The president of the Pasadena Ice Company, shortly after his arrival in Pasadena, organized the company of which he is now the head, the same being incorporated in January, 1901. Under his supervision was erected a building 100x200, with a daily capacity of forty tons of ice and a cold storage capacity of fifteen car loads. The plant is located on South Broadway, from which point a switch furnishes means of transportation to the Santa Fe Railroad, thus ensuring ease of shipment.

In an early day the Halsted family came from England and settled at Hempstead, N. Y. Among their relatives were the Spencers and Ogdens, who, like their own family, took the part of the colonies in the Revolutionary struggle. George W. Halsted, who was born at Elizabeth, N. J., became a merchant at Huntsville, Ala., whence, returning to the north, he removed to Philadelphia, Pa. His son, Walter Kerr Halsted, was born in Alabama and reared in Philadelphia, where he engaged in the dry-goods business, later following the same occupation in Cincinnati, Ohio. His home is still in Cincinnati, and he is junior warden of the Episcopal Church in the suburb of Glendale. Politically he affiliates with the Republicans.

The wife of Walter Kerr Halsted was Elizabeth Hazard, who was born in Philadelphia and died in Covington, Ky. Her father, Samuel Hazard, was a man of literary ability, and, by appointment from the governor, assisted in compiling the archives of Pennsylvania. He also compiled the "Annals of Pennsylvania." During the Civil war his son and namesake was a captain of a Pennsylvania company. The father of Samuel, Sr., was Ebenezer Hazard, president of the Insurance Company of North America, and postmaster-general of the United States under the continental congress and also under President Washington. He in turn was a son of Samuel Hazard, one of the organizers of the First Presbyterian Church on Wall street, New York, and a leading business man of the city.

Of a family of three children Samuel Hazard Halsted alone survives. He was born in Covington, Ky., October 16, 1857, and until thirteen was reared principally in Philadelphia and Germantown, Pa., removing from there to Cincinnati and attending the Avondale school. At the age of sixteen years he entered the employ of a dry-goods commission house of Cincinnati, for whom he later traveled. With his father he built up the knitting mills of S. H. Halsted & Co., of Cincinnati, manufacturers of knit goods. A later venture was as a manufacturers' agent, first in Cincinnati, and from 1896 to 1900 in New York. Meantime he had married Miss Louise Taylor, daughter of S. Leslie Taylor, an old and prominent merchant of Cincinnati. The failure of his wife's health caused him to come to California in 1900, since which time Pasadena has been his home. He is a member of the board of trustees of Throop Polytechnic Institute and also auditor of the same. In the work of All Saint's Episcopal Church he is interested, and aids the same through his services as church treasurer. The Pasadena Board of Trade numbers him among its members. In politics he is a staunch supporter of Republican principles. Since coming to Pasadena he has entered the ranks of the Masonic order, being a member of Lodge No. 272, F. & A. M., and he holds membership in the New York Chapter, Sons of the Revolution.

C. D. MANNING. Since the spring of 1899 Mr. Manning has filled the position of road foreman of the Sierra Madre road district, extending from the city limits of Pasadena to the vicinity of Monrovia and covering almost one hundred and fifty miles of road. So constant and judicious have been his efforts to improve the condition of the roads in his charge that it is frequently remarked that his roads, in the suburbs of Pasadena, are in even better condition than those of the city, excepting of course the paved streets. About twenty-five miles are in oil, the use of which he was among the very first to adopt.

Near Toronto, Canada, Mr. Manning was born October 24, 1847, a son of C. L. R. and Jane (Baker) Manning, natives respectively of Ontario and New York. His paternal grandfather was born in the north of Ireland, of Scotch descent, and settled in Ontario. The father, who was a saddler and harnessmaker, took his family to Rockton, Ill., in the early part of 1848, and there followed his trade until he died. His wife, who also died in Illinois, was a daughter of Rufus Baker, who was born in Vermont, of English descent; and served in the war of 1812. In young manhood he removed to New York state, and from there went to Ontario, Canada, finally locating on a farm near Rockton, Ill., where he died. Fraternally he was connected with the Masons.

In the family of three sons and one daughter, C. D. Manning was the only one to come to California. When an infant he was taken to Rockton, Ill., where he attended the public schools. Before his schooling had been completed he enlisted, in January, 1863, in Company I, Ninth Illinois Cavalry, and was mustered in at Belvidere, Ill., afterward joining the regiment in Memphis, Tenn. Among the numerous engagements in which he took part were those of Pontatock, Tupelo, Hurricane Creek, Franklin and Nashville, Tenn. In July, 1865, he was mustered out at Cairo, Ill., after a service of two years and six months. Afterward he attended the Soldier's College at Fulton for a year, and then for two years assisted his father in the harness business. On leaving home he went to Clinton, Mo., and for almost two years carried on a farm, but returned to Rockton to assist his father once more. In 1882 he and a brother, under the firm name of Manning Brothers, opened a harness shop in Rock Rapids, Lyon county, Iowa, and they continued together until he was elected county treasurer, on the Republican ticket, in 1889, at which time he disposed of his interest in the business. Taking the oath of office in January, 1890, he served two terms, retiring in January, 1894.

On settling up his official and business matters in Iowa Mr. Manning came to Pasadena, Cal. In 1892 he had purchased ten acres in deciduous fruits at Lamanda Park, and as soon as he settled on the place he began to make improvements. The property is situated at the end of East Villa street, on the corner of Santa Anita avenue. Since coming here he has bought an additional tract of nine acres, and now has nineteen acres in orchards of various fruits. In addition he owns three hundred and twenty acres, with water right, at Imperial, which is superintended by his son, Charles C. While living in Clinton, Mo., he married Miss Mary E. Kinne, who was born at Bloomingdale, Ill. They have three children living, namely: Mrs. Olive J. Aldrich, of La Habra valley, Cal.; Charles C., of Imperial; and Leroy, at home.

The Pasadena Farmers' Club has Mr. Manning among its members. He has always been a staunch Republican, voting and working for the party's success. In religious connections he is a member of the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Pasadena. The days of his army service are kept in memory through his identification with Godfrey Post, G. A. R., and he was also active in the post at Rock Rapids, of which at one time he was commander. In matters fraternal he is associated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, Knights of Pythias, Ancient Order of United Workmen, and is especially prominent in Masonry, into which he was initiated at Rock Rapids, Iowa. While living there he was a past master of the blue lodge, but is now connected with Pasadena Lodge No. 272, F. & A. M., though still retaining his membership in the chapter and commandery at Rock Rapids (in which latter he was eminent commander) and in El Raid Temple, N. M. S., Sioux Falls, S. D. Among the people of Lamanda Park he has many friends who respect him for his business ability, excellent official service and integrity as a man.

MITCHELL H. SALISBURY. The superintendent of the North Pasadena Land and Water Company is a descendant of a New England family and a son of Hiel and Charlotte (Mitchell) Salisbury, natives of New York, and pioneers of Whiteside county, Ill. Upon the home farm in that county he was born May 11, 1859, being the youngest of four children, one of whom, H. H., is engaged in the plumbing business at Boyle Heights, Los Angeles. After the death of her husband the mother came to the Pacific coast and has since made Los Angeles her home. The boyhood years of Mitchell H. Salisbury were passed principally in Lyons, Clinton county, Iowa, where he received a public-school education. One of his first positions was that of stationary engineer in Grundy county, Iowa, after which, as a member of the firm of Salisbury Brothers, he was for seven years engaged in business as a machinist and pipe fitter at Atlantic, same state. Also, for eighteen months he served in the capacity of city marshal. On leaving Atlantic he became a traveling salesman for the Bostedo Package and Cash Carrier Company of Chicago, whose system he installed in different states. It was in their behalf that he first came to the coast, spending a few weeks in Los Angeles in 1891. While business duties obliged him soon to return east, he did so with the conviction that one day he would return here as a resident. In 1892 he was burned out in Omaha, and instead of rebuilding he removed to California, settling in Pasadena.

Three months after his arrival Mr. Salisbury was appointed superintendent of the North Pasadena Water Company, and has since filled the position. During this time the capacity of the works have been trebled by the addition of two large pumping plants. Several miles of mains have been built and the system greatly extended. As he thoroughly understands machinery and engineering, he has proved a valuable man to the company, and to him is largely due the credit for its successful continuance in business. In politics he is a Republican, and fraternally is connected with the Modern Woodmen of America. While living in Atlantic, Iowa, he married Miss Eudora Pressnall, who was born in Indiana. Four children were born of their union, namely: Ralph, who is a stationary engineer; Clarence; Alice, who died at eight years of age; and Gladys.

HON. WILLIAM H. COFFIN. A résumé of the life of William H. Coffin recalls to our minds the days of "bleeding" Kansas, when free-state and pro-slavery adherents bitterly contested for the supremacy of power and when every man carried his life in his hands. In all the work necessary for the securing of Kansas as a non-slavery state, Mr. Coffin was foremost, and perhaps none of his acts was more important than those in connection with the underground railroad, over which he helped many a fleeing slave to freedom. Since 1887 he has made his home in Pasadena, where he erected and occupies a comfortable residence on the corner of North Raymond avenue and Roberts street.

As early as 1640 Tristram Coffin came from England and bought Nantucket Island from the Indians. Later in life he joined the Society of Friends. His descendants remained on the island and engaged in the whaling business. However, after some time the island became over-populated, and at this juncture Bethuel Coffin headed a colony of Friends that settled in Guilford county, N. C. There he improved a farm, on which years later the battle of Guilford Courthouse was fought and the Friends' meeting house used as a hospital to succor the wounded soldiers. In 1825 he removed to Milton, Ind., where he died. His son, Elijah, was born in Guilford county, N. C., and removed about 1824 to Milton, Ind. which city he helped to lay out, and later engaged in business there as a merchant, also was the first postmaster of the town, holding the office under General Jackson. A man of great liberality and public spirit, his influence was constantly given to promote enterprises for the benefit of his home town. In 1833 he settled in Cincinnati, Ohio, where he engaged in a wholesale business for two years. Leaving that city he accepted a position as the first cashier of the State Bank of Indiana, having charge of its branch at Richmond. The bank's charter expired in twenty-five years, and after a long service covering that period he wound up the company's affairs and retired to an honorable leisure. For thirty-two years he was clerk and presiding officer of the Indiana yearly meeting of Friends. In politics he was a Whig and on the disintegration of that party became a Republican. Regarding the slavery question he was a staunch abolitionist. He had a cousin, Levi Coffin, who was president of the underground railroad.

The wife of Elijah Coffin was Naomi Hiatt, who was born in North Carolina, of Holland-Dutch ancestry who removed from Virginia to North Carolina. Her father, Benajah Hiatt, a native of that state, was a pioneer of Milton, Ind., and engaged in farming there, also served as a minister in the Society of Friends. Mrs. Coffin was a woman of deep spiritual convictions and accomplished much good through her self-sacrificing labors as a minister in the Friends' Church. Her death occurred in Richmond, Ind., when she was sixty-eight, and her husband died in the same town when sixty-four. They were the parents of two sons and five daughters, all living, of whom William H. was third in order of birth and is the only son in California. He was born at Milton, Ind., September 25, 1825, and was eight years of age when the family settled in Cincinnati, and ten when they returned to Indiana to settle in Richmond. Though he had only the most meager educational advantages, he has always been interested in the securing of good schools and was a generous contributor to Earlham College at Richmond, Ind. When fifteen years of age he entered the bank to assist his father, but the work was uncongenial and he chose farming instead. As early as 1840 he began to be interested in the slavery question, and nothing pleased him more than to aid some slave on the road to freedom. In one night he helped to get twenty-seven negroes through the lines, and it gave him pleasure afterward to learn that all of these safely reached Canada. In 1845 he married Miss Sarah W. Wilson, who was born at Milton, Ind., her father, John Wilson, having gone there from South Carolina. Their golden wedding in 1895 was an occasion of great rejoicing and was appropriately celebrated at their Pasadena home. After a happy married life of almost fifty-seven years, Mrs. Coffin passed away November 21, 1901, aged seventy-seven years. They were the parents of nine children, five of whom attained maturity, namely: John W., a builder living in Pasadena; William Henry, a farmer near Richmond, Ind.; Albert, a farmer and stockman at Salem, Ill.; Robert, of Pasadena; and Frank, a hardware merchant of Richmond, Ind.

For some years after his marriage Mr. Coffin engaged in farming near Richmond, Ind., but the fall of 1854 found him among the pioneers of Kansas, his primary object in going there being to aid the free-state movement. Settling in Leavenworth county, he engaged in farming there for eleven years. In 1858 he was elected a member of the Leavenworth constitutional convention, which met and drafted a state constitution, opposing the principles of the Le-compton convention and perfectly legal in all technicalities. It has been one of the pleasures of Mr. Coffin's later years to put in written form his recollections of Kansas during those stirring days that preceded the war, and the memoirs possess intrinsic value by reason of his connection with many important events. These memoirs have been published by the Kansas State Historical Society under the authority of the State legislature.

When the war came to an end Mr. Coffin returned to Indiana and settled on a large farm near Richmond, on Greene's Fork, where he engaged in stock-raising and general farming. Meantime he acted as a commissioner of the state reform school located at Plainfield. In 1881 he returned to Kansas and settled in Lawrence, where he built a beautiful residence at Haskell's institute overlooking the city. In the founding of this institute he was a leading factor, and took great interest in superintending the farms and instructing the Indians in the principles of agriculture. At the resignation of Dr. Marvin he also resigned his position, which he had filled with such credit. His first visit to California, made in 1886, left such delightful impressions of the Pacific coast that in 1887 he returned to make his home here. For a time he devoted considerable attention to the improvement of ten acres, planted in oranges and deciduous fruits, but this property he sold, and is now retired from business cares. Politically he has always been a pronounced Republican. He is interested in the Anti-Saloon League of Southern California and in other movements for the development of the highest citizenship. Like his ancestors, he is devoted to the work of the Society of Friends. For more than forty years he acted as superintendent of a Sunday-school or as an assistant in other departments of the work, and he is still actively aiding to the extent of his ability. During his residence in Kansas he was a member of the committee having charge of the Friends' mission on the Shawnee Indian reserve. While living in Indiana he was a member of the missionary board of the Indiana yearly meeting. After the war the government barracks in Arkansas and other states were turned over to the Friends for the purpose of using as schools for colored children, and Mr. Coffin went to Arkansas to assist in the starting of the work and to aid in every way possible as a member of the managing committee. Indeed, in all of the movements for good devised and carried out by the Friends he has been in deep and earnest sympathy, and the society has had no member more efficient and resourceful than is he; and while necessarily his activities have been lessened by the advance of years, he still keeps in touch with all enterprises for the welfare of his fellowmen.

O. E. GOODALE. On the establishment of the Pacific Branch, National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, Mr. Goodale was selected for the important position of chief engineer and his service has been so efficient and satisfactory that he has been retained to the present time. The post is no sinecure, for it includes a careful oversight of all mechanical work connected with the plant as well as the management of such buildings as have been or may be erected on the grounds. His responsibilities have grown with each year, as he has witnessed the growth of membership from less than a hundred to more than two thousand.

Descended from an old family of New England, Mr. Goodale was born in Lewis county, N. Y., December 21, 1849, the oldest of four children and the only son in the family. His father, Nicholas, who was a son of David Goodale, a farmer of Lewis county, himself took up agricultural pursuits, following the same both in New York and in Iowa. During the Civil war he served with Company I, Third Battalion, Fifth Regiment New York Heavy Artillery, and remained at the front until he was honorably discharged for physical disability. About 1871 he settled in Parkersburg, Iowa, and there died in 1892. He married Delia M. Hough, who was born in Lewis county, N. Y., and died in Iowa. Her father, John Hough, was a native of Connecticut and died in New York. During the war of 1812 he served in the American army.

From boyhood Mr. Goodale has been familiar with carpentering, and he also studied architecture in New York, after which he engaged in the building business at Booneville, Oneida county. In 1885 he crossed the continent to Los Angeles, where he became an architect. When the Soldiers' Home was started he was appointed superintendent of construction and a year later was made general superintendent, continuing as such until he was transferred to the position of chief engineer. Men who are familiar with engineering claim that it would be difficult to find an engineer who is Mr. Goodale's equal in thorough knowledge of the work and painstaking oversight of every detail. While living in New York he married Miss Mary A. Hoyt, who was born in Lewis county, that state, and by whom he has a daughter, Florence Adelle. The family are identified with the Christian Church in Los Angeles, where they placed their membership shortly after coming to California. Though not a partisan nor active in politics, Mr. Goodale is known as a staunch Republican, whose ballot is always given to the men and movements of the Republican party.

HON. THEO. PARKER LUKENS. Since he came to Pasadena in 1880 the record of the life of Mr. Lukens has been intimately associated with the history and development of the city. A descendant of remote German ancestry and a Pennsylvania family, devoted adherents to the Society of Friends, he is a son of W. E. and a grandson of Moses Lukens, the latter a farmer of the Keystone state. From his native county of Chester, Pa., W. E. Lukens moved to Ohio and settled at New Concord, Muskingum county, but later moved to Putnam and thence to Zanesville. At these various points he was principally engaged in the manufacture of lumber. In 1856 he went to Sterling, Whiteside county, Ill., and started a flouring mill on the Rock river, where he continued for many years. Meantime he also became interested in horticulture and the nursery business both at Sterling and Rock Falls, and acquired valuable possessions, representing his judicious and extensive investments. His death occurred at seventy-four years of age. In early manhood he married Margaret Cooper, daughter of Nicholas, both born near Hagerstown, Md., and descendants of Quaker English ancestors.

Four sons and two daughters comprised the family of W. E. Lukens, namely: Sereno, a machinist in South Bend, Ind.; Emeline and Melissa, of Whiteside county, Ill.; W. C., a veteran of the Civil war, and now engaged in horticultural pursuits at Redlands, Cal.; Theo. Parker, of Pasadena; and W. L., a molder living in Chicago. At New Concord, Muskingum county, Ohio, T. P. Lukens was born October 6, 1848.

From eight years of age he was reared in Illinois. His education was completed in Sterling high school. While still a mere child he acquired a thorough knowledge of the nursery business, and it is probable that he has grafted as much nursery stock as any nurseryman in the world. At one time his father had fifty acres in nursery stock, his specialty being apples and ornamental trees, and Lukens' Nurseries were known all over the country, shipments being made to every part of the United States. On the retirement of his father, T. P. Lukens became manager of the business, which he conducted for some years, but sold out in 1880 on locating in Pasadena.

When nineteen years of age, Mr. Lukens enlisted in a United States regiment and was sent to Carlisle, Pa., where he was stationed nine months and then honorably discharged. His father was a strong abolitionist and had at his Ohio home one of the leading stations of the underground railroad. Reared under these influences, he naturally espoused the Republican cause, nor has a careful study of national problems during later life given him reason to change his views. While living at Rock Falls, Ill., he served as tax collector for three years and was mayor one term. In that town he was united in marriage with Charlotte Dyer, whose grandfather was a soldier in the war of 1812, while her great-grandfather was a Revolutionary hero. Her father, David, engaged in farming at Manchester, Vt., where she was born, but later he moved to Illinois, where his last years were spent. By her marriage to Mr. Lukens there is a daughter, Mrs. Helen Jones, of Pasadena, whose children, Charlotte and Ralph, are the pride of their grandparents.

On coming to Pasadena in 1880, Mr. Lukens started a small nursery of oranges and peaches. Soon, however, he drifted into other business, and after 1882 engaged in laying pipes for the mains between Pasadena and San Bernardino, as well as in all the settlements along the mountains. Next he drifted into the real-estate business in 1884, and his was the first shingle ever displayed on the streets of Pasadena. At first he had his office in a store on the corner of Colorado and Fair Oaks avenue, and while carrying on the business laid out Raymond's addition, Kensington Place and the addition to Olive-wood. His health failing, he took his brother-in-law, H. Dyer, into partnership, organizing the Lukens Land Company, but he still found the burden of business cares too heavy, so in 1887 relinquished his work entirely and traveled for two years. On his return he was earnestly urged to take charge of the Pasadena National Bank, which had been in unfortunate financial condition, its stock being worth only thirty-five cents. Somewhat reluctantly he accepted the management. So successful was he in the work that he placed the bank on a paying basis and brought its stock up to par. However, the accomplishment of this herculean task had been too much for his health, which again gave way, and he resigned the management of the bank.

In the organization of the Board of Trade Mr. Lukens bore an active part and at one time served as its vice-president. In addition to his charming home at No. 195 North Marengo avenue, he has built some forty houses in Pasadena, but most of these have been sold. Largely through his efforts, the Colorado Street Railway Company was organized and he put in the first $10,000 of its $25,000 of stock. The first cement sidewalk in Pasadena was built in front of his residence. In 1891 he was elected to the council, and during the same year became president of the board of trustees. Under his administration as mayor, from 1891 to 1895, the sewer system was completed, the first paving done, the first piping and cement reservoirs built. It was the desire of the people to have a business administration, and in this respect Mr. Lukens more than met their anticipations, his four years of service as mayor proving most helpful to the business interests of the city. Fraternally he is a charter member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen in Pasadena, in which he has passed all the chairs. In Pasadena Lodge, F. & A. M., he was made a Mason; and while in Illinois was actively connected with the Odd Fellows.

Becoming interested in the idea of reforesting the mountains, in 1897 Mr. Lukens took up active work along that line, and in 1900 he was appointed agent for this work by Secretary of Agriculture Wilson. Under his supervision men are now engaged in planting pine seeds on the mountains, and much of his time is spent there. For six years he was president of the Mutual Building and Loan Association of Pasadena, and is still a stockholder in the same. Near Baldwin's ranch he has improved an orange orchard of forty acres, in which he also has a number of walnuts. Some of the vineyards and orange groves that he set out in Pasadena years ago are now among the most thrifty in the entire city. One of the measures in which he was most interested and the success of which reflects credit upon his persistence was the library movement, to which he was an early contributor and an earnest friend. For years he was a member of the library board of trustees. For eight years he was connected with the board of trustees of the California State Normal, which was established at San Diego, but removed to Los Angeles on account of the advantages offered by the latter city. His first appointment came from Governor Markham and his second from Governor Budd; twice he resigned, but it was accepted neither time, the general feeling being that his services were of too valuable a character to be dispensed with prior to the expiration of his term.

JOHN M. HUNTER. The prolific soil of the Montecito valley proved a boon to many of the settlers who sought here a home in the early days, and among those who came, about 1872, and introduced modern methods of tilling the ground and developing the latent richness thereof, none is entitled to more credit than John M. Hunter, one of the successful ranchers of the valley.

For many years the Hunter family has been identified with Kentucky, where settled the first of their number who immigrated to America. John M. Hunter was born near Georgetown in 1824, and reared on the farm of his parents, William and Frances (Hurnden) Hunter. He received his education in the district schools, and when sixteen years of age was no longer dependent upon the family resources, but started out to earn the wherewithal for his own existence. His first stopping place was New Orleans, La., where he lived until 1850. While there he enlisted as a soldier for the Mexican war in 1846, in Colonel Marks' Third Louisiana Regiment. He participated in the battles of Buena Vista and Monterey, but afterward, being on the sick list, was discharged and sent back to New Orleans.

In 1850 Mr. Hunter came to California via the Isthmus, and up the coast to San Francisco, from where he went to the mines in Sonora and for eleven years engaged, with fluctuating success, in mining. Later he remained for ten years on Truckee river, four miles above Reno, Nev., where the services which he rendered in the neighborhood and the esteem in which he was held resulted in the naming of a station after him on the Central Pacific railroad. In 1872 Mr. Hunter removed to the locality of which he is now a resident, and bought the ranch which has developed under his industry into a fine and paying property. At first covered with oak trees and shrubs, he has cleared fifty acres of the home place, and is engaged in raising hay and apples, and besides has one of the finest lemon orchards in the valley in which are set out three hundred trees; he now has nineteen acres in orchard. He is one of the charter members of the Santa Barbara Lemon Growers' Exchange, and is otherwise interested in the enterprises which have aided in promoting the growth of the valley. In addition to the management of his ranch he has dealt somewhat in real estate, and has exerted his influence in the building up of the school system and the erection of schoolhouses. As a staunch Republican he has taken an active part in local politics, and served for four years as supervisor of the county. Fraternally he is associated with the Masonic order at Santa Barbara.

In 1886 Mr. Hunter married Miss Ella F. Stockton, from Philadelphia, but a native of California. Of this union there is one son, John Stockton Hunter.

JAMES M. HORTON. The association of Mr. Horton with California began during the early pioneer days, and he has been identified with Buckhorn, Ventura county, for a long period, having come here from Nevada in July, 1866. A native of Delaware county, N. Y., born on the last day of the year 1833, he accompanied his parents to Michigan in 1840 and settled near Lansing, where the years of youth were passed. Like many other young men during the '50s, he sought his fortune across the plains in the far west. With an immigrant train, in 1852, he started on the long overland journey for the Pacific coast, enduring all the hardships of such a journey, whose difficulties and dangers we of the present day of railroads can form no conception.

Arriving in Eldorado county, Mr. Horton located several placer mines, and remained there for four years working his claims. At the outbreak of the Civil war, in 1861, he went to Nevada and for several years worked in the mines at Esmeralda. Next he removed to Santa Barbara (now Ventura) county and settled on the Camulos ranch, noted in the field of romance as the home of the heroine of Helen Hunt Jackson's famous work, "Ramona." In 1868 he bought his present farm at Buckhorn, which is the northwest quarter of section 30, a part of the old Dominguez ranch. At this writing he owns one hundred acres, twenty-five acres of which are in apricots, two acres in olives, and thirty acres in almonds, the latter being his principal crop. Besides these fruits he has a general orchard. The development of his ranch is the result of constant industry through many years and speaks volumes for his determined perseverance.

May 7, 1881, Mr. Horton married Miss Minnie Stowell, who was born in England and died in California September 13, 1893. Later he was united with Miss Ella Obear. On the ranch where he settled in 1868 his six children were born, all being of his first union, and named as follows: Olive, Alfred, Etta, Harry, Mabel and George.

As a stockholder Mr. Horton is associated with the Ventura County Mutual Fire Insurance Company. The nominees of the Republican party not only receive his vote, but his hearty support in every way. The local conventions of his party have the benefit of his presence and wise suggestions, while each election day finds him doing active work at the polls. Not only is he active in politics, but also in all plans for bettering the community and uplifting humanity.

FRANK R. HENNION. Preceded by an extended business experience in different parts of the state and country, Mr. Hennion came to Ventura in 1897, as agent for the Union Oil Company of California. This responsible position he has since creditably maintained, his duties extending to a general supervision of the company's interests at this end of the line, a by no means unimportant task, as all of the oil of the concern is shipped from Ventura. Aside from his business obligations, he is variously interested in the affairs of the town, his influence as a moral and progressive force being unquestioned and unceasingly exerted on the side of law and order and general improvement. In the suppression of the saloon he has been particularly active, and, as a member of the executive committee and also secretary of the Anti-Saloon League, he has, from the time of its organization, endeavored to enforce municipal purity, and do away with political intrigue and its attendant retrogression.

From practically his fourteenth year Mr. Hennion has been the architect of his own fortunes, and his toil has supplied the wherewithal for sustenance, education and general improvement. The only child in his father's family, he was born October 22, 1866, at Macomb, McDonough county, Ill., son of Martin and Mattie (Reese) Hennion. The father was born in Newark, N. J., and eventually went to Colorado where he followed with varying success and failure the fortunes of a miner. With the breaking out of the Civil war he enlisted in the Second Colorado Cavalry, and was raised from the rank of lieutenant to that of captain, in which capacity he served until the close of the war. With the return of peace he settled in Macomb, McDonough county, Ill., and became a commercial traveler, but later located in Kansas City, Mo., where he engaged in the mercantile business. In 1886 he removed to San Diego, Cal., which has continued to be his residence up to the present time. His wife was born in Hanover, Ind., and was a granddaughter of Rev. Benjamin Reese, a prominent clergyman in the Presbyterian Church.

Upon starting out to earn his own living Mr. Hennion entered the employ of Meyer Brothers, drug merchants, with whom he remained for three years. Afterward he learned the wood working and furniture manufacturing business, in which he engaged until 1886, or until his removal to San Diego, Cal. He was here employed by the Russ Lumber Company as yard salesman until 1892, when he went to Los Angeles, Cal., and was with several different lumber companies in a similar capacity, up to the time of settling in Ventura in 1897.

In Los Angeles Mr. Hennion married Nellie Junod, daughter of Alfred and Eugenie Junod, and a native of Highland, Ill. Of this union there are two children, Harry Martin and Ruth Genevieve. Mr. Hennion is a Democrat in politics, and a member of the Presbyterian Church, in which he is a ruling elder. He is a member of the Board of Trade, and is fraternally associated with the United Moderns and the Modern Woodmen.

THORVALD INGVALDSEN. The position which Mr. Ingvaldsen fills, that of superintendent of the Highland Place ranch at Pasadena, he has held since 1891, at which time he was employed by John W. Hugus to assume management of the ranch. There was little to attract one in the appearance of the property, which had been permitted to run down, and was therefore proving an unprofitable investment for its owner. The utmost liberty of judgment was given Mr. Ingvaldsen in the planting of fruit, selection of varieties to be cultivated and making of improvements. The two hundred and seventy-four acres have been placed under cultivation to fruit, one hundred and eighty being in grapes, while the balance is in citrus and deciduous fruits. It is said by those competent to judge that some of the finest table grapes grown in the entire country came from his vineyards, among these being the Lady Finger and Red Emperor varieties. The thrifty appearance of the property indicates beyond a doubt the intelligent supervision of the manager.

As his name indicates, Mr. Ingvaldsen is of Scandinavian lineage. His parents, Tønnes and Karen Töresen Ingvaldsen, were natives of Norway and both not only spent their childhood days upon farms, but after marriage continued a rural existence. On selling their homestead, they moved to Stavanger, Norway, where Mr. Ingvaldsen became manager of the largest steam bakery in the town. When its owner, William Hansen, failed, he invested his savings in the purchase of the business, and continued as proprietor for some years. In addition he owned fishing boats and engaged in business in that line. He was reared in the Lutheran faith, to which he remained faithful until death. Since his death Mrs. Ingvaldsen has continued to make her home in Stavanger. Of their three sons and two daughters all are living but one son, the two surviving boys being in California. The older of these, Thorvald, was born in Stavanger, May 15, 1868, and attended the schools of that town until he was fourteen, when he went to sea. During his life upon the ocean he visited many lands, cast anchor at Port Natal and St. Helena, stopped at the Barbadoes, and in 1885 arrived at Galveston, Tex. Deciding to remain in America, he came to California during the same year and settled at Los Angeles. During the course of his voyages his ship had taken on a cargo of ostriches at Port Natal, and he had been given charge of the birds. In this way he became interested in the business, and so was impelled to ask the doctor for employment on his ostrich farm. Securing the desired position, he cared for the birds on Los Phillis ranch and also assisted in starting the zoological gardens in San Fernando near Glendale. After two years a change was made in the ownership of the business, and Mr. Ingvaldsen remained on the ranch with G. J. Griffith, who later sent him to the Briswalter tract in Los Angeles. For several years he superintended a tract of three hundred acres, under cultivation to grapes and oranges. After several years he resigned this position, and for two years was an employe of Llewellyn Brothers in their foundry. On leaving that place he came to Pasadena for John W. Hugus, whose ranch he has since managed with characteristic fidelity.

Politically Mr. Ingvaldsen is a Republican, while fraternally he is connected with the Foresters and Maccabees. His marriage took place in Los Angeles, March 3, 1890, and united him with Miss Katie Müller, daughter of Andreas and Anna M. (Hansen) Müller, natives respectively of Schleswig-Holstein, Germany, and Erö, Denmark. In a family of four children (all living) she was second in order of birth, and was born at Alsen, Schleswig-Holstein, whence she came to America in 1887 and settled at Santa Ana, Cal. Her father was a soldier in the revolution of 1848 and for forty years was employed as maltster in a brewery at Alsten, where her mother is still making her home. In the schools of her country she received an excellent education, and was in her home early trained to a knowledge of housewifely arts. She is connected with the Ladies Order of Maccabees, in the work of which she maintains an interest.

WILLIAM A. HEISS. The founder of the Heiss family in the United States was William Heiss, who brought his family from Strasburg, Germany, and settled in Lancaster, Pa., where he became a land owner and farmer. Accompanying him on this trip was a son, William, who latter married Susan Kaforth, daughter of a colonel in the Revolutionary war and member of one of Pennsylvania's prominent colonial families. Some years after his marriage this ancestor, accompanied by wife and children, removed to the vicinity of Erie, Pa., and bought a large tract of land, the improvement of which brought him wealth. Born of his marriage, among other children, was a son, Isaac Heiss, a native of Lancaster, Pa., and for years a carpenter in Dayton, Ohio, but later a manufacturer of confectionery in Shelbyville, Ind. On retiring from business pursuits, about 1881 he came to California, and afterward lived, retired, in Pasadena, where he died in 1900, at eighty years of age. Politically he was a Republican, fraternally a member of the Masonic Order and in religion a communicant of the Methodist Episcopal Church. His marriage united him with Jane Hartman, who was born in Strasburg, Germany, and died in Shelbyville, Ind. When only two years of age she had been brought to America by her parents. Her father, Rev. John Wesley Hartman, was a minister in the German Lutheran Church, and after crossing the ocean secured a pastorate in Philadelphia, later officiating as pastor of a Dayton church, and finally preaching the Gospel in Chicago. His life was prolonged to the great age of ninety-seven years.

In the family of Isaac Heiss were seven children, all but one of whom are living, Fannie having died in infancy. The survivors are: Mrs. Louise Weingarth, who lives in Los Angeles; William A., of Pasadena; Mrs. Ellen Emerick, of San Bernardino; Alvin G., who is in partnership with his older brother at Pasadena; Frank, also a member of the same firm; and Emma, of Pasadena. William A. Heiss was born in Shelbyville, Ind., May 13, 1855, and received a fair education in the grammar and high schools. Going to St. Paul in 1873, he entered the office of William Lee & Co., a wholesale dry-goods firm, with whom he remained for fifteen years, meantime filling every position from office boy to manager. Finally, when the business was closed out owing to the advanced age of the heads of the firm, in the capacity of manager he had charge of the settling up of affairs.

On visiting Pasadena for the first time in 1885, Mr. Heiss had been favorably impressed with the city. The following year he returned to the coast and opened a real-estate office in Pasadena, also laid out fifteen acres owned by his sister, Mrs. Weingarth, the tract being known as Weingarth's subdivision to Pasadena, and later named Winona avenue. Meantime, in 1887, the clothing firm of Heiss Bros. had been established, and this enterprise has since been successfully conducted, the present location being on the corner of Colorado and Fair Oaks avenue. Among his other enterprises was the purchase of a ranch at La Canada, where he has improved an orchard of thirty acres. Other places have also been improved under his skillful management and wise oversight. At one time he officiated as vice-president of the Pasadena Deciduous Fruit Association. In the organization of the Pasadena Merchants Protective Association he took an active part. He belongs to the Board of Trade and is a charter member of the Twilight Club. After coming to Pasadena he married Miss Belle Van Camp, daughter of Joseph Van Camp, a merchant of Indiana. She was born in Metamora, Ind., but has been a resident of Pasadena since girlhood, and is actively identified with the Methodist Episcopal Church and various philanthropic and social organizations of this city. The children born of their union are named William Van Camp and Olive Blanche.

Ever since attaining his majority Mr. Heiss has been staunch in his adherence to the Republican party. On this ticket, in 1901, he was elected to represent the fourth ward in the Pasadena city council for a term of four years. In this body he has served as chairman of the sewer committee and member of various others, and has at all times advocated measures calculated to promote the city's progress and welfare. Among the fraternal societies of which he is a member may be mentioned the Knights of Pythias, Woodmen of the World, and Masonic Order, he having been made a Mason in Pasadena Lodge No. 272, F. & A. M., and he is also connected with the Eastern Star as past patron. He is fond of recreation and enjoys his connection with the Green Wing Gun Club, although the management of his various business interests and the duties of his office as councilman leave him little leisure for participation in social affairs.

GEORGE WEST HUGHES. By his numerous friends and associates in the business and social world, George West Hughes is remembered as a man in whom were united shrewd financial acumen and a high sense of moral responsibility. In common with many whose ambitious tendencies outweigh their physical strength, he came to California in 1885, traveling extensively through the state, and finally, locating in Los Angeles, came and went in the busy places of the city, a potent factor in its intellectual and material growth. His death, March 25, 1899, signaled the passing of a man of exceptionally fine character and attainments, the memory of whose personality will continue to abide, when his commercial successes have been forgotten.

Of Welsh descent on the maternal and paternal side, Mr. Hughes was born on the Ouachita river in what is now Camden, Ark., and was a son of Judge Green B. Hughes, a native of Kentucky, and an early settler in Arkansas, where he was a large planter on the Saline river, Saline county. Judge Hughes was prominently identified with the early history of Saline county, and at the time of his death had filled many important positions in the government of his district, his greatest sphere of usefulness being found as county judge, a position which he sustained with equity and good judgment for many years. He married Louisa West, a native of Missouri, and who died in Arkansas, leaving two sons and one daughter, George West Hughes being the oldest child. The education of Mr. Hughes was acquired at a boarding school in Washington, Ark., after the completion of which he took a course in civil engineering, to which he devoted many years of his life. Among his most ambitious accomplishments in this line was his location of the entire Iron Mountain Railroad through Arkansas, and a similar office which he performed for the Fort Smith Railroad. Recognizing his particular fitness, the governor of Arkansas appointed him superintendent of the construction of the levees on the Arkansas river, during which time he resided principally at Little Rock, Ark. His health failing in 1885 he sought release from physical disability in the rejuvenating air of California, a change which probably gained for him many years of life.

In 1887 Mr. Hughes built a residence on Adams street, and in time became interested in the California Bank, of which he was vice-president, and a member of the board of directors up to the time of his death. He was a Republican in politics, and voted with understanding, and due regard for the personal worth and qualifications of candidates for office. He was above all else the friend of education, and to his children gave every advantage which money and intelligent direction could bring about. February 28, 1855, he married in Dallas county, Ark., Martha Butler, a native of Henderson, N. C., and daughter of Alexander Butler, who was born in Boydtown, Va. Alexander Butler was a merchant and manufacturer in Henderson, N. C., and about 1847 removed to Saline county, Ark., and two years later to Dallas county, Ark., where his death occurred. He married Mary Reavis, a native of North Carolina, and whose father, Louis Reavis, was a planter in North Carolina, and came of an old Virginia family. The mother, formerly Miss Sally Wyche, of Virginia, was of Welsh descent, and died in North Carolina. To Mr. and Mrs. Butler were born twelve children, all of whom attained maturity, and seven are living, Mrs. Hughes being the oldest. To Mr. and Mrs. Hughes were born three children. The oldest son, Walter J., graduated at the University of Virginia and the Harvard Law School, and became a member of the bar of Los Angeles, in which city he died, leaving to the care of his mother three children, Marguerite, Reavis, and Mary. Dr. West Hughes is a graduate of the University of Virginia and the College of Physicians and Surgeons in New York City, and is engaged in medical practice in Los Angeles. George Reavis, who died in Los Angeles eleven years ago at the age of thirty-two years, was also a graduate of the University of Virginia and of Harvard College, in which latter institution he took the degrees of A. M. and LL. B. He had just entered upon a professional practice in Little Rock Ark., when his health irretrievably failed. Mrs. Hughes is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church South.

WILLIAM M. McFADDEN. While Mr. McFadden is known as one of the successful horticulturists of the Placentia district, and the first settler of what has since developed into one of the garden spots of this well-favored state, his chief claim to distinction is the result of his unflagging zeal in promoting the cause of education. Favored with exceptional educational advantages in his youth, he has for many years upheld the highest standards of applied intellectuality in the localities in which he has resided, and as a teacher and superintendent of teachers, has evolved methods of imparting knowledge as feasible as they were readily understood.

Extending well into the last century the family to which Mr. McFadden belongs have been identified with Pittsburg, Pa., in which city he was born February 19, 1840. He was graduated from the West Pittsburg high school, and the Curry Normal Institute, also at Pittsburg, and at Beaver Academy, Beaver, Pa. Later he finished a course in the commercial department of Welbourn College, Louisville, Ky., having, in the mean time, paid his own tuition with money acquired from teaching school. In 1864 he came to California, and, arriving in Alameda county, for four and a half years taught in the district schools. In 1868 he came to Southern California and continued his former occupation in what is now Orange county, and was for eleven years located at what was then called Upper Santa Ana. During a portion of his work as a teacher he served as superintendent of schools of the then Los Angeles county. In later years he was president of the high school board at Fullerton, and superintended the construction of the high school building. In Los Angeles county he was a member of the board of education for two years, and during the second year was president of the board.

The horticultural experience of Mr. McFadden began in January, of 1869, when he settled on ninety-two acres purchased from the Stearns Rancho Company, fifty acres of which are still in his possession. From the products of his soil Mr. McFadden ships annually to the eastern market about twenty-three car loads of oranges, and two car loads of walnuts, his shipping being conducted through the Fullerton Walnut Growers' Association, of which he was one of the organizers and has been president for several years. He was the second man to raise an orange in the Placentia district, and in connection with his interest in horticulture has been prominently connected with many of the important organizations which are of such invaluable aid to fruit growers. He was one of the five shippers who organized the Southern California Orange Exchange, and was one of the promoters of the former Fruit Growers' Bank, now merged into the First National Bank of Fullerton.

Like the majority who have been confronted with the difficult problem of artificial irrigation, Mr. McFadden has realized the necessity of providing reliable water systems, and he was one of the original promoters of the now extinct Cajon Irrigating Company, of which he was secretary and a director for several years. He assisted in the organization of the Anaheim Union Water Company, of which he was at one time president, and has been a director for years.

SIMON HARTMAN. The general merchandise store of Simon Hartman in Santa Ynez is among the sound commercial enterprises of the town. Unexpected misfortunes have not interfered with its general standing or retarded its progress, and it stanchly holds its own in catering to a large trade extending far into the surrounding country. The enterprising owner and proprietor is one of those energetic and practical business men who owe much to their German birth and training, and who, upon coming to American shores, readily adapt themselves to existing conditions, and as readily grasp the opportunities awaiting them in their adopted land. He was born in Prussia, Germany, in 1851, and there lived and attended the public schools until about sixteen years of age. He then removed to London, England, and while there continued his education, and also learned the trade of tailoring. Upon immigrating to America in 1872 he lived for fifteen months in the Lehigh valley in Pennsylvania. Coming to California, via Panama, he arrived in San Francisco in February of 1876. At Marysville he engaged in the tailoring business for a couple of years, after which he was in the sewing machine business in San Francisco for three years. In June of 1885 he came to Santa Ynez, but was so unfavorably impressed with the outlook here that he left for Prescott, Ariz., where he remained for six months. He then decided to again visit Santa Ynez, and upon his return bought out his present place of business, or rather the building in which he first conducted his affairs, and which came to a dire end through fire in 1891. The loss was about $12,000, and constituted all that he had in the world, and the insurance was but $2,000. Nothing daunted, he erected the present store and laid in an even larger supply of general merchandise, since which he has had no cause to regret the happy chance which directed his steps to this appreciative little community. Behind the store are five well-furnished and comfortable rooms in which the family live.

The marriage of Mr. Hartman and Ricko Jacobowitz occurred in San Francisco in 1883. To Mr. and Mrs. Hartman have been born two children, Hannah, who is twenty-one years of age, and Josephine, who is seventeen years old and attending the high-school at Santa Ynez. Hannah is an unusually bright and capable girl, and is bookkeeper for Levi Straus of San Francisco. She has been with the firm for over five years, and her services are highly thought of by her employers. Miss Hartman is a graduate of Heald's Business College of San Francisco, and commands a good salary in her position. Mr. Hartman is the agent at Santa Ynez for the Wells-Fargo Express Company. He is vitally interested in promoting the cause of education in his town, and has always been prominent on the school board. The first presidential vote of Mr. Hartman was cast for Garfield, but since then he has voted with the Democratic party. He is a charter member of the Knights of Pythias Lodge No. 212, of Santa Ynez, is past chancellor of the same and now master of finance, and he is also a member of the I. O. B. B., of San Francisco.

WILLIAM HAMILTON, proprietor of the Ventura machine shops, was born near Thortown, Boone county, Ind., February 19, 1859. To an extent, he inherits his mechanical ability from his grandfather, William Hamilton, who was born in Ohio in 1792, and who was a flour and saw miller during his years of activity; also from his father, John Hamilton, a native of Ohio, who was engaged in the same occupation. The grandfather was of English descent, and at a very early day left Ohio and settled near Colfax, Ind., where he conducted his mills for many years, and where he died about 1876. The father conducted his mills at Thortown, Ind., and in 1871 removed to Marion county, Kans., where he purchased land and still lives. His wife, formerly Holland Veach, was born in Ohio, a daughter of John Veach, and of French descent. Mrs. Hamilton, who died in Kansas, was the mother of seven sons and two daughters, of whom one daughter is deceased, her son William being the fourth child. Another son, Horatio, is at present conducting a ranch near Los Angeles.

From boyhood William Hamilton was reared to a knowledge of the milling business, and he also learned the trade of machinist. His education was acquired in the public schools, and this, combined with a practical home training, ably fitted him for the responsibilities of the future. In 1871 he removed to Kansas and lived on a farm, and also engaged in running stationary engines and in manufacturing lumber. In 1888 he came to Ventura and for a time worked at the blacksmith's trade, continuing the same after his removal to San Luis Obispo. Upon returning to Ventura he entered the shops of the Ventura Machine Company, and worked for Mr. Johnson, continuing the same for seven years, after which he purchased the machine shop, remodeled it, put in new machinery, and started upon an era of uninterrupted success and prosperity. While with Mr. Johnson, the firm patented the only successful bean and grain thresher on the market, and the only combination thresher which will thresh lima as well as other beans. Mr. Hamilton is personally widely known as the inventor of several important devices of a mechanical nature, chief of which is a belt guide, and the Hamilton cylinder wrench for removing nuts on the cylinders, which was patented November 1, 1901. He has also manufactured and invented bean planters and general machinery, and is acknowledged to possess a more than ordinary talent for the work to which he is devoting his life.

At Marion, Kans., Mr. Hamilton married Eva Harrison, who was born in Ohio, and of this union there are six children: Bert, Mary, Debbie, Ray, Floyd and Nellie. The children are all at home, and Bert, the oldest son, is a machinist with his father. Mr. Hamilton is a Republican in politics, and Mrs. Hamilton is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

JOHN IRWIN. Continually advancing to the front, and even threatening to overshadow the vast aggregation of interests in which Southern California abounds, is the oil industry, holding out such giant possibilities as to revolutionize the motive power of railroads and other aids to progress, as well as to offer inducements for speculation, with its inevitable loss and gain. Among the early promoters of the oil business in Santa Paula is John Irwin, one of the pioneers who prosecuted the business successfully in Ventura county. At present retired from active participation in business affairs, his rest is a well merited one, and is the sequel to a life untiringly devoted to the tasks allotted it.

The interest of Mr. Irwin in the production of oil may be said to date as far back as the memories of his youth, for his birthplace was within four miles of the Drake, the first producing oil well in the state of Pennsylvania, which was opened in 1859. He was born in Cherry Tree, Venango county, Pa., May 4, 1841, a son of William Irwin, a native of the same place, and Eliza (Stewart) Irwin, a daughter of Elijah Stewart, and a native of Pennsylvania. The paternal great-grandfather, Richard, was born in County Armagh, Ireland, in 1740, and immigrated to the United States and Pennsylvania in 1761, at the age of twenty-one years. The paternal grandfather was one of the early settlers of Venango county, and lived to be eighty-seven years of age. In 1809 one of his brothers, John Irwin, built the first gristmill at Cherry Tree, and the first sawmill in the township was built by another brother, Ninian, in 1823. John and Ninian were appointed justices of the peace, and held the office for many years.

When John Irwin was yet a small lad his father kept a dairy, and he became interested in stock at a time when the average boy knows little outside of his rudimentary studies. At the age of eleven he bought and sold cows, and was as familiar with their good and bad points as are many men of mature years. By practical experience he also became familiar with the arduous work around a farm, and thus no royal road led to the success of later years. The death of his father when the son was but nineteen years materially added to his responsibilities, for his mother, six children, and the management of the farm, practically devolved upon his none too strong shoulders. In connection with his other interests had ever been that of oil production, of which he was incessantly reminded by its close proximity to his home, and during the few intervals of leisure allowed between his farm duties he worked for wages at the oil wells. In time he picked up quite a knowledge of the oil business, and eventually had an outfit and took contracts to sink wells, the owner of the well furnishing the boiler engine and wood rig, the other material being furnished by the driller. Gradually working his way up he in time became the owner of wells, and among the wells with which he became connected by right of purchase or development was the Old Sherman, which was drilled to a depth of six hundred feet by himself and an older brother. This famous old spouter had an industrious career of over twenty years, and when its days of usefulness were at an end it was estimated that it had flowed one million and nine hundred barrels, or about one thousand and two hundred barrels a day.

In 1880 Mr. Irwin spent six months on the line of the Northern Pacific Railroad, and among other undertakings drilled a water well at Tower City. In April, 1883, he came to Southern California on a prospecting tour, in company with Lyman Stewart, and immediately recognized the hidden possibilities of Ventura county. He ventured upon what is known in the west as "wild-cattin'," but which settled into a fine substantial business after roads were made, machinery brought from the east, and the general preparations perfecting for oil development in this part of the state. For assistance Mr. Stewart telegraphed for W. L. Hardison, whose interest became vital as his own, and in July, 1883, was formed the Hardison-Stewart Oil Company, of which Mr. Irwin became field superintendent, and continued in this capacity until 1887. He then went to Tar Creek, in the Sespe district and there was formed the Sespe Oil Company, Hon. Thomas R. Bard being a member of the same. In the producing of wells with a pipe line to the field, Mr. Irwin acted as superintendent of the field work, having complete supervision of the business of sinking the wells, of their production, and of the roads leading to them. Thomas R. Bard was president and W. L. Hardison general manager. After the consolidation of several of the oil companies into the Union Oil Company of California, Mr. Irwin became identified with the concern as general superintendent, and was thus employed up to January of 1900, when he retired from active business life. His years of experience contributed to render him one of the most widely known oil men in the country, and his advice was often sought where the soil produced evidences of its existence. Nor must it be supposed that his field of activity was limited to oil production, for he was variously interested in the general development of his county, and was one of the organizers of the Santa Paula Hardware Company, and of the Santa Paula Refinery. He is a practical all-around business man, and has never chased visionary phantoms which lead to disappointment and loss. He is the owner of considerable property in Santa Paula, and his family are housed in a comfortable cottage near the center of the town. He cast his first presidential vote for Abraham Lincoln, and has since voted the straight Republican ticket.

In 1868 Mr. Irwin married Caroline B. Canfield, a native of Niagara county, N. Y., and of this union there is one son, Ralph, who was born at Cherry Tree, Venango county, Pa., September 9, 1874.

REUBEN HART. Among those sturdy and farsighted pioneers to whom the towns of Guadalupe and Santa Maria owe a lasting debt of gratitude is Reuben Hart, than whom no citizen living in this part of Santa Barbara county is more respected. In his make up he combines those sterling characteristics which have wrought so exceedingly well when transplanted to the greater opportunities of this country, and which have their origin in England. He was born in Derbyshire, England, in 1843, and was educated in the public schools. As a means to future independence he learned the trade of carriage builder with the Stubbs Manufacturing Company at Derby City, remaining there for five years. For a time also he worked in a manufactory in Swansea, Wales, and after immigrating to the United States was employed in the Erie and New York car shops for four years, where he was recognized as an efficient workman.

In 1868, four years after his arrival in New York, Mr. Hart, with his brother, also a machinist, came to California, settling in Alameda county. At San José he entered the employ of D. S. Mills, as manager of his large wagon and agricultural implement manufactory. After one year he and his brother went to Castorville, where they established a general machine, blacksmith and wagon shop under the firm name of Hart Brothers. This association was amicably continued until 1878, when Reuben

Hart disposed of his interest to his brother, Thomas. The next combined effort of the brothers transpired in 1872, when they practically started the town of Guadalupe by erecting a machine shop and a large block of buildings, and acting as sub-agents for the Guadalupe ranch. They were very prosperous, and succeeded in interesting many home-seekers in the advantages to be found in the embryo town.

In 1875 Reuben Hart severed his connection with his brother in Guadalupe and came to Santa Maria, where he built a blacksmith, wagon, and machine shop on the corner of Main and Broadway, and the first brick building in the town, which is now occupied by Hastleman & Company, general merchants. He also built a feed mill, with steam power, and this necessarily placed him in intimate touch with the farming contingent, whose extensive patronage he for a long time enjoyed. In 1879 he still further branched out into mercantile enterprise by starting a lumber yard which was successfully conducted for some time, and in 1888 he built the Hart Hotel, a brick and stone building costing $35,000, and 100x120 feet in dimensions. There are forty-three sleeping rooms, parlors, smoking and reception rooms, gas, hot water, and all modern conveniences. This hotel was admirably conducted by Mr. Hart for six years; he proved a model host, and had a fine reputation among the traveling public.

One of the most advanced improvements in Santa Maria which owes its origin to Mr. Hart was the construction of the water works in 1880. The water was pumped all over the town by steam from a well eighty-five feet deep to an elevated tank, and the supply was equal to all demands. In 1897 Mr. Hart bought out the minor water works in the town, so at present he is in control of the entire Santa Maria water supply, being able to produce seventy-five thousand gallons daily. Nor do these interests represent all of his responsibilities, for he owns considerable other town property, as well as the slaughter-house and race-track. He is foremost in promoting worthy enterprises, and holds many prominent town positions, among these being a director in the race-track and park associations. He is in no sense a politician, believing that party should have no place in the election to positions of trust in the community, principle alone dictating the people's choice. He has rendered valuable service in promoting education, hospital service and other public institutions.

In 1880 Mr. Hart married Harriet Sharp, a native of England, and of this union there is one daughter, Harriet, who is a graduate of the high school. Mrs. Harriet Hart departed this life in June, 1897, mourned by a large circle of sincere friends for her many noble traits of head and heart.

JOHN W. HAMMONS. One of the pioneer and most successful insurance men of Southern California is John W. Hammons, who has been a resident of Ventura since 1889. He was born in Henry county, Mo., February 3, 1860, to which county his father, William H. Hammons, removed in a very early day, for many years afterward carrying on a farm as well as extensive carpentering and building interests. An industrious and competent man, had his life been spared past its prime, he would undoubtedly have gained noteworthy success, but he passed away when his son was a small child. His wife was Susan Williams, a native of Missouri and the daughter of a Kentuckian who joined the ranks of Missouri's pioneers.

When twenty-one years of age John W. Hammons settled in the village of Salem, Richardson county, Neb., where in 1883 he married Miss Dora L. Valentine, daughter of George W. and Mary Jeannette (Gore) Valentine, and a native of Rushford, Minn., where she was reared and educated. Born of their union are two children, Harry V. and Ramona D.

For a few years Mr. Hammons was employed as clerk in a general merchandise store. Before leaving Missouri he had served an apprenticeship to the printer's trade and in Salem rapidly advanced in journalism, culminating with the editorship of the Salem Index, through the columns of which he exerted a progressive influence for six or seven years. After removing to Ventura, Cal., in 1889 he continued in the same occupation and for a year published the Democrat, in partnership with John McGonigle, to whom he later disposed of his interest in the paper. Next he turned his attention to the insurance business, in which he has since been engaged exclusively, handling life, fire, accident and marine insurance, representing in all thirty-seven fire insurance companies. His business is the largest of its kind in the county. He represents the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York, which, through his efforts, is doing a large business in Ventura county. One policy alone, in November, 1901, amounted to $25,000, besides which every month brings many policies for smaller amounts, indicating the extent of his business and the patronage which he has established.

As a promoter of enterprises calculated to advance the general welfare of his community, Mr. Hammons has been prominently before the public. He was one of the originators of the Ventura Board of Trade and is always active in any of its enterprises. A Democrat in politics, he has a keen understanding of the issues and undertakings of his party and has served the interests of the same in various ways, including a service of seven years (1890-1897) as secretary of the Democratic county central committee. Fraternally he is associated with Lodge No. 613 B. P. O. E. at Santa Barbara, being one of its charter members. In 1889 he became a member of the National Guard of California, was appointed corporal, later became second lieutenant and afterward was promoted to be first lieutenant. At the breaking out of the Spanish-American war he was first lieutenant of Company H, Capt. A. W. Browne commanding, and with his company and regiment volunteered for service, expecting to be sent to the Philippines. Company H, Seventh California Volunteer Infantry, started for San Francisco, May 6, 1898, and remained there until December 2, of the same year, when they were mustered out at Los Angeles. When in San Francisco Mr. Hammons was appointed ordnance officer on the staff of Col. John R. Berry and served as such until he was honorably discharged. His first enlistment had been in Company D, Seventh Regiment, which later was consolidated with the Ninth Regiment, and Company D became Company H.

CHARLES LEE KING, M. D. With all of the advantages which a splendid theoretical equipment can bestow, added to years of practical experience in professional work, Dr. King embarked in the practice of medicine at Pasadena during 1893 and has since devoted himself closely and successfully to his profession. He is a member of one of the colonial families of Massachusetts and possesses many of the traits which enabled those pioneers to overcome the obstacles presented by a bleak and undeveloped region. His father, Henry J., a native of Suffield, Conn., received his education principally in Yale College, and later became a merchant of Medina, Ohio, also acted as assistant treasurer of Oberlin College. Removing to Hillsdale, Mich., in an early day, on the establishment of Hillsdale College by the Free Baptists in 1853 he was chosen secretary and treasurer of the institution, and filled the position until 1860. From that time until 1874 he was cashier of the First National Bank of Hillsdale, where he added to the reputation he had previously established as an expert accountant. On account of impaired health he gave up this position and spent some time in recuperating, after which he was for two terms agent of the Indians at Leach Lake, Minn. From there he went back to Hillsdale and later returned to Oberlin, Ohio, where he died at sixty-seven years. In religion he was an earnest and sincere member of the Congregational Church. A man of classical attainments, all through his life he was a student, and the acquirement of knowledge, historical, scientific and commercial, formed one of the greatest pleasures of his life. Perhaps one of the chief works of his life was in connection with Hillsdale College, of which he was an officer for some years, and long served as a trustee. To his labors, together with a few other public-spirited men, was due the growth of the institution until it had gathered beneath its shadow many hundreds of young men, whom it prepared for the activities of existence.

Three years after the death of Henry J. King his wife passed away in Oberlin. She was Sarah, daughter of Josiah Sumner Lee, who was born in Windham, Conn., and engaged in the drug business in that state. Later he removed to Ithaca, N. Y., where his daughter Sarah was born. His next place of residence was New York City. At an early day he became a merchant of Medina, Ohio, and from there moved to Hillsdale, Mich., where he died in 1880, aged eighty-two years. Fraternally he was a Mason and in religious connections a Congregationalist. His genealogy could be traced back in this country to the early part of the seventeenth century, when his English ancestors settled in Massachusetts. The family was represented in the Revolutionary war. Its members are now scattered all over the United States and are prominent in various professions and occupations. In the family of Henry J. and Sarah King there were six sons and two daughters, of whom all but three sons attained mature years, and at this writing two sons and both daughters are still living, David H. having died at twenty-one years of age. The younger living son, Henry Churchill King, A. M., D. D., Ph. D., a graduate of Oberlin College and later a student in the post-graduate course in Harvard College, now occupies the chair of systematic theology and philosophy in his alma mater, and, by reason of his exceptional mental qualities and wide researches, has gained a national reputation.

In Oberlin, Ohio, Charles Lee King was born March 24, 1853. He was educated in Hillsdale College, where he completed the sophomore years, but was then obliged to leave on account of reverses with which his father had met. For a time he was employed as clerk and for five years was assistant postmaster of Hillsdale. Meantime he had cherished a desire to study medicine, and, carefully saving his earnings, he was able to apply them toward the desired object. About 1876 he began his studies under Dr. H. Harris of Hillsdale, and in 1877 matriculated in the Chicago Medical College (now the medical department of Northwestern University), from which he was graduated in 1880 at the conclusion of a course of three years. Returning to Hillsdale he took up the practice of his profession and also for two terms acted as health officer, continuing in the town until 1889. Meantime, for seven months in 1883-84, he was engaged in post-graduate work in the Harvard College medical department. From 1889 until 1893 he was medical superintendent of Alma sanitarium, and meanwhile spent the winters of 1890, 1891 and 1893 in the New York Post-Graduate College. Coming to California in 1893, he opened a private sanitarium at Sierra Madre Villa, and from there in 1896 came to Pasadena, where he resides at No. 70 South Euclid avenue. He was married in Monroeville, Ohio, his wife being Miss Selina Bath, who was born in Bristol, England.

Various professional organizations receive attention from Dr. King, particularly the Pasadena Medical Association, of which he has officiated as president. In addition he is connected with the Los Angeles County and California State Medical Societies and the American Medical Association. Though not active as a partisan, his politics are of no uncertain stamp, but are staunchly Republican. An active worker in the Presbyterian Church, he served in it as a ruling elder. Before leaving Michigan he was made a Mason in Hillsdale and is now a member of the lodge and chapter at Pasadena, also is connected with the Elks lodge in this city.

CAPT. ISAAC B. HARDY. During the colonial period Benjamin Hardy left England for America and settled at Andover, Mass., where his son, James, was born and reared. The latter removed to East Strong, Franklin county, Me., where his son, Albert, first saw the light. In turn the latter sought a new home to reward his manhood's activities. In 1855 he settled at Freedom, LaSalle county, Ill., where he improved a valuable farm from a tract of raw prairie land. On retiring from agricultural pursuits, he came to Santa Barbara, and here his death occurred when he was eighty-four years of age. He had married Nancy R. Baldwin, who was born in New Sharon, Me., and died in Oakland, Cal., and two sons were born of their union, Isaac Baldwin and George F., the latter now a real-estate dealer in Oakland. Mrs. Hardy was a daughter of Naham Baldwin, who in early life was a seafaring man in the trans-Atlantic trade, and sailed around the world with his ship. Like the Hardys, the Baldwin family were early settlers of Massachusetts and removed from there to Maine.

At East Strong, Me., Isaac Baldwin Hardy was born June 10, 1843. In 1855 he accompanied the family to Illinois, where, August 16, 1862, he enlisted in Company A, Sixty-fourth Illinois Infantry, better known as Yates' Sharpshooters. Mustered into service at Springfield, he was sent at once to the front and took part in the second battle of Corinth, October 3 and 4, 1862, after which the regiment went into winter quarters at Glendale, Miss. The next year was spent in scouting. Among the battles in which Captain Hardy took part were the following: Dallas, Dalton, Buzzard's Roost, Resaca, Adairville, Peach Tree Creek, Snake Creek, Kennesaw mountain, siege of Atlanta, Altoona, Marietta, and then started on the march to the sea, taking part in various engagements en route. Thence they marched north through the Carolinas, and were at Averysboro, Rivers' Bridges, the capture of Columbia, S. C., and at Goldsboro and Bentonville. After the surrender of the Confederates they were ordered to Washington, where they participated in the grand review and were mustered out of service, later were honorably discharged at Springfield, Captain Hardy holding the rank of sergeant. While he took part in over thirty engagements and was hit at Corinth, Bentonville and Resaca, no wound was in the least serious; however, he had been affected by the hardships of war and for a long time after returning home was in poor health, although he endeavored to manage his farm near Odell, Ill. In 1872 he removed to Clinton, Iowa, and for five years was engaged in a sash and blind business. Returning to Livingston county, Ill., in 1877, he resumed farming. From there, in 1880, he moved to Kansas and took up a homestead near Norton, at the same time carried on contracting and building. On his arrival in Santa Barbara, in August, 1883, he turned his attention to carpentering, but since 1887 has been a contractor and builder, and among other contracts has built the Hopkins block and the residences of Mr. Whitney and E. R. Spaulding.

March 20, 1870, in Livingston county, Ill., Captain Hardy married Miss Zoraida G. Bolt, who was born in Colon, St. Joseph county, Mich., and was one of five children, three now living. The Bolt family is of Holland-Dutch descent and is related to the Putnams and the Van Rensselaers. Her grandfather, Thaddeus Bolt, married a descendant of Gen. Israel Putnam. Her father, Cornelius Bolt, a native of Schenectady, N. Y., moved to Colon, Mich., in 1845, and later settled in Livingston county, Ill. His wife was Elsie Ann, daughter of Charles Doughty, both natives of New York and descendants of a Scotch family that settled in Connecticut at an early day. Charles Doughty died in Michigan and his daughter, Mrs. Bolt, is now living at Mendon, that state, and is eighty-two years of age. After completing her education in Colon Seminary Mrs. Hardy taught school, first in Michigan, later in Illinois. Since coming to Santa Barbara she has been an active member of the Women's Relief Corps. To her marriage have been born four children, namely: Clara Frances, Mrs. Griffith, of Santa Barbara; Ethel C., a student in Berkeley College; Albert C., a graduate of Santa Barbara Business College; and Blanche B.

During his residence in Illinois Captain Hardy was made a Mason in the blue lodge of Freedom, Ill. At this writing he is past commander of Starr King Post No. 52, and formerly he served as an aide on the department staff. Politically he is a Republican and in religion holds membership in the Grace Methodist Episcopal Church, to whose official board he belongs. He is a member of the Chamber of Commerce and interested in other movements for the development of Santa Barbara's trade facilities. Ever since his participation in the Civil war he has maintained an interest in military affairs and has kept well posted in military tactics. At a mass meeting held when the Spanish-American war was declared, he was appointed to organize and drill four companies of home guards, and this he proceeded to do, the result being a fine brigade of well-trained militia. He also organized and commanded the Santa Barbara Boys and Girls Brigades, the former of which had a reputation as the banner company of its kind in the United States.

THEODORE A. KELSEY. There are few of the residents of the Santa Clara valley whose identification with its interests antedates the arrival of Mr. Kelsey, a pioneer of 1869. For ten years before that he had been a resident of California, but his success and prosperity may be said to date from his arrival in the county of Ventura, with whose history he has been associated since his early manhood. Born in Rockaway, Morris county, N. J., he accompanied his parents to California in 1859 and settled in Oakland. Acquiring a knowledge of the harness-maker's trade, he followed that occupation in San Francisco for seven years. From there he came to the Santa Clara valley, where he operated rented land at first, saving his earnings in order that he might invest in property for himself.

For several years after 1876 Mr. Kelsey owned and operated the Jack Hill ranch near Montalvo, where he was associated with his brother, J. B. Kelsey, in the raising of hogs. In 1887 he rented Captain Blackburn's ranch and for eight years engaged in raising beans there. His next purchase comprised sixty-two acres, formerly known as the Cline farm, and situated near West Saticoy. On this place he has since made his home. All of the land is under cultivation, and is devoted to the raising of walnuts, apricots and lima beans. The latter he raises more especially for the seed, which he sells to eastern seed houses. During 1900 he shipped seventy-five tons of hand-picked seed beans, which shows the large scale upon which the business is conducted. At the World's Fair in 1893 he was awarded a premium on the Lazy Wife bean, a variety that is particularly fine.

The subject of irrigation receives considerable attention from Mr. Kelsey, who realizes its importance in the development of California. To furnish water for one hundred acres, he has wells that are sixty feet and three hundred feet deep, respectively. He is a member of the Walnut Growers' Association at Saticoy, a stockholder in the People's Lumber Company at Ventura, and a director of the Saticoy Co-operative store. Progressive and enterprising, he is eager to carry out plans for the upbuilding of the valley, and has done much to benefit his locality. For nine years he was a trustee of the Saticoy school district, during which time he was active in promoting the standard of education and introducing needed improvements. While he is not a partisan, he is nevertheless a worker in the Republican party and a thorough sympathizer with its principles. Being a natural farmer and practical fruit man, he has made a special study of the fruit industry, and his land forms one of the finest fruit ranches near Saticoy. However, his greatest delight is not in his ranch or his town, but in his home and family, and his greatest ambition is to promote the welfare of his children. One of his daughters, Mabel E., is a graduate of the California State University at Berkeley; Adaline is in the school for trained nurses at San Francisco; Rita F. is making a special study of music, for which she possesses talent; Inez is attending the Ventura high school. The eldest son, Earle, who possesses ability in the mechanical arts, is being given the advantage of a course in that line at the State University.

C. E. HOAR. The family represented by Mr. Hoar of Ventura county is one of the most illustrious in New England, with the history of which its members have been identified since the colonial period. During the Revolutionary war Capt. Samuel Hoar was a gallant officer in the patriot army, and after the close of the conflict he was for many years a member of the Massachusetts legislature. His son, Samuel, Jr., was born in Lincoln, Mass., May 18, 1788, and was graduated from Harvard College in 1802, after which he studied law and in 1805 was admitted to the bar. Establishing himself in practice at Concord, he was for forty years one of the most distinguished attorneys of the Bay state. In 1825 and 1833 he was elected to the state senate, and from 1835 to 1837 he served in the United States congress. The degree of LL.D. was conferred upon him by Harvard College. His death occurred in Concord, November 2, 1856.

By the marriage of Samuel Hoar, Jr., to a daughter of Roger Sherman, two sons were born, both of whom attained national reputations. One of these, Ebenezer R., was the father of C. E. Hoar, while the other, George Frisbie, is known throughout the United States as the senator from Massachusetts and as one of our nation's leading men. Ebenezer R. Hoar was born in Concord February 21, 1816, and was graduated from Harvard College in 1835. Five years later he was admitted to the bar, and entered upon a distinguished career at the bar and on the bench. From 1849 to 1855 he served as judge of the court of common pleas; from 1859 to 1869 he was a judge of the state supreme court. In March, 1869, under the administration of Ulysses

S. Grant, he was chosen attorney-general of the United States, but resigned from the cabinet in July, 1870. In 1871 he was a member of the joint high commission which framed the treaty of Washington with Great Britain. He accepted a seat in the United States congress December 1, 1873, and remained in that body until March 3, 1875, when he resumed his private practice. Politically he was a firm believer in Republican principles, and was himself one of the leaders in the establishment of the party's platform.

The brilliant career of Ebenezer R. Hoar has been duplicated in that of his brother, George F. Hoar, who was born at Concord August 29, 1826, graduated from Harvard in 1846, and began the practice of law at Worcester, Mass. In 1856 he was elected to the Massachusetts legislature and the next year became a state senator. His long and successful connection with national statesmanship began March 4, 1869, when he took his seat in congress. He remained in that body until March 3, 1877, when he retired. Two days later he entered the United States senate. His subsequent history is known to all. Frequently he has been a delegate to national Republican conventions. From 1874 to 1880 he was overseer of Harvard College; in 1880 he was regent of the Smithsonian Institute. Other offices held by him have been those of president of the American Antiquarian Society and trustee of the Peabody Museum of Archeology. Like his father, he is a member of the Massachusetts Historical Society. The degree of LL.D. has been conferred upon him by William and Mary, Amherst, Yale and Harvard Colleges.

In Concord, Mass., with the history of which his forefathers were so closely associated, C. E. Hoar was born and reared. Following the example of his father and grandfather, he became a student in Harvard, from which he was graduated. In 1875 he came to California, and during the first thirteen years of his residence in this state he engaged in the sheep-raising business and rented practically one-half of the entire valley in which his ranch was located, Capt. A. W. Brown renting the other half for a similar period. Eventually Mr. Hoar purchased seven hundred acres near Simi, Ventura county, and this he has turned to the profitable raising of grain and alfalfa, having one hundred acres in the latter. At present his specialty in stock is the raising of hogs. The ranch is fitted out with approved modern appliances and labor-saving devices. Irrigation is facilitated by artesian wells, one of which is ninety feet deep. Success has made of Mr. Hoar an advocate of the manifold advantages to be found in this part of the state, and he is one of the most enterprising of the easterners who have here found a pleasant home and congenial occupation. He cast his first presidential vote for James A. Garfield and has ever since affiliated with the Republican party.

MRS. H. G. HELMER. To trace the success of Mrs. Helmer in her chosen occupation of floriculture is to go back to the fundamental principles of her life, which are perseverance, many-sided capabilities, and an ardent love of nature in all her moods and an understanding of her many peculiarities. No smallest shoot in the large and complete greenhouses but seems to have a future of verdure, flower or fruit, and because of this prophecy it receives the most careful ministrations, and is gently induced to fulfil expectations. From an insignificant and experimental beginning Mrs. Helmer has developed by far the largest trade in the city, and no one questions her right to be designated one of the most artistic decorators in a state where floral embellishment seems as second nature. From earliest youth this successful florist evinced a love for children, flowers and sunshine, three of the happiest combinations, and the most harmonious of character developers. She was born in the city of Oldenburg, Germany, her maiden name having been Helena G. Miners. Her father, Otto Miners, was one of the principal men of the little German town, which was also his birthplace, and there in his mature years he became a large wholesale manufacturer and merchant. To him belonged the distinction of selling the first sewing machine in the empire, which was the make of Wheeler & Wilson. He came from a very old family of that section of Germany, and his death in his native town ended a career marked by large achievements and many public-spirited undertakings. His helpmate through life was formerly Helena Linderman, who was born and died in Oldenburg.

There was but one child in the family, and Miss Miners received every advantage which her parents' circumstances permitted. She was educated in the schools of Oldenburg and as an aid to future independence learned to be a kindergarten teacher under some of the best masters in the country where this admirable system of early instruction originated. In 1873 she immigrated to the United States, and after a short sojourn in New York City came to San Francisco and entered the German kindergarten of that city, being one of the first teachers in this part of the country. At first assistant principal, she was later promoted to the principalship, which position she held until her resignation in 1875.

June 6, 1875, Miss Miners married George Helmer, a native of Saxe-Weimer, Germany, and a barber by occupation. Mr. Helmer came to New York City from his native land and there followed his trade, removing later to San Francisco, and in 1875 locating in Santa Barbara, where he has one of the finest and most popular shops in the city. He is a master in his line, and possesses those requirements which are inseparably associated with success in this most necessary of callings.

At first Mrs. Helmer had a small private greenhouse, but about twelve years ago she decided to branch out and make a regular business of raising plants and flowers, and now has very large houses for propagating plants. The cut flower gardens are in the adjoining block to the Arlington, and there is a flower stand in the hotel. When President McKinley visited Santa Barbara, Mrs. Helmer decorated the dining room, which was by all pronounced a model of artistic skill, roses galore and of many varieties being used, three thousand five hundred in all. The president's table was decorated with La France roses. Especially worthy of mention are the unique and beautiful decorations thought out by Mrs. Helmer for wedding parties, and equally appropriate her funeral embellishments. Every department of her trade is under her own personal supervision, and she has taken the premiums for artistic work at the Santa Ana floral carnivals, and on many other occasions where there was pronounced competition and an opportunity for more than ordinary decorative knowledge. Mrs. Helmer is a member of the Santa Barbara Horticultural Association.

To Mr. and Mrs. Helmer have been born four children: Alexander, who assists his mother with her work; Otto, who is a foreman in a mining camp in British Columbia; Leta and Adellea, who are at home. Mr. Helmer is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. The family are members of the Lutheran Church.

FORDYCE GRINNELL, M. D. At the time of the revocation of the edict of Nantes the French-Huguenot family of Grinnell joined in the Protestant dispersion and became residents of England, whence three brothers crossed the ocean to America, settling in Massachusetts. Sylvester Grinnell, a native of the state of Vermont, and a soldier in the war of 1812, was the first of the name to embrace the doctrines of the Friends' Church, and his son, Rev. Jeremiah A. Grinnell, also of Vermont birth, became a minister in that society. The beautiful doctrines of that sect were exemplified by his life and teachings, and he did much to broaden the influence of the church. From Morrow county, Ohio, in 1850, he moved to Cedar county, Iowa, settling in Springdale and buying a tract of new land. Many other towns afterward received the encouragement of his presence as a minister of the gospel. Both in the north and the south he founded new churches and strengthened established congregations. Even after coming to California in his old age he organized several new congregations. For more than fifty years he continued in ministerial work and when very old passed away in Pasadena. In his labors as a preacher he had the faithful and devoted assistance of his wife, who was a member of an old Quaker family of Vermont, where she was born. In childhood she went to Morrow county, Ohio, with her father, Thomas Taber. Her death occurred in Tennessee. The family of Jeremiah A. and Martha (Taber) Grinnell consisted of four sons and four daughters, of whom two sons and two daughters are living, namely: Edwin, of Des Moines, Iowa; Fordyce, of Pasadena, Cal.; Mrs. Rosa G. Hastings, of Maryville, Tenn.; and Mrs. Evelyn Cleaver, of Indiana. After the death of Mrs. Martha Grinnell, Rev. J. A. Grinnell married Jane M. Kille, in Damascus, Ohio. She is still living and makes Pasadena her home.

At Mount Gilead, Morrow county, Ohio, Fordyce Grinnell was born April 23, 1844. He studied classics in the Farmers' Institute near Lafayette, Ind., and during the war was for two years associated with the Freedmen's Bureau, teaching the colored people in Missouri. Later he engaged in educational work in Tennessee and while teaching also gained his rudimentary knowledge of medicine. In 1873 he was graduated from Miami Medical College of Cincinnati, Ohio, after which he acted as physician and surgeon to the Wichita Indian agency in the Indian Territory, practicing for five years near Fort Sill. Meantime, October 21, 1874, in Rochester, N. H., he was united in marriage with Miss Elizabeth Pratt, and while they were living near Fort Sill their first child, Joseph, was born. In 1878 the family removed to Tennessee, where Dr. Grinnell practiced at Maryville for two and one-half years. In 1881 he was appointed government physician and surgeon at Red Cloud Agency (now the Pine Ridge Agency), where he remained two years. Another son, Fordyce, Jr., was born at this agency, while the only daughter, Elizabeth, was born subsequently when the family were for two years stationed at the Rose Bud Agency.

During the years of his service as government physician Dr. Grinnell always treated the Indians with consideration and thoughtful kindness. As a result he won their confidence. At no time did he ever wear arms although often the red men were on the war path, but he knew himself and family to be safe with them. When an Indian war was impending, the other white families at the agency were moved away in government wagons, but his family remained among the Sioux and received from them the most courteous treatment. On leaving the government service, in 1885, he came to California and purchased property at Pasadena. At the solicitation of his old friend, Colonel Pratt, he accepted an appointment as physician in the hospital connected with the Indian training school at Carlisle, Pa., but a year later returned to Pasadena, where he has since conducted a general practice in medicine and surgery. He owns and has improved three and one-half acres on Marengo avenue, also has property in other parts of the city, and has improved various orange groves. As an organizer and director he was connected with the Pickering Land and Water Company, which laid out and started the town of Whittier. The name of Whittier was suggested by Mrs. Grinnell on the occasion of her first visit to the town site and the suggestion was at once adopted by the company. At one time he was president of the Pasadena Medical Society, in whose organization he assisted. For years he was a director of the Young Men's Christian Association, of which he was also honored as the president. In religion he is a Presbyterian, and in politics a believer in Republican principles.

Sylvester Grinnell, brother of Fordyce, graduated at Oberlin, Ohio, and preached as a Congregational minister for many years in Wisconsin.

Mrs. Grinnell is of Puritan lineage. Her great-grandfather, Simeon Pratt, settled in Roxbury during Revolutionary days, and the house in which he lived still stands. He was a charter member of the Washington Lodge of Masons, which he served as warden. His son, Nathan, a merchant of Roxbury, was the father of Rev. Joseph H. Pratt, who became a minister in the Society of Friends, and who married Martha E. Hanson, daughter of Robert Hanson. The latter represented the second generation in descent from one of three brothers emigrating from England. A native of North Carolina, Robert Hanson started northward for New England and settled at Thorndike, Me., entering three hundred and twenty acres of land there and becoming a farmer of means and influence. There were twelve children in his family, among them being Martha E., who was born in Maine and now, at eighty-five years of age, makes her home in Indianapolis, Ind. By her marriage to Rev. J. H. Pratt, one son and three daughters were born, namely: Charles Eadward, who died in Boston; Mrs. Jennie Woollard, of Amesbury, Mass.; Mrs. Elizabeth Pratt, of Pasadena, Cal.; and Mrs. Hannah Jessup, of Indianapolis, Ind. The son, Charles Eadward Pratt, is worthy of more extended mention than the limits of this article permit. Known throughout New England as lawyer and litterateur, he was born at Vassalborough, Me., in 1845, and in 1870 was graduated from Haverford (Pa.) College. After having completed his law studies with Messrs. Jones and Otis (former associates of Governor Andrew), he was admitted to the Suffolk bar in June, 1871, and to the bar of the United States in July, 1872. For a time general practice engaged his attention, but soon he made a specialty of patent law. In May, 1881, he became counsel for Pope Manufacturing Company, a position which he held until shortly before his death. Elected from the twenty-first ward to the city council of Boston, in 1881 and 1882 he was president of that body, and for a time he was a trustee of the Boston Public Library. It is a noteworthy fact that he was the first Quaker to hold any office in Boston; he was also the first of that society to speak on Boston common since the execution of Mary Dyer, his address being delivered before Post No. 113, G. A. R., on Decoration day of 1882. Notwithstanding his active professional career, he kept in touch with public affairs of moment and with the onward march of literature representing the modern phases of thought. At the time that bicycles were first introduced he became a champion of the wheel, was one of the earliest riders, projected the League of American Wheelmen, and was its first president. He also founded "The Bicycling World," and acted as editor of "Outing." On all questions connected with the privileges and interests of bicycling he was regarded as a practical authority. At the time of his death he was engaged in a translation of Les Carboles's "Historie de la Nouvelle France."

The early childhood of Mrs. Grinnell was passed at the family home, on the banks of the Penobscot river, about sixty miles north of Bangor. Living close to nature, she early gained a love for all her moods, whether of summer sun or winter snow, and, like all who have a teacher so profound, she is richly endowed with the highest ideals of moral obligations. During those same days she began to understand the situation of the homeless Indians, whose fast-thinning ranks were drifting slowly toward the west, and the injustice done them awakened within her a deep pity for their pathetic and hopeless condition. Always fond of writing, since coming to California she has devoted considerable attention to literature, and is now, with her older son, on the staff of "Out West" (formerly "Land of Sunshine"). She is the author of the following works: "How John and I Brought Up the Child," published by the Sunday-School Union of Philadelphia; "John and I and the Church," published by Fleming H. Revell, of Chicago; "For the Sake of a Name," by David C. Cook, of Chicago; "Our Feathered Friends" (which she wrote in collaboration with her son Joseph), published by D. C. Heath & Co., of Boston, and now in use in the public schools of the United States as a supplementary reader; and "Birds of Song and Story," by herself and son, Joseph, written in the interests of the Audubon Society, and published by A. W. Mumford, of Chicago. In addition, she edited "Gold Hunting in Alaska," written by her older son and published by David C. Cook. The son, who is an instructor in the Leland Stanford Summer School, makes a specialty of ornithology and biology, and is a fellow in the American Ornithological Union. In the interests of this science he has made two trips to Alaska, thus securing the finest collection yet obtained of Alaska birds. On one trip he spent four months around the islands of Sitka, but on the second trip he pushed further northward, accompanying twenty men on a gold hunt, and spending the winter beyond the Arctic circle, three hundred miles up the Kowak river. Fordyce Grinnell, Jr., second son of Dr. and Mrs. Grinnell, is now a student in Stanford University. He has chosen entomology as his pursuit and has already won some place among the lovers of this science. Elizabeth, the daughter, is pursuing a college course at Throop, Pasadena.

C. D. BONESTEL. The genial and popular postmaster of Ventura has crowded into his well rounded life much of interest and even adventure, and no one within the borders of the town more fully realizes our idea of the typical sturdy and substantial type of men, whose enterprise and ambition drew them to the Pacific coast, during the days of glittering gold and possibilities. In the intervening years between 1849 and the present, he has tarried in the wake of the fortunes lost and won, the surprises and disappointments, and has made his influence felt in the town which is his by right of adoption and untiring public service. Many of the large enterprises which have so materially aided in the general development of the neighborhood owe their partial origin and ultimate success to his profound financial understanding, and clear, common sense business methods, and his name is another expression for all that is admirable in the world of progress and upright-ness.

The Bonestel family came originally from Germany, and has, at the hands of its different members, undergone various changes as to orthography, some spelling their name Bohnstein, which is the original, while other spellings adopted are Bonesteel and Bonestell. The grandfather, David, lived in Columbia county, N. Y., and later removed to Greene county, where he spent his days in conducting a farm. His son John, the father of C. D., was born in Columbia county, and was up to the time of his death a farmer in Greene county. He married Deborah Carvin, who was born in Connecticut, and died in New Hartford, Iowa. They became the parents of six children, two of whom are living, C. D. being the youngest and the only one on the coast.

On his father's farm in Greene county, N. Y., C. D. Bonestel was born May 30, 1825, and there he was reared to agricultural pursuits. As may be imagined his educational opportunities were somewhat limited, owing both to the necessity which required his services on the farm, and to the crude methods of imparting knowledge at that time. He has a vivid recollection of wrestling with the problems as set down in that old landmark among educational books, Dabald's Arithmetic, and of a log school house the conveniences of which were in sad contrast with those of the present. In 1849 he decided to enlarge his prospects by removal to the west, whence came wonderful tales of hidden riches, and accordingly he boarded the Crescent City in New York harbor, bound for Aspinwall, Panama. Arriving at the peninsular town he was detained for nearly three months owing to there being no vessels at Panama. Meantime people were dying in large numbers of cholera. Finally he succeeded in securing passage on the sailing vessel, Crown Princess, and reached San Francisco in September of 1849, having been on the journey from Panama just eighty-five days. For a time he worked and prospected in the mines in Eldorado county, Cal., and after eighteen months settled in Placerville, the same county, and bought a little log house. This unassuming structure in time became prominent as the Placer Hotel, and was conducted with varying success until 1854. The better to accommodate the transient public, he then built a brick building, which went up in smoke in 1856, but was rebuilt and managed until 1858, when it passed into other hands. Mr. Bonestel then engaged in ranching and the cattle business until 1861.

Determining to revisit the scenes of his youth in 1862, Mr. Bonestel set sail on the steamer Golden Gate for Panama. Arriving near Manzanilla the steamer caught fire and was consumed in flame, two hundred and ten lives being lost and one hundred and fifty saved. With others equally fortunate Mr. Bonestel made his escape from the wreck in a boat which eventually capsized, but he succeeded in reaching shore one hundred miles from Manzanilla. Utterly exhausted from his combat with the waves and elements, he hardly saw a way of reaching his destination, but succeeded in securing horses and a conveyance with which he traveled for ten days before reaching the town. There he boarded another boat to Panama, and finally reached New York, and his former home, where he remained for three months. The journey back to San Francisco by way of Panama was embellished with an even more picturesque incident than its predecessors, for the good ship Areal was singled out by the pirate steamer Alabama, which swept down upon it from over the horizon, and took possession of all on board. It was the piratical intention to land the passengers (over eight hundred) at San Domingo, Hayti, but owing to the captain signing bonds payable on the recognition of the Southern Confederacy to the amount of $300,000, the party were allowed to proceed unmolested to Panama. Crossing the isthmus they again set sail for San Francisco and arrived at their destination in January of 1863.

For a few months after returning to the west Mr. Bonestel engaged in prospecting and mining at Austin, Nev., and then with a Mr. White engaged in the banking and brokerage business for eighteen months. He then bought out Mr. White, and when the First National Bank was started with a capital of $200,000, he accepted the position of vice-president and manager, but resigned a year later, on account of his health, and went to San Francisco. He there bought in 1868 an interest in the Henry Payote book and stationery business, now the Payote-Upham company. Mr. Upham bought out Mr. Bonestel in 1871. After a short trip to the east Mr. Bonestel then availed himself of the great boom in mining stocks, and for a few months bought and sold the same in San Francisco, but without success, and then determined to go to the southern part of the state and take an inventory of the prospects there to be found. So well was he satisfied with Ventura, that he returned here and took up his residence in 1875. After a short time he was appointed under sheriff under J. B. Stone, and after four years of service he bought an interest in the general merchandise firm of Chaffee & Gilbert, the affairs of the concern being then conducted under the firm name of Chaffee, Gilbert & Bonestel. This arrangement was amicably carried on until 1893, when the firm added to their interests a lumber business, the management of which was undertaken by Mr. Bonestel. They later bought out Mr. Gilbert, and the firm then ran under the name of Chaffee & Bonestel, although the lumber business was soon disposed of and the general merchandise part alone continued.

In 1893 Mr. Bonestel undertook a trip to the east, taking in the World's Fair and other points of interest. While in Troy, N. Y., he received a message announcing that his partner, Mr. Chaffee, was stricken with paralysis. This news necessitated an immediate return to the west, and in 1894 he settled up the business of Chaffee & Bonestel, so long conducted under successful auspices. In February of 1898 he was appointed by President McKinley postmaster of Ventura, a position which he has since creditably held, to the satisfaction of all concerned. In his capacity of a staunch Republican he has held other offices of importance, including that of school trustee for eight years and city trustee for two years, and he has also been a member of the county central committee, and chairman of the same for three terms.

Upon the organization of the People's Lumber Company in 1893, Mr. Bonestel was elected president of the concern, which position he has since held. The lumber company does an enormous business, and the extensive trade extending over the whole county has justified the starting and maintenance of yards at Oxnard and Santa Paula. The capital stock is $80,000, and the affairs of the company are under the superior management of W. A. Bonestel, son of the president, and one of the best informed men on lumber matters in Southern California. C. D. Bonestel has, among his multiplicity of interests, a ranch of sixteen hundred acres, ten miles north of Ventura, on San Antonio creek, which is devoted to general farming and stock-raising, it being mostly grazing land. He also owns considerable city property, and much more has at times been in his possession, and in the certain changes passed into other ownership.

The first marriage of Mr. Bonestel occurred in New York with Elizabeth Falk, the issue being one son, Watson A., general manager of the People's Lumber Company. A second marriage was contracted in San Francisco, with Nannie A. Smith, who claims distinguished connections, her maternal uncle, Byron Weston, having been lieutenant-governor of Massachusetts three terms. Mrs. Bonestel was born in Texas, and her parents were from Massachusetts. Of the union of Mr. Bonestel and Miss Smith there are two sons and two daughters, viz.: Cora, who is now Mrs. F. J. Sifford of Ventura; Alonzo Frank, who has charge of the rural delivery, under his father's management; Edith, Mrs. Arneal, of Camarillo, Ventura county, Cal., and Chester Dean, who resides at home. Mr. Bonestel is a member of various political, mercantile, social, and philanthropic societies, and is one of the most honored members of the California Pioneer Society.

ELISHA K. GREEN. His residence in Los Angeles Mr. Green dates from the spring of 1873. He was born in the township of Gaines, Orleans county, N. Y., August 30, 1839, being a son of Eri Allen and Johanna (Kelley) Green, also natives of New York state. His maternal grandfather, John Kelley, a soldier in the war of 1812, was a man of great mechanical and inventive genius, and as such became well known among the people of Monroe county, N. Y., where he made his home near Rochester. The paternal grandfather was a farmer of New York and descended from a Massachusetts family who in turn traced their lineage to Scotland. From New York E. A. Green moved to Eaton county, Mich., in 1844, and improved a farm from the woods, spending his remaining years in the cultivation of the tract. In religion he was a Baptist. He was one of the active organizers of Kalamazoo College and subsequently maintained an interest in its progress. His death occurred in Charlotte, Eaton county, Mich.; his wife died in 1857. They were the parents of eleven children, of whom E. K. was the seventh. He received a public-school and academic education in Charlotte, Mich., and from eighteen until twenty-six years of age taught school in Eaton and Ionia counties, Mich. While in Chester township, Eaton county, he was elected school inspector for that township.

After graduating from Bryant & Stratton's Business College in Chicago in 1864, Mr. Green returned to Michigan and remained there over a year. He then removed to Batavia, Ill., and secured employment as bookkeeper in a large manufacturing establishment. Four years later he resigned to enter the grocery and crockery business, and after another four years he sold out his business in order to come west. November, 1872, found him in California, and the prospects impressed him so favorably that in the spring of 1873 he brought his family here and embarked in business as a manufacturer of wind-mills and pumps, his factory being on Aliso street. Some of the wind-mills that he made are still standing in Southern California. At a later period he sold hydraulic pumps and gasoline and steam engines, selling the same in Riverside, San Bernardino and San Diego counties, and as far to the north as Santa Barbara and Ventura. By means of a water rod he located many wells, which he understood forty years ago, but did not apply the principle until some years after he came to Los Angeles. To him is due the credit for starting the first artificial water-works in Southern California. On account of having sales in different places, he became familiar with every town in Southern California, and had friends everywhere. The last location of his factory was on Ord and Buena Vista streets, where he remained until retiring from business in 1896.

The real-estate interests of Los Angeles owe much to the wise judgment of Mr. Green. He laid out Green tract, comprising seven acres between Eighth and Ninth, Valencia and Union, and opened up Green avenue through the block, which he has since built up. His purchase on the hill in 1873 was the first made there, and through putting up wind-mills and later building a water system of his own, he was able to irrigate his place and set it out in trees. During the long period of his residence in the west he has seen many changes, and some of them have been remarkable. At that time freight rates were so high that the carload of wind-mills he brought cost him $750 in freight, and for years afterward he paid rates equally as high. He recalls vividly the selling of his first mill to Prudent Beaudry, the first sale he made in California. At first it was not easy to find customers, but after a time, as the people began to know him personally and feel confidence in his honor and judgment, his trade increased until he had all he could manage. Through his connection with the Society of Los Angeles Pioneers, of which he is a charter member, he keeps in touch with other old settlers and enjoys with them an occasional meeting to call to mind the days of auld lang syne. Through much of his life he was a Republican, but the importance of prohibition principles led him to ally himself with the party pledged to oppose the liquor traffic. Years ago he was for four years a member of the city council, during which time he devoted two or three days each week to council duties, but received no wages for his work. The development of water was one of the perplexing problems that the councils of those days were called upon to solve and settle, and there were other questions almost as difficult and annoying brought before them for solution. The securing of water for irrigation had reached its limit without further development and a large expenditure of money. The only feasible plan for enlarging the irrigation facilities was to bring the water from a distance of eight miles, and this task was accomplished during his term of office. In religion he has been identified with the Independent Church of Christ.

The marriage of Mr. Green, in Eaton county, Mich., united him with Miss Myra C. Halladay. They have two children: Floyd E., an assayer and chemist; and Ruth L., wife of David Ferguson, of Los Angeles. The Halladays are of Scotch and Welsh extraction and were early settlers of Connecticut, going thence to the vicinity of Brattleboro, Vt. Mrs. Green was a daughter of David and Nancy (Carpenter) Halladay, natives of Vermont. After she accompanied the family to Eaton county, Mich., she engaged in teaching school for a time. Two sisters and a brother now live in Ionia county, Mich., while two brothers, Daniel and Monroe, reside in Santa Ana, Cal. Among the residents of Los Angeles Mr. and Mrs. Green have a host of warm personal friends, who have been attracted to them by their many worthy traits of character and their prominence among the pioneers of the city.

GEORGE W. GOODE. Occupying a position among the ranchers of Ventura county, and especially prominent in the activities of Saticoy and vicinity, is Mr. Goode, who came from Cincinnati, Ohio, to California in 1889, and after one year near Los Angeles and San Diego, in June, 1890, bought his present property near Saticoy. The estate which he bought forms a portion of the Richards property and comprises one hundred acres, all under walnuts. At this writing he has fifty-seven acres of soft-shell walnuts, unexcelled as to quality, and the trees are in a healthy and gratifying condition. The improvements on the ranch are of a permanent nature and give evidence of the owner's progressive spirit.

A native of Georgia, Mr. Goode was born thirty miles southwest of Atlanta August 27, 1841. There and in Alabama he grew to manhood. For several years he engaged in the mercantile business in Columbus, Ga. During the Civil war he was conscripted into the Confederate army and remained for a year, but as soon as possible left the Southern army and went north, in the summer of 1864, not wishing to take part in the struggle against the Union. In the beginning of 1865 he joined the Union army under General Sherman, then in the southern part of South Carolina, which took up its line of march through the Carolinas. He was at Columbia when that city was burned by the Union forces and at or near Goldsboro, N. C., in the last fighting between the armies of General Sherman and General Johnston, soon after which the southern forces surrendered and Sherman's army was marched to Washington City, reviewed and disbanded, the regiment to which he belonged being sent to Camp Denison, near Cincinnati, and mustered out there.

Settling in Cincinnati, Mr. Goode engaged in the manufacture of confectionery about twenty years and met with gratifying success. Since he left Cincinnati he has devoted his attention to the raising of walnuts, and is one of the active members of the Walnut Growers' Association. His family consists of his wife (whose maiden name was Ada Lawrence) and one daughter, Mildred, and they are numbered among the representative families of their locality. Among those who are trying to secure adequate and extensive means of irrigation Mr. Goode stands foremost, for he realizes that in California irrigation is a problem to be satisfactorily solved before any community can attain its greatest prosperity. In politics he is a Republican and supports the men and measures of his party.

HUGH GLASSELL. The position occupied by Mr. Glassell as executor of the estate of his father, the late Andrew Glassell, gives him the oversight of one of the large and valuable properties whose accumulation the growth and progress of Los Angeles county has rendered possible. Added to the influence given by the management of so valuable an estate is the prestige belonging to one bearing the honored name of Glassell, which is so intimately associated with the pioneer professional history of Los Angeles City and calls to mind the talents of one whose death was a loss to our citizenship.

During the residence in San Francisco of his parents, Andrew and Lucy (Toland) Glassell, occurred the birth of their son, Hugh, who was one of nine children. Born July 11, 1859, he was about six years of age when the close of the Civil war brought the family as permanent residents to Los Angeles. Primarily educated in grammar schools, he afterward attended the high school, where he made civil engineering one of his favorite studies. On leaving school he went into the field as an engineer and for five years was employed on the Northern Pacific Railroad, mainly as instrument man, although he was gradually advanced from that position to the important and responsible office of engineer on construction in charge of a division, in which capacity he spent some time in Washington, Idaho and Montana. On quitting the road he turned his attention to business pursuits and for two years conducted a hardware store in Sprague, Wash.

Henry H. Keanworth

Returning to Los Angeles in 1887, Mr. Glassell assisted in looking after his father's extensive interests, and on the death of that parent, January 28, 1901, he became executor of the estate. His broad experience in this capacity gives him a thorough knowledge of real-estate values and brings weight to his opinion on subjects pertaining to property in this part of the state. Politics has as yet never engaged his attention, and aside from voting the Democratic ticket he takes no part whatever in municipal affairs. Of his first marriage one son, Andrew, was born. His second wife, Anita M., is a daughter of J. A. Kelly, a former county recorder of Los Angeles, where she was reared and educated. Mr. and Mrs. Glassell make their home in Los Angeles, and have an extended acquaintance among the residents of this city.

HENRY H. KLAMROTH, B. S., LL. B. The descendant of a long line of worthy German ancestors, Judge Klamroth was born in New York City, at No. 64 St. Mark's Place, October 11, 1869. His father, Albert, was a son of Rev. Henry Klamroth, who was a minister in the Lutheran Church and a lifelong resident of Germany. Albert attended the University of Berlin, from which he was graduated. On account of the prominent part that he bore in the revolution of 1847-48, it became unsafe for him to remain in his native land, and accordingly he escaped to England, coming thence to the United States. Subsequently he became one of the leading citizens of New York City, whose German population owes a debt of gratitude to his high citizenship and constant efforts in its behalf. Indeed, Germans there and elsewhere are under lasting obligations to such men as he and William Steinway, the head of the great piano house, also Oswald Ottendorfer, the proprietor of the New York Staats Zeitung, all of whom, while manifesting the deepest loyalty to the country of their adoption, yet made unceasing efforts to promote the welfare of the German residents of America. For years he had control of all the advertisements, in foreign languages, in all papers published in the United States. While his career is principally associated with New York, he is also remembered as one of the founders of the Teachers' Seminary in Milwaukee. As a representative of the Germans of New York, he served on the "committee of seventy," whose efforts were successful in bringing defeat to the Tweed ring. While a member of the board of education in New York City, he was instrumental in introducing the study of the German language in the public schools there. It was frequently commented upon that, while a foreigner by birth and training, his English was unsurpassed in its purity, nor was his command of other languages less thorough. After becoming a citizen of this country he always cast his vote with the Republican party. In religion he adhered to the Lutheran faith, with which his ancestors had been identified since the days of the Reformation. At the time of his death, which occurred in 1891, at sixty years of age, he was serving as professor of German language and literature in the Normal College of New York City.

The wife of Albert Klamroth, Josephine Weismann, was born in New York City, and still makes her home there. Her father, Hon. Augustus Weismann, was a native of Stuttgart, Germany, who settled in New York and established the first German pharmacy there, his store being on the corner of Broome and Orchard streets. He was a member of the first common council of the city. During the régime of the committee of seventy he was a candidate for state senator, and, receiving their support, gained the election, serving for two terms. In politics he was a leading Republican. In the family of Albert and Josephine Klamroth there were five sons and three daughters, of whom all are still living except one son. They reside principally in the east, where one of them, Albert, is assistant secretary of the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York.

First in the College, and then in the University of the City of New York, Henry H. Klamroth received fine educational advantages. In 1888 he was graduated from the university with the degree of B. S. During his course he was a member of the Zeta Psi, vice-president of the senior class, and grand marshal of the graduating exercises. Immediately after completing his university scientific studies he entered the law department of the same institution, under Professor Jacques and Isaac Russell. Soon after his graduation in 1890 he passed the state examination, although he did not receive his certificate until December, 1891. While in the law school he was managing clerk for Smith & Dougherty, No. 7 Nassau street, with whom he continued after his admission to the bar. However, on account of ill health, he was obliged to relinquish his work in that city, whereupon he came to California. Since then he has engaged in the practice of law at Pasadena. From 1899 until the new charter was secured he filled the office of city recorder. In 1898 he was elected justice of the peace, to serve from January, 1899, until January, 1903. He was the first police judge to serve under the new charter, and is filling that position with striking success. He has his office at No. 61 East Colorado street.

Typical of the man and his originality of ideas, as well as his profound interest in humanity, is one of the plans he has devised while serving as a judge. A number of boys, charged with petty crimes, have from time to time been brought before him. Not wishing to sentence them to jail, where they would be still further degraded by contact with hardened criminals, four years ago he adopted the plan of putting them on a period of probation, during which time they are to report to him every week. His appeal to the honor of the boys has never been made in vain, and it is a noticeable fact that he has accomplished much good among boys of that class. His new departure in the mode of dealing with the bad boy question is worthy of emulation by judges in other cities.

In Pasadena, Judge Klamroth was united in marriage with Miss Ethel Howell, who was born at Twickenham Ferry, England, and by whom he has a daughter, Winnifred Gertrude. In the starting and upbuilding of the Pasadena hospital he has borne a prominent part, and now holds office as secretary of the institution. At one time he was a director of the Pasadena Board of Trade. He assisted in the founding of the Twilight Club and at this writing is its secretary. A firm believer in Republican principles, he is rendering efficient service as a member of the city central committee. Since coming west he has been made a Mason and is connected with Corona Lodge, F. & A. M., of Pasadena. With his wife, he holds membership in All Saints' Episcopal Church and contributes to its benevolences. Since the organization of the Los Angeles County Mutual Building and Loan Association of Pasadena, in which he assisted, he has been a member of its board of directors. Another organization in which he is interested is the California Historical Society. He has assisted in the work of Throop Polytechnic Institute by filling the position of instructor of music.

WILLIAM RICHARD GRANT. The philosophy of cheerfulness, of strict attention to business, of liberal-mindedness, and of fair play, whether as employed or employer, has helped to make the career of William Richard Grant successful and popular. In his capacity as chief engineer of the Santa Barbara Ice Company he is one of the pillars of the concern, and is promotive of the utmost good feeling and the greatest amount of industry. He was born near Cornwall, Glengary county, Canada, August 19, 1856, and comes of a family prominent in the annals of Scottish history. The great-grandfather, John, was the emigrating ancestor, and settled in Canada, bringing with him his family, which included the paternal grandfather, Richard Nelson. The latter was a lieutenant in the Canadian militia, and was a cooper by trade, his manufactory being replenished by timber from his own lands.

Capt. John A. Grant, the father of William Richard, was also born in Canada, and was a prominent man in the northern country. A captain during the summer months, he not only ran, but owned boats plying on the St. Lawrence between Hamilton and Quebec. He was also a contractor and builder, to which he devoted his time when the river was locked in ice and navigation suspended. He was rated a master builder, and received many large and important contracts, and it was in 1888, while filling one of these, namely, the government wharf at Hamilton's Island, that he contracted the cold which resulted in his death, at the age of sixty years. His wife, Mary (Bethune) Grant, was born in Canada, a daughter of Duncan Bethune, who came to America when a young man and followed the occupation of miller at Cornwall, Canada. The death of the mother occurred five days after that of her husband. There were nine children in the family, seven of whom are living, five sons and two daughters, William Richard being fourth. One of the sons, A. C., is engineer and machinist for the Yellow Astor Company, at Randsburg, Kern county, Cal., and was formerly for eight years chief engineer of the Santa Barbara Electric Company. During the eight years of his service the city was in darkness for only two hours after night had set in. Another son, Norman C., is a locomotive engineer on the Iron Mountain Railroad in Missouri, and yet another son, James, is a stationary engineer in South Dakota, as is also his brother, Lawrence.

All of the sons in the Grant family learned engineering in the shop of their uncle, Alexander McLaughlin, in Cornwall, Canada, and later gained additional practical experience on their father's St. Lawrence river boats. William Richard Grant was especially apt at learning the trade, and from the time that he was able to walk he accompanied his sire on the boats, and when twelve years of age could run a craft from Hamilton to Quebec, barring the rapids. When about twelve he had to take charge of his father's dairy farm, and he helped to milk the eighty cows there. When twenty years of age he went to St. Paul, Minn., and was later employed for nine months on a farm at Northfield, after which he became identified with the Osborn Manufacturing Company in Minneapolis, and while there became an expert on binders and steam threshers, remaining with the company for eight years. During that time he represented the company for three years as salesman in the Elk valley, now North Dakota. He then purchased an interest in a railroad contracting outfit, and spent two years constructing the Great Northern road between Grand Forks in Dakota and Great Falls in Montana. However, this undertaking proved a failure, and he returned to Minneapolis the richer by $75 as reward for many months of hard labor. He then ran a steam hay press, and in the spring of 1889 went to Seattle, Wash., and contracted for the construction of the street car line. This venture proved a success, and he thereafter engaged in teaming, for which he had a most complete outfit, but this became the prey to flames during the great fire at Seattle. A later undertaking was as chief engineer on the sound steamboat or tug, Virgil Price, under command of Captain Price, a position which he held until coming to San Francisco in July of 1892. After being chief engineer at the Pleasanton Hotel for three years, he was night engineer for two years and a half for the Piedmont Railway & Power Company of Oakland.

June 1, 1898, Mr. Grant located in Santa Barbara as chief engineer of the Santa Barbara Ice Company, and has since greatly improved the plant, and has invented an oil burner that is applied and is a distinct success. He has varied interests apart from his trade, and is carrying on mining in Randsburg, Kern county. He is a staunch Republican every day in the year, and is in religion a Presbyterian. He enjoys the distinction of being president of the Santa Barbara Lodge No. 5 of the National Association of Stationary Engineers, and is fraternally associated with the Knights of Pythias and the United Moderns.

The wife of Mr. Grant was formerly Lizzie McClusky, who was born in San Francisco.

HON. HENRY M. STREETER. There is perhaps no problem that has confronted the California horticulturist more tenaciously or that has been more difficult of satisfactory solution than the securing of an adequate supply of water for the irrigation of groves and ranches. During the years of his public service, in the halls of legislature, Mr. Streeter gave special consideration to this subject. After months of careful consideration, he presented to the legislature a bill empowering boards of supervisors of counties and boards of trustees of cities to fix the rate at which water, both for irrigating and domestic uses, should be sold. This bill attracted widespread attention, bringing to its support many of the ablest men of the state, but at the same time arousing such an enmity on the part of some that a strong lobby was formed against it. Finally, however, after a hard struggle the measure was passed by the house and later by the senate. The lobbyists appealed to the governor to veto the bill, but the chief executive, after sending for Mr. Streeter and hearing from him of the benefits to be derived from its passage, appended his signature, which made the measure a state law.

Upon coming to Riverside, in November, 1875, Mr. Streeter began the improvement of an orange grove on West Central avenue. In 1879 he was elected to the assembly from San Bernardino county, and in 1880 was re-elected for a term of two years. In the senatorial contest he gave his support to Hon. John F. Miller. As presidential elector in 1888, he went to Sacramento and cast his ballot for Benjamin Harrison. The Republicans, in 1890, nominated him for state senator from San Bernardino and San Diego counties, and he was elected by a majority of over sixteen hundred. The following year the Riverside county bill was passed in the senate, but defeated in the house. However, in 1893, he introduced another bill organizing Riverside county out of San Bernardino and San Diego counties, and it was passed in both the house and senate, thus creating Riverside county with its present limits. At the same time the bill provided for a special election of county officers, which was held in May of the same year. During the United States senatorial campaign of 1891 he gave his support to Leland Stanford, who was elected. Recognizing his long and efficient service to the party, President McKinley, in August, 1898, tendered him the appointment of postmaster of Riverside. For one term he was city trustee and president of the board, ranking as mayor. For some years he has served as a member of the school board in the Arlington district.

A. C. GREENWELL. Representative of true western enterprise, and of that whole-souled fellowship and success which seems borne in on the winds from the Pacific, is A. C. Greenwell, deputy collector of customs for the ports of Santa Barbara and Ventura counties. A native of San Francisco, he was born January 17, 1867, and is a son of Capt. W. E. Greenwell, and the younger of two children. When but two years of age he accompanied the rest of the family to Santa Barbara, where he was educated in the public schools, and was graduated from the high school and Santa Barbara college. His first position in the business world was as book-keeper for the Commercial Bank of Santa Barbara, after which he became assistant cashier in Senator Bard's Bank of Hueneme, filling this position between 1890 and 1894. He then removed to San Francisco, where he remained for three years, and in 1897 returned to Santa Barbara, where he engaged in the book and stationery business in partnership with Mr. McPhail, until his appointment to his present position under John C. Cline.

The marriage of Mr. Greenwell and Daisy Merry occurred in Ventura county, Mrs. Greenwell being a daughter of Capt. T. H. Merry, one of the well-known attorneys of Oxnard. She was born in California, and was educated in San Francisco. Three children are the result of this union, Arthur M., Marjory A. and David William. The family live in a beautiful residence on Bath street, surrounded by fine grounds, the care and arrangement of which evince the exercise of artistic and nature-loving instincts. Mr. Greenwell has been prominently before the public as a staunch Republican, and is an ex-member of the county Republican central committee. He is also a member of the Chamber of Commerce.

C. F. GUTHRIDGE, proprietor of the Keystone Milling Company at Los Angeles, was born in Cable, Champaign county, Ohio, September 12, 1862, a son of Jehu and Elizabeth (Middleton) Guthridge, natives of Champaign county, Ohio. The latter was of Scotch descent, and a daughter of William Middleton, a farmer and native of Ohio. Jehu Guthridge was also of Scotch descent, and during the greater part of his life engaged in agricultural enterprises in Ohio, whither his father, William, had removed from his native Pennsylvania. Eventually Jehu Guthridge retired from active life to Urbana, Ohio, where terminated his long and useful life. To himself and wife were born ten children, eight of whom attained maturity, and six of whom are now living, C. F. being the second youngest child in the family, and the only one on the coast. The oldest son, William, served in an Ohio regiment during the Civil war, and is now living in Chicago, Ill., in which city he is superintendent of the United States Car Company.

Until his sixteenth year Mr. Guthridge remained on his father's farm in Champaign county, in the meantime attending the public schools of his district. His first knowledge of business was gained while clerking in a dry-goods store in Urbana, a position which he held until 1884. A subsequent line of activity was as draper for Bowe & Beggs, a large carpet and curtain house of Columbus, Ohio, where he remained for seven years. He was then district manager for the Mutual Life Insurance Company, of Franklin county, Ohio, a position relinquished in 1895, owing to the condition of his wife's health. Hoping much from a change of climate and surroundings, he located in Los Angeles, and in 1897 bought a half interest with Mr. Neeland in the Keystone Mills, and in the spring of 1898 became sole proprietor of the mills, having bought out his former partner. The mills are of more than passing interest, their origin, dating back to 1887, entitling them to pre-eminence from the standpoint of age over other mills in the locality. Under the successful management of the present proprietor their original proportions have been noticeably enlarged, the capacity per day being now one thousand sacks, and the machinery a twenty-five horse-power boiler and eighteen horse-power engine. Rolled barley, cracked corn and wheat, besides all kinds of feed, are the commodities furnished by this model milling enterprise, and a wholesale and retail department is maintained. Mr. Guthridge is also the possessor of the Main street mill, near the corner of Eighteenth street, and this may be utilized should an increase in business require greater facilities.

As proof of his faith in the future oil business of California, Mr. Guthridge has invested in different parts of the state, noticeably with the Central Union Oil Company, operating near Fillmore, Ventura county. He is a member of the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce, and is among the enterprising and reliable business men of the city. In fraternal circles he enjoys prominence. He was a member of Champion Lodge No. 581, K. of P., at Columbus, Ohio, having joined that organization the same evening as did our martyr, President McKinley, who was then Governor of Ohio. Mr. Guthridge is now a member of Marathon Lodge No. 182, K. of P., at Los Angeles, and has been raised to the Uniform Rank, and has been three times chancellor of the lodge. He is a member of the Royal Arcanum, D. O. K. K., Al Borak Temple No. 75, and is Royal Vizier. While living in Ohio he was for three years a member of the Third Regiment, O. N. G., from which he retired as sergeant. His company saw active service when called out to quell the Cincinnati riots. In Los Angeles he is adjutant of the Third Regiment, with the rank of captain. Politically he is a Republican, and has been a delegate to various county conventions. As a moral influence in the community Mr. Guthridge is widely known, his association with the Christian Church resulting in wisely directed philanthropic undertakings, and liberal contributions to the maintenance of charities. He is a member of the board of trustees of the First Christian Church of Los Angeles.

In Columbus, Ohio, Mr. Guthridge married Florence Montgomery, who was born in Truro township, Franklin county, Ohio, and of this union there are two children, Ralph A. and Russell M.

REV. LUDGER GLAUBER, O. F. M. Although identified with the work of the Roman Catholic Church in California for a comparatively brief period only, Father Glauber has already made the impress of his personality and broad knowledge felt throughout the region where he resides; and in the east, where he was long and intimately associated with religious work, he is known as a man of deep consecration and superior wisdom. After years of successful work in the Mississippi valley he was transferred, September 12, 1900, to the Santa Barbara Mission Church as rector, superior of mission, master of novices and consultor or definitor in the Sacred Heart Province of the Franciscan Order.

The history of the old mission, which is one of the landmarks of Spanish supremacy in California, appears in another part of this volume; this article therefore will be limited to a recapitulation of important events in the life of the rector of the mission. He was born in Buffalo, N. Y., February 9, 1857, and is a son of John B. and Elizabeth (Hummel) Glauber. His father, who was born and reared near Trier, Germany, came to America at the age of twenty-five years and settled in Buffalo, where he followed the machinist's trade in Shepherd's iron works for many years; he died at his home, January 20, 1886.

His wife was born near Strassburg, in Alsace, and died in Buffalo November 29, 1892. They were the parents of six sons and three daughters, one of whom, Rev. George J. Glauber, has been pastor of St. Mary Magdalene's Church, Omaha, Neb., for about twenty-two years, and another, Ven. Sr. Aegidia Glauber, O. S. F., has been engaged in charity work about twenty years at the St. Vincent's Orphan Asylum, Columbus, Ohio.

In St. Boniface parochial school of Buffalo, Father Glauber received his primary education. September 10, 1871, he entered St. Joseph's College at Teutopolis, Effingham county, Ill., where he continued in the classical course for five years, his studies being conducted with a view to the priesthood in the Franciscan order. June 29, 1876, he entered upon his novitiate. Afterward he continued the study of classics and rhetoric. In August, 1878, he entered the Franciscan monastery, at Quincy, Ill., where he studied philosophy. From there, in July, 1880, he was sent to the Franciscan monastery in St. Louis, where he carried on his theological studies for two years.

May 28, 1882, Father Glauber was ordained to the priesthood by the present Archbishop Ryan of Philadelphia, the solemn ceremony taking place in St. John's Church, St. Louis. Subsequent to his ordination he continued for another year in the study of theology at the monastery, after which, in July, 1883, he was sent to St. Joseph's College, Teutopolis, Ill., as a professor, remaining in that connection one year. Next he was made master of novices in the Franciscan monastery in the same town, where he continued in active and successful work for sixteen years. From Teutopolis he was transferred to the Pacific coast, arriving in Santa Barbara November 8, 1900, where he had been before for two and a half months, on account of ill health, in the fall of 1890. At once after his location here he began the discharge of the duties associated with the pastorate of the historic old mission in this city.

R. D. COOK. In numerous ways Mr. Cook has been identified with pioneer undertakings in different parts of California, and his influence has ever been cast on the side of progress and enlightenment. He was born in Clermont county, Ohio, in 1832, and when eighteen years of age, March 18, 1850, left the familiar surroundings of his father's farm and started out to make his own living. For a time he lived in Warsaw, Hancock county, Ill., and while in that river town learned the carpenter's trade, which he also followed during the eighteen months of his residence in Quincy, Ill.

Deciding to avail himself of an opportunity to try his fortune in California, Mr. Cook in 1851 came from Adams county, Ill., paying for his board and accommodations en route by driving an ox team. Arriving in Sonoma City, Cal., at the expiration of a journey of five months and fifteen days, he continued to live there, following the occupations of carpenter and mechanic. During his ten years' residence in Sonoma county he set up the first three threshing machines used in the entire state of California and in 1852 built the first windmill ever put up in the state. The residence of Mr. Cook in Santa Maria, Santa Barbara county, dates from May 28, 1869, when he pre-empted one hundred and sixty acres of land. Shortly afterward he built the first house in the town. In the fall of 1869 he established the first school district, from which small beginning have been developed forty-two public schools within the limits of the same region. In 1874 he raised his first good crop, the grasshoppers having devoured the crops of the three preceding years. In 1875 he established a blacksmith's shop, but sold it the next year to R. Hart. For the past twenty-five years he has been engaged in the livery business, has built two barns, and receives an extended patronage from all over the surrounding country. His establishment is well equipped with vehicles of all kinds and with an excellent grade of horses. A bus meets all incoming trains between here and Guadalupe, and a general livery business is successfully conducted.

The marriage of Mr. Cook, in 1854, united him with Miss Jinnett Nelson, of Sonoma county, Cal., who died in October, 1897. Born of their union were six children: Ebby, who is deceased; Mrs. Mary Miller, Mrs. Viola Jones, Mrs. Ellen Tunnell, Mrs. Emma Devine, and Fred. Mr. Cook is a Democrat in politics and takes a warm interest in local affairs, but has never desired official recognition. Prominent in fraternal circles, he is a charter member of Lodge No. 302, I. O. O. F., in which he has passed all of the chairs. He is respected by all who know him, and has established a firm footing for himself in his community.

C. M. GIDNEY. As secretary of the Santa Barbara Chamber of Commerce, Mr. Gidney is closely identified with one of the organizations that has proved beneficial to the best interests of the city. His identification with Santa Barbara dates from 1886. On his arrival, he was indeed a stranger, not knowing anyone in the entire town, but he had read much concerning the climate and resources and was so pleased with the outlook that, immediately after his arrival, he bought a lot and in a short time had a residence erected. This house he sold in 1887 and built a larger one, which he occupied until 1896, and then traded it for outside property. He owns twelve acres in Hope district, where he makes his home and engages in horticultural pursuits.

The Gidney family is of English descent. Joseph Gidney, a native of New York City, removed with his parents to New Brunswick and settled on a grant of land. In the possession of C. M. Gidney there is a commission by King George, dated 1787, showing that Joseph Gidney was a captain in the New Brunswick militia. Charles, son of Joseph, was born in New Brunswick, and became a farmer, at one time owning the site of the old de la Tour fort, on St. John's river. About 1860 he settled in Houlton, Me., where he died. Next in line of descent was Rev. H. O. Gidney, a native of New Brunswick, and a Baptist clergyman, who settled in Houlton, Me., in 1860, and officiated as clergyman there until his death, in 1895. His wife, who bore the maiden name of Martha Dykeman, was born in New Brunswick, and now resides in Maine. Her father, Manzer Dykeman, owned a beautiful homestead on the St. John's river, to which point Grandfather Dykeman had moved from New York. The Dykeman family is of Holland extraction.

The eldest of eight children (all but one now living), C. N. Gidney was born December 10, 1855, in Cambridge, New Brunswick. He attended the Houlton Academy (now Ricker Classical Institute), and after graduating began to teach, which profession he followed for fourteen years in Aroostook county, Me. At the same time he had farm interests near Houlton. In June, 1886, he came to Santa Barbara, and two months later entered the office of J. J. Perkins, for whom he acted as bookkeeper and took charge of the real-estate and insurance departments, remaining about fourteen years. In July, 1900, he resigned his position to take charge of the Independent for the estate of the late William La Vies, and, in the interests of the heirs, in January of the next year, sold the paper. In March, 1901, he was elected secretary of the Chamber of Commerce. This is the outgrowth of the Board of Trade and the Business Association, which were reorganized as the Chamber of Commerce and incorporated May 25, 1899. It has a membership of two hundred and fifty and is one of the best institutions of its kind in the country.

In Houlton, Me., Mr. Gidney married Miss Clara M. Jones, who was born in Hodgdon, that state. They have four children: Ray M., who is a graduate of the Santa Barbara Business College, at fourteen years of age; Harry D., Lucy M., and Pearl C.

Since coming to Santa Barbara Mr. Gidney has been affiliated with the Odd Fellows and is past noble grand of the lodge. He is also a past officer of the Foresters. In politics he is independent. From 1892 to 1894 he was a member of the city council, where he served as chairman of the finance committee, and, during the absence of Mayor Gaty, he served as acting mayor for eight months.

LUCIUS DARWIN GATES, owner and proprietor of the Santa Barbara foundry and machine works, also of the South Side water works, was born in Valparaiso, Ind., January 18, 1864, a son of Lorison L. and Nancy (Ingrham) Gates. His paternal grandfather, Rev. Lorison Gates, was born in New York, of English descent, and at an early age settled in Ohio, thence removing to Indiana, where he gave his active life to the ministry of the Christian Church. He is still living, and is now about ninety years of age. Lorison L. Gates, who was born in Ohio, became a farmer in Indiana, but in 1875 he took his family to Butte county, Cal., where he followed farming. Two years later he located at Los Alamos, where he bought and conducted a ranch, and here he died in 1888. His wife, the mother of our subject, was the daughter of Scotch parents that lived in Rensselaer county, Ind., and her father was killed in battle during the Civil war; she died in Indiana when Lucius D., the older of her two sons, was six years of age. The latter, in 1875, came to California with his father and settled in Santa Barbara county in 1877, but two years later went to San Francisco, where he began to learn the machinist's trade in the Pacific rolling mills. Next he became an apprentice in the Sacramento foundry, where he became an expert machinist and tool-maker, remaining there from 1880 to 1884. On account of the ill health of his father, he then returned to Santa Barbara county, where he started a machine and repair shop at Los Alamos.

November 26, 1886, Mr. Gates located in Santa Barbara, where he erected the machinery for the electric-light plant. In January, 1887, he established a foundry and machine shop at Nos. 711-717 Bath street, and this business he has since conducted. He is now erecting a new shop, 50x100 feet, and will put in an additional engine to assist the eighteen-horse now in use. The machinery is modern and fitted for its special purpose. By means of artesian wells, a supply of water has been secured and a pumping plant established, which furnishes water for the southern part of the city, and he is owner of these works, as well as the machinery plant. His attention is given closely to his business affairs, and he takes no interest in fraternal societies, with the exception of the Odd Fellows. In politics he is a staunch Republican.

The marriage of Mr. Gates, in Santa Barbara, united him with Miss E. J. Brooks, who was born in New York state. They have six children, Carrie May, Lucius L., Olive E., Earl I., Ralph B. and Barbara.

MRS. PEDDIE FRANKLIN. A resident of Santa Barbara since 1870, Mrs. Franklin was born in Rehoboth, Mass., near Providence, R. I., February 13, 1825, and was one of ten children, all but one of whom attained mature years and five are now living. Her father, Noah Bliss, was a son of Noah and Peddie (Cushman) Bliss, and a grandson of Noah Bliss, a descendant of English ancestors who became early settlers of the Massachusetts colony and bore a brave part in all of the Indian wars. These three men who bore the same name were born in the same locality in Massachusetts and engaged in farm work. The father was eighty-eight at the time of his death. He had married Olive Medberry, whose father, Abel Medberry, took part in the Revolutionary war when a mere boy. He was of English descent, as was also his wife, whose family name was Carpenter. At the time of her death Mrs. Bliss was seventy-four years of age.

When about fifteen years of age the subject of this article secured employment in Pawtucket, R. I., and during a larger part of the eight ensuing years she was employed in the weaving department. In 1848, at Rehoboth, Mass., she became the wife of William A. Franklin, who was born in Herkimer county, N. Y., and received an excellent education in Cazenovia Seminary. For some years he engaged in educational work, for which his education and his tastes admirably fitted him. The year after his marriage he bought a farm in Seekonk, Mass., and became interested in agricultural pursuits. In 1859 he became a resident of Fall River, Mass., where he engaged in the hotel business until 1867. Next he was proprietor of the Park hotel at Newport, R. I.

Disposing of their eastern possessions, Mr. and Mrs. Franklin started for California January 5, 1870, making the voyage from New York to Aspinwall via steamer and then on the Old Constitution up the Pacific to San Francisco, where they arrived February 28. Three weeks later they came to Santa Barbara, and in March bought seventy acres of wild land, on which no effort at improvement had ever been made. This they at once commenced to improve, and from time to time sold off portions of the property. Mr. Franklin's tastes were toward literary pursuits rather than commercial affairs, so he gave into his wife's hands the management of much of his business interests, having found her to be possessed of wise judgment, excellent discrimination and keen intuition. It is therefore largely to her energy that her present prosperity is due. In addition to her interests in the west, she still has capital invested in the vicinity of her old home. She aided in organizing the Tecumseh Manufacturing Company of Fall River, Mass., and was also one of the organizers of the Mechanics' Manufacturing Company, of the same city. Since the death of her husband, which occurred August 17, 1898, she has continued to reside at her comfortable home on Franklin avenue, Santa Barbara, where she is surrounded by all the comforts that her business judgment and industry have rendered possible. Her life, however, has not been without its sorrows, and she has been especially bereaved in the loss of all of her children. Her daughter, Isabelle M., was only four years of age when called hence by death. The only son, William Arthur, was a young man of great promise and received excellent educational advantages, graduating from the Albany Law School with the degree of LL.B. Returning to Santa Barbara, he began the practice of his profession, and was already known as a promising attorney and a rising orator when, in 1876, he died at the age of less than twenty-two years. The youngest member of the family circle was Annabel Eugenia, who was twenty years of age at the time of her death.

J. B. EASON. The popular hostelry owned and managed by Mr. Eason at Nordhoff is a credit to the town and to the taste and enterprise of the host. A favorite stopping place for the tourist and commercial traveler, all are here treated with the utmost tact and consideration, their rooms are well cared for to the point of absolute neatness, and the inner man is satisfied with the viands furnished. The hotel has thirty available rooms, and the price of $2 and $3 per day is very reasonable when the character of the accommodations is considered.

The family of which Mr. Eason is a member have for years been residents of Mississippi, and worthy and successful farmers. J. B. Eason was born in that southern state, October 20, 1860, and grew to manhood and received his common-school education there. While living there he married Emma, daughter of William and Jennie Reaves, also of Mississippi. In 1884 he determined to seek a change of location and occupation, impelled to the change by the illness of his wife and children. He therefore settled in Nordhoff, Cal., where he remained for a year, going then to Santa Paula, where he engaged in the meat business, and resided on an orange ranch in the lower Ojai valley. From this line of industry he branched out into the hotel business, and has since been the proprietor of the Ojai Inn.

To Mr. and Mrs. Eason have been born five children: Pearl, Reaves, May, Tressie and Walter. Mr. Eason is the friend and advocate of education, and is giving his children every possible advantage. Pearl, the oldest, is now attending high school, and the other children will enjoy a similar opportunity. Mr. Eason is a Democrat in politics, and cast his first presidential vote for Grover Cleveland. He is associated fraternally with the Modern Woodmen of America.

S. J. EDWARDS. Near Land's End, Cornwall, England, S. J. Edwards was born May 14, 1846, a son of William and Elizabeth (Roach) Edwards, natives of England, the former of Welsh descent. After having learned the builder's trade under his father, in 1865 he crossed the ocean to Halifax county, Nova Scotia, and the following year settled in Jersey City, N. J., where with two partners he engaged in sewer contracting for five years. During the '70s he settled in Lowell, Mass., where he was foreman under the street superintendent in the contracting of the city sewers and other city improvements. Later he became superintendent of the work, but resigned to accept a similar position in Lawrence, Mass., where he remained three years. For a year he was superintendent in the construction of the water works in South Shore, Quincy and Cohasset, Mass. In 1887 he came to California, settling in Pasadena, where he was a pioneer in sewer building and was superintendent in the laying of the first pipe and sewer in the city system. The close of the boom brought a cessation in all improvements, and he then went to Utah, where he was engaged in the construction of the water works and reservoir of Salt Lake City. Returning to Pasadena after a year, he worked for the North Pasadena Land and Water Company, and later was with J. DeBarth Shorb for two years. With Hughes & Meyer, in 1893, he became interested in the construction of the Los Angeles outfall sewer as foreman of construction on the two sections, which proved a most important and responsible work, but was successfully completed.

As a member of the firm of Hughes & Edwards, the senior partner being J. B. Hughes, Mr. Edwards engaged in sewer building and cement work in Pasadena, Los Angeles and other places, the two men continuing together until 1899. In the fall of 1900 the firm of Edwards & Halloway was organized, since which time they have engaged in street grading, sewer building and cement work. While living in Massachusetts he married Miss Edna Bryant, who was born in New Hampshire. They have two sons, William Bryant and Albert E., both of Pasadena. While in Halifax Mr. Edwards was made a Mason, later transferring his membership successively to Jersey City, Lowell and Pasadena. He joined the Royal Arch in Jersey City, and is now connected with Crown Chapter No. 72, R. A. M., of Pasadena, in which he is past high priest. Since coming to Pasadena he has joined the commandery, in which he is captain-general. In Temple Lodge of Perfection he is senior warden, in Rose Croix Council served as junior warden, and is master of ceremonies in the Temple of Kodosch, thirtieth degree. Besides these various degrees of Masonry, he is connected with Eastern Star, and his wife is worthy matron of the order. Both are members of the Amarith and in religious associations are identified with the Methodist Episcopal Church. In politics he is a Republican.

WILLIAM BRYANT EDWARDS. Since 1887 a resident of Pasadena, W. B. Edwards was born in Lowell, Mass., December 12, 1875, and was therefore almost twelve years of age when he accompanied his father, S. J. Edwards, to California. His education was completed in the Pasadena high school, after which he studied architecture in this city, later going east, where he was a student and working in offices. Since then he has followed the occupation of architect and superintendent of building, and his work is of such a character that there are constant demands upon him for contracts by those who recognize his superior ability and unusual attainments. In the designing of residences he has displayed great taste and skill, his plans combining utility, convenience and beauty. Among the houses which he has designed are some of the most beautiful now to be seen in this fair city of the west, which boasts the possession of homes than which no handsomer can be found in any American city. In the building up of the city, by the establishment of a high standard of architecture, he has borne an important part. It is his aim to select and originate designs which will be in harmony with the environment, so that the fair-smiling valley, the grand old mountains and the homes themselves may all present an harmonious aspect to the visitor and resident, and thus make of the city an abode of beauty that, in the providence of God, "will be a joy forever."

Besides his ability as an architect Mr. Edwards possesses considerable musical taste, is himself a fine tenor singer, and now officiates as leader of the choir in the Baptist Church. In

John Adams.

Pasadena he married Miss Jessie Linola Baldwin, who was born in Iowa. Fraternaly he is connected with Pasadena Lodge No. 272, F. & A. M., and has been raised to the degrees of chapter, council and Temple Lodge of Perfection, of all of which he acts as organist.

HON. JOHN ADAMS. The genealogy of Mr. Adams of Pasadena indicates his descent from one of the F. F. V's. His father, John, and grandfather, Zachariah Adams, were natives of the Old Dominion and served respectively in the war of 1812 and the Revolutionary struggle. For many years the father carried on a farm near Somerset, Pulaski county, Ky., but finally retired from active cares to enjoy the comforts accumulated by a long life of toil. At the time of his death he was almost ninety years of age. His wife, Elizabeth, was a daughter of Hezekiah Clemmons, a soldier from Virginia in the Revolutionary war and descended from one of the oldest families of that state. She was born there and died in Kentucky. Of the nine children comprising the family John alone survives. One of the brothers, Charles, was a soldier in the Mexican war and died while at the front with the army.

At the family homestead in Pulaski county, Ky., John Adams was born June 1, 1819. When fifteen years of age he accompanied an older brother to Rush county, Ind., where relatives resided, and there he remained for two years. From Indiana, in company with the same brother, he went to Illinois, making the journey by ox-team and passing through Chicago during the year (1837) when the name of Fort Dearborn was replaced by that now in use. Reaching Winnebago county, the brother squatted on land which he afterwards entered when it came into market near Trask Ferry and with him our subject remained until 1840, when he crossed the line to Wisconsin. For a time he was interested in mining and merchandising at Dodgeville, and from there removed to West Blue Mound (generally known as Pokerville), Wis., where he was the first merchant and the first stock dealer. Chicago was the nearest market and he was accustomed to drive several hundred head of cattle to that point, two hundred miles distant, bringing the cash back with him. When he first bought goods in New York, checks and drafts were not in vogue and he was obliged to carry gold, at one time having $9,000 in gold on an eastern trip. The goods purchased did not reach their destination until three months after shipment, being in early days sent via the Mississippi to Galena and hauled from there; while later they came via canal and lake to Milwaukee, and thence by teams.

Removing to Black Earth, Wis., in 1863, Mr. Adams opened a general store and also began to deal in stock and grain. The railroad had just been completed and had given the town an incentive to progress previously unknown. In 1868 he was elected to the state legislature of Wisconsin and was re-elected in 1869 and 1870, serving with conspicuous fidelity and intelligence. During 1874 and 1875 he served as sheriff of Dane county, filling the position with such ability that, had the state law permitted re-election to the office, he would undoubtedly have been chosen to succeed himself. In 1882 and 1883 he was a member of the state senate representing the twenty-sixth senatorial district, during which time the law was changed to biennial sessions. After 1875 he no longer engaged in mercantile pursuits, but concentrated his attention upon the buying and selling of farm lands, owning more land than any other property holder of Dane and Iowa counties, Wis. In addition he had farms in Iowa. As long as he remained in Wisconsin he was prominent in the Democratic party, assisting in state committee and convention work, and aiding in many ways the progress of his party. December 24, 1890, he came to California, and now owns and occupies a comfortable home at No. 619 North Madison avenue, where he has well-kept grounds and two acres in fruit.

In Dodgeville, Wis., in December, 1846, occurred the marriage of John Adams and Miss Eliza Blanchard, who was born in Cortland county, N. Y., January 19, 1832, and grew to womanhood in Wisconsin. One of her brothers, Alvin Blanchard, was the founder of Blanchardville. Her father, Asahel Blanchard, settled on a farm near Dodgeville in an early day and some years afterward was accidentally killed in a runaway accident. Nine children were born to the union of Mr. and Mrs. Adams, and five of these are living. Charles died at Black Earth, Wis., and George in Colorado Springs, Colo., while two died in infancy. Those surviving are Alva, John, Jr., Frank, Elizabeth and William H., all residents of Colorado except the daughter, who is with her parents in Pasadena. John, Jr., is an extensive cattleman in the San Juan country; Frank, also a large rancher, is now president of the fire and police board in Denver; William H., who has large cattle interests in the San Juan country, represented that district in the state legislature one term and for the past fourteen years has been a member of the state senate. Perhaps the most distinguished member of the family is Hon. Alva Adams, ex-governor of Colorado, who was born in Wisconsin May 14, 1850, and has made his home in Colorado since 1871. His first work there was hauling ties from the mountains south of Denver for the building of the Denver & Rio Grande Railroad, then in process of construction. Later he became a hardware merchant in Colorado Springs, in which he has been engaged much of the time since at different points, now being located at Pueblo, Colo. In 1876 he was elected from Rio Grande county to the state legislature; in 1886 was elected governor, and again, in 1896, was the successful candidate for that high office, being one of very few governors who have received re-election at the hands of the people. As chief executive he was noted for his careful oversight of the state's finances, his close examination of every bill demanding an appropriation and his prompt rejection of such as were not wholly praiseworthy. The high character of his two administrations won him honor in his own state and elsewhere, and he is recognized as one of Colorado's most eminent men.

ALDEN R. DODWORTH. For several generations the Dodworth family was identified with the manufacturing interests of Sheffield, England, where various representatives engaged in the manufacture of cutlery, the principal product of that old town. From there Thomas Dodworth brought his family to America and settled in New York City, where, with his four sons, he organized the first successful and well-known band in the city. There are still living those who can recall the Dodworth band as the favorite at all leading social and political functions. Upon the death of the organizer of the band its leadership fell to the hands of his son, Allen, a native of Sheffield, England, and the inheritor of pronounced musical ability. In conjunction with this work, he organized and conducted the Dodworth dancing school on Broome street, it being the first institution of the kind in New York City. Among his pupils were the children of many social leaders, and some of those whom he taught the art of the muse Terpsichore have themselves since become prominent in the most aristocratic circles of the country. He continued at the head of this school until his death, in 1896, at the age of seventy-eight years. Since then the institution has been continued by relatives, and is now conducted by a nephew, T. George Dodworth, and a grandson, Arthur Dodworth, the present headquarters being at No. 13 East Forty-ninth street, between Madison and Fifth avenues.

The wife of Allen Dodworth was Calanthe E. Raymond, who was born in Westchester county, N. Y., the daughter of a pioneer merchant of New York City, and is now making her home in Ocean Park, Cal. Of her two children, A. R. is a resident of Pasadena, Cal., and Frank is proprietor of a dancing school in Brooklyn, N. Y. The older of these sons, who forms the subject of this article, was born at the family residence on Broome street, New York, July 16, 1842. When a boy he attended grammar school No. 42, on Greenwich avenue, and the knowledge there obtained was supplemented by study in the University of the City of New York, from which he was graduated. At the opening of the Civil war he was a member of Company E, Seventh New York state militia, which was mustered into the government service and sent to Baltimore, thence to Frederick City, and supported the Second Rhode Island Battery in the battle of Gettysburg. During the riots in New York they were called back to the city, where they aided in quelling the disturbance, and were then honorably discharged.

Mr. Dodworth went to the oil regions around Oil Creek in 1865 and for nine and one-half years he successfully engaged in the oil business, abandoning the same only on account of its injurious effect upon his health. During that time he became known as one of the most scientific and expert producers in the region, and the high degree of success which he attained was justly merited through his intelligent supervision and indomitable energy. Believing that the climate of North Carolina would prove beneficial to his health, he bought land and set out a vineyard at Ridgeway, that state, where he remained five and one-half years, meantime cultivating his sixty acres of vines. For the three and one-half years ensuing he made his headquarters in Cologne, Europe, meantime traveling all over the continent and into the British possessions, visiting points of historic interest and studying the various governments and peoples. On his return to the United States he remained for a time in New York City and East Orange, N. J., after which, in 1889, seeking a location that would combine beauty of scenery with perfection of climate, he came to Pasadena, Cal., which is his present home. Here he erected a residence on Terrace Drive and West Colorado avenue, invested in real estate and improved various properties. In 1901 he completed the Dodworth block, which is the finest building of its kind in the city, and contains all modern improvements and appliances. To its other advantages it adds that of a central location, on the corner of Colorado and Fair Oaks avenue. The building, 58x100, is of white pressed brick, finished in quartered oak, and is five stories in height, containing five store rooms and forty-two offices, the service in which is rendered first-class by means of an electric elevator. Besides his Pasadena interests he owns stock in various mining properties in Southern California, notable among these being his interest in the American Girl and American Boy property at Ogilby, on the Southern Pacific road.

The marriage of Mr. Dodworth united him with Miss Sarah Sutherland, who was born and reared in New York City. They are the parents of four children: Florence, of Pasadena; Cally, wife of C. B. Scoville, of Chicago; Lillian, who married E. J. Pyle, assistant cashier of the Pasadena National Bank; and Arthur Allen, who is connected with the Dodworth Dancing School in New York City. Exceptional advantages were given to the daughters and son, not only through their attendance at New York schools, but also through their studies and travels abroad.

Under the influence of his father, who was a staunch old-line Democrat, Mr. Dodworth was reared in a belief of that party's principles, and he has never ceased to support them in national elections. However, in local matters he believes the standing and character of the candidate to be of more importance than his opinions concerning tariff, imperialism, currency and other national issues, hence he is inclined to be independent in municipal elections. During his residence in Oil City, Pa., he was initiated into Masonry, and is now connected with Corona Lodge, F. & A. M., of Pasadena, also the chapter here, and the thirtieth degree Scottish Rite.

It is to the citizenship of such men as Mr. Dodworth that Pasadena owes its high standing among the cities of Southern California and its prestige as the home of people of the highest culture and refinement. In many ways, but chiefly through the erection of the finest business block in the city, Mr. Dodworth has promoted the prosperity of the place and enhanced its importance among neighboring towns. At the same time his honorable course in business, his courteous bearing, and his liberal citizenship have given him the confidence of the entire community and a high place in the regard of all his associates.

MRS. MARY G. BANTA-JONES. As one of the pioneers of Pasadena Mrs. Banta-Jones has been intimately associated with and deeply interested in the progress of this popular western city. She was born at Sacket Harbor, N. Y., a daughter of David and Mary (Smith) Hooper, the former born at Sacket Harbor, and the latter near Hartford, Conn. The Hooper family was founded in America by her grandfather, Robert Hooper, an Englishman who settled at Sacket Harbor. From the latter city David Hooper removed to Ohio and spent his last years near Norwalk. While the support of his family was derived from his labors as a tiller of the soil, much of his time was given to ministerial work and almost every Sunday he preached for some congregation that was too poor to engage a salaried minister. All of his preaching was done gratuitously and for the good of the cause. After his death his wife came to California and died in Pomona. Her parents, Jedediah and Mary Smith, were of New England birth and ancestry; the former fought in the battle of Sacket Harbor and after the Revolution had ended he engaged in farming near the spot where that historic engagement had occurred. In later life he removed to Ohio, where he died near Norfolk.

In the family of Rev. David Hooper there were seven daughters and one son who attained mature years. The latter, Sidney, enlisted in the Union army at the opening of the Civil war, went to the front with his regiment from Ohio, and died in a hospital in Georgia. Only two of the daughters are now living. Mary G. Hooper, who was second among the children, was eight years of age when the family went to Ohio and settled near Norwalk, Huron county. A few years later, while still a mere girl, she became the wife of Isaac Banta, who was born near Amsterdam, N. Y., of a Holland-Dutch family long identified with New York. For many years Mr. Banta not only followed farming on a large scale (owning six farms and employing twenty-two hands), but he also carried on a large contracting business, and afterward conducted a hotel in Norwalk. With the hope that California climate would benefit his health, which had become impaired through overwork, he came to Pasadena in 1882. With the aid of Mrs. Banta he started the first hotel in this city and then built the Los Angeles house on the present site of the First National Bank (Fair Oaks and Colorado), continuing as proprietor of this hotel until 1887. While visiting his old home in Norwalk, Ohio, he died in 1888, and his remains were interred there. Of his four children, Mrs. Lucy Pierce of Pasadena is the only survivor, George having died at twenty-three, Jennie at twenty-four and Martha at eighteen years of age. After the death of Mr. Banta his widow erected a beautiful home at No. 408 North Fair Oaks avenue and in it she has since resided. February 13, 1902, she became the wife of L. C. Jones, who was born in Deerfield, Franklin county, Mass., a son of Lorenzo W. and Mary Ann (Williams) Jones. His father, who was born in Deerfield and died in South Dakota, followed the carpenter's trade. The Jones family is of Puritan stock and Welsh descent. Mrs. Mary Ann Jones was born at Charter Oak, Conn., daughter of Daniel Williams, and a member of the family made famous by the history of Roger Williams. Her death occurred in Illinois. Of her five sons and one daughter, four sons are now living, Mr. Jones being the third in order of birth. Born in 1835, he remained in Massachusetts until he attained his majority, meantime attending district schools and Deerfield Academy.

Following the throng of resolute pioneers who were beginning to populate the vast prairies of the central west, in 1856 Mr. Jones went to Ogle county, Ill., where he broke a tract of raw prairie land, put up needed buildings, and transformed a wild acreage into a valuable estate. After twenty-six years in the same location he removed to Iowa and engaged in the mercantile business at Storm Lake. From there, in 1892, he came to California, where he has since improved an orchard of twenty acres at La Canada, which, in conjunction with a son, he still owns. While living in Ogle county, Ill., he was married at Oregon, that county, to Miss Jane Wadsworth, who was born in Manchester, Ill., and died in Iowa. The six children born of their union are as follows: Mrs. Lettie Wayer, who died in Minnesota; Herbert R., a traveling salesman with headquarters at Minneapolis; Mrs. Mittie V. Rogers, who died in Los Angeles; Willard F., a business man in Washington; Charles C., who is in partnership with his father in the ownership of the La Canada ranch; and Mrs. Grace E. Little, of Los Angeles. Fraternally Mr. Jones is connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and politically is a firm believer in Republican principles. Of this party Mrs. Banta-Jones is also a member, and, while not having the right of franchise, has nevertheless wielded considerable influence in the party's behalf. In religious connections she affiliates with the Christian Church, while Mr. Jones is associated with the Methodist Episcopal denomination.

EDWIN CAWSTON. Throughout Southern California Mr. Cawston is known as the proprietor of the South Pasadena Ostrich farm, while in many parts of the United States his name is known as that of the first importer of the birds to this country. In 1887 he brought fifty-two ostriches from South Africa. The journey was memorable for many reasons, but chiefly on account of its many anxieties and responsibilities. From the time of purchasing the birds the new owner found himself confronted by difficulties, among which were the heavy export taxes at Cape Colony. When attempting to ship from Natal he was confronted by ironclad freight rules, and finally chartered his own sailing ship and made the voyage in that way. Not only did the trip prove a hard one for the ostriches, but they were also affected by the change of climate, and never thrived under Southern California skies as they had in the sands of South Africa. To-day not one of the fifty-two survives. However, their offspring seemed in no wise injured by the troubles of the parents, but are in every respect as healthy and contented as their cousins in the old world.

During the first eight years Mr. Cawston found the business a constant struggle, as considerable experimenting had to be done, and this naturally proved quite costly. Moreover, the climate at Norwalk, where he started his farm, did not prove entirely satisfactory, but since 1895, when he removed to a ten-acre tract at South Pasadena, the fortunes of the business have improved, and the farm is one of the famous show places of Southern California, almost all of the tourists from the east now visiting here in order to see and study the ostriches. At various times he has experimented in raising flocks elsewhere, but a few experiments in Northern California convinced him that climate was unsuitable. One hundred were sent to Florida, thirty to Hot Springs, Ark., and one thousand to Arizona. These experiments show that Phoenix furnishes the most ideal climate for breeding and raising, and accordingly he keeps a large number there at all times. His latest experiment is especially interesting, because through it ostriches have now been introduced into Europe. In 1901 he made arrangements to ship forty birds from New York to the south of France, where, January 15, 1902, he opened a farm between Nice and Monte Carlo. As he was the pioneer ostrich-raiser in America, so, too, he was the first to conceive the idea of raising the birds in Europe, and there is every reason to believe that his indefatigable energy, thorough knowledge of the business and familiarity with the habits of the birds will enable him to achieve gratifying success and make of his farm one of the favorite resorts of southern France.

In his work Mr. Cawston has the advantage of cosmopolitan knowledge and wide travel. Of English birth, a graduate of Charterhouse College in London, he is a member of an old English family. His father is a member of the London Stock Exchange, and his brother, George, has been for some years a director in the South African Company, of which the late Cecil Rhodes was the distinguished head. He himself has traveled through much of the world, has gained a broad knowledge of men and nations, and has always kept posted concerning international problems. However, his attention is given closely to his chosen occupation, the gaining of success in which has been his ambition and most cherished hope, and it is a matter of gratification to all familiar with his self-sacrificing devotion to the industry that he has now placed it upon a substantial basis and has achieved the success which he justly merits.

WILLIAM TENHAEFF. Although born and reared in another country, Mr. Tenhaeff is a patriotic American and gives loyal allegiance to our national institutions and the government of the United States. With a fervent love for the stars and stripes, he believes that no colors equal in beauty and meaning the red, white and blue. He was born in Prussia, February 9, 1826, being a son of Frederick and Johanne (Osterman) Tenhaeff, natives of Prussia and lifelong residents of that kingdom. Of eleven children comprising the family, five are living, and two of these have crossed the ocean to America. Following the usual German custom, William was confirmed at fourteen years of age and at the same time left school to take up life's active duties. In 1854 he left his native land, taking passage on a sailing vessel at Rotterdam and proceeding to New Orleans, thence up the Mississippi to St. Louis, and from there to La Prairie, Adams county, Ill., where, in 1855, he opened a general store. Within a few years he had built up a profitable trade among the farmers of that section, and, being of an economical disposition, he accumulated considerable property. Meantime he became well known through his familiarity with public affairs, his capacity for leadership, and his high standing among German-Americans. Among the local offices to which he was elected were those of supervisor, township treasurer and school treasurer. A further tribute to his popularity was paid him when the members of his party (Republican) nominated him for the state senate. The district being strongly Democratic, he failed of election, but maintained an excellent record at the polls. In 1865 he returned to Prussia in order to attend the celebration of the golden wedding of his parents, and enjoyed a pleasant visit with his relatives and former associates. On his return to America he relinquished business pursuits and gave his attention entirely to agriculture. Two farms were improved under his supervision, one containing two hundred and forty acres and the other two hundred and sixty acres. In addition to the raising of farm products, he made a specialty of stock-raising and shipped large consignments to the Chicago markets. To provide pasturage for his cattle a large amount of land was necessary, and in this way he utilized at times as much as twelve hundred acres. In 1893 he disposed of his property in Illinois and came to California, where he now makes his home on South Fair Oaks avenue, Pasadena.

The marriage of Mr. Tenhaeff united him with Miss Eva Kaufmann, who was born in Germany, and died in Pasadena March 3, 1900, leaving five children, viz.: Anna, who is with her father in Pasadena; Mrs. Mary Eisele, of Quincy, Ill.; Alexander, of Pasadena; Leopold, who is employed on the Salt Lake Railroad; and Clara, at home. Mrs. Tenhaeff was a member of the Lutheran Church, and Mr. Tenhaeff is of the Evangelical faith. Since becoming a citizen of the United States he has always voted the Republican ticket and advocated the party's principles. Stanchly in favor of the abolition of slavery, he aided in the work through his membership in the Union League, and no one in his community was more eager than he to encourage the soldier and aid the widows and children of those who fell while fighting for the country.

WILLIAM D. DILWORTH, M. D. The physical ills to which the residents of Oxnard fall heir are skillfully and conscientiously adjusted by Dr. Dilworth, who has succeeded in building up a large practice extending throughout the entire valley. He was born in Chicago in 1871, and is the eldest child of Benjamin and Alice (McClellan) Dilworth, natives respectively of Ireland and Canada. The father was a contractor and builder in Chicago, and before and after the great fire put up many of the large buildings in that city.

When a mere child Dr. Dilworth left Chicago and went to Sterling, Ill., where he received his education, and where he lived until 1887. He then returned to Chicago and entered the College of Physicians and Surgeons, from which he was graduated with the class of 1894. The family, in which there were five children, came to California in 1887, and after his graduation Dr. Dilworth joined them at Pasadena. He there engaged in practice for a year with Dr. N. A. Dalrymple, and then located in Hueneme, where he practiced successfully about five years. From there he came to Oxnard in October of 1900, and has already become prominently identified with the professional and other interests of the place. For the convenience of his practice he has constructed a pleasant and well-equipped office in the public square.

January 20, 1900, in Los Angeles, Dr. Dilworth married Miss Laura M. Dunn, who was born in California and is a daughter of J. M. Dunn. In politics Dr. Dilworth is a Republican, and is fraternally associated with the Masons, which organization he joined in Hueneme. In the estimation of those who know him the doctor is destined for a brilliant professional career, suggested by his close application to the best tenets of medical science, his natural aptitude, and his decided personal qualifications.

BYRON LISK. The Pasadena Milling Company, which was founded by Mr. Lisk in 1889, is one of the leading business houses of the city, and occupies a stone building, 75x170 feet, the plant being operated by a boiler of twenty-five and an engine of fifteen horsepower. The location of the mill is California street and Raymond avenue, and among its products are rolled barley, cracked corn, corn meal, graham flour and feed meal. In the jobbing of local and northern flour an extensive trade has been established. For the convenience of shipping a siding has been built to connect with the Santa Fe Railroad. At the time of starting the business, in July, 1889, Mr. Lisk bought out the plant of the old Pasadena Milling Company. Two years later a former partner, George P. Lyman, joined him, and they continued together for a time, when a brother of Mr. Lisk bought out Mr. Lyman's interest, and the present firm of Lisk Bros. was thus organized.

The Lisk family are of Quaker descent and remote English and German lineage. Israel, son of James Lisk, was born in Albany county, N. Y., and was a strict adherent to the Society of Friends. His son, Anson, likewise a native of New York, removed to a farm in Michigan, and later settled at Onarga, Ill., where he died. In Albany county, N. Y., his wife, Garretie Shear, was born and reared, a daughter of Stephen Shear, a Quaker, whose last days were spent in Virginia. She is still living, and makes her home in Pasadena. In spite of her eighty years, she retains to a large degree her physical faculties. Of her marriage there were two sons, Byron and Allen G., and both of them reside in Pasadena, where they are connected in business.

In Edwardsburg, Cass county, Mich., Byron Lisk was born February 25, 1850. From nine years of age he was reared in Illinois. His education was largely received in the Onarga high school and the University of Illinois at Champaign. At eighteen years of age he began to teach in district schools, being at the head of one school for five successive winters. Not desiring, however, to continue educational work permanently, he removed to Roberts, Ford county, Ill., where, as a member of the firm of Lyman & Lisk, he started a hardware, furniture and lumber business. Later Mr. Harding was admitted to the firm, and at a subsequent date the title was changed to Lisk Bros., continuing as such until 1888, when Mr. Lisk came to Pasadena. During his residence in Illinois he served as supervisor of Lyman township, Ford county, as township treasurer, member of the school board, and as postmaster of Roberts, in all of which positions he faithfully conserved the interests of the people. At the same time, with his brother, he operated two creameries successfully for six years, these varied business and official interests making his life a very busy one.

In Illinois Mr. Lisk married Miss Alice Henderson, who was born in Ohio. They have eight children, namely: Mrs. Minnie Nettleton, of San Francisco; Mrs. Lucina Turner, of Pasadena; Mrs. Alice Lacy, of Pasadena; Grace, Ouina, Anson, George and Irene. Politically Mr. Lisk is a Republican, fraternally is connected with the blue lodge of Masons at Pasadena, and along business lines holds membership in the Board of Trade. On the organization of the Pasadena Orange Growers' Association he became a charter member, and has since officiated as vice-president and a director. Besides owning interests in various ranches, he is the sole owner of twenty-five acres in North Pasadena, which he has planted in oranges and deciduous fruits. For six years he has been vice-president of the North Pasadena Land and Water Company, in which he is also a director. When the Pasadena Highland Fruit Association was organized he was one of the charter members, and has since been a director, also now holds the office of president. Another enterprise in which he is represented on the directorate is the Pasadena Deciduous Fruit Exchange, which is the largest and leading packing and local exchange in this vicinity.

JAMES R. GIBBS, superintendent of the Santa Barbara Cemetery Association, has an exhaustive knowledge of all branches of agriculture, horticulture, landscape gardening, and the possibilities of natural development. He was born in Scotland in 1861, and is a son of James Gibbs, a prominent Scotch veterinary surgeon, who served in his professional capacity in the Franco-Prussian war, the result of his heroism being a wound through the spine from which he never recovered. For eighteen years, until his death, he was confined to a bed of continual suffering. His brother, Charles Gibbs, was inspector of police in Glasgow, and through his influence secured a position for his nephew, James R., with Ross & Wallace, commission merchants, who sent him to Canada to buy and ship apples. During the four years of his association with the firm Mr. Gibbs was so successful that he determined to go into business for himself. He accordingly went to Detroit, Mich., and formed a partnership with James White, from Wadington, Glasgow, an old fruit man of experience, and they bought and shipped apples to Glasgow for two years.

In 1884 Mr. Gibbs went to Omaha, Neb., and became associated with J. G. Craig, a landscape gardener and florist, whose foreman he eventually became, and when Forest Lawn, the now beautiful cemetery of Omaha, was established he became assistant superintendent under Mr. Craig. Together they took a raw farm of four hundred and sixty acres and evolved the delightful landscape effects which are the pride of the Nebraska capital. In 1897 Mr. Gibbs came to Santa Barbara and for two years was associated with C. B. Hale, and in March of the same year became superintendent of the Santa Barbara Cemetery Association. The grounds comprise seventy acres, and under his capable management the drive-ways, lawns, shrubbery, and floral effects have been beautified beyond the expectations which necessarily accompanied the reputation of Mr. Gibbs when he came to California. He devotes all of his time to the work of keeping the cemetery in order. While living in Omaha Mr. Gibbs married Miss Forsyth, who accompanied him to California. To Mr. and Mrs. Gibbs have been born two children, Walter and Jessie.

MARY M. GALLY. A more thoroughly delightful resting place for the lover of nature or the physically exhausted could scarcely be found than Oak Glen Cottages in the Ojai valley. Here are found all those wonders of air and sky and verdure for which Southern California is so famed, and which in their unchangeableness are unlike the charm of any other part of the world. The nine cottages constituting the residence part of this ideal resort nestle in the valley in picturesque and convenient arrangement, their roofs and verandas shaded from the noon-day sun by the sweeping branches of white and live oaks, those strong and rugged sentinels in the world of trees. The main building contains the dining rooms and general recreation rooms, and the cuisine furnished is such as to tempt a jaded palate, the finest cream and milk, and the freshest vegetables being served in abundance upon the absolutely neat tables, and by the trimmest of waitresses. The cottages, situated one mile from the village of Nordhoff, furnish a privacy and independence not to be found in a large hotel, and each room is supplied with cheerful wood fires when the evening chill comes in from the sea. The elevation of fifteen hundred feet insures a bracing and dry air, and the mountains intervening between the grounds and the sea, shut out the coast influence and fogs. Hither come many families year after year, delighted at the uniformity of good treatment, and the congeniality. Many exchange their permanent quarters in hotels in Los Angeles and Santa Barbara for the varied interests here united, the usual rush beginning in November and continuing until May. All games are at the disposal of guests, including billiards, tennis and golf, and it is the pride of the manager that she has the finest golf links in Southern California, and the only ones that are maintained by a resort. Hunting in the mountains and fishing in the river afford unlimited amusement, and smooth, hard roads tempt the sojourner on long exploring tours to the different points of interest in the valley. Artesian wells two hundred and fifty-two feet deep supply the house and grounds with water from an unfailing source, and mineral springs abound with their curative ingredients.

The idea of the retreat in the Ojai valley originated in the brain of B. W. Gally, for many years one of the prominent business men in the valley, and who was born in Wheeling, W. Va., July 9, 1852. His father, Hon. Thomas M. Gally, was a native of Virginia, a leading Whig politician, and a member of the constitutional convention of Virginia in 1852 and 1854. His mother, Mary List, was also a native of Wheeling, W. Va., and a daughter of H. List, a leading banker of that city. To this couple were born two children, a son, B. W., and a daughter. After availing himself of excellent educational advantages Mr. Gally engaged in the banking business, but, owing to impaired health from too close confinement, removed to California in 1883. He then purchased the grounds where the cottages are now located, the former owner being W. S. McKee. In his enthusiasm over the beauty of his surroundings, and his faith in the efficacy of the climate to restore and invigorate, he continued to add to his possession every possible convenience for travelers, and added several to the cottages already erected by Mr. McKee. The genial owner of the valley resort was a typical southern gentleman of the old school, with that grace of manner and courtesy of bearing which marks the man of birth and breeding. His death in 1893 was regretted by the friends and acquaintances who had enjoyed his friendship, and by those who had basked with him in the perpetual sunshine of his adopted Ojai.

Mrs. Mary M. Gally, who is so successfully carrying on the management of the cottages, was born in Jefferson City, Mo., a daughter of Dr. William and A. A. Davison, both deceased. She was educated at the Female Seminary at Jefferson City, and in 1885 became the wife of Mr. Gally, by whom she has three children, Howard, Kilbourn and Willey, students in the high school. It may be said that Mrs. Gally is in every way fitted for the responsibility which is hers as manager of the Oak Glen Cottages, for she has the instinctive kindliness of disposition, unfailing tact, and knowledge of human nature, which would invariably aid in conducting an enterprise of this kind. Year by year she welcomes some of the most distinguished people of Southern California, and treats them so well that they are in haste to return to her hospitable and picturesque surroundings.

WALTER ELLIOT. Among the citizens of Santa Maria who have shown special aptitude for successfully maintaining positions of trust within the gift of his townsmen may be mentioned Walter Elliot, deputy assessor of Santa Barbara county. He is possessed of the strong, reliant traits of his countrymen, and was born in Scotland in 1846. His youth was not unlike that of the average farm-reared Scottish boy, nor was he destitute of the laudable ambitions which oftentimes find vent remote from their original surroundings. At the comparatively young age of fifteen he immigrated to America and settled in New York, and while living there enlisted in the Civil war in Company C, Twentieth New York Infantry, serving for one year. His discharge occurred in the city of Richmond, June 17, 1865.

After the war Mr. Elliot lived for a time in New York and Illinois, and in March of 1868 came to California intent upon investigating the conditions here existing. After traveling all over the state he decided upon a ranch fifteen miles east of San José, and here he lived and carried on farming until November, 1875. He then removed to Santa Maria district and ranched until 1891, at which time he took up his residence in the town. The same year he was elected county supervisor of the fifth district, his services being so satisfactory that he was re-elected, and served in all eight years. For the past ten years he has held the position of deputy county assessor, his service in this capacity also meeting with approval. Repeatedly has it been demonstrated that he in all ways consults the general good of the community, and that he regards public office as a means to further the general development, rather than an opportunity for personal aggrandizement. Fraternally he is a member of the Masonic order and of the Knights of Pythias, and he is a past commander of the Grand Army of the Republic.

Of the union of Mr. Elliott and Nina O. Roper, at Santa Cruz, in 1874, there are seven children: Lillian, Frank H., Anna, Elmira, Stella, Edith and Walter, Jr. The children are unusually intelligent and well educated, three of them, Lillian, Elmira and Stella, being engaged in educational work. Frank H. is a miner. Mrs. Elliot died in 1896, and is buried at Santa Maria.

J. VINCENT ELLIOTT. This prominent contractor and builder of Santa Barbara was born at Lone Rock, Richland county, Wis., October 15, 1860, a son of Ezekiel and Phœbette (Vincent) Elliott, the former a native of New York, and now a resident of Santa Barbara. The family is of Scotch extraction. The youngest in a family of four children, J. Vincent Elliott was educated in the public schools of Lone Rock, Wis., and when fifteen years of age came to California, settling in Santa Cruz, where he supplemented his former study by attendance at the schools of the Bay View district. In 1881 he came to Santa Barbara and began to learn the carpenter's trade under his father, and also became interested in the sheep business with the elder Elliott, he having leased the islands of Anacapa and San Nicholas for that purpose. During the four or five years in the sheep business they also contracted and built, and started a planing mill on Chapala street. Eventually the son disposed of his sheep interests for his father's interests in the planing mill, and continued to run the mill for five years. He became one of the pioneer promoters of the Union Mill Company, Incorporated, and was one of the directors and the manager. The mill was after a time removed to the wharf, and after being run there for a year, it was sold to other parties, and Mr. Elliott turned his attention exclusively to contracting and building.

In 1892 Mr. Elliott thought to improve his prospects by removing to Los Angeles and engaging in the restaurant business, which was conducted with moderate success until 1894, when he returned to Santa Barbara and contracted a partnership with George Humphreys in the milling and building business, Mr. Elliott having charge of the contracting. In 1897 this arrangement was dissolved, since which time Mr. Elliott has carried on contracting independently. To him are credited many of the finest residences and buildings in Santa Barbara and elsewhere in the county, among them being the residences of Dr. Stoddard, and Mrs. Varner, the De La Vina house, and, out of the city, the Lompoc high-school building, one of the finest in the county. Mr. Elliott is an architect of no mean ability, and he is a successful business man, standing high in the community in financial circles. His interests extend to Mexico, where he owns stock in the Rea Machol Rubber Company, which concern owns twenty-four thousand acres of Mexican land; also in another rubber company, owning thirty-five hundred acres of land. He is a Republican in politics, and is a member and trustee of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

The first marriage of Mr. Elliott occurred in Cherry Vale, Kans., and united him with Minnie Newton, daughter of Revilo Newton, a banker of Cherry Vale. Mrs. Elliott died in Kansas City. The marriage of Mr. Elliott and Lottie Bouton occurred in Lompoc. Mrs. Elliott is a native of Oakland, Cal., and the mother of one child, Adah M.

HON. JOHN S. COX. Through his intimate connection with the real-estate interests of Pasadena and through his identification with the progress of this city since 1886, Mr. Cox has become one of its influential citizens. In 1892 he was elected to the city council from the second ward and served in the position for four years, during the latter half of which he was honored with the presidency of the board. It was during this period that all of the asphalt paving was contracted for and executed, the electric railroad built and the Southern Pacific Railroad brought into the city. The completion of the sewerage system was another advance made at this time. Miles of street regrading and curbing were also put in, and old and unsightly walks were replaced by cement pavements. All in all, the administration was marked by advance in every line of municipal progress and activity.

In Covington, Ky., Mr. Cox was born February 16, 1857. His father, John S. Cox, Sr.,

a native of county Antrim, Ireland, and a pattern-maker by trade, settled in Philadelphia in young manhood, and there engaged in cotton manufacturing. A later place of business was Cincinnati, Ohio, where he was employed as a pattern-maker; and at the same time he made his home across the river in Covington, Ky. During the Civil war he enlisted in an Ohio regiment and went to the front. His last years were spent in Philadelphia, where he died. In early life he was a Whig and upon the disintegration of that party identified himself with the Republicans. In religious faith he was an Episcopalian. His wife, Elizabeth, was a daughter of William Newton, and accompanied her father from the north of Ireland to Philadelphia; after her husband's death she came to Pasadena, Cal., where she died in 1900. Of the six children of this marriage who attained maturity four are living. The eldest son, William N., who now resides in Philadelphia, was a soldier in the Civil war for a year.

When nine years of age John S. Cox accompanied his parents to Philadelphia, where he was a student in the grammar and high schools. At fourteen he went to Quakertown and two years later entered the employ of the Northern Pennsylvania Railroad at that place. When he was eighteen he returned to Ohio and settled at Mansfield, where he took up photography. In 1876 he became a traveling salesman, selling photographers' supplies through the middle states. During September of that same year he was married in Mansfield to Miss Esther E. Herr, who was born in Pennsylvania. They are the parents of four children, namely: Newton H., who is with the Southern Pacific road in Los Angeles; Mary E., Harold E., and John S., Jr. From 1878 until 1879 Mr. Cox carried on a produce business at Zanesville, after which he resumed photographic work at Glendale, and then, returning to Mansfield, carried on a grocery for three years. From there he came to California in 1886 and settled in Pasadena, which has since been his home. As a charter member of the Pasadena Board of Trade he has been identified with one of the enterprises for the benefit of the city. In many other ways he has endeavored to promote the welfare of this garden spot of the western world, and is interested in everything which makes for the prosperity of his state and nation. In 1896, at the time of William McKinley's first nomination for president, he was serving as a member of the county central Republican committee, also was a worker on its executive committee, and did much to further the cause in this vicinity. During the long period of his residence in Pasadena, he has witnessed its gradual development and progress, and is justly proud of his citizenship in this ideal city.

CHARLES M. SKILLEN. While Pasadena was still an undeveloped tract, its possibilities unrealized and its climate unappreciated, Mr. Skillen visited the town in 1874, having come west in the hope that a change of surroundings might assist him in recovering from the effects of his army service. A year's experience of the climate convinced him of the desirability of the town as a place of residence, and he accordingly returned east to dispose of his business interests, preparatory to a permanent location in the west. During 1880 he purchased fifteen acres bounded by Los Robles and East Colorado streets, which he platted into Skillen's subdivision, opening, parallel with Los Robles, a street which he named Euclid avenue. No attempt had been made previously to improve the land, which had been used as a sheep pasture. One of his first improvements was the securing of water, which enabled him to raise a thrifty orange orchard. However, the opening of the boom convinced him that it would be more profitable to sell the land in lots than to continue to use it as an orange grove, and he therefore platted the subdivision named, and sold the lot with certain building stipulations, so that the residences since built upon it are first-class in every respect. In connection with Samuel Stratton, he also bought the northeast corner of Colorado street and Marengo avenue, which they laid out in Skillen & Stratton's subdivision and afterward sold. When the Pasadena Electric Light Company was organized he was interested in its establishment and served as one of the directors until the plant was sold.

The Skillen family came from the Highlands of Scotland. George Skillen, the American immigrant, became a successful painter and grainer, and was given fine contracts for work in wood and marble in New York City. George Skillen's mother was a Miss Douglass, of the lowlands of Scotland. In religion he was an Episcopalian, and in politics an abolitionist and Republican. He married Hannah Davies, who was born in Wales and died in Knox county, Ohio. His death occurred at the home of his son, Charles M., when he was almost ninety-four years of age. Of his four children, Charles M. was the second and is the sole survivor. Born in New York City in December, 1838, he was reared principally near Mount Vernon, Knox county, Ohio, and in youth learned the painter's trade under his father. However, his tastes ran less toward a trade than toward professional life, and he soon turned his attention to the reading of law, which he began under private tutelage of Sapp and Simons, of Mount Vernon, Ohio. In 1861 he matriculated in the law department, University of Michigan, where he was for one year numbered among the ambitious, progressive and promising students. However, his decision to enter the army changed all of his plans, and the year 1862 found him a private in Company F, One Hundred and Twenty-first Ohio Infantry. He was appointed sergeant and as such accompanied his regiment to the front. While on a forced march from Louisville to Perryville, he succumbed to a progressive paralysis that had been coming on for some time. Unable to proceed further, he was sent to camp near Louisville, where he received skillful and constant treatment, but all remedial agencies seemed ineffective, and in 1863 he was discharged for physical disability. Some two years later an officer of his regiment told him that a commission as captain was to have been tendered him in the event of his recovery, but the loss of his health cut off all hopes of continued service.

Unable to resume his law studies, Mr. Skillen turned his attention to a manufacturing business in Mount Vernon, in which he met with fair success. In that city he married Miss Jennie Stephens, who was born in Pennsylvania. They have an only son, Ralph G. Skillen, D. D. S., a graduate of the Pennsylvania College of Dental Surgery, class of 1897, and now a practicing dentist in Pasadena. Mrs. Skillen is connected with the Methodist Episcopal Church, to the work of which Mr. Skillen has been a contributor. Politically a Republican, the condition of his health has prevented participation in politics and caused him to refuse the various offices that have been tendered him. Connected with Masonry ever since having been made a Mason in Montezuma, Iowa, he became a charter member of Pasadena Lodge No. 272, and is now associated with Corona Lodge, F. & A. M., has since joined the chapter, commandery and thirty-second degree in this city, and is a member of Al Malakiah Temple, N. M. S., of Los Angeles.

HERMAN BLATZ. An industry that has done much toward raising the standard of American wines is owned by the Sierra Madre Vintage Company, of Lamanda, Los Angeles county. In the far-famed San Gabriel valley, between Pasadena and Sierra Madre, are the company's vineyards, established in 1871, and now producing Trousseau, Malvoisie, Muscatel, Tokay, Zinfandel, Petit Bonchet, and other varieties of grapes, from which the wines are made. Sheltered by the Sierra Madre range, rich with the calcareous washings from the mountains, nourished by sun and dew, there is every natural advantage to aid in the development of the vineyards, hence the quality of the grapes is unexcelled, and for the same reason the wines reach the highest point of perfection. The plant covers acres of ground, and includes large wine cellars, containing some of the rarest, oldest and most valuable wines in California; also fermenting houses, cooper shops, sherry house, distillery and store rooms. To facilitate shipments a switch has been built connecting with the Santa Fe Railroad, thus furnishing direct transportation to the jobbing houses of the east.

The manager of the company, Mr. Blatz, was born in Milwaukee, Wis., and is a son of the late Albert Blatz, a Bavarian by birth and for years a brewer in Milwaukee. On completing his education, he entered the grain commission business in his native city. His first visit to California was made in 1884 and two years later he came to the state to locate permanently, settling in Lamanda Park, where he bought and sold real estate. On becoming associated with the Sierra Madre Vintage Company he was assistant to H. Brigden, who, with Hon. J. F. Crank, had established the winery. On the death of Mr. Brigden in 1894, Mr. Blatz succeeded to the position of manager. Under his capable and energetic supervision the capacity of the plant has been doubled, being now one of the largest plants in Southern California. A large acreage of vineyards produces immense quantities of grapes, but, in order to supply the demand, large quantities are also brought in from outside points. It is a source of gratification to Mr. Blatz, and to all the other officers of the company, that the wines from their plant received gold medals at the Paris Exposition in 1900 and the Pan-American Exposition in 1901, while their brandies received similar recognition for excellence and purity. This recognition is especially appreciated because, ever since the company began in business, its members have been obliged to contend with the prejudice of Americans toward native wines, a prejudice so unjust that many, while decrying the home product, drink California wines under foreign labels. Recently, however, a change of sentiment has been brought about, and the pure product of the California grape is in demand throughout the country, not only in hospitals, and for drug trade, but also in leading hotels (such as Hotel Green and La Pin-toresca), and it is also used for sacramental purposes. In addition to unfermented grape juice, the company manufacture orange wine, made from oranges grown upon their grounds, and excellent as a tonic for nervous and stomach troubles.

Besides his duties as secretary and manager of the company, Mr. Blatz is engaged in other enterprises, and is interested in horticulture at Lamanda and Sierra Madre, where he owns vineyards. Since coming to California he has been made a Mason, in Corona Lodge No. 324, and has also been raised to the chapter in Pasadena. He is a believer in Republican principles and has served his party as a delegate to county conventions.

ISAAC A. WITHERSPOON. In the social circles of Riverside Mr. Witherspoon is well known as the president of the Rubidoux Club. In business circles he is known as the owner and proprietor of one of the best-equipped groceries in Southern California. He first came to Riverside in the spring of 1886. In the spring of 1896 he bought out the firm of J. R. Newberry & Co., on the corner of Seventh and Main streets. May, 1900, found him at his present location, No. 754 Main street, where he occupies a building of two stories, 60x157 feet, furnishing adequate accommodations for his growing and prosperous wholesale and retail trade. The best modern facilities are to be found in the store, including electric power for the operating of his plant and machinery for the roasting of coffee, etc. In every respect the store is metropolitan in its appointments, and loses nothing by comparison with similar establishments in larger cities.

Of Scotch descent, Mr. Witherspoon was born near Delphi, Ind., December 11, 1854. The spring of 1886 found him in Riverside, Cal., where he was a clerk for D. A. Correll three years, Cromby & Co., two years, and J. R. Newberry & Co., two years, continuing with the latter until he purchased the business.

R. EASON. The high standing of the Union Savings Bank of Pasadena in the financial circles of Southern California is due to the conservative management and recognized ability of its officers and directors, and particularly to the rare judgment and constant oversight of its president, R. Eason. When Mr. Eason came to Pasadena in 1894, having disposed of his banking interests in the east, he immediately began the organization of a bank in his new home city, and this institution, with a paid-up capital of $100,000, began business March 6, 1895. The office of president he has filled since the organization. Associated with him are A. R. Metcalfe, vice-president, and W. M. Eason, cashier. For the purpose of erecting a suitable bank building, in 1901, he organized the Union Savings Bank Building Company, of which he is president. Plans are now being made for the building of a four-story structure, 56½x118 feet, on the corner of Colorado and Raymond avenue, the cost of the whole to be $76,000. The corner room will be fitted up with banking appliances, while the balance of the building will be rented in office suites.

Several generations ago a Scotchman brought his family to America and settled in Pennsylvania. His son, Samuel Eason, who was born in Scotland, became a pioneer farmer in Lycoming county, Pa. During the war of 1812 he was a lieutenant in the navy and, as such, commanded a vessel on Lake Erie at the time of Perry's celebrated encounter with the British.

With him at the time was his son, Alexander G., a boy of twelve, who in later years often narrated the thrilling tale of how "We met the enemy and they are ours." This son was born in Lycoming county, Pa., in 1802, and became a farmer near Wooster, but about 1854 settled near Iowa City, Iowa, and bought eighteen hundred acres of government land. The cultivation of this tract occupied his remaining years, and he died there when seventy-six years of age. During war days he was strong in his abolition views and always supported Republican principles. Fraternally he held membership with the Masons and in religion was a Universalist.

The marriage of Alexander G. Eason united him with Mary Ellwood, who was born in Columbiana county, Ohio, and died at Iowa City, Iowa. Her father, Thomas, was a son of Noah Ellwood, who died in the east. Six daughters and four sons formed the family of A. G. Eason, and all of these arrived at mature years, but only five are now living. The fifth of the number, Robert, was born in Wooster, Ohio, November 25, 1838, and received public-school advantages. At the age of seventeen he began to teach in Johnson and Cedar counties, Iowa, and for a time was principal of the Rochester school. At Iowa City, he was mustered into the Union service as a member of Company B, Fourteenth Iowa Infantry, in which he had enlisted in September, 1861. The next year, at the battle of Shiloh, so many soldiers of the regiment were killed or wounded that the remainder were transferred to the Forty-first Iowa Infantry, and he became a member of Company L. In the spring of 1863 the Forty-first was transferred to the Seventh Iowa Cavalry, he still belonging to Company L. In July of the same year President Lincoln commissioned him quartermaster of the One Hundred and Twenty-second United States Infantry, with the rank of lieutenant. His first order was to Lexington, Ky., but before assignment had been made, he was sent to Fortress Monroe to take charge of the quartermaster's stores. On his arrival he found the stores scattered over so large an area that he refused to receipt for them, because he realized it would not be wise to assume responsibility for them under the circumstances, nor did he feel that he could receipt for goods he had never seen and never been in possession of. Therefore he resigned. However, his resignation was not accepted until March, 1864, at which time he returned to Iowa.

The improvement of a farm of six hundred and forty acres, the putting up of substantial buildings and making other improvements that added to the value of the property, received Mr. Eason's close attention for some years after the war. The land is still in his possession and lies near Scranton, Green county, Iowa. In 1875 he became interested in the Bank of Scranton. Ten years later he bought out the other stockholders and continued alone as proprietor of the bank, being assisted by his son, W. M., as cashier. From Scranton he came to California, establishing his home in Pasadena with the intention of spending his remaining years in this city.

In Davenport, Iowa, Mr. Eason married Miss Ellen Burke, who was born in New York state and died at Scranton, Iowa. Three children were born of this union, namely: Alexander F., who is a graduate of the Scranton high school and now superintends his father's farm near that town; Willis M., also a high-school graduate, and a graduate of a business college in Des Moines, Iowa, who is now cashier and a director of the Union Savings Bank of Pasadena; and Martha E., who graduated from the Scranton high school and the Cedar Falls College and died at Scranton in 1892. The second marriage of Mr. Eason united him with Miss Hannah M. Baxter, who was born in New York state, and is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

Always a Republican in politics, during his residence in Iowa Mr. Eason served as county supervisor of Johnson county for four years, as mayor of Scranton for three terms, and also held the office of justice of the peace. While in Scranton he was an active worker in the Grand Army of the Republic and also in the blue lodge, F. & A. M., of which he was master for five years. Since coming west he has been identified with the Pasadena Board of Trade.

WILLIAM BAXTER. The weight of eighty-four years rests but lightly upon Mr. Baxter's shoulders, notwithstanding the fact that he has led a very active life. He was born in Aberdeen, Scotland, a son of George and Margaret (Slessor) Baxter, also natives of that country. Following the example of his father, who was coachman to the Duchess of Gordon, he early attached himself to the household of nobility, and traveled as valet throughout Great Britain and the continent. For four years he was with Lord Aberdeen of Scotland, for a similar period was with Lord James Russell and Sir John Russell, besides which for a time he studied veterinary surgery in London, England. In 1857 he went to Canada, where he was employed as inspector and collector. As early as 1859 he visited the then small village of Chicago, going from there to Dupage county, Ill., and later to Tazewell county, where he engaged in farming. A subsequent location was in Livingston county, where he improved a quarter section of land. Removing from Illinois to Iowa, he bought four hundred and eighty acres in Union county, which, under his capable superision, was made to bloom and blossom as the rose. When quite advanced in years, but still a hale, active and energetic man, he came to California, settling at Duarte in 1884. Since becoming a citizen of the United States he has given his allegiance to the Republican party. In religious views he is a Congregationalist.

The marriage of Mr. Baxter united him with Miss E. M. Ironside, a native of Scotland, being a daughter of James Ironside, a blacksmith and farmer. Of their union the following-named children were born: James, who is a liveryman in San Bernardino, Cal.; William A. and John, of Monrovia; Leslie, who died in Iowa; Mary, who is married and lives in Los Angeles; Jennie, Mrs. W. B. White, of Los Angeles; George, who was accidentally killed; Albert, of Riverside county; Robert, who died in Iowa; Charles, of Monrovia; and Annabel, who died in Iowa.

WILLIAM A. BAXTER. Those who form the acquaintance of Mr. Baxter at the present time, noting his stalwart physique, carrying well its two hundred and eighteen pounds, find it difficult to realize that when he came to California in 1882 he had been an invalid for seven years and weighed only one hundred and seventeen pounds. He is one of the many who owe to timely removal to the Pacific coast their health and, indeed, life itself. A native of Aberdeenshire, Scotland, born in 1854, he was taken to Canada by his parents, William and Elizabeth M. Baxter, when but an infant. His boyhood years were passed principally in Illinois and in 1874 he accompanied the family to Iowa, where he continued to make his home until his removal to California. For some time he was unable to engage in active work on account of ill health, but as soon as sufficiently recuperated to resume work, he began the manufacture of cement pipe, later carried on a livery business in Monrovia, and for ten years had a harness shop here. He laid the first cement pipe for the water system and in other ways aided in the progress of the town. At this writing he devotes himself to the improvement of his orange grove of three acres, where he has a cozy home.

The fraternal relations of Mr. Baxter are with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, while in politics he is a staunch Republican. After coming to California he established a home of his own, his marriage being solemnized in Orange, and uniting him with Miss Elizabeth Bond, a native of Marshalltown, Iowa. Her father, Rev. John Bond, was born in Indiana and during active life officiated as a preacher in the Society of Friends, of which he was a birthright member. Reared in that faith, Mrs. Baxter still retains her membership in the same, while Mr. Baxter is a believer in

John G. Hill

Presbyterian doctrines. They are the parents of two sons and two daughters, namely: Walter A., Harold L., Charlotte and Helen, all of whom are with their parents in Monrovia.

JOHN G. HILL. The splendid possibilities arising from the fertility, resources and general advantages of the region surrounding Oxnard, are nowhere more emphatically reproduced than in the life and efforts of John G. Hill, one of the most successful and prominent of the ranchers and stock-raisers of Ventura county. In the future history of the accomplishments of the county his name will be foremost along several lines of activity, not the least of which is the proud distinction of being the owner and breeder of some of the finest specimens of horse flesh in California, if not in the world. Every lover of this noblest friend of man who visits this ideal retreat, and is brought to realize the care and indulgence exercised in his development, departs with the conviction that here at least his needs and nature are faithfully studied, and consequently attain to their greatest beauty, intelligence and usefulness.

The fourth child in his father's family of ten children, John G. Hill received the training accorded the average farm-reared boy. He was born in Paris, Monroe county, Mo., March 14, 1845, a son of James and Nancy (Gray) Hill, natives of Kentucky. For many years the ancestors of the family for the most part engaged in agriculture, and in producing the blooded stock for which Kentucky is justly famed. When seven years of age John G. accompanied his parents and the rest of the family across the plains to California, where they settled in Napa county, and where the elder Hill purchased a farm of one hundred and sixty acres, to which he subsequently added by the purchase one thousand and four hundred acres. There the sons gained the comprehensive knowledge of farm life which has been of such invaluable aid in their mature years, one of the best products of his father's example being Ben Hill, of El Cajon, one of the most noted horsemen in California. The parents passed to the great majority while living in their adopted state, the father in 1870, at the age of three score and two, and the mother in more recent years at Napa City.

In 1866 Mr. Hill began farming independently on his father's ranch, and in 1868 removed to Ventura county, and bought an interest of six hundred and thirty acres in the old El Rio de la Santa Clara a la Colonia grant, which, in its entirety, contained forty-four thousand acres of land. This has since been his home, and a more representative Southern California ranch it would be difficult to find. During the years that have intervened since its purchase giant agricultural interests have been carried on, grains raised in large quantities, the pastures have afforded grazing for thousands of thoroughbreds, and the markets have profited by the Durham cattle and Berkshire hogs. Years ago, in partnership with G. W. Chrisman, Mr. Hill owned at Montalvo a town site of three hundred and fifty acres of land, fifty acres near Santa Paula, one hundred and eight acres sown to alfalfa on the Colonia grant, and four-fifths of two hundred and sixty acres planted in walnuts. With M. L. Wolff he owned one-third interest in eight hundred and forty-two acres rented and sown in barley. He also had five hundred and thirty-seven and one-half shares out of one thousand shares of the Ventura water-works, in partnership with G. W. Chrisman. All of these investments have proved worthy the management and far-sighted discernment of the partners, and while many of them have, in the light of passing events, gone into other possession, they are representative of the enterprise and progress for which Mr. Hill is widely known. In 1885 he built on the home property a beautiful (and at the time the finest) country residence in the county, which, since the subsequent growth of the city, is now on the outskirts of the town, and on the west side.

Indeed it is doubtful if the enterprising little town of Oxnard had ever reared its spires and homes to the sky had it not been for the faith in its future entertained by Mr. Hill. When there were barely a handful of people here, his enthusiasm for the present and confidence in the future stimulated others in like manner, and as a practical demonstration of his belief himself and Henry T. Oxnard laid out the plans of the town in the latter part of 1897, and the survey was made the following year. For the town site Mr. Hill sold a two-thirds interest in three hundred acres of land, and afterwards established the Colonia Improvement Company, which has accomplished wide reaching results, and of which Mr. Hill is now vice-president. The company owns the fine hostelry known as the Oxnard hotel, also the water works and electric light plant. And so has developed this town of two thousand inhabitants, where formerly Mr. Hill and those who shared his aspirations viewed a waving field of mustard.

In addition to his other interests Mr. Hill owns gold and silver mines in the Bradshaw mountains in Arizona, operations upon which have already begun, and from which he expects large returns. He is the owner of the new postoffice, a fine modern structure, and model in its way, built expressly for the purpose to which it is devoted, and he also has built a splendid vault with attendant conveniences, on South Fifth street.

In 1866 in Contra Costa county Mr. Hill married Aranetta Rice, daughter of William and Louisa Rice, and sister of Thomas A. Rice.

Two children are the result of this union, Earnest Rice Hill and Ralph Norman Hill, both ranchers of Ventura county. The latter was the first postmaster of Oxnard. The former was educated at the Leland Stanford University and the latter at the Belmont School. The two sons built the first building in the town in which the postoffice was conducted, and which has since been substituted by the present commodious structure. Although a Republican at present, Mr. Hill was a Democrat until 1896, but has never aspired to political office.

ISAAC BAILEY. The story of the founders of this nation is interesting, not only from a historical standpoint, but also as a source of inspiration and encouragement to others. Yet we need not look to the past, for the present furnishes many examples worthy of emulation in the men who have risen through their own efforts to positions of prominence and financial success. To this class belongs Mr. Bailey of Pasadena, who was formerly engaged in the manufacture of linseed oil in Illinois. The success of his life is due to no inherited fortune, but to his own sturdy will, steady application, wise judgment and tireless energy.

In an early day four brothers came from England to America and cast in their fortunes with the struggling colonies. Descended from one of them was David Bailey, a farmer in the east, and the father of Alfred Bailey, who owned a homestead of one hundred and fifty acres in Schoharie county, N. Y. In the family of Alfred and Betsey (Reynolds) Bailey were six sons and two daughters who attained mature years. The next to the youngest of these was Isaac, whose birth occurred in Delhi, Delaware county, N. Y., October 31, 1844. On the completion of a public-school and academic education, in 1859 he secured employment in a dry goods store in Albany, N. Y., and for seventeen years he remained in that city. Removing further west in 1876, he settled in Gilman, Iroquois county, Ill., and there embarked in the manufacture of linseed oil. Under his direction the Gilman Linseed Oil Company was established and he became its president. After ten years in Gilman he removed to Evanston, Ill., and erected a residence there which he still owns. The linseed oil business was sold to the trust, and having no special ties to bind him to the east, Mr. Bailey decided to enjoy, for the balance of his life, the delightful climate of Southern California. Since 1894 he has made his home in Pasadena, where he purchased and remodeled the residence at No. 720 East Colorado street. Under his direction the home has been transformed into a bower of beauty that is a joy to the beholder as well as a source of pride to the owner. The grounds, too, have been improved until they form a fitting environment for the mansion.

While it was Mr. Bailey's plan, on coming to California, to seek entire rest from business activities, yet he is of too active and nervous a temperament to enjoy a life of retirement; hence we find him identifying himself more or less with local movements; aiding in the putting forth of new ventures; showing himself to be a patriotic citizen, desirous of still further enhancing the fame of Pasadena throughout the world, and contributing his quota to forward movements. He owns a ranch of twenty acres at Rialto, which tract is under cultivation to citrus fruits. He is a director of the Los Angeles County Building and Loan Association, a well-known enterprise, while he also has various oil interests, being president of the Amazon Oil Company of Bakersfield, Cal., a director in the Revenue Oil Company, and a stockholder in other companies. His interest in educational affairs led him to accept the position of regent of the Southern California University, in Los Angeles. With his wife, who was formerly Miss M. Louise Borthwick, of Albany, N. Y., he is an earnest and active member of the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Pasadena, in the building of which he was a generous contributor. In Masonry he has attained the thirty-second degree, while politically he votes for Republican principles. He is a genial gentleman of high social qualities and has a wide circle of acquaintances, by all of whom he is esteemed highly for his sterling qualities.

FRANCIS BECKWITH. That period of inflation and enthusiasm best known as the "boom" found Mr. Beckwith a newcomer in California and a pioneer of Altadena, where he made several purchases of property. At this writing he owns two and one-half acres in this place, besides two lots on Second street, Long Beach, and two lots in Cariton, Cal. The home place is planted with a variety of products, principally vegetables, and also contains a well-appointed dairy, the milk for the same being obtained from seven Jersey cows. In this way the land is being brought to a paying basis, and will in time become remunerative to a gratifying degree.

Mr. Beckwith dates his arrival in California from January 2, 1887, previous to which he had spent some years in Texas. He was born in Yorkshire, England, August 12, 1848, being a son of Thomas and Nancy (Hartley) Beckwith, lifelong residents of Yorkshire, the former being a farmer by occupation. The maternal grandfather, Henry Hartley, followed the trade of a weaver in the cotton mills, and such was his skill with the loom that he accumulated a neat competency, which enabled him to retire from active cares before he had reached old age. In the family of Thomas Beckwith there were three daughters and ten sons, and all but three of these attained mature years, Francis being the fifth in order of birth. The family being large and their means limited, he was set to work when only eleven years of age, and ever since then has earned his own livelihood, besides helping to support others. For two years he worked in paper mills, after which he returned to school. His next position was that of bookkeeper in the cotton mills, and later he became assistant bookkeeper in an iron foundry. In a year he was promoted to be cashier and collector, and also held a position as salesman. Subsequently, for four and one-half years, he held the office of manager.

On embarking in business for himself, Mr. Beckwith formed a partnership with two others and conducted a successful and growing trade. When the partnership was dissolved, he turned his attention to jobbing in the same line. Six years later he closed out his business and in 1881 crossed the ocean to the United States, settling in Texas. However, this state did not equal his anticipations, and, while he saved a little money during his residence there of five and one-half years, yet the results were too small to be satisfactory, and he was thus led to cast his lot in with the people of California, a decision that he has no cause to regret. Besides his landed interests, he is the owner of water stock. Since becoming a citizen of our country he has affiliated himself with the Republican party. Socially he is identified with the Sons of St. George, and in religion is a staunch Episcopalian.

While living in England Mr. Beckwith married Miss Mary Ellen Worthington, who was born in Lancashire. Her father, George Worthington, was a lifelong resident of England, where for years he filled a responsible position as manager of the spinning department in a cotton mill. The children of Mr. and Mrs. Beckwith are Arthur, George and Elizabeth (twins) and Margaret, all of whom are being given the advantages of excellent educations.

FITZ E. BEACH. One of the characteristics of the people of Pasadena is a love of their city. The tie that binds them to the place is not a fragile one, that may be broken by the softest call from afar. This trait is a conspicuous feature in the character of Mr. Beach. His travels have taken him to many countries, and during the time he spent abroad he was a thoughtful student of conditions and peoples, visiting Great Britain, and traveling through France, Switzerland, Italy, Austria, Germany, Holland and Belgium. There was much to admire in those historic lands but he returned to Pasadena firm in the belief that it is unrivaled for beauty and climatic attractions.

Tracing the lineage of the Beach family, we find that Abel Beach removed from Connecticut to New York in boyhood and settled in Peruville, Tompkins county, where for years he carried on a mercantile business, and a large business in insurance and money loaning. His son, Ezra, was born in Peruville, was a school teacher, and afterwards traveled through Iowa for A. S. Barnes & Co., of New York, introducing their text-books in schools. Later he engaged in farming until his death at fifty-four years of age; he married Lucy A. Fitts, who was born in Groton, N. Y., and now makes her home in Pasadena, Cal., with her only child. Her father, Pascal Fitts, a native of Massachusetts, held the office of assessor for three terms and also held several town offices. He spent much of his active life on a farm near McLean, N. Y., where he died. Fitz E. Beach, born in Peruville, N. Y., was given excellent advantages in the high school of Moravia, N. Y., and taught school in Cayuga county, N. Y. After completing his education he traveled through the west, and prepared himself for teaching in Washington. On his arrival in California he was delighted with the appearance of Pasadena and accordingly settled here, buying a lot and making a home, on South Los Robles avenue, for himself and mother. Taking up the study of law under Congressman James McLachlan, of Los Angeles, he was admitted to the bar there and to the United States district court for Southern California, since which time he has had a law office in Los Angeles.

Besides his practice, Mr. Beach has bought land and built a number of houses in Los Angeles, where he now owns valuable property, and was one of the pioneers in the oil development in Los Angeles. At one time he owned a part of the tract near the Cudahy Packing House which is now in the manufacturing district of Los Angeles. On the organization of the Central Bank he became the owner of one-sixth of the stock and was the teller. Another enterprise in which he was a stockholder was the Los Angeles Hay, Storage and Milling Company, in which he held the office of vice-president. During the years of its construction, although not a railroad man, he was a director in the Pasadena & Los Angeles Electric Railroad Company, and he has also been a director in the State of California Mutual Building and Loan Association. In the incorporation of the Pasadena Daily News Company he was an active factor, at the same time becoming a member of its board of directors; it was especially his object, in identifying himself with this movement, to secure for Pasadena a newspaper of high grade, representative of the culture of the people, and for better state, county and city government. Not only is he informed in matters pertaining to the public welfare, but he is also actively interested in local enterprises, and progressive measures receive his co-operation. Politically he supports Republican principles. He is a member of the New Century Club of Pasadena. In matters fraternal he is connected with the Knights of Pythias and the Masons.

NELSON C. BURCH. Prior to the Revolutionary war three brothers came from Wales to America and identified themselves with the struggling colonies. One of the brothers was a Tory, but the others were loyal to the colonies, and John H. acquired an extended reputation as a scout and daring soldier during the Revolutionary conflict. Asa, who was a son of this patriot, was born in New York state and during the war of 1812 served as a captain of a company under General Scott. The next generation was represented by V. D. Burch, who was born near Auburn, N. Y., and married Amanda Chapin, who, at eighty-seven years of age, is living at Jefferson City, Mo. The family of which she is a member settled in New England in an early day. Her grandfather, Levi Green, was a nephew of Nathaniel Green, who served all through the Revolution and at the battle of Bennington was detailed to escort the prisoners; the latter, attempting to escape, were killed.

On the homestead near Auburn, N. Y., Nelson C. Burch was born October 11, 1835. When a small child he was taken into the home of his grandfather, Asa Burch. At eighteen years of age he went to Kentucky and from there to Athens, Mo. He read law with Daniel F. Miller at Fort Madison, Iowa, and later at Keokuk, where he was admitted to the bar on motion of Hon. Samuel F. Miller, late of the United States supreme court. After his admission to the United States district court at Keokuk, he was examined and admitted to practice in Missouri, where he began professional work in 1858. His first presidential vote was cast for Abraham Lincoln and from the first he was a thorough believer in Free Soil and the principles of the emancipation proclamation. In 1861 he became connected with the government service at Washington, where he remained until the fall of 1864. Returning to Missouri, he bore a part in the reorganization of the state. In January, 1865, he was made bookkeeper to the state treasurer. In July, same year, he was appointed clerk of the supreme court, which position he held for eight years. Later he engaged in practice, also established the first daily Republican paper in Jefferson City, Mo., continuing as editor of the same until 1885.

Owing to ill health, Mr. Burch found continued residence in Missouri impossible, and therefore, in 1887, disposed of his interests in Jefferson City and came to California. The town site of Tropic had just been laid out in the midst of a large sheep ranch. Being attracted by the climate, he bought five acres and erected a residence, where he has since made his home. In addition he owns five acres at Glendora. For a few years he conducted an active practice in Los Angeles, where he had his office, but since the summer of 1901 he has given his attention to the work of notary public in Tropic, confining his attention to office work, including the drawing up of wills. For years during his residence in Missouri he was an active Republican politician, but of late years he has not been a participant in public affairs, although his interest in national problems is deep and sincere. With his family, he holds membership in the Presbyterian Church, while fraternally he is connected with the lodge and chapter of Masonry. July 7, 1859, he married Miss Gertrude Ayres, of Alexandria, Mo. Four children were born of their union, namely: Maude, at home; Winnie, who married Lewis Wagner, formerly of Jefferson City, Mo., and now of Denver, Colo.; Emmons, at home; and Asa, who was drowned at six years of age. During the period of his residence in Tropic Mr. Burch has won many warm friends among the people of this vicinity, and is himself devoted to the welfare of the town and its people. However, he has never forgotten his old Missouri home, but in memory often lives over again the stirring scenes of war times in which he participated. When returning to Jefferson City to visit old friends he was greeted with the heartiest pleasure by the comrades of days gone by, and from none was there a warmer welcome than from the "boys" who were in his employ when he edited the Jefferson City State Journal, and who have since succeeded to the active management of the paper.

A. S. BIXBY. During the early days of California's history as a state, Mr. Bixby came hither from the far distant shores of Maine, where he was born, in Somerset county, in 1831. He was the eldest of ten children, all of whom are still living except two, the youngest of the eight being over fifty years of age. His parents, Simon and Deborah (Flint) Bixby, were natives of Maine, and died there at the respective ages of fifty-eight and seventy years, after having spent their busy lives in the midst of farm toil and surroundings. Mrs. Bixby was a daughter of Dr. Thomas Flint, a physician of Farmington, Me., and he in turn was a son of Thomas Flint, Sr., who served as a surgeon on a privateer during the war of the Revolution.

The educational advantages offered to the boys and girls of his locality when Mr. Bixby was a boy were exceedingly meagre, as the school was held for only eight or ten weeks out of the year. However, in spite of this lack of advantages, by observation and by experience he has acquired a fund of valuable information upon all topics of importance to him as a citizen and horticulturist. Setting out as an independent farmer when he attained his majority, for five years he tilled the soil in his home state, and then came to the Pacific coast. Here his first occupation was that of raising sheep on a ranch in Monterey county, and for a considerable period he followed the stock-raising business. It was not until 1877 that he turned his attention more exclusively to citrus culture, in which he is now engaged at Sierra Madre, having during the year named purchased five acres at this place. While the ranch is small, it bears first-class improvements, and is a valuable piece of property. In politics he votes with the Republican party, fraternally is connected with the Masonic order, and in religion attends the Congregational Church. By his marriage to Mary L. Goodwin, who was born, reared and educated in Dresden, Me., he has four children, viz.: Alice May, who is the wife of Albert J. Close, residing in Pomona, Cal.; Lulu A., at home; William F., now in Troy, N. Y.; and Florence L., who is with her parents in their Sierra Madre home.

CAPT. WILLIAM WRAY FREEMAN. A knowledge of the science of deduction, supposed to be the foundation of the success of Sherlock Holmes and other students of criminology, and which, sifted from all subterfuge, is naught save a profound insight into intricate human nature and all its workings, has been profitably and even profoundly studied by Capt. William Wray Freeman, expert detective and chief of police of Pasadena.

Of Swedish parentage, Mr. Freeman was born at Genoa Junction, Walworth county, Wis., November 4, 1866, and is a son of Adolph and grandson of Carl Freeman. The paternal grandfather was a man of affairs and prominence in Sweden, and connected with the government as secretary of war. In response to worthy ambitions he emigrated to America with his sons, Otto, Adolph, William, John and Harmon, and settled upon purchased land in Walworth county, Wis. John and Harmon afterward emigrated to Nebraska and Kentucky, respectively. Thereupon he returned to Sweden, the land of his birth, to continue his official duties and died on his estate, "Malimo," at Wally Hara, Ock Skara, Burgs Lane, Sweden, after a life directed into worthy channels. His sons, Adolph, William and Otto, continued to reside in Wisconsin, and their native sagacity and business ability found ample opportunity among the practically inexhaustible timber regions. They became large dealers in lumber, and under the firm name of Freeman Brothers were well known throughout the southern part of the state. They were the founders of Genoa Junction, from which headquarters they conducted their ever-increasing business. The father of Capt. William died February 12, 1871, but his brother William is now living retired in Pasadena. Otto died from the effects of a fall, September 11, 1902, aged seventy-nine years. Adolph Freeman married Melissa M. Chatfield, a native of New York state, and an early settler of Wisconsin. She became the mother of two children, of whom Capt. William is the oldest, the other son, Dean A., being a resident of Pasadena, and connected with the Pasadena Manufacturing Company.

After graduating from the high school at Lake Geneva, Wis., Captain Freeman came to Pasadena in March of 1886, and the following year entered the employ of a private detective agency at Los Angeles, with which he remained four years. He was very successful and had a natural aptitude for the work, his success leading to his promotion to the positions of captain of patrol, deputy sheriff of Los Angeles county, and to the government secret service. In December of 1893 he returned to Pasadena and started a private detective agency and merchants' night patrol, which was the first of the kind in the history of the city, and though he started with comparatively little capital or influence, his business grew apace and he was soon able to increase his force from himself alone to six men. May 6, 1901, he was tendered the position of first chief of police of Pasadena, his term of service beginning with the adoption of the new city charter. He has organized a very efficient force, and has maintained a high state of order in the city. Captain Freeman is intensely interested in every phase of his chosen work, and regards it from an extremely broad-minded and liberal standpoint. He believes that all punishment should carry with it reformation if possible, especially in juvenile cases, and that all crime is more or less of a disease, and should be regulated accordingly.

The substantial residence erected by Captain Freeman at No. 160 South Moline street is presided over by his wife, who was formerly Viola M. Root, a native of Minnesota, and whom he married March 10, 1892, in San Pedro, Cal. Four children have been born of this union, Naomi M., Ruth C., Carl W., and Gerald C. Mr. Freeman is a staunch Republican, and is fraternally connected with the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks. He is a member of the Board of Trade, and is a charter member of the Association of Chiefs of Police of the Pacific Coast.

JOHN P. CHAFFIN. One of the foremost real-estate men in Pasadena is John P. Chaffin, who came here in 1896, preceded by an extended business career in other parts of the country. He was born in Naples, Me., July 2, 1848, and, because of the loss of his father when five years old, was obliged at an early age to enter the ranks of the employed. His parents, Orrin P. and Dorothy (Green) Chaffin, were born in Maine, the former in Acton, and the latter died in Windham. The father was descended from one of three brothers who came from England to Massachusetts at a very early day, and he was a stonemason by occupation. Of his seven children, John P. is second youngest, while another son, Orrin B., resides in Portland, Me., and was a soldier in a Maine regiment during the Civil war.

At the age of fourteen John P. Chaffin began to clerk in an hotel in Portland and was later connected with a clothing manufactory in Gorham. At Acton, Mass., in 1873, owing to the stringency of the times, the manufacturing plant having closed, he began firing a boiler for the American Powder Company, and before leaving this concern at the end of seven years had risen to the superintendency of the motive power of the plant. Upon returning to Maine he was for a time with a clothing manufacturer at Gray, and then went into the piano business at Mechanic Falls. For the following seven years he was identified with the real-estate business in Waltham, and during that time helped to organize the American Waltham Manufacturing Company, of which he was secretary and acting treasurer. This concern manufactured the Waltham Comet three ball-bearing wheels, and was very successful under the capable management of such men as Mr. Chaffin. In 1896 he disposed of his interest in the bicycle manufactory, and, locating in Pasadena, Cal., engaged in the bicycle and real-estate business at No. 104 East Colorado street. In connection therewith he had a bicycle store in Los Angeles for a year, his main wheels being the Waltham Comet. As his real-estate business increased in proportions he found it necessary to devote his entire time to it, and therefore disposed of the wheel business entirely. The firm of J. P. Chaffin & Sons includes the two sons of Mr. Chaffin, Clifford G. and Ralph S., and does a large business not only in real estate, but in stocks and bonds. Mr. Chaffin is also interested in oil and mining, and he is a member of the Board of Trade.

In Windham, Me., Mr. Chaffin married Clara Emery, a native of that town. Of this union there are three children, Clifford G., Gertrude E. and Ralph S. Mr. Chaffin became associated with the Knights of Pythias in Maine, and is now a member of the Pasadena lodge. He is first and foremost a Prohibitionist. In 1884 he was converted to the Methodist Episcopal faith, and has since been an active promoter of the interests of that denomination. He is a steward and class leader, and contributes generously, not only to the church, but toward many worthy enterprises presented for his consideration.

J. F. CLARKE. The large feed and fuel enterprise conducted by J. F. Clarke since April of 1895 has been, and still is, a distinct addition to the commercial soundness of Pasadena. The headquarters were at first on South Fair Oaks, and were on a comparatively small scale, but the increase of business necessitated larger quarters, and resulted in the erection of the present building in 1901. The new structure is admirably fitted to carry on both a retail and wholesale trade. It is of brick, and covers ground dimensions of 135x200 feet.

To the reliable and substantial traits of the Englishmen Mr. Clarke adds the adaptability of the American born. He comes from that middle class whose representatives have contributed to England's greatest prestige, and was born in Bedfordshire, England, in September of 1863. His father, William, was a farmer and native of Bedfordshire, but in later life removed to Brompton, Kent, a suburb of London, where he is at present residing. Mrs. Clarke was formerly Maria Bandy, a native of Bedfordshire, and the mother of four sons and two daughters, all of whom are living.

Until his sixteenth year J. F. Clarke lived on his father's farm in Bedfordshire, and then went to Grangetown, Yorkshire, and entered the steel works as fireman. In time he worked himself up to the position of engineer, and after three years' service in this capacity went up to London as engineer for the London Tramway Company, with whom he remained for two years. March 18, 1886, he sailed from Liverpool for Ontario, Canada, and found employment at Belleville for about a year, removing to Pasadena October 31, 1887. In spite of his training as an engineer, Mr. Clarke turned his attention in Pasadena to carpenter work, and assisted in the building of the Painter Hotel. In 1888 he removed to San Francisco and engaged in the transfer and express business, and in 1892 went to Chicago, where the approaching World's Fair held out inducements to all kinds of practical labor. In 1891 he was foreman of construction on the Wigwam, and also superintended pulling it down, and he was employed on the construction of the Transportation building, and was foreman of construction on the California state building. He was also foreman of construction for the sheds under which the trains unloaded passengers.

While in Chicago, April 5, 1893, Mr. Clarke married Margaret Breckenridge, a daughter of James Breckenridge, who was born in Scotland, and became a merchant in Godridge, Canada. He married Grace Wilson, of Godridge, Canada, daughter of George Wilson, a farmer in the north. Mrs. Clarke is the mother of one child, Grace Elizabeth. Mr. Clarke continued the carpenter business in Chicago until locating in Pasadena, October 31, 1894. For a time he worked at his trade, but in 1895 started his present feed and fuel business. He has a pleasant home in North Pasadena, on the northeast corner of Glorietta and the county road. Mr. Clarke is a member of the Merchants' Protective Association, of which he served as director, and he is politically allied with the Republican party.

HON. C. F. COOKE. Years of intimate association with the business affairs and public life of Rhode Island are being crowned by an attractive experience with the land of sunshine, where Mr. Cooke now makes his home at Monrovia. He was born at North Foster, R. I., February 2, 1837, being next to the eldest among the six children of James G. and Eleanor (Fisher) Cooke, natives respectively of Gloucester and Cumberland, R. I., the former born August 10, 1807, the latter born two days before. The maternal grandfather, Avery Fisher, was born in Cumberland, R. I., and followed the blacksmith's trade there and at Woodstock, Conn. The paternal grandfather, William Cooke, was a lifelong resident and farmer of Gloucester. Thence James G. Cooke moved to North Foster, where he carried on a general mercantile store for over a half century and for about the same period served as postmaster, dying there in 1883.

A fair common-school education, supplemented by attendance at Greenwich Academy, prepared C. F. Cooke for the occupation of teaching, which he followed during the winters and in the summer engaged in farming. While still a mere boy he had bought and improved seventy-five acres of land, and this farm he still owns. Agriculture formed his principal occupation, but in connection with it he had numerous important interests. Under his father's influence he had early imbibed Republican principles, and a subsequent study of the great political parties caused no change in his views. His intelligence and ability qualified him for leadership in his community, and frequently he was called to positions of honor and trust. For two years he was a member of the town council of Foster. So satisfactory was his service that he was called to higher offices, being for two terms a member of the Rhode Island house of representatives and for one term a member of the state senate, where he favored bills for the benefit of his constituents and the general welfare of the state.

Arriving in California January 1, 1889, Mr. Cooke spent six months as manager of the Hollenbeck ranch in Covina, since which time he has made Monrovia his home, having been in the grocery business five years, also a dealer in real estate, and since 1895 a justice of the peace. Many friends have been won to him since he cast in his lot with the Californians, and his wife shares with him in the general esteem. He was married in North Scituate, R. I., to Miss Alzada Hopkins, whose father, Obadiah Hopkins, was born at North Foster, R. I., in 1800, and was a farmer and lumber manufacturer. Born of their union are a son and two daughters, namely: James A., who is traveling for A. Schilling & Co., of San Francisco; Celia Annette, wife of D. Bascom, of Los Angeles; and Frances M., who is a bookkeeper with the Capital Milling Company of Los Angeles.

J. R. CUTTING. Though a comparatively recent accession to the ranks of the horticulturists of Southern California, Mr. Cutting is by no means a newcomer in the state, for he has made his home here since 1868, and therefore merits the distinction of being a pioneer. After a long and honorable identification with railroading, in September of 1898 he turned his attention to ranching, at which time he bought thirteen acres at Monrovia and here established his home. A comfortable residence adds beauty to the property, while rows of citrus and deciduous trees annually furnish a considerable income in return for the care and cultivation expended upon them.

The Cutting family was established in Vermont several generations gone by. From that state Elijah Cutting, a farmer, removed to Ohio and settled near Upper Sandusky, where he died. His son, Linus, who was born in Vermont in 1794, followed the trade of a miller and millwright, accumulating by steady industry the means which permitted him to pass the twilight of his life in retirement and ease. When eighty-one years of age he passed away at his home in Kenton, Ohio. Six sons and three daughters had been born of his marriage to Eliza Conkling, who was born in 1802 where the city of Cincinnati now stands. Her father, Samuel Conkling, was a native of Scotland and came to the United States in early manhood, settling in Ohio. He was a man of great industry, a devoted follower of the Methodist Episcopal Church and honored wherever known.

The youngest of the children of L. and Eliza (Conkling) Cutting, J. R. Cutting was born in Ohio January 18, 1841. No event of special importance marked the years of his youth, but in early manhood he experienced all the excitement incident to the Civil war with its trail of sorrow and of blood. Naturally his sympathies were enlisted in behalf of the Union, and with the ardor of a patriot he resolved to offer himself to the cause he supported. At the opening of the conflict, when the first call was made for volunteers, his name was enrolled with Company G, Fourth Ohio Infantry, assigned to General McClellan. In all the excitement of the Peninsular campaign he bore his part loyally and well, enduring the vicissitudes of war, the tedium of camp life and the strain of forced marches, with a courage worthy of a regular soldier, and scarcely to be expected from an undisciplined recruit. Those were days that tried men's souls and brought out the best in them, and in the galaxy of brave soldiers he merits a distinctive place. At the expiration of his term of service he was mustered out at Newark, N. J., but immediately offered himself again to his country, enlisting in Company E, Ninety-first New York Infantry, at Albany, N. Y., in September of 1864. Again he went to the front with his regiment and remained with it until the final discharge was received, July 23, 1865, after which he resumed the pursuits of civic life.

During 1868 Mr. Cutting came to California, where he was employed as a conductor with the Central Pacific Railway Company for ten years, meantime making Oakland his home. For some years he was engaged as a conductor on the Overland route, and for two years also served as city marshal of Oakland. After a short experience with life in Idaho he came to Los Angeles in 1888, about the same time securing employment as conductor with the Santa Fe Railroad Company. Ten years were given to the service of this company, and on his retirement he came to Monrovia, where he has since resided. Every acquaintance of Mr. Cutting is familiar with his devotion to the Republican party and his constant support of its principles. Personally he is a man of firmness of character and force of will, with the stature of a soldier and the geniality of a railroad man. Among the people of Monrovia he has a host of warm friends. He has been twice married, first in Springfield, Ohio, when Miss Louise Philbrick, a native of Massachusetts, became his wife. At her death she left two children, Edwin and Nellie. His present wife was Mrs. Belle Lynch, who has two children, Philip and Isabel.

GEORGE F. DUTTON. Many years before the abolition of slavery became a question of national importance, a wealthy farmer and slave-owner, becoming convinced that the traffic in human beings was unjust, liberated his slaves and removed to Ohio, where he bought large tracts of unimproved land. In religion he was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Though of English descent, he was a loyal American and was proud of the fact that his ancestors served in the Revolutionary war. His son, Viridin, a native of Delaware, engaged in milling and farming in Ohio, whence about 1845 he removed to the then frontier of Indiana, and died at Wabash, that state. In early manhood he married Hannah Carey, who was born in Sussex county, Del., of Scotch-Irish descent; her death occurred in Ohio in 1885. Of the nine children born to this union all but one attained maturity, and two sons and three daughters still survive, George F. being the oldest son and the only member of the family on the Pacific coast. He was born in Marion, Ohio, August 20, 1838, and at twelve years of age lost his father, shortly after which he began to make his own way in the world, securing employment in a brickyard and later on a railroad.

July 19, 1862, the name of George F. Dutton was enrolled in Company A, Seventy-fifth Indiana Infantry, which was mustered in at Indianapolis August 20, same year. For a time he served as orderly sergeant, but January 23, 1863, he was promoted to be second lieutenant, and as such participated in the battles of Stone River, Hoover's Gap, the advance on Tullahoma, and the battle of Chickamauga, where he commanded his company. After the capture of Chattanooga he was taken seriously ill and for this reason resigned his commission and returned home October 23, 1863. As soon as he had regained his health sufficiently to take up business matters, he began work as a cabinet-maker, which he followed some years. However, his health still being far from satisfactory, he decided to try a change of climate, and in March, 1868, went to Kansas, settling at Erie, Neosho county, and embarking in the manufacture of furniture. While living there he and his partner built the Neosho county courthouse. In 1872 he removed to Parsons, Kans., where he carried on a large building business. For a year subsequent to this he engaged in building bridges for the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railroad Company, after which he was chief of police of Parsons, and later opened a store in the Postoffice building, where he carried newspapers, stationery and notions. His next location was Neodesha, Kans., where he was a member of a firm dealing in hardware and agricultural implements.

The fall of 1881 found Mr. Dutton in Los Angeles, Cal., where he became a contractor and builder, and erected about seventy houses. However, the cessation of the boom proved disastrous to building enterprises and caused him to seek another occupation. Removing to Glendale, he opened a grocery, becoming the first merchant of the town and erecting the first store building there. In addition, for a time he was postmaster, and for five years conducted a farm. On selling out he returned to Los Angeles, where he engaged in business, but after two and one-half years resumed ranching. During the summer of 1899 he worked at his trade in Washington and British Columbia, but in August of that year returned to Los Angeles county and embarked in the strawberry business with his son-in-law, Mr. Griswold, of Tropico, since which time he has made this place his home.

The first marriage of Mr. Dutton united him with Miss Martha Chamness, who was born at Wabash, Ind., and died there in 1879, leaving two children, namely: Ernest, of Seattle, Wash.; and Mrs. Claudia Griswold, of Tropico, Cal. After the death of his first wife Mr. Dutton was united with Miss Cora Buckles, who was born in Champaign county, Ill. Their children are named as follows: Jesse, of Los Angeles; Harry, who is in Portland, Ore.; and William, at home. Fraternaly Mr. Dutton is connected with the Knights of Pythias and Bartlett Logan Post, G. A. R., of Los Angeles.

H. A. NELSON. The Los Baris Cañon, extending back from the sea into the Santa Barbara mountains, has a narrow strip of tillable land which widens out into an almost round pocket. Here, in the midst of a walnut grove of three hundred trees grown from the seed, is the rarely picturesque home of Mr. Nelson, than which there is none prettier in Santa Barbara county. A finely constructed stone mansion affords shelter for one of the most successful and happy families for miles around, and towering mountain crags on either side, covered with shrubbery and variegated vegetation, seem to shut out the worry and strife of the world of commerce and bustle beyond; and the radiance of the sunset from this particular place is well worth traveling many leagues to see. Mr. Nelson came here in 1883 and bought two hundred acres of land, built his stone house, and set out his walnuts, and is now engaged in general farming and stock-raising, large numbers of hogs, cattle and horses being placed on the market every year. He has a good barn and plenty of water from the mountains, and his staple crop of walnuts averages over one hundred and fifty pounds per tree, although he has raised as many as four hundred and thirty pounds.

The birth of Mr. Nelson occurred in Schuyler county, Ill., in 1845, his father, Henry, being a native of Ohio, and an early settler of Illinois, where he died. The mother, Mary Ann (Teal) Nelson, also died in that state. In 1875 Mr. Nelson left the surroundings of his youth and came west, and for six years lived in Nevada, where he was engaged in the lumber business. He came to Santa Barbara county in 1881 and settled at his present location in the cañon, and has become one of the best known and most successful of the Santa Barbara agriculturists and walnut growers. He is interested in the general development of his locality, and is now in politics a Populist, but formerly affiliated with the Democratic party.

Mrs. Nelson was formerly Louise Darnell, a native of Illinois, and her marriage to Mr. Nelson occurred in Illinois in 1875. Of this union there is one daughter, Jessie, who is the wife of Mr. Rutherford, and who lives with her husband on her father's ranch. Mr. Rutherford assists in working the farm, and is a progressive and industrious man. He is the father of one son, Stephen Nelson Rutherford.

RHODOLPHUS DOTY. Preceded by an unusually successful career as an expert engineer, Mr. Doty came to Pasadena in the spring of 1889, and has since been identified with the upbuilding of many enterprises in the city and county. Although born in Macedon, Wayne county, N. Y., in 1834, he was taken the following year to Lorain county, Ohio, where his father, Aaron, died when his son was eight years of age. He was thus left an orphan, for his mother, formerly Polly Grandy, a native of New York, and daughter of Rhodolphus Grandy, died when he was five years of age. Rhodolphus Grandy was a soldier in the war of 1812, and in 1830 removed from New York to Lorain county, Ohio, where he engaged in building and farming. Besides Rhodolphus Doty, there were two other children born to his parents, and of these, Andrew J. died in Cleveland in 1853; while Moses is a resident of Cleveland, and an engineer by trade, during the Civil war having served as a member of the engineer corps.

Until 1840 Rhodolphus Doty lived in Spencer, Ohio, and then removed to the vicinity of Akron, Summit county, where he attended the district schools and academy, and also learned the machinist's trade. His apprenticeship was primarily served in the Ravenna (Ohio) carriage works, after which he went to Cleveland and learned mechanical engineering at the Phoenix foundry. For the following three years he served a further apprenticeship with John McClellan, learning to construct marine engines, and for the succeeding forty years was identified with machinery interests in Cleveland. For nineteen years he was on the lakes, principally with the Union Steamship Company, and was also superintending engineer for Mark A. Hanna, part owner of the Cleveland Transportation Company, in the latter capacity employed to put in engines for seventeen years. In Cleveland also he was interested in the manufacture of engines and machinery under the firm name of R. Doty & Company; and he was also one of the organizers of the Cleveland Transportation Company, of which he was superintending engineer until the disincorporation of the company in 1886. After this line was well established, Mr. Doty for twelve years and three months acted as chief engineer of the Cleveland water works, and still remained as consulting engineer of the Cleveland Transportation Company. During his twelve years and three months' service for the city he put in five water works engines, three of which were ten million and two fifteen million gallon capacity. He raised the standard of the works and left it in fine condition, and resigned only on account of failing health. Twice the company gave him vacations covering three and four months, and he utilized these opportunities by spending the winter of 1886 and 1887 in California. The change of climate was so materially beneficial that he settled permanently in Pasadena in 1889, and soon after became connected with the Pasadena Electric Light Company, of which he was vice-president and director until the company was sold to the Edison Company. He was one of the organizers of the National Marine Engineers' Benefit Association, of which he was treasurer for several years, and he had formerly been president for several years of the Local Marine Engineers' Benefit Association of Cleveland.

Mr. Doty has many substantial interests in Pasadena and different parts of California. He is interested in mining, his stocks being principally in the Inyo County Mining and Developing Company. In 1891 he purchased ten acres of new land in Redlands, on the Bear Valley Ditch, where he set out oranges of various varieties, and put in a pumping plant of twelve inches' capacity, which is a more than adequate supply for all his needs. He is the owner of three acres of land on Mountain street, which is set out in orange and walnut trees. He is a member of the Pasadena Orange Growers' Association, and was formerly a stockholder in the California Co-operative Colony at Clearwater, Los Angeles county.

In Nelson, Portage county, Ohio, January 27, 1859, Mr. Doty married Lois Amy Roper, a native of Braceville, Trumbull county, Ohio, and whose parents were born in New England, but were early settlers in Ohio. Of the children born to Mr. and Mrs. Doty seven are now living, namely: Charles R., a resident of Cleveland; Mrs. Fannie Fletcher, of Cory, Pa.; George F., who is bookkeeper for the First National Bank at Pasadena, and is a graduate of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology; Henry A., also a bookkeeper for the First National Bank, and a graduate of the Los Angeles Business College; Amy A., wife of Charles Brenner, of Pasadena; Lida and Eilleen. Ezra Roper, the father of Mrs. Doty, was born in Connecticut, in which state three brothers Roper settled after emigrating from England. He was an early settler of Braceville, where he engaged in farming and where he died in 1850. He was a soldier in the war of 1812, and an industrious, honorable citizen. Mrs. Roper was also born in Connecticut, and was of English descent, and at the time of her death in Ohio left five children, all of whom are living, Mrs. Doty being the second. George Roper lives in San Francisco; Francis B., in Topeka, Kans.; Aaron E., in Youngstown, Ohio; and Charles L., in O'Brien, Wash.

ROLLIN DUNSHEE. The history of Santa Barbara county would be incomplete without due and even particular reference to the abilities and attributes of Rollin Dunshee, with whose name is connected all that is best in the early and later development of Montecito. A native of the town of Bristol, Addison county, Vt., he was born in July of 1820, a son of John and Alma (Dowd) Dunshee, who were born in Vermont. On the maternal side, the Dowd family were very early settlers of New Haven, Vt., and at the present time are still represented in that community. The Dunshee homestead in Vermont came into the family many years ago, the paternal grandfather having settled there when Addison county was a wilderness.

The second son in a family of nine children, Rollin Dunshee lived in Addison county until nearly forty years of age. A portion of the homestead fell to his inheritance, and for many years he was a manufacturer of wagons, known the country over as the Dunshee wagons, also an equally high grade of buggies being made by him. The last conveyance manufactured under his supervision in the east, took the premium at the district fair. In 1860 he transferred his field of activity to the coast, coming by way of Panama and thence to San Francisco. At San José he engaged in his former occupation for about five years, and then returned to Vermont, to find that it compared to its disadvantage with the broader opportunities in the west. Again locating in San José, he continued to manufacture buggies and wagons, shipping most of the hardwood lumber for their construction from the east. In 1873 he came to Santa Barbara, where lived a brother, John Dunshee, also engaged in the manufacture of wagons and buggies, and he here retired permanently from the manufacturing business, and engaged in real-estate investment and speculation.

In 1885 Mr. Dunshee settled on his ranch at Montecito, which, however, had been in his possession for several years. Here he lives one of those ideal existences of which few have the inclination to avail themselves, or, having which, do not know how to encompass. Alone, yet never alone, he is surrounded with the unchanging companionship of books, those versatile friends of the cultured mind. In keeping with this broadly comprehensive appreciation of the fine things of life is the gentle humanitarianism which dictates an interest, and suggests a practical help in innumerable instances, and which has gained him a reputation second to none as a sure help in time of need.

In politics a Republican, Mr. Dunshee has been prominently before the public for years, especially in his native state, which nominated and elected him to the legislature with Esking. Since coming to Santa Barbara county he has served as a school trustee. Fraternaly he enjoys a wide reputation, and always takes an active interest in Masonic lodges, being known as one of the best degree workers in the state. He is a member of the Santa Barbara Lodge No. 191, and has been master of the lodge for six years in succession; he is also past high priest of the Corinthian Chapter, R. A. M. It is generally conceded that he has most generously contributed to the general enterprises for building up the county.

ELIZABETH PASSMORE EVANS, the genial and successful manager of The Philadelphia, creditably fills a demand among tourists and permanent residents of Pasadena, for no better managed hostelry caters to an exclusive Southern California trade. The name of the hotel is an appropriate one, for Philadelphia is the principal city of the state whose fertile acres were tilled by the Evans ancestors, Miss Evans herself, her father, Thomas P.; her grandfather, another Thomas; and her great-grandfather, John, having been born in Chester county. Thomas P. Evans, unlike his father and grandfather, branched off from farming to manufacturing in Westchester, and was also active in Republican affairs, serving two terms as clerk of courts of Chester county. During the Civil war he served in a Pennsylvania regiment, and he was always well known in fraternal circles, being a member of the Masons, Odd Fellows and Knights of Pythias. He died in July, 1901, at Swarthmore, Pa., and with his wife, who died January 5, 1902, while living with her daughter in Pasadena, is buried in Westchester cemetery. The mother was formerly Phebe Smedley, also a native of Chester county, and daughter of Isaac and Mary (Hawley) Smedley, born in Pennsylvania. The parents were married for more than fifty-two years, and reared three children, of whom Elizabeth Passmore is the youngest and only one in California. John is a resident of Wilmington, Del., and Ellen H. is the wife of Ferris W. Price, professor of Latin at Swarthmore College, of which institution she is also a graduate, and is secretary of the school board. Mrs. Price is very prominent in club affairs, and is well known as an advocate of woman suffrage. On the maternal side of the family, the Smedleys were all members of the Society of Friends.

After completing her education in Westchester, Elizabeth Passmore Evans spent a couple of years in Europe in recreation and study, and from 1889 until 1891 lived in Philadelphia. In December of 1892 she came to California as an invalid, and after recovering her health engaged in the hotel business in 1894, undertaking the management of the Raymond Villa for a couple of years. In 1898 she purchased the house in which she now lives at No. 521 North Fair Oaks avenue, and named it The Philadelphia. So successful did this venture prove that the accommodations proved inadequate, and an enlargement became necessary in 1902. Miss Evans is interested in the social life by which she is surrounded, and in which her broad mind and culture appear to special advantage. She is an active member of the Christian Science Church.

WILLIAM T. GLASSELL. Connected with the history of Los Angeles as a member of one of its influential pioneer families, Mr. Glassell was born in Santa Cruz, Cal., January 14, 1863, and is a son of Andrew and Lucy (Toland) Glassell, natives respectively of Virginia and South Carolina. His maternal grandfather was the founder of the Toland Medical College of San Francisco and afterward presented the institution to the state of California, since which time it has been an adjunct of the State University. Extended mention of his father, Andrew Glassell, is made elsewhere in this volume, where also may be found sketches of his brothers Hugh and Andrew Glassell (the fifth in direct line to bear that name), and his sisters, Mrs. H. M. Mitchell and Mrs. J. DeBarth Shorb.

The earliest associations of William T. Glassell cluster around Los Angeles, to which city his parents removed when he was two years of age. His education was begun in local public schools and continued in a high school at Oakland, Cal., where he was a student for two years. Returning home, he assisted for a time on his father's ranch, and then acquired a ranch of his own at Florence. The fifty acres were in a vineyard, but after he had managed the property for three years the vines suffered the fate of so many similar properties in Southern California. Renting the place, he returned to Los Angeles, and for three years studied dentistry under Dr. Crawford, and also engaged in mining in Ventura county for six months or more. Since the death of his father he has devoted himself to the management of a portion of the estate. As yet he has not participated actively in politics, nor has he had any desire for official prominence, and he takes no part in public affairs except the casting of a vote for Democratic candidates.

The first marriage of Mr. Glassell united him with Miss Lillie Solomon, of Los Angeles, who died August 24, 1898, leaving a son, Hobart P. His present wife bore the maiden name of Fannie Moore and prior to her marriage resided at Ivanhoe near Los Angeles. One son has been born of this union, William T., Jr.

REV. JOHN H. HARRIS. Thirty years of self-sacrificing labor as a minister of the gospel make the record by which Mr. Harris is held in affectionate remembrance. Much of his work was of the nature of home missionary effort, the planting of congregations on the frontier, the building up of churches in the midst of strange and often discouraging surroundings, the holding aloft of the name of Christ among men and women who were laying the foundation of religion, education, morality and business prosperity in their various communities.

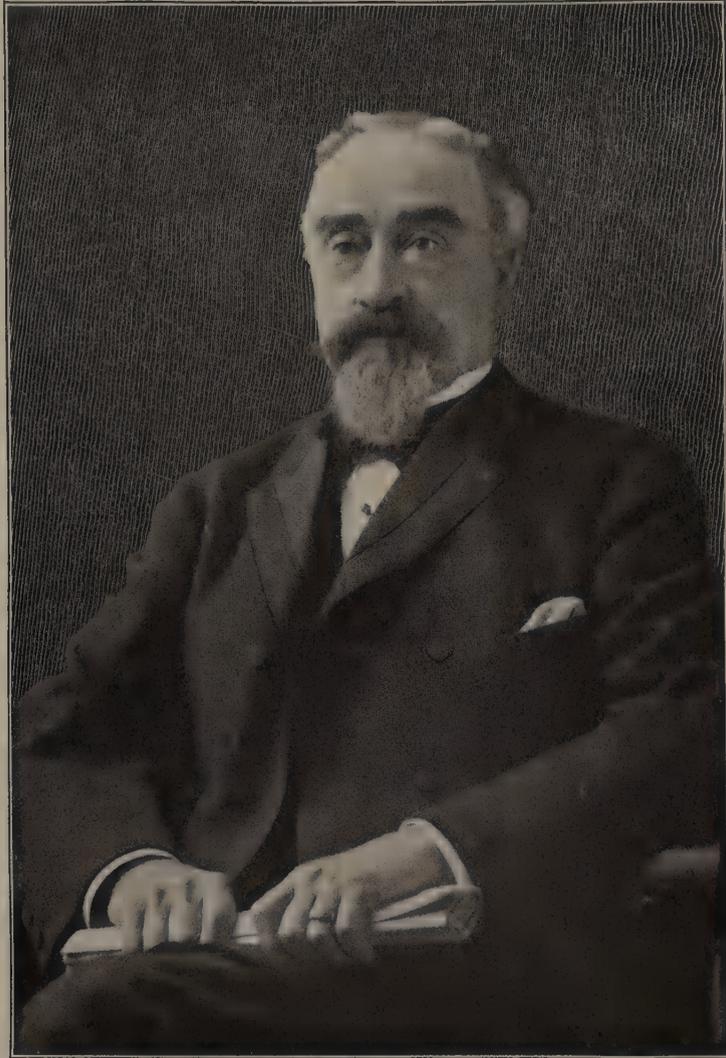

A native of Akron, Ohio, Mr. Harris was a son of Andrew and Elizabeth (Dreher) Harris, who were respectively of English and German descent. The father, who was born in Essex county, N. Y., became a farmer near Akron, Ohio, and it was on this homestead that the son passed the years of youth. Though possessing only limited means, the parents were ambitious for their children, and, recognizing their son's ability, they gave him the best educational advantages possible, in which he assisted by paying, to a large extent, his own way while in college. He was graduated from Miami University and from the Western Theological Seminary of Allegheny City, Pa., and was ordained to the ministry of the Presbyterian Church, after which he ministered to churches on the frontier of Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, and for some years was an officer in the American and Foreign Christian Union. Finally, on account of poor health, resulting from overwork in the ministry, he found a change of climate necessary, and therefore came to California. Organizing the Presbyterian Church at Hueneme, he was its pastor until the second failure of his health again obliged him to retire from ministerial work. In November, 1886, his death occurred at Glendale, bringing to a close a long and laborious career as an earnest preacher.

At Eaton, Ohio, May 21, 1857, occurred the marriage of J. H. Harris and Harriet Newell Miller, daughter of John D. and Huldah Ann (Ayers) Miller, natives respectively of Essex county, N. J., and Montgomery, Orange county, N. Y. The grandfather, Jonathan Miller, was a sea captain's son and was born in New Jersey in 1776, but in an early day settled near Eaton, Ohio. At the time of this removal John D. Miller was a boy, and his subsequent years were principally passed in the vicinity of Eaton, where he engaged in farming. For some time he conducted in Eaton a large marble business. His last days were spent in Glendale, Cal., where he died at seventy-eight years of age. His wife, who died in Eaton, Ohio, in 1860, was of Scotch descent and a daughter of E. B. Ayers, who was born near Morristown, N. J., spent some years in Newburgh, N. Y., and vicinity, later settled on a farm in Preble county, Ohio, where he became an influential citizen. In the family of John D. Miller there were four daughters and one son who attained maturity. The daughters are all living, and three of them reside in Glendale, viz.: Mrs. Harris, Mrs. E. T. Byram and Mrs. Elias Ayers.

During her girlhood years Mrs. Harris was given superior advantages, and had the privilege of studying at Oxford Female College under Dr. Scott, one of the well-known educators of his day. In 1856 she was graduated from this institution and the following year became the wife of Mr. Harris, in whose labors as a minister she proved a most efficient helpmate and colaborer. Being fond of music and possessing ability in the art, she aided him not a little in raising the standard of church music in his various parishes. A staunch believer in temperance principles, one of the principal works of her life has been in connection with the Women's Christian Temperance Union. During the crusade days she aided that movement effectively. For some years after her husband's death she made her home in Los Angeles, but in 1896 returned to Glendale, where she has an attractive and cozy home. With her resides her daughter, Miss Judson, who inherits her mother's musical ability and gives and receives great pleasure through the exercise of this art. Another daughter, Mrs. Lydia Hamlin, is an instructor in music in Tugaloo University, of which her husband, Rev. Cyrus Hamlin, D. D., is Dean. The only son, Murray M. Harris, is an organ builder in Los Angeles.

ALBERT GREGORY. In the capacity of superintendent of the Mesa Alta rancho Mr. Gregory since 1884 has been associated with one of the most interesting properties in the San Gabriel valley, and its reputation as one of the finest estates in the valley is due in large measure to his keen and capable oversight. While he is well versed in all departments of horticulture, it is perhaps as a vineyardist that he is most experienced and successful. Having made a study of the science of raising grapes, he has applied his theoretical knowledge to such good purpose that it is everywhere conceded that no vineyard in all California produces finer grapes for the making of wines than those raised at Mesa Alta. In addition, he devotes considerable attention to the breeding of fine horses, and now has on the ranch a number of standard-bred animals of the English Hackney strains.

Mr. Gregory was born at Richland, Keokuk county, Iowa, September 18, 1853, being the second child in the family of Adonijah and Margaret Jane (Nixon) Gregory, natives respectively of North Carolina and Indiana. His mother accompanied her parents to Keokuk county, Iowa, in 1840, where not long afterward her father, a farmer, was burned to death in one of the prairie fires that caused great devastation in early days. In 1876 the Gregory family removed from Iowa to California and settled at San José upon a farm. Four years later they came to Sierra Madre and took up horticultural pursuits, the father remaining here until his death, in 1896. Educated in the local public schools and Whittier College, Albert Gregory left school to take up agricultural pursuits, which he followed in his native county until his removal to California, in 1884. In young manhood he married Miss Annie L. Williams, who was born in Wales and died at Sierra Madre, Cal., in 1892. Later he was united with Miss Marcia Stinson, of Kentucky. By his first marriage he is the father of three children, namely: Anna Jessie, who died at twenty-five years of age; Brinton Blake, who is with the Title Insurance and Trust Company of Los Angeles; and Eva Mabel, wife of L. W. Hill, of Pasadena. In political views Mr. Gregory is a pronounced Republican.

WILLIAM MORGAN. A penetrating, analytical mind, and profound interest in all that appeals to the strength and sympathy of mankind, have guided the activities of William Morgan into channels of vital accomplishment, principally among the lumbering regions of Michigan and the mining districts of the far west. So many sided has been the career of this Pasadena capitalist, so extensive have been his operations in different parts of the country, and so thoroughly successful has proved his business judgment, that he has practically furnished material for many careers, and built up several reputations of equal merit. Nevertheless, it is as a knight of the pick and shovel, a traveler through thousands of miles of mountainous country in Northern and Southern California, Colorado, and Dakota, in search of the earth's hidden treasures, that he has attained his most prized distinction. No more practical miner has invaded the mining possibilities of the west; no one is better prepared with tents and appliances to start off at a moment's notice upon any trail of supposed merit; and few have the innate gift of estimating the value and quality of any kind of ore by the simple devices of touch, sight and weighing. The years intervening since he first went into mining in 1852 have prepared him for the credit now accorded him as one of the most reliable judges of ore, not only in California, but in the whole country.

A native of Surrey, England, Mr. Morgan was born in December, 1831, and from his father, Thomas Morgan, inherits that wide expanse of vision which contemplates with practical certainty the opportunities by which he is surrounded. The elder Morgan claimed Welsh ancestors. From the beginning of his career he evinced marked business ability and in time became a man of wealth. For the African trade he purchased two vessels from the English government. In 1844 he brought his family to America, and bought a large tract of land at what is now Morgan Park, Chicago, upon which he lived for the remainder of his life. His wife, Anna Maria Morgan, died, leaving seven sons and two daughters, five of her sons having died.

William Morgan was thirteen years of age when he accompanied the family to America, and at Morgan Park he was placed under the private instruction of a tutor. When the craze for gold swept over the land in 1849 his most ardent wish was to cross the plains with the caravans then on the way, but parental opposition prevailed, and instead he entered the office of an eminent Chicago lawyer. In those days much copying fell to the lot of the lawyer's clerk, and the close confinement told upon his health. He therefore changed his plans in 1852, and set out for the Traverse country in Michigan. Thus began his association with the region around Traverse bay, in the building up of which he was to take so conspicuous a part. He was one of the pioneers on the field, and with his partner, Perry Hannah, of Traverse City, selected and surveyed thousands of acres of timber land, much of which they purchased outright. His dream of a western trip was now within his grasp, and the same year that he went to Michigan he returned to Chicago and made arrangements to cross the plains via Humboldt and the Southern Pass. In September of 1852 he reached Grass Valley and engaged in placer mining, and thus was inaugurated in the same year the two great industries of his life, lumber and mining, in which he has been engaged ever since. Late in the fall of 1852 he returned to Chicago via the Nicaragua route, and settled upon land formerly purchased at Blue Island, where he engaged in farming on and off for fifteen years. In the mean time he continued to manufacture lumber at Traverse City, Mich., and at the same time had yards in Chicago at Canal and Jackson streets, removing at a later day to the corner of Lumber and Maxwell streets. As in all lumbering districts, there were mercantile and banking opportunities, and Mr. Morgan was with the Hannah-Lay Mercantile Company as silent partner, which conducted a large enterprise along mercantile lines, and also engaged in banking on a corresponding scale.

These concerns are now among the most substantial in that part of Michigan, and the Hannah-Lay Company are known from one end of the state to the other. They own the finest business block in Traverse City, have all kinds of stores, and have established one of the finest summer resorts in America. The Park Place Hotel, owned by the company, has few superiors in Michigan or in the country, for that matter. The company also own large flouring mills near Traverse City, and their lumber mills were among the most complete and profitable to be found anywhere.

Mr. Morgan also has interests in the Traverse City State Bank, and in the Chicago Chamber of Commerce building, erected by the Hannah-Lay Company. He owned lands in Madison, Greenwood county, Kans., but has long since disposed of his farm at Blue Island, Chicago. Other property in the great middle west metropolis has passed through his hands, and at the present time he has large holdings there. In the time of the boom he came to California and added to his real-estate possessions by numerous purchases, among others owning a ranch in South Park, called the Ravens Roost ranch. His services in Pasadena have been of the substantial and lasting kind, and he has contributed greatly to the building interests of the city. He erected the old postoffice, the Morgan block on Raymond avenue and the Morgan livery building, in which is conducted one of the finest livery enterprises in the west. High-bred horses and up-to-date rigs are the only kind associated with this concern, which is the popular headquarters for the Wilson Peak tourists, and a matter of special pride with its enterprising owner. Mr. Morgan is the friend and admirer of man's noblest and most helpful friend, the horse, and no one better than he understands his kindly and adaptive nature, and his many just claims upon the consideration and patience of his master, man.

January 17, 1856, Mr. Morgan married in Chicago, Emma V. Bingle, a native of New York state, and a daughter of a New York architect who early settled in Illinois. Mrs. Morgan died in Pasadena, October 15, 1898. Since coming to Pasadena, Mr. Morgan has been unceasing in his devotion to mining affairs, and has prosecuted his researches in all the surrounding mining regions. He has a fine collection of ores, and is still engaged in mining. He is a staunch Republican in political affiliation, and was an ardent admirer of William McKinley. In religion he is a member of the Episcopal Church. Too much cannot be said of men who have idealized the conditions by which they are surrounded, and such has been the case with Mr. Morgan. In the primeval forests and the rough lumber and mining camps he has maintained an innate supremacy of character inspiring to all with whom he has come in contact. He is a believer in the great creed of humanity; of absolute kindness to man and beast; of unselfishness and generosity; and the necessity for gentle judgment where aught is at fault.

HERMAN HOEPPNER. A resident of California since 1889 and of Pasadena since 1893, Mr. Hoepner was born in Berlin, Germany, September 10, 1871, and was the youngest of five children, the others being as follows: Mrs. Mary Gottleber, of Santa Monica; Otto, a mason and contractor in Pasadena; Mrs. Bertha Brueckner, of Los Angeles; and Mrs. Emma Sutter, also of Los Angeles. The parents, William and Augusta (Kroeger) Hoepner, were born in Mechlenburg, Germany, and the former followed the occupation of merchant tailoring in Berlin until his death. Both of the grandfathers were soldiers in the German army. After the death of the father, Mrs. Hoepner came to America, and some years later died in Pasadena.

On leaving the German schools, and when fourteen years of age, Herman Hoepner began an apprenticeship to the locksmith's trade in the Berlin Safe Works. At the expiration of his time, in 1889, he crossed the ocean to America, proceeding direct to Los Angeles, where, however, he could find no employment at his trade. He then learned the mason's trade under his brother, continuing in this manner for four years, when he came to Pasadena as a contracting mason with his brother. Among the contracts in which he was interested were those for the stone work of the West residence at Altadena, and the residences of H. G. Reynolds and Mrs. Hopkins in Pasadena. In 1900 he entered the employ of the Los Angeles Brewing Company and was appointed their agent at Pasadena. He is a member of the Fraternal Brotherhood, in politics always votes the Republican ticket, and socially is one of the most active workers in the Pasadena Leiderkranz, of which he is now the president. Since boyhood he has been identified with the Lutheran Church. After coming to Pasadena he married Miss Amelia Zuschlag, who was born near Cologne, Germany. Of their union one child was born, Ella Elizabeth.

C. K. INGERSOLL. Representative of an old-established family of America is Mr. Ingersoll of Monrovia. The first to settle in this country was a German, who came across the ocean in boyhood and became so thoroughly devoted to the welfare of his adopted country that he joined forces with the patriots who sought independence. His name appears as one of the signers of the declaration of independence and the constitution of the United States. One of the most prominent members of the family was Robert Ingersoll, of Peoria, Ill., and later of Washington, D. C. C. K. Ingersoll was born in New York, December 23, 1843. In February of the following year his father, Jesse, who had been a farmer in New York, removed to Wisconsin and settled on a raw tract of prairie land twelve miles from Racine and twenty-one miles from Milwaukee. Buying one hundred and sixty acres, he gave himself closely to the difficult task of evolving a valuable farm, in which aspiration he was successful. On that homestead he died when eighty-four years of age. His wife, who was Sarah Kelley, a native of Canada, died when thirty-two years of age.

The earliest recollections of C. K. Ingersoll are associated with the Wisconsin farm, and there he learned valuable lessons in perseverance, industry and determination. On leaving home he secured employment as a brakeman on the railroad, but soon was promoted to be baggageman and afterward served as conductor. It is worthy of notice, as indicative of his energy and ability, that eighteen months after he began railroading he had charge of a train. However, the work was not entirely congenial, so he resigned and in 1870 went to Kansas, where he homesteaded a quarter section of land near Jewell City, in Jewell county. He was married in 1875 to Miss Rosetta S. Elliott, whose father, James T. Elliott, came from England to Wisconsin in his youth. Two children were born of their union, but both are deceased.

It was in 1885 that Mr. Ingersoll came to California. His first location was San Jacinto, where he bought one hundred and seven acres of unimproved land. Removing the brush that covered the ground, he applied himself to the task of developing a farm, as forty years before his father had labored to clear and cultivate a Wisconsin farm. After a short time he sold this place and removed to Monrovia, where he bought fourteen acres of unimproved land. This he set out in citrus fruits and improved with a commodious and comfortable residence. The irrigation of the land is provided for by means of a reservoir, seventy feet square, eighteen feet deep, and with a capacity of six hundred and sixty thousand gallons.

Fraternal organizations have not been a source of special interest to Mr. Ingersoll, who belongs to none but the Masonic blue lodge. Nor has he cared to identify himself with political affairs. Through a long course of industry and the exercise of wise judgment he has acquired valuable properties and interests, numbered among which is his position as a stockholder and director of the First National Bank of Monrovia. He still owns bank stock and manufacturing interests in Wisconsin, also has stock in Los Angeles banks. Since coming to Monrovia he has witnessed much of its development and has been depended on to conserve the best interests of the people. It may be truly said that Monrovia has no citizen more loyal to its welfare than Mr. Ingersoll.

ALBERT S. BRADFORD. Although now scattered through almost every state in the Union, many of the members of the Bradford family still live in New England, where they are prominent in the Congregational Church, also as educators and as gifted contributors to the current literature of their locality. The state of Maine has been the home of many bearers of the name, and there Albert S. Bradford was born, in York county, August 18, 1858. When barely fourteen years of age he struck out in the world to earn his own living. His search for employment was rewarded when he neared Boston, for he secured work on a market garden farm, remaining for some years in the same capacity. During this time he made a scientific study of hotbed culture and horticulture, and in 1881 started up a business of his own in the outskirts of Boston. After a number of years he assumed the proprietorship of a summer resort at Burlington, Vt., and later settled at Stoneham, Mass., where he was a successful grower of garden produce.

In 1888 Mr. Bradford came to California and for three years was foreman on the fruit ranch of Daniel Halladay at Santa Ana. In 1891 he settled on the ranch in Placentia which his industry has developed. Twenty-eight of the thirty-eight acres of his land are devoted to orange culture and the balance is under walnuts. The nursery department is his special pride. In orange culture he has been particularly successful, his specialties in this fruit being Washington navels and Valencias.

THOMAS HOLMES. It is no exaggeration to say that the greater part of the fine granite work turned out in the state of California comes from the works of Thomas Holmes in Pasadena, for he is one of the most expert in his line in the country. He comes of good old English stock, and was born in Wisbech, Cambridgeshire, England, June 22, 1856, and was educated in the private school of his native town. His father, William Holmes, was a prominent merchant of Wisbech, the store there being but the branch of a larger one in London, England. The father now lives retired in London, his wife, formerly Sarah Ann Bradley, having died in 1899. She was a native of London, and was the mother of eight children, one of whom is deceased, Thomas, the fifth child, and his sister, being the only ones in America.

As a boy Thomas Holmes assisted his father in the store in Wisbech, and eventually he succeeded to the entire management of that branch of the business. In the spring of 1884 he emigrated to America and lived for six months in Marion county, Iowa, the latter part of the same year going to California on a tour of inspection, at the time not fully determined to abandon his former place of residence. So well pleased was he with the prospects in the western state that he decided to remain here, and after locating in Pasadena secured a position as superintendent of the Mount View cemetery. At the time the burying place had but thirty graves. Under the management of Mr. Holmes it became a place of beauty, and was constantly improved by the addition of trees, shrubs and flowers. Meantime he began to be interested in the granite business, and established works adjacent to the cemetery. His reputation as a master workman soon spread abroad, and in 1896 he resigned his position as superintendent to engage in a large contract for Greenwood cemetery, Brooklyn, N. Y., where he put up a mausoleum on which he worked for five months. The same fall he went to England on a visit, and on his return located again in Pasadena and devoted his time exclusively to granite contracting. He is now located at No. 120 Fair Oaks avenue, and makes a specialty of fine granite work and mausoleums. He built three of the latter in the cemetery in Pasadena, and he has also turned out most of the fine monuments and general granite work in the city. He uses the California granite to some extent, but for the larger stones utilizes Barre granite from Vermont. On his grounds he has recently placed a polishing plant run by electricity, which greatly facilitates the making of monuments and fine building stone.

In Middleboro, England, Mr. Holmes married Sarah Dobbings, a native of Yorkshire, and who died in 1893 leaving three children: William, who is with his father in business; Henry and Fred, at home. Mr. Holmes is fraternally connected with the Knights of Pythias, the Woodmen of the World, the Sons of St. George (of which he is president), and the Uniform Rank, K. of P. He is enterprising and successful, and is considered one of the substantial business men of Pasadena.

WILLIAM O. JACKSON. The improvement of his neat little ranch in the Hollywood district, Los Angeles county, has occupied Mr. Jackson's time since he came to California in 1893. Like many of the substantial men of this state, he is of New England parentage. His father, Hon. Andrew B. Jackson, was born near New Haven, Conn., February 14, 1814, and while still a boy gained a thorough knowledge of the harness-maker's trade. He married Mary A. Bassett, also a native of Connecticut, and soon after his marriage became a part of the tidal wave of immigration which flowed into the northwest. Leaving New Haven in 1836, he sought a new home in Wisconsin territory. Settling on government land about twelve miles west of what was then known as Southport, the site of the present city of Kenosha, he improved and cultivated a fine farm and also kept one of the old-time stage taverns and in connection with this also had a general store.

A man of great natural capacity and much force of character, Andrew B. Jackson was one of the most widely known pioneers of Southern Wisconsin. He served as a member of the constitutional convention which framed the present organic law of the state of Wisconsin, and became well known throughout the state in later years as an ardent anti-slavery man. In 1856 he stumped the state for General Fremont and again in 1860 for Abraham Lincoln. He was a warm personal and political friend of John F. Patten, Senator James R. Doolittle and other distinguished Republicans of the ante-war period in Wisconsin. While in Washington attending the first inauguration of Lincoln, he served as a member of the trusted coterie of the president's friends and supporters banded together under the leadership of Gen. Cassius M. Clay, of Kentucky, to guard the nation's chief executive from threatened assassination. In 1856 he removed from Kenosha county to Appleton, and in 1861 was appointed by President Lincoln register of land office at Menasha, Wis., retaining that position until 1866, when he retired from office on account of his refusal to support the policy of President Andrew Johnson. In 1870 he removed to Chicago, where he became well known as one of the founders of the suburban town of Rogers Park, but resided during the later years of his life at Evanston, where he died in 1878. His life was one of great activity, characterized by manly actions, and an exemplification of the highest temperance and Christian principles, these qualities being an inheritance from his parents, Orrin and Anna (Frisbie) Jackson, who descended from early-established families in the east.

The marriage of Hon. A. B. Jackson united him with Mary A. Bassett, who was a member of a well-known eastern family, one of her cousins long officiating as doorkeeper of the senate. She was married in 1836 and lived to be eighty-one years of age. From girlhood she was an interested worker in the Methodist Episcopal Church. Of her four children, the first-born, E. Gilbert, is engaged in the lumber business at Oshkosh, Wis.; Andrew is similarly occupied; Marv E. is the wife of J. W. Ladd of Indiana; and William O., the youngest, is the sole representative of the family in California. He was born near Bristol, Kenosha county, Wis., July 31, 1851, and received his education in the public schools, supplemented by attendance at the Northwestern University of Evanston, Ill. After his father's death he was employed for some years in an office in Chicago, but from there went to Merrill, Wis., and secured a clerkship in the First National Bank of that city. Resigning that position in the spring of 1893 he came to California and bought ten acres, comprising west half of lot 44, of the Lick tract, Los Felis rancho. No trees had been planted and no improvements made, but, believing the property could be made productive, he moved his family here in the fall, and in 1894 erected the attractive residence which is now their home. At the same time he planted eight acres in lemons, utilizing the balance for lawn and garden. In addition to this property he owns a house in Los Angeles, a number of lots in Chicago, and some unimproved land in the foot hills.

In Glencoe, Ill., Mr. Jackson married Miss Harriet M. Hovey, who was born in Cambridge, Mass. Four sons comprise their family, the eldest of whom, Augustus William, is attending Armour Institute, Chicago, with the intention of becoming a mechanical and electrical engineer. The other sons are Irving F., a student in the Los Angeles high school; Wayne B. and Herbert L., at home. The family are connected with the Methodist Episcopal Church and Mr. Jackson officiates as a trustee in the same. While agreeing with the Republican party in many of its principles, he believes that prohibition should be made a national issue and is himself a very active worker in the temperance cause. For a few years he has been vice-president and a director of the Cahuenga Valley Lemon Exchange at Colegrove, and at the same time he has been interested in other movements for the development of the lemon-growing industry.

JOHN O'SULLIVAN. The Los Angeles representative of a fine old Irish family, Mr. O'Sullivan has been identified with the upbuilding of this city since 1875, and has successfully forged his way to the front as an horticulturist and dairyman. A native of Kingston, Ontario, he was born March 8, 1845, a son of Patrick and Catherine (Delaney) O'Sullivan, born respectively in county Tipperary and county Kilkenny, Ireland. The paternal grandfather, John O'Sullivan, was a large farmer in county Tipperary, and was a man of prominence in the affairs of his neighborhood.

Patrick O'Sullivan was a man of fine education of the college at Limerick. He went to rion and various attainments, and was a graduate of Kingston, Canada, as head bookkeeper for the Quebec forwarding store, and later located on a farm near Kingston, where he reared his family and where he died in retirement at the advanced age of ninety-eight years and six months. To himself and wife were born ten children, all of whom attained maturity, and eight of whom are now living: Michael is a resident of Ontario;

Ellen lives in Rochester, N. Y.; Mrs. Cosgrove and Mrs. Gleason live in Bradford, Pa.; Mrs. Selby resides in Kingman, Ariz.; John is the subject of this sketch; James P. is with John in Los Angeles; and William lives in Oregon.

For his rise in life Mr. O'Sullivan owes but a slight debt to his early education, for the opportunities were limited by the amount of work to be done on the Canadian farm, and the little that he learned was mostly at his mother's knee. In so large a family the different members were expected to fulfill their share towards the general support, and John was therefore familiar with early and late hours and the labor side of life. In the spring of 1896 he went to New York state and found employment on a dairy farm in Norwich, Chenango county, and during the three years of his residence in that part of the county was employed by three different men. His last employment was as assistant foreman of the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad. In 1875 he came to California and was for a time employed on the construction of the Folsom prison, after which he worked in various capacities in the same section of country. November 15, 1875, he came to Los Angeles. At that time the houses were mostly made of adobe and there was little of the beauty or enterprise which to-day distinguishes this ideal California town.

For the first year of his residence in Los Angeles Mr. O'Sullivan was employed by the dairy concern of Towne & Hanna, and in time became their general manager. In 1876 he worked for the city of Los Angeles and had charge of the horses, and the second year was appointed by the city council as captain of a chain gang, holding this position for three years and three months. In the mean time he had bought the ranch of which he is now the owner, and which comprises thirty-four and a half acres. From the crude and unpromising this property has been developed into a fine dairy ranch, which has grown from three to seventy cows. To facilitate his enterprise he is obliged to lease other land, so that in all he has the use of about three hundred acres. The Canada dairy is within the city limits, and the owner has made the most advanced improvements, and placed himself in touch with the most exclusive trade in the city. Besides buildings in which to keep hay and grain and horses, he has a cow barn 140x50 feet in dimensions. Two wagons are utilized to convey the milk through the town, and eighteen head of horses are in constant use for general purposes. Horticulturally Mr. O'Sullivan has been quite as successful as in the occupation by which he is best known, and he has a fine orange and walnut grove, from which abundant harvests may be expected every year. His land is all under irrigation, and he raises corn for feeding, his three silos holding about three hundred tons. Alfalfa in large quantities is another product raised on this model ranch, besides grain and general farm produce. Mr. O'Sullivan has numerous interests besides those located on his ranch, and he is a stockholder in the Reilly Oil Company, operating in Los Angeles.

In Norwich, N. Y., Mr. O'Sullivan married Mary Walsh, a native of county Tipperary, Ireland, and who died in Los Angeles, January 30, 1893. Of this union there were seven children, viz.: Daniel, who died at the age of three years and nine months; Addie, who died at the age of eighteen years; William P., who went to Dawson City in June of 1898, and is engaged in mining; Francis Joseph, who is living in Northern California; John James, who is with his father on the home ranch; Edward T., who is also with his father; and Grace, who is attending St. Mary's Academy. The second marriage of Mr. O'Sullivan was contracted in Los Angeles and was with Mrs. Margaret (Coughlin) Moriarity, who was born in Kings county, Ireland, and who is one of the heirs of the Coughlin estate in England. This estate, which is now in the courts of chancery, belonged to the uncle of Mrs. O'Sullivan, who was an high official in the English army, and served with distinction through the Crimean war. The large fortune left by him has been the source of much litigation, and is as yet in a very undecided state. The father of Mrs. O'Sullivan died in Ireland, but her mother brought the family to America, where two or three of the father's brothers lost their lives during the Civil war. To Mr. and Mrs. O'Sullivan has been born one son, Marcellus. Mr. O'Sullivan is fraternally identified with the Foresters, and for twenty-five years has been a member of the Ancient Order of Hibernians, and served as one of the early presidents of the organization. He is a Democrat in politics, but has never taken a conspicuously active part in either county or town affairs. Mr. O'Sullivan possesses enterprise and good business ability, and his career in Los Angeles has resulted in great good from a commercial and general standpoint.

HENRY NICOLAUS. During his residence of more than thirty years in Los Angeles county Mr. Nicolaus has been an interested witness of its growth in population and increase in land values. His own experiences in the buying and selling of property have been extensive and illustrate the fluctuations in prices, which rose gradually until the beginning of the boom, then mounted upward with eagle-like rapidity, only to fall backward with the cessation of the boom and to remain stagnant for a considerable period afterward.

As his name indicates, Mr. Nicolaus is of German lineage. He was born in Bavaria, May 24, 1847. In the summer of 1859 he came to America with his sister and brother-in-law and made his home with them in Cassville, Wis. At the age of sixteen years he came by steamer to San Francisco and from there proceeded to the mines in Shasta county, where he worked for some years, meeting with only fair success. His first glimpse of Los Angeles was in 1871, when he found it to be a town of ten thousand people, lifeless from a commercial standpoint, and giving little promise of future activity. It was his intention to buy a farm and he visited the surrounding country with that object in view. Soon he selected one hundred acres near the present site of Downey, where at that time stood two stores and a few houses, forming the village of Gallatin. Setting himself to work, he began the task of clearing the land and placing it under cultivation. In addition to the raising of farm products, he had an orchard of twenty acres in deciduous fruits.

Selling his farm in 1880, Mr. Nicolaus came to Los Angeles, and for two years engaged in teaming. In exchange for his ranch he had received a lot in Los Angeles with only a small house on it. This he later sold for $5,000, and the purchaser in turn sold it for $100,000. On the site now stands the Bradbury block. In 1882 he came to what is now Burbank and rented twenty-five hundred acres, on which he raised wheat and barley and also had considerable stock. Continuing the cultivation of the land until 1888, when the property was subdivided during that year he bought fifty-four acres one mile west of Burbank and built a house on the land. With his customary energy he set about the task of clearing and improving the land, and soon had twenty acres under walnuts and sixteen acres in alfalfa, while the remaining eighteen acres he sold. Ever since then he has managed the ranch. In 1895 he erected a residence in Burbank and afterward made that village his home until August 1, 1902, when he removed to Los Angeles. The many improvements made in the Burbank district he has witnessed with interest. When he came here in 1882 all the surrounding country was one great sheep ranch, and he plowed the first furrow in the entire district. His possessions include four houses in Los Angeles that he rents, a number of lots in that city and Burbank, and his ranch, which with its improvements forms a valuable property. At the incorporation of the Lagona Irrigation Company he was elected president and held the office for a time.

By the marriage of Mr. Nicolaus to Miss Julia E. Albritton, a native of Louisiana, there are three sons, Henry W., Frederick and Roy. The family attend the Methodist Episcopal Church and Mrs. Nicolaus is a member of the congregation, while he contributes to its maintenance. As a Republican he has been active in the local work of the party. For six years he held the position of school trustee at Burbank, but with that exception he has held no offices, nor has he at any time been an office-seeker. In fraternal relations he is connected with the Forsters. Personally he is a citizen of whom any community might be proud, and the people of Burbank, fully appreciating this fact, accord him a place among their leading residents as he has also gained for himself a name as a capable rancher.

L. B. PEMBERTON. Possessing a more than ordinary mental equipment, and the rare faculty of practically utilizing talents, which in their versatility range from electricity and mechanics to music and poetry, Mr. Pemberton represents the most favored of the adopted sons of Santa Barbara. A scholar, savant and appropriator to himself of the history and knowledge of the world, he is also a keen student of current events, and a sincere appreciator of nature's matchless wonders.

The descendant of a Quaker family, he was born near Bethel, Clermont county, Ohio, November 25, 1866. His grandfather, Richard Pemberton, was born in Kentucky, where he engaged in the stock business, and later immigrated to Southern Ohio. The parents, George M. and Belinda (Black) Pemberton, were natives respectively of Bethel and Georgetown, Ohio, and the former is now an attorney in his native town. During the Civil war, he enlisted in the Union service, and was sent to the Shenandoah valley with his regiment, the One Hundred and Fifty-first Ohio Volunteers.

The youngest of three sons, L. B. Pemberton was given good advantages and attended Clermont Academy near Cincinnati, from which he was graduated in June, 1884. He then engaged in teaching school near his home; but in 1886 removed to Topeka, Kans., and taught the Highland Park school for a year. For the next year and a half he was engaged as book-keeper for the Topeka Coal Company. In 1888 he became assistant superintendent of the Topeka Municipal Electric Light Works, which plant was the first concern of the kind west of the Mississippi river. In 1887 he became acting superintendent of the works and continued in the position until 1889.

About this time one of the Los Angeles street car lines was bought by a Topeka syndicate, and Mr. Pemberton became their representative to put in the electrical equipment of the road. In this capacity he started the first car out under the new and more approved method of transportation, and continued in charge of the electrical department, after the Topeka Company had been absorbed by the Los Angeles Consolidated Electric Company, when the electric system rapidly displaced all the other methods of transportation in the city. In 1893 his scene of activity was shifted for a few months to Phoenix, Ariz., where he installed the first electric car line in that territory. After the Phoenix road was put in running order, and the natives had become somewhat accustomed to the mysterious "broom-stick train," he returned to Los Angeles, and continued with the Los Angeles Company until the latter part of 1895, when he resigned and became sales-agent and engineer for the General Electric Company of Schenectady, N. Y., the largest manufacturers of electrical machinery in the United States. This company he represented in Southern California, having his office, repair-shop and store-room on West Third street, Los Angeles. In 1896 he sold an electric railway plant to C. W. D. Miller, and started in operation the first electric cars in Santa Barbara. A similar advance was made in San Diego, where he started operations for the Citizens' Traction Company later in the year.

Having decided to enter the literary field, Mr. Pemberton resigned from the General Electric Company in September, 1897, and purchased Town Talk, a society and literary weekly; but finding the venture not so remunerative as it was represented, sold out after a few months and accepted the position of master mechanic and electrician for the Los Angeles-Pacific Railroad, a suburban line between Los Angeles and Santa Monica. In 1901 he resigned to accept the position of superintendent of the Santa Barbara Consolidated Railway Company, where his previous varied experience came into good play. A thorough overhauling of the system was necessary in every department. New tracks were laid, the cars rebuilt, a new, modern power house installed, and a complete transformation was soon effected.

Having entered the electric field in its early stage, and being far from the base of supplies, Mr. Pemberton's ingenuity was often called upon, and a number of practical inventions was the result; among which might be mentioned the first detachable incandescent headlight for street cars, an automatic arc headlight, a section insulator for trolley wire, electric heater, track bond and center-bearing street car track with steel-yard motor suspension. Attributable to him also is the designing and building of the "Mermaid," the most complete and sumptuous private street car in the world.

Turning to the literary productions of Mr. Pemberton, we find the same wide range and versatility. The libretto of the opera "Mardi Gras" is characteristic of his lighter style of composition, and when produced for a week in Detroit in 1895, the opera was favorably received by the public. Another of his productions is the "Midshipman," of which Prof. Dion Romandy was the musical composer; but owing to the death of the latter, the opera was never presented to the public. Further inroads into the world of music was made in collaboration with Louis Gottschalk, musical director for the Frank Daniels Opera Company of New York, the opera being the "Nawab," an Oriental production based on the art of hypnotism.

Aided by the possession of a fine natural ear for rhyme and accuracy of meter, Mr. Pemberton has launched upon a successful career some very creditable poetic productions, one volume in particular, called "Sappho and Other Songs," issued in 1895 from the Times-Mirror press of Los Angeles, having received wide and favorable mention. The New York World, in a highly complimentary review, stated that "if the work were only two hundred years old it would be raved over." Another meritorious undertaking is "Prometheus Unbound," a lyrical drama founded on the old Greek legend, and published in 1896 by the Editor Publishing Company of Franklin, Ohio. Of this production, the Boston Ideas says: "It is a work of genuine strength and beauty. It is fervently real and nobly suggestive. Mr. Pemberton is one of the truest poets of modern days. His verse breathes an inspirational air that flows forth into fitting rhythmic cadences with a surety and expressiveness that reveal the beauty of his meaning through the quiet obedience of his words." A five-act tragedy, entitled the "Life and Death of Joan of Arc" was finished in 1891, and received, from the foremost dramatic critic in this country, the following encomium: "It is deserving of the highest praise, of that praise so seldom yielded to modern dramatic compositions." During the following year, a number of short prose sketches were published under the title of "Sketches in Color, A Collection of Half-Tints and Undertones, by the late Vandyke Brown."

During his academic days, Mr. Pemberton proved a most capable Latin and Greek scholar, and achieved the highest record in those branches that had been made in the institution in the forty-five years of its existence. Although taking great pains and pleasure in his literary productions, he has never pushed his work for publication, and has contributed very rarely to current periodicals. At the Poets' Contest given by the Unity Club of Los Angeles in 1893, he produced one of his best shorter poems, entitled "Song to the Sequoia Gigantea" (or Big Redwood Trees of California). This poem was awarded the first prize over nearly one hundred competitors.

The marriage of Mr. Pemberton and Janet Drummond was solemnized in Los Angeles in 1897. Mrs. Pemberton is a daughter of Rev. A. D. Drummond, a minister of the Episcopal Church, whose death occurred in Pasadena. To Mr. and Mrs. Pemberton has been born one child, Lucile. Mr. Pemberton is a Republican in national politics.

EDWARD H. HOLLENBECK. Horticultural pursuits have formed the chief occupation of Mr. Hollenbeck, and the energetic manner in which he has taken advantage of every method tending toward the enhanced value of his property is having much to do with his success in life. In his home place at Verdugo, Los Angeles county, he has six acres, and besides this he owns a tract of thirty-two acres, seven of which are in apricots and five in olives, while the home place is planted in apricots and prunes. Included in his possessions is some property in Los Angeles.

The Hollenbeck family came originally from Holland. John Hollenbeck, a farmer in the east, lived to be eighty-nine years of age. His son, Silas C., was born in Akron, Ohio, March 4, 1823, and in early manhood accompanied his parents to Illinois, where he engaged in farming for a long period. From there he came to California in 1882 and bought sixty-six acres, a portion of which is now owned by his son, Edward H. The improvement of the property and its planting in fruits occupied his remaining years, and he died here June 5, 1901, aged seventy-eight years. Until a few years before his death he was as active as a man of half his years, and the hardships of his busy life seemed to make few inroads upon his powerful constitution. During early life he served as a supervisor, but after coming to California he took no part in local affairs, aside from voting the Republican ticket at general elections. Religious and charitable enterprises received his support, and no worthy project ever was refused assistance at his hands, nor was any one in need turned cold and hungry from his door. By his marriage to Mary Ann Reed, who was born in New York and died in Illinois, he had three children, namely: Francis A., who is engaged in the real estate business in Los Angeles; Julia B., who married Henry W. Benson, and resides at Florence, Cal.; and Edward H., of Verdugo. The last-named, who was the youngest of the three, was born at Pecatonica, Winnebago county, Ill., July 21, 1865, and received a common-school education in the home neighborhood. After coming to California at seventeen years of age he was for one year a student in Woodbury's Business College.

In 1889 Mr. Hollenbeck married Belle Peckham, who was born in Litchfield, Ill. Two children were born of their union, but both were taken by death while still quite young. With his wife Mr. Hollenbeck holds membership in the Presbyterian Church and is an attendant upon its services. In politics he is a firm Republican. The principles of Masonry have in him a staunch champion, and he is actively connected with Hollenbeck Lodge No. 319, at Boyle Heights, which was named in honor of his uncle, John E. Hollenbeck. Since his marriage he has continued to live at the same location, having first bought six acres of his father's place and subsequently adding to his possessions by such purchases as seemed advisable. By a course of industry he is becoming successful financially, while at the same time the fact that he is well spoken of by all is sufficient indication of his character.

RICE B. SHELTON. The Shelton family is of English descent, and it is possible that Roderick Shelton may have been the founder of the family in America, although indications point to the fact that he was a native of Virginia. Accompanied by his family, he moved to North Carolina, and there spent his remaining years. His son, Louis, who was of Virginian birth, grew to manhood in North Carolina and there married Nancy Gladden, a Virginian girl. In company with a colony of southern families they removed to Missouri and took up government land, but subsequently settled in Clinton county, same state, where he improved a farm and died at fifty-six years. Later his wife went to Oregon and there died when sixty-five years old. Both were earnest members of the Methodist Episcopal Church. In their family were fourteen children, and all but one of these attained mature years, Rice B. being the seventh in order of birth. The first-born, David, crossed the plains to Oregon in 1847 and followed the carpenter's trade at Portland, later going to Washington, where he died at eighty-five years. Levi and Tilman were twins, the former of whom died at sixty years, and the latter is living, retired, in Washington. Eliza makes her home in Missouri; Martin died when seventy-five years of age; William, who is now four score years old, is a resident of California; Elijah lives in Washington; Polly Ann was forty-five at the time of her death; Cynthia is living in Oregon; James, who has always been an invalid, makes his home with his older brother, Rice B., who has cared for him since childhood; John died in Texas when he was forty years of age.

In Clay county, Mo., Rice B. Shelton was born October 20, 1831. While still quite young he began to care for his mother and younger brothers and sisters, hence his boyhood was filled with responsibilities. He was sixteen when his father died, and afterward, with an older brother, he managed the farm from 1847 until 1852. During the latter year he crossed the plains, with an ox-team, to Oregon, thence to Washington, returning to Oregon in the spring of 1853 and leaving his mother and younger brothers in Polk county, that state. With the hope that mining might prove a profitable venture he went to Siskiyou county, Cal., and worked in the placer mines on the Scott river, where for five years he met with fair success. On selling out his interests he returned to Oregon, and for a year engaged in driving cattle between there and Washington. With a drove of his own cattle, in 1861 he went to eastern Washington, hoping to sell beef in the mines, but the severe weather caused a heavy loss in the cattle, making the venture unprofitable. His next employment was in packing goods to the mines at Florence, Idaho. Later for twelve months he mined at Boise Basin, Idaho, but did not find the field a fortunate selection. In 1863 he went to Alder Gulch, Virginia City, Mont., where he was employed in mining for $12 a day, and he continued there as superintendent of a crew until the spring of 1865. Prospecting and mining at Helena, Mont., and other points occupied his time until 1881, during much of which time he played in hard luck. About 1878 he crossed the line into Idaho prospecting and with Jack Hicks discovered, at the head of the Limhi valley, on Spring mountain, a rich silver mine, which they developed, being "grub staked" by Levant Pease of Chicago and Tate Taylor. After a short time Hicks became discouraged and sold his quarter interest for a very small sum, but Mr. Shelton would not allow himself to be daunted by obstacles, and the result proved his good judgment, for within twelve months he sold his quarter interest to Pease for $25,000. This was his first stroke of fortune, and well repaid him for the anxieties and cares of past years.

After a winter in Olympia, Wash., Mr. Shelton began prospecting in Montana, but in a few weeks his health failed. In order to recuperate, he spent six months at Hot Springs, Ark., where he soon regained his strength. While there he married Miss Jennie L. Alberton, of that city, who remained his faithful helpmate until her death February 1, 1898, at Burbank, Cal. One of their children died in infancy; the others, Roy B. and Jennie L., are with their father. In the spring of 1883 Mr. Shelton came to California and settled in Los Angeles, but in the fall of the same year removed to the country, buying one hundred and sixty acres of land west of the present site of Burbank. At once he began the arduous task of improving the property. Sixteen acres were planted in a vineyard, and twenty-five acres were improved with deciduous fruit, while the balance of the land was given over to general farming. On selling this place in 1892, Mr. Shelton bought a ranch of twenty acres at Burbank, where he has since lived practically retired, although giving some attention to the raising of alfalfa and also raising fruit for family use.

During the days of his mining experiences in Montana Mr. Shelton was brought face to face with the problem of maintaining order in a community populated principally by a lawless element, and he well remembers having seen thirty-six desperadoes hung in one winter, at the instigation of the citizens who were trying to bring order and law out of chaos. Through his work on the vigilance committee he did much toward aiding to place the government upon a stable basis, and his efficient work as deputy sheriff of Beaverhead county, which office he filled for two years, was also helpful in maintaining the law. Reared a Democrat, he early espoused that platform and continued to vote for its principles until 1900, when, feeling in sympathy with the first administration of President McKinley, he cast his ballot for the reelection of that popular president to the office of chief executive. While he is not a member of any denomination, he is in thorough sympathy with the work of Christianity and has frequently been a contributor to its support, as well as to movements of a philanthropic and helpful general character.

CHARLES M. JAQUES. After a business career of great activity, resulting in a financial success desired by all but achieved by few, Mr. Jaques was led by considerations of health to come to the Pacific coast, and in a short time had become so attached to the country that he decided to establish his permanent home in Pasadena. Here he purchased No. 525 East Colorado street, a palatial residence of brick and stone whose beauty accords with the charming environment of this far-famed city.

Descended from Puritan ancestors who were among the pioneers of Plymouth, Charles M. Jaques is a son of John P. and a grandson of John Jaques, both lifelong residents of Massachusetts, where the former was a builder and contractor, and the latter a farmer. His mother, Pamela Kittredge (Chandler) Jaques, was a daughter of John Chandler, an agriculturist of the Bay state. In the parental family of seven children all but one attained mature years, Charles M. being the second. He was born near Boston, July 1, 1842, and at the age of sixteen graduated from the Boston public schools. His initial experiences as a business man were gained while conducting a wholesale and retail fruit and vegetable trade in Boston. During 1869 he removed to Minneapolis, Minn., but not finding a desirable opening, six months later he went to Chicago, where he began the buying and shipping of grain. In the subsequent years he met with a success that was far in excess of his earliest rose-tinted ambitions. As the president of the Jaques Grain Company, he superintended the building of sixty elevators in Illinois and Nebraska, meantime making Lincoln, Neb., his headquarters. Since coming to California his attention has been largely given to mining, and he is president of the Hercules Copper Company, the Copper King Mining Company and the Verde Mining Company, all operating in Wyoming. He is also erecting three houses in Pasadena for renting purposes. It will thus be seen that he has by no means retired from business activities, but is engaged in enterprises as varied and important as those that engrossed his time and thought when in the east.

The marriage of Mr. Jaques was solemnized in the historic town of Concord, Mass., and united him with Miss Mary Gray Shaw, by whom he has a daughter, Kathrina, now ten years of age. The father of Mrs. Jaques was Kingman A. Shaw, who for some years was a cattle broker at Brighton, Mass., but in 1869 removed to Minneapolis, Minn., and there conducted an extensive real-estate business. On retiring from active labors he settled in Chicago, where he remained until his death. Mr. Jaques is identified with the Methodist Episcopal Church, while in fraternal relations he is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. At no time in his busy life has he sought political honors or the responsibilities of public office, his tastes being rather in the direction of business affairs. However, he is a firm believer in Republican principles and is always relied upon by his party to support its tenets. His warm sympathy is given to all movements that are for the uplifting of the community, whether they tend toward a broadening educational or religious impulse, or toward ideals more nearly allied with the arts and sciences.

D. E. JUVINALL. No science presents greater opportunities to young men than that of electricity, with its constant developments and fascinating intricacies. The fact that Mr. Juvinal is endowed by nature with abilities that adapt him to the business of an electrician contributes largely to his success in this line of work, but coupled with the native ability are determination, perseverance and sound judgment, qualities of the highest importance in every occupation. Since he came to California in 1899 he has made his home in Monrovia, where he built and became a stockholder in the Independent Telephone System, the prosperous management of the same having proved gratifying to him from the standpoint of an electrician as well as profitable from the standpoint of a stockholder. As the owner of this system, he has labored constantly to maintain a high grade of service and to secure the patronage of the people in the vicinity, and now has one hundred and twenty-five subscribers.

The records of the Juvinal family show that Andrew Juvinal, a native of Ohio, became a pioneer of Illinois, where he afterward owned and cultivated a farm of three hundred and twenty acres. His son, James, who served during the Civil war as a member of an Illinois regiment of boys in blue, afterward tilled the soil of a farm of one hundred and ten acres near Danville, Ill., where his son, D. E., was born June 20, 1871. From there in 1894 he removed to Jamesburg, same state, where he lived in retirement from active labors. In Illinois he met and married Miss Eliza Abbott, a native of Ohio, who in girlhood removed to Illinois with her father, James Abbott, and settled on a farm.

In a family of ten children D. E. Juvinall was one of the youngest. When a boy he attended the district schools near his home. At an early age it became apparent that he possessed a voice of unusual power and clearness, and he was given good advantages for its cultivation, being a pupil of Professor Peckham, of Chicago. Afterward he taught vocal and instrumental music for three years. To some extent, also, agricultural pursuits engaged his attention. In 1899 he removed to California and settled in Monrovia, where he built a residence on the corner of J. I. C. and White Oak avenues. Besides his property here, he owns seven hundred and sixty acres in Vermilion county, Ill., near the city of Danville. He is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and a worker in behalf of movements that are uplifting and progressive. In habits he is irreproachable, and both in precept and practice advocates prohibition doctrines. His marriage, which was solemnized in Potomac, Ill., united him with Miss Mattie Goodwine, who was born in Illinois. Her father, John Goodwine, a native of Indiana, settled near Danville, Ill., but now makes Potomac his home, and has during all of his active life followed the business of a stock-raiser, his specialty being thoroughbred hogs and cattle.

THOMAS POLLARD, a government stone and mason contractor of Naples, was born in Lancaster, England, in 1855, and learned the trade of mason and stone cutter while still in his native land. After immigrating to America in 1880 he lived for eleven years in New Jersey, and later in New York and Pennsylvania, in all of which places he successfully carried on his trade, and became prominent as a contractor. Following an inclination to investigate the conditions along his line in the west, he removed to Los Angeles in 1897, and after a short sojourn came to Santa Barbara, where he was for some time identified with the McCormick Machine Company. On the 17th of July, 1900, he received the contract to build the lighthouse at Point Arcala, the estimated cost of which will be $26,000, and the responsibility of which is certainly a guarantee of the confidence which his work has inspired in the government. He also received the contract to build six culverts and one bridge on the Southern Pacific Railroad, and so satisfactory has been his fulfilling of the same that the government inspector, Captain Brown, as well as others high in official life, have highly recommended his work and given credentials which would be of value in any part of the world. Mr. Pollard is now making arrangements to go to Los Angeles to build the lighthouse.

While living in England, in 1878, Mr. Pollard married Harriet France, and of this union there are six children: Raymond, Florence, Ethel, Bessie, Beatrice and Roland. In addition to his general contracting Mr. Pollard is the owner and manager of an hotel in Naples. He is politically a Republican, and fraternally associated with the Knights of Pythias in New Jersey. In the memory of himself and family is the interesting fact that they were among the last American citizens to see the now historic Maine on its way to its doom in Havana harbor. They had left New York on board a steamer which arrived at Norfolk just as the North American Squadron received orders to proceed to Cuban waters, and they watched the departure of the stately fighting machines that later brought so much added glory to the United States navy, and one of which in its destruction was destined to be the real impetus of the Spanish-American war.

ANTHONY R. PIERCE. Industry, wise judgment and energy are marked elements in the character of Mr. Pierce and have been the principal factors in the attainment of financial success, which enables him to spend his later years in retirement from business cares and anxieties. Now a resident of Pasadena, where he established his home in 1886, he was born in Randolph county, Ind., March 26, 1833, being a son of Thomas and Lydia (Ward) Pierce, natives respectively of Loudoun county, Va., and Ohio. His maternal grandfather, Thomas Ward, was a Virginian who became a pioneer farmer of Indiana and remained there until death. The paternal grandfather, Samuel Pierce, was a Scotchman who immigrated to the United States at an early age and participated in the Revolutionary war. When a mere boy Thomas Pierce settled among the Indians in what is now Randolph county, Ind., of which he was one of the very first white settlers and in which he entered and improved a homestead of three hundred acres. He lived to be sixty-eight years of age, and his wife survived him, dying at eighty-three years. Their six sons and four daughters attained mature years, and only one preceded the father in death, while eight were still living when the mother passed away.

In the family Anthony R. was fifth in order of birth. When he was a boy schools were few and methods of instruction crude. His entire attendance at school only aggregated six months, and this was in a subscription school held in a log building, with slab benches, greased paper for window panes, puncheon floor, etc. It will thus be seen that he had no advantages whatever. All that he has and is may be attributed to the patient spirit which enabled him to rise above obstacles. His first work was that of farm hand at twelve and one-half cents a day, and he continued at these wages until he was twenty. Going to Iowa in 1851, he pre-empted three hundred and twenty acres, but difficulties arose which forced him to give up the tract. In the same township he entered one hundred and twenty acres, and there he made his home from 1855 to 1886, meantime bringing the farm under a high state of cultivation. From time to time he added to his possessions, and at this writing still owns four hundred and one acres of highly improved land in Iowa. While in that state he laid out and founded the village of St. Anthony, which was named in his honor, and he now owns a business block there.

The first purchase made by Mr. Pierce in California comprised two acres on Munk Hill, Pasadena, but this he sold within six months, and bought other properties. Adjoining Altadena he now owns a ranch of thirty-five acres, with three hundred walnut trees, besides many orange, apricot, peach and prune trees. In common with many citizens of this locality, he owns water interests and has done much to foster the industry so closely allied with horticulture in California. The North Pasadena Land and Water Company, in which he is a stockholder, is one of the important concerns of the kind in the county. Interested in Masonry, he is connected with the Knights Templar and Shriner organizations. In politics he votes with the Republican party and in religion is a believer in Universalist doctrines.

The first wife of Mr. Pierce was Charlotte Bevins, a native of Illinois. The children born of their union are as follows: McHenry, of Lancaster, Cal.; Thomas J., of Marshall county, Iowa; Addina R., who married H. Becher Ward, of Nebraska; Clara M., the widow of Frederick L. Plant, of Marshall county, Iowa; William E., of Oregon; Mamie L., Mrs. H. J. Munger, of Pasadena; and John M., who is living in Story county, Iowa. The present wife of Mr. Pierce, whom he married July 18, 1893, in Chicago, was Mrs. Anna Schultz, of foreign birth and parentage.

C. M. RICHARDSON. A thriving and constantly increasing business is carried on at the large livery establishment of C. M. Richardson in Ventura, and at this well conducted place tourist and permanent resident may find all manner of conveyances for a diversity of purposes, and may have a delightful ride over the smooth country roads on the only tally-ho coach this side of Los Angeles. An unusually large supply of fine appearing horses are at the disposal of the public, their speed and general qualifications being far in advance of those usually found in like places of accommodation.

The youth of Mr. Richardson was spent on the home farm near Cleveland, Ohio, which was also the place of his birth. His father, Harvey Richardson, was born in Connecticut, and went to Ohio when a young man, where for many years he carried on farming and carpenter work. The mother, Susanna (Cook) Richardson, was also a native of Connecticut, but was married in Ohio. C. M. Richardson left Ohio in 1887, and came to Los Angeles, where for several months he worked as a street car conductor. He had previously purchased ten acres of land planted with apricots near Ventura, Cal., and upon this he eventually settled and lived there for seven years. He then sold out and purchased eleven acres three miles from the city, and four years ago bought the livery on California avenue near Main street, which is by far the largest barn in town.

In 1891 Mr. Richardson married Anna Fisher, a native of Nova Scotia, and of this union there is one child, Harvey, who is now eight years of age. In politics Mr. Richardson is independent and has no official aspirations. Fraternally he is associated with the Ancient Order of United Workmen, and the T. F. B., both of Ventura. With his family he affiliates with the Methodist Episcopal Church. He is secure in the esteem of the community in which he lives, and his up-to-date and modern livery stable is a source of pride to the city and of convenience to all.

JOHN SCOTT. During the entire period of his residence in California, which dates from 1882, Mr. Scott has made his home at Duarte, where he cleared and improved a valuable ranch and has engaged extensively in the growing of fruits. His parents, Archibald and Mary (Nelson) Scott, were natives of Scotland, but England is his native country, and his birth occurred in Lancashire county in 1845. When a boy he attended local schools, receiving a fair academical education. Such time as was not devoted to his studies was spent upon the home farm, where he early gained an excellent knowledge of agriculture. From 1877 until 1882 he made his home in Ontario, Canada, and from there came to Southern California. A visit to various sections convinced him that Duarte offered unexcelled advantages, and accordingly he purchased property at this point.

The twenty-five acres of hill land which Mr. Scott acquired had not been improved, but was still in its primeval wild and uncultivated state. With characteristic activity, he set about its cultivation and the erection of necessary buildings. In addition, at the same time he acquired other property, all of which was developed under his capable oversight. His cottage was erected at a point commanding a fine view of the San

W. D. F. Richards

Gabriel valley stretching away for miles to the hills at Puente. Much of the land is planted in the finest qualities of oranges, and there is also an orchard of deciduous fruits, including apricots, figs, peaches and prunes.

For some years, in the capacity of water commissioner of his district, Mr. Scott rendered excellent service, and he also rendered satisfactory service as president of the Duarte Mutual Irrigation and Canal Company. Has also been county horticultural commissioner for years. So closely has his attention been given to the development of his ranch that he has had no leisure for participation in public affairs, except to vote the Republican ticket in national elections. He was reared in the faith of the Church of England and is now an Episcopalian. In 1876 he married Sarah Fisher, a native of England, and a daughter of Henry and Elizabeth (Sumner) Fisher. Of this marriage were born four children now living, namely: Elizabeth Mary, Margaret Crawford, Archibald and Alice Marion.

W. D. F. RICHARDS. The financial and executive ability which has placed Mr. Richards in the front ranks of the promoters of Ventura county, and the perseverance and wisely laid plans for improving the opportunities within reach of his all-around capacity are in no sense overshadowed by his fame as founder of the town of Saticoy. It is his lot to deserve the kindly interest regarding the circumstances which fashioned his success in life, and the methods pursued while treading the uneven path indicated by a moderately indulgent fortune. He was born in Fairfield, Herkimer county, N. Y., March 8, 1838, of an ancestry which settled during the eighteenth century in America, and was represented in the war of the Revolution by the paternal grandfather, Joseph, who was born in Connecticut. The parents of W. D. F. Richards, Benjamin and Hepsy (De Forest) Richards, were born respectively in New York state, June 30, 1800, and in Connecticut June 20, 1800. On the maternal side the ancestry is interestingly interwoven with the sufferings of the French Huguenots, who were forced to forswear their Protestantism or flee the country. A relative of the maternal grandfather, Isaac De Forest, whose name was David C. De Forest, sought an asylum of tolerance in America, and in gratitude to the country which granted him freedom in action as well as thought, he gave before his death to Yale college an endowment fund for the education of any who bore the name of De Forest. Jesse De Forest by virtue of a charter from the states general of Holland founded the city of New Amsterdam (now New York City) in 1623.

The sixth in a family of nine children, W. D. F. Richards was educated at the public schools, and at Fairfield Academy, one of the earliest institutions of learning in New York. He came to California in May, 1868, locating soon after in the Santa Clara valley, where he purchased six hundred acres of land on the old Santa Paulay Saticoy tract, and was one of the first in his neighborhood to begin improving the raw land. He soon began the raising of flax and canary seed, and one year he raised three thousand bushels of the latter commodity, for which he received from three to five cents a pound. Of later years he has been devoting his land to walnuts and apricots, having about four thousand apricot trees, and fifty acres of Santa Barbara soft shell walnuts. All needful improvements have been instituted on his ranch, and his home is one of the most delightful in the valley.

In 1887 Mr. Richards surveyed and platted a tract of his farm, which eventually evolved into the town of Saticoy, and he was the first to build houses and stores. The town in its present prosperous and promising condition, its advantages of situation, and fortunate possession of enterprising citizens, is the result of the faith in its ultimate well-being cherished in the mind of its foremost citizen, and practically demonstrated in innumerable lasting ways. In furthering the interests of the town he has for many years been engaged in general merchandising, and owns the West Saticoy general store with its complete line of general necessities. He was one of the organizers of the Farmers' Ditch Company, and many other organizations have profited by his intuitive prophecy of their usefulness in the community. His influence has been materially augmented by his activity in promoting the building of the Presbyterian Church of Saticoy, as well as the Methodist Episcopal Church, for both of which he contributed the lots, and subscribed liberally towards the construction. A Republican in politics, he has taken an active part in town and county politics, and has been a delegate to numerous conventions. He was one of the commissioners who separated Ventura from Santa Barbara county, and aided in the organization of the county, and in securing the first postoffice for West Saticoy.

October 4, 1877, Mr. Richards was united in marriage with Carrie Leavens, a native of Trenton Falls, Oneida county, N. Y., and daughter of Hamilton Leavens, of New York.

JOHN B. RAPP. A residence of twenty-two years or more in the district of Hollywood has brought to Mr. Rapp a wide acquaintance throughout this part of Los Angeles county, where he is engaged in raising greenhouse products and vegetables for the market. Of German parentage, he was born August 11, 1847, in Rudesheim, on the right bank of the Rhine, opposite the world-famed city of Bingen. At fourteen years of age he left home and ever since then he has been self-supporting. It was his intention to learn the trade of a maker of surgical instruments, and with that object in view he went to Wiesbaden, fifteen miles away, where he paid $175 for the privilege of being apprenticed to a leading man in the art. For three years he served at the trade without pay, and at the expiration of that time became a journeyman, working at his trade through Europe and Asia, and in the northern part of Africa. Returning home at the age of nineteen years, he followed the usual custom among Germans of offering his services to the army, in which he spent the three ensuing years. Ten months after he had been honorably discharged war broke out between Germany and France, and he was at once called into service, re-entering the army and engaging in its campaigns, marches and battles for the next seven months. When the war ended he still continued with the army, remaining about fourteen months altogether.

His travels throughout the old world had inspired Mr. Rapp with a desire to see America, concerning which he had so frequently heard from his childhood days. During October, 1872, he took passage on the steamer Main, which after a voyage of eighteen days cast anchor in New York. From there he proceeded to Carlstadt, N. J., and secured employment in a watch case factory. Not entirely satisfied with his prospects, he still sought other fields and a more suitable location. After two years he took passage on a steamship for Aspinwall, where he crossed the isthmus. His original plan of visiting South America was changed and he came to California on the steamer Montana, which arrived in San Francisco in December, 1874. The next ten months were spent at his trade in that city, from which he went to Portland, Ore., and began to manufacture cutlery and surgical instruments. While the business proved a profitable venture, the climate was so unhealthful that he was obliged to change, and accordingly returned to San Francisco, where he took up a similar line of business.

On coming to Los Angeles, in May, 1877, Mr. Rapp found a small city, whose people had little money and whose outlook for the future contained few encouraging features. However, the climate was so ideal that he decided to remain, and so opened a small repair and manufacturing shop. In 1879 he came to Hollywood district and bought a home, after which he continued to ride back and forth between his country place and the city every day on horseback. In the fall of 1881 he sold the business, since which he has given his attention exclusively to his greenhouse and market gardening industry. His first purchase consisted of fifteen acres, to which he added eighteen months later fourteen acres, all of which is now improved and forms a neat homestead. Since becoming an American citizen he has voted with the Democrats in national issues and has served his party as committeeman. Six months after coming to Los Angeles Mr. Rapp married Miss Elizabeth Foerst, who was born in the same part of Germany as himself and whom he had known in childhood. They are the parents of seven children, namely: Elizabeth, Mrs. Otto Harms; Emily and Matilda (twins), Theodore, Otto, Arno and Ernest, all at home except the eldest daughter.

WILLIS H. SMITH, engaged in a lucrative harness and saddlery business in Pasadena, was born in Otisco, Onondaga county, N. Y., in November, 1855, a son of Willis G. and Almira (Whitney) Smith, also natives of New York state. The paternal grandfather, Smith, was a practicing physician of Otisco, N. Y., and his son, Willis G., followed in his professional footsteps. The latter was also identified with medical and surgical affairs in Otisco for a number of years, but owing to ill health he eventually retired to Savannah, N. Y., where he in time engaged in the mercantile business. About 1887 he came to Pasadena, where he died, leaving a wife and five sons, two of whom are in California, Willis H. being the third youngest in the family. Charles A. Smith is with the Columbia Banking Company of San Francisco; and A. P. is in the dry-goods business in Savannah, N. Y.

After studying in the public schools of Otisco and Savannah, N. Y., Mr. Smith became interested in his father's mercantile business in the latter city, having learned it in childhood. At the age of eighteen he became a bookkeeper for Mr. Hemingway, of Syracuse, N. Y., but not being able to stand the confinement, engaged in the livery business in Auburn, N. Y., with which city he was identified on and off for eight years. He was city treasurer and recorder for several years, and was prominent in general affairs. In the mean time he had undertaken a stationery business at Rock Rapids, where also he took an active interest in political and social undertakings. In May of 1892 he located in Pasadena as bookkeeper for Kennedy & Co., grocers, with whom he remained for about four years, later becoming bookkeeper for the Union Savings Bank, of which his brother was cashier. This position he resigned in the fall of 1896, to engage in the harness business, to which he has since devoted his energies, and which has been attended by such gratifying success. His establishment is advantageously located in the heart of the city, and the majority of the exclusive and exacting trade has come his way. He has furnished the Raymond livery and full outfit of harness manufactured by himself; also the Morgan outfit, as well as that of many other citizens whose turn-outs are characterized by extreme simplicity and elegance.

In Savannah, N. Y., Mr. Smith married Martha Smith, born in Seneca county, N. Y., and daughter of Bela Smith, a hardware merchant of Savannah. To Mr. and Mrs. Smith have been born three children: Gertrude, a graduate of the Pomona College, and of the University of California, class of 1902; Elbert, a graduate of the high-school, and bookkeeper for the Pasadena National Bank; and Addison; attending the Throop Polytechnic. Mr. Smith is a Republican in political affiliation, a member of the Board of Trade and the Merchants' Protective Association. Mrs. Smith is a member of the Presbyterian Church.

MRS. JEANNIE E. STICKNEY. Far removed from the happy scenes of her girlhood, Mrs. Stickney is passing life's tranquil twilight in Monrovia, where she has made her home since 1897. Largely through the distinguished public services of her father, Hon. Amos Kendall, the family of which she is a member has been intimately associated with our nation's progress. Descended from Francis Kendall, who crossed the ocean about 1840 from England to Woburn, Mass., Amos Kendall was born of poor parents, at Dunstable, Mass., August 16, 1789. Neither outward circumstances nor the influence of friends were indicative of the success he was to achieve; but, being early thrown upon his own resources, he developed qualities of self-reliance and perseverance that were of inestimable value in subsequent years. When sixteen years of age he entered Dartmouth College, from which he was graduated in 1811 at the head of his class, although he had frequently been out of school in order to earn the necessary funds for college expenses.

After a few years of law study, in 1814 Mr. Kendall settled in Lexington, Ky., where he was tutor in the family of Henry Clay during that great statesman's absence to negotiate the treaty of Ghent. Later he became editor of a paper at Georgetown, Ky., where he was also postmaster. In 1816 he bought an interest in the Argus of Western America, the state journal at Frankfort. Largely through his efforts one-half of the profits of the Bank of the Commonwealth were set aside for the school fund, by legislative act. In 1829 he was appointed fourth auditor of the treasury. During the following years he aided in shaping the president's anti-bank policy, was appointed a special treasury agent to negotiate with state banks, and became a distinct power in public affairs. It was at this time that Harriet Martineau wrote of him: "I was fortunate enough to catch a glimpse of Amos Kendall, one of the most remarkable men in America. He is supposed to be the moving spring of the administration; the thinker, planner and doer, but it is all in the dark." An additional honor came to him in 1835, when he was appointed postmaster-general. During his service he freed the department from debt and introduced many reforms. In 1840 he retired from the cabinet, refusing a foreign mission tendered him by President Polk. For a short time afterward he was at the head of a bi-weekly called Kendall's Expositor, and a weekly the Union Democrat. In 1845 he became associated with Prof. Samuel F. B. Morse in the ownership of his telegraph patents, and his connection with their management, after years of trial and defeat, made him a rich man. The remainder of his life was passed at his country seat, Kendall Green, near Washington, D. C. During the Civil war he supported the Union cause, and his last political address was made for General McClellan at Trenton, N. J., in 1861.

In the midst of all his activities, Mr. Kendall found time to interest himself in worthy charities, and no deserving cause appealed in vain to him for help. One of his most notable philanthropies was the contributing of $100,000 for the building of the Calvary Baptist Church at Washington, D. C., dedicated to his wife, while two mission schools received $25,000 to forward their work. He lived to see the development of his idea of a collegiate department for the classical education of the deaf mutes and made the address at their first commencement. He resigned the presidency in favor of E. M. Gallandet, who is still its president. More than once he gave scholarships to the Columbian College, of whose board of trustees he served as president. With all of his other busy affairs he maintained an interest in literature, kept posted concerning those books that marked epochs in the world of thought, and was himself the author of several productions. He commenced a "Life of Andrew Jackson, Private, Military and Civil," but was unable to complete it because of the failure of a friend to supply him with the necessary material. His death occurred at Washington, D. C., November 11, 1869.

After having completed her education in a ladies' seminary at Washington, Miss Jeannie E. Kendall in 1852 became the wife of William Stickney, who was born in Bangor, Me., and graduated from Columbian College. He studied law with Judge Lomax, of Virginia, to whose sons he was tutor. In 1847 he began to practice law in St. Louis, but in 1850 returned to Washington and in 1852 became assistant counsel in Prof. Morse's telegraph cases and resided in New York. Subsequently he became private secretary to Amos Kendall, continuing in that position until Mr. Kendall's death. Later he was president of the National Safe Deposit Savings Trust Company of Washington, also acted as a member of the Indian peace commission and as secretary of the deaf and dumb college and as secretary of the Columbian University, his alma mater. His death occurred at Washington in 1881, closing a career that was active, honorable and patriotic. Both he and his wife were associated with Calvary Baptist Church, and Mrs. Stickney is now a member of the Monrovia Baptist Church, also is identified with the Saturday Afternoon Club of Monrovia. On the organization of the Women's Christian Association in Washington she was elected the first president, and her executive ability and wise leadership accomplished much for the furtherance of reforms greatly needed by the city at that time. It had been her intention to spend her last years in Washington, where she had many ties of warm friendship, as well as the memory of the influential lives of father and husband, but in 1897 considerations of health led her to remove to California.

DAVID SULLIVAN. An evening spent with David Sullivan when in his most reminiscent mood is like being transported back many years into the last century, into the crude conditions that then prevailed in certain portions of the east as well as west. When narrated in the midst of the beauty of Santa Barbara these undertakings seem as the dew and fragrance of unspoiled early morning, soon to be overpowered by the heat and aggressiveness of a noon-day sun. Mr. Sullivan was born in Zanesville, Ohio, in June of 1813, and is the only surviving member of a family in which there were nine children. His father, Samuel, was born in Delaware, and became a prominent merchant in Zanesville, being also the owner and manager of a large and productive farm in the vicinity of the town, and living to a ripe old age. The mother, formerly Mary Freeman, of Georgia, attained the unusual age of ninety-one years.

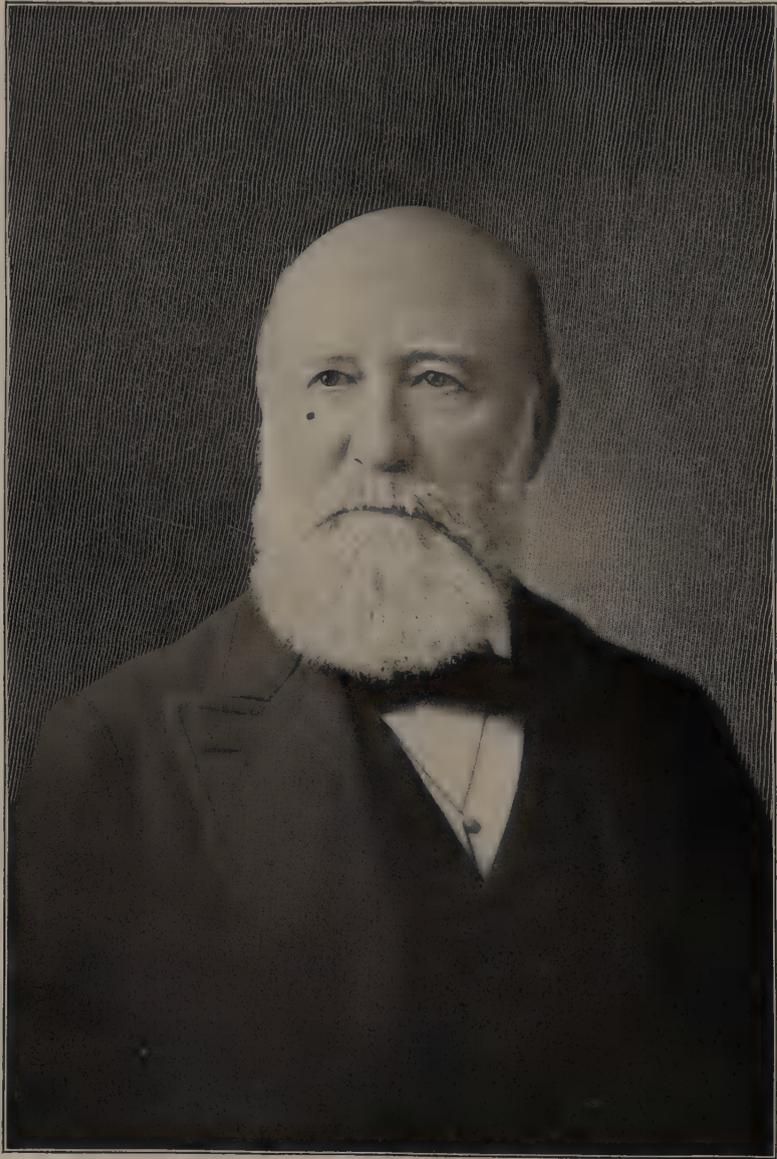

David Sullivan was reared on his father's farm, and when old enough became an assistant in the general merchandise store. When his duties admitted of the leisure he attended the early subscription school of the neighborhood, held in a building roughly constructed of logs. The benches were made of slabs, and the children used the now obsolete quill pens. In the surroundings of farm and store he remained until twenty-one years of age, and directly after the Black Hawk war, in 1834, removed with his brother to Iowa. Traveling in those days was not facilitated by Pullman cars, but was another expression for genuine hard work. The brothers loaded a keel boat with general merchandise and floated it down the Muskingum and Ohio rivers to Louisville, after which they hired a steamboat to take them to St. Louis and another boat thence conveyed them to the present site of Rock Island, Ill. They purchased the first lot in what is now Rock Island and started with their merchandise a store which was continued for about a year. They then sold out and located near Davenport, Scott county, where they bought the first land purchased after the Black Hawk war, and which consisted of three hundred and twenty acres. In time Mr. Sullivan purchased other property near by so that he owned several farms and carried on large agricultural enterprises. The land for his original farm was decidedly in the rough and was broken with five or six yoke of oxen. On this land he maintains was raised the finest corn that ever grew from seed.

During the gold excitement Mr. Sullivan started for Pike's Peak and journeyed as far as Laramie, when discouraging reports made him change his mind and retrace his steps. A couple of years later, however, he came overland with his family to the Rocky mountains, and was much disturbed by the Indians in the Big Horn mountains. For two years he mined in Montana. He then located in Santa Barbara, the journey here being accomplished overland, and taking six months from Virginia City. He immediately bought the four blocks which he now owns and which are in the city limits, besides additional property, and engaged in farming and horticulture, raising apricots, plums, peaches and grapes. For many years he had several blocks of fruit orchards which never failed in their harvests, but of late years the drought has thinned out the trees to a considerable extent. Most of this property has since been sold, with the exception of the residence property at the corner of Mission and Bath streets. Mr. Sullivan has done much for the city of his adoption, whose interests have ever been his own.

In Ohio Mr. Sullivan married Ann Crabtree, who was born in England and reared in Ohio, and whose death occurred twelve years ago. Of their children two attained maturity, viz., Samuel, who has been engaged in mining in Montana, and Angeline, who became Mrs. Sprague, and died in Santa Barbara. An older sister of Mr. Sullivan, Mona, married the son of S. S. Cox, ex-member of congress, known as Sunset Cox. Mr. Sullivan is a Republican all the time, and is a Methodist in religious belief.

ECKFORD D. TYLER. Although by birth a Canadian, Mr. Tyler has been a resident of California since youth and is a typical representative of the energetic and capable men who are contributing to the growth of our state. His father, S. Tyler, a native of England, followed the occupation of landscape gardening there and in Canada, and from 1877 to 1882 was similarly engaged in Minneapolis, where he also conducted a florist's establishment. During 1882 he settled in Santa Monica, Cal., and five years later came to Pasadena, where he purchased a small ranch on Bradford and Arroyo Drive. Since then he has carried on an occupation somewhat different from the usual pursuits of Californians, but one in which he is meeting with gratifying success. He owns a fine kennel of fox terriers and spaniels, of the best breeds the country produces, and he also has the largest aviary in the county, in both of which specialties he is prominent. By his marriage to Margaret McLarin, a native of Scotland, he had eight children, the second of whom is Eckford D., who was born near Toronto, Canada, August 27, 1872. He was five years of age when the family removed to Minneapolis and the public schools of that city furnished him with the rudiments of his education. In 1882 he accompanied the family to Santa Monica and five years later came to Pasadena, where he completed his studies in the local schools.

Taking up the carpenter's trade as an apprentice under J. J. Allen and serving with him four years, Mr. Tyler gained a thorough knowledge of the business, and after ten years as a journeyman carpenter and apprentice, in 1900 he began to take contracts for building. Since then he has built the residence of Miss Sybil Sweet, the addition to the Moore residence, and his own home on Grand avenue and Bradford street. Like his father, he is a lover of fine dogs, and now has a kennel of thoroughbred Scotch collies, in the breeding of which he is engaged, and he also devotes some attention to the breeding of thoroughbred Angora cats. Fraternally he is connected with the F. & A. M. and Woodmen of the World and in politics is a Republican. He was married in Pasadena, his wife being Miss Helen Salter, who was born on the Isle of Wight, England, and is a daughter of J. Salter, represented elsewhere in this work.

CHARLES W. SMITH. As president of the Los Angeles & Pasadena Electric Railway Company, vice-president of the Los Angeles Railway Company, and vice-president of the Pasadena & Mount Lowe Railway Company, Mr. Smith has been intimately associated with the development of the transportation facilities of this part of California, and the success of the inter-urban electrical system is due to his keen and judicious oversight, in connection with the efforts of men of like enterprise and resourcefulness. In addition to the various positions named, he is president of the Portland Cement Company.

During the colonial period a party of home-seekers came from Litchfield, England, and founded Litchfield, Conn., and it was then that the Smith family, represented by Charles W. Smith, became identified with American history.

Several of the ancestors, direct and collateral, were soldiers of the Revolution. William D. Smith was born in Litchfield, Conn., in 1805, and grew to manhood in Berkshire county, Mass., where he followed the trade of carriage-builder. Removing to Austerlitz, N. Y., he engaged in the manufacture of carriages. A later place of residence was Homer, Union county, Ohio, and there, in March of 1848, he and two of his children died of the cholera. His wife, Almira, was born in Austerlitz, N. Y., and died in Ohio. She was a daughter of Story Gott, a native of Connecticut, of English and Scotch descent, and a lieutenant in the Revolutionary war, after which he engaged in farming in Columbia county, N. Y. There were nine children in the family of William D. and Almira Smith, six of whom attained maturity and three are now living. One of the sons, William Henry Smith, was the first verbatim reporter in the legislature of Ohio, later became an editor and publisher in Cincinnati, and in 1869 originated the Associated Press of the United States, of which he acted as manager until his death, in 1897. Possessing high literary ability, he was the author of a number of works of standard merit and acknowledged authority in their special lines. Included among his productions are the St. Clair papers. At the time of his death he was engaged in the compilation of a History of the Northwest, which was almost completed; and he had also almost completed a biography of the late Ex-President Rutherford B. Hayes, which work he had taken up in accordance with a request made by President Hayes in his will.

In the town of Austerlitz, Columbia county, N. Y., Charles W. Smith was born September 5, 1831. In July, 1842, he accompanied his parents to Union county, Ohio, where he attended a subscription school held in a log building, with greased paper for windows, slabs for seats, and a puncheon floor. The common mode of writing was with quill pens, while the writing desk was a board fastened to and running along the side of the wall. However, while none of the modern equipments could be found, these same schools sent out into the world some of our greatest statesmen and our best citizens. At the age of eighteen he utilized his education in teaching, which occupation he followed during the winter months. Next he learned the trade of a harnessmaker and saddler in Woodstock, Ohio, and just about the time he completed his apprenticeship railroads were built into that section. March 1, 1855, he was appointed agent at Woodstock for the Columbus, Piqua & Indiana Railroad. About one year later he became their agent in Columbus, Ohio, and after his first year there he was invited to become general freight agent of the road, with headquarters in Columbus. Under various changes and consolidations, he held the office from 1857 until the spring of 1870. Meantime the road had been extended to Cincinnati and Pittsburg on the east and to Chicago on the west. On the opening of the Union and Central Pacific roads he accepted the position of general freight agent for the Central Pacific, with headquarters in Sacramento; but after two years, on account of failing health, he resigned the position and returned east. A later position was that of general manager of the Indianapolis, Bloomington & Western Railroad, with headquarters in Indianapolis. December 1, 1874, he resigned in order to accept a position with the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad as general freight agent, with headquarters in Chicago, and three years later was promoted to be traffic manager of the same road. Beginning May 1, 1880, for one year he held the office of traffic manager of the New York, Lake Erie & Western Railroad, with headquarters in New York City, following which he was general manager of the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad, headquarters Richmond, Va.

A further honor came to Mr. Smith in his election, January 1, 1886, as vice-president and general manager of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railroad, after which he had his headquarters in Topeka, Kans. While officiating in this position there was great activity in railroad building, and the Santa Fe lines were extended through the west. In addition to this office, in 1888 he also acted as general manager of the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad. On the completion of the Santa Fe into Chicago, the headquarters of the company were moved to that city. The management of the company's vast interests, at a period so critical in the history of the road, proved too great a strain upon his health, and it became necessary for him to seek at least temporary change of environment. Accordingly in 1890 he resigned his position; two years later the road went into the receivers' hands.

It was Mr. Smith's intention to abandon railroading permanently when he left the Santa Fe office, but in 1896 the bondholders of the Atlantic & Pacific road became dissatisfied with the receivers and he was asked to fill the position. His health being much better, he consented and took charge in December of that year. Under his systematic oversight order was brought out of chaos and affairs were brought to a satisfactory termination. When the road was sold to the Santa Fe system, in July, 1897, he came to Pasadena, again expecting to retire permanently from railroading, but again his decision was changed. Some friends in Chicago, who owned the bonds of the Pasadena & Los Angeles Electric Railway, solicited him to accept the presidency of the road. In the fall of 1897 he became connected with the road in this capacity, and also became a stockholder and director. Largely through his efforts the road was placed upon a satisfactory basis. In 1898 the company was merged into the Los Angeles & Pasadena Electric Railway Company, and of this he is still president. February 1, 1900, he was chosen general manager of the Los Angeles Railway Company, with headquarters in Los Angeles, and at once assumed the active management of the same, conducting it successfully. About the same time he installed his son, W. H., as manager of the Los Angeles & Pasadena Electric Railway Company. August 1, 1901, he resigned from the management of the Los Angeles system and was elected second vice-president, in which capacity his broad knowledge and experienced judgment are still at the service of the company. June 1, 1901, the company bought the Pasadena & Mount Lowe Railway, which became a part of the system, and he is its vice-president. In February, 1902, all of these roads except the Los Angeles Railway were merged into the Pacific Electric Railroad Company, of which his son is now manager.

In Woodstock, Ohio, Mr. Smith married Miss Marcelline M. Sprague, who was born in Woodstock, Vt., of a very old New England family. They became the parents of three children: Mrs. Kate Kelsey, who died in Richmond, Va.; Ella, who died at five years; and William H., manager of the Pacific Electric Railroad Company.

The Pasadena Board of Trade and Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce number Mr. Smith among their members. During his residence in Ohio he was a member of the grand lodge, I. O. O. F. During the days of the Civil war he was a member of the Union League and a firm believer in abolition principles. In politics he is a staunch Republican. While living in Chicago he became connected with St. Paul's Universalist Church, in which his membership remains to the present. The success which he has attained is notable. When only fifteen years of age he was compelled to begin life's battles for himself, working on a farm for a shilling a day. From that discouraging start he rose to a position of such prominence in railroad circles that his talents were recognized by the leading railroad men of the country. His close connection with various roads resulted in their upbuilding and development. While to a certain extent his start in the railroad business was accidental, yet by a happy coincidence he had found the line of work for which he was best adapted and in which his talents might have ample opportunity for expansion. His achievements in the east merit recognition, but were his sole record that which he has made in connection with the street railroad system of the twin cities of Los Angeles and Pasadena, he would still be entitled to recognition as one of the most successful railroad men of the country.

JOHN J. HEWITT. In presenting to the readers of this volume the life-record of Mr. Hewitt, we are perpetuating the history of one of the most influential men of Riverside. While his name is intimately associated with other localities, yet the fact that the last, and perhaps the most fruitful years, of his life were spent in California, renders his biography especially interesting to the people of this state. To a certain extent, his removal to Riverside was the result of chance. Owing to impaired health resulting from overwork in many lines of activities, a change of climate was made desirable, and traveling through the west, along the coast, he arrived in Riverside in 1882. At once he was fascinated by this city. Without further delay he purchased property and established his family in the home which they still occupy.

From the first, Mr. Hewitt was identified with the business interests of Riverside and a contributor, in many ways, to its material development. When the First National Bank was organized he became a director and continued in that capacity until he was elected to succeed Mr. Naftzger as president of the institution. As a financier, he proved himself abundantly able to cope with the many questions constantly brought to him for decision. To his efforts, in no small degree, is due the high standing which the bank enjoys to-day as a financial institution. Nor did his connection with this bank represent the limit of his activities. After the organization of the Riverside Savings Bank, he was foremost in the work of placing it upon a firm basis and his connection with it created a confidence among the people in its safety. In addition to his work with these two banks, he acted as president of the Keeley Institute, which manages all of the branches on the coast.

When but a mere lad, the education John J. Hewitt hoped to obtain was rendered impossible owing to his ill health. In the fall of 1848 he went to Chicago, where he was employed as a clerk in the National Hotel. In the summer of 1849 he settled in Ogle county and, with the money saved while in the hotel, he bought a half interest in an ox-team and began to break prairie. Before the close of the first season he had bought the claim of his partner and had also become the owner of another team. The same fall he sold both teams and went to Kentucky, where he bought tobacco, shipping it by river to Pittsburg, where he sold the entire shipment at a good profit. After six months spent in this business he returned to Franklin county, Pa., but soon began to teach school in Washington county, Md. At the close of one term of school he embarked in the mercantile business, in which he met with fair success. In the fall of 1854 he joined his father at Foreston, Ill. The next year his brother, Theodore, commenced the erection of the Central Hotel, but died before it was completed. In 1858 Mr. Hewitt began the erection of a second hotel structure. In February, 1868, he opened the Bank of Foreston, which he conducted until 1872, when he sold his interest. In June, 1880, he established the Farmers and Traders Bank at Foreston, of which he was chosen president.

Owing to impaired health, in the fall of 1881 Mr. Hewitt came to California, hoping to be benefited by the climate. His subsequent history was, in many respects, the history of Riverside. With its progress, his own financial advancement was promoted. With its growth, there was a simultaneous development of his personal interests. Meantime, he won the friendship of the people of Riverside. His acquaintances were his friends. When he died, September 12, 1900, his associates in business lamented his loss as if he had been their father or brother. Throughout all of his active life he showed the guiding star of Christianity. He was a member of the Calvary Presbyterian Church in Riverside and also an active worker in, and contributor to the Y. M. C. A.

January 15, 1857, Mr. Hewitt married Miss Susan M. Emrick, who was born in Franklin county, Pa., April 20, 1830, and died in 1864. They were the parents of four children: Emrick B., who died at about twenty-one years of age; Grace; Theodore D.; and Philo, who died at eight months. His second marriage was solemnized December 3, 1872, and united him with Miss Martha E. Hutchison, by which union were born two daughters, Beulah W., wife of Dr. W. W. Roblee, of Riverside, and Ethel M., at home.

LUTHER HARVEY TITUS. To its noble, self-sacrificing pioneers, no less than to its enterprising business men of later days, Southern California owes its remarkable progress. To their zeal and energy will posterity be indebted, and among the names worthy of perpetuation in the future is that of L. H. Titus, a pioneer of 1849. From 1869 until his death thirty-one years later he made his home in Los Angeles county, where he accumulated valuable properties and gained prominence by reason of his striking individuality and excellent business judgment. At Hamburg, Erie county, N. Y., Mr. Titus was born October 9, 1822. His father, a native of New York, was of English and Holland-Dutch descent, while his mother, whose maiden name was Cary, traced her ancestry to the Puritans, and her father was a Revolutionary hero.

Starting out in the world to seek his livelihood, in 1840 L. H. Titus went to Rockford, Ill., and from there to Galena, where he worked in the lead mines for four years. His next venture was the purchase of a farm, for which he paid out of his earnings in the mines. In 1845 he returned to Hamburg. Four years later he started on a memorable journey for the Pacific coast, via New York to Galveston, thence through Houston and Austin to El Paso, and along the southern route to the coast. As he was crossing the Rio Grande at the old copper mines he met David S. Terry, en route to California. Proceeding together and with various others, they arrived at the Gila river, where the hostility of the Indians caused all but three of the party to turn back. These three, consisting of Titus, Tupper and Salisbury, resolved to push on through the country inhabited by the ferocious Apaches, the most bloodthirsty of all Indian tribes. With a courage that knew no such word as "fail" they passed through the very heart of the savages' haunts. Ceaseless watchfulness alone saved them from horrible deaths. Again and again their cunning threw the Indians off their trail, and at last they reached the country of the friendly Pimos, from whom they purchased supplies for the remainder of the journey. Before reaching the Colorado river they overtook a party of twenty-eight Americans, with Dr. James B. Winston at their head. In company with this party they crossed the Colorado at Fort Yuma, using a government wagon box as a substitute for a ferry boat. A few days later Mr. Titus met with a severe accident through the blowing up of a powder flask, which, indeed, was but one of many catastrophes he met with on the way. Finally, however, August 13, 1849, the party arrived at San Diego.

By the steamer Oregon from San Diego, Mr. Titus arrived in San Francisco September 13. Thence he went to Stockton and Moquelumne Hill, and later to Calaveras, where he and Mr. Salisbury met with considerable success. When their claim had been worked out, Mr. Titus returned to San Francisco and from there to the redwoods north of the city, where he engaged in the manufacture of shingles. While there he caught a number of salmon, which he sold for $5 each, also killed ten deer in two days, selling them for $18 each. In February of 1850 he went to the Feather river, where he engaged in an unsuccessful attempt, with others, to turn Deer creek. Thence he went up the Sacramento valley and prospected above Shasta, later returned to Marysville, where he was very low with fever for some time. As soon as he had recovered sufficiently to permit of travel he went to San Francisco, where he took a sailing vessel for Panama, and finally arrived at home in 1851. During the ensuing years he continued in the east, where his business ventures were successful.

Returning to California in 1860, Mr. Titus was so pleased with Los Angeles that he decided to locate here permanently, so went back home, and the next year, with his daughter and her husband, Capt. J. C. Newton, he once again crossed the continent to the coast. Soon after his arrival he bought a ranch near San Gabriel Mission, where he engaged extensively in the raising of oranges. At the same time he was interested in the breeding of fine horses. In 1870 he brought from the east the stallion "Echo," one of the finest horses that up to the time had been secured for the coast. The raising of grapes was another industry in which he engaged. Inventive ability was one of his noticeable characteristics, and was utilized in the devising of a ladder on wheels for picking fruit, also a three-notch board for planting trees, both of which patents are in general use in Southern California. Another ingenious device permitted of the cutting and picking of fruit with the same hand. He constructed a machine for moulding cement canals to economize the use of water, by which means a given quantity of water would irrigate three or four times as much land as when run in ditches in the soil. He was the first in Los Angeles county to use a portable apparatus for spraying fruit trees troubled with pests.

In 1845 Mr. Titus married Maria Benedict, who died leaving two daughters, Mary H., wife of Capt. J. C. Newton; and Clara R., who became a sister of the order of the Immaculate Heart of Mary. The older daughter was married to Captain Newton in 1866 and became the mother of two daughters, Clara Drysdale and Mary Titus Newton. At Saratoga Springs, N. Y., October 1, 1891, Mr. Titus was united in marriage with Miss Ella Crary, daughter of John and Ella (McKenna) Crary, natives respectively of Saratoga Springs and New York City. Her mother was educated in New York City and while visiting in Saratoga Springs met Mr. Crary for the first time. By their union three children were born, Mrs. Titus being the second. Mrs. Crary died at Saratoga Springs, April 23, 1888, and Mr. Crary, after many years as a merchant, is still living in that city, but now retired from active cares. Excellent educational advantages were given Mrs. Titus in her girlhood, culminating in a course of study at the Fort Edward Institute in New York. After graduating she returned home, where she remained until her marriage to Mr. Titus. Her bridal tour was the trip across the continent to her new home, Horseshoe ranch, on San Pasquel avenue, East Pasadena, a tract of fifty acres comprising one of the most valuable estates in the vicinity. The only child of her marriage to Mr. Titus was a son, his father's namesake, and who died December 24, 1895, at the age of three years. The death of Mr. Titus occurred April 29, 1900, on the home ranch, and thus passed away one of the honored pioneers of Los Angeles county, one who as a friend, neighbor and citizen, had been faithful to every duty in life, and whose sterling integrity of character won the friendship of every acquaintance. Since his death the management of his properties has fallen to the care of Mrs. Titus, and her unusual business ability is called into constant exercise in their supervision. Besides the homestead, she has a section of unimproved land in Riverside; a section five miles from Templeton, the larger part of which is in wheat; six acres on Garfield avenue at San Gabriel Mission, which is under cultivation to barley; six acres on Rose avenue, Lamanda Park, which is planted to olives; and two lots on Agricultural street, Los Angeles. Her recognized ability in business affairs, coupled with her culture, has won for her a high position among the refined and successful citizens of Pasadena.

J. M. Stewart.

JOHN MARCELLUS STEWART. It is given to few in a corresponding sum of years to pass through the varied phases of life experienced by John Marcellus Stewart, the key note of which is best expressed in a paper read by this honored early settler before the pioneers in September of 1901. In vivid and graphic fashion are set forth his impressions of the days when men's minds reeled with visions of limitless wealth on the coast, and when the vast western plains were intersected with slow moving forms borne past all deprivation and suffering by the internal fire of their golden dreams. So faithfully and candidly are his experiences recounted that the pages were filed away in the archives of the society, and pronounced a masterful exposition of happenings possible at but one period of the world, and in but one country.

A native of Warner, Merrimack county, N. H., Mr. Stewart was born April 13, 1828, and comes of Scotch-Irish ancestors, who were devoted members of the Baptist Church. His father, John Stewart, was born in Massachusetts, as was also his grandfather, another John, and whose brother was killed at the battle of Stillwater, during the Revolutionary war. The grandfather eventually moved with his family to New Hampshire, where he was a pioneer farmer, and where he died. The younger John during the rest of his life, lived on the homestead which he tilled and improved and which had been the special pride of his father before him. He married Hannah Dalton, also a native of Warner, and a daughter of Isaac Dalton, born in Massachusetts and an early settler of New Hampshire. To this couple were born six children, two of whom are living, John Marcellus being the youngest. Another son, Leonard, was a soldier in the Civil war, and lost his life as a member of a New Hampshire regiment.

The education of Mr. Stewart was acquired in the public schools of Merrimack county, N. H., and at Sanbornton Academy. At the age of eighteen he had qualified for a teacher, and engaged in educational work for about a year. In 1848, when twenty years old, he located in Columbus, Columbia county, Wis., and after buying land on the prairies engaged in teaching school. He, also, heard the tales of gold narrated by returned travelers from the west, and in 1850 set out with four companions, and with horse teams and wagons crossed the Mississippi river at Dubuque, Iowa, and the Missouri at Council Bluffs. The little band here laid in a supply of horses and provisions, and proceeded by way of the Platte and the Southern Pass to Salt Lake and Humboldt, and arrived at Placerville, July 14, 1850. The danger infested journey consumed eighty-three days, and of the nine horses with which they started from Council Bluffs, and the one purchased on the way, four only succeeded in reaching California. For two years Mr. Stewart engaged in mining on the American river with fair success, and in 1852 returned to the states by way of Panama and New York, finally reaching Wisconsin, where he engaged in the milling business for six years. To facilitate his ambitious schemes he built a saw and grist mill on the Crawfish river, where was heard the hum of industry which indicated a deserved success. But as most returned who had once felt the charm and possibility of California, the miller of Wisconsin felt again the old desire, and in 1858 brought his family hither by way of Panama to San Francisco, and settled in Sacramento county. For a time he juggled with the uncertainties of mining, and then settled down to the slower but more sure returns of mercantile business, as found in the sewing machine trade of Sacramento. As time went on he had no occasion to regret this departure until the big flood left six feet of water on Jay street, when it behooved him to settle elsewhere. He therefore established a business in San Francisco, and in 1864 returned east with his family by way of Panama, and visited Wisconsin and New Hampshire until the following year. By the Nicaragua route he then returned to San Francisco and engaged in lumber manufacturing for several years.

In 1871 Mr. Stewart became identified with Southern California, and bought seventeen acres of land in Los Angeles east of what is now Grand avenue and south of Thirtieth street, where he built a cottage about a hundred feet from his present residence. This property was set out in vineyards, and under the present management was converted into a nursery which was maintained for about ten years. In the mean time the land had been sold off so that there were but ten acres remaining, and this

Mr. Stewart laid out into the Stewart nursery tract, most of which has since been disposed of. He has built some residences on his property, and has an unusually fine addition.

In Columbus, Wis., Mr. Stewart married Melissa A. Fisher, a native of New York state, and of this union there have been two children: Nettie, who is now Mrs. Barron, of San Francisco, and Grace, who is married to C. H. Hall and is living at home. Mr. Stewart is a Republican in political affiliation, and is a member of the Society of Los Angeles Pioneers. He is associated with the Immanuel Presbyterian Church, and is an ex-member of the board of trustees. Of recent years he has not discontinued his travels, for in January of 1888 he went east via the Central and Union Pacific Railroads and returned the following December to California by the Canadian Pacific Railroad. In 1890 he took a pleasure trip to Alaska, and it may thus be said that he has a most intimate knowledge of the country of which he is a typical citizen.

CLARK GILBERT WILKINSON. After some years of identification with various business interests in California, in 1901 Mr. Wilkinson turned his entire attention to the strawberry business, having previously started the raising of the plants. The five acres that he has planted in strawberries are in a thriving condition and give every indication of gratifying fruitage, in return for the care and labor expended upon them. To assist in the cultivation of the land, he has his own pumping plant, and is thus enabled to irrigate the ranch as needed. The property is located at Tropic, within easy reach of Los Angeles, where the berries are marketed.

The parents of Mr. Wilkinson are Samuel and Sarah (Smith) Wilkinson, natives of Pennsylvania, and pioneers of Tropic, Cal., having settled here in 1885. For some years the father carried on horticultural and farming pursuits, but he is now living in retirement at his pleasant country home. Of the twelve children comprising the family six are living, Clark Gilbert being the youngest of the number. He was born at Elburn, Kane county, Ill., March 18, 1872, and grew to manhood upon a farm. In 1889, four years after coming with his parents to Tropic, he became an employe of the Los Angeles & Glendale Narrow Gauge Railroad, and within six months had worked his way up from news agent to conductor. After one year in the latter capacity he left the railroad and began farming and teaming, but later opened the first plumbing establishment in Tropic. While still a boy he had learned how to operate gasoline engines by working the pumping plant on the home farm, and in this way he gained a thorough knowledge of engineering.

In 1898 he became chief engineer of the Tropic Water Company, of which he was an organizer and stockholder. After superintending the putting in of the plant, he continued as engineer for three years, and under his capable management the plant was greatly enlarged and improved. He is regarded as an expert in all matters concerning gasoline engines and is frequently called upon to set them up or repair them when out of working order. His interests extend to the oil business, and he acts as agent for the Franklin Refining Company of Los Angeles, which handles distillate and lubricating oil.

The marriage of Mr. Wilkinson and Miss Orlie F. Saunders, who was born in Kansas, occurred in Los Angeles, and they have since made their home at Tropic. Their family consists of two sons, Miles and Irving. Though not active in politics, Mr. Wilkinson is a staunch Republican. Fraternally he is connected with the Odd Fellows at Glendale, the Maccabees in Los Angeles, and the Independent Order of Foresters at Glendale, being an officer in the lodge last named.

R. H. WILSON. This well-known citizen of Monrovia arrived in California with his parents when a lad of about fifteen years. At once the qualities of energy and determination which he possessed asserted themselves. With an acre of land, given him by his father, he began for himself, planting the tract in nursery stock. From that small nucleus has grown the Pioneer Nursery, which is one of the largest and most successful in Southern California. A close study of the soil during the past twenty-five years has given him a thorough knowledge of the same, together with a complete understanding of the varieties of plant life best adapted to certain soils; and this latter fact causes him to be often consulted by amateur horticulturists desirous of securing a correct start in the business. His trade is large and extends all over the state, and the filling of the many orders received makes him one of Monrovia's busiest men.

At New Providence, N. J., Mr. Wilson was born March 15, 1859, a son of Joseph and Elizabeth B. (Sayre) Wilson, the former a native of Manchester, England, the latter of New Providence. The paternal grandfather, Henry Wilson, brought his family from England to the United States and settled in New York, afterward removing to New Jersey. The maternal grandfather, David Sayre, who spent his entire life on a New Jersey farm, was the son of a Frenchman residing in America from youth. Growing to manhood in the east, Joseph Wilson for some years carried on a saw manufacturing business at Newark, N. J., but, hoping to better his condition in the west, he settled in California in 1873. For thirteen years he was employed in Los Angeles, and in 1876 bought thirty acres, which he planted in navel and valencia oranges, deciduous fruits and English walnuts. The ranch is one of the most thrifty in Duarte and its prosperous appearance reflects credit upon the enterprising owner, who, at the age of seventy-two, is still giving personal attention to its management.

When a child R. H. Wilson accompanied his parents from New Providence to Newark, N. J., where he attended the common schools until thirteen years of age. Since coming to California he has given his attention to business matters, but has compensated for his limited schooling by self-culture and habits of close observation. His first wife was Miss Alice Philbrook, who was born in Bloomington, Ill., and died in Duarte, Cal. His present wife was formerly Miss Florence A. Campbell, of Illinois. They have two sons and two daughters, namely: Alice, Nellie Elizabeth, Chester Ellsworth and Charles Roswell. The family attend the Presbyterian Church, to the work of which Mr. Wilson is a contributor. In fraternal organizations he is connected with the Foresters, Royal Arcanum and Ancient Order of United Workmen. In addition to the management of his nursery business and the supervision of his ranch of thirty-three acres where nursery stock is grown, he has various business interests, including the ownership of one-third interest in the Citrus nurseries at Duarte and a one-fifth interest in the California Rose Company of Los Angeles.

JOSHUA WOOD. The genealogy of the Wood family is traced back to the founding of Jamestown, Virginia's first colony. His great-grandfather was a Revolutionary soldier from Virginia. The paternal grandfather, Thomas, was equally patriotic and offered his services to the country during the war of 1812, but ere he had been sent to the front peace was declared. Becoming a pioneer of Ohio, he cleared and improved a raw tract in Columbiana county, and later took up new land in Lexington township, Stark county, where he improved a farm and remained until death. His son, Robert, though born in old Virginia, spent his life principally in Ohio, where he cleared eighty acres of wild forest land, built a log cabin, placed the land under cultivation, and in time became a prosperous farmer. For years he served as township trustee, being elected to the office on the Republican ticket. He married Abigail Gaskill, who was born in Columbiana county and died at Alliance, Ohio. The family of which she was a member affiliated with the Society of Friends. Her father, Nathan Gaskill, a native of England, accompanied his parents to America and settled among the pioneers of the southern part of the state, later going to Columbiana county. In the family of Robert and Abigail Wood there were twelve children, all but three of whom attained maturity and five are living. One son, E. J., now of Anamosa, Iowa, and another, J. D., of Alliance, Ohio, were soldiers in the One Hundred and Fifteenth Ohio Infantry during the Civil war.

The eldest of the family and the only one in California is Joshua Wood, of Pasadena. He was born in Alliance, Ohio, December 3, 1829, and grew to manhood on a frontier farm in Lexington township. Among his earliest recollections are those of seeing bear, panthers, wolves and deer. In the early days children had little opportunity to attend school, for every hand was needed in the arduous task of cutting timber, grubbing, clearing, cultivating and improving. The years of his youth had few recreations or pleasures, but he grew up, strong, resolute and clean-souled. Through self-culture, rather than any extensive attendance upon the subscription schools, he acquired a fair education, and at the age of twenty-one began to teach in the home district, where he remained for ten successive years, afterward teaching one year in Indiana. His success in educational work led to his selection as chairman of the township board of education, which position he filled for fourteen years. In the meantime he had bought and improved a farm of one hundred acres, and on selling this he bought one hundred and fifty-seven acres two miles from Alliance. For six years he was a member of the board of county commissioners, and for three years served as its chairman.

When the first call came for volunteers in 1861 Mr. Wood offered himself for service in the Nineteenth Ohio Infantry, but was rejected on account of a stiff ankle. The surgeon, who noticed that his rejection was a keen disappointment to the enthusiastic youth, tendered him a position as aid in the provost-marshal's office, and he was delighted to see that much of active campaign work. While he was filling the position, as he stood one day on guard at the door, he lowered his bayonet to permit the entrance of a mere boy, who had just volunteered and desired an examination. It was this boy who afterward served so nobly in his country's cause and who, in later years, as President of the United States, brought the nation to a degree of prosperity never before experienced. The acquaintance formed in this unique way between the guard and the recruit was continued in later years, and Mr. Wood took pleasure in serving as foreman of the first grand jury after Mr. McKinley had been elected prosecuting attorney; also had the pleasure of attending the congressional convention where he was nominated for congress. Among his most prized keepsakes are a number of letters received at different times from Mr. McKinley. Among his friends he also numbered James A. Garfield, with whom he was well acquainted.

In 1889 Mr. Wood came to Pasadena, Cal. Two years later he was made foreman of the Pasadena road district, which position he has since filled. In his district there are eighty-seven bridges, and eighty-two and one-half miles of road. In point of years of service, he is the oldest road foreman of any district in Los Angeles county. The satisfactory condition of his roads speaks volumes for his efficient labors in the office. Meantime he has also engaged in horticulture and has improved his place with deciduous fruits. While living in Ohio he married Miss Maria Carter, who was born in Portage county, that state. They have five children. The eldest, Lorinda, is the wife of G. A. Winner, who came from Alliance, Ohio, to Pasadena, Cal., in 1887, and is now superintendent of Station A, Pasadena postoffice, besides carrying on mercantile pursuits. The other members of the family are: Belle, at home; Edwin Garfield, who is tax adjuster with the Southern Pacific in Los Angeles; Mrs. Ona Spaulding, of Los Angeles; and Burdette, at home.

For twenty-four years, during his residence in Ohio, Mr. Wood was superintendent of the Methodist Episcopal Sunday-school, and for four years he also had charge of another school. He is now a member of the board of trustees of the church in Pasadena and at one time served as president of the same. From his earliest voting days he has been an enthusiastic Republican, and no one is stancher than he in his support of the party. In Ohio he rendered service on the county central committee. In this state, during the candidacy of William McKinley, he did considerable stump work, and was especially careful to brand as falsehood a number of statements that had been made against the Republican nominee. Both from the standpoint of personal friendship and party policy, he was unceasing in his efforts to enlist the public favor in behalf of his friend, whose subsequent successful administration proved that he did not err in his estimate of his presidential qualities.

GEORGE B. WOODBURY, the secretary of the Verdugo Canon Water Company, at Verdugo, Los Angeles county, is of English descent and a son of George L. and Anna (Rich) Woodbury, natives respectively of Massachusetts and Dixmont, Me. His father, who was reared and educated at Salem, became an undertaker by occupation. While a young man he joined a party of fortune-seekers for the Pacific coast, but did not long remain in California. He was married in Massachusetts and later removed to New Orleans, La., where he was employed as bookkeeper in an office. In 1860 his son was born in Monticello, Minn., while the family were visiting there in order to escape the heat of a southern summer. Soon afterward, during the Sioux Indian outbreak, Mrs. Woodbury had a narrow escape from drowning, while attempting to seek safety from the red men. A few months later she was bereaved by the death of her husband, who was then thirty-nine years of age. She was thus left alone in New Orleans, with limited means, and surrounded on every hand by the evidences of hostility which the near approach of the war was developing. Being in sympathy with the north and desirous of joining her relatives in New England, she made hurried preparations to leave the south, and secured passage on the last boat that started from New Orleans before the war began. In her haste she was obliged to leave property and household possessions, and on her arrival in Boston had only $20 in her possession. For many years she remained in that city, but finally died in Maine, when sixty-one years of age.

The public schools of Boston, supplemented by attendance at the Maine Central Institute, in Pittsfield, Me., furnished Mr. Woodbury with an excellent education, which he utilized by teaching three terms of district school during winters. In November, 1884, he crossed the continent and established his home in California, where he has since been a devoted adherent to the state's progress and a firm believer in the constant growth and progress of his particular locality. Buying twenty acres at Glendale, he found himself in a sparsely settled community, where few attempts at improvement had been made. With the subsequent development of the locality he has been closely associated and still owns the ranch that was his first purchase in the state. However, the land is rented, with the exception of his homestead of two acres, which is planted in fruit and vegetables for family consumption. His attention is mainly given to his labors as secretary of the Verdugo Canon Water Company, which office he has filled since 1901, having previously since 1886 been connected with the company as zanjero. He and his wife (who was formerly Miss Alice Wright, of Pennsylvania) have a daughter, Anna A. In his political views he is independent, not binding himself to any party, although maintaining an active interest in all matters pertaining to the local and general welfare.

JUDSON HORATIO WOODWORTH, one of the early settlers of Pasadena, was born in the township of Wayne, Ashtabula county, Ohio, October 31, 1847. The Woodworth family, from which he descended, came originally from England and settled in New England. Ezra Woodworth, his great-grandfather, came from Vermont in 1804, and settled with his family, consisting of a wife and nine children, in Ashtabula county. This family was among the earliest settlers of that region. They found there an unbroken forest, inhabited by Indians and abounding in bears, deer and wolves.

Ezra Woodworth and his five sons bought large tracts of land from the government, and clearing the forests from them, made farms which are known today as among the very best estate in the old Connecticut Western Reserve. Horatio Woodworth, a grandson of Ezra and father of J. H. Woodworth, lived upon one of these farms, and reared his family of six children, of which J. H. is the eldest. The latter, after attaining his majority, remained with his father, engaging in farming, general produce shipping and manufacturing. In the year 1886 he came to Pasadena. Since living in Pasadena he has been identified with the real estate, loan and insurance business, in which he has maintained, either alone or in partnership with others, one of the leading real estate offices of the city. At present he and his son, Wallace S. Woodworth, are conducting an office at No. 11 South Raymond avenue.

Mr. Woodworth has been for several years president of the Pasadena Orange Growers' Association, and by his energy and perseverance has been a leading factor in bringing that organization to its present prosperous condition. He is also vice-president and a director in the Semi-Tropic Fruit Exchange, and a member of the Pasadena Board of Trade.

PETER FLEMING. Of the many men who have contributed to Pomona's progress none is more worthy of mention than the late Peter Fleming. In many respects he was a remarkable man. His sagacity and foresight have seldom been surpassed. From the time of his settlement in the eastern part of Los Angeles county in 1875 until his death, which occurred February 2, 1898, at the age of forty-six years, he was closely associated with the development of local water systems and did much to solve the difficult problem of satisfactory irrigation.

During his boyhood Mr. Fleming lived at Troy, Vt. (his birthplace), and in Massachusetts, where he was a close friend of Charles Allen, son of Enoch Allen. Later he was employed as a clerk by Allen & Endicott, of New York City, and while there married Margaret Coleman, who was born in that city and is now living in Pomona. Ill health forced him to relinquish his position in New York and seek a more genial climate, and he decided to come to California. His friends bade him farewell as he started on the long voyage by the isthmus, but they did so, believing it to be a last goodbye, for no one dared hope that he would reach his destination alive. However, he not only stood the trip well, but after he had settled at Spadra, he at once began to recuperate and soon felt himself to be a well man once more. Delighted by these hopes, he sent for his family and made purchases of land with a view to permanent residence here.

In the selection of an occupation Mr. Fleming showed his usual sagacity. He was one of the first to establish an apiary in California, and so successful was he in this experiment that at one time he owned twelve hundred stands and annually shipped fifteen car-loads of honey to the east. The excellent price received for the product made the enterprise a remunerative one, and he continued successfully engaged as an apiarist until the country began to be thickly settled. As a result of the scientific study he had made of bee culture, he not only gained financial profits, but became known as one of the best informed apiarists in the state.

While this region still had few settlers, Mr. Fleming conceived the idea that if water could be developed to supply the land, it would command a much higher price and would attract a high class of permanent residents. In 1885 he began to develop a water system, having as an associate in the enterprise C. N. Earl, who was succeeded by J. W. Saller and he in turn by George Rhorer. The last named, with Mr. Fleming, organized the Sycamore Water Developing Company, which furnishes the domestic supply for Claremont, and also supplies the larger part of Ontario and all of Packard ranch. Selling his interest in this company in 1892, the following year Mr. Fleming was interested in organizing the Claremont Water Company, which developed into the Pomona Water Company. On the organization of the Consolidated Water Company of Pomona, August 1, 1896, it succeeded the Pomona city water works and the Citizens' Water Company, purchasing their pipes and utilizing them in the construction of their present extensive system. They now have fifty-six miles of pipe lines in the city of Pomona, and the North Pomona branch of four miles of pipes. The tunnel from which the water is obtained is five miles northeast of the business center of Pomona, above Claremont. It is five thousand feet long and at its upper extremity one hundred and ten feet below the surface of the ground. From the mouth of the tunnel the water is conducted in large cement pipes to within one and one-half miles of Pomona, where it enters a large reservoir, holding eight hundred thousand gallons. From it the water flows into a sixteen-inch iron pipe which feeds four distributing mains, and these in turn deliver the water into small laterals under an average pressure of fifty pounds. Not only is the supply large at present, but it seems capable of very great increase by extension of the tunnel farther into the water-bearing channel. In addition the company owns the Smith wells and thirty-five acres of water-bearing land on the Sorby place. The water not consumed by Pomona and North Pomona is used for irrigating lands about Claremont and the Seth Richards orange orchard. From the organization of the company until his death Mr. Fleming was its largest stockholder and manager, and it was due to his sagacity that the project of tunneling was adopted.

The first ten-acre tract of oranges at Ontario was set out by Fleming, who succeeded by good cultivation in showing the people the possibilities of citrus-fruit culture, and thus proved himself a most helpful citizen. At Lordsburg he was a pioneer in setting out lemons, which he proved it was possible to raise profitably. Indeed, everything that he attempted seemed to prosper. Disappointments of course he had, for they come to all, but failure was a word that did not appear in his dictionary. His shrewd, keen, capable foresight made him one of the most influential men of his locality, and the heritage that he left to his family is one of which they may well be proud. He was the father of six children, namely: Edward J., who is represented in this volume; Mary A., at home; William T. and Frederick A., who are cigar manufacturers in Pomona; Frank X., a drug clerk; and Walter P., who is a student in local schools.

J. C. BREWSTER. Photography as a combination of art and science, carried to that high state of perfection possible only to those who have an innate appreciation of chairo-scuro, attitude, varied emotions, and the multitudinous details which enter into and make a satisfying photographic reproduction, finds repeated expression in the work of J. C. Brewster, a resident of Ventura, and one of the pioneer and most gifted artists of Southern California. Added to a natural aptitude for his chosen occupation is the gift of application, and the desire to be foremost in all advances along the line of his work, many important discoveries having been made by himself. He has in addition to an extensive paraphernalia in ordinary use, a large camera with which he takes life-size head pictures, and he has also at his command all possible devices for securing the required finish and effects. An extensive and ever increasing trade is a reward for years of practical research.

Back to the voyageurs of the Mayflower Mr. Brewster traces his descent, and he is eighth in line from Elder William Brewster, who sailed from the shores of England in the most renowned craft in American history. Following him in direct succession were Love; Wrestling; Jonathan, who settled in Windham, Conn., in 1729; Peleg, who was born in 1717, and whose oldest son John, born in Canterbury in 1739, made the sixth generation. Next to the great-grandfather, Peleg, came Jedediah, the grandfather, who married Prudence Robinson, May 19, 1773, the following children being born of the union: Elizabeth, Silas, Anson, Florina, Sarah, Calvin and Jedediah, Jr. Elizabeth, Sarah and Jedediah died in childhood, and the mother, Prudence, died in January, 1789. The following autumn Jedediah, Sr., married Asenath Hapgood, and a few years later removed to Berne, Albany county, N. Y. He was a soldier during the Revolutionary war. Calvin Brewster, the father of J. C., was born in Canterbury, Windham county, Conn., in 1787, and in 1810 became one of the first settlers in Wayne county, Ohio. He served with distinction in the war of 1812. In 1850 he removed to Keosauqua, Van Buren county, Iowa, and engaged in the hotel business. In 1862 he came with his son to California, and was for a time in the hotel business in Sacramento, his death occurring in Petaluma, Cal., at the age of eighty-four years. He married Harriet Cramer in 1837, Mrs. Brewster being a native of Strausburg, Lancaster county, Pa., and of Dutch descent. She was the mother of seven children, five of whom are living, and all in California. Mrs. Brewster died in Ventura in 1877.

Until nine years of age J. C. Brewster lived in Wayne county, Ohio, where he was born December 31, 1841. In 1852 he accompanied the family to Iowa, where he studied in the public schools of Keosauqua, and eventually was graduated from the Benton's Port Academy. Before he was of age he taught two terms of school, and with the money thus acquired took his first lessons in photography in 1860, paying $80 for his six weeks' instruction. He then started in business on a small scale at Leroy, and in May of 1862 started for California in an ox train, arriving in Sacramento October 31, 1862. For a time he taught school in Sacramento, and then engaged with Wymer & Jacobs, large brick manufacturers in Virginia City, Nev., keeping their books at night, and doing other work during the day, for which combination he received double pay. He then bought a half interest in a photographic outfit in Vallejo, but after a few months sold out to his partner, and returned to Sacramento. For a time he had charge of a gallery on Jay street, and in 1864 returned to Virginia City, and assumed charge of the Vance gallery, R. H. Vance, of New York, being the pioneer photographer on the coast. He was later transferred to the Vance gallery at Carson City, and had charge of it until the spring of 1865, when he drove a Concord wagon and four mustang ponies to Ruby City, Idaho, and there opened a studio for Sutterly Brothers. His salary was $50 a week, and his board, independent of room, $16 a week. In the employ of the same firm he opened a studio in Salt Lake City in 1865, where Mr. Sutterly built a gallery, and while it was under construction Mr. Brewster ran a tent studio at Camp Douglas, three miles distant. In the spring of 1866 they started what proved to be a fine business in the new gallery, their receipts amounting at times to $200 a day. Mr. Brewster then branched out for himself and opened a gallery in Helena, Mont., returning to Salt Lake City in the fall of 1868, where he also ran a gallery with great success. In 1869 he went to White Pine, Nev., and in 1870 to Virginia City, and opened a fine studio on C street. In 1871 he removed to San Francisco, where he worked for William Shew on Kearney street, but from this establishment he was discharged because he refused to work on Sunday. He was then with Bradley & Rulofson, as retoucher, and in 1872 went to San Luis Obispo, where he opened a large studio, removing in April, 1874, to Ventura. Here he opened a studio near the old mission, and in 1875 built a gallery between Oak and California streets, which building he removed to the present site on Oak street, making thereto extensive additions in 1877. As heretofore stated, his gallery is equipped with every known device for the successful conduct of the best possible work. In his studio are beautiful pictures of all the old missions, and he has a large collection of Indian relics, brought from the Island of San Nicholas, which he visited, and which is eighty miles out in the ocean. He has built a fine residence on Santa Clara street, which is beautifully located in the midst of flowers and shrubs. He has filled many positions of honor in the community, has served as a school trustee, as treasurer of the Young Men's Christian Association, and has been an honorary member of the Women's Christian Temperance Union. He is a strong advocate of temperance, an elder in the Presbyterian Church for many years, Sunday-school superintendent for as many years, and a leader in the choir. He is a member of the Board of Trade, and a strong Republican.

In 1875 Mr. Brewster married Mrs. Mary Sinclair, née Mary Oberia Hadley, and widow of J. S. Sinclair. Of this union there have been two children, Calvin D., who died when two years old, and Pansy Augusta, who was born in Ventura, August 15, 1880.

MARIE ANTOINETTE NEY. Among the California artists who are helping to perpetuate the historical and picturesque old missions, none is more faithful and consistent in delineation than Marie Antoinette Ney. It is doubtful also if any interesting bit of scenery along the coast has escaped the attention of this wielder of brush and pencil, or if the glories of the mountains have found a more persistent and conscientious friend. So long ago as 1889 Miss Ney chose Pasadena as a fitting field for her activities, her arrival in the state being preceded by a thorough artistic training, and an association with people of high aspirations and keen appreciation of the beautiful and true. She was born in Vernon, Oneida county, N. Y., and is the youngest of the four daughters and two sons born to Charles and Cassan (McConney) Ney, natives respectively of Oneida county, N. Y., and Connecticut. Her father was connected with a large commission house in New York City, and came of a family long identified with that state, in which the paternal grandfather, Jonathan Ney, also was born. The mother was of Scotch descent, and her death occurred in New York. Of the four children still living, Roenna is a teacher of languages in New York City; Mrs. Phillip Dietrich lives in Pasadena; and Mrs. Wesley Tooke is a resident of Malone, N. Y.

The education of Miss Ney was acquired at Cooper Institute, New York, and her first artistic training at the Art Students League, also of New York. She subsequently taught art in New Jersey and Long Island up to the time of her removal to California in 1889. Before permanently locating in this state she spent four months on a tour of inspection, and six weeks of that time were spent on Mount Wilson. So charmed was she with the prospects here represented that she returned to the east to dispose of her interests, and again in California built a cabin on Mount Wilson, where she spent the summer. Her association with Pasadena was originally accidental, and arose from an advertisement inserted by the principal of schools for an assistant drawing teacher. She was engaged for a month on trial, but remained with the school for two years, afterward spending a year in Throop Institute in charge of the drawing and painting department. She then opened a studio in Pasadena, and as a result of her work in her present surroundings has exhibited in the Academy of New York City, the National Academy of Design in New York, and the American Water Color Society exhibit. In 1898 Miss Ney visited Europe and traveled and studied in different parts of the continent, and upon her return studied during two winters with the world-renowned William Chase, of New York. She is especially interested in mission pictures, of which she has made a distinct success, her canvases being in demand all over the country. California, and its diversified gifts has no more enthusiastic admirer than Miss Ney, who has traveled along the coast as far as British Columbia, and claims to have found no more inspiring scenery in Switzerland than is to be found in the Rocky Mountains. Each summer she starts out on a sketching tour, and returns laden with material for a winter's occupation. Miss Ney is possessed of personal characteristics which have won her many friends in California, all of whom are justly proud of her eminent place in the delightful world of art.

MRS. MARY S. FRYE. The Evanston Inn, one of the most luxurious and home-like of the many abodes at the disposal of the transient public of Pasadena, is indebted for the excellence of its management and the beauty of its arrangement to the business ability and artistic appreciation of its owner and proprietor, Mrs. Mary S. Frye. Among the multitude of places in the country where one may revel in Southern California delights none is more widely known or patronized, for here all things combine to satisfy the senses, the mind and the heart. From a small place rented by Mrs. Frye in 1899, the Inn has known a constant succession of enlargements and improvements, and is at present in need of far greater facilities for entertainment. The building is now three stories in height and contains forty rooms, the whole having a frontage of one hundred feet. A fine park adds to the comfort and pleasure of guests, and two cottages in the rear of the hotel are utilized for overflow during the busy season. The arrangements and plans are all the work of the genial and popular manager, whose reputation for tact and kindness is exceeded only by her gratifying success.

From a staunch New England ancestry Mrs. Frye inherits shrewd common sense, which, augmented and developed by careful early training, has placed her in a position to adorn and dignify her place. Before her marriage a member of the Sheldon family of Vermont, Mrs. Frye is a daughter of a Vermont merchant, Otis P. Sheldon, and his wife, formerly Mary Shedd. The father was born in Dorset, Vt., while the mother was born at Windsor, same state, the parental home being at the foot of the Ascutney mountains, on the Connecticut river. Both families were for many years identified with Vermont, and both claimed among their members those who had shouldered muskets in the colonial army during the war of the Revolution. There were but two children born into the Sheldon family, of which Otis P. was the head, the other daughter being Mrs. Skinner, of Cambridge, Mass.

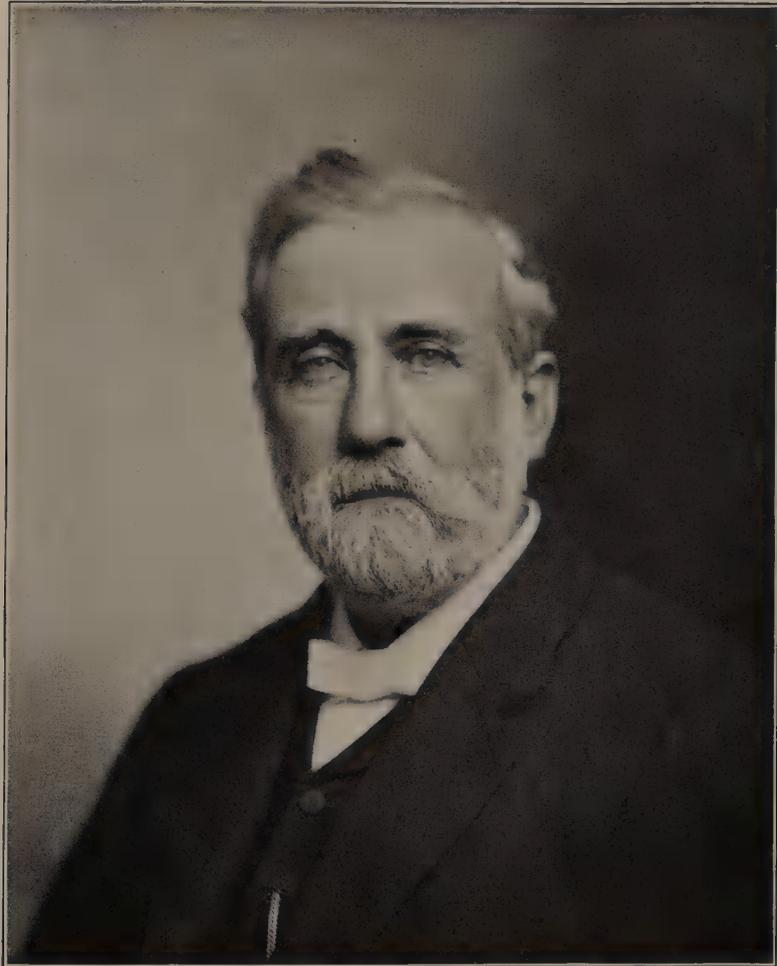

At Windsor, Vt., Mrs. Frye attended the public schools, and when eleven years of age removed to Newton, Mass., and graduated from the La Salle Seminary. She then took a course at the Philadelphia Art School, and later removed to Chicago, in which city her sister was then living. While in Chicago she was united in marriage with L. B. Frye, a native of Danbury, Conn., and the business manager for the Chicago branch of Fuller, Warren & Company, of Troy, N. Y. This position he creditably maintained for over twenty-three years, and in the mean time made his home in Evanston, a suburb of Chicago, where he lived about twelve years. Mr. Frye retired from active business in 1890, and, owing to impaired health, came to Pasadena in 1896, his death occurring in this city in October of 1899. To Mr. and Mrs. Frye was born one son, Edward Sheldon, who is living with his mother. Mrs. Frye is prominent in social circles of Pasadena, and is a member of the Shakspeare and other social organizations. In religion she is a Presbyterian, and in political affiliations a Republican.

JOHN B. CUMMINGS. From the time of his removal to Pasadena in 1882 until his death, October 29, 1893, John B. Cummings acceptably filled his place in the city of his adoption as a carpenter and builder, and an enterprising citizen. He was one of the many men who have settled in this town after a youth and early manhood spent in Ohio, in which state he was born at Mount Vernon, in 1843. He was educated in the public schools, and at a comparatively early age learned the carpenter's trade, which he followed with much success in his native state. June 22, 1882, he arrived in Pasadena, and gradually made his way among the builders of the town, many important contracts falling to his lot. He was honorable and industrious, and skilled in his chosen work, and while in this city made many friends.

While living at Mount Vernon Mr. Cummings married Elizabeth Toms, daughter of George and Sarah (Wallace) Toms, and granddaughter of William Toms. The family is of English extraction, and the father and grandfather came together to this country, settling on a farm in Knox county, Ohio. The grandfather returned to London, where he died, but his son continued to live in Ohio, where he engaged in building and contracting. He served with distinction in the Civil war, in Company C, Thirty-second Ohio Volunteer Infantry, but he never again saw the family to which he was devoted, for his death occurred at Cheat Mountain, Va. Through his marriage to Sarah Wallace he became identified with a family whose heritage mounts up into the millions, but which property is still tied up in England. The grandfather of Mrs. Cummings, Sir Richard Wallace, and his brother, Sir Arthur, were the direct heirs to forty million dollars, but through the failure of Sir Richard to return to England after the death of his brother, Arthur, the disposition of the property has been inadvertently delayed. Mrs. Cummings is the eldest in a family of five sons and two daughters, one of whom, Silas, is proprietor of the Enterprise Nurseries at Pasadena.

Mrs. Cummings is an excellent business woman. During the real-estate boom she speculated successfully in property, which she bought, sold and exchanged to advantage. She formerly owned several lots in North Pasadena, besides three hundred and twenty acres of land seven miles from Visalia, in Tulare county. She is very liberal and public spirited, and has brightened many lives by unostentatious contributions. Mr. and Mrs. Cummings had three children, namely: George E. C., who lives in Pasadena; Lula C., at home; and Queenie, who died January 1, 1899, at the age of seventeen years.

GEORGE L. STEARNS. In response to an expanding ambition a remote Stearns ancestor left the home of his forefathers in Germany and settled in England during the Norman invasion. At yet a later stage in the family history one equally desirous of improving his chances pursued his occupations and reared his family among the sheltering hills of Wales, from which safe but circumscribed retreat one bearing the name in after years crossed the seas to America, settling with other searchers for largeness of opportunity in Massachusetts. Thus began a line of Puritan sires and model matrons, the former of whom have since fought and often died while promulgating the liberty we now enjoy.

The honor and prestige of his family have been well maintained by George L. Stearns, who was born in Amsterdam, Montgomery county, N. Y., January 22, 1833. Ezra Stearns, the paternal grandfather, was born in Massachusetts, and in time became one of the pioneer settlers of New York state. Imbued with a sincere patriotism he followed the martial fortunes of Washington during the Revolutionary war as a minute-man, and was wounded at Bunker Hill. His second brother also was a patriot, and served in the Colonial army during the same struggle for the removal of English oppression. The grandfather was a millwright in Amsterdam, N. Y., and died in the Black River country, whither he had gone to construct a mill. His son, Asa, the father of George L., was born in Pittsfield, Mass., and like his sire became a millwright, carrying on extensive milling and furniture manufacturing interests in Amsterdam. Having decided to try his fortunes further west, he located on a farm near Eagle, Waukesha county, Wis., where he died in 1857. Through his marriage to Anna Paddock he became allied with a family the most distinguished representative of which was LaFayette, the great Frenchman. Mrs. Stearns was born in New York City just after the landing of the ship which had brought her parents from France, in which country was born the grandfather Paddock, who became one of the pioneer farmers and millers of the Black River country, New York. Mrs. Stearns, who died in Michigan, was the mother of four sons and three daughters, of whom two sons are now living. Of these, Lawton B., who served during the Civil war in the Second Wisconsin Heavy Artillery, is a resident of Cove, Ore., where he is extensively engaged in building.

The necessarily limited educational opportunities afforded George L. Stearns in Amsterdam, Montgomery county, N. Y., were redeemed from future disastrous results by his ready wit and commendable thirst for knowledge, resulting in individual effort and self instruction, and eventually gaining for the studious youth a teacher's certificate. As early as eight years of age he shouldered responsibility by entering his father's furniture factory, where he learned to work in wood, and also became familiar with machinery and iron work. When twenty-one years of age he began to learn mechanical engineering and structural building in New York state, having finished which he settled in Rockford, Ill., in 1856. There he served as inspector for the Maney Reaper Company's works. Not content with the prospects in the Illinois town he repaired to Eagle, Wis., where he engaged in building mills and bridges, the latter being both public and for the railroads. In Wisconsin he tried to enlist for the Civil war, but was rejected. The same effort in Rockford was attended by the desired results, and he enlisted in Company C, Sixty-seventh Illinois Infantry, and was placed on detached service for four and a half months at Camp Douglas. With this apology for an anticipated war service of large proportions he was obliged to content himself, and after being mustered out he returned to Wisconsin, and in Appleton engaged in the furniture business. He was the first contracting furniture manufacturer of the place, but his factory went up in smoke and flame, and proved the first of a series of like disasters which temporarily illuminated the business career of Mr. Stearns. The second destructive blaze happened in Hebron, in the same state, and the third factory to succumb to the elements of destruction blazed away in distinguished company, for on the same night in 1871, Mrs. O'Leary's cow tipped over the most expensive candle in the history of the world, and Chicago was in the throes of the most horrible and persistent of fire fiends. Nevertheless, Mr. Stearns in spite of these unwelcome and discouraging hindrances again engaged in the furniture business after locating in Cedar Falls, Iowa, and continued the same with moderate success until removing to Grand Haven, Mich., in 1874.

One of the most conspicuously successful periods of Mr. Stearns' life was in connection with the lumbering business in Grand Haven, where he also conducted a planing mill, preparatory to the organization of the Stearns Brothers Manufacturing Company, devoted to the manufacture of engines, machinery and windmills. This venture started out under auspicious circumstances and was maintained with ever-increasing success, and the Stearns windmills became known the world over, and were shipped to all quarters of the globe where the utility of this invention is known and appreciated. The firm also manufactured tanks and wooden wheels for other manufacturers, and at one time turned out two-thirds of the woodwork for mills in the United States. Mr. Stearns was also the first to make tanks by machinery in connection for woodwork for mills. The windmills were, however, of paramount importance, and so great was the European demand that an exporting house was established at No. 43 New street, New York City, and from 1873 until 1883 inclusive, the Stearns Brothers had the largest exporting windmill business in the world. An unusually appropriate advertisement for the mills grew out of the destruction of the town of Alexandria, Egypt, when, above the general debris arose unscathed the Stearns windmill, pumping away as of yore, apparently unmindful of its exclusive isolation as the sole reminder of a previously prosperous town. The historian who chronicled the disaster gave a particularly interesting description of this always picturesque construction, a fact which lent additional romance to the flapping wings so well beloved of artist-souls on the Dunes of Holland, and on the practical prairies of the west. Thus nine years of united effort built up a commercial enterprise of international importance, and yet so uncertain are the most substantial plans of men, that in 1883 the grim and relentless flames swept away that which was created by the careful thought, diligence and splendid achievement of master business minds, and $85,000 was as though it had never been, this being the sum lost above all insurance. This was the fourth large conflagration, but there had in the mean time been six smaller ones.

The necessity for artificial irrigation in California had in the mean time been prolific of orders for the mills constructed in Grand Haven, Mich., and by 1883 over two thousand had been erected in different parts of the state, and agencies had been established for their further disposal. It was therefore not surprising that Mr. Stearns should feel kindly disposed towards the business prospects of the coast, when taken in connection with the admirable fire departments and climatic and general inducements. Upon locating in Los Angeles he established, in 1884, the Stearns Manufacturing Company, which was disposed of in 1895 to the Lacy Manufacturing Company, on North Main street. His success proved in a measure a duplicate of that experienced in Michigan, and his mills and steam engines found a ready sale along the coast as well as inland. Another plant, established about the same time and later disposed of to his son, was the machine manufacturing concern that turned out the first steam engine and the first steam pump in Los Angeles. They also made and put in the first machinery for ironing shirts and collars in the city, and which is now used by the Excelsior laundry.

Having disposed of his former two interests in 1895, Mr. Stearns bought and built his present place of business at No. 1200 North Main street. This enterprise now constitutes the largest furniture manufactory in the city, and the plant consists of two buildings, one two stories in height, 36x85 feet in ground dimensions, and one 50x85 feet in ground surface. Furniture of all kinds is turned out of the factory, and a high grade of work is maintained in all of the departments.

At Eagle, Wis., Mr. Stearns married Mary Snyder, who was born in Cattaraugus, N. Y., and died in Whitewater, Wis. Of this union there were three children: Frank, who is in the machine shop in Los Angeles; Charles, who died in this city; and Augustus, who is a fruit shipper at Redlands and Highlands. A second marriage was contracted by Mr. Stearns in Cedar Falls, Iowa, the present Mrs. Stearns being Angeline Snyder, a sister of his first wife, and also a native of New York state. To Mr. and Mrs. Stearns have been born two children, Bert, who is a traveling salesman in San Francisco, and Will, who is a practicing physician in Dupuyer, Mont., and is a graduate of the Los Angeles Medical College. Mr. Stearns is pronouncedly public spirited, and is of practical assistance in furthering any plan of improvement in the city. He is a member of the Merchants and Manufacturers Association, and has lent the weight of his influence in furthering the undertakings of the Republican party. In the latter capacity he has been active in the county central committee, and during 1886-7 was a member of the city council. Fraternally he is associated with the Masons, having joined that organization in Cedar Falls, Iowa, in which town he was raised to the Royal Arch Masons and the Commandery. He is also affiliated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, with Bartlett Logan Post, G. A. R., and has also been vice-commander of Kennesaw Post. Mr. Stearns enjoys a standing in the community commensurate with his splendid financial ability, his sterling general worth and unblemished integrity. Of such are the bulwarks of any commonwealth composed, and to men of like calibre will appreciation and gratitude be ever forthcoming.

JOHN BRENNAN. That the successful hotel man is "born and not made" was proved by the career of John Brennan, one of the most capable in his line in the country. Identified for several years with the hotel business in Southern California, he is particularly remembered as the proprietor of the Hoffman House, in Los Angeles, which, under his wise and efficient management, developed into one of the most popular and paying hostelries in the southern part of the state. From his youth up he made a study of entertaining the traveling public, and based his operations upon a wide knowledge of human nature, ready tact, and the aid of a pleasing and genial personality. Everyone who came to his hotels, whether in the east or west, left with the rooted intention of coming again, which means without specification that the internal and external man were well cared for.

A native of Peterboro, Canada, Mr. Brennan was born in 1849, and received his education in the public schools of his northern country. He never had any intention of engaging in other than the hotel business, and his first independent venture was conducted in Painesville, Ohio, in connection with the Cowles House. He later went to Cleveland, Ohio, and was proprietor of the Empress House, which establishment had an era of prosperity until relinquished by him at the end of five years. In Los Angeles he purchased the Hoffman House, as heretofore stated, and in 1893 returned east to Cleveland and ran the Oxford House, which was disposed of in 1895. Cherishing memories altogether delightful of his residence in California, he followed the example of most who come under the influence of her manifold charms and returned west. With hopes of a continued residence on the western slope of the country he purchased the New Morris Hotel of Santa Barbara, and was just located and ready for business when, on account of the failure in business of the proprietor of the Oxford House in Cleveland, he was obliged to relinquish his desire to live in the west, and returned to the scene of his previous efforts in Cleveland. While in the prime of life, at the age of forty-six, he died in Detroit, Mich., in 1895, his demise being occasioned by a cold. He left many warm and admiring friends, who appreciated the noble traits of his character, and who sadly missed him from his accustomed haunts. He was truly a man of many gifts, not the least of which was a large heart and a well-directed sympathy with all who struggle with the trials and vicissitudes of life.

Mrs. Brennan, who occupies a prominent place among the hotel managers of Santa Barbara, was born in Buffalo, N. Y., and is a daughter of Timothy Callahan, for many years connected with the large grain firms of Buffalo, and subsequently a clerk in the surrogate court. The mother, Mary (Hughes) Callahan, who died in Buffalo, had thirteen children, eight of whom attained maturity, and five are now living, Mrs. Brennan and her brother, Cornelius, being the only ones in California. Mrs. Brennan has demonstrated her ability to carry on the work of her husband, and has been especially successful since going into partnership with her brother in the management and ownership of the New Morris and the Mascarel. These hotels are being conducted in a most satisfactory and up-to-date manner, and with every regard for the comfort and convenience of the many guests who return again and again to avail themselves of the pleasant associations here to be met with. Like her husband, Mrs. Brennan is a Republican in politics. She has many friends among those whom she has met in a business and social way, and is one of the necessary adjuncts of hotel and social life in Santa Barbara.

A. MARIA McDOUGALL CONGDON, M. D. It is doubtful if any medical practitioner in Los Angeles county has achieved such pronounced success in the treatment of pulmonary troubles as has Dr. Maria McDougall Congdon, who makes a specialty of research tending to the amelioration of this universally dreaded human disorder. Cases considered practically hopeless have been restored to normal conditions under her efficacious treatment, and the growing confidence in her ability has brought her an extended patronage and a reputation by no means local in its reach.

A native of Allegany county, N. Y., Dr. Congdon was born in Clarksville, and comes of a family first represented in America by the paternal great-grandfather, who emigrated from Scotland, and settled in Vermont. There the paternal grandfather, another James, was born, and thence in later life removed to Saratoga county, N. Y., where the third James, the father of Dr. Congdon, was born. The father was a farmer in New York state, near Clarksville, who had the good fortune to strike the first oil and gas well in Allegany county on his property. He died at the age of forty-nine years. His wife was formerly Hannah Maxson, a native of Madison county, N. Y., and of Scotch descent. Mrs. Congdon was the mother of one son and two daughters. Of these Dr. Congdon is the youngest; Trivilla is the widow of J. F. Zimmerman, of Clarksville; and Marcellus C. is living in Cuba, N. Y.

Dr. Congdon received her professional training in the medical department of the University of Buffalo, from which she was graduated in 1892, thereafter engaging in practice in Cuba, N. Y., eight miles from the place of her birth. Her efforts were crowned with success, and she worked up a large practice. The constant strain of responsibility so told upon her general health that at the end of four years and a half she was obliged to seek a change of climate and surroundings, and therefore located in Pasadena. This city, rich in the possession of women of talent and diverse accomplishments, has welcomed the professional acumen and high standards of Dr. Congdon, whose sympathy with human suffering has led to so thorough an understanding of the diseases of women, as well as of pulmonary disorders.

Dr. Congdon is a member of the Pasadena Medical Society, and is medical examiner for the Knights of the Maccabees, the Live Oak Circle, Women of Woodcraft and the Fraternal Aid. She is a Republican in political affiliation, and is a staunch believer in temperance, whether viewed from the standpoint of intoxicants or of general living. Her son, Roscoe Paul Congdon, was admitted to the California bar April 10, 1900, and is now one of the prominent young attorneys of Pasadena, engaged principally in probate and corporation law. In February, 1898, he married Grace Moore, of Olean, N. Y., and they have one daughter, Lucille.

ELIZA J. BEACH, M. D. The science of homeopathy in Pasadena has no exponent more painstaking and capable than Dr. Eliza J. Beach, whose practice here began in the fall of 1887, and has since continued uninterruptedly. Dr. Beach was born in Knoxville, Tioga county, Pa., a daughter of David, and granddaughter of William Beach, the latter a native of Wales. The grandfather emigrated from Wales with his brothers, Samuel and David, and settled in Connecticut, where his remaining days were spent.

David Beach, the father of Dr. Beach, was born in Connecticut, and for several years lived in Tompkins county, N. Y., removing afterward to Tioga county, Pa., and later to Knoxville, Pa., where his death occurred. He was a manufacturing cooper up to the time of his retirement. His wife, formerly Anna Bull, was born in Groton, Tompkins county, N. Y., a daughter of James and Hannah (Shaw) Bull, natives of Connecticut. The Bull family is of English descent, and the paternal grandfather was the emigrating ancestor. Mrs. Beach died in Knoxville, Pa., having reared a family of seven children, five of whom are living, Dr. Beach being the third. Three of the sons served in the Civil war: Victor, a soldier in the Tenth New York Infantry, died in Memphis, Tenn.; Oscar, a soldier in Pope's Division, Ninth Pennsylvania Regiment, died from exposure and starvation; and Charles, a member of the Tenth New York Volunteer Infantry, served for four years, and through two enlistments, and now lives in Cataugus county, N. Y.

Dr. Beach was reared in Knoxville, Pa., and was educated in the public schools and at Cowanesque Academy, after which she engaged in educational work in Addison, N. Y., as principal of a public school. In 1863 she removed to Leavenworth, Kans., and while there was one of the organizers of the Home for the Friendless, for women and children. She was appointed matron in charge by the other ladies interested in the enterprise, and so successful was her management that the place was enlarged from a two-room shelter to a four-story brick building on Fifth and Pine streets. This place is still running, having been brought to a high state of development by Dr. Beach, who, during her seven years' association with the institution, became interested in medicine through Dr. Eliza Knowles Morgan, the homeopathic house physician. Having decided to devote her life to medicine she entered the medical department of the University of Michigan in 1869, graduating therefrom in 1871. She then became identified with the Dr. Rachel Gleason Sanitarium, at Elmira, N. Y., and in 1871 began to practice at Mansfield, Tioga county, Pa. In 1876 Dr. Beach entered the Homeopathic Medical College at Cleveland, Ohio, and graduated from that institution in 1877, later continuing her former practice in Mansfield for three years. In Waverly, N. Y., she practiced until 1886, during which year she came to Pasadena. Being pleased with the city, she returned to the east and disposed of her interests there, the fall of 1887 finding her again located in Pasadena, where she bought a residence on Worcester avenue. She engaged in practice in this town, and although interested in general medicine and surgery, she makes a specialty of rectal surgery and the diseases of women. The Doctor has a commodious residence and fine offices, and her experience in the west has been that of the successful, conscientious and gifted professional woman.

In 1897 Dr. Beach returned to Cleveland and took a post-graduate course at the old school, and this represents but one of her constant efforts to keep abreast of the advance in her great calling. She is a member of the State Medical Society, the Southern California Homeopathic Medical Society, the Los Angeles County Homeopathic Medical Society, the American Institute of Homeopathy, and is foremost in professional matters in the city and county. Dr. Beach is a member of the Shakspeare Club, and of the First Methodist Episcopal Church. In political affiliation she is allied with the Republican party.

STEPHEN G. BROOKS. By virtue of the position which he occupies as agent for the Southern Pacific Milling Company at Santa Paula, Mr. Brooks is well known among the people of Ventura county. He came to California in September, 1888, from the historic town of Concord, Mass., where he was born and reared and where his early manhood years were passed. In that city he married Mrs. Jane Palmer, a native of Dover, Mass. Two children were born of their union, namely: Walter H., who lives in Greenwood, Cal., and Maisuna, who is attending school in Los Angeles.

During the years from 1871 to 1888 Mr. Brooks was in the employ of the American Express Company, but in the latter year he resigned his position in order to come to the Pacific coast. Arriving in California, he worked for a year in the employ of the Los Angeles Ice and Cold Storage Company at Los Angeles. Later he secured employment in Santa Barbara, and still later made his home in Ventura. In September, 1890, he came to Santa Paula as agent for the Southern Pacific Milling Company, since which time he has had charge of the company's business and has discharged his manifold duties in a way highly satisfactory to his employers.

A. H. Johnson

While in the middle district of Los Angeles county Mr. Brooks first became interested in the oil industry. Included among his possessions is some real estate in Los Angeles. Educational matters for the advancement of the Santa Paula schools receive his thoughtful and intelligent attention, in the capacity of secretary of the high school board. Another local enterprise in which he is interested is the Santa Paula Board of Trade, of which he is president. An active worker in the Democratic party, he is now a member of the county central committee and in 1900 served as chairman of the Democratic convention at Ventura. Fraternally he is connected with the Ancient Order of United Workmen, and during his residence in Concord, Mass., was active in the Royal Arcanum. He is public-spirited and in the ranks of those who are seeking to promote the welfare of the town and county.

CAPT. ALBERT H. JOHNSON. The development of a community depends not only upon its advantages of climate and soil, but also upon the character of its citizenship. Judged by both of these standards, Monrovia bids fair to attain prominence among the towns of Southern California. Its soil is susceptible of high cultivation, its climate is said by many to be ideal, and its citizens as a class are enterprising and capable. One of the promoters of the town is Captain Johnson, who dates his residence here from January 25, 1887. Since coming here he has owned and developed a considerable amount of land. His first house was built on the present site of the Mills residence, and later he erected the attractive abode which he now occupies and which, with its pleasant surroundings, forms a distinct addition to Monrovia.

The boyhood days of Captain Johnson were spent on a farm near Wethersfield, Wyoming county, N. Y., where he was born April 23, 1836. When he was twelve years of age, his father, Orrin Johnson, took the family to Wisconsin, where soon he began to bear his part in the busy world of affairs. As a boy he worked on the railroad, first in his home state, and later in Illinois and Iowa. When the gold mines of Colorado were attracting thousands he made his first trip to the west, and from 1860 to 1863 was employed in mining at Leadville. On his return to Iowa, he enlisted at Fort Dodge in the Seventh Iowa Cavalry, and accompanied his regiment in its varied expeditions up to the close of the war. From first sergeant he was promoted to regimental commissary sergeant and, in the spring of 1864, to the rank of captain. At the close of the war he returned to the duties of a private citizen, resuming railroad work and taking contracts to furnish ties and lumber with which to complete the Union Pacific Railroad. Meantime he also bought and sold real estate, also made a contract with the Northern Pacific Railroad and was a manufacturer, also a dealer in butter, eggs and poultry.

The work of a contractor proved congenial and profitable, but Captain Johnson found that the constant exposure to inclement weather rapidly undermined his constitution, and he therefore decided to seek California's equable climate. A visit through much of the state in 1887 resulted in a growing conviction that Monrovia offered a climate surpassed by no other location, and he accordingly established his home here, a decision which he has never had cause to regret. While living in Iowa he was married, at Fort Dodge, to Miss Lavinia Dwellie, by whom he had four children, namely: Amy, Tillie and Sarah, who died in childhood; and Alberta, a beautiful and accomplished young lady, whose death in 1898 was a deep and irreparable loss to her devoted parents and many friends. Mrs. Johnson is a communicant of the Episcopal Church and a contributor to various movements of a religious and philanthropic nature, in which the captain also is interested, being a man of benevolent spirit and kind heart. The days of his war service he holds in memory by his association with Stanton Post No. 55, G. A. R., of which he is past commander and an interested worker, while fraternally he is associated with the Masons and has been raised to the degrees of Royal Arch, Knight Templar, Scottish Rite and Shrine.

The principles of the Republican party receive the support of Captain Johnson, yet he is less a partisan than a patriot, less a political worker than a progressive, public-spirited citizen. Feeling the keenest interest in the welfare of Monrovia, he consented to serve in the city council, which position has given him an opportunity to further measures for local progress, particularly along the line of the development of water facilities through his service as chairman of the city water committee. He is known for his sound and careful judgment in the council, which quality makes his suggestions particularly valuable. Whatever progress and prosperity Monrovia may enjoy in the future may be attributed in no small degree to the efficient and judicious labors of such citizens as Captain Johnson.

ALBERT BRIGDEN. From the time of arriving in Southern California in 1877 until his death seventeen years later, Mr. Brigden made his home at Lamanda Park, where, shortly after his arrival, he purchased from Charles Ellis a tract of land, later selling a part to his brother-in-law, J. F. Crank, but retaining one hundred and twenty acres. The land thus acquired had at one time been owned by the widow of Gen. Albert Sidney Johnston, of Confederate fame, and she had erected thereon the first frame house in that part of San Gabriel valley. In 1869 Judge Eaton purchased the property and established what is now called Fair Oaks vineyard. Two years later Charles Ellis acquired a portion of the large ranch, and he in turn sold to Mr. Brigden, who built ditches and a reservoir, secured ample water facilities from the Precipice canon, and placed the land under cultivation. At this writing there are thirty-five acres in the finest varieties of oranges, five acres in lemons, five in deciduous fruits, while the balance is in a vineyard. Surrounding the land is a hedge nearly fourteen feet high and eight feet across, provided with three openings which secure entrance to the ranch.

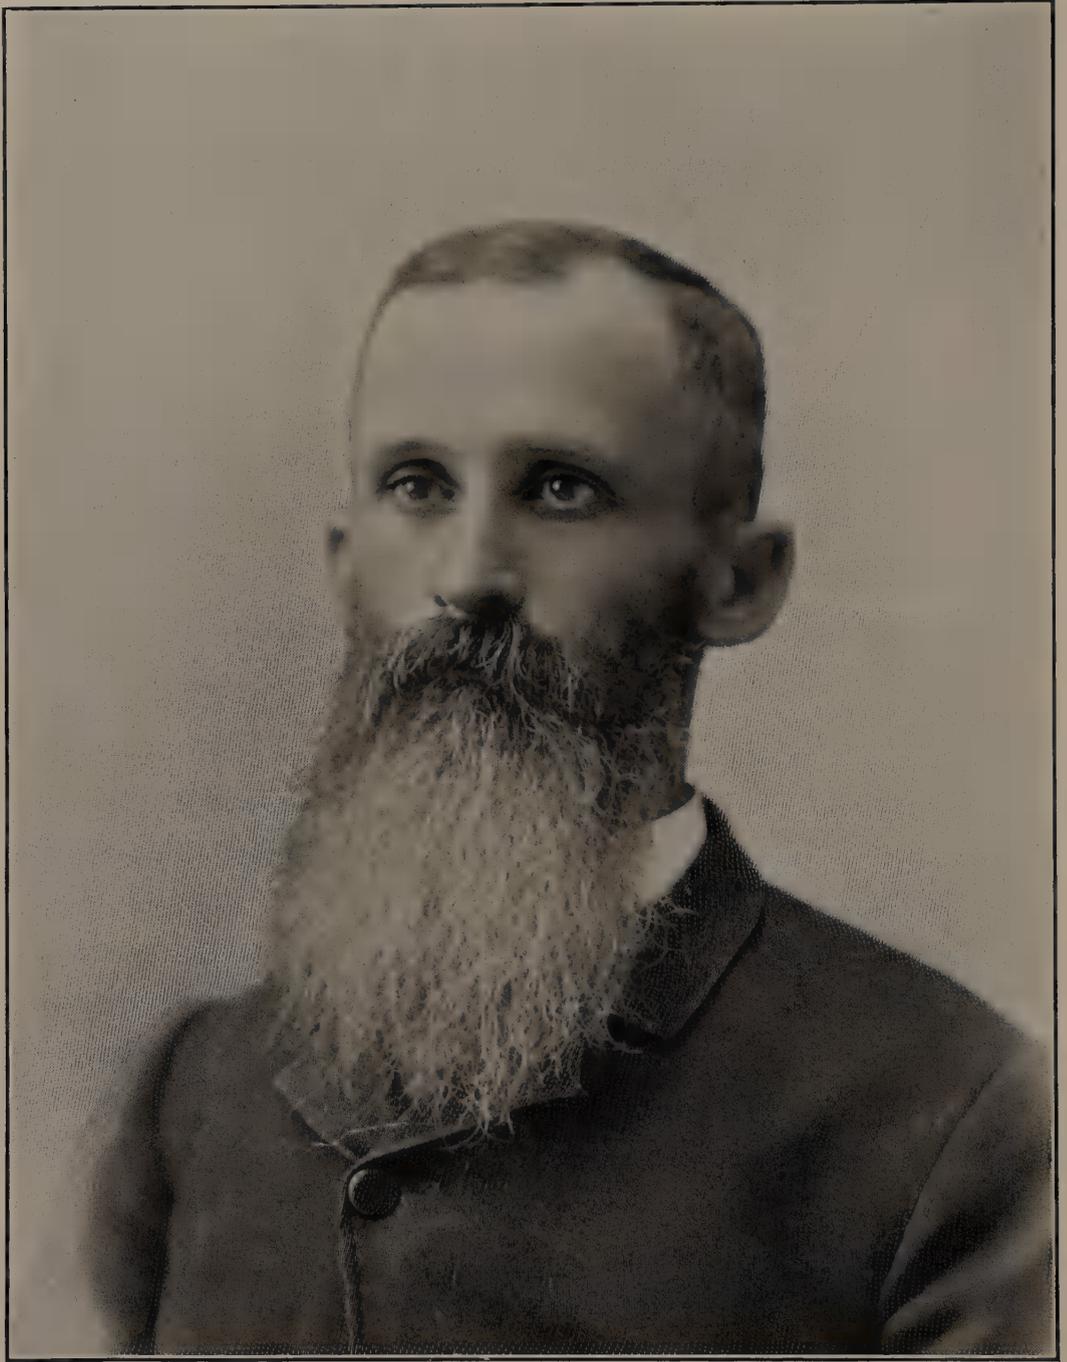

In 1844 Mr. Brigden was born in Penn Yan, N. Y., where his father, Timothy, was a manufacturer. His mother, who bore the maiden name of Cornelia Dwight Hickox, was born in Connecticut and was a relative of Timothy Dwight, ex-president of Yale College. In 1864 he enlisted as sergeant in the Fifty-eighth New York Infantry, which was assigned to duty in guarding prisoners and escorting paroled detachments to their point of exchange. At the age of twenty-one he became a partner in his father's business, and continued as such until fire destroyed the works in 1872. He then went to Chicago, where he was interested in a wholesale hardware business until 1876, the year of his arrival in San Francisco. The following year he settled on the ranch where his widow now makes her home. Associated with several gentlemen, in 1885 he incorporated the Sierra Madre Vintage Company, of which he became general manager and vice-president. During the same year a winery was built at Lamanda Park, which was afterward under the supervision of Mr. Brigden. From time to time its capacity has been increased, until it now disposes of two thousand tons of grapes during the season, these grapes being furnished principally from the Highland vineyards of Mr. Brigden.

During the time that he made his home at Lamanda Park no enterprise was inaugurated for its benefit which failed of his encouraging aid. Public-spirited to the point of self-sacrifice, he neglected nothing that would develop this region and render it one of the most beautiful spots of the country. In 1885 he assisted in incorporating the San Gabriel Valley Railroad, and became a director of the same. The opening up of this locality to settlement was due in large measure to this road, which has since been merged into the Santa Fe system. He was a member of the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce and the Union League, and in politics voted with the Republican party. His death occurred October 8, 1894, being the result of an explosion at Lamanda Park. To the many friends and associates of his busy years the news came with all the force of a sudden and unexpected bereavement and called forth many tributes of praise for his manly character, upright life and generous dealings with his fellow-men.

The marriage of Mr. Brigden occurred at Penn Yan, N. Y., June 27, 1882, and united him with Miss Helen L. Whitaker, who was born near Geneva, that state, and by whom he had two children, Louise C. and Timothy Dwight Brigden. The Whitakers are of English descent and early settlers of New Jersey. The great-grandfather of Mrs. Brigden was a Revolutionary soldier. The grandfather, Jonathan Whitaker, organized the first Presbyterian congregation in Yates county, N. Y., and long officiated as its elder; by occupation he was a farmer. The father, Gen. Alexander Finley Whitaker, was born near Geneva, N. Y., and engaged in the manufacture of agricultural implements at Penn Yan, but, after being burned out in 1872, he retired from business cares. His last years were spent in California, in the home of Mrs. Brigden, but he died in New York while visiting old friends and relatives. The title by which he was known was given to him during his service in the New York state militia, where he held the rank of major-general. In religious views he was a Presbyterian. His two children, Mrs. Brigden, of Lamanda Park, and Melville Torrance Whitaker, of Los Angeles, were born of his union with Louise Phelps Torrance, who was born in Avon, N. Y., and died at Lamanda Park in 1900. Her father, Richard Torrance, was a native of Connecticut, and her grandfather was a commissioned officer in the Revolution and one of the most conspicuous figures in that historic conflict.

WILLIAM G. BENEDICT. Few men in Southern California have managed larger or more important real-estate transactions than has William G. Benedict, one of the honored business men of Pasadena. From an English-Quaker ancestry Mr. Benedict inherits the strength of character and high moral principle which have been of such inestimable value to him in fashioning his successful career. His youth, spent on the paternal farm near Cardington, Morrow county, Ohio, contained all of the hardships experienced by the average farm-reared boy, and his opportunities were those of his own making. He was born January 10, 1833, and attended the little log schoolhouse in the vicinity of his home, sitting on the slab seats and poring over the rule of three at the crudely constructed desks.

Sylvester Benedict, the father of William G., was born near Lake Champlain, N. Y., the paternal grandfather, Cyrus, being also a native of New York, and an early settler of Ohio. Sylvester located on a farm in Morrow county, Ohio, where he lived for many years, and where his death occurred. He married Susannah Shaw, born near Lake Champlain, N. Y., a daughter of Jonathan Shaw, who settled on Shaw Creek, Delaware (now Morrow) county. The very first pioneers of this region were the Shaws and Benedicts, and the families underwent many hardships and deprivations while tilling their land and rearing their children. Three Benedict brothers married three Shaw sisters. They built their own log cabins and made their own clothes, and the Benedicts cleared one hundred and twenty acres. Of their four sons and three daughters, William G. is the only survivor, although a half brother, T. J. Grisell, lives in Galion, Ohio, but will soon come to Pasadena.

In 1856 William G. Benedict left the familiar surroundings in Ohio and located in Marshall county, Iowa, near Legrand. This region proved a most satisfactory place of abode, and he became prominent and useful in the community. He found employment in buying, improving and selling lands, in manufacturing and milling, and all that he touched seemed to succeed and yield abundantly. He also bought and sold stock in large numbers, shipping thousands of head to the Chicago markets. They at one time purchased a thousand head of cattle in Montana, which they shipped to Chicago. In connection with his Montana stock he also engaged to some extent in mining, but owing to the disadvantage of not being on the premises he failed to realize his expectations. During his six years' residence in Marshalltown he was a member of the board of supervisors uninterruptedly, and resigned the position only upon his removal to Pasadena in 1887.

Among the subdivisions developed and laid out by Mr. Benedict in Los Angeles county may be mentioned the L. H. Michner subdivision, in which he owns a half interest; the William G. Benedict & Company subdivision; the Benedict & Son subdivision; the Chamberlain subdivision on Woodbury Road; three subdivisions east of Pasadena; the William G. Benedict subdivision of the Halliday tract, Santa Ana; and he owned an interest in the Palmer tract. The real-estate business is conducted under the firm name of William G. Benedict & Son. They own an orange ranch of twelve acres on the Marengo tract, South Pasadena. At the collapse of the boom in 1887 Mr. Benedict lost heavily.

In Legrand, Iowa, Mr. Benedict married Cordelia A. Youngs, a native of Miami county, near the town of Troy, Ohio. Of this union there have been born four children, viz.: Wilfred W., who is the partner of his father; Susie, who died at the age of eighteen; May, the wife of B. B. Hinman, of Chicago; and Charles V., traveling inspector for the Pasadena Electric Railroad. Mr. Benedict was an abolitionist during war days and is now a Republican. He is a well-informed, genial and popular gentleman, and has many stanch friends in the city of which he is one of the most enthusiastic upbuilders.

GRANVILLE SPURGEON. As one of the earliest settlers of Santa Ana, Granville Spurgeon was intimately associated with the development of its business interests. Coming here in 1870, he joined his brother, William H., the founder of the town, and whose arrival preceded his own by two years. For many years afterward the brothers were partners in a mercantile establishment, which they conducted successfully and which subsequently was sold to Beatty Brothers, but is now owned by the firm of Crookshank & Son. Another enterprise in which Granville Spurgeon engaged was the fire insurance business, also as a produce merchant, but these he also sold out to other parties. Of later years he devoted himself especially to the development of one hundred acres of peat lands, on which can be raised the finest celery in California. Of this he sold a part, still retaining fifty acres.

The Spurgeon family originated in England and on coming to America settled in Virginia, whence Mr. Spurgeon's grandfather removed to Bourbon county, Ky., during the days of Daniel Boone and other pioneers. Granville Spurgeon, Sr., was born and reared in Bourbon county, and there married Lovina Sibley, a native of Prince Edward county, Va., and a direct descendant of an influential English family. In 1830 Granville and Lovina Spurgeon moved to Columbus, Ind., and settled on a farm, but ten years later made another change of location, going to Clark county, Mo. After some years on a farm there they settled in Alexandria, Mo., where the father was an active business man and held some local offices of trust. While the family were visiting at the old home near Louisville, Ky., Granville Spurgeon, Jr., was born August 19, 1843. In 1849 the father came overland to California and for eighteen months engaged in mining, after which he returned to Missouri and in 1855 bought a farm. Some few years were spent on that place, but in 1864 he and his family sought a permanent home in California, spending five months on the road and settling in Solano county. There both parents passed away, the father surviving the mother and dying at fifty-seven years of age.

About 1866 Benjamin and Granville Spurgeon, accompanied by a sister, moved to Watsonville, Cal. One year later, in November, 1867, these two brothers, with W. H., settled in Los Angeles county and took up government land between Compton and Los Angeles. The next year W. H. went to Santa Ana, but Granville remained on the farm until his brother, Benjamin, died in 1870, when he joined his remaining brother in Santa Ana. He therefore was one of the oldest residents of this city at the time of his death, which occurred August 7, 1901. During the long period of his connection with the city, he maintained a high standing as a citizen and a friend.

WILLIAM ALLEN. After a busy mercantile career in Egypt, Mr. Allen came to the United States, and, selecting what he believed to be one of the fairest spots in any country, established his home at Lamanda Park. At the time of its purchase by him the ranch, now known as Sphinx, consisted of five hundred and two acres, but the estate has since been reduced to four hundred and forty acres, the whole of which has been managed since his death by his widow and children. About twenty-six acres are under cultivation to citrus fruits, mostly oranges. A vineyard of over two hundred acres, set out in 1872, 1882 and 1885, furnishes an abundance of grapes of the Mission, Zinfandel, Blue Elbe and Berger varieties, as many as six hundred tons being used in one season in the winery on the ranch.

A native of Liverpool, England, William Allen early acquired a thorough knowledge of mercantile pursuits through the instruction of his father, Joseph Allen, who was a prosperous cotton merchant of that city. When a young man he went to Egypt, settling at Alexandria, where he engaged in exporting cotton to various European markets. His energy and shrewd business methods brought him an early financial success, and while he was still young he was able to retire from active cares, returning in 1864 to England and establishing a country home at Bath, Somerset. His first visit to California was made in 1878, when he was so pleased with the climate and prospects that he bought the ranch Sphinx. Returning to England, he brought his family back the following year, and about the same time erected for them a commodious rural residence. From the time of his removal to California until his death, which occurred July 21, 1886, he was busily engaged in undertakings calculated to develop his property and also to advance neighborhood values.

At Alexandria, Egypt, in 1859, occurred the marriage of Mr. Allen and Miss Emily J. Bell, whose father, a Londoner by birth, became one of the early cotton merchants of that famous Egyptian city. Her mother, Hester L., was born on the Isle of Malta, where her father, John David, was at the time serving as general commissariat. The David family was of Welsh extraction. Of the union of Mr. Allen and Miss Bell nine children were born, namely: Annie, at home; Arthur, a cattleman at Payson, Ariz.; Harold, who is executor of his father's estate; Walter, manager of the home ranch; Edith, Mrs. Bowring, of Charter Oak, Cal.; Hubert, who carries on a cattle business at Payson, Ariz.; Sidney, an orchardist in Lindsay, Tulare county; Percy, who is engaged in horticultural pursuits at Covina; and Bernard, who resides on the home ranch at Lamanda Park. The family attend the Episcopal Church at San Gabriel and contribute to its various benevolences. Throughout the vicinity where they have so long resided their friends are as numerous as their acquaintances. Not only by reason of her hospitality and social qualities, but also on account of her executive ability, Mrs. Allen has won a high place in the respect of associates. With the able assistance of her sons, she has maintained a high standard of improvements at the homestead and has constantly added to its value by such changes as suggest themselves to an intelligent vineyardist of the present day.

PERRY P. BONHAM. Since the spring of 1886 Mr. Bonham has been identified with the business interests of Pasadena. He was born in New York City December 13, 1857, being the third among the five children of Perry and Marie Bonham, the former a furniture dealer in the metropolis. The family possessing sufficient means to educate their children and train them for life's responsibilities, the son who was his father's namesake attended local schools in boyhood, but, being of an ambitious nature, he early developed a desire to learn a trade, and accordingly when fifteen was apprenticed to the plumbing business, at which he served for four years. The year 1885 found him in Chicago, and the next year he settled in Pasadena, where he worked on the old Raymond Hotel, and then took charge of the plumbing department of the Pasadena Hardware Company, in which capacity he did the first plumbing in Pasadena.

Believing that the city offered an excellent field for independent work, Mr. Bonham entered business for himself in 1889, and for some years was located at No. 19 East Colorado street, but later bought the property at Nos. 45-47 West Colorado, where he erected a suitable business structure. Among the contracts which he filled were those for the Painter Hotel of Pasadena, Westminster Hotel in Los Angeles, Stimson and Newmark buildings in Los Angeles, State Normal building of Los Angeles,

J. P. Trotter

Pomona College building at Claremont, the Schaffer block in San Diego, Green Hotel, Carrollton block, and many public buildings and residences in Pasadena. By many he is considered to be the finest plumber in the state, and on all hands it is conceded that his work has borne the test of time and has proved in every respect reliable and as guaranteed. In 1900 he sold out his business, since which he has given his attention to managing his real-estate holdings. He erected and now owns the Bonham apartment house, containing seven apartments, and situated on Walnut and Raymond avenue. The block which he erected on West Colorado has since been sold. The residence which he built at No. 460 North Marengo avenue is presided over by his wife, who was formerly Miss Fannie Johnson, and was born in New York City. They have one child. The family attend the Episcopal Church and Mrs. Bonham is a member of the same.

While voting with the Republican party in national elections, Mr. Bonham believes that local elections should not be based upon the belief of the candidate regarding tariff, currency, imperialism, etc., but rather upon his fitness for the work and his standing as a citizen, hence he votes independently for all local offices. At this writing he is a member of the board of police, fire and park commissioners of Pasadena.

J. P. TROTTER. During the years of his residence in California Mr. Trotter has been identified with various activities in Ventura county, and for some years past has made his home in the village of Fillmore. He came here in 1891 from Carroll county, Mo., where he was born November 30, 1859. His father, Hamilton Trotter, who was a merchant and leading citizen of Carrollton, gave him good educational advantages and trained him for the responsibilities of the future. This training, combined with his natural intelligence and practical experience, has made him a thorough-going business man.

For eight years, beginning in 1881, Mr. Trotter engaged in the stock business in Montana, principally in Gallatin county. From there he returned to his native county, and spent three years, still carrying on a general stock business. However, impaired health necessitated a removal, and, in search of a more healthful location, he came to California, where he has not been disappointed in the hoped-for restoration of his health. In 1891 he bought a stock ranch at Pole cañon, in the vicinity of Fillmore, and on that place he made his home for five years, meantime engaging in the raising of horses and cattle. On moving into Fillmore, he bought out the firm of Lineberger & Pyle, and since that time has conducted a livery and sales stable. Besides his barn, he owns several cottages in the village. To him belongs the credit for the present improved state of the town. A tireless worker in behalf of the village, he has sought by all means within his power to promote the local activities.

October 25, 1888, Mr. Trotter married Miss Emma Faris, who was born in Carroll county, Mo., and accompanied her husband to California in January, 1891. During 1898 she returned to Missouri to visit her mother, and died at her old home on the last day of July.

The nominees of the Republican party receive Mr. Trotter's vote, and he is quite active in the politics of his county. In the fall of 1899 he was elected justice of the peace and afterward served efficiently in the position until he resigned, March 7, 1902. All movements for the general welfare receive his support and warm sympathy. Though he is a very busy man, having in addition to the business already named a meat business that is important and large, he yet finds time to work in the interests of local beneficial movements, and no citizen of Fillmore is more public-spirited than he.

JOHN RANSOM BRAGDON. From a Welsh ancestry variously represented in the church and among the more intellectual occupations, John Ransom Bragdon inherits a capacity for painstaking effort at once consistent with material prosperity and a high order of citizenship. As manager for the Pasadena Electric Light & Power Company he occupies a substantial position in the business world of his adopted city, his rise to his present responsibility being expressive of a thorough mastery of the business. Of Pilgrim stock, he was born in Boston, Mass., August 31, 1875, a son of Prof. C. C. Bragdon, and grandson of Rev. Bragdon, a clergyman in the Methodist Episcopal Church.

Prof. C. C. Bragdon was born in Portland, Me., and is a graduate of the Northwestern University at Evanston, Ill. As a soldier in an Illinois regiment he served the cause of the Union during the Civil war, and for thirty years was connected with the La Salle Seminary, at Auburndale, Mass., first as principal, and later as proprietor. As an educator he has taken high rank among the most capable in the country, and, unlike many who follow a similar calling, has amassed a competence. Of late years he has been identified with interests in California, and is one of the large stockholders of the Edison Electric Light Company of Los Angeles. At the present time he is building a palatial home on the corner of Madison and East Colorado street, Pasadena, and will soon be installed in his new quarters. He married Kate Ransom, a native of Williamsport, Pa., and daughter of John Ransom, a large land owner in Pennsylvania, and a lumberman on the Susquehanna river. Mrs. Bragdon was educated at the Dickerson Seminary, and is the mother of two children.

John Ransom Bragdon was educated in the Boston public schools, at Allen's private school, and at Williams College, which he entered in 1894, and from which he was graduated in 1898, with the degree of A. B. For the following six months he was private secretary to his father, and in January, 1899, came to California in the employ of the Edison Electric Light Company, of Los Angeles. From the humble position of telephone boy and messenger he worked his way into the bookkeeping department, later becoming assistant cashier. May 1, 1900, he was appointed cashier, and July 1, 1901, was made manager of the Pasadena Electric Light & Power Company, a branch of the Edison Company's plant. Although a comparatively newcomer to this city, he has already made his influence felt in various departments of its activity, and his faith in its future, and his own desire to participate therein, are best evinced by his purchase of property upon which a residence is in process of erection. He is a member of the Board of Trade, and is fraternally connected with the Delta Kappa Epsilon. In political affiliation he is identified with the Republican party, and as a member of All Souls Episcopal Church is secretary of the vestry. Mrs. Bragdon was Sarah Coleman, a native of Lake county, Cal., and daughter of Theodore Coleman, manager of Throop Polytechnic Institute.

JOSEPH EDWARD McCUTCHEON. Among the many capable builders who have found business opportunities in Pasadena, none has more surely won the public confidence than Joseph Edward McCutcheon, erector of many of the finest residences in this city, and one of its most honored and respected citizens. Of sturdy Scotch ancestry, Mr. McCutcheon was born in Lindsay, Victoria county, Ontario, April 6, 1866, his paternal grandfather, Samuel, having settled in that region in the early '40s. He was a farmer by occupation, as was also his son, Samuel, the father of Joseph Edward, who was born, lived, and eventually died, in Lindsay, Ontario. The younger Samuel married Mary McCarroll, a native of Peterboro, Canada, and daughter of James McCarroll, born in the north of Ireland and of Scotch descent. Six children were born of this union, two of whom are living, Joseph Edward being the youngest and the only one in California. In his youth he had few educational advantages, for the family fortunes were not large, and it became necessary for him to assist in the general maintenance.

When seventeen years of age he was apprenticed to a carpenter in Lindsay for three years, after the completion of which he continued to reside in the city and did such carpenter work as came his way. In 1888 he removed to Toronto in the hope of improving his prospects, and the same year crossed the lake to Buffalo, N. Y., where he worked at his trade for a short time. Upon removing to California in 1889 he worked for three years in San Francisco, and during a portion of that time was foreman for a firm in Oakland. After locating in Pasadena in 1892 he was for a time employed by Mr. Slaven, eventually becoming foreman for that gentleman, and remaining with him until embarking on an independent building business in 1898. For a year he continued a partnership with Mr. Stoll, but after the removal of the latter-named member of the firm he managed the business alone. Among the residences which reflect special credit upon Mr. McCutcheon may be mentioned that of Mr. Christy, and the Wildes, Dr. Groff and Vedder residences, of Pasadena; the Fred Armstrong and Mrs. Girouar residences of Altadena; and the Martin Chase residence at Riverside, the most imposing and beautiful in the town.

The wife of Mr. McCutcheon was formerly Elizabeth Bonham, born in Pittsburg, Pa., and a sister of P. P. Bonham, of Pasadena. Mr. and Mrs. McCutcheon are members of the Presbyterian Church, and are well known in the social life of this beautiful city.

GEORGE B. ADAMS was born in Syracuse, N. Y., September 5, 1826, and there he lived with his parents, Zophar H. Adams and Lucy (Barnes) Adams, until the age of seventeen years, when he moved to Elgin, Ill. There for several years he was employed in one of the village stores, but at the age of twenty-three he began business for himself. His first venture was the grocery business, but after a few years he purchased a stock of watches and jewelry and steadily increased this business until he moved to the Pacific coast.

April 18, 1850, Mr. Adams married Ellen M. Truesdell, daughter of Burgess Truesdell and Maria L. (Gale) Truesdell, and four children, Florence, Claude, Alice and Gertrude, were born to them. Florence and Gertrude died before their father. His wife, son and daughter Alice were with him at the time of his death, April 10, 1900, at Alhambra, Cal. Throughout his life he was an earnest Christian. He was reared in the Episcopal Church, but when about twenty-three he joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, and continued an active member, having been steward and trustee for fifty years.

The National Watch Factory at Elgin was the making of that city, and to Mr. Adams, more than to any other, is due the credit of locating the factory there. Rival towns were making most strenuous efforts to secure the industry, but through his tact and unceasing energy the little city offered liberal inducements to the watch company, and at last, after suppressing an entire edition of the Elgin Gazette, which contained a premature hint which, it was feared, would alarm the rivals and cause them to redouble their endeavors, success crowned his efforts. The first watch made in the Elgin factory was given to the president of the company, but the second was presented to Mr. Adams, in recognition of his services, and was carried by him to the day of his death.

In 1876 Mr. Adams moved with his family to California and became one of the earliest settlers of what was then known as the Alhambra Tract, near the famous San Gabriel Mission. Here again he showed the same public spirit which animated him in Elgin, and by continual and thoughtful effort the town of Alhambra was established and developed, and it was his pleasure to live to be known as the "father" of Alhambra. Here he was largely interested in fruit culture and was identified with the beginnings of that great industry of California.

But above all the achievements which mark the course of his life stand pre-eminent the self-forgetfulness and self-sacrifice he continually exercised to benefit those about him, not only those bound to him by ties of relationship, but friends, neighbors and the communities in which he lived. Always ready to help the needy, to comfort the depressed, to counsel and uplift the discouraged, to lay aside his own tasks and give his best efforts to accomplish and sustain every wise movement for the benefit of his neighbors and townspeople, such a life needs no epitaph or monument, for it is graven in ever-living symbols upon the loving hearts of those who knew him.

D. W. MARCH. Although a resident of Pasadena only since 1900, Mr. March has for many years been connected with building interests here and in different parts of Los Angeles county. Upon removing to the state in 1886 he spent the first winter in Monrovia, and in September of 1887 settled in Los Angeles, where he engaged in building and contracting for two years. In 1889 he removed to Alhambra, where he became well known as a skillful builder, and erected the bank building and several fine residences. He also built himself a home in the town, and had a little ranch of two acres set out in oranges. With Alhambra as a headquarters, Mr. March extended his activities to many towns in the county, and has structures of various kinds to his credit in Redlands, Long Beach, Whittier, Monrovia, and other points. He erected the H. N. Sherman residence at Orange, and at Pasadena has built the residences of J. F. Kerr and H. D. West, the United Presbyterian Church, the Goodrich block, the Garibaldi building, the Whittier house, the Odd Fellows' Hall, besides many other public and private buildings.

A native of Columbiana county, Ohio, Mr. March was born April 9, 1850, and was reared on the paternal farm, upon which his father, Philip, settled in 1810, and upon which he died at the age of sixty-four years. Philip March was born in the Shenandoah valley, in Virginia, and was of Scotch-English descent. His father was an early settler in Virginia, and died in the war of 1812. The mother of D. W. March was formerly Sarah Gilmore, a native of Pittsburg, Pa., and whose grandfather, William, came from Scotland and bought a farm which is now the site of the central part of Pittsburg. Mrs. March, who died in Columbiana county, was the mother of nine children, of whom two daughters and six sons attained maturity, and three sons are now living, D. W. being the only one in California. Two of the sons, Henry Clay and William Gilmore, served during the Civil war in the One Hundred and Fifteenth Ohio Infantry, and both died in Ohio.

When fifteen years of age D. W. March left the home farm and district school, and apprenticed as a carpenter in Pittsburg for three and a half years. He subsequently followed his trade in Pittsburg, and while there married Josephine G. Henry, a native of the town, and to whom has been born one son, James Nelson, a plumber of Pasadena. Some time after his marriage Mr. March returned to Ohio and settled at Marysville, Union county, where he built many residences and blocks, and where he was a member of the school board. From Ohio he came to California, as heretofore stated, and has since made his influence felt in building and general affairs. He is a Republican in national politics, and is a charter member of the Alhambra Lodge, F. & A. M., a member of the Knights of Pythias, and the Eastern Star. Mr. March is connected with the Presbyterian Church, in which he has been superintendent of the Sunday-school; and he is a member of the Ohio Society.

J. E. MORGAN. Arriving in Los Angeles for the first time in 1875, Mr. Morgan found an unimportant town, contrasting strangely with the present western metropolis. Few business opportunities awaited men in those days, and, the outlook being discouraging, he went in the spring to San Diego county, where he started an apiary at Fall Brook and for nine years carried on a successful business in that line. Finally, however, disaster came, a flood almost totally destroying his entire industry, and so in 1884 he returned to Los Angeles, and secured employment with his brother, who had started the Highland water works. In 1889 he became interested in the raising of nursery stock and at the same time began to raise oranges and lemons, establishing his home in Los Angeles. The Sycamore Grove nurseries, of which he is proprietor, are located at No. 4584 Pasadena avenue. At this writing he makes a specialty of ornamental trees, shrubs, olives and greenhouse plants, and from his tract of three and one-half acres in Arroyo Seco he makes shipments of nursery stock to all parts of the state and to the east.

Tradition has it that three brothers bearing the name of Morgan crossed the ocean together from South Wales, one of whom settled in New England, another in New York and the third in Virginia. The father of J. E. Morgan was George, who was born in New Hampshire in 1798, and in youth learned the saddler's trade. For a time he lived in Oswego county, N. Y., and then in Jefferson county, the same state, where his son, J. E., was born April 20, 1833. In 1845 he took the family to Fox Lake, Dodge county, Wis., where he remained until death. His wife, Eleanor (Evans) Morgan, was born in Vermont in 1808, of Welsh descent, and died in California. They were the parents of twelve children, all of whom attained mature years. Three sons served in the Civil war. One of these, Charles E., who enlisted from Oberlin College, served as captain of his company; he died at Greenville, Miss., a few years ago. Another son, A. T., who enlisted from Wisconsin, received from Lincoln a commission as brevet-major and lieutenant-colonel, and served as provost-marshal under General Cutler. Three times he received very serious wounds and each time he was reported among the killed. His regiment was in the thickest of many battles and suffered heavy losses, entering with one thousand and one men, and numbering, when mustered out, less than one hundred. He is now a resident of Montana, where he is engaged in mining. The third soldier son, W. A., enlisted in the Fiftieth Wisconsin Infantry and served as lieutenant; he died in Los Angeles.

When the family settled in Wisconsin J. E. Morgan was twelve years of age. When twenty-one years of age, in 1854, he started out for himself, working for eight months, from four in the morning until eight in the evening, and receiving $12 per month, the largest wages paid farm hands at that time. After a year he began to break prairie, for which purpose he used four yoke of oxen. At the end of the season he sold out, having $300 in gold as remuneration for his season's labors. This was considered a splendid sum, yet, when all his privations and hardships are considered, it is doubtful if the young men of the present day could be induced to work the same length of time and the same number of hours for the same amount. A later venture was as clerk in Fox Lake for a year, after which he spent a year in Oberlin College, and then became clerk in a hardware store owned by a brother of Governor Smith of Wisconsin, where he remained seven years. For eight years he carried on a lumber business at Randolph, Wis., after which he spent two years in lumber milling in Mississippi, going back to Wisconsin, and soon afterward moving to California. While in Wisconsin, in December, 1858, he married Irene Hawley, who was born in New York state and reared in Wisconsin. They became the parents of one child who reached maturity, May, who married C. J. Burleson. Since the death of Mrs. Burleson, leaving two sons and a daughter, the latter has been taken into the home of Mr. Morgan and his wife. When a boy Mr. Morgan was reared under Whig and abolition teachings, and on the organization of the Republican party became one of its members, since which time he has always supported its men and measures.

JAMES BEGG. One of the busiest places in Ventura is the horse-shoeing establishment owned and managed by James Begg, who has the well-earned reputation of being not only the pioneer in his line in the city, but also the best and most skillful. He has a comprehensive knowledge of his trade and is no respecter of quality, each and every four-footed applicant receiving his most careful attention. The hard-worked and patient farm horse coming into town from all parts of the county retraces his steps at set of sun the better for having received painstaking treatment for his pedal extremities, while the thoroughbreds and aristocrats who occupy box stalls and wear upon their well-groomed, glossy coats the latest novelties in harness, are equally well served and provided with the most comfortable footgear. Through this reliable work Mr. Begg has come to enjoy the confidence of the people and receives their patronage.

Of sturdy Scotch ancestry, Mr. Begg was born in Scotland in 1857, a son of John and Mary (McAdam) Begg, also natives of Scotland. He was educated in that country and while still quite young prepared for future independence by learning the trade of horse-shoeing. There were seven children in the family and all benefited by the common-sense training of their parents and became useful members of society. His parents still make their home in Scotland, but have visited their son in America. In 1879 James Begg crossed the ocean and settled in Santa Barbara, Cal., where for three years he followed his trade. Removing to Ventura, he then opened the shop which he has since conducted. After coming to Ventura, in 1887, he married Annie Laurie Barnett, of this city, who died, leaving two children, Annie Laurie and Jamie Gordon. The second marriage of Mr. Begg was solemnized in 1892 and united him with Emma Dubbers, who was born in Ventura, and is an officer in the Native Daughters of the Golden West. One son, William Frederick, has blessed this union. The family have a comfortable residence on Ash street, and Mr. Begg owns other city property, including his shop. Since casting his first presidential vote for James G. Blaine he has always supported Republican measures and candidates. In religion he is a Presbyterian, while fraternally he is connected with the Odd Fellows and has passed all the chairs in the Ventura lodge.

William C. Fry

The father of Mrs. Begg, Henry Dubbers, a native of Germany, was one of the three first white settlers of Ventura, and afterward remained here until his death. Few of the pioneers were better known than he. Possessing a fine education, he could read and write five languages, and was a fluent conversationalist in each. Through his extensive travels in South America, as well as by text-book study, he gained a thorough knowledge of Spanish and an acquaintance among aristocratic old Spanish families. Frequently he transacted business and wrote letters for the Spanish residents of Ventura and also in the San Joachim valley, where he lived for some time before settling in Ventura. He is survived by his wife, two sons and two daughters, who still live in Ventura.

WILLIAM C. FRY. Although by birth and education an Englishman, so much of Mr. Fry's life has been passed in Los Angeles county that he is a thorough-going American and a typical Californian. He was born in Devonshire in 1860 and grew to manhood upon a farm, alternating work at home with attendance at school. In September, 1879, he crossed the ocean to Quebec and from there proceeded direct to California. Establishing himself in Los Angeles, with his brothers, T. Ashton and T. G. Fry, he bought twenty-three acres near what is now Eleventh and Pico streets. This land they placed under cultivation to oranges and operated for several years. During 1885 they bought twenty-three acres in what is now the Hollywood district. As the land was merely a stubble field, it was bought at a low price. In 1888 William C. began to make improvements, and in the spring of 1889 he set out an orchard of walnut trees, and a grove of orange and lemon trees. At this writing he has acquired the ownership of the entire tract of twenty-three acres, which is now one of the most beautiful and valuable homesteads in Hollywood district, its value being placed at $1,500 an acre by conservative judges. At the time he came here Hollywood had not yet sprung into existence. The surrounding country was sparsely populated. Improvements were conspicuous by their absence. In all of this work of improvement and cultivation he has borne an active part. As road overseer, which office he filled for four years, he assisted in opening and building roads in the district. During the winter months, when his ranch does not demand the constant attention of other seasons, he carries on a real-estate business in the city of Los Angeles, and he also owns mining interests in Riverside county, but as yet these have not been developed.

In 1889 Mr. Fry married Miss Anna Armstrong, who was born in England and died in Hollywood district April 9, 1895, leaving two children, Sarah Rhea and Lawrence A. Mrs. Fry was a member of the Gospel Tabernacle Church and he also is prominent in the same, having for six years officiated as a deacon, since which time he has held the office of elder. He is a firm opponent of the sale of intoxicating liquors, and believes that the saloon is the greatest enemy of our nation. By precept and by example his influence has always been thrown on the side of prohibition, which cause has always received the benefit of his support and assistance.

ION WATSON PARKS. The family represented by Mr. Parks of Pasadena is not only one of the oldest of Vermont, but has also been very honorably associated with the history of that state. Not the least successful of its members was his father, Hon. Frederick Kinsley Parks, a general merchant and influential citizen of Grand Isle, Vt., an active Mason, attaining the thirty-second degree, and the recipient of numerous honors from the hands of his fellow-citizens, including election as selectman, member of the lower house of the Vermont legislature and judge of the probate court. By his marriage to Elizabeth Russell he had four sons and two daughters, of whom one son and one daughter are deceased. Into this family was born Ion Watson Parks, at Grand Isle, Vt., July 18, 1872. When he was eight years old he accompanied the family to Wyoming, and for some years his life was spent on the frontiers of the west. On Little Goose Creek, in Johnson county, Wyo., the family took up six hundred acres of land, and there he assisted in the raising of cattle and horses and in general farm pursuits. For three years he was in the employ of the L. X. Burr Cattle Company. His mother died in the west in 1889, and his brother, Wallace, who has for some time been a resident of Helena, Mont., is at the head of an improvement company in that city.

At infrequent intervals I. W. Parks attended school, his advantages in this direction including one year in Scranton, Pa., and one and one-half years in the night school at Grand Isle, Vt., supplemented by attendance at the high school of Burlington, Vt. As he passed from boyhood into youth, having meantime acquired considerable knowledge of stock, there came to him a desire to fit himself for a veterinary surgeon, and in pursuit of this object he took a full course in the Ontario Veterinary College at Toronto, from which he was graduated in 1897. Returning to Vermont, he began to practice at Montpelier, and soon secured a growing business in his line. On the organization of the Vermont State Veterinary Association he became a charter member and was elected the first secretary, which position he continued to hold until his removal to the Pacific coast. Meantime he was interested in various measures bearing upon his chosen calling. While living in Montpelier he married Maude Carroll Fiske, who was educated in the grammar and high schools of that city. Since coming to Pasadena in November, 1900, they have purchased and now occupy the residence at No. 180 Oakland avenue.

In Pasadena, as in his former eastern home, Mr. Parks practices all branches of surgery and has become known through his thorough knowledge of successful modes of treating the diseases to which horses and other stock are subject. In addition, he devotes considerable time to taxidermy, in which art he has acquired commendable proficiency. Both the Ontario Veterinary Society and the State Veterinary Association of California number him among their members, and he is likewise identified with the Pasadena Board of Trade. Though seeking no prominence in politics, preferring to devote himself to his chosen work, he always votes at elections, casting his ballot for Republican candidates. Fraternally he is connected with Lodge No. 22, F. & A. M., and is vice-chancellor of the Knights of Pythias, Uniform Rank.

MARCUS SAMUEL PLANT. Upon removing to Pasadena in 1886, Mr. Plant devoted nine years to his trade as a carpenter, and in 1895 began to build and contract, in partnership with Mr. Dawson, under the firm name of Plant & Dawson. During the intervening years many of the finest residences and public buildings in the city have been erected under the capable management of this enterprising firm. Among other commendable undertakings may be mentioned the Macomber block, the Lincoln Avenue Methodist Episcopal Church, Mrs. Meeker's residence, and the residences of Mr. Warner, Mr. McCulloch and Mr. Evans.

A native of Wyoming county, N. Y., Mr. Plant was born September 16, 1842, and is the third of the seven children born to Ira L. and Polly M. (Lewis) Plant, natives of Connecticut, and the former born in 1817. The paternal grandfather, Isaac, was born in Connecticut, and was one of the very early settlers of Wyoming county, N. Y., whither he removed in 1823. As yet there had been no land tilled in that section of the country, and this courageous pioneer settled in the midst of dense forest, where he built himself a log hut, and proceeded to clear away the surrounding timber. In time he improved a paying farm, and reared a family of children, and continued to live upon his original place of settlement until his death, at the age of eighty-two years. Ira L. Plant was a contractor and builder in Wyoming county, N. Y., and experienced all of the difficulties incident to that occupation in those days, for he had to go into the woods and hew and prepare his timber, and had none of the appliances which make modern construction comparatively easy. In 1856 he removed to Sterling, Ill., and engaged in building up to the time of his death at the age of seventy-five years. He was a Mason and a Republican. His wife was a daughter of David Lewis, who removed from Vermont to Wyoming county, N. Y., about 1825, and spent his last years in Battle Creek, Mich. Mrs. Plant, who died in Illinois, was the mother of four sons and three daughters, the daughters being all deceased. One son, Henry C., served in Company C, Thirteenth Illinois Infantry, and is now living in Sterling, Ill.

From earliest boyhood Marcus S. Plant became familiar with the use of carpenter's tools, and before completing his education in the public schools was thus of great assistance to his father. His life was uneventful up to the time of the Civil war. In 1862 he volunteered in Company D, Seventy-fifth Illinois Infantry, and was mustered in at Dixon. During a three-years' service he participated in many important battles, including those of Stone River, Look-out Mountain, Chattanooga, Chickamauga, Dalton, Dallas, Resaca, Kennesaw Mountain, Buzzard's Roost, and Peach Tree, at which latter conflict he was wounded in the right foot and left ankle, and sent to the field hospital for recuperation. Finally he was sent back to Chattanooga, and then to Jefferson, Ind., until a furlough home enabled him to vote for Abraham Lincoln in 1864. He later rejoined his regiment and continued with it until the close of the war, when he was mustered out in Parker, Tenn., and honorably discharged in Chicago, Ill.

After the war Mr. Plant returned to Sterling and began to work at the carpenter's trade with his father, and at the end of three years learned the trade of millwright in the vicinity. In Chicago, Ill., he was employed by B. F. Gump, as traveling foreman for erecting machines in different parts of the country, and later filled a similar capacity for John T. Noye of Buffalo, N. Y. He remained with the latter concern for two years and a half, and was then employed by Stout, Mill & Temple, of Dayton, Ohio. In 1883 he located in Fall City, Neb., and engaged in building and contracting until 1886, in which year he came to Pasadena as heretofore stated.

The pleasant home of Mr. Plant is presided over by his tactful wife, formerly Charlotte H.

Barrett, who was born in Ohio, and moved to Illinois with her parents. Of this union there are three children: J. H., who is a painter in Pasadena; M. M., who resides in Stockton; and Mary S., who is living at home. Mr. Plant became a Mason in Sterling, Ill., and is now connected with the Pasadena Lodge No. 272. He is also a member of the Eastern Star. In political affiliation he is a Socialist. Mrs. Plant is a member of the Universalist Church, of the Relief Corps and the Eastern Star.

A. B. ROYAL, M. D. Ever since he came from Illinois in 1894, Dr. Royal has been recognized as one of the professional influences of Pasadena, and as one who maintains the highest tenets of his calling. Preceded by years of practical experience, he assumed the new responsibilities represented in this town with every assurance of success, and year by year has added to his store of knowledge, and to the esteem and confidence of a large following. He was born in Mazon, Grundy county, Ill., December 26, 1853, and comes of a family first represented in America by his paternal great-grandfather, who emigrated from England and settled in Pennsylvania, removing at a later day to Ohio, where his death occurred. The paternal grandfather, Charles, was born in Pennsylvania, but also removed to Ohio, locating, in 1846, near Newark, Ill. In 1852 he crossed the plains with ox-teams and wagons to Oregon, where he died.

Rev. Thomas Wesley Royal, the father of A. B., was born in Ohio, and in manhood became a farmer in Grundy county, Ill. He studied for the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal Church and preached in Illinois, Kansas, and Oregon, to which he removed in 1888, and where he died at the age of sixty-five years. He married Amanda Goodrich, who was born in New York, a daughter of Gardner Goodrich, who removed from New York to Illinois, where he lived in Du Page, Grundy and Livingston counties, and was one of the early pioneers of the state. Mrs. Royal lives in Greeley, Kans., and is the mother of three children, of whom A. B. is second. Charles lives in Los Angeles, and Ella is now Mrs. Wood of Greeley, Kans.

At the age of seventeen years A. B. Royal engaged in teaching school, and was thus employed for five years, at the same time working his way through the Academy at Morris, Ill. Having decided to adopt the medical profession for his life work he began to study under Dr. Palmer, of Morris, Ill., and in 1873 entered Rush Medical College, Chicago, Ill., from which he was graduated in the class of 1877. For the following eighteen months he practiced medicine in Mazon, Ill., and then located in Americus, Lyon county, Kans., where he remained for sixteen years. He became prominent in the development of the town of Americus, was one of its incorporators, and a member of its first board of trustees. In 1894 he removed to Pasadena, and has since engaged in a general medical and surgical practice, his office being at Washington and North Fair Oaks, and his residence at the corner of Cedar and Fair Oaks.

The first marriage of Dr. Royal was solemnized in Americus, Kans., and was with Belle Jaquith, a native of Michigan, and who died in Americus leaving one child, Harry J., of Pasadena. In North Pasadena, Dr. Royal married Mrs. Mamie (Negus) Painter, who, by her former marriage had two children, Harry J. and Ethel Painter. Dr. Royal is fraternally associated with the Ancient Order of United Workmen (of which he is examining physician), the Select Knights, the Modern Woodmen of America, the Knights of the Maccabees, the Knights and Ladies of Security, and the Foresters. He is a member of the Pasadena Medical Society, is a Republican in political affiliation, and in religion is identified with the Methodist Episcopal Church, in which he is secretary of the board of trustees.

WILLIAM M. ROGERS. Mr. Rogers of Pasadena comes from one of the old Puritan families of Newton, Mass. The genealogy is traced back to Bishop John Rogers, of Smithfield, England. Nor are his maternal ancestors less worthy of record on the pages of history, his mother, Elizabeth Blaisdel, a native of Portsmouth, being a member of a colonial family of New England; and in his possession now there is a coat-of-arms of her family that is one hundred and fifty years old.

An uncle of W. M. Rogers had a somewhat unusual history. John Rogers (such was his name) shipped from Boston as supercargo on a merchant vessel bound for Spain and, arriving at his destination, was led to explore that country. There he met an American consul, Robert Montgomery, whose daughter he later married. He then settled in Genoa, Italy, and from there moved to Naples, where he died in 1865. At one time he held the office of American consul at Naples, Italy. His thorough knowledge of the people and their customs caused him to be often sought for advice by Americans visiting in Italy, and to all the same thoughtful courtesy was extended. When his brother, Aaron, was unable, by reason of ill health, to endure the rigors of New England winters, he sent for him to come to Italy, where he assisted him in the commission business, Aaron remaining there for nine years, and then returning to his native town, Newton, Mass., where he died at sixty years of age.

In the family of Aaron Rogers there were four sons, John B., Charles F., George H. and William M. The first-named enlisted in the Fifty-seventh Massachusetts Infantry, and was killed at Petersburg, June 17, 1864. Charles F., after a lifetime of activity as a pharmacist in Newton, Mass., recently retired from business and is now acting as city assessor. George H., who is now a rancher of Riverside, Cal., and formerly a pharmacist of Waltham, Mass., enlisted in the navy in 1861 and served for three years as a hospital steward. Not less patriotic than his brothers, William M. Rogers also offered his services to the country. In 1862 he enlisted in Company B, Forty-fourth Massachusetts Infantry, and going to the front, took part in the battles of Kingston, Goldsboro and Whitehall, N. C. The following year he was mustered out at Boston, Mass., and honorably discharged. He then secured employment as salesman in a stove and tinware store, in which way he gained his early experiences in this business. For seventeen years he was with Charles King and for five years with the latter's successor, H. P. Brooks, in Hartford, Conn. On closing out his interests in the east, he came to California in 1897 and settled at Pasadena. Later he bought the property at No. 163 North Euclid avenue and tore down the house, which he replaced with a modern residence. He is connected with the Grand Army of the Republic and in political views supports Republican principles. Though now sixty years of age (having been born September 24, 1842), he retains much of the robustness of youth, and under the influence of the healthful climate of Pasadena shows little trace of the passing years.

March 30, 1865, Mr. Rogers married Miss Elizabeth S. Gorman, who was born in Springfield, Mass., being a daughter of Francis and Elizabeth (Moore) Gorman, natives respectively of Dublin, Ireland, and Westfield, Mass. The latter is now making her home with her daughter, Mrs. Rogers. On coming to the United States, Mr. Gorman secured employment with a wholesale and retail grocery, continuing in the same business during much of his life. Indeed, his connection with the firm of William Gunn & Co. did not cease until the business was sold out, thirty-eight years after he had entered the firm's employ. His death occurred in Hartford, Conn., February 4, 1896, at the home of Mr. Rogers. He had a son, Francis Gorman, Jr., who was born in Massachusetts and in 1864 was graduated from Harvard College, afterward engaging as a private tutor in Cambridge, Mass. The superiority of his work caused his services as an instructor to be in great demand, and he continued very active until his sudden death from heart disease. His sister, Mrs. Rogers, is also the possessor of splendid mental resources, and, in the various places of her residence, has borne an active part in benevolent movements. One of her leading activities in Hartford was the Children's Aid Society. While in that city she was also chosen the first president of the Robert O. Tyler Post, Women's Relief Corps, the successful inauguration of whose work was due to her wise discrimination and judicious leadership. At this writing she holds the office of president of the Women's League in the Universalist Church of Pasadena.

SMITH J. SHAFER. The record of Mr. Shafer while in the volunteer service entitles him to the praise of all men who honor courage and a chivalrous defense of principles one believes to be true. Indeed, it is as a direct result of his services that Mr. Shafer is now totally disabled and for years past has been a constant sufferer. Yet, in spite of all, he has never regretted that he offered himself to his country in her hour of need, for he is a staunch patriot and loyal citizen.

The home of Mr. Shafer is now at No. 459 North Fair Oaks avenue, Pasadena. He was born in Delaware, Ohio, May 20, 1841, and was third among eleven children, three of whom survive. His father, who was a native of Pennsylvania, became a pioneer of Knox county, Ohio, and thence removed to Delaware county, where he engaged in the manufacture of brick and shingles. His wife died in 1849 and three years later he passed away, leaving his son, Smith, an orphan eleven years of age. A cousin took the boy to his farm, and there he remained until sixteen years of age, when he was apprenticed to the cooper's trade at Huntsville. Unfortunately, just about the time he completed his trade, flour sacks came into general use, replacing flour barrels to such an extent that wages were reduced and the cooper's trade became unprofitable. He was thus obliged to learn another trade, and took up harness-making and the saddlery business.

At the opening of the war Mr. Shafer enlisted in Company E, Sixty-sixth Ohio Infantry, and was mustered in at Camp McArthur and assigned to the army of the Potomac. With his regiment he took part in various engagements. At the battle of Port Republic, Va., June 9, 1862, he was wounded five times in the breast and once in the right hand, besides which a grape shot passed through the knee of the left leg. The fortunes of the battle were against the Federal troops. All was dismay and confusion, and the wounded were not given the attention they needed. He was left five days on the battle field, during which time he had nothing to eat but a cracker. Fortunately, a canteen of water had been given him by a merciful Confederate colonel, which kept him from dying of thirst. While he lay on the ground the Confederates came around him and said they intended to shoot. Too much in pain to utter a protest or feel any indignation at their treatment of him, he merely told them to go ahead and shoot, but they soon went away. As others came on the scene, he hired them, for $5 and two rubber blankets, to carry him to a large house on the battlefield, and there a Confederate surgeon amputated his leg. After this he was taken to Lynchburg and a week later to Libby prison, where he was confined until September 11, 1862. He was then paroled and sent to Fort Delaware, and from there to Philadelphia, where he was honorably discharged December 28, 1863.

As soon as he had recovered sufficiently to seek work, Mr. Shafer was made toll gate keeper on a plank road at Delaware, Ohio, and also, for three and one-half years, engaged in the harness and saddlery business. He then removed to Clarinda, Page county, Iowa, and for many years conducted business pursuits there, first having a meat market and later a grocery. November 9, 1891, he came to California, and has since made Pasadena his home. For a time he engaged in the confectionery business here and each summer, during the season, now carries on a confectionery and fruit business at Long Beach. In politics he is an unfaltering Republican. As might be expected, he is a staunch Grand Army man and maintains a deep interest in the workings of the post. At Clarinda, Iowa, December 4, 1873, he married Miss Sarah Jane Hutchinson, who was born in Kentucky. In religion she is identified with the Methodist Episcopal Church, while socially she is connected with the Women's Relief Corps. Four children were born of their union, three of whom attained mature years, namely: Jessie, Stanley and Edna May, the latter of whom died at twenty-one years of age, just before she was to have been graduated.

RICHARD O. ROBINSON. As seasoned and brave a packet captain as ever plowed the waters between New York and Liverpool was Richard Robinson, the father of Richard O. He was born in Maine in 1817, and for years his craft carried merchandise to various ports on the coasts, and he made several trips around the Horn to San Francisco. When he permanently abandoned the high seas for more stable residence he located in California in 1872, and came to Ventura the following year, where he began farming and stock-raising and fruit growing. He was very successful in his operations and conducted them on a large scale, and at his death left an estate of between two and three thousand acres. His wife, formerly Mary Wentworth, was also born in Maine, and is now living on the old ranch in the upper Ojai valley.

The oldest son in the family, Richard O. Robinson was born in Maine July 15, 1848, and subsequently made several trips on the ocean with his father. He accompanied him to California in 1872, and settled in Ventura in 1873, and from then until the death of the father was associated with him in the fruit raising, stock and farming business. This has since been his occupation, and he has met with gratifying success in all of his undertakings, his land being under a high state of cultivation, and his crops, cattle and fruit coming up to the high standard of excellence desired by their owner. He owns altogether twenty-four hundred acres of land, of which nearly eight hundred acres are under cultivation.

In Ventura in 1877 Mr. Robinson married Ella Wentworth, and two children have been born to them: Edna, who is a graduate of the high school, and Richard O., who is attending the grammar school. Mr. Robinson is a Republican in politics. Such is the political belief of his brother, C. W., who lives at Ocean Park, and was also of his father, the hardy sea captain. In fraternal circles he is well known. He was made a Master Mason and a Knight Templar at Ventura, and is a member of the Mystic Shrine at Los Angeles. He is appreciated in the community for his many evidences of good fellowship, and for his desire to aid in the general improvement of his county.

C. E. SLOSSON. Various enterprises contributing to the progress of Monrovia have received the benefit of Mr. Slosson's co-operation. When he settled in this town in 1887, immediately after his arrival in California, he took up real estate interests and has since handled considerable realty, both vacant and improved. However, the improvement of property does not represent the limit of his activities, but he has been interested in numerous other private and public enterprises. For several years he was a stockholder and the president of the Messenger Publishing Company. He was largely instrumental in establishing the Monrovia steam laundry, of which he is still one of the principal stockholders. At this writing he conducts the only livery and sales stable in Monrovia, with a teaming and contracting outfit in connection. On the organization of the Monrovia Board of Trade he became a charter member and is now its secretary, through which position he has been enabled to promote local commercial activities.

The Slosson family was identified with New York state for several generations. From there Abner Slosson removed in 1867 to Iowa, where he remained until death, meantime improving a valuable farm. Previous to his arrival, his son John had settled in Iowa, buying a tract of raw land near Northwood and afterward giving his attention to its cultivation. The farm on which much of his life was passed consisted of six hundred and forty acres and was purchased by him in 1871, remaining his home from that time until his death. On the farm in Iowa where he was born, September 25, 1861, C. E. Slosson passed the years of youth, meantime attending the common and high schools of Northwood. Farming engaged his attention during vacations, and on leaving school he gave his whole time and thought to agriculture. A little later he became interested in a creamery business near Northwood. He has always been a firm upholder of Republican principles, which he believes best calculated to promote our national welfare. For three terms he served as a member of the central Republican committee of Los Angeles county, and during two of these terms he was also a member of its executive committee. For three terms he served as city clerk of Monrovia and for two terms as town trustee.

After coming to Monrovia Mr. Slosson married Anna MacCulloch, who was born in Pennsylvania and passed the years of childhood there, later coming to California to visit her brother and sister. Her parents were William and Christine MacCulloch, the former of whom, a native of Scotland, died in Michigan while on his way to California. Mr. and Mrs. Slosson have one daughter, Arline.

SILAS TOMS, proprietor of the Enterprise Nurseries, was born in Gambier, Knox county, Ohio, September 4, 1857, and is a son of George and Sarah (Wallace) Toms, and grandson of William Toms. George Toms was born in London, England, and came to America with his father, William, with whom he settled on a farm in Knox county, Ohio. William returned to London and died there, but his son continued to live in Ohio, where he married, and engaged in building and contracting. With the first call for three-year men during the Civil war he enlisted in Company C, Thirty-second Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and died at Cheat Mountain, Va. In his young manhood he married Sarah Wallace, a native of Brighton, England, and daughter of Sir Richard Wallace, who, with his brother, Sir Arthur Wallace, was a co-heir to forty million dollars. Sir Richard came to America and settled in Gambier, Knox county, Ohio, where he engaged in contracting on an extensive scale, intending to return to England at no distant day. So well was he pleased with his new surroundings that he continued to tarry even after the news of his brother's death reached America, and he himself soon after sickened and died. Since then the property has remained undisturbed in England. Five sons and two daughters were born to George and Sarah Toms, of whom four sons and one daughter are now living, namely: George W., a resident of Pasadena; C. R., a contractor and mason; Henry, a veterinary surgeon at Mount Vernon, Ohio; Silas, and Mrs. Elizabeth Cummings, of Pasadena.

After attending the public schools at Gambier, Ohio, Silas Toms found employment at Kenyon College as superintendent of men, and while there learned floriculture and landscape gardening. In 1882 he located in Pasadena and was employed by B. O. Clark, now of Honolulu, and contracted with him and the park nurserymen of which Mr. Clark was president. During the World's Fair at Chicago, he boxed all of the trees and plants exhibited from the Park Nurseries, and the same year started the enterprise with which he is connected at the corner of Kirkwood and Pepper streets. He owns another nursery on Jefferson and Summit streets, which contains ten thousand trees. He is the second oldest nurseryman in the city, and handles more nursery stock than any one other person here. In his houses are all manner of trees, both ornamental and useful, and in the matter of roses and ferns and standard flowers he has few superiors. He ships by the car load, and contracts for the setting out of hundreds of acres of orange and lemon trees, as well as acres of grape vines. His greenhouses are constructed after the most approved designs, and his property is one of the show places of Pasadena.

The first marriage of Mr. Toms was contracted in Ohio with Hattie Ayers, who died in Pasadena, leaving five children: Maude, who is the wife of Charles Canfield, of Pasadena; Clarence, who is a gardener of this city; Mamie, at home; Lewis, who is the partner of his father; and Jennie, at home. The present Mrs. Toms was formerly Elizabeth Neill, of Cambridge, Mass. Mr. Toms is fraternally identified with the Ancient Order of United Workmen and the Modern Woodmen of America. He is a member of the Nurserymen and Florists' Association of Southern California, and in political affiliation is a Democrat. Mrs. Toms was a member of the Baptist church at Old Cambridge, Mass. Being a lover of plants and flowers, she has added much to his business as well as domestic life. Mr. Toms is well known throughout the whole of Southern California, and is one of the most skilled of those who devote their lives to this interesting and ever expanding occupation.

WILLIAM SHIBLEY. In Rensselaer county, N. Y., William Shibley was born, January 4, 1836, being a son of Jeremiah and Lydia (Brockway) Shibley, natives of New York. The father, during active years, followed agricultural pursuits, and on retiring settled in Brooklyn, N. Y., where he died in September, 1866, aged seventy-one years. The homestead, which he had sold in 1854, contained two hundred and fifty-one and one-half acres. Of his nine children all but one attained mature years, William being the seventh in order of birth. Besides public school advantages, he was privileged to attend the academy two terms, and afterward tilled the soil of the home farm for two years.

Going to Illinois in 1856, he was employed as clerk and bookkeeper for his brother in a general mercantile store and paper manufacturing business. At the opening of the Civil war he relinquished business pursuits in order to assist in defending the country, his name being enrolled as a member of Company D, United States Engineers, in which he was serving as non-commissioned sergeant at the time of discharge, December 18, 1864. The entire period of his service was with the army of the Potomac. He assisted in building the bridges at Fredericksburg, Petersburg and Bull Run, besides numerous others less important.

After the expiration of his army service Mr. Shibley took up business pursuits in Illinois, and from 1866 until 1887 was interested in buying stock and grain at Rockton. During the latter year he returned to New York and settled at Cohoes, where he became manager of his sister's interest in a knitting mill, owned by his sister, Mrs. Sarah M. Root. In 1890 it was disposed of and Mr. Shibley removed to California in 1891 with his sister. The latter was born in New York and is the widow of S. G. Root, who owned large and valuable manufacturing interests. The residence occupied by Mr. Shibley and his sister is the property of Mrs. Root and stands at No. 510 Marengo avenue.

While in Illinois Mr. Shibley married Miss Mary J. Osgood, who died at Rockton, that state, in 1861. One daughter was born of this union, namely: Elizabeth, who makes her home in Illinois. He later married Miss Delilah White, who died in 1885; they had one child, Mary, who resides with her father and aunt in Pasadena. Interested in Masonry, Mr. Shibley has passed various of the degrees of the same and is connected with the commandery and consistory. His service in the war is borne in mind through his connection with the Grand Army of the Republic. Tenacious in his principles, he holds firmly to the doctrines of the Republican party, which he has supported from youth. He is a patriot from principle, and favors any measure for the benefit of the commonwealth and nation.

EDGAR FREMONT LANCASTER. While many others engaged in a similar occupation have come and gone in Pasadena, Edgar Fremont Lancaster has continued his reliable and conservative grocery business, and is at the present time the second oldest purveyor in the town, and one of the most extensive and successful. His youth was spent in Corydon, Wayne county, Iowa, where he was born October 18, 1858, and where he was educated in the public schools. The family were first represented in Iowa by the paternal grandfather, Bartlett, who was born in Virginia, farmed in Kentucky, and spent his last days in Wayne county, Iowa. He was a soldier in the war of 1812, and was of English descent.

J. W. Lancaster, the father of Edgar Fremont, was born in Frankfort, Ky., and was a wagon-maker by trade, having served his apprenticeship in Cincinnati. In 1850 he settled in the neighborhood of Des Moines, Iowa, where he took up a claim, but later removed to new land in Dallas county, still later locating near Corydon, Wayne county. There he farmed and engaged in wagon and carriage making until 1889; during which year he disposed of his Wayne county interests and retired to Pasadena, where he is now living at the age of seventy-six years. He married Louisa Parr, a native of Indiana, and daughter of Rev. Morgan Parr, born in Indiana. Rev. Parr was the first minister of the Christian Church to preach in Wayne county, Iowa, and he was thus employed up to the time of his death at the age of seventy-one years. Mrs. Louisa Lancaster died in Pasadena, in January, 1902, at seventy-four years of age. She was the mother of six sons and two daughters, of whom one son and two daughters are deceased. The children are all living on the coast, Edgar F. being third in order of birth. Thomas M. is in the employ of his brother, Edgar; J. N. is a builder and contractor; John Lincoln is a merchant in the state of Washington; William died in Pasadena; H. A. is in Chaparral, Yavapai county, Ariz., and Ella is deceased.

While yet quite young Edgar Fremont Lancaster worked in his father's carriage shop, and when he arrived at eighteen years of age removed with his family to Missouri, where he engaged in the restaurant business. Returning to Corydon, Iowa, he lived on a farm for a year, and came to Pasadena in 1887, working temporarily at the carpenter's trade. He soon after bought a restaurant, called it the Omaha Waffle House, and conducted it until 1891. The same year he found employment in the grocery store of Chubb & Billings, and at the end of six months bought out the Tory & Hagadorn grocery business across from where he is now located. In December of 1900 he located in the Strong building, on the corner of Colorado street and Marengo avenue, and has since carried a full line of groceries, besides general produce, feed and flour. Two delivery wagons are required for his business, and he has the steady patronage of many of the finest families in town. In the meantime he has won a reputation for progressiveness and fair dealing, and is accounted one of the most reliable business men in Pasadena.

In Corydon, Iowa, Mr. Lancaster married Maggie Booth, a native of Corydon, and of this union there are four children, Marie, William, Irene and Paul. Mr. Lancaster is a Republican in politics, and is fraternally associated with the Foresters and the Modern Woodmen of America. He is a member of the Board of Trade and the Pasadena Grocers' Union. He is a member of and worker in the Baptist church, and is chairman of the board of trustees.

WILLET BARKER HAZARD. One of the most successful and popular of the hotel men of Pasadena is Willet Barker Hazard, the genial proprietor of the Whittier, a modern and finely equipped house, advantageously located at No. 165 South Marengo avenue. The present commodious structure was erected in 1899, as the successor of the old Whittier, established by Mr. Hazard in 1895, at No. 99 South Marengo. The lot has a frontage of sixty-six feet, and the building is 66x34 feet floor dimensions, and three stories in height.

Previous to entering the ranks of public dispensers of hospitality, Mr. Hazard had a varied business experience in different parts of the east, and for fifteen years tilled the soil and gathered the harvests on a typical Canadian farm. In fact his first impressions of life and work were gathered on the paternal farm in Prince Edward county, Canada, where he was born January 3, 1830, and which had been settled by his father, Joseph, in the early pioneer days. The elder Hazard was a member of the Society of Friends, and removed from his native Orange county, N. Y., to the forest region on the bay of Quinte, Prince Edward county, Canada, seven miles from Picton. He owned four hundred acres of land upon which he spent his middle and latter life, and where he reared a family of ten children, of whom Willet Barker is the second youngest. His wife was formerly Martha Barker, a native of Ontario, and daughter of Edward Barker, one of the pioneer settlers near the bay of Quinte. Mr. Barker was well known around the bay, not only as a farmer, but as a ferryman who piloted people in safety across the bay. He also was a Quaker, and a man of simple, unostentatious manner of living.

For those early days in Canada Mr. Hazard received a common school education, supplemented by attendance at the Bloomfield Academy, a boarding school. In 1853 he started out on his own responsibility, and in King township, York county, Canada, bought and improved a farm upon which he lived for fifteen years. In 1870 he located in Buffalo, N. Y., and engaged in the wholesale and retail lumber business under the firm name of C. P. Hazard & Brother. The firm were very successful, purchasing their commodities by the cargo, and re-shipping the same to New York City, Pennsylvania and New Jersey. The lumber business was disposed of entirely in 1894, as was also the building enterprises which the Hazards had maintained in connection therewith, and the same year Mr. Hazard removed to Pasadena, drawn hither by the climatic and general inducements. The following year he bought the Whittier, as heretofore stated, and has since been one of the prominent hotel managers of this town.

In his native county in Canada Mr. Hazard married Susan E. Noxon, a native of Canada, of which union there have been born five children, viz.: Mary A., who is now Mrs. Eugene Robinson, of New York state; Lydia E., who is the wife of Mr. Leon Deutch, of Buffalo, N. Y.; Eleanor; Carrie M., and Stevenson who died at the age of nine years. As were his ancestors for many years, Mr. Hazard is a member of the Society of Friends, and is one of the official board of the church. In politics he is a Republican, but has never entered the arena of political agitation.

L. C. TURNER. In the office of street superintendent of Pasadena, to which he was elected in 1901, Mr. Turner has displayed an energy of disposition and sagacity of judgment that are appreciated by all public-spirited citizens, desirous of the promotion of the city's welfare. A noticeable improvement has marked the condition of the streets under his supervision. With an eye keen to discern any needed change, he combines an enterprise and energy in the bringing about of the requisite transformation. Since 1890 he has made his home in Pasadena, where he resides at No. 404 Cypress street, and in addition to this place owns several other lots. Some years ago he built a storage barn on Champlain street. His principal occupation has been that of contracting for street grading, and most of the streets here have been built under contract by him. Another enterprise due to his energy was the building of the ditch from Rubio Canon to Eaton Canon.

Walworth, N. Y., is Mr. Turner's native place, and August 23, 1846, the date of his birth. His father, Silas, also a New Yorker by birth, became a stonemason and contractor and helped to build the first brick building in Rochester, N. Y. Besides this occupation, he had charge of a farm that he owned. After eighty-three useful years he passed away in Walworth. By his marriage to Margaret Caldwell, a native of New York, he had four children, namely: Lewis, of Grand Rapids, Mich.; Lucy, wife of W. W. Tuttle, of New York; Edison, a pioneer of Pasadena and at one time a councilman, but who was killed by accident about 1887; and Lucian C., of this sketch.

On the completion of a course of study in Hiram (Ohio) College, of which James A. Garfield was then the principal, L. C. Turner turned his attention to farming, and later was engaged in the meat business for ten years. During 1864 he enlisted in Company H, One Hundred and

A. E. Vesper.

Fiftieth Ohio National Guard, and served for five months in the Union army, after which he was mustered out at Cleveland, and then took up farm work in Ohio. In that state he remained until his removal to California in 1890, and while residing there he married Miss Dora Ethridge, who was born in Auburn, Ohio, and died in Pasadena, Cal., in 1899, leaving three sons, Frank E., Ralph H. and Roy N. She was a daughter of Nathan Ethridge, who was born in Rochester, N. Y., and engaged in building and contracting in Ohio, where he died. Though not a partisan, Mr. Turner is a warm and pronounced Republican and unswervingly upholds party principles. The Grand Army of the Republic and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows have his name enrolled among their members, and in matters of religious faith he is affiliated with the Christian Church.

A. E. VESPER. As manager and proprietor of the largest plumbing concern in Pasadena, A. E. Vesper has been connected with the finest work in this line in the city and county, and undoubtedly has as thorough an understanding of sanitary plumbing as any man on the coast. He has also made a study of heating apparatus, and in this connection has patented and is manufacturing one of the most reliable and practical gas machines on the market. So great is the demand for his superior workmanship that he employs twenty-five men during five or six months of the year. He has placed the plumbing and heating in the Union Savings Bank building, La Pintoresca Hotel, Pasadena Hospital, the Stanton residence on Grace Hill, the Cudahy residence, and innumerable other buildings and private residences. At present he is the contracting plumber for possibly the largest job ever handed to any one individual in the state, viz.: the plumbing for the Potter Hotel, on Burton Mound, Santa Barbara. This hotel alone is to have eight hundred and eighty stationary fixtures in it, and is to be the largest, most complete and most sumptuous hotel in California.

Mr. Vesper is a native of Beaver Dam, Wis., where he was born January 17, 1860, a son of Artemas and Sarah A. (Caldwell) Vesper, natives respectively of Vermont and Pennsylvania, and the latter a daughter of Samuel Caldwell, a farmer of Pennsylvania. The paternal grandfather, George Lincoln Vesper, was born in England and settled in Vermont, later removing to Wisconsin, of which state he was a pioneer. Artemas Vesper had a large stock farm near Rolling Prairie station, Wis., and became known all over southern Wisconsin, Iowa, Minnesota, and Nebraska, as a successful and enterprising stockman. He also raised and dealt in Percheron, Norman and English coach horses, besides all manner of high grade cattle. He was prominent in the state of Wisconsin in a general way, and was a member of the board of supervisors of Dodge county, elected there to by the Republican contingent, to which he ever acknowledged unswerving allegiance. He was active in the Agriculture Association, and was a member of the United Brethren Church. He died at the age of sixty-seven years, while his wife died when fifty-six years of age. They were the parents of four children, of whom A. E. Vesper is second; Minnie G. is now Mrs. A. H. Cady of Burnett Junction, Dodge county, Wis.; Charles R. is connected with the Chicago & Northwestern Railroad; and Harry L. is living on the old homestead in Dodge county.

Mr. Vesper was reared on the paternal farm in Wisconsin, and was educated in the public schools and Marshall (Wis.) Academy. From earliest youth he displayed marked ingenuity for all things mechanical, and his first independent business venture was as a clerk in a hardware store. Of his father he had learned all about stock dealing in boyhood, and after leaving the clerkship he became active in buying and selling cattle and horses from Appleton to Green Bay, Wis. After a time he removed to Milwaukee and clerked in the Union stock yards for a year, still later engaging as a telegraph operator for the northern division of the St. Paul Railroad. He was for a time an operator for the Chicago & Northwestern Railroad, in Minnesota and Dakota, and for two years and a half was operator and agent for the South Dakota Division of the Winona & St. Peter Division. In 1886 he located in Pasadena as trimmer and plumber, in the employ of the Stephens Hardware Company, and under them learned the plumber's trade. When this firm sold their mechanical department to Whiteson & Co., he still continued with them for two more years in the same capacity. In 1890 he bought a third interest in the concern, and in 1896 sold his interest and started the plumbing business of A. E. Vesper, now located at No. 37 West Colorado street.

In Pasadena Mr. Vesper married Sadie A. Gockley, born in Chicago, Ill. They have one son, Howard G., born June 13, 1902. Mr. Vesper is associated with Pasadena Lodge No. 272, F. & A. M., and the Knights of the Maccabees. He is a charter member of the Merchants' Protective Association, and was one of the organizers of the Pasadena branch of the Master Plumbers' Association of California, of which he is president. He has been a member of the state executive board of the Master Plumbers' Association of California for the past six years. As one of the earliest members of the State Association of Plumbers he has been active in forming local branches all over the state, and served as president of the state association for one year. Politically he is a Prohibitionist, and fearlessly works for the cause of temperance.

JOHN D. GAYLORD. The talents which Mr. Gaylord evinced as an educator brought him prominence in the realm of pedagogy and, until his retirement from the profession, he ranked among the leading teachers in New England. He was born in Ashford, Windham county, Conn., December 24, 1839, being a son of Horace and Mary (Davis) Gaylord, natives respectively of Connecticut and Rhode Island. The paternal grandfather, Luther Gaylord, devoted his entire active life to the manufacturing of harness and trunks in Connecticut; and the other grandfather, Major John Davis, engaged in the hotel business during all of his active life, with the exception of the years of his service as an officer in the Revolutionary war, and during the latter part of his life he lived in retirement at Ashford, Conn.

While agriculture formed the principal occupation of Horace Gaylord, his attention was by no means confined to the details of farm work, but embraced a comprehensive knowledge of public affairs and national issues. Among the offices he held were those of selectman and probate judge. He lived to be seventy-five years of age. Being a thorough believer in the advantages of a good education, he endeavored to prepare his sons for responsible and honored positions in life, and the success they attained cheered and rendered happy his old age. Three, William L., Samuel D. and Charles H., became earnest ministers of the gospel; Horace A. and John D., entered the educational field as did all their brothers with the exception of Charles H. The oldest, James G., died during the Civil war while he was confined in a southern prison; and the youngest, Edward E., followed the profession of a physician.

The sixth among the sons was John D. Gaylord, who after graduating from the Ashford Academy served as its principal for six years. A later position was that of principal of the Brooklyn (Conn.) high school, after which he was similarly engaged at Union, Conn., and Mansfield, Conn. Returning from the latter town to his former home in Ashford, he continued teaching, but at the same time had charge of the old homestead of one hundred and fifty acres. In 1870 he settled in Clinton, Conn., thence removed to Cambridge, Mass., and afterward lived for three years at Welleslev, same state. On coming to California in 1892, he established his home in Pasadena and bought an acre of land here, remodeling the residence at No. 146 Terrace Drive, which has since been his home.

Like all of the members of his family Mr. Gaylord is intensely patriotic. The Civil war broke out when he was a young man, just entering upon life's active duties. Inspired by a desire to serve his country, in 1862 he enlisted in Company D, Twenty-first Connecticut Infantry, and accompanied his regiment to the front, where, in the office of sergeant, he took part in many of the important engagements fought by the army of the Potomac. Among these was the engagement at Fredericksburg. At the expiration of his term of service, in 1864, he was mustered out at Hartford, Conn., and returned to his home. Since the organization of the Grand Army of the Republic he has been interested in its workings and has been commander of John F. Godfrey Post. All of his life he has believed in Republican principles, and these he has supported by his ballot and influence. In religion he is of the liberal faith.

In Connecticut Mr. Gaylord married Miss Sarah Kendall, who was born in Ashford, Conn., descended from the founders of the Ashford colony. Her father, Mason S. Kendall, spent his entire life at Ashford engaged in farming pursuits, and died there in 1890, aged eighty-three years. The children of Mr. and Mrs. Gaylord have received exceptionally fine educational advantages and are already gaining positions of assured influence in the various fields of activity they have entered. The oldest son, Wallace K., is professor of chemistry in the Throop Polytechnic Institute, while Harry D. is an instructor in wood carving in the art department of the same institution. Horace A. follows the dental profession in Pasadena, and James M. is an electrical engineer of this city. The two youngest, John Clarence and Ruth L., are students in the Polytechnic Institute.

WILLIAM T. CLAPP. As early as 1873 Mr. Clapp came to California, where a year later he took an active part in organizing the Indiana colony, later known as the San Gabriel Orange Growers' Association. January 27, 1874, the twenty-seven incorporators of the company met for the selection of their individual homesteads. Four thousand acres of the San Pascual rancho had been purchased for $25,000, and this tract was divided among the home-seekers. Such was the diversity of soil, location and topography that each of the twenty-seven stockholders secured his chosen homestead, without interfering with that of his neighbor. Water was brought to fifteen hundred acres and suitably apportioned among the members. Out of the land thus secured has been evolved the now beautiful city of Pasadena, which Dr. Elliott so named from an Algonquin word meaning "Crown of the Valley." The first schoolhouse and the first church were built on land owned by Mr. Clapp, and the first school was taught by his daughter, Jennie H.

Theo G. Schmidt

in their own home. The land which he acquired consisted of sixty acres extending from Arroyo Seco to Fair Oaks avenue, being mapped out as Division E, and he has since retained a portion of the same property, having his residence at No. 625 South Orange Grove avenue. One of the noteworthy facts about the colony was that it was founded on temperance principles, and has remained a prohibition city to the present day.

The ancestors of Mr. Clapp lived in Massachusetts. His grandfather, Charles Clapp, a native of Northampton, Mass., engaged in the manufacture of hats during his active life and died in his native town at ninety-three years of age. The maternal grandfather, Simon Huntington, was a farmer in Hinsdale, Mass., where he died at seventy-five years of age. The father, Levi Clapp, was born in Worthington, Mass., in 1796, and learned the hat-manufacturing business in the manner then in vogue, and he afterward carried on a gents' furnishing business at Worcester, Mass., where he died at sixty years of age. He had married Sarah Huntington, a native of Hinsdale, Mass., and they were the parents of three sons, namely: Lewis H.; A. Huntington, who was officiating as secretary of the Home Missionary Board of the Congregational denomination at the time of his death, in New York City, in 1900; and William T., who was born in Worthington, Hampshire county, Mass., January 17, 1821. The last-named received his education in public schools and academies. At an early age he learned the tanning business and from 1845 to 1868 he owned and operated a tannery in Massachusetts; for a time, indeed, he had two plants in active operation. Crossing the continent to California he traveled for several years, then returned east, and in 1873 again came to the Pacific coast. With him came his three children, Frederick Arthur, Jennie Huntington and William Billings, of whom the daughter is now the wife of Rev. F. J. Culver, a Congregational minister residing in Pasadena. His first wife, the mother of these children, was Miss Ophelia Billings, a native of South Deerfield, Mass. After coming to Pasadena he married Mrs. R. E. Burnham, who was born in London, England, and accompanied her parents to America, settling in New York. By her marriage to Mr. Burnham she had two sons, Fred R. and Howard, the latter being a mining engineer in the gold fields of Johannesburg, Africa, while the former has a wide reputation for his work as an explorer into the unknown wilds of Africa as well as his success in the field of mining engineering.

During the existence of the Whig party Mr. Clapp favored its principles and since its disintegration he has voted with the Republicans. In religion he is a Congregationalist, while fraternally he is a Knight Templar Mason of the thirty-second degree.

THEODORE E. SCHMIDT. A singularly appropriate analogy between the past and present is suggested by the fact that Mr. Schmidt is spending his well-earned retirement in Anaheim, for in the very early days of the city's immaturity he was a prophet of wise foresight, and even suggested the name, which, translated from the German means, "the home of Ana." As his name implies, Mr. Schmidt is of German ancestry. In his native town of Bielefeldt he was educated in the public schools, and at a comparatively early age embarked in the dry-goods business. This business experience was supplemented by extensive travel in different parts of Europe, principally in France and Spain, after which he enlisted in the German army as a private in the Fifteenth Infantry of fusileers, and for meritorious service was advanced to the grade of lieutenant. After an honorable discharge he came to America in 1848. In the latter part of the same year he started out to cross Texas and Mexico, and at Mazatlan boarded a French sailing vessel which eventually anchored at San Francisco, the entire journey having consumed about seven months. As a means of livelihood he went to work in a brickyard, and afterwards became the proprietor of a bakery establishment which he conducted for two years. Later he engaged in the dry goods business. Meantime he became one of the chief promoters of the Los Angeles Vineyard Company, of which he was the first president and leading director. The company bought the tract of land upon which Anaheim is built, and as before stated, the name of the embryo town was the suggestion of Mr. Schmidt. Two years after the purchase of the land, in 1857, he located here and engaged in horticulture upon forty acres of land, and continued with fair success until 1871. A desire to visit the land of his birth was the natural outgrowth of his success, and he therefore spent about a year in Westphalia, and upon returning to New York was accompanied by his brother. In New York City he started a wholesale wine business, his chief object being the marketing of the Anaheim wines, but his stock also included other brands. From a comparatively modest beginning at the foot of Broadway, on Bowling Green, he was obliged with the increase of trade to remove to more commodious quarters on Warren street, where, under the firm name of the James M. Bell & Co., he managed a thoroughly successful venture for many years.

In 1893 Mr. Schmidt disposed of his New York wine interests and removed to Vineland, N. J., where he purchased fifty-two acres of land and engaged in horticulture. This property is still in his possession, although in 1899 he returned to California, and has since enjoyed a respite from business cares.

W. P. BARNES. The earliest recollections of Mr. Barnes are associated with the county of Los Angeles, where he now resides; for, although not a Californian by birth, he was brought to the state at two years of age and has witnessed its subsequent growth and development. During 1868 his parents settled at Azusa, being the ninth family in the valley, and here he has since made his home, having at this writing the only real-estate office in the town. Thoroughly familiar with local values, and possessing indomitable perseverance and patience, he is well adapted for the work in which he is engaged and merits a large degree of success.

In Tarrant county, Tex., Mr. Barnes was born October 25, 1857, being a son of Larkin and Elizabeth (Bohannon) Barnes, natives respectively of Kentucky and Alabama. His father removed to Missouri and there met and married Miss Bohannon, who accompanied him to Texas in 1847. Securing a tract of fifteen hundred acres, he became extensively engaged in the raising of cattle, but, not being entirely satisfied with the location, he determined to seek a home on the Pacific coast. Accompanied by his family, in 1859 he came to California and settled at El Monte, where he bought a ranch of forty acres and another somewhat larger in size. From El Monte in 1868 he moved to Azusa, where he bought one hundred and sixty acres and assisted in developing water. In order to secure irrigation facilities he built a ditch from San Gabriel Canon, which supplies all of the water now used in Azusa. He died in 1884.

After having completed the studies of the common schools W. P. Barnes was for some years connected with his father in the latter's horticultural undertakings, and also farmed independently for a time. The oncoming of the boom caused him to devote himself exclusively to the buying and selling of real-estate, and during those days of high prices and large demand for property he negotiated many important sales, representing thousands of dollars. His advice was constantly sought in matters pertaining to property values, and strangers in this section soon learned that his judgment was to be relied upon. One of his important transactions was the sale of the Haines tract of one hundred and sixty acres, which brought the seller $46,000. With the cessation of the boom there were naturally many dull days for the real-estate agent, but more recently the rise in values indicates that the era of steady prosperity has commenced and permanent growth and progress is now assured.

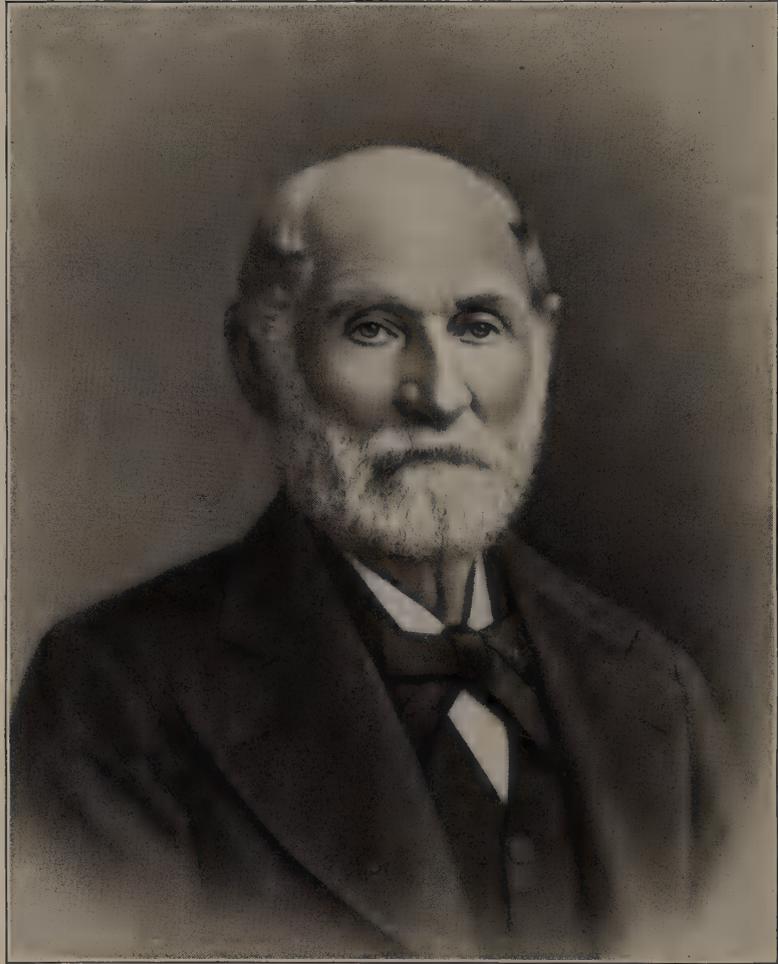

In Los Angeles occurred the marriage of

Mr. Barnes to Miss Blanche Hudson, who was born in Texas and died in California, leaving an only child, Irene. Mrs. Barnes was a daughter of T. H. Hudson, a southerner, who came to California in 1881 and for a time resided in Orange county, thence removing to Azusa, where he has since acquired various farming interests.

Fraternally Mr. Barnes is connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. An adherent of the Jacksonian Democracy, he is a worker in his party's behalf and at this writing occupies a position on the county central committee. Besides his home interests, he has outside matters claiming attention, among them being the ownership of two miles in Death Valley and one at Searchlight, Nev., the latter having gold and silver ore in paying quantities, while the former contains valuable deposits of lead and antimony respectively.

WILLIAM SPROUL. Now engaged in the livery and transfer business in Santa Barbara, and known as one of the successful business men of the town, Mr. Sproul was born in Allegheny county, Pa., April 7, 1839, and comes of an old Pennsylvania family. In the same state also occurred the birth of his father, Nathaniel, a blacksmith, who in 1854 removed to near Viola, Mercer county, Ill., where he engaged in farming and where he died in 1899 at the age of eighty years. The mother, Jane (McGinnis) Sproul, was also a native of Pennsylvania, and died in Illinois. She was of Scotch descent and was the mother of seven daughters and three sons, of whom six are living, William being third. One son, John, is now a resident of Los Angeles, Cal.

The education of Mr. Sproul was acquired in the public schools of Pennsylvania, and at the winter schools in Mercer county, Ill. In 1859 he started across the plains with four horses and three companions, going along the Platte river, with Pike's Peak as their destination. On the way, however, they met some returning "Peekers" with doleful stories of misplaced confidence and unrealized dreams, and these discouraging reports caused the travelers to proceed to California. At Ash Hollow they changed their horses for two yoke of oxen and one cow, and crossed to Wyoming, Sweetwater and Humboldt, and finally brought up at Chippee Flat, Nevada, in August of 1859. For a time Mr. Sproul engaged in horticulture near Marysville, and then turned his attention to lumbering, finally starting to raise hogs with considerable success. Eventually, the brown cinnamon bear was his undoing as far as hogs were concerned, and in the fall of 1860 he removed to Los Angeles and engaged in teaming. From 1863 until 1868 he was a stage driver on the overland route between Los Angeles and

Samuel Heiss

Santa Barbara, after which he teamed and conducted a transfer business in Santa Barbara. June 15, 1868, he started the first truck wagon in the city, and from then on gradually increased his business until he had four wagons in use. The present livery business is the outgrowth of this first enterprise, and in connection therewith is conducted a general transfer business. In 1888 Mr. Sproul built his livery and transfer barn at No. 516 Anacapa street, which is 40x112 feet in dimensions. He has been very successful in his business, and has a large patronage from the town and surrounding country. Other interests have also commanded his attention. At one time he built a soap factory, but this was sold after having been operated at a loss for two years. He is a Republican in politics, as are also his sons. Formerly he was a Knight of Pythias.

The marriage of Mr. Sproul and Clara Balenzuela, a native of Santa Clara, Cal., occurred in Santa Barbara. Mrs. Sproul comes of an old Spanish family, and is the mother of the following-named children: Addie, who is Mrs. Prince, of Los Angeles; William, who is with his father in the livery business; Myra, at home; Alfred, who is with the Southern Pacific Railroad Company; Walter, also with his father in the livery business; Alvin, who is with the Southern Pacific Railroad; Harry, who is with his father in business; and Carl.

SAMUEL HILL. That adverse conditions build up the strong is a truism emphasized in the life of Samuel Hill, one of the large land owners and successful ranchers of Ventura county. A native of Lancashire, he was born March 21, 1815, a son of Samuel and Sarah Hill, who spent their entire lives in England, and who died at the ages respectively of sixty and forty years. Their son received his education in the public schools of his native land, and in time prepared himself for the future by learning the trade of miller, for which he served as an apprentice for four years. In 1835, when nineteen years of age, he immigrated to the United States, landing at Quebec, Canada, where he lived for a year and a half. He then located at Dubuque, Iowa, and practiced his trade for about seven years, and after a short sojourn in England returned to America in the days of California gold. Animated by the same desire which caused thousands to endure the hardships and dangers of crossing the plains, he gathered together sixteen men, whom he agreed to pilot to the gold fields, with the understanding that they were to work for him for a year after being safely conducted thither without present expense to them. The journey was undertaken with horse teams and without particular incident, and at the end Mr. Hill found himself enriched by experience, but sadly in arrears as to work expected from his companions in travel, who separated in their respective paths, and were never more heard from.

The first year in California Mr. Hill wandered around taking inventory of the prospects for the future, mining and prospecting. At Spring Hill, the famous quartz mine, named for Mr. Hill and a spring found on the premises, he and P. Y. Coal operated the mine, and also carried a small stock of miners' supplies. After losing all they had in the world, Mr. Hill decided to forswear mining forever, and so located in Amador county, where for sixteen years he engaged in ranching with considerable success. So impressed had he become with the excellent money making chances in California, that in 1876 he bought his present place of six thousand and five hundred acres in the Conejo valley, twenty-five miles east of Ventura. In partnership with a Mr. Edwards he went into the sheep business, a hazardous venture, and by the next year, owing to long continued drought, he had barely eight hundred left out of the original nine thousand sheep. As recompense for the loss he gave up sixteen hundred acres of land, and at the present time has fifty-six hundred acres left.

After years of arduous labor Mr. Hill has to show for his pains one of the finest ranches in Southern California, and where once was an arid desert, are now fields covered with barley, wheat, and beans. Two thousand acres are under cultivation, and as a portion of the land is rented out there is a regular village of barns and cottages for the tenantry. The water supply is one of the best in Ventura county, an inexhaustible supply being piped from the mountains two miles distant, which is used for all purposes, and furnishes sufficient to maintain at least three hundred head of cattle. The home of Mr. Hill is modern in construction, and convenient as to arrangement, water being supplied to every portion of it by a two hundred and seventy-five foot pressure. It has also a gas machine and telephone, the whole constituting one of the truly delightful California homes.

February 28, 1870, Mr. Hill married Mrs. Sarah Middleton, widow of Thomas Middleton, who died in 1864. Mrs. Hill is a native of County Durham, England, and a daughter of George and Margaret (Grant) Cooper, both born in England. By her former marriage Mrs. Hill had five children: Thomas and Anthony, who are living at Redlands; Margaret, who is the wife of George Worts, of Vacaville, Cal.; Sarah L., the wife of William Ratsler, of Beaumont, and Elizabeth, who is the wife of Joseph Howard, of Congress, Ariz. In national politics Mr. Hill is a Democrat, but has never devoted more time to politics than is expected of all loyal citizens. With his wife he is a member of the Episcopal Church, and contributes generously towards its maintenance.

JAMES BARKER. The deserved reward of a well-spent life is an honored retirement from business, in which to enjoy the fruits of former toil. After a useful and beneficial career, Mr. Barker is quietly living at his pleasant home in Pasadena, surrounded by the comforts which earnest labor has brought to him. His residence in California dates from the 10th of October, 1885, just fifty-seven years from the day he was born, in Union, Me. He was the eldest child of Israel and Caroline (Nye) Barker, natives of Maine, and the parents of one son and one daughter, Eliza Ann. When these children were still very young the wife and mother died and subsequently the father married again, afterward continuing to make his home in Union, Me., where he followed the machinist's trade. During the last six years of his life he was an invalid.

The only part of the year when James Barker could attend school was during the winter season, when the snow was so deep that work on the farm was suspended. At such times he waded through the drifts to the schoolhouse a quarter of a mile away. When seventeen years of age he began an apprenticeship of four years to the trade of a cabinet-maker, after which he spent a similar period with Frank Rice in the carriage manufacturing business. His first business venture was made at Belmont, Me., where, with a capital of $1,000, he started a carriage manufacturing business. So successful was he that within six years he had sold out the business and was the happy possessor of $5,000, but unfortunately his next enterprise, the manufacture of bobbins for cotton mills, was less successful, and after one year in that business he sold out. Going to Searsmont, Me., he engaged in the manufacture of carriages for twenty-two years, meantime accumulating a neat property. Considerations of health finally led him to dispose of the factory and seek a change of climate. After a winter in Los Angeles, he came to Pasadena, where he has since built a residence at No. 409 North Los Robles avenue. During the boom he bought and sold considerable property and made a neat little sum, his experience in this respect being far more satisfactory than that of many people. In politics he is a Republican, while fraternally he is connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the blue lodge of Masons in Maine.

In Belmont, Waldo county, Me., Mr. Barker married Miss Mary L. Bicknell, who was born and reared in that town. Her father, James Bicknell, for years a farmer of Maine, finally settled in Lawrence, Mass., and there remained until his death at eighty-two years. The three children of Mr. and Mrs. Barker were named as follows: Herbert E., now deceased; Caroline Elvira, wife of N. S. Leithed; and James Edmund, an electrician living in El Paso, Tex. The family enjoy the acquaintance of many cultured people, and all delight to enjoy the hospitality for which the family home is known.

N. H. HOSMER. In the quiet but earnest and conscientious discharge of his duties as a citizen and horticulturist Mr. Hosmer has passed the many years of his residence in Sierra Madre, where he holds a high position by reason of the recognized value of his citizenship and the unwavering integrity of his character. The family of which he is a member ranks, both in paternal and maternal stock, among the early established residents of the historic city of Concord, Mass., and in that town he was born May 18, 1844, being next to the oldest child of Nathan S. and Ruth Lee (Hayward) Hosmer, likewise natives of that colonial Massachusetts town. His father followed the building business throughout all of his active life and died at Concord when he was eighty years of age.

In the midst of scenes made famous through events of the Revolutionary war and through the later connection therewith of such literary lights as Emerson, Hawthorne and Miss Alcott, the boyhood years of N. H. Hosmer were uneventfully passed. At the age of seventeen he was graduated from the high school of Concord, Mass., after which he began to earn his own livelihood, his first work being that of clerk in a grocery. Being of an industrious and economical disposition, his earnings were carefully saved and in 1878 were utilized in his removal to California, at which time he settled in Florence. He was accompanied by his wife, whom he had married in 1872 and who had previously been Miss C. W. Hathorn, of Solon, Me. A residence of a few years in this western region convinced him of its advantages for permanent location, and he has since remained in the state, with the exception of the summer of 1881, when he visited in Concord. During the fall of 1881 he settled at Sierra Madre and bought twenty-six acres, all in brush. Immediately he set about the task of bringing the land under cultivation, developing from it a fine ranch of citrus and deciduous fruits. At the opening of the boom, he laid out the Hosmer subdivision to Sierra Madre and platted a large number of lots, disposing of all of his land with the exception of eight acres, which latter constitutes his home place and is in oranges. Besides the management of his orange orchard he is now engaged in promoting his gold mining interests in the Mojave desert.

During the many years of his residence at

Sierra Madre Mr. Hosmer has watched with interest the gradual development of this locality, the redeeming of farms from great stretches of land covered with brush; the planting of fruit trees whose generous crops make this indeed a land of plenty; and the settlement of the farms by a desirable class of citizens. In politics he is a staunch Republican and has for years been committeeman of this precinct. Fraternally he belongs to the Knights of Pythias.

SETH C. ARNOLD. By reason of his removal to Southern California in 1885, Mr. Arnold experienced all the excitement incident to the boom, as well as the serious depression that followed, and he is now witnessing the more substantial era of growth and commercial activity. Soon after his arrival he opened a furniture store on the corner of Main and Fourth streets, Los Angeles, and this he conducted for six years, when he sold out. During the boom times he bought considerable property in Pasadena, but much of this has been sold. He now owns two lots, 80x400 feet, where he has erected a neat residence and planted many English walnut trees, together with fruits of various kinds.

In Otsego county, N. Y., Mr. Arnold was born March 21, 1833, being a son of George M. and Betsey Arnold, natives respectively of Vermont and New York. When a boy his father settled in Otsego county, N. Y., and there in time he acquired the ownership of two hundred acres, forming the family homestead. The seven children in the family were named as follows: Joseph C., of Burlington, N. Y.; Seth C., of Pasadena, Cal.; David N., Betsey R., Ellen, Otis P. and Edson, all of New York. It is noteworthy that all of the seven married and had children. Seth C. supplemented attendance at the public schools by a course in the Albany (N. Y.) State Normal, from which he was graduated in 1851, receiving a state certificate as teacher. For fifteen years he engaged in educational work in New York, after which he was for two years principal of the schools of Monmouth, Ill. Removing to Iowa in 1858 he taught for five years in Iowa Falls, after which he settled on an eighty-acre farm he had previously purchased. However, in 1865, he moved back into the city and opened a general mercantile store, which he conducted for ten years. During 1875 he moved to Marshalltown, Iowa, and bought a stock of furniture, after which he continued in that business for ten years, and, on removing to California, brought his stock of furniture with him. Of late years he has been retired from business responsibilities, except such as are connected with the management of his property interests. In various places where he has made his home positions of trust have been offered him, but he has no desire for public life, and, aside from voting the Republican ticket, takes no part in politics. In religion he is of Universalist faith.

The marriage of Mr. Arnold and Miss Jennie Wells took place in Iowa Falls, Iowa, Mrs. Arnold having removed to that city from her native town of Warsaw, N. Y. Her father, Joseph Wells, was a stone mason and contractor, and attained advanced years, dying in Iowa. The family of Mr. and Mrs. Arnold consists of the following children: Clara, who is the wife of George Andrews, of Marshalltown, Iowa; Nellie, Mrs. W. B. MacNider, and Harry Otis Arnold, of Seattle, Wash.

A. W. ARMSTRONG. The records of the Armstrong family in America indicate that they were early residents of Pennsylvania and maintained an active connection with the development of that state. From there Dr. Alfred M. Armstrong removed to Ohio and engaged in the practice of his profession at Dowlstown. Some years ago he retired from practice, but he is still remarkably robust for one of ninety-two years, and advanced age has not quenched his interest in movements tending toward the progress of his state and nation. His son, Alfred C., was born in Ohio and made railroad-ing his principal occupation in life, being for twelve years purchasing agent for the Lake Shore Railroad and for four years holding a similar position with the Santa Fe. On retiring from business, he came to California, and subsequently made his home at Altadena until 1893, when he passed from earth's activities. Four children were born of his marriage to Mary Warner, a native of Ohio, her father, Lucius Warner, having removed to that state from his native city, Waterbury, Conn. The Warner family is of remote Scotch extraction.

The second in the family of Alfred C. Armstrong was A. W. Armstrong, of Altadena, who was born in Cleveland, Ohio, April 10, 1861. It being the desire of his parents that he should have excellent educational advantages, he was sent to Brooks Military Academy in Cleveland, Ohio, and later became a student in Yale College, from which he was graduated in 1882. Taking up an active business, he selected the occupation of a marine engineer, and this he followed for eight years, principally with the firm of Harlan & Hollingsworth, of Wilmington, Del. On coming to the Pacific coast in 1891, he bought ten acres at Altadena. These were in seedlings and he at once replanted in navels, while he also planted seven acres in lemons. The grove has become one of great value, and its thrifty appearance, as well as the fine quality of its products speak volumes for the scientific skill of the owner. Besides managing his ranch, he is interested in stocks in the industrial line.

During the residence of Mr. Armstrong in Wilmington, Del., he married Miss Effie Fulenwider, who was born in Philadelphia, Pa. The children born of their union are named as follows: Margaret Owen, Henry Fulenwider, Alfred Warner, Jr., Mary Warner and Catherine Gwynne. The family are identified with All Saints' Episcopal Church, in which Mr. Armstrong officiates as vestryman. While in college he was one of the leading members of the Delta Psi Fraternity. In politics he is a believer in the principles of Democracy as viewed by Cleveland and other leading supporters of sound money and free trade. The office of postmaster of Altadena, to which he was appointed during the administration of President Cleveland, is still filled by him with characteristic zeal and ability. Golf and other outdoor sports have an ardent friend in Mr. Armstrong, who has been honored by election to the office of president of the Country Club of Pasadena and is now filling the position, his executive judgment and enthusiasm having done much to promote the welfare of the club.

COL. CHARLES BENTZONI, U. S. A. While general history treats of the great events of the past and records the rise and progress of governments, biographical history deals rather with the individuals who make the nation's history, and the record of army officers is therefore peculiarly appropriate. Glancing over the record of Col. Charles Bentzoni, both when in active service upon the field of battle and when stationed at frontier posts in time of peace, it would seem that the words "America expects every man to do his duty" had become interwoven with the innermost fibers of his being. Faithfulness to duty was the watchword of his whole career as a soldier, and, now in the twilight of life's long day, as he dwells upon the past and reviews his connection with military affairs, he may feel a just pride in the part that he has borne in maintaining the honor of his country among the nations of the world.

In Dantzig, where he was born October 11, 1830, Charles Bentzoni was reared and educated. At seventeen years of age he entered the German army, in which he remained for seven years, meantime receiving promotion from the ranks to a non-commissioned officer. In April, 1857, after a voyage of two months from Liverpool, he arrived in New York City on the sailing vessel, Thornton, and for a month remained in the metropolis. May 12, of the same year, he enlisted as a private in the regular army, and was stationed on Governor's Island as an instructor of infantry. January 4, 1861, with two hundred men, he started for Fort Sumter, on the steamer, Star of the West, under the orders of General Scott. January 9, after the steamer had crossed the bar, it was fired upon by the batteries of Morris Island and Fort Moultrie, and was compelled to return to New York. These shots were the very first fired by the Confederates in the Rebellion.

During the latter part of July Colonel Bentzoni was assigned as first sergeant of Company D, Eleventh United States Infantry, a newly formed regiment. November 20, 1861, he was appointed second lieutenant, and March 17, 1862, was made first lieutenant. During 1862-64 he served in the army of the Potomac. In November, 1864, he was made colonel of the Fifty-sixth United States Colored Infantry, and during the two following years commanded the eastern district of Arkansas. September 30, 1864, he was brevetted captain for gallant and meritorious services in the battle of Poplar Spring Church, Va. March 13, 1865, he was brevetted major and lieutenant-colonel in recognition of his valor in the war. On being mustered out of the volunteer service, September 15, 1866, he rejoined the Eleventh Infantry, as first lieutenant, and subsequently was appointed a captain in the Fortieth Infantry, of which General Miles was the first colonel. His commission as captain dated from July 28, 1866. In 1869 the Fortieth United States Infantry consolidated with the Thirty-ninth, forming the Twenty-fifth United States Infantry. In this Colonel Bentzoni continued until December 4, 1891, a period of twenty-five years and six months, when he was promoted to be major in the First Infantry, and with the latter he continued until he was retired October 11, 1894, by reason of having reached the age limit. During his long connection with the Twenty-fifth Infantry he served in the Indian country from the Gulf of Mexico to the British Northwestern Territory, and had numerous encounters with hostile Indians.

From March, 1867, to April, 1869, Colonel Bentzoni was stationed at Fort Macon, Plymouth, Raleigh and Goldsboro, N. C., and from there was transferred to Fort Jackson and St. Philip, La. Subsequently his stations were as follows: Fort Quitman, Tex., May 17, 1870, to August, 1871; commanding at Fort Bliss, May 27, 1871, to June 27, 1872; Fort Quitman, June 29, 1872, to January 5, 1877, as commander of the post; Fort Clark, Tex., February 3, 1877, until May 16, 1877; leave of absence until May 1, 1878; commander at Fort St. Felipe, Tex., from May 1, 1878, until September 5, 1879; thence transferred to the garrison at Fort Stockton, a lonely station about six hundred miles from the railroad, and in the central part of Pecos county, Tex., to reach which consumed his time from the 5th to the 19th of September; Fort Randall, Dak., from August 2, 1880, until September 4, 1882; on general recruiting service at Buffalo, N. Y., from October 4, 1882, until October 12, 1884; in garrison at Fort Snelling, Minn., from November 1, 1884, to May 18, 1888; in garrison at Fort Shaw, Mont., from May 21, 1888, until June, 1891; thence transferred to Fort Buford, N. D.; received his majority December 4, 1891, and was assigned to the First Infantry with station at Angel Island, San Francisco Bay, Cal., where he remained until his retirement from active service. From November, 1894, until August, 1896, he resided in Los Angeles, after which he spent a few months in San Francisco. April 10, 1897, he started upon a trip around the world, during the course of which he visited Honolulu, spent six months in Japan, six weeks in China, two months in India, and two months in Egypt. He next visited Turkey and Austria, and afterward traveled in other European countries. His first wife had died many years before and while on his tour of the world he married Mrs. Gertrud Von Schlutterbach, whose mother was his first cousin. The ceremony was solemnized in London, England, August 26, 1899. Returning to this country, he landed in New York June 3, 1900, and for a few months remained in that city, coming from there to Los Angeles February 11, 1901, and purchasing the residence at the northwest corner of Thirtieth and Flower streets which has since been his home.

WILLIAM C. CROWELL

In bearing Colonel Bentzoni is a typical soldier, with a firm, elastic step, an erect carriage, and an imposing dignity of manner. His long years of active service have left few traces in figure and face, for, with the exception of impaired eyesight, he retains the strength, physical robustness and alertness that characterized his army service. Like the majority of army officers, he is never too weary to enjoy a good story and a hearty laugh, and like them, too, he is generous toward those less fortunate than he in fighting the battles of life.

WILLIAM C. CROWELL. Many years ago Jonathan Crowell, a native of the Cape Cod region of Massachusetts, removed to Yarmouth, on the bay of Fundy, in Nova Scotia, where during the brief and fleeting summers he endeavored to secure from the soil those products which would sustain his family and find a ready sale in neighboring markets. He himself was a descendant of another Jonathan, who came from England and set up his home at Cape Cod, where his ship landed. Jonathan, son of the Nova Scotian emigrant, was born on that peninsula, and there spent his entire life. Next in line of descent was Capt. Weymouth, a native of Yarmouth and for years in earlier life a sea captain, but now, at seventy years of age, a tiller of the soil near the bay. By his marriage to Elizabeth Gavel, a native of Nova Scotia, he had eleven children, six of whom are still living, three sons and one daughter having their homes in California. Of the sons, Charles and William C. reside in Pasadena, while Weymouth lives in Los Angeles; the daughter, Mrs. Adeline Crosby, is a resident of Pasadena.

In Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, William Chamberlain Crowell was born September 21, 1871. The days of boyhood he passed on a farm, on which he worked during summers, while in the winter he attended school. During 1889 he went to Seattle, Wash., where he was an apprentice under his brother, Weymouth. His leisure hours were given to the study of architecture in the Puget Sound Business College, where he studied for two years. Coming to Pasadena in 1894, he took up carpentering. In the fall of 1895 he went to Guatemala, Central America, in the capacity of superintendent and draughtsman for Henry Jones, a large contractor. His sojourn in that region was beneficial to him educationally, for he gained an excellent knowledge of Spanish. After a year with Mr. Jones he turned his attention to contracting and architectural work in San Marcos, Guatemala, and was laying the foundation of large profits and a successful business when his health gave way, through outdoor work in a climate exceedingly warm and enervating. In 1897 he returned to Pasadena and later spent six months at his Nova Scotian home, recuperating. Since his return to Pasadena he has engaged in contracting and building, having built among many other structures the Pasadena ice plant, Tompkins, Hitchings, Coffin, Dr. A. S. Hoyt and Michael Cudahy's residences. He was married in Yarmouth, in August, 1899, to Miss Iva Mickerson, a former schoolmate there. They have two children, Elsie and Ruth. The family are connected with the First Baptist Church of Pasadena. In politics Mr. Crowell is a pronounced Republican, while fraternally he is connected with the Independent Order of Foresters and the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks.

WILLIAM H. BULLIS. Since 1880 Mr. Bullis has considered Tropic his home, although for a few years the acquiring of his trade kept him elsewhere. As a consequence of his long residence in this locality he is familiar with its growth from the early days of its settlement to the present time and has been especially interested in experiments made in order to ascertain the varieties of fruits best adapted to the soil. In 1890 he went to Salt Lake City, where he served three years at the trades of bricklayer and cement finisher and two years at the plasterer's trade. Returning to California in 1895, he has since carried on business at Tropic as a contractor in plaster, brick and cement work, under the firm name of Bullis & Stine. A large trade has been built up that extends throughout the San Fernando valley. In addition to this business, Mr. Bullis has improved twenty acres on Third street, West Glendale, ten acres of which are in fine qualities of peaches and apricots. The balance he expects to plant in grapes. The land is under the Verdugo Canon Water Company, in which he is financially interested. At one time he served as a director in the Tropico Water Company.

As early as 1849 Joseph R. Bullis, grandfather of William H., sought the possibilities of California and entered the mines near Hangtown. His first visit to Southern California was made about 1867, when he bought a large tract of land at Lynwood. In time he acquired several thousand acres of the Tugo tract, where he engaged in stock-raising, general farming and dairying. At the time of his death, in July, 1889, he was eighty-nine years of age. During the forty years of his residence in California he witnessed many changes and saw the whole state evolved from a wilderness to a highly improved and thickly settled region. Being himself a man of shrewd foresight, he believed Southern California investments would prove profitable, and so not only invested personally, but advised others to do the same. It was largely as the result of his advice that his grandson ten years ago bought the twenty acres he now owns.

On another page of this volume will be found mention of Philip H., son of Joseph R. and father of William H. Bullis. Since 1880 he has owned property in the town of Glendale, but his home is now in Redondo. By his marriage to Henrietta, daughter of William Payne, there were born five children: Joseph W., a horticulturist at Alhambra; W. H.; Tessie A., Mrs. Stine, of West Glendale; Georgia F., at home; and James Allen. William H. was born in Kent county, Mich., April 4, 1869, and was brought to California at the age of six months. His education was obtained mostly at Lynwood, although he was for a time a student in the Glendale school. His attractive home on Glendale avenue is presided over by his wife, formerly Luella M. Marden, who was born in Minnesota, came to California in 1880 and graduated from the Los Angeles State Normal School. For eight successive years she taught the primary department in the Tropico school, and since 1899 she has served efficiently in charge of the Tropico postoffice, having been appointed to this office under President McKinley. Both Mr. and Mrs. Bullis are staunch adherents of Republican principles, and he has served as a member of the county central committee, besides aiding in other ways to promote the party welfare in his town and county.

JUAN E. CAMARILLO. A visit to the home of Juan Camarillo, worthy descendant of that elder Camarillo, whose deeds in the early days of Ventura county will ever be recalled as historic mile-posts in the development of the state which he visited first in 1834, coming hither from Mexico, where he was born in 1812, is an occurrence destined to linger long in the memory of the fortunate one. Upon a portion of the enormous ranch which he bequeathed to his sons, Juan E., the younger, who was born at Ventura in 1870, has erected a home which for novelty and interest is unexcelled in the county. With his brother, Adolpho, he was educated in the grammar school at Ventura, and with him graduated from the Woodbury Business College, at Los Angeles. He also attended for a time the university of Southern California. After his father's death, December 4, 1880, he lived with his mother in Ventura until her death in 1898, at the beautiful home with its memories of the splendid traits of character which brightened the career of the Mexican emigrant, and which had no superior in Ventura. Juan E. still owns this home, but to drown the sorrow occasioned by the departure of his beloved parent, and to afford occupation in his now lonely life, he erected the beautiful ranch house which is now his home, located about half a mile from that of his brother. This house is enjoyed by himself and one Oliver B. Dunn, whom Mr. Camarillo took as a companion from his youth; besides being a companion he is now the foreman of the ranch. Mr. Dunn is indeed a worthy recipient of his friend's interest, and it would be difficult to find a nobler or more congenial companion.

Adjacent to the home is a large and finely equipped barn, wherein are kept blooded saddle and driving horses, of the good points of which Mr. Camarillo is an excellent judge. Of minor importance, however, is the really palatial home of the horses compared with the interest which greets the traveler who secures admission to the home, with its valuable and exhaustive collection of Indian relics, many of them the work of tribes now extinct, who carried with them to the happy hunting ground the secret of the art embodied in their productions. Now in Ventura county there is but one Indian woman basket maker, of whom Mr. Camarillo has an admirable kodak picture, representing her outside of her cabin, at work on the baskets by which she makes a living. A particularly interesting relic is that of a mantle or mangas, formerly worn by men of high degree in Spain. It is decorated with a gold fringed collar, hand made, and has a hole in the center through which the head is supposed to project. Another cherished souvenir is the Indian cap of penance, used to designate a red man who had been guilty of a crime, and to single him out as unworthy the notice of his tribe. It is made in the shape of a fool's cap, and from the roots of an herb, so finely woven into a net that it has the appearance of leather. Also there is included in the collection the first scales used by the elder Camarillo when he first opened his store in Santa Barbara, a queer kind of scales, the old style chimes variety. Many of the most interesting and important of these prized reminders of the past are handed down from the grandfather, who secured them when he was appointed by Spain commandant of the mission in San Diego county, which office is similar to that of governor or superintendent, and carried with it a large responsibility, and varied opportunities for good government.

With a due appreciation of their responsibility as descendants of a noble family, the Camarillo heirs observe a most delightful hospitality, and invariably dispense towards strangers as well as friends those old world considerations and galantries of manner so intensely admired, yet so rarely seen, in this country of commercialism and devotion to the worship of the golden calf.

JOHN B. DAWSON. The rapid growth of Los Angeles during recent years and the high character of the architecture adopted for its public buildings and residences have combined to attract to this city contractors and builders of superior skill, conspicuous among whom is John B. Dawson, of the firm of Dawson & Eldridge. Desiring a larger scope for his activities than his former home afforded, he established himself in Los Angeles in 1895 and has since devoted himself with energy and intelligence to his chosen occupation. The contracts which have been filled by himself and partner, S. T. Eldridge, include some of the most important in the vicinity, and all have been executed with dispatch and great care.

A member of an eastern family and a son of John and Agnes (Porter) Dawson, this citizen of Los Angeles was born near Rochester, Monroe county, N. Y., April 22, 1859. After having completed the studies of the local schools, he took up the carpenter's trade, which he learned in its every detail while he was still young, and in addition he studied the builder's and architectural departments. Even at an early age it was his ambition to become a successful contractor and builder, and, to aid in the attainment of this end, he acquired a thorough knowledge of carpentering, seeking the best employers, so that he might have the benefit of their successful experience. After some years as a journeyman he went to Ann Arbor, Mich., where he followed the trade for five years. During this time he became interested in military matters and enlisted in Company A, First Regiment Michigan State Troops, in which he served for three years and received various promotions including first-sergeant. While in Ann Arbor he was also active in fraternal organizations, particularly the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, in which he was honored with the offices of past grand and past chief patriarch. In that city he was made a Mason in Fraternity Lodge No. 262, F. & A. M., and also belonged to Washtenaw Chapter No. 6, R. A. M., and Ann Arbor Commandery No. 13, K. T.

When the boom of the '80s was attracting many settlers to the Pacific coast, Mr. Dawson became interested in studying about the west, with the result that in 1887 he settled in Pasadena. The large amount of building then in progress rendered his calling a desirable one, and he immediately found employment as a foreman of buildings, in addition to which he also became interested in real estate, and bought and sold a number of lots. However, after a year in Pasadena, the cessation of the boom put an end to improvements, and in 1888 he removed to Santa Cruz, where he began to take contracts for buildings, among these being the Santa Cruz County Bank building, the residences of Capt. W. W. Gray, A. M. Johnson, J. L. C. Stevens, William Rennie, W. D. Haslam, and many others, also the Capitola hotel at Capitola.

In Santa Cruz Mr. Dawson married Miss Mamie E. Sutphen, daughter of Judge C. T. Sutphen, and they made their home in an attractive residence erected by himself. Accompanied by his wife and two children, Mildred Agnes and John Clifford, in 1895 he moved to Los Angeles, trading his Santa Cruz property for a deciduous fruit ranch at Boulder creek, which he still owns. Shortly after settling in this city he formed a partnership with a well-known contractor, under the firm title of Dawson & Schurz, and they were given contracts for a number of fine residences in Los Angeles and Redlands. While in the midst of their activities, with much work ahead of them, Mr. Schurz was bitten by a black spider and lost his life. They had just accepted a contract to build the First Methodist Episcopal Church at Pasadena, which, at a cost of $80,000, was afterward completed by Mr. Dawson. After a time he formed a partnership with S. T. Eldridge, who is represented elsewhere in this work. Among their many contracts may be mentioned those for the $30,000 residence of Hiram Higgins, the State Normal School addition, the Twentieth street schoolhouse, with twelve rooms; the Los Angeles Railroad carshops; the First Congregational Church of Los Angeles, costing $60,000; also the city hall and jail building at Pasadena, Cal., $40,000.

Having given his attention closely to business matters, Mr. Dawson has never entered into the political life of the city, and aside from voting the Republican ticket takes no part in public affairs. In religious views he inclines toward the Presbyterian faith, while his wife is identified with the Episcopal Church. As a citizen he favors all movements for the growth and upbuilding of Los Angeles, to whose beauty and attractions he has added not a little by his work as a builder.

ARTHUR L. CHAFFEE. Surrounding the dry-goods and clothing business of A. L. Chaffee & Co., of Ventura, there is a tinge of the historic, a suggestion of hardship in early days, and of obstacles overcome, rendering possible the present successful trade. Beyond the fact that the enterprise is without exception the oldest of its kind in Southern California and by far the largest in its line in Ventura county, is its association with the life of that well-remembered pioneer, Walter Scott Chaffee. This early settler, who, more than any other in the small Spanish settlement of San Buenaventura, dispelled with the enthusiasm of his eastern spirit the old-world traditions of the town, was born in Peterboro, Madison county, N. Y., February 2, 1834. His father and ancestors were associated with many of the early struggles of the country, and during the great slavery excitement the former was instrumental in aiding many an unfortunate to gain liberty.

At fourteen years of age Walter Scott Chaffee began to clerk in a store in Syracuse, N. Y. Ten years later he opened a general mercantile store at Portage City, Wis., but soon he returned to New York, and from there went to Colorado about 1860, engaging in mining near Leadville with Jerome B. Chaffee. The following year he came to Ventura, which at the time had only three American citizens. He started a farming industry on More's grant and was especially interested in raising hogs. Six months later he opened a general store in a small adobe house, shipping a stock of goods here from San Francisco by schooner. By 1863 the increase of trade warranted the erection of the present brick structure on the corner of Palm and Main streets. He erected the first frame building in Ventura county, bringing the lumber from Santa Barbara and putting up a house which is still the family residence and in good condition. In time he became the instigator of many enterprises. Much real estate came into his possession. He owned a ranch of one hundred acres devoted to walnuts and apricots, and was one of the first to set out a walnut grove, also one of the first to resort to irrigation. He was one of the original incorporators of the Bank of Ventura. When the town was incorporated he was appointed by the legislature a member of the first board of trustees. His courage and strength of character are best illustrated by the stand which he took during the Civil war, when, upon a liberty pole in front of his store, there waved a United States flag. After a number of flags had been stolen, he took the precaution to guard the last one with a shot gun, and this same flag was the only one south of San Jose which was placed at half mast when it was known that Lincoln had been assassinated.

The wife of Walter Scott Chaffee was Rebecca Nidever, a native of Texas, born in 1846. Her parents, John and Mary (Vernon) Nidever, came to California as early as 1853, and died in Santa Barbara county. Mrs. Chaffee is still living on the homestead. Of her nine children eight are living, namely: Walter S., who is secretary of the corporation; John H., who is cashier of the Ventura Savings Bank; Arthur Leslie, the subject of this article; Helen, wife of Willington Wilde, of Ventura; Ethel M., wife of M. McIlhenney, of Los Angeles, Cal.; Lawrence W., Chester C. and Bessie M. Arthur Leslie Chaffee was born in Ventura November 22, 1870. He acquired his education in the public schools and at Heald's Business College in San Francisco. When sixteen years of age he entered his father's store and was engaged in the capacity of bookkeeper. On the death of his father he became an administrator of the estate and one of the incorporators of the same, which includes all the property besides the store. For some time he continued the business alone, but in 1900 the firm of A. L. Chaffee & Co. was incorporated. Possessing excellent ability as a manager and a keen knowledge of finance, he is a worthy successor of his father.

The marriage of A. L. Chaffee united him with Eva Solari, who was born in Ventura and received her education in Pomona convent near Pasadena. Her father, Augustino Solari, was a pioneer merchant of Ventura. By her marriage two children have been born, Grant Leslie and Harold Scott. Mr. Chaffee is a Republican in politics.

J. H. DOBBINGS. Proud of his descent from a long line of British naval officers, Mr. Dobbings is equally proud of his citizenship in the "land of the free," and no native-born son of the United States is more loyal than he in allegiance to our government and its institutions. Since September, 1885, he has made his home in America, and for some years past has filled with efficiency and faithfulness an important position as first assistant engineer at the Pacific Branch, National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers. The machinery now in use at the plant has been put in under his supervision, and includes eight boilers, with a capacity of five hundred horse-power; one engine, seventy-five, and one engine, twenty-five horse; one ice machine, of five tons capacity (twenty-five horse); and one eight-ton ice machine, fifty-horse power.

Archibald McNeil

The great-grandfather of Mr. Dobbings was for years connected with the British navy. The grandfather, J. G. Dobbings, was an officer in the British navy until sixty-four years of age, when he was retired after an honorable and active career. The father, John, was born in Elstow, Bedfordshire, England, and in early manhood turned his attention to mining. For twenty-six years he was superintendent of mines for a large company in England, but since 1888 he has made his home in Pasadena, Cal., where he is living retired. He married Sarah Bell, who was born at Newcastle-on-Tyne, and died in England in 1874. Her father, George Bell, was at one time manager of a division of the Northeastern Railroad in England.

The family of John and Sarah Dobbings comprised four daughters and one son, the latter, J. H., being next to the youngest of the children. He was born in Middlesboro, Yorkshire, England, April 13, 1864, and received his education in local schools. At fourteen years of age he began an apprenticeship to the machinist's trade in Bolckow, Vaughn & Co. (his father's employers), with whom he continued to serve for seven years. On the completion of his time, in September, 1885, he came to America, settling in Des Moines, Iowa, where he worked at his trade with the Pioneer Coal Company. The spring of 1886 found him in San Francisco, where he followed his trade in the Risdon iron works. From there, in October, 1887, he removed to Pasadena, where he engaged in the retail oil business until 1889, and then, going to San Diego, was occupied as chief engineer of the Fourth street cable railway until it was closed down in 1893. Meantime he had embraced the first opportunity to take out naturalization papers and had entered into full American citizenship in 1890, since which time he has taken an active part in local Republican movements and has worked in the interests of his party. On leaving San Diego he became first assistant engineer at the Soldiers' Home, which position he has filled since May, 1893, with credit to himself and satisfaction to those concerned.

During his residence in San Francisco Mr. Dobbings formed the acquaintance of Miss Mattie A. Evans, who was born in Concord, N. H. They were married in San Francisco and now have a family of two children, Olney J. and Dorothea Belle. Mrs. Dobbings is a Presbyterian in religious belief, while Mr. Dobbings, having been reared in the Church of England, finds the Episcopalian faith in accord with his doctrinal views. He was made a Mason in Silver Gate Lodge, San Diego, and is now senior warden in the Santa Monica blue lodge; also a member of Lodge Perfection No. 3, in Los Angeles; and Rosary Croix Chapter No. 3, K. T., in Los Angeles. For some years he has been affiliated with the Knights of Pythias, Uniform Rank, in Santa Monica. Along the line of his chosen occupation he is connected with Council No. 4, San Diego, National Association of Stationary Engineers.

ARCHIBALD McNEIL. The owner and proprietor of the Santa Maria flour mills, and known as one of the substantial citizens and business men of Santa Maria, Mr. McNeil was born near London, Canada, in 1848. His parents, Peter and Henrietta (Beaton) McNeil, were natives of Scotland, in which country they were reared, educated and married. After their immigration to America they settled near London, Canada, where the father engaged in farming. On his homestead he died in 1875 and his wife in 1882. They had a family of ten children, of whom Archibald was seventh in order of birth.

A practical home training and an education acquired in the public schools, supplemented by learning the trade of miller, were the preparations with which Mr. McNeil started out to face the world when twenty-two years of age. He learned the miller's trade in Napier, Canada, under James G. Sutherland, and among the most pleasant recollections of his youth are those connected with his stay of four years as a member of the family of Mr. and Mrs. Sutherland. On coming to the States he settled near Lafayette, Ind., and operated a mill for a year. He then came to California and for two years worked in a mill at Chico for General Bidwell. A later location was at Marysville, this state, and for nine years he had charge of Governor Perkins' mill at Oreville. From there he came to Santa Maria in 1882, and formed a partnership with John Adams, under the title of Adams, McNeil & Co. Buying Mr. Popp's mill at Nepoma, they tore the building down, and removed the machinery and timbers to Santa Maria, where the plant was changed from a burr to a roller mill. The affairs were conducted under the partnership until 1899, when Mr. McNeil became the sole possessor of the mill property, and now operates it alone. The present capacity of the mill is sixty barrels a day, and about all of the mill work for miles around is taken care of at this enterprising establishment. The building is located on Ocean avenue, on the Pacific Coast Railroad tracks near the depot.

In the town Mr. McNeil has erected a pleasant and comfortable residence on Mill street, and in addition to his mill and residence property owns several city lots. He is variously interested in local affairs, and is a stockholder in the new savings bank. Politically a Republican, he has never been an office seeker, and entertains liberal ideas regarding the election of candidates to office. Fraternally he is associated with the Knights of Pythias, being past chancellor of Santa Maria Lodge No. 90, and No. 46 Uniform Rank K. of P., besides which he is a charter member of the Santa Maria Lodge, Independent Order of Foresters. In 1876 he married Margaret Morrison, daughter of Warren and Nancy (Tobin) Morrison, of Oreville, Cal. Of this union there are four children, namely: Flora, a graduate of the Santa Maria high school and the California State Normal; Edwina and Warren, both high school graduates, and the latter now a student in the California State University at Berkeley; and Margaret, who is attending the local schools.

EDWARD GOLTER. While he is thoroughly loyal to American institutions and a typical Californian in enterprise, Mr. Golter is a foreigner by birth, being a native of Wurtemberg, Germany, where his parents, Gotleib and Louise Golter, were also born. His paternal grandfather, Frederick Golter, was a farmer by occupation and belonged to one of the old families of the province. In the parental family there were four sons and two daughters, one of whom, Paul, lives in San Francisco, while a sister makes her home in Los Angeles. Edward, who was the youngest of the six, was born July 18, 1864, and received his education in the national schools. At fourteen years of age he began an apprenticeship to the brewer's trade in Heilbronn, where he served for two years. Later locations were in Stuttgart and Ulm, where he was employed in breweries, and afterward he traveled throughout the empire, securing employment wherever an opening occurred. In 1883 he was graduated from the Brewers' school in Munich, after which he again traveled through Germany as a brewer.

During 1886 Mr. Golter crossed the ocean to New York and from there across the continent traveled to Los Angeles, where he soon entered the brewery of Maier & Zobelein, accepting a very humble position. From the first it was evident that he understood the position, and his promotion after five months gave him a position better suited to his abilities, that of foreman and brewmaster, in which capacity he has been retained since September 1, 1887. His long continuance in the position proves that his work has been acceptable to his employers. During his service the capacity has been repeatedly increased, until it is now six times as great as when he became connected with the plant, and his position is therefore one of much greater responsibility than it was ten years ago. The yeast is manufactured in the brewery, and is the best of its kind, while the other necessary articles are also as perfect as can be secured.

The marriage of Mr. Golter took place in Los Angeles, his wife being Miss Ida Hensling, who was born in the government of Stettin, Pomerania, Germany, and by whom he has a son, Edwin F. Among the organizations of which he is a member are the Turners Society, Sons of Herman and Los Angeles Lodge No. 42, F. & A. M., in which latter he was made a Mason a few years after Los Angeles became his home.

GEORGE W. HILL, the city treasurer of Pomona, was born in Blairsville, Pa., in 1840, and was reared and educated in the same town. Although he had gained a knowledge of agriculture through his early experience upon a farm, yet his tastes did not run in that line and as soon as possible he turned his attention to other occupations. At the age of twenty-two years he entered the Pennsylvania Railroad shops as an assistant, and worked his way up until he became wreckmaster. At the expiration of seven years he resigned his position in order to give his attention to the operating of a planing mill which he with others had purchased. Three years were thus spent, and for a similar period he conducted a grocery in Blairsville, later opening a clothing establishment, which he conducted about ten years.

With the hope that a change of climate might be of benefit to his daughter, in 1887 Mr. Hill disposed of his property in the east and removed to California. In company with J. W. Neal he built a plant and engaged in the manufacture of iron pipe, of all sizes, for the water supply throughout this section. The business was carried on prosperously for two years, but at the expiration of that time, the demand for pipe decreasing, the business was sold, and is now the property of the Southern California Manufacturing Company. While in the hands of Mr. Hill and Mr. Neal about twenty hands were employed.

A subsequent enterprise conducted by Mr. Hill associated with another business man of Pomona, was the management of a clothing business, but after four years he disposed of his interest to his partner. During the second administration of President Cleveland he was chosen postmaster of Pomona and held the office for four years. During his incumbency of the office, in 1894, he established a free delivery system in about one-third of the city, employing three regular and two extra carriers. In 1899 his party further honored him by electing him city treasurer and tax collector, in which capacity he has given faithful and efficient service. He is among the local leaders of the Democratic party and takes an active part in its measures and movements. During the Civil war he enlisted in Company D, Two Hundred and Sixth Pennsylvania Infantry, and went to the front, remaining in service until the close of the war. In later years he was warmly interested in Grand Army work in Pennsylvania. By his marriage to Miss Marguerite S. Wilson, of Blairsville, Pa., he became the father of three children, but Susan and Rebecca are deceased, and the only one living is George M., a school student. The family are connected with the Methodist Episcopal Church.

FREDERICK J. FISCHER. At the time of the discovery of gold in California news of the rich find reached a young German jeweler, John Fischer, who was then in Brazil. Eager to join the throng of gold-seekers, he hastened to New York, and there took passage on a ship for the Isthmus of Panama, going from there to San Francisco. During his voyage and after his arrival his plans definitely resolved themselves into a determination to follow his trade rather than prospect in the mines. In 1850 he opened what was one of the first jewelry stores in San Francisco, his location being on Sutter street, where he was twice burned out at times of great fires. The lawlessness reigning on the coast caused him to throw his influence in with the vigilance committee in a determination to establish law and order. At the time that the colony of Anaheim was first talked of by a number of prominent Germans in San Francisco, he became interested in the project, and was one of the founders of the town, where he carried on a hotel and put out a vineyard of twenty acres. His daughter, born in 1860, was the first child born in the colony. He assisted in the incorporation of Anaheim, of which he served as postmaster and also, for several terms, held office as president of the common council, being the first to hold that position. Indeed, he was one of the Republican leaders of the colony, and his influence did much toward forwarding enterprises favored by his party. After having for years conducted a hotel and superintended his vineyard, in 1878 he removed from Anaheim to Los Angeles, and later filled the office of deputy county recorder, also served as city assessor for three terms (one being an unexpired term). Soon after the expiration of the third term, he died in Los Angeles, in July, 1894. Fraternally he was connected with the lodge and encampment of Odd Fellows, as well as with the Veterans' Association of that order.

In San Francisco, in 1855, John Fischer married Julia Hartung, who was born in Hanover, Germany, and died in Anaheim in 1874. Her father, Fred Hartung, had a large weaving and spinning establishment at Goslau, Hanover. Some years after his daughter, Julia, had crossed by sailing vessel, around the Horn, from Germany to San Francisco, he brought the other members of the family and settled in San Francisco, later removing to Anaheim, where he owned a large winery. At the age of eighty-four years he died in Anaheim. There were six children in the family of John and Julia Fischer and five of these are living, namely: Emily, wife of George Hull, of Los Angeles; Frederick J., who was born in San Francisco, May 10, 1858; Anna, Mrs. DeFreese, of Los Angeles, who was the first child born in Anaheim; Mrs. Malvina McKennie and Mrs. Dora Bain, both of Los Angeles.

When the family settled in Anaheim, Frederick J. Fischer was only a year old, hence his first recollections are of a home in Southern California. His education was obtained in the Anaheim schools, of which Prof. J. M. Guinn was principal. In 1873 he began an apprenticeship of four years to the machinist's trade, in the Cyclops machine works, at San Francisco, returning to Anaheim at the expiration of his time, and a year later going to Los Angeles. In April, 1879, he traveled by team and wagon to Tucson, Ariz., where he became engineer of an ice plant that manufactured ice by the ether process. The capacity was only one ton every twenty-four hours, and this found at five cents a pound a ready sale, but, not being sufficient to supply the demand, ice was also shipped in from Los Angeles. After two years in Arizona, he returned to Los Angeles, and for five years was machinist in the Southern Pacific shops. For a year he carried on a business as plumber and gas-fitter, his shop being on what is now San Fernando street. In 1889 he became chief engineer of the Citizens' Water Works, and when this company was merged into the Los Angeles City Water Company, he became chief engineer of the new organization, which position he has since efficiently filled. The plant has three engines, with a capacity of eight million gallons of water, and is well equipped with modern improvements.

A general recognition of Mr. Fischer's ability as a machinist has brought him prominence among others in the same line of business. At this writing he is serving his third term as a member of the board of examining engineers of Los Angeles. On the organization of the Los Angeles Division No. 2, National Association of Stationary Engineers, he was honored with the office of president, and is now its treasurer, also the state deputy national president. For some years he and his wife (formerly Annie Martin, and a native of Oregon), with their daughter, Julia, have owned and occupied a comfortable residence at No. 429 North Fremont avenue. The nature of his occupation being such as to leave him little time to participate in public affairs, he has never been a seeker after office, yet he has held a number of positions in the Republican party, chief among these being a member of the city central committee and deputy city assessor. Fraternally he is connected with the Modern Woodmen of America and Ramona Parlor, Native Sons of the Golden West.

ROBERT P. ELLIOTT. During the years of his residence in Santa Monica, dating from the fall of 1883, Mr. Elliott has been actively engaged in the building business, and it is probable that he has erected more buildings than any other contractor in the city. Equally important has been his connection with educational work. From 1894 to 1900 he served on the school board, being its president five years of the time, and while occupying the position he was instrumental in the erection of the high school and two grammar schools.

Eighteen miles west of Meadville, in Crawford county, Pa., Mr. Elliott was born November 19, 1840, a descendant of Scotch forefathers. His grandfather, Thomas, a native of Crawford county, was a son of John Elliott, who was born in Maryland and became a pioneer of western Pennsylvania. The father, John Elliott, Jr., was born in Crawford county, but in 1853 removed to Green county, Wis., settling near Monroe. The year 1855 found him in Kansas, where he settled on a farm near what is now Valley Falls, and there he died in April, 1860. His wife, Mary (Porter) Cowan, was born in Ireland, of Scotch ancestry, and accompanied her father, Robert Porter, to New York City. Her first husband was an early settler of Crawford county, Pa. By that union three children were born, two now living. One of these, Henry Cowan, now living near Guthrie, Okla., was a lieutenant in the First Kansas Infantry during the Civil war. Of her marriage to John Elliott, eleven children were born, seven now living. One son, Washington M. Elliott, who resides near Chandler, Okla., was a soldier in the Eleventh Kansas Infantry. Mrs. Elliott died in Santa Monica, Cal., in 1895, when more than eighty years of age.

One of the vivid recollections that Robert P. Elliott has of his boyhood is that of driving with team and wagon to Kansas. As a farmer he worked early and late, and no change came into his life until the Civil war began. In August, 1861, he volunteered in the Fifth Wisconsin Battery of Light Infantry, and was sent to the front, taking part in the siege of Island No. 10, the siege of Corinth, battles of Perryville, Murfreesboro, Chattanooga, Chickamauga, Missionary Ridge, all the engagements in the Georgia campaign up to and including the siege of Atlanta, the battles of Jonesboro and Lovejoy Station, the march to the sea with the entrance into Savannah, the battles of Goldsboro, Averysboro and Bentonville. He took part in the grand review at Washington, and then returned to Wisconsin, where he was mustered out June 14, 1865, at Madison. At the time of his discharge he was serving as sergeant.

Immediately after his return from war he was married, in Monroe, Wis., to Miss Carrie Williams. They are the parents of eight children: Marietta; Mrs. Dora Hathaway, of Santa Monica; Mrs. Nellie May Shader, of Los Angeles; Mrs. Edith Pearl Abbott, of Santa Monica; George P., a carpenter, who has been associated with his father in the building business; William E., Carrie M. and Franklin J.

In 1866 Mr. Elliott settled at Harrisonville, Mo., and the next year became a farmer near Valley Falls, Kans., whence in 1870 he went to the Pottawatomie reservation and homesteaded one hundred and sixty acres eighteen miles north of Wamego. Besides farming he did considerable work as a carpenter. From Wamego he came to Santa Monica, of which town his brother, Thomas, had been one of the first settlers. Among the buildings he has erected here were those for J. J. Davis, Mr. Howard and Mr. Lewis, also many of the finest residences here, and the first house built in Sawtelle. In politics he is a Republican. His memories of war times are kept fresh through his association with the Union Veteran League, Camp No. 138, at Soldiers' Home.

In closing this sketch mention may appropriately be made of the lady who, December 17, 1865, became the wife of Mr. Elliott, and has ever since been his faithful and devoted helpmate. Her father, George Williams, was born in Ovid, N. Y., of Welsh descent, and became a pioneer of Rock Grove township, Stephenson county, Ill., later settling near Monroe, Wis., thence returning to Illinois and New York. During the Civil war he was a member of the Fifth Wisconsin Battery. He died in Kansas in August, 1882, aged sixty-one years. By his marriage to Mary Hartsough, who was born in Ovid, N. Y., and died in Los Angeles, Cal., he had ten children, five of whom are living, Mrs. Elliott being the fourth. Two of her brothers, Peter and Levi, were members of the Fifth Wisconsin Battery and served by the side of their father at the front. Naturally, she possesses a deep interest in all matters pertaining to the war, in which her father, husband and brothers served with honor, and her interest finds expression through the activities of the Women's Relief Corps and the Ladies' Auxiliary of the Union Veterans' League.

JOHN GOFTON FRANKLAND. Among the families who crossed the ocean from England in 1851 was that of Robert J. Frankland. Some years before he had married Elizabeth Gofton, daughter of a ship chandler. Accompanied by their two children, the younger of whom, John Gofton, was an infant, and taking with him also his two children by a former marriage, he crossed the Atlantic to Quebec and settled in Molton, Ontario, where he engaged in the carriage-manufacturing business. Later locations were at Streetsville and Barry, Ontario, and he died in the latter town. His wife is now living in Peterboro, Canada. Born of their marriage were two sons and four daughters, now living, John G. being the only one of the number in the States. He was born in Scarborough, Yorkshire, England, April 9, 1850, and has no recollection of the voyage of seven weeks and three days between Hull and Quebec. His earliest memories are associated with Molton and Streetsville, where from a boy he worked in his father's shop and gained a thorough knowledge of woodworking and carriage-making. At eighteen years of age he began to work at the trade in Streetsville, later going to St. Thomas, where he engaged in contracting and building, and also operated a large planing mill for the manufacture of sash, doors and blinds.

The year 1880 found Mr. Frankland in Chicago, where he erected a number of residences. Three years later he began to follow contracting at New Rockford, N. D., and at the same time improved a farm of one hundred and sixty acres. Among his contracts while in North Dakota were those for the courthouse at Carrington and a church at Minnewaukon, besides various depots on the Northern Pacific line. In December, 1889, he removed to New Whatcom, Wash., where he followed the same occupation as before. His removal from Washington to California took place in August, 1893, since which time he has engaged in contracting in Los Angeles, being now a member of the firm of Frankland & Franklin. Among his contracts in this city are those for the residences of Lee A. Phillips, on Twenty-eighth and Severance streets; Mrs. Hahn, on Severance; W. M. Jack, on Ellendale Place; the Buchanan house, on Thirty-second street; the Holterhoff and Erkenbrecher residences; the large Connuck and numerous others in various parts of the city. He is a member of the Builders Exchange and the Master Builders Association. Close participation in and connection with public affairs have prevented him, owing to the pressure of business duties, and he has seldom consented to hold office, although, while living in North Dakota, he served as justice of the peace at New Rockford for five years, and was probate judge of Eddy county for one term. A member of the Baptist Church, he is an earnest worker in his congregation, a member of its board of deacons and board of trustees, and a participant in Sunday-school work.

In St. Thomas, Canada, Mr. Frankland married Miss Margaret Thompson, who was born in Ontario, of Scotch descent. They are the parents of five children, namely: Mary Ellena, wife of Joseph Grayson, of Seattle; Maude Margaret, Mrs. N. D. Bennett, of Los Angeles; Florence Clayton, Hazel and Pearl at home.

H. C. RUGGLES. The present home of Mr. Ruggles in Pasadena is far removed from the home of his ancestors in Maine, and the distance in miles is not greater than the contrast in climate between the two—there the long and dreary winters, here the constant and flower-laden summers. The founder of the family in America, Edward Ruggles, great-grandfather of H. C., came over from England and settled in Harwich, Mass. His son, Paul, was born in Harwich, and moved from there to Carmel, Me. His son, Franklin, was born near Carmel, that state, and removing to Pennsylvania, took up the manufacture of rakes there, also followed the trade of a mechanic and later engaged in contracting and building. Going to Kansas in 1875, he settled on a farm near Lincoln and afterward engaged in raising stock and general farm products, remaining there until his death. While in Pennsylvania he married Hulda Harding, who was born at Muncie, Lycoming county, Pa., and is now living in Kansas. Her father, James Harding, was an Englishman by birth, but for years resided on a farm in Pennsylvania.

In a family of seven children, all but one of whom are living, H. C. Ruggles was third in order of birth and is the only one in California. A brother, Q. E., is a well-known portrait painter in old Mexico, and another brother, Dexter L., is a pharmacist in Kansas. H. C. was born in Williamsport, Lycoming county, Pa., March 11, 1860, and at fifteen years of age accompanied the family to Lincoln, Kans., where he assisted on the farm. However, his tastes did not run along agricultural lines, and he soon turned to other industries. Before leaving Pennsylvania he had worked as fireman in a planing mill and in Kansas he secured employment in the first steam mill built on the Saline river at Lincoln Center, holding the position of engineer there for two years. From Kansas he went to Denver, Colo., and secured work as machinist in the shops of the Union Pacific Railroad. On the completion of the new shops, on Fortieth street, he was placed in charge of the steam and electric light plant there, as chief engineer and electrician. To fit himself for this work he attended a night school, where he had special advantages for the study of electricity.

A visit to California in July of 1895 convinced Mr. Ruggles that the climate of Pasadena had no peer in the United States and he therefore resigned his position in Denver and accepted a place as chief engineer and electrician with the Pasadena Electric Light Company, continuing in that capacity until January, 1901, since which time he has been chief engineer of the Pasadena Ice Company. In the installing of the ice plant he assisted as erecting engineer, and the excellent work which has always been secured from the machinery is due largely to his capable oversight. While filling the duties of every position with the greatest fidelity, he has yet found time for original work of his own, having made improvements on oil burners and also invented an improved mechanism for street lighting. In electricity he is thoroughly posted and is also an expert draughtsman. At one time he was trustee of Los Angeles Lodge, Local No. 2, National Association of Stationary Engineers, and is still quite active in this society. Politically he is a staunch Republican, and fraternally is connected with the Woodmen of the World in Pasadena, the lodge of Odd Fellows in Denver and the encampment in Pasadena. While not connected with any denomination he contributes to the work of the Methodist Episcopal Church, with which his wife is identified. He was married September 8, 1884, in Kansas to Miss Dora Edwards, who was born in Missouri and removed to Kansas with her father, George Edwards, an extensive farmer and at one time postmaster at Ackley. The four children born of their union are, Agnes, Ana, Viola and Franklin.

F. I. GARDINER. The genealogy of the family represented by F. I. Gardiner, postmaster at Soldiers' Home, is traced back to Northumberland, England, whence Arthur Gardiner, who was a captain of horse, accompanied the Earl of Essex to Ireland, settling upon a large grant of land in county Roscommon and Galway. From him descended Patrick Gardiner, a gentleman farmer and large land owner of Roscommon. The latter's son, Matthew, was born in Roscommon, and became an architect and superintendent of building at Carrick-on-Shannon, the assize town of county Leitrim, Connaught, Ireland, where he died. His wife, Susan, was a daughter of Robert Irwin, a land owner and prominent citizen of county Leitrim, whither his ancestors had come from Scotland.

Of the eleven children of Matthew and Susan Gardiner, two sons and three daughters are living, F. I. being the eldest of these and the only one in America. He was born on the old homestead at Carrick-on-Shannon, June 28, 1836, and received his education in a private school. Under an uncle, Francis Gardiner, he served five years in the wholesale grocery business in Dublin. About 1857 he crossed the ocean to New York City and secured employment as fireman on a steamboat, later working as chief stoker between New York and Panama, also between New York and Cuba, and Havre and Falmouth. By way of Panama, in 1858, he came to California, after which he was employed on steamers out from San Francisco for two years. Returning to New York in 1860, he continued his seafaring life. During the Civil war he was for two years under Captain Phillips on the steamer Corwin, United States survey, being paid from the United States treasury, although not an enlisted sailor. In April, 1864, he enlisted in the navy and was assigned to the battleship New Hampshire on its first trip under Commodore Thatcher. Later he was detailed to the Monitor Passaic as first-class petty officer, and remained in this capacity until May 25, 1865, when he was honorably discharged at Philadelphia. While on the Corwin he was engaged in gunboat duty on the coast, and on the Passaic was principally in the blockade service.

After the close of the war Mr. Gardiner came on the steamship Nevada through the Straits of Magellan to San Francisco and for eighteen months engaged in coasting on the Pacific. Next he secured a position as conductor on the street railway in San Francisco, and from that was promoted to be ticket auditor and then secretary of the omnibus railroad, in which he was also a stockholder. When the road was sold he continued with its purchasers for a year as secretary, and then resigned. In 1886 he came to Los Angeles and for some years conducted a dairy business on Grand avenue. A severe illness caused him to come to the hospital of the Soldiers' Home for treatment. On his recovery he was about to leave, in order to resume business pursuits, but just at this juncture he was, greatly to his own surprise, tendered an appointment as postmaster, his commission dating March 11, 1892. Under President Cleveland he retained the office, and again, under President McKinley, received another commission. During his incumbency of the position the office has advanced from fourth class, with perquisites amounting to $115 per quarter, to third class, with a salary of $1,500 a year.

While in San Francisco Mr. Gardiner married Susan McCourt, who was born in Enniskillen, the chief town of the inland county of Fermanagh, Ulster, Ireland. Of their union there are one son and four daughters, namely: Robert St. John, who lives in San Francisco; Emily Jane, a graduate of the Los Angeles high school and State Normal, and now manager of Mount Tamalpais hotel; Frances Cora, who is in Los Angeles; Elizabeth, a graduate of the Los Angeles State Normal, now employed as a telegraph operator in that city; and Margaret, who resides with her mother at Los Angeles. The family are of the Episcopalian belief. The Republican party has received the staunch support of Mr. Gardiner ever since he has had the privilege of voting, and his support of its principles has been enthusiastic and firm. On the organization of the Uncle Sam Post, G. A. R., at Soldiers' Home, he became one of its charter members, and still continues active in its work. Fraternally he is connected with the Ancient Order of United Workmen and E. Gale Lodge, F. & A. M., in which he was made a Mason.

W. D. Daniels

CAPT. M. J. DANIELS. Captain Daniels is intimately associated with a number of enterprises that have promoted the progress of Riverside and the development of its principal industry, the raising of citrus fruit. His name is particularly associated with the Orange Growers Bank and its successor, the Riverside National Bank, the former organized in 1890, with himself as president; and the latter acquired, by consolidation, in 1895. He has served continuously as president of the institution, and its high standing as a financial concern is largely due to his sagacious management and oversight. The capital stock of the bank is $250,000, with a paid-in capital of $100,000. Throughout the entire period of its history, it has maintained a reputation for a conservative spirit in investments, combined with enterprise and the highest type of commercial honor.

Since the organization of the Riverside Fruit Exchange, Captain Daniels has been one of its chief executive officers, and is, as president, honored with the confidence and respect of all members of the association. As one of the largest orange growers of this vicinity, his name is one of weight among horticulturists. Some years ago he purchased fifty acres in the frostless belt, above Highgrove, the same forming a part of the Viviana tract, and this he has developed and still owns. He is also interested in the Chase Nursery Company, which owns one hundred and sixty acres, planted to oranges, in the Victoria Hill tract; this, without doubt, will in time become one of the most valuable tracts of fruit land in Southern California. Since 1893 he has acted as a director of the Riverside Water Company, and at this writing officiates as its vice-president.

Both in his old home state of Minnesota and since coming to California, Captain Daniels has been an active participant in public affairs. As successor to his father, he was elected to the state senate of Minnesota in 1882, and his service proved so satisfactory to his constituents that, at the expiration of his term, in 1886, they re-elected him to the office. During the eight years of his service in the senate, he assisted in securing the election, as United States senators from Minnesota, of William Windham, Cushman K. Davis and E. B. Washburne. While a member of the senate, he introduced a high license bill, which was passed and is still a part of the state statutes, it being considered one of the most practical temperance regulations ever enacted in any state, as it rids the large cities of hundreds of grog shops. For six years he was president of the state lunacy board of Minnesota.

During the period of his residence in Riverside, Captain Daniels has supported public measures of undoubted value to the people of his vicinity and state. At the time of the excitement over the Dingley tariff bill, in 1897, he was sent to Washington, by the fruit growers here, in order to look after the interests of the horticulturists of California. As chairman of the committee from this state, he was entrusted with great responsibilities, but proved himself worthy of the high trust reposed in him. To him may be given credit for the imposition of a tariff of one cent a pound on imported citrus fruits, which has been the salvation of the industry in the west. When the Jamaica reciprocity treaty was under consideration, the tariff committee of the state, realizing that it would work great injury to the fruit industry in our own country, sent him to Washington, where his efforts succeeded in preventing its ratification.

REV. ISHAM FUQUA. Before the railroad had been built to span the continent from ocean to ocean, Mr. Fuqua and his family came to California, traveling from Texas along the southern route and arriving in Los Angeles in 1853, after a journey of six months. To those of the present generation accustomed to swift trips in palace cars furnished with every luxury, it is impossible to comprehend the hardships attending those overland journeys. When this family started they were equipped with six yoke of oxen, two cows and a large supply of provisions, but the Indians stole their oxen while they were crossing the desert, and they had but little left when they arrived at the end of their weary journey.

While his life in California was one of self-sacrificing devotion to the welfare of others, Mr. Fuqua was prepared for such work by previous training. His whole life, indeed, was one of self-denial. Born in Virginia, reared principally in Tennessee, early inured to the hard task of clearing and improving farm lands, he gave himself further to helpful work by entering the local ministry of the Baptist Church. For ministerial work he was well equipped. His disposition was noble, his character above reproach, his education better than was customary in those days, and his command of language and fluency of speech noteworthy. The good that he accomplished by his missionary work it would be impossible to estimate; only eternity can reveal this. Feeling that he might secure success in the newer country of Texas he removed there and settled on a farm near Paris, it being his intention to give up ministerial work. He then brought his family to California and settled ten miles from Los Angeles, where he resumed preaching. Various towns had the benefit of his faithful service, and through his instrumentality Baptist congregations were organized in places where previously no effort at concentrated religious effort had been made. Although he purchased a farm he had but little time to manage it; consequently his wife and children assumed the management of the land. When his health failed under the pressure of his heavy responsibilities, he removed to Pomona in 1889, purchased property, built a business block and a residence, and was prepared to spend a tranquil old age in this land of sunshine when, in 1890, he was called from earth, at the age of seventy-five years.

In 1851 Mr. Fuqua married Mrs. Johanna (Hathaway) Cross, who was born in Kentucky, reared in Missouri, and educated principally in St. Louis. When eighteen years of age she became the wife of William L. Cross, who died leaving one son, Thomas J. Cross. A few years later she was married to Mr. Fuqua, by whom she had the following children: Dora, Mrs. Thurman, of Pomona; John, a farmer; Mary, Mrs. Vine, of Los Angeles; Susan, deceased; Benjamin, who lives in Arizona; Joseph, a farmer near Pomona; Serena, Mrs. Hidden, of Los Angeles; and William Jephthie, of Lemon, Cal. Notwithstanding the care of rearing a large family, added to the difficulties of frontier life and the self-sacrificing work of a pioneer minister's wife, Mrs. Fuqua bears her years gracefully, and retains much of the activity of middle age, a fact which may be partly attributed to her habit of always casting off her burdens and keeping young, and therein lies a lesson for all.

A. FRY. Many of the substantial and satisfactory plastering contracts in the city of Los Angeles testify to the skill and conscientious application of A. Fry, one of the expert workers in his line in Southern California. The family of which Mr. Fry is a member has for many years been associated with Bristol, England, where he was born December 13, 1858, a son of Thomas and Ann (Shortman) Fry, the latter a native of Bristol, and a daughter of John Shortman, one of the city officials of the English city. The paternal grandfather, Abraham Fry, proved a splendid architect of his own fortunes, for, from the lowly position of tow boy on the Avon river, he rose to be captain of a boat and eventually part owner of a line of boats plying between Bristol and London. His son, Thomas, the father of A. Fry, was a market gardener near Bristol, and had a family of five children, two of whom are living, both in America. Of these, Simon, also a contractor, is living in Westerly, R. I.

It was fortunate that A. Fry was gifted with push and ambition; for his father's circumstances did not permit of many advantages for his children, and up to the age of twelve years he had received but six months of schooling. At that early age he began to look out for himself by working at the plasterer's trade, and started in as scaffold boy, working his way up through the five years of his apprenticeship, begun when sixteen years of age. At twenty-one he had qualified for the most expert work, and afterward followed the trade for three years in Bristol.

In 1879 Mr. Fry came to America and worked for a time in Chicago, eventually traveling south, and again north, from the Gulf to Canada. He also visited the west and middle west in search of a desirable location, and finally landed in Kansas City, Mo., where he found a position as contractor during the great boom of that city. He then went to Spokane, Wash., and in 1890 to Salt Lake City, finally bringing up in Portland, Ore. Not exactly satisfied with the prospects in any of these places, he repaired to San Francisco and remained a year. In 1893 he came to Los Angeles, which has since been his home. He has had some of the finest and most desirable contract work in the city, including the Christian Science Church and Shirley's residence, on Park View and Seventh street, and has worked up a large and appreciative trade. In addition to his other responsibilities he has been doing the contract plastering, cement and brick work for the Santa Fe Railroad Company, on their road between Bakersfield and Seligman. Outside of the city also there has been a demand for his substantial and reliable work, and at Needles he built the smelter for the Needles Smelting Company. Mr. Fry is public spirited in his attitude toward general affairs in Los Angeles, and his practical assistance may be counted on in an emergency touching the good of the community. He is affiliated with the Knights of Pythias in Chicago, and is a charter member of the Los Angeles Master Plasterers' Association, of which he has been financial secretary.

CHARLES S. GILBERT. Though by occupation a telegraph operator, Mr. Gilbert is now giving his attention to the duties of his positions as constable of Pomona and deputy sheriff of San José township, which offices he has filled with satisfaction to all. He is of eastern birth and lineage, born in Butler county, Ohio, in 1864, and there passed the years of boyhood and youth, completing his education in the high school. At an early age he began to learn telegraphy and as soon as he had mastered the science he secured employment as an operator. For eight years he was employed along the line of the Cincinnati, Hamilton &

John A. White.

Dayton Railroad, after which he was for five years in the employ of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railroad Company. In 1887 he was assigned to the station at Lordsburg, Los Angeles county, where he remained until 1892.

Having during his residence at Lordsburg become delighted with the beautiful valley of Pomona, Mr. Gilbert decided to remain here permanently. Accordingly he resigned his position as operator and at once began to identify himself with local affairs. Soon he was elected deputy sheriff and constable by the Republican party and these positions he has since held, by successive re-elections. It is his aim to discharge every duty in an exact and conscientious manner, and to uphold and sustain the law in all its workings. It is the testimony of the people that he is a fearless and capable officer. In the various places where he has lived it has been his custom to identify himself with certain fraternal organizations, and we find him active in the Independent Order of Foresters, in which he is now financial secretary and past chief ranger. Besides being past grand of the lodge of Odd Fellows, he is a member of the encampment and the Rebekahs, in the latter of which his wife is an active worker. In 1891 he was united in marriage with Miss Sadie Kidson, who was born in Boston, Mass., and they have one son, P. Howard Gilbert.

JOHN A. WHITE. Overlooking the beautiful Santa Clara valley and the towns of Oxnard and Hueneme, and affording a charming view of the ocean, stands the homestead of Mr. White, who in the selection of this ideal spot for a location was guided not alone by the beauty of surroundings, but also by the adaptability of the soil for the raising of certain products. His ranch comprises three hundred and eighty-five acres in Aliso Canon, Ventura county, and is under cultivation to beans, barley and several varieties of fruit. A number of fine horses may also be seen on the ranch, for the owner is a lover of live stock and has been successful in raising the same.

A pioneer of 1850 in California, Mr. White was born in Canterbury, Windham county, Conn., February 19, 1827. His father, Rev. George S. White, a native of Bath, England, born April 12, 1784, came to America in 1810 and established his home in Freeport, R. I. Having previously entered the ministry of the Church of England, he now became identified with pastoral work in the Episcopal denomination, holding pastorates both in Boston and Brooklyn. During the last twenty years of his useful existence he lived, retired from ministerial labors, in Canterbury, Conn., where he died in 1852, aged sixty-eight years. Before leaving England he married Miss Warmesley, who was born in Kent in 1785 and died in Connecticut, March 27, 1867. They were the parents of nine children, but John A. is the sole survivor. One of their grandsons, James White, is a leading publisher of New York City. A distinguished member of the same family was Dr. Andrew J. White, for many years a resident of New York City. While visiting in London, England, in 1898, his death occurred; the body was brought back to New York for interment. A man of charitable disposition, keenly interested in educational and philanthropic efforts, he was a generous contributor to many of these movements, and is particularly remembered owing to his contribution of $150,000 to Yale College as an endowment.

The grammar and high schools of his native county furnished John A. White with fair educational advantages, which have since been supplemented by habits of close observation and thoughtful reading. When he reached manhood California was the theme of many conversations by firesides of evenings, and many a boy, as he followed his plow all through the long day, dreamed dreams of the fortunes to be made in that far El Dorado. Led by the impulse which drew so many Argonauts westward, he bade farewell to home and friends at the age of twenty-three and started via the Isthmus of Panama for San Francisco, where he landed September 22, 1850. Going at once to the mines at Mokelumne Hill he worked there for two years, after which he returned to San Francisco and began to handle live stock with James M. Tice, under the firm name of Tice & White. To facilitate the raising of stock they secured a ranch at the mouth of the San Joaquin river near Antioch, the property being known as the New York ranch. There they kept several thousand head of sheep, hogs and cattle, and, in connection with the feeding and selling of stock, they also engaged in the butchering business. The partnership was dissolved in 1858, after which Mr. White traded in stock for many years, meantime making San Francisco his headquarters. In 1884 he returned to Connecticut to visit the friends of days gone by, and, on leaving again, settled in Bexar county, Tex., thirty miles from San Antonio, where he carried on a general stock business. In addition, he raised sheep on the Staked Plains. Selling out in 1891, he came to Southern California, since which time he has made his home on his present ranch, in Ventura county, and has given his attention to the development and improvement of the property.

Only a pioneer can appreciate the many experiences which fell to the lot of Mr. White during the '50s in California. The business in which he engaged, that of stock-raising, was one of great difficulty by reason of the scarcity of water, the high price of feed, the non-dependence of the ranges, and the presence in the state of a lawless element always to be found in a new mining country. His travels with stock took him all over the western country, through Utah, Nevada, New Mexico, Texas and Arizona. During the Civil war he took contracts to furnish the government with horses and mules for cavalry and transportation service. Ever since he became a voter he has been a believer in Republican doctrines and has been warmly interested in politics, although at no time has he desired the honors of office for himself.

In 1866 Mr. White was united in marriage with a sister of J. R. Willoughby, whose sketch appears elsewhere in this work. Two daughters were born of their union. The older, Mary W., is the wife of Major Ogden Rafferty, U. S. A., now stationed in the Philippines, where his wife has joined him. The younger, Phoebe Lucretia, married O. T. Fitzpatrick and has three children, Olivia, John and Mary. The family reside in Ventura county, where Mr. Fitzpatrick owns important interests. He is a native of Ireland and a son of Rev. Fitzpatrick, of the Episcopal Church, and Lady Olivia Fitzpatrick.

S. TUSTON ELDRIDGE. Los Angeles is indebted for some of her substantial buildings to S. T. Eldridge, who has been identified with the building interests of the city since 1883. He was born in Philadelphia, Pa., February 27, 1860, a son of S. Tuston and Ruth Ann (Pierce) Eldridge, natives respectively of Bucks county, Pa., and Dover, Del. The grandfather, Jacob, was born in England and was an early settler in Bucks county, where he remained on a farm until his death. S. Tuston, Sr., was reared on the home farm and became a hardware merchant in Philadelphia, where for thirty years he conducted business near the corner of Pine and Second streets. On selling his hardware business, he turned his attention to insurance, and continued to make his home in the Quaker City until he died. He was a stanch Republican, fraternally was an Odd Fellow, and in religion affiliated with the Presbyterian Church. Of his five children, four are living, S. Tuston, Jr., being the youngest and the only one in California. He graduated from the Philadelphia high school, and at the age of seventeen began to learn the carpenter's trade in Philadelphia, completing the same at Camden, N. J.

During 1880 Mr. Eldridge settled at Albuquerque, N. M., which was at that time the terminus of the Santa Fe Railroad. In November of 1883 he settled in Los Angeles, where he was at first a foreman with W. O. Burr, and from 1898 to 1901 was a general contractor. August 1, 1901, he formed a partnership with John B. Dawson, in the contracting and building business, under the firm name of Dawson & Eldridge. The firm have had, among other contracts, the following: Twentieth street school, Normal school addition, Los Angeles Railroad shops, First Congregational Church on Hope street, residence of H. Higgins on Wiltshire Boulevard and Rampart street, and the new car barns for the Pacific Electric Railroad Company, two hundred and sixty-four feet square, and located on the corner of Seventh street and Central avenue. While in the employ of Mr. Burr, Mr. Eldridge was foreman on the Van Nuys Hotel and several large buildings on Main street. While foreman for Mr. Dewar he built Los Angeles Railroad barn No. 1, 550x110 feet, and remodeled the People's Store.

In Los Angeles Mr. Eldridge married Ada L. Vosburg, who was born in South Lee, Mass. He was made a Mason in Albuquerque, N. M., in 1882, and is now a member of Pentalpha Lodge No. 202, of Los Angeles, Cal.; also the Fraternal Brotherhood. In national politics he votes with the Republicans. The Builders' Exchange and Modern Building Association number him among their members. He has added to the prosperity of Los Angeles both by his skill as a builder and by his business career of noticeable worth and uprightness.

FRANK GARCELON, M. D. This popular physician of Pomona descends from an old eastern family long resident in Maine, and in Androscoggin county, that state, he was born in 1848, a son of Harris Garcelon. When a boy he was given the best educational advantages that the state afforded, and, realizing the priceless value of a good education, he availed himself to the utmost of the opportunities offered him in Lewiston Falls Academy, Edward Little Institute and Bowdoin College. After having graduated in medicine in 1870, he opened an office at Livermore Falls. To a man of his ambitious temperament it is impossible to cease study with the close of college life, so we find him a constant and thoughtful student of medical journals, an interested witness of important surgical operations, and a quick appropriator to himself of such new remedial agencies as come to his knowledge.

With a desire to identify himself with the west, in 1880 Dr. Garcelon settled in Abilene, Kans., where he built up a profitable and extensive practice. However, the constant reminders concerning the splendid climate of California and particularly of Pomona, from letters written by Dr. Brown, a former medical student under him, and later a practicing physician of Pomona, did much toward calling his attention to the attractions of life near the Pacific ocean. In order to avail himself of the climatic advantages of Pomona, he relinquished a large practice in Kansas and came to this place, where for a year he practiced with Dr. Brown, but has since been alone. Besides the management of his private practice, which has assumed gratifying proportions, he has served acceptably for six years as health officer of the city and the county, in which capacity he has given general satisfaction. In pursuing the noble calling of medicine he has won laurels for himself. Through his studies and reading he keeps abreast with modern discoveries in the science and the proper application of the same. The same ability which has given him prominence as a physician is always at the service of the community in which he lives. To the promotion of meritorious enterprises he is a contributor. In Masonry he is past master of the Blue Lodge, also past high priest of the Pomona Chapter and past commander of the Southern California Commandery. By his marriage to Eleanor Coffin, a native of Maine, he has two children, namely: Harris, who is a medical student in Los Angeles; and Eleanor, who is attending the Pomona schools.

HENRY X. GOETZ. The fact that Mr. Goetz has made Santa Monica his home since May, 1887, entitles him to a position among its pioneers, for he came here within a very few months after the incorporation of the city. By birth a Canadian, he unites the thrifty traits of his race with the genial characteristics of his Irish ancestry and the persevering industry of his German forefathers. Many years ago his grandfather, Cassius Goetz, came from Germany to America and settled on a farm in Ontario, where he died at about eighty years of age. While the family were crossing the Atlantic a son was born, whom they named Andrew. In time this son became a farmer near the old homestead and still continues in the same place, but is now retired from active labors. When a young man he married Elizabeth Berry, who was born in county Wicklow, Ireland, and crossed the ocean to Canada at the age of fourteen years. Born of their union were eight children, all but one of whom still survive. One of the sons, John A., resides in Oxnard, Cal.; another, W. B., is in Los Angeles; and a third, Henry X., the oldest of the children, is a contractor and builder in Santa Monica. He was born on the homestead near Guelph, Ontario, August 7, 1861, and spent his boyhood years in alternating farm work with school studies. Later he learned the carpenter's trade at Walkerville, Canada. In April, 1883, he removed to Victoria, British Columbia, where he engaged in contracting.

On coming to California Mr. Goetz engaged in the building business at San Francisco. After eleven months there, in October, 1886, he came to Los Angeles, and in May of the following year settled in Santa Monica. Among his contracts may be mentioned those for the Bank building, a part of the Steer block, North Beach bathhouse, power house, Presbyterian Church, Santa Monica hotel, Academy of Holy Name (for which he also drew the plans), Lincoln school, and many elegant residences of Santa Monica, besides a number in Los Angeles, the power house in Santa Barbara, etc. He is a member of the Los Angeles Builders' Exchange. His marriage took place in Los Angeles and united him with Miss Catherine Genevieve Wood, who was born in San Francisco, her parents and grandfathers having been early settlers of that city. The children born of their union are Joseph, Mary and Milton. The Democratic party has a firm supporter in Mr. Goetz, who has been a member of the county central committee several years and was also a member of the first committee of fifty for the reorganization of the Democratic party in the county. As a local leader of the party he has done much to promote its welfare and advance its cause. Active in the work of the Foresters of America, at this writing he is deputy grand chief ranger of the Foresters of his home district, and has done much to awaken an interest in this order among the people of this locality.

W. E. KIMMELL. The great brotherhood of engineers has no more capable addition to its ranks than W. E. Kimmell, chief in charge of the engineering department of the cracker and biscuit manufactory of Bishop & Company. Before coming to Los Angeles in 1892 Mr. Kimmell had experienced the varying fortunes of the rancher and business man, and in his chosen occupation had qualified for any position, however responsible. At first he was engineer for the Hughes mill, later was connected in the same capacity with the high school, and in 1895 was appointed to his present important post. He operates an engine with a two hundred pound boiler capacity.

A native of Flushing, Genesee county, Mich., Mr. Kimmell was born December 28, 1853, and is a son of Rev. S. B. Kimmell, born in Pennsylvania, and member of a family long connected with that state. Rev. Mr. Kimmell, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, carried on his humanitarian work in different parts of Michigan, Detroit, Howell, Holly, Flushing and South Saginaw being among his principal charges. After a life of ceaseless activity he came to Southern California in 1890, and is now living on a ranch at Hemet in comparative retirement from large responsibilities. His wife, formerly Sarah Freeman, was born at Seville, Medina county, Ohio, a daughter of Rev. Rufus Freeman, a local clergyman in the Baptist Church at Seville. He was at one time a large land owner and extensive agriculturist in Medina county, and organized the Ohio Farmers' Insurance Company, with headquarters at Westfield, Ohio, and of which enterprise he was president for many years, and up to the time of his death. Mrs. Kimmell, who is still living, is the mother of four children, of whom W. E. is the oldest.

The education acquired in the public schools and during a two years' course at the University of Michigan, was utilized by Mr. Kimmell in teaching in different parts of Michigan. Upon removing to South Dakota, he homesteaded land near Castleton, and engaged in ranching and raised stock on a large scale. He also engaged as a stationary engineer for five years, following which he removed to Melrose, Minn., and engaged in a general merchandise business for three years. He afterwards built and operated a creamery for two years, or until his removal to Los Angeles in 1892. In Michigan he married Lillie A. Hood, who was born in Shiawassee county, that state, and of this union there is one child, Ernest W.

Mr. Kimmell is not only one of the best engineers on the coast, but he possesses a cultivated mind, and is well abreast of current events. His pronounced executive ability has been demonstrated in many ways, not the least important of which is in connection with the presidency of the California Division No. 2, National Association of Stationary Engineers, of which he is at present a member of the educational committee. He is also active in the Epworth League. As a member of the official board of the Methodist Episcopal Church he exerts an influence for all-around good, and he is also a teacher in the Sunday-school.

ROBERT MCPHERSON. No name is more closely connected with the early growth and development of Orange county than that of Robert McPherson. Of Scottish descent, he traces his ancestry back through the name of McPherson to the original historic and heroic clan, so conspicuous in Scottish life. William McPherson, his father, in the early part of the eighteenth century, moved from Deering, N. H., to New York, where he was a most successful and prosperous farmer, and there reared a family of seven children.

Robert, the youngest son, was born in Chamont, Jefferson county, N. Y., in 1841, and there received his education at the Bellville Academy and Jefferson County Institute. At the age of seventeen he began teaching school in his home state, and in 1860 came to California, where he continued his profession of teaching school for a time, but later associated himself with his brother, Stephen McPherson, in mercantile pursuits in the northern part of the state. After years of close observation, and believing in the great possibilities of the fruit industry, he removed to the place which afterwards took the name of McPherson (named in his honor) then a part of Los Angeles county, but now Orange county. The firm of McPherson Bros., of which Robert McPherson was the head, secured a large and beautiful tract of land, and engaged in the production, packing and shipping raisins and other products of Southern California, in which they were abundantly successful. To facilitate the handling of these products, the largest packing house in the state was built and completely equipped, which became the center of attraction for all who were interested in the future prospects of the great fruit industry. The large shipments attracted the attention of the officials of the Southern Pacific Railroad, who deemed the business worthy a better outlet. Through Mr. McPherson the railroad negotiated the rights-of-way, terms and conditions which resulted in the building of the Tustin Branch of that road.

The name of Robert McPherson is associated with many of the large and important undertakings of the Pacific Coast. He is known and honored for his honest dealings and strict integrity, and the success which has rewarded his efforts is justly merited. Mr. McPherson is now a resident of Los Angeles, having moved there to be nearer the interests that now occupy his attention. In politics he is a staunch Republican, and while he has done much for the party, he has never held office, his business being such as to occupy his entire attention.

Mrs. McPherson was Ann Jane Goldsworthy, a daughter of Richard Goldsworthy, an early pioneer. Mr. and Mrs. McPherson became the parents of four children, two daughters, now married, and two sons, the youngest, R. E. McPherson, now deceased, and A. W. McPherson, who now holds a position with the Southern Pacific Railroad at Santa Monica, Cal.

JOSEPH PRETER. The vicinity of Lake Constance, and the village of Watterdingen, Baden, Germany, hold many associations connected with the family of Preter, all of whom were trusted and honored members of the community, and identified with the commercial and agricultural life surrounding the lake. Here the paternal grandfather, Basil, was born, reared, and followed his trade of cooper manufacturer, and here also Mathias Preter, the father of Joseph, and his mother, Jenevive (Kauth) Preter, were born, and spent their lives. The father had a farm near Lake Constance, where he lived until his death at the age of sixty-two years, his wife pre-deceasing him at the age of forty-seven years. Mathias Preter was, like his forefathers, a member of the Catholic Church, and he served his country during the revolution of 1848.

Of the six children in his father's family Joseph Preter is the only son living and the only child in America. He was born at Lake Constance March 4, 1859, was reared on the farm and obtained his education in the public schools. At the age of fourteen he followed the example of the other youth in the neighborhood and was apprenticed to learn a trade, his father's selection for him being that of cabinet-maker. After a service of two and one-half years he became a journeyman cabinet-maker, taking his way through Switzerland, France, and different parts of Germany, accumulating the while a large fund of general information by reason of his association with the various peoples with whom he came in contact. In 1880 he immigrated to America and settled in Hammond, Ind., where he worked at the carpenter's trade until 1881. A later field of endeavor was in St. Paul, Minn., where he worked at his trade until 1887, locating thereafter in Los Angeles, Cal., where, after the expiration of two years, he began contracting and building. Many residences and buildings in the town are attributable to his enterprise and proper understanding of his chosen occupation, and he has himself a pleasant and comfortable residence at No. 1109 East Twentieth street.

The marriage of Mr. Preter and Anna Clara Hutter occurred in St. Paul, Minn., the parents of Mrs. Preter coming originally from Ohio. Four children are the result of this union, Arthur Anthony, Marie Lora, Florence Jennie and Joseph Rudolph. Mr. Preter is a member of the Master Builders' Association, and is fraternally connected with the Maccabees. In national politics he is independent.

R. J. CRAIG. The residences and public buildings erected in Long Beach by R. J. Craig are not only more numerous than are those attributed to other builders in the town, but much of his work has a particular significance, in that it was the very beginning of what has since proved a prosperous and thoroughly delightful community. He is therefore the pioneer architect and builder of the place, and so well has he wrought that his services are in invariable demand, and his reputation extends far beyond the boundaries of his adopted city. Preceded by years of practical experience in different parts of the east he came here in the spring of 1886, and for years devoted himself exclusively to the architectural part of his work, but in more recent times has combined building with the execution of his architectural plans. To enumerate the many structures which have arisen under his guidance and practical assistance were indeed a trying task, but some idea may be gained of his untiring industry by the mention of the Methodist Episcopal Church, the city hall, the pavillion on the beach, the Lowe & Bixby, Almind, Campbell and Stafford blocks, the Park View Hotel, the Garvin House, the Stafford residence and the Bellview Lodge.

The youth of Mr. Craig was uneventfully passed in Canada, and he was born in Quebec, April 16, 1848. The paternal great-grandfather Craig came originally from Scotland and settled in the North of Ireland to secure more tolerance in religious belief, and his son, Andrew, the paternal grandfather, was the first American representative, settling near Quebec on his emigration from Ireland. He was a farmer by occupation, and died in the land of his adoption. George F. Craig, the father of R. J., was born in the North of Ireland, and like his father was a farmer in Canada. When his son, R. J., was seven years of age he removed to the vicinity of Guelph, Ontario, and continued to farm, and in 1883 located in Osceola county, Mich., near Reed City, where he farmed and raised stock up to the time of his death. He was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He married Eliza Orr, who was born in the North of Ireland and came to the Province of Quebec with her grandfather. Mrs. Craig is the mother of twelve children, ten of whom are living, and although seventy-five years of age is still enjoying the best of health. Of the children, two sons are in Michigan, two in Iowa, one daughter is in Canada, one in New Mexico, one in Calcutta, India, and two in Long Beach.

Mr. Craig was educated in the public schools of Canada, and at the age of nineteen began teaching school in order to make money for his higher education. He entered the Victoria College and remained for a year, when, owing to impaired health, he was obliged to relinquish for the time being further attempts at study. In order to make a livelihood he engaged as a book-keeper, and at the same time began the study of architecture in Listowell, Ontario, where he remained for five years. In 1878 he removed to Reed City, Mich., and engaged in architectural work and in building, and soon worked up a large trade and did much towards the upbuilding of the town. He put up the Methodist Episcopal Church and many fine residences and public buildings, and for eight years made a success of a calling for which he was particularly adapted. In 1886 he located in Ontario, San Bernardino county, Cal., and continued his former success as a builder for a short time, but not being impressed with the prospects of a permanent residence there came to Long Beach in the spring of the same year.

In Reed City, Mich., Mr. Craig married Martha Hall, a native of the vicinity of Lansing, Mich., and who died in Ontario, Cal. Of this union there was one child, Arthur, who is attending the high-school. Since coming to Long Beach Mr. Craig has married Victoria Ferguson, a native of Ontario, and of Scotch descent. Four children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Craig, Vera, Herbert, Leslie and Gertrude. Mr. Craig is a Republican in national politics but is not radical in his belief. He is connected with the Independent Order of Foresters, and is a member of the board of trustees and ex-Sunday school superintendent of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He has won by his admirable citizenship and mastery of his chosen occupation, the confidence and esteem of the entire community.

OWEN McALEER. The McAleer family is one of the oldest in county Tyrone, Ireland, where its members have been influential and prominent as far back as the genealogy can be traced. Owen McAleer, Sr., was born in Inniskillen, county Tyrone, where his father, Nicholas, was a merchant tailor. In early manhood he came to America and settled on a farm in Ontario, Canada, later removing to Youngstown, Ohio, where he remained until his death. Mary Miller, who became his wife, was born in Carlisle, England, and now lives at Youngstown, Ohio. Her father, Jacob, was the son of Jacob Miller, Sr., a soldier at Waterloo under the Duke of Wellington; he married a Miss Teague, daughter of a Scotch nobleman, and afterward made his home in Carlisle, England.

The family of Owen McAleer, Sr., comprised six sons and two daughters, of whom five sons are now living. The oldest of the survivors is Owen, Jr., who was born at Liscard, Canada, February 3, 1858. When a boy he had no advantages whatever and his entire attendance at school did not exceed three months, for he was obliged to work early and late in order to help keep the family together. Though he had no opportunities for himself, he was ambitious for the other members of the family, and it was through his efforts that two of his brothers received collegiate educations. Of his four brothers John and Torrence are employed in Youngstown, Ohio; Thomas is with his brother Owen in the Baker iron works, Los Angeles; and James is proprietor of a gents' furnishing store at Youngstown and manager of the St. Louis base ball team.

When nine years of age Owen McAleer entered the boiler shop of W. B. Pollock & Co., where he remained until 1872, and then for three years was employed in a grocery. Returning to the boiler works in 1875, he remained with the same firm until 1884, when he started the Youngstown boiler works. Two years later he sold out and bought a one-third interest in the boiler and bridge works at Newtonia, Ohio. Selling out there in 1888, he came to California, intending to open a business in Los Angeles, but not finding an available opening he entered the employ of the Baker iron works as a boiler manufacturer. Two months later he went north, but in August Mr. Baker sent for him to return and take charge of the boiler department, since which time he has filled the position of foreman. His long connection with the plant proves his ability and his thorough knowledge of the business; indeed, few are more familiar than he with all the details connected with boiler-making. In the spring of 1901 he accepted an appointment as member of the examining board of stationary engineers, and he is also connected with Los Angeles Division No. 2, National Association of Stationary Engineers. In politics he is a firm Republican, a thorough believer in party principles. If he has any hobby besides that in connection with his special occupation, it is his love for fine horses, and he confesses to a weakness for standard-bred equines, of which he owns a number himself.

The McAleer residence, at No. 236 North avenue 23, is presided over by Mrs. McAleer, who was formerly Gertrude Mullally and was born in Covington, Ky., her father, Richard Mullally, being at this writing manager of Fuller's wholesale salt business.

SAMUEL A. MARCHANT. The proportion of English-born residents of Southern California is not large, but their activity and success in horticultural pursuits are everywhere acknowledged. Among their number is Mr. Marchant, who has made his home in Tustin since 1894 and owns a ranch of seventeen acres, under cultivation to walnuts and apricots. He was born in Brighton, England, September 27, 1835, being a son of William and Elizabeth (Elphick) Marchant, lifelong residents of England. By occupation his father was a miller, while his maternal grandfather, Joseph Elphick, was a merchant tailor.

The next to the youngest among seven children and the only survivor of the entire family, Samuel A. Marchant was reared in Brighton, and received a fair grammar-school education. From the age of thirteen until eighteen he worked at the printer's trade. On the 4th of July, 1853, he left home for the new world, embarking on the City of Manchester at Liverpool and arriving in Philadelphia after a voyage of seventeen days. His point of destination was Ripley, Ohio, where his brother, William, was engaged in the milling business. He learned the trade under his brother and then proceeded to Georgetown, Ohio, where he operated a mill. Later he was similarly occupied near Hillsboro in Highland county. In 1856 he married Miss Harriet Huggins and then settled upon a farm, where he remained a few years. Changing his location to Illinois in 1859, he settled in Vermilion county, near Hoopeston, where he bought a raw tract of prairie land, comprising one hundred and sixty acres. This he broke and improved and afterward sold at a fair profit. Another tract was then purchased, placed under cultivation and sold. In 1872 he removed to Des Moines county, Iowa, and purchased two hundred and sixty acres near Danville, where he carried on general farm pursuits, also raised stock, and operated a dairy and cheese factory, making a specialty of the manufacture of full cream cheese. From Iowa he came to California and has since made his home in Tustin.

The first wife of Mr. Marchant was born in Ohio and died in Illinois. Of that union seven children were born, five of whom attained mature years, namely: Mrs. Lizzie Shellenberger, of Santa Ana; Ira Lincoln, a farmer at Tustin;

John, who died in Iowa at the age of twenty-two years; Silas, a merchant in Pasadena, and Dora, who died in Iowa. The second marriage of Mr. Marchant was solemnized in Iowa and united him with Sarah Turner, who was born in Indiana. They became the parents of two children, but only one, Grace D., is now living. Politically Mr. Marchant is a believer in Republican principles. He is an active worker in Immanuel Baptist Church of Santa Ana, and officiates as a deacon in the same. All movements for the benefit of the county receive his support, especially such as are for the development of the horticultural resources or the irrigation facilities on which success so largely depends. The Southern California Walnut Growers' Association numbers him among their members, and he has maintained an interest in the progress of this organization.

FRED MEIER. One of the capable and promising builders of Los Angeles is Fred Meier, whose thorough understanding of his interesting and ever broadening occupation has resulted in lasting benefit to the city of his adoption. If no other illustration of his masterful handling were forthcoming, St. Joseph's Church, now approaching completion, one of the truly fine samples of ecclesiastical architecture in Southern California, would stand as a monument to his harmonious conception of unity, appropriateness, and extreme beauty. The parish house connected with the church is also the work of Mr. Meier, and in no way detracts from the composition as a whole.

The youth of Mr. Meier was spent in the town of Marne, Schleswig-Holstein, Germany, where he was born May 9, 1865, a son of John and Wepke (Haase) Meier, natives of the same province. The father was superintendent of public highways in his locality, and filled this responsible position for about twenty years. In 1887 he came to America and settled upon a farm near Glencoe, Minn., where his death eventually occurred. There were nine children born to himself and wife, eight of whom attained maturity, Fred Meier being the fourth, and the only one in America.

When seventeen years of age Mr. Meier came to America with his brother Peter, and upon his arrival in Chicago in 1882, began at once to learn the carpenter's trade. At the end of eighteen months he removed to Will county, Ill., and worked for nine months, and then settled in Glencoe, Clark county, Minn., and worked at his trade until 1887. A fitting field of activity seemed to present itself in Tacoma, Wash., whither he removed from Minnesota in 1887 and remained until 1893, at which time his fortunes were shifted to Los Angeles, and he worked at his trade and also became foreman for the Mechanic mills. In January of 1901 he began contracting and building, and his successful start argues well for continued appreciation in the future.

While living in Glencoe, Minn., Mr. Meier married Martha Fritz, a native of Danzig, Germany, and of this union there are five children, John, Kate, Louis, Edward and Mary. Mr. Meier is a Democrat in national politics, and is a member of St. Joseph's Catholic Church, and St. Joseph's Society. He is a man of high ideals other than those which enter into his occupation, and his many sterling personal qualities have won for him the high regard of all with whom he has been associated.

J. A. MERMILLIOD. There are few parts of the world which have not been visited by J. A. Mermilliod, either in his capacity as an engineer in the French navy, or as an expert stationary engineer. Up to the time of his incumbency as chief engineer of the Ice and Cold Storage Company's plant at Los Angeles in April of 1901, his life had been extremely varied, and his association with every department of his favorite occupation so extensive that he is entitled to the enviable reputation of being one of the finest engineers on the coast.

A native of Fontainebleau, France, Mr. Mermilliod was born August 10, 1865, a son of Capt. Anthony Mermilliod, one of the most seasoned salts that ever mastered a vessel. Capt. Anthony was born in Geneva, Switzerland, and as master of a vessel in the merchant marine visited many ports and many seas. He was subsequently a navigator in the French navy, and participated in the Crimean war. His wife, formerly Julia Robineaux, was born in Macon, France, and at present lives in Geneva, Switzerland. She is the mother of five children, all of whom are living, J. A. being the only one in America. In his youth Mr. Mermilliod received the advantages of a thorough French training in the public schools, later graduating from the Polytechnic school in Zurich, Switzerland, one of the finest institutions of its kind in the world. Owing to his father's example he naturally became interested in maritime affairs, and when seventeen years of age entered the French navy as an engineer. During the three years of his service he went all over the world, and in his travels rounded Cape Horn four times and sailed through the Suez canal four times. In 1886 he was honorably discharged, and in December of the same year came to America and landed in New Orleans, where he was employed as machinist and draughtsman in a sugar refinery and sugar house works. With the termination of this position began a series of travels throughout the country, resulting from his position as erecting engineer for the Cincinnati Ice Machine Company, with whom he remained for five years, and in whose interests he visited thirty-two states and territories. He was later employed by the American Cotton Oil Company as supervising engineer of their mill in Mississippi, and still later was with the Illinois Central Railroad for a few years. In Vicksburg, Miss., and Wilkesbarre he worked as an expert machinist and renovated ice plants, and accomplished the same good results in Rio Janeiro, Brazil. In the meantime he had been a correspondent for the Chicago Ice and Refrigeration, and still contributes readable and instructive articles to this periodical.

In April of 1901 Mr. Mermilliod came to Los Angeles upon the recommendation of the above mentioned Chicago people, and has since been chief engineer of the Ice and Cold Storage Company's plant, which is the largest enterprise of the kind west of Kansas City. The plant has a capacity of one million cubic feet cold storage, and manufactures one hundred and forty tons of ice a day.

In Vicksburg, Miss., Mr. Mermilliod married Alice Moguin, a native of Vicksburg, and of this union there is one son, Warren. Mr. Mermilliod is a broad-minded liberal man, and is wonderfully well posted on affairs in every part of the world. A keen power of observation and the intelligence to assimilate his acquired knowledge, renders him a most interesting companion and entertainer. He is a member of the National Association of Stationary Engineers, California Lodge No. 2.

J. W. MORRISON. The earliest memories of Mr. Morrison are connected with his childhood home on Prince Edward Island, Canada, where he was born in the vicinity of Charlottetown, December 23, 1858. His father, John, was a native of the same northern island, and his grandfather, Hector, was born on the Isle of Mull, Scotland, and in time became a farmer on Prince Edward Island. John Morrison was a magistrate, a clerk of the courts, and served in various official capacities, his active life covering a period of more than seventy years. He was a Presbyterian, and was a cousin of David Livingstone, the great explorer. He married Elizabeth Smith, daughter of Andrew Smith, a native of Inverness, Scotland, and, after emigrating to America, a farmer on Prince Edward Island. Mrs. Morrison, who died on Prince Edward Island, was the mother of seven children, all of whom are living, J. W. being the youngest. Of the other children, Alexander is in San Francisco; H. J. and Andrew are in Portland, Ore.; and Laughlin is living on the old homestead in Canada. Two sisters also are in Canada.

On his father's farm in the east J. W. Morrison was reared to man's estate, and was educated in the public schools. As an aid to the future he learned the trade of carpenter, and in 1882 removed to Portland, Ore., where his brothers were prominent builders and contractors. In 1884 he began a nine years' residence in Tacoma, Wash., where he built many residences and public buildings, and superintended the erection of the city hall, and put up the Grand Pacific hotel. In 1893 he located in Los Angeles and engaged in contracting and building, and among his most creditable accomplishments may be mentioned the Fremont Hotel, on Fourth and Olive streets; the Portsmouth, on Hill street; the three-story brick Nateck hotel, and many residences. He also erected many buildings in Santa Monica. In the fall of 1897 Mr. Morrison sought the quicker way to wealth supposed to await the industrious in the Klondyke, and, strange to tell, his experiences were by no means discouraging. After a year he returned to Los Angeles, and in 1899 substantiated his faith in the frozen north by again seeking to wrest from the earth its hidden treasures, a quest unusually successful, and prolific of a decidedly agreeable impression of a country that to the majority represents disaster and intense suffering. Upon his return to Los Angeles, Mr. Morrison again took up his former occupation of building, and it is no exaggeration to say that he is not excelled in his line in the city.

The marriage of Mr. Morrison and Jessie Fraser occurred in Tacoma, Wash., Mrs. Morrison being a native of Nova Scotia, and a descendant of an old Scotch family. To Mr. and Mrs. Morrison have been born two children, Bessie and Lloyd Fraser. Mr. Morrison is a staunch Republican. Fraternally he is connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the Encampment, and the Ancient Order United Workmen. With his family he attends the Presbyterian Church.

A. NIEMEYER, proprietor of the Central Avenue winery, the Los Angeles depot for the Eagle Rock vineyards at Verdugo, was born at Guttenberg, Clayton county, Iowa, April 1, 1868. His father, Henry Bernard, was born in Prussia, and was a tailor by trade in his native land. When twenty-three years of age he came to Cincinnati, and later removed to Guttenberg, where he engaged in a general merchandise and tailoring business, until his removal to Los Angeles in 1873. He purchased ten acres of land on Central avenue from Ninth to Twelfth streets and started a horticultural and wine-making business. In 1883 he bought the present site of the Eagle Rock vineyards; set out his vines and got things started. His manufactory in the city had been placed on a paying basis when he was killed by the cars, September 30, 1891. His wife, Mary Ann (Weber) Niemeyer, was born near Munich, Germany, and came with her parents to Cincinnati, Ohio, later removing to Clayton county, Iowa, of which they were pioneers. Mrs. Niemeyer, who is still living, is the mother of four children, two sons and two daughters.

Alfred Volpe

When his father removed to California Mr. Niemeyer was but five years of age, and his education was therefore acquired in his adopted city of Los Angeles. He attended the public schools and St. Vincent's College, and from earliest childhood began to learn all about the growing of grapes and the making of wine. He eventually assisted his father in the conduct of his business, and in 1890 became sole manager of the enterprise. Until 1900 he lived at the Eagle Rock vineyards, and then removed into Los Angeles, turning over the care of the vineyards to his mother. He still utilizes the grapes from the forty acres comprising the vineyard, and in all uses the product of about a hundred acres. In the city he has a fine wine cellar, also the lots on which are built his winery and other buildings on the corner of Eleventh street and Central avenue, and which principal building is 46x105 feet in dimensions. A large retail and wholesale business is carried on successfully, and Mr. Niemeyer is also agent for the East Side Brewing Company.

The marriage of Mr. Niemeyer and Mary Cecilia Maxey was solemnized in Los Angeles, Mrs. Niemeyer being a native of Denver, Colo., and a daughter of J. J. Maxey, a capitalist of Denver and Los Angeles. Six children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Niemeyer, viz.: A. J. W., Bernard E., Mary C., Zeno W., Lorenzo and Henry James. Mr. Niemeyer is independent in politics, and is a member of St. Joseph's Catholic Church.

ALFRED DOLGE. Many and varied have been the experiences that have given individuality and prominence to the career of Alfred Dolge, who is now engaged in the wholesale wine business at No. 829 South Spring street, Los Angeles. He was born in Chemnitz, Saxony, December 22, 1848. At the age of thirteen he entered the piano factory of A. Dolge & Co., the president of this being his father, August Dolge. At the age of seventeen he crossed the ocean to New York, where he completed his studies in piano construction. Meantime he was making a thorough study of the business, during the course of which he found that the hammer leather made in the United States was far inferior to that manufactured in Germany. Believing he could dispose of the better article, he ordered a small shipment and immediately sold the same at a profit of several hundred dollars, this forming his first capital. Afterward he ordered constantly increasing consignments. At the same time, having proved the superiority of Poehlmann's wire to the Rollason wire, he began to import the same. In 1871 he organized the Eagle Felt Company, who began business with a single bale of wool in a small loft in Brooklyn. Discouraging failures followed the first experiments and the partners withdrew. However, the enterprising young German continued undismayed and finally succeeded in producing a superior quality of felt. In less than two years after purchasing his first bale of wool he was making a better quality of felt than had been manufactured in Europe up to that time; realizing this, he determined to make an exhibition of his hammer felt at the Vienna Exposition of 1873. Six weeks after the opening of the fair he reached Vienna, but found his shipment of felt had been broken open and the contents badly damaged by water and dirt. By the time he had his felts in position the judges had finished their labors, but he persuaded them to examine his exhibit, and the result was that he received the first prize, a medal and a diploma. The Vienna award was followed by the receipts of large orders from the piano manufacturers of Europe, which rendered an enlargement of the factory necessary.

Finding a suitable location at Brockett's Bridge, two hundred miles from New York, he purchased a factory site and in 1874 established a factory there, but retained his New York store. At the Centennial in 1876 he received two medals and a diploma. About this time he built a second factory, for the manufacture of sounding boards. In 1882 large granite felt mills were erected, all the materials used for the same being taken from neighboring quarries and forests. In 1883 he began the manufacture of felt shoes, which business was later sold to the Daniel Green Shoe Company. By the request of the villagers, in 1882 the name of Brockett's Bridge was changed to Dolgeville, in honor of the man to whom the prosperity of the town was due. Not only had he built factories there, but school-houses as well, and one of the schools was largely supported by his private contributions. Two large parks were presented by him to the village and he maintained all expense connected with the same. The academy and free library were built by him, and he advanced to the Turn Verein $40,000, with which to erect a Turner Hall, with gymnasium, theater, banquet halls, etc. Never once were the factories closed until the financial depression of 1893-94, when they were shut down for three months; on starting up again, new tariff conditions made a new standard of business operations and wages necessary, although even then they were higher than those paid for similar work anywhere in America or Europe.

Many pages might be filled with a recital of the good Mr. Dolge accomplished in working among his employes, in seeing that they received wages enough to live on comfortably, and in promoting their welfare in every way possible, but suffice it to say that he has ever been a friend of labor, and has cherished the belief that eventually manufacturers will make their employes partners in their business. When the disaster came to him that left him with absolutely nothing, he did not allow the heavy misfortune to embitter him nor the deceit of some to engender in his mind a distrust for all; but has come to his new surroundings and his new work with energy, hopefulness and the same broad mental equipments which won him success in former years.

ERNST DOLGE. Overlooking Pasadena, in the foothills of the San Gabriel valley, lies Fair Oaks ranch, of which Ernst Dolge is the capable superintendent. The history of this place is carried back to the days before the Civil war, when its owner was the gallant general, Albert Sidney Johnston. Later it became the property of J. F. Crank, who erected thereon a mansion costing $35,000 and made other improvements of great value. At a subsequent period it was cultivated and occupied by Alfred Dolge, formerly of New York, and when he removed to Los Angeles, November 1, 1901, the owners of Fair Oaks appointed his son, Ernst, to take charge of the three hundred acres comprising the tract. Among the ranches of California this is one of the best known, and tourists from the east constantly visit it in order to see the beauties of which they have often heard. In climate and location the estate is ideal. With an elevation of twelve hundred feet, it lies to the west of San Jacinto mountains, while on the south may be seen the ocean with Catalina island in the distance, and on the west and north may be seen the snowy caps of the mountains. The land having a gradual slope receives excellent natural drainage, while the fertility of the soil insures gratifying crops. On the ranch are almost four thousand citrus trees, these being Washington navels, Thompson improved navels, Mediterranean sweets, Australian navels and seedlings. Recently the eight hundred lemon trees have come into bearing, with excellent promises for future returns. In the vineyards are one hundred and nineteen thousand vines, producing as high as five hundred and fifty tons of grapes in a single season, the varieties being Blue Elbe, Mission, Muscat, Malvoisie, Zinfandel, Trousseau and Rose of Peru. There are one hundred and seventy-five olive trees, and one hundred deciduous trees for home use. Fifty acres are in citrus trees, one hundred and forty-seven in vineyards, one hundred in grain, the balance being utilized for lawns surrounding the residence. Water is supplied by the Precipice Canon Water Company and accumulates in a reservoir of six hundred thousand gallons capacity, for use in orchards and vineyards, while another reservoir provides water for the house, barns and garden.

The high degree of cultivation established by former superintendents has been maintained and even advanced under the administration of the present manager, Mr. Dolge, who is an enterprising, intelligent and resourceful young man. He was born in New York City in 1880 and was given every advantage which the large wealth of the family rendered possible, but, while preparing for Cornell University, his father, Alfred Dolge, was robbed of his vast property through the cunning and dishonesty of other parties. Thrown thus suddenly and unexpectedly upon his own resources, the disaster developed the fine qualities which he possessed and which, otherwise, might have laid dormant. At first he taught school in Stratford, N. Y., but in September, 1899, he came to California, joining his father at Fair Oaks ranch. Up to that time he had never been on a farm nor had he felt any interest in agriculture or horticulture, but he at once began to study these sciences, and took correspondence courses in the same, also in the culture of vines. Every book pertaining to this subject he read with eagerness, often spending long hours at night in study after the day's work had been ended. In this way he acquired the best ideas of the most successful workers in the varied fields of activity, and these researches have proved of inestimable value to him in his practical experience. Frequently he has been called upon to prepare articles for publication bearing on those topics in which he is most deeply interested, and horticulturists who have for years made a study of the occupation speak with the highest respect of his broad information and excellent ideas concerning horticulture. In the work of the Pasadena Farmers' Club he maintains an interest, as he does in all those organizations that benefit his community. As yet he has not participated in politics, but he is a staunch Republican and at some time may possibly identify himself with political movements.

JOHN G. PATERSON. After a seafaring life which took him into many of the principal ports of the world, Mr. Paterson came to California, his residence in Los Angeles dating from April 24, 1886. He was born at sea, in the Indian ocean, under the English flag, May 29, 1853, being the youngest child of Capt. James Irving and Charlotte (Craik) Paterson, natives of Scotland. His father and grandfather were born on the Orkney Islands, and the former, who became master of a vessel, sailed all over the world, finally dying of jungle fever on the west coast of Africa. His wife had died in England in 1854. They were the parents of five children, but only two are now living.

Upon graduating from the Greenwich naval school in 1868, John G. Paterson entered the English merchant marine service and sailed to Valparaiso on the Arau, later returning to England. Again in 1869 he sailed to South America, going this time to Callio, where he joined a civil engineering corps and secured employment in railroad surveying. Almost three years were spent in this manner, in the employ of an English gentleman, after which he was employed in boiler works in Chile for nine months. Returning to England, in 1875 he sailed to Port Blakeley, with the intention of going to mines in British Columbia, but instead he remained on the sound for two years, working as a marine engineer.

The year 1877 found Mr. Paterson in California. His first employment in this state was as fireman on the Central Pacific Railroad, and later he engaged as a marine and stationary engineer at Eureka, Humboldt county. On coming to Los Angeles, he was employed for almost two years as fireman with the Los Angeles Electric Company and later was fireman with the Los Angeles Railway Company in their old plant. Resigning this position, he was afterward for two years engaged in contracting in Hyde Park, next secured employment as fireman with the Pacific Cable Railway Company and then held a similar place with the Los Angeles Electric Company, later being engineer in the Hollenbeck hotel for a year. The council of Los Angeles appointed him deputy boiler inspector, August 31, 1897, and two years later promoted him to the office of city boiler inspector, to which office he was reappointed in 1901. His work is said to be exceptionally accurate and systematic. His attention is closely given to an oversight of the four hundred and fifty boilers in the city. Engineering in all of its branches he thoroughly understands, hence he is particularly well qualified to discharge the duties of his position in an efficient manner. By virtue of his inspectorship, he is ex-officio secretary of the examining board of engineers, and in this way is connected with one of the most important boards in the city. At one time he was vice-president of the National Association of Stationary Engineers, Los Angeles No. 2, his membership in which has been retained ever since its organization.

With his family, comprising four children, Lottie, Charles, Alice and Walter, Mr. Paterson makes his home at No. 970 East Eleventh street. In fraternal relations he is connected with the Independent Order of Foresters, while in politics he is a staunch Republican and at one time served as secretary of his ward club, besides in other ways identifying himself with local politics.

EDWARD NEISSER. During the period that has elapsed since he came to Los Angeles Mr. Neisser has worked his way forward to a position of prominence as an architect and superintendent of building. Many of the designs and plans furnished by him have had the merit of originality, with a further value from the standpoint of convenience and harmony. Particularly is this true of his plans for the Santa Barbara bath house and power house, the former of which is said to have no superior in Southern California. A number of large warehouses have been erected under his supervision and from his plans, while he has also designed many residences in various parts of his home city.

Though he has spent the greater part of his life in California, Mr. Neisser is of eastern birth and German parentage. His father, Moritz, who was born near Berlin, Germany, came to America in early manhood and engaged in merchandising in New York City. During the Civil war he took government contracts. Coming to California in 1873, he opened a general store in Sonoma county, but two years later removed to San Francisco, where he was a stock broker. Ill health rendered a change of climate and occupation necessary and for six years he acted as manager of a sugar plantation in Hawaii. On his return to San Francisco, his health being restored, he resumed the brokerage business and also acted as a promoter of enterprises. His death occurred in 1894. A few years after he came to America he married Regina Fernbach, who was born near Berlin, Germany, and accompanied her parents to New York City, where her brother, Henry, was a prominent architect. For the past few years she has resided in Los Angeles, which is also the home of six of her children, another being in San Francisco.

Born in New York City, May 11, 1867, Edward Neisser was six years of age when the family came to the Pacific coast, and his education was received in grammar and high schools in California. After graduating from the Alameda high school in 1883, he began the study of architecture under William Patton, a prominent architect of San Francisco, with whom he remained about nine years. From 1892 until he came to Los Angeles, three years later, he followed his chosen occupation with other architects of San Francisco, thus acquiring a thorough knowledge of the work and an intimate acquaintance with its leading representatives in his home city. He is now a member of the Southern California Chapter of Architects, besides being a reader of journals bearing upon architecture and kindred subjects. Through these various channels he keeps in touch with every development made in the science which he is making his life work. While living in San Francisco he married Miss Celia Jacobs, who was born in that city. Though not active in politics, he does not neglect the duties of citizenship, but casts his ballot in behalf of measures for the benefit of the people, and politically supports Republican principles. His connection with Masonry began in West Gate Lodge No. 35, F. & A. M., and he was also made an Odd Fellow in San Francisco. He has his office in the Byrne building. As an architect he has attained a prominence that speaks volumes for his ability and painstaking skill, and without doubt the future years will bring him an ever increasing degree of success and professional influence.

WILLIAM J. OLIVER, V. S. Of remote Scotch extraction, the Oliver family became associated with North of Ireland people by reason of the religious persecutions in their own land. From Ireland William Oliver, a farmer, crossed the ocean to Canada, and settled in Toronto, where he married Miss Anne Hunter, a Canadian by birth and of English descent. Of their union were born nine children, the youngest being William J., who is also the only member of the family in the States. His birth occurred in Toronto, Ontario, March 30, 1848. When he was quite small he lost his mother by death and was thenceforward thrown to some extent upon his own resources. Reared upon a farm in the township of Toronto, Ontario, he early gained a thorough knowledge of the stock business and the raising of general farm produce. From boyhood he was interested in horses, and during the years that he acted as buyer of horses for the American Express Company of Toronto, he gained a thorough knowledge of equine flesh, and at the same time was obliged to study veterinary surgery, in order that he might understand the diseases to which the stock were subject. Ambitious to acquire a thorough knowledge of surgery, he entered the Ontario Veterinary College in 1878 and three years later was graduated with the degree of V. S. From that time until 1886 he engaged in practice in Bramton, Ontario, and during the last two years of his residence there he also engaged extensively in shipping horses to the west and northwest.

With a desire to see the Pacific coast region of which he had heard so much, Mr. Oliver visited California in 1886, and during the trip he became so delighted with this country that he determined to establish his home in Los Angeles. Returning to Ontario, he disposed of his interests, and accompanied by his family, removed to the city where he has since resided. While living in Toronto he married Miss Harriet McFarland, a native of York, Canada. They are the parents of a daughter and son: Mrs. Florence W. Cole, of Los Angeles, and W. A., a graduate of the Los Angeles high school, now in Nome, Alaska.

In the spring of 1898 Mr. Oliver was appointed a member of the State Veterinary Medical Board and on the organization of the board was appointed its secretary, which position he has filled with recognized efficiency and success. His practice is large, including not only a considerable private practice, but also the care of the horses of the majority of truck and transfer companies in Los Angeles, and, in addition, he is engaged in raising standard-bred horses, of which he has some fine specimens. Since he became a citizen of the United States he has voted the Republican ticket. His fraternal relations include membership in the Independent Order of Foresters and Benevolent Protective Order of Elks.

HIRAM PHELPS. Amid the rugged hills of Addison county, in Vermont, several generations of the Phelps family resided and were prominent in the affairs of their community. There, during the greater part of his life, Benjamin Phelps was a farmer. He had become familiar with the crude and unsettled conditions which surrounded his boyhood, and in his later years of prosperity used to recall the incident of a barefoot boy trudging to a mill nine miles distant, his back bending beneath the weight of a sack of corn for grinding. In the sunset of his life he lived with his son, Reuben. At the time of his death he was eighty-five years of age.

In the occupations of farming and sawmilling Reuben Phelps acquired a competency. He was one of the prominent residents of Addison county and a man of force and character. In politics he was a Republican, and in religion was identified with the Methodist Episcopal Church, in which he served as steward. His useful and successful life terminated at the age of eighty-six years. By his marriage to Mary Knapp, a native of Addison county, Vt., he had the following-named children: Lorenzo, who was drowned when two years old, in his father's mill pond; Elmira, Harvey, Hiram, Amanda and Norman.

A son of Reuben and Mary Phelps, Hiram Phelps was born in Addison county, Vt., September 3, 1852. He assisted his father about the sawmill and on the farm, and acquired his education in the public schools of his district. Eventually he came into the possession of a farm in Vermont, but this he disposed of, and removed to Portage Ferry, Dodge county, Wis., where for eighteen years he was engaged in farming pursuits with success. In 1883 he disposed of his Wisconsin property and brought his family to Southern California, settling in Orange county, where he purchased twenty-three acres of land. A portion of this he sold, and now owns a homestead of eight acres under a fine state of cultivation, besides which he has property in Santa Ana and Long Beach.

While living in Vermont Mr. Phelps married Cornelia C. Gale, a daughter of Squire and

John J. Butler

Mrs. Mary Butler

Naomi (Harrison) Gale, of Vermont. Of this union there are two children: George E., who is a nurseryman on Main street, Santa Ana; and Eugenia, wife of George Y. Coutts, a rancher of Orange county. Both Mr. and Mrs. Phelps are active workers in the Methodist Episcopal Church. In politics he is a Republican, and in fraternal relations a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows.

JOHN T. BUTLER. To the undiscerning eye there was little to attract in the aspect of the property at Pasadena which Mr. Butler purchased in 1884 shortly after his arrival in California. The keen foresight and intuitive judgment which he possessed, however, enabled him to discern its possibilities, when once it was given an opportunity to respond to care and cultivation. A glance at the well improved homestead of today proves him to be a man of discrimination, for the woods and wild mustard patches have been transformed into a thriving citrus and deciduous fruit ranch and to complete the loveliness of the spot a residence has been erected, whose exterior finish is enhanced by its interior charms.

Near Oswego, Oswego county, N. Y., J. T. Butler was born December 5, 1852, being a twin brother of J. P. Butler, also of Pasadena. His father, J. T., Sr., was born in New York and throughout active life engaged in the manufacture of lumber, dying at Amboy Center, Oswego county. He was a son of Joseph Butler, a native of Connecticut, who served in the war of 1812 and afterward followed agricultural pursuits. The wife of J. T. Butler, Sr., was Catherine Wright, who was born in Williamstown, N. Y., and died in Amboy Center. Her father, Thomas Wright, a native of Williamstown, N. Y., moved from there to Pleasant Hill, Neb., and there died in 1877, aged ninety-five years. It is noteworthy that his wife also attained a great age, being one hundred years old when she died in 1901 in Nebraska.

A rude schoolhouse at Amboy Center, with its rude equipments of furniture and primitive text books, was the "temple of learning" in which J. T. Butler gained the rudiments of his education. From that discouraging start he has attained to a breadth of knowledge not always the possession of college graduates. Starting out for himself in 1873, he went to Jones county, Iowa, where he was employed at railroading. A year later he began to manufacture lumber, which he soon had increased to important proportions. From 1881 until his removal to California in 1884 he made his home in Dixon county, Neb., where he carried on a general ranching business, with a specialty of cattle-raising. His possessions there consisted of three hundred acres of well improved land, with twenty acres in a fine fruit orchard. The farm was considered the finest in the county. The experience in agriculture in Nebraska fitted him to appreciate the beauties of horticulture in California, and our state has no one more enthusiastic than he in its behalf. In selecting fruits for his farm in California, he set out a variety of cherries. Old settlers of the county endeavored to dissuade him, believing the attempt would prove a failure. However, in 1890 he placed a large crop of cherries upon the market, these being the first marketed that were grown in Southern California. In religion he believes in the doctrines of the Seventh-Day Advent Church, while politically he votes with the Republicans. In 1873 he married Miss Mary Kenyon, of Rome, N. Y. They have reared two children, of whom the daughter, Gladys Butler, remains with them. Grant Butler enlisted in the United States army and served through the war in Cuba. On re-enlisting in the Third Artillery, he was ordered to the Philippine Islands, his total period of service covering three years.

CHARLES HERBERT TOWLE. The descendant of English ancestry, Charles H. Towle of Pasadena was born in Lee, N. H., October 6, 1848, and is a son of John F. and Abbie (Davis) Towle, also natives of Lee. His grandfather, Col. Gardner Towle, removed from Epping to Lee, where he became a leading merchant and manufacturer. By reason of his recognized ability and fitness for the public service, he was frequently chosen to occupy positions of trust and responsibility, among these being the office of state legislator. For a time he was a member of the state militia with the rank of colonel. Instead of following in his footsteps, John F. Towle became a farmer, which occupation he followed in Lee and then in Epping, dying at the latter point in 1901. His wife had preceded him in death in 1895. They were the parents of four children, of whom Charles H. and two daughters (now in Exeter, N. H.) are the survivors.

Under the influence of his father's training Charles H. Towle while yet a boy secured a thorough knowledge of agriculture. Not desiring, however, to follow the occupation throughout life, at the age of twenty he began to learn the carpenter's trade in Lawrence, Mass. On becoming a journeyman carpenter he secured employment at Exeter, N. H., where his success was so encouraging that he took up contracting and building. Among his contracts were those for schoolhouses, substantial business blocks and fine residences. Since he came to Pasadena in 1895 he has built some of the most attractive residences here, besides building for himself three houses, two of which he owns. The firm of Towle & Hansen, to which he belongs, is one of the leading in its occupation in the city, and is frequently chosen for contracts that are important and responsible.

The political views of Mr. Towle bring him into affiliation with the Democratic party, and during his residence in Exeter he was elected, on that ticket, to the office of selectman, which he held one term. Fraternally he is connected with the Odd Fellows. His marriage, in Northwood, N. H., united him with Miss Addie A. Leach, who was born in Epping, N. H., and by whom he has three children, Frank W., Beulah R. and Ethel B.

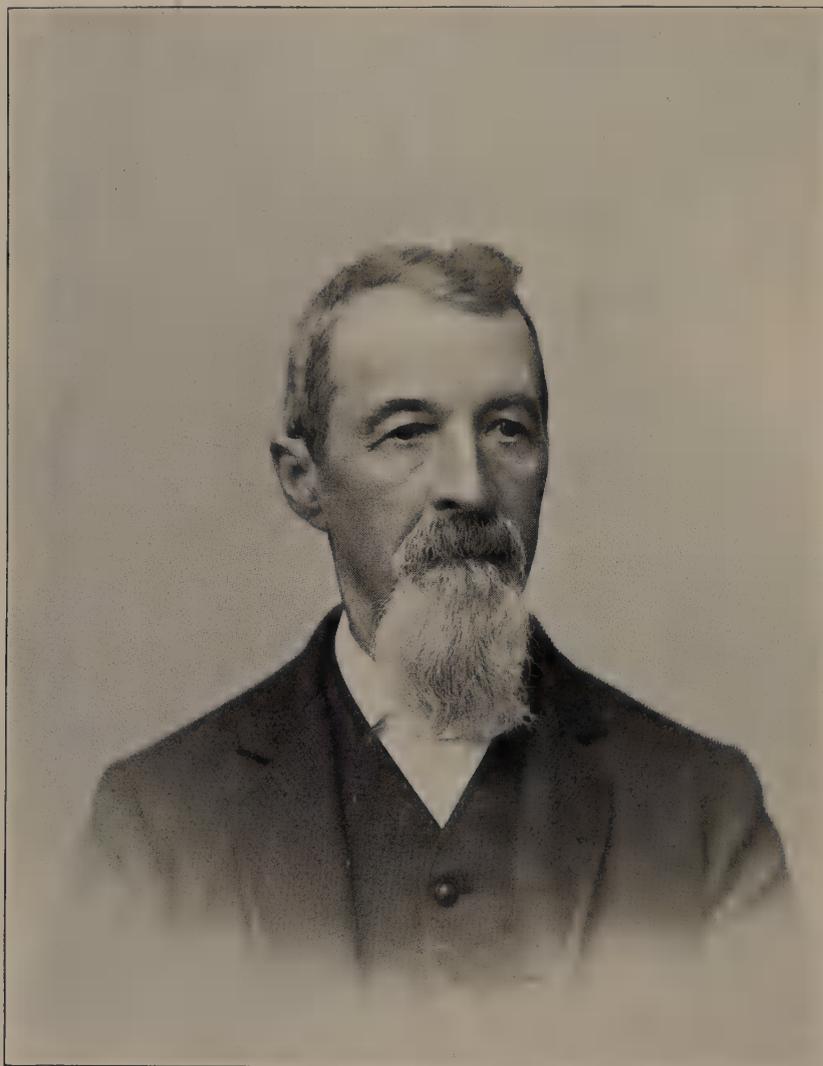

MRS. M. J. UTTERBACK. Among the vivid recollections that cluster around the childhood of Mrs. Utterback is that of the long journey across the plains to California when she was eight years of age. Her father, Silas Ritchey, believing that the west afforded greater opportunities than his home state, Iowa, brought his wife and four children with him in 1853, making the trip with a party of Iowans. During the six months spent in the journey, all were forced to endure great hardships, but the children of course were freed from the burden of anxiety and responsibility that rested so heavily upon the older members of the company. Following the Platte route, they finally arrived in Napa county, Cal., and the Ritchey family settled upon a farm of one hundred and sixty acres. With the assistance of the sons, the father placed this homestead under cultivation, and also operated a large tract of rented land. Meantime the daughter, Martha, was equally useful in the home, assisting her mother in the heavy work that fell upon the housekeeper and acquiring a knowledge of domestic science that fitted her for the management of a home of her own. In 1868 she was married to Mr. Utterback, and two years later came to Santa Ana, where Mr. Ritchey purchased three hundred acres. Here, as before, his sons assisted him in the cultivation of a large tract, at times operating one thousand acres, and thus they gave employment to many of the strangers coming to settle in Orange county. Finally the homestead of four hundred and fifty acres was divided and sold to other parties, with the exception of three tracts of fifty-six acres each, which became the property respectively of William S. and James M. Ritchey and Mrs. Utterback. Another son, Milton, had died at the age of eighteen years. William S. died in 1901, leaving a wife and two daughters. James M. never married, but made his home with his older brother and assisted in developing the various properties owned by the family.

The homestead of Mrs. Utterback comprises thirty acres on Ritchey avenue, Tustin, where she has a fine orchard of citrus and deciduous fruits. The supervision of the property falls upon her, and in its management she has shown decided business ability. Matters pertaining to the progress of the county and the general uplifting of humanity receive her sympathy and co-operation, and she is especially interested in religious movements, being a sincere believer in the doctrines of the Baptist Church. In her family there are three children. The only son, James Henry, of Santa Ana, is engaged in the manufacture of novelties, and is said by competent judges to possess a genius for art, in which he has produced some excellent work. The older daughter, Hettie Elvira, is the wife of Isaac Fields, of Santa Ana, and the younger daughter, Kate Irene, resides with her mother.

JOHN W. WOOD. The postmaster of Pasadena was born near Wilmington, Del., March 1, 1851, of Scottish parentage. His education was obtained in the common schools of his home town. While still a mere boy he acquired an excellent knowledge of the drug business, through acting as assistant to his father, John Wood, a pharmacist. In 1871 he was graduated from the Philadelphia College of Pharmacy, and then went to New York City, where he was employed as a pharmacist for four years. Coming to California in 1875, he clerked in San Francisco and for three and one-half years conducted a drug store in San José. In 1883 he came to Pasadena, of which city he has since been a resident, interested in its growth and upbuilding. For three years he was editor and proprietor of the Pasadena Valley Union, having established the same. His intimate knowledge of pharmaceutical matters led to his selection as a member of the California State Board of Pharmacy, with which he was connected for six years. For two years he served as a school trustee of Pasadena and he has also efficiently filled the office of trustee of the public library. A staunch Republican in his views, he was honored by his party and the administration January 17, 1900, when he was appointed postmaster. The duties of the position he assumed March 1 following, and has since devoted his attention to their faithful and painstaking discharge. Fraternally he is connected with Corona Lodge, F. & A. M. In 1877 he married Miss Georgeanna Newlin, whose father is James Newlin, of Chester county, Pa. They have one son, Clifford H., who has been educated in the State University of California at Berkeley, and is now a student of medicine.

BARNABAS TIBBALS. There is probably no resident of Riverside more familiar with the growth and development of its orange interests than is Mr. Tibbals. From the first he has been connected with its fruit lands and has been a firm believer in their possibilities. Nor has this confidence ever been shaken, in spite of the discouragements that have occasionally arisen to try men's faith and dampen their ardor. When the prices of the fruit have been low and railroad freights high, he has maintained the same enthusiastic belief in the future that less hopeful natures can only have when all goes well. It has been his privilege to live to see the industry established upon a firm basis, which cannot be impaired by those minor matters that once threatened its destruction.

August 17, 1887, Mr. Tibbals bought, for $12,000, ten acres of land on Brockton Square, Riverside, of which tract four acres were in oranges and six in deciduous fruits. In the fall of the same year he put the six acres in oranges. August 17, 1891, he sold the place for $24,000, which is the highest price ever paid, per acre, for an orange grove in Riverside. His next purchase comprised forty acres at San Jacinto, for which he paid $6,000. A portion of this property was in alfalfa, the remainder in fruit. The buildings were first-class and a flowing well greatly enhanced the value of the land. After three years he sold out and returned to Riverside, where he bought a three-year-old orchard on the corner of High and Center streets. On this place he made his home until June, 1901, when he moved to No. 1049 Almond street. He has also improved an orange grove on Chicago avenue, south of Center street, the same comprising ten acres of growing trees.

MRS. JEAN K. MAGEE, who has made her home in Riverside since August 19, 1875, was born in Steubenville, Jefferson county, Ohio, a daughter of Robert and Elizabeth (Kelley) Thompson, natives respectively of Ireland and Chester county, Pa. At the beginning of the nineteenth century her father came to America and settled one mile from Steubenville, Ohio, where he improved a farm, at the same time carrying on a mercantile store in the city and conducting an iron manufacturing business. In addition, he owned flour mills at Jacksonville. For four years he held office as sheriff of Jefferson county. At fifty-five years of age his life work ended, his death occurring November 13, 1833, the night long memorable among pioneers as that of the falling stars. His wife, who was reared in Pennsylvania, accompanied her parents to Holiday's Cove, W. Va., across the Ohio river from Steubenville, Ohio. She died at Eastport, Tuscarawas county, Ohio. Of her eleven children only one daughter and two sons attained mature years, and Mrs. Magee is now the sole survivor. She was born February 18, 1823, and spent the first ten years of her life in Steubenville, after which she accompanied the family to Cadiz and received her education in Cadiz Seminary. From there she went to Eastport, Ohio, where she taught school several years.

In Eastport, September 10, 1844, Miss Thompson became the wife of Dr. S. R. Magee, who was born in Mifflin county, Pa. His father, Thomas Magee, a farmer first in Pennsylvania and later in Ohio, was a son of Thomas Magee, Sr., a soldier in the Revolutionary war. When a mere boy, S. R. Magee determined to become a physician, and in the carrying out of this purpose, he attended Rush Medical College, Chicago. His first location for practice was at Uhrichsville, Ohio, after which he carried on professional work at Deersville, Harrison county, Ohio, and later moved to Cadiz, Harrison county, where he officiated as county sheriff for four years. During the Civil war he was a member of the Ohio National Guard, and when the perpetuity of the Union and the homes of the north were threatened, he was called out into service, being assigned to the One Hundred and Seventieth Regiment of Ohio National Guard. With his regiment he was sent to Washington May 4, 1865, and remained at the front for some months.

Upon his honorable discharge from the army Dr. Magee became agent at Steubenville for the Pittsburg & Cleveland Railroad, in which capacity he was employed for nine years. In the fall of 1876 he joined his family, who had come to California a year before and had purchased forty acres of raw land on what is now Palm and Central avenues, Riverside. To the improvement of this place he at once gave his undivided attention, experimenting with fruits of many varieties, but finally planting the entire tract in oranges. A portion of the property has been sold, and the homestead now comprises twenty-one acres, planted to oranges of different varieties. One of the most attractive features of the place is the long drive of palms, which lend an air of picturesqueness to the homestead and add materially to its value. It was at this place that Dr. Magee died April 22, 1896, and his remains were interred in Olivewood cemetery a few days later, the interment being conducted with Masonic honors.

MARIE B. WERNER, M. D. The Werner family has held an honorable place in German history as far back as the genealogy can be traced. Christian von Werner, a man of liberal ideas and large estates, held the office of mayor of Weinsberg, and wielded a powerful influence among his associates. While serving as a captain in the revolution of 1848 he was shot and fatally injured; whereupon his only son, Charles Augustus Ferdinand, fled to America in company with his mother and settled in Philadelphia. Some years later he married Caroline Wolpert, the only child of a merchant of Wurtemberg, Germany. Their home continued to be in Philadelphia, where Mrs. Werner died in young womanhood. For years he engaged in the manufacture of pianos, but finally failing health obliged him to retire from business cares, and from that time until his death in 1889 he remained in retirement. After coming to this country he dropped the title "von" and was henceforward known by the name of Werner.

In the city of Philadelphia, where she was born September 21, 1859, Marie Bersania Werner received her education in public and private schools. At a very early age her aspirations turned toward the medical profession, and, notwithstanding the fact that women physicians were then infrequently seen, she did not allow the prejudice of many to deter her from pursuing the career for which she felt herself to be adapted. In the spring of 1877 she began the study of medicine in the Woman's Medical College of Pennsylvania, where she took the three regular courses of lectures, graduating in 1880 with the degree of M. D. For a time she was interne in the Woman's Hospital and later was for several years retained as clinician, meantime also engaging in the practice of medicine in her native city. Her life work has been along the line of her profession, and she has striven earnestly to acquire a thorough knowledge of all its intricacies. The ability with which she was endowed, supplemented by thorough education and habits of close study and observation, led her to a front rank among the physicians of Philadelphia. In 1883 she performed an exceedingly delicate and complicated operation in a case of congenital malformation, the patient being a girl of eighteen years. The success of the operation brought her into prominence among the members of the profession, and convinced her that in surgery she could find a splendid field of usefulness. Since then she has made a specialty of that branch, and the success which has come to her proves the wisdom of her choice of a profession. During 1884 she went abroad and visited the principal medical schools of England and the continent, spending eighteen months in study, principally under Professors Von Billoth of Germany, Von Frisch, Von Hacker and Salter of Vienna, Schroeder and von Hahn of Berlin, Sanger of Leipsic and Apostoli of Paris. Indicative of her ability is the fact that she was the first member of her sex who was allowed to work in Prof. Von Frisch's clinic in Vienna. Again in 1891 she visited Europe and studied surgery under Gersuny of Vienna, Sanger of Leipsic, Bantock of London and Savage of Birmingham.

The literary ability which has found expression in the translation of the works of various French authors has been utilized by Dr. Werner mainly along professional lines, and the articles from her pen that have been read before conventions or published in medical journals have commanded the attention of the ablest physicians of the country. She was the first woman delegate from Philadelphia to read a paper before the American Medical Association, this being at the convention of 1890 in Nashville, Tenn. She was also the first woman to read a paper before the Obstetrical Society of Philadelphia and was the first woman who signed its constitution. Among her many valuable and interesting articles may be mentioned the following: "Battey's Operation for Congenital Malformation;" "Operation for Abdominal Fistula;" "Twenty Consecutive Abdominal Sections, with Remarks;" "Fistulous Escape of Ligatures After Pelvic Operations;" "A Retrospect of the Treatment of Pelvic Inflammation;" "The X-Ray and Its Uses in Diagnoses and Treatment."

Various professional organizations have enrolled Dr. Werner's name as a member, including the American Medical Association, Philadelphia County Medical Society, Philadelphia Obstetrical Society, Philadelphia Neurological Society, Alumni Association of the Woman's Medical College, and the Los Angeles County and California Medical Associations. While in the midst of a successful career in Philadelphia, the demands made upon her professional services during the intense heat of summer seriously affected her health, and, after having been overcome by the heat three successive summers, in 1899 she removed to Los Angeles, where she established her office in the Laughlin building. In addition to her private practice, she became chief of the children's clinic in the Medical College of Southern California. After a time she came to San Diego, whose climate has given her the much needed impetus toward permanent recovery. Though the period of her residence in California has been comparatively brief, the career upon which she has entered here will undoubtedly be worthy of the prestige established in Philadelphia among the gifted professional workers of that city. Her attention being closely given to professional duties, she has little leisure for participation in movements of a local nature or for attendance upon social functions, and, aside from her membership in the Lutheran Church and in the United Moderns and Fraternal Brotherhood, she has not been intimately identified with activities along a line not strictly professional, but devotes her time and thought and energies to the attainment of that professional skill and success which is the ambition of every aspiring physician.

CHARLES H. FRAZIER. In the list of energetic and resourceful men who have been attracted to California, especial mention should be made of Charles H. Frazier, who came to Orange in 1875, bought a twenty-acre ranch and began the improvement of the same. From that time till the present he has resided here and is to-day one of the most prominent citizens of the place. He is well known and highly respected by all who know him, and has proved himself to be progressive and public spirited, and ready to assist in any work for the betterment of mankind and the upbuilding of the city. Being one of the pioneer settlers of this locality, he has watched and aided its growth from a primitive condition to its present high state of perfection. The principal product of his ranch is oranges. He has planted his own trees and developed his place until it has become one of the finest ranches in the county.

ALBERT MORTON. At Summerland, situated six miles from Santa Barbara, on a portion of the old Ortega rancho, between the sea and the Santa Ynez mountains, are collected together a peaceful gathering of citizens of varied occupations and inclinations, constituting one of the pleasantest and most satisfactory communities in this part of the county. Here, in practical retirement from the strenuous business activities which have fallen to his lot, resides Albert Morton, who can justly claim recognition for having creditably taken his part upon the stage of life, and earned the right to henceforth pass his days in the fragrant air and under the cloudless skies of his Southern California home.

Few in these United States can claim an ancestry more intimately interwoven with the early history of America, or more directly connected with the memorable expedition, immortalized in history as the voyage of the Mayflower. An Englishman, George Morton, emigrated from his native land in 1623, having previously been the agent for the Pilgrims in London, and the chief factor in fitting up the Mayflower for its hazardous journey in search of liberty in thought and action. The first son of George Morton, Nathaniel by name, was the famous historian of the Pilgrim colony. The grandmother, Morton, was descended from John Alden, Priscilla Mullens and Alexander Standish, and another Morton, Marcus, a cousin of the father of Albert Morton, was governor of Massachusetts, his son being at the present time a chief justice of that state.

A native of Dixfield, Me., Albert Morton was born September 17, 1832, a son of Cornelius B. and Adeline (Partridge) Morton, the father having been born in Middleboro, Mass. On the maternal side, the Partridge family are well known in Massachusetts, and were early settlers in Amesbury, of that state. The education of Albert Morton was acquired at the public schools of Augusta, Me., supplemented by the classical course at Monmouth Academy. At the age of nineteen he came west to Illinois and Wisconsin, and remained for twelve years in Chicago and Milwaukee, as bookkeeper and clerk for the superintendent of the La Crosse & Milwaukee Railroad. During this time he spent one year in California, and became impressed with the manifold advantages to be found here. In 1864 he located at Webster, Worcester county, Mass., and was financial agent for the Stevens Linen Works, the largest linen manufacturing establishment in the United States. That position he held until 1869. In 1872 he removed with his family to San Francisco, where he lived for twenty years. During the greater part of his residence in the sea coast town he was interested in promoting the cause of spiritualism, and in furtherance of his object held meetings in the Metropolitan Temple for three and a half years. For a year he also published a magazine devoted to the propagation of his belief. For the same length of time he managed the financial affairs of H. L. Williams, the owner of the one thousand and fifty acres comprising the Ortega rancho, who, after the subsidence of the boom of 1886-88, laid out one hundred and sixty acres in town lots, and by judicious advertising collected together a colony of citizens of spiritualistic belief, the place now known as Summerland.

Owing to somewhat impaired health Mr. Morton removed to Summerland in 1890, since which time he has enjoyed a well earned rest. He married in 1854, in Chicago, a Miss Brown, and of this union there are two children. In 1871 Mr. Morton married Mrs. Littlejohn. He became a Mason in 1866, at Webster, Mass., and was raised to the Royal Arch Chapter there. Politically he is a Republican, and held the appointment offices of justice in Massachusetts, and of notary in Wisconsin.

ASA COBB was a notable addition to the successful horticulturists whose lives have been brought to a close amid the ideal surroundings of Southern California. He came to West Orange in February of 1893, and died November 7, 1897. The different sections of country in which he was at times located profited by his honesty of purpose. A native of Kentucky, Mr. Cobb was born April 29, 1819, and during his youth removed with frequency to different parts of the middle west. As a small boy he was taken by his parents to Indiana, and later to Keokuk, Iowa, where he grew to manhood and married Mary Samuels. From Keokuk he removed to Taylor county, Iowa, where he resided for several years, and during 1865 settled in Andrew county, Mo., which continued to be his residence until he came to California. In West Orange he purchased ten and a half acres of land; this was improved to apricots, walnuts, and other fruits, and in time became the fine home property upon which his family now reside.

HON. N. P. CONREY. Though only in the prime of life, N. P. Conrey, prominent in the ranks of the Los Angeles bar, has won distinction. Frequently he has given the public evidence of his ability and earnest desire to promote the interests of the community in which he dwells, and this led, in 1898 and 1899, to his election to the state legislature, where he fulfilled the expectations of his numerous friends.

In February, 1884, he established an office and commenced the practice of law in Los Angeles, and during the years of 1886 and 1887 he maintained a branch office at Pasadena. He took part in the organization of that city as a corporation, and was honored by election to the office of city attorney. In connection with the movement in the direction of establishing local option in that city he prepared the prohibition ordinance, which was successfully established in the courts, and having stood the test of trial in the supreme court of California, set at rest the question, then in doubt, as to the legality of a city's rights in the matter of local option. Mr. Conrey has always taken an active part in public movements and has been especially interested in the cause of education. During his service as a member of the Los Angeles school board, in 1897 and 1898, he cast his influence on the side of progress, and contributed toward some needed reforms. Fraternally he is a Knight Templar Mason.

WILLIAM S. BARTLETT. The year 1881 found Mr. Bartlett in Southern California. After less than a year in Los Angeles he went to Santa Ana, Orange county, and there organized the Commercial Bank, of which he was the cashier and manager for a number of years, and in which he is still a director. In 1883 he organized the Bank of Orange, and also the Bank of Tustin, in the latter of which he is yet a director. Besides assisting in the organization of these institutions named, he was connected with the founding of the Orange County Abstract Company, the Santa Ana Improvement Company, the Santa Ana Gas & Electric Light Company, the Santa Ana Development Company, the Santa Ana Street Railway Company, the Main Street Investment Company of Los Angeles, etc. He also acts as local representative for the Bank of California (San Francisco), and for many non-resident capitalists and property owners, and as acting executor of the Vanderlip estate, in Orange county. Under special appointment, during 1893-94, he acted as agent for the stockholders in the final liquidation of the affairs of the Southern California Insurance Company of Los Angeles. He also liquidated the affairs of the Bank of Anaheim, as the representative of the state board of bank commissioners.

On his removal to Los Angeles, in 1898, Mr. Bartlett became identified with the Union Bank of Savings as its president; and with the Security Loan & Trust Company as its vice-president and general manager; while at the same time he continues to have charge of large landed interests in Orange and San Diego counties, this state; in Coconino county, Ariz., and in Nye county, Nev. He has also long been connected with the Olive Milling Company, Orange county, and is local director in Los Angeles of the Fidelity and Deposit Company of Maryland (Baltimore, Md.).

F. A. WORTHLEY, the superintendent of the electric light department of Riverside, was born in Oxford county, Me., April 10, 1865, and passed his boyhood happily in country pursuits. Having completed his high school course he decided to give his attention to some kind of mechanics. Going to Lewiston, Me., he mastered the trade of a millwright and machinist, and in February, 1887, came to California, and was employed as an engineer by the San Bernardino Electric Light & Power Company. The plant was situated in the old Kiel mill at first and later was removed to Citrus, now known as Highgrove. Having superintended that change, Mr. Worthley came to Riverside and built a plant here, obtaining power from the Riverside Water Company, and furnished light to this city, Colton and San Bernardino. After acting in the capacity of engineer here for some six years he resigned, and during the following three years was assistant engineer of the electric light plant at Redlands, the first one operated there and run by water-power.

Returning to the scenes and friends of his youth, F. A. Worthley spent several months in the east, but in 1896 crossed the continent for the third time, and became superintendent of the electric light department of Riverside. In 1900 he directed the building of the new and finely equipped modern works of Riverside. This is a steam-power plant of 600 horse-power and steam engines, the capacity of the old and new plants together being 90 arc lights and 10,000 incandescent lights. About 300 horse-power motors (sixty-five all told) are distributed over the city, and the electric street car lines are furnished with power. The steam-plant has engines of Nordburg manufacture, and the boilers are of Stirling make. The Tracy Engineering Company of San Francisco contracted for and put in the steam-power plant, and the electrical equipment was under the management of the General Electric Company, of Schenectady, N. Y. The location is central, being at the corner of Ninth and Mulberry streets, and the building is 66x142 feet in dimensions.

GEORGE M. PEARSON. None of the county officials of Riverside county is more popular than George M. Pearson. Coming to this locality at the organization of the county, he was soon nominated for the important position he occupies, that of county surveyor and civil engineer; in April of the same year (1893) was elected, and in the fall of the following year was re-elected. Again, in 1898, he was a candidate for the office, on the Republican ticket, as before, and was duly elected, his term to extend until January, 1903.

George M. Pearson was born in 1867 and is next to the oldest in a family comprising six children. Until he was in his fifteenth year he lived quietly at Springdale, Iowa, his birthplace, and then went to Westtown (Pa.) College, where he pursued a classical course. He then studied civil engineering and when fully equipped for his future work came to California. In 1887 he settled at Wildomar, where he was employed on irrigation canals and government contracts, also doing some surveying in the Temescal mountains. His labors being completed about the time of Riverside county's formation, he became thoroughly identified with public affairs here, and always has maintained genuine interest in its development. At present he is serving as United States deputy mineral surveyor and is civil engineer of the Florida Water Company and assistant engineer of the San Jacinto & Pleasant Valley irrigation district.

GEORGE R. THAYER. As early as 1876 Mr. Thayer became interested in Riverside property and, in conjunction with E. D. C. Derby, bought twenty acres at $40 an acre, the tract lying on Magnolia avenue. This he set out in oranges and other fruits and, after establishing his home on the place in 1879, he carried forward the work of improvement with great zeal. On the ten acres which he reserved for himself he built a small residence, and in 1887 sold the property for $13,500. Afterward he engaged in the manufacture of carriages and the sale of farm implements, having his place of business on Eighth street. In time he received into partnership William L. Peters, the firm title becoming Thayer & Peters. In addition to the store at this point, the firm established stores in San Bernardino and Redlands, and in the three towns had the largest implement and carriage house there. The business was bought in its entirety by Mr. Peters in 1891, and Mr. Thayer then resumed ranching, in which he has since engaged, owning twenty acres on Hermosa avenue, Cucamonga, San Bernardino county, where he has eight acres in oranges and eight acres in lemons, the whole forming a very valuable and thrifty orchard. The lemons are cured in a large house he built for that purpose, and every facility has been provided for the prosecution of the business.

The Southern California Fruit Exchange numbers Mr. Thayer among its members, also the Cucamonga Fruit Association, of which he is a director. For years he was a director of the Lemon Growers' Association at Ontario, of which he was a charter member and to which he still belongs. After the organization of the Hermosa Water Company he was chosen on the board of directors, of which he is still a member. Since 1899 he has acted as president of the company. At this writing there are nineteen hundred and twenty shares in the company, which has a fine water system, securing an abundance of water from Deer Cañon by means of eleven miles of pipe line, which irrigates six hundred acres of land.

ELLIOTT HINMAN. As president of the board of trustees of Pomona, Mr. Hinman occupied a position affording especial opportunities for a man of progressive spirit. That he availed himself of these opportunities is known to every citizen of his town. In April, 1896, he was elected a member of the board for four years, and in January, 1899, became president, which position he filled with characteristic ability. Though for some years he has been active in political affairs, he has never sought office for himself, and his election as trustee was a tribute to his recognized ability.

It is thought that the Hinman family originated in England. Mr. Hinman was born in Henry county, Ill., August 31, 1853, a son of R. N. and Elizabeth (Miller) Hinman, natives of Connecticut. The schools of Cambridge afforded him fair advantages. On reaching his majority he became interested in a retail lumber business at Cambridge. Beginning on a small scale, he gradually increased the business and enlarged his trade until he was one of the most substantial business men of the town. For twenty years he carried on a lumber business, and during the last four years of the time he also engaged in buying and shipping grain. While in Cambridge he was a member of the board of village trustees for some years, and a stockholder and director in the First National and the Farmers' National Bank, in both of which he is still a stockholder.

The responsibilities connected with the management of a large business and the injurious effects of a changeable climate finally began to impair Mr. Hinman's health. Feeling the imperative necessity of a radical change, he decided to dispose of his business interests in Illinois and settle in California, and since 1893 he has made his home in Pomona.

J. E. LONGACRE. A leading industry of Moneta is the raising of strawberries, and Mr. Longacre is among the most successful workers in this occupation. He was born in Tennessee July 3, 1840, being a son of Joseph A. and Mary (Edwards) Longacre, also natives of Tennessee, where the father, a farmer by calling, died at seventy-four years of age. The paternal grandfather, Arson Longacre, was born in the Shenandoah valley of Virginia, and at twenty-one years of age settled in Tennessee, where eventually he acquired the ownership of four hundred acres. Besides carrying on his plantation he engaged in surveying to some extent. The maternal grandfather, Rev. Joshua Edwards, was born in the south, and became a preacher in the Baptist Church, but for a livelihood depended principally upon the results of his toil as a farmer on his tract of four hundred acres.

In a family of seven daughters and two sons, J. E. Longacre was the fourth in order of birth. When a boy he attended the public schools, but at an early age left school to devote himself to mercantile enterprises, and for three years he carried on a store of his own in Tennessee. During 1877 he came to California, first settling in Fresno, where he carried on a general store for three years. A later location was at Santa Ana, but after a year there he returned to Fresno, where he built a store and carried on general merchandising. The year 1889 was spent in visiting relatives and friends in Tennessee, and on his return to the Pacific coast he settled at Puente, where he remained three years and cultivated ten acres. Going from there to Pomona, he bought a house and lot, but this property he sold on settling in Moneta in 1899, and he has since devoted himself to the strawberry business on his six-acre tract at this place. While in Fresno he married Miss Hettie Matthews, who was born in Missouri, and by whom he has three children, Mary B., Joseph R., and Addison O. The family are associated with the Presbyterian Church, and Mr. Longacre is a contributor to the same, as well as to other worthy movements of his locality. He is connected with the blue lodge of Masons and in politics adheres to the policy of the Democratic party.

CAPT. W. CHIPPENDALE. The horticultural interests that have been acquired by Captain Chippendale, of Duarte, are of an important and diversified nature. They include the ownership of an orange grove of thirty acres, all of which is under cultivation to navels of a fine quality, this ranch being one-half of his original purchase made on settling in California. Another interest of considerable importance is his position as a director in the Duarte-Monrovia Fruit Exchange. In movements looking toward the increasing of irrigation facilities he has always been concerned, realizing that this is one of the most annoying problems to confront a western horticulturist. In the organization of the Duarte-Monrovia Irrigation and Canal Company he was quite active, and he has since served for two years as president of the same, also for nine years as its secretary.

The year after the Civil war began Captain Chippendale enlisted as a soldier in the Union army and afterward served as captain of Company E, Twenty-second New Jersey Infantry, taking part with his regiment in numerous engagements, chief among which were those of Chancellorsville, Rappahannock and Fredericksburg. Loyal to his adopted country and particularly enthusiastic in regard to the claims of California in the galaxy of commonwealths, he is not, however, a politician, but is independent in such matters, supporting the best men, irrespective of party. In religion he is of the Episcopalian faith.

S. J. COLEMAN. One of the most successful and enthusiastic horticulturists of Glendale Valley, Los Angeles county, is S. J. Coleman, who has a splendidly cultivated ranch of fourteen and a half acres just north of the postoffice of Glendale. In the estimation of this tried and trusted member of the community, the portion of the county to which he has devoted many years of striving and attainment, bids fair to rank with time among the finest and most prolific fruit regions of the state. Arriving here when there were but a few buildings in the valley, Mr. Coleman has been an interested spectator and worker for its best development, and is rightly esteemed one of the substantial and progressive authorities on fruit culture and all around ranching. He set out at first five acres of pears, but has since branched out in many directions, his orchard now containing oranges, to the extent of five hundred trees, lemons, walnuts, and various kinds of fruit. He enjoys a natural advantage over many fruit growers, in that his land has never been visited by a devastating frost. The irrigating advantages also are excellent, water having been found at a depth of ninety-three feet.

A native of Holmes county, Ohio, Mr. Coleman was born in 1838, and remained on his father's farm until his nineteenth year. His father, Ezekiel, was born in Pennsylvania, and came to Ohio at a very early day, where he took up government land and built a house of logs, and reared his family of four sons and five daughters. This log house, wherein was undertaken the responsibilities and trials of pioneer life, is still standing, and is known as the Coleman homestead. Of the children, but two survive, the other son, Cornelius, being now a farmer at Overbrook, Kans. Elizabeth (Peterman) Coleman, the mother of S. J., was born in Pennsylvania, and comes of a long-lived family, her parents having lived to be more than a hundred years old. Mrs. Coleman herself was ninety-four years old at the time of her death, her husband having lived to be seventy-two years of age. At the age of nineteen, S. J. Coleman went to Dekalb county, Ill., and, having learned the trade of tanner, worked at the same until about eighteen years ago. He then removed to Marshall county, Iowa, and at the end of two years to Carbondale, Kans., where he lived for seven or eight years. In 1881, owing to the health of his wife and son, Ellsworth, he came in the fall to California, and lived for a year and a half in Los Angeles, after which he purchased his present ranch near Glendale.

The first marriage of Mr. Coleman was solemnized in Illinois, and the result of this union was three children. The second marriage took place in California. Of the children, Luella is a dressmaker in Los Angeles, and Ellsworth is a teacher in Oakland at a salary of $1,600 a year. He was educated in the normal school at Glendale, at Harvard and Berkeley, at which latter institution he took the $300 prize, being a natural mathematician. In politics Mr. Coleman is independent, and believes in voting for the man best qualified to fill the position.

WILLIAM P. RAMSAUR. The death of William P. Ramsaur, in October of 1896, removed one of the substantial citizens and principal developers of Los Angeles county, and deprived many friends of a faithful ally in whom they could invariably put their trust. While an all-around agriculturist on a large scale, he was particularly known as an authority on the subject of hog raising, to which he devoted much time and attention, and in which occupation he achieved remarkable success. He came to California in 1869, with a large fund of practical business and other experience to apply to his interests here, having been previously a planter in Mississippi and Arkansas. He was born in North Carolina in 1834, and until the war was a southern sympathizer, but, after losing all that he had in the world while living in the south, his affiliations became essentially northern, and some of his most devoted friends and associates were supporters of the Union.

In 1876 Mr. Ramsaur settled in the vicinity of Florence, where he purchased one hundred acres of land, to which he added from time to time until he had four hundred and fifty acres. Originally the property was a vast sheep pasture overgrown with wild mustard, but a transformation was effected under his industrious hand and good management, a fine rural home was erected, and barns and outhouses in keeping with the general air of thrift and prosperity. At present the extent of the ranch is two hundred and forty-five acres, and the staple crop is barley and alfalfa.

The marriage of Mr. Ramsaur and Florence Walker occurred in Los Angeles in 1874, Mrs. Ramsaur being a native of Quincy, Ill., and a daughter of E. D. Walker, who came to California in 1861, and eventually died in the state of his adoption. The family is descended from that courageous band of French Protestants called Huguenots, and who dispersed to various parts of Europe in search of the liberty denied them in Catholic France. Mrs. Ramsaur, who is living on the home ranch, is the mother of four sons and one daughter: Lee M. of Los Angeles; William H., Lucian C., Sydney and Ernest. Lucian

C., who has charge of his father's property, is a fine business manager, and intelligent agriculturist and stock-raiser. So large are his interests, that in addition to the home property he works one hundred acres of land. Like his father before him he is a Democrat in politics.

JACOB BOSSHARD. Did he choose to discontinue his successful occupation of farming, Mr. Bosshard has ever at his command a sufficient knowledge of music to make him a valuable acquisition to any orchestra or musical organization, a talent which he exercised for many years with commendable results. A native of the picturesque and thrifty country of Switzerland, he was born in 1849, a son of John and Catherine Bosshard, also born and reared among the grandest scenery in the world. The family emigrated to America in 1864, and a year later, in Utah, the father died, and left them dependent upon their own exertions. About 1870, Jacob Bosshard left Utah and settled in California, and in Los Angeles, which then had a population of five thousand souls, himself and two brothers organized a band known as the Bosshard Band, which was in wide demand, owing to their understanding of music, and their excellent interpretation of the best musical composers. This congenial occupation was continued until 1891, at which time Mr. Bosshard left his brothers still pursuing their musical career, and he himself came here and purchased sixty acres of land on the corner of Compton and Shorb avenues. Thirty acres of this land was afterwards sold, but the remainder has been improved by its owner, and is valued at about $300 per acre. The farm has artesian water, and is devoted principally to the raising of alfalfa and the cultivation of beets.

In Los Angeles, in 1884, Mr. Bosshard married Mary Reishsteiner, and of this union there are five children, Olga, Hermann, Selma, Orlo, and Arthur. In national politics Mr. Bosshard is a Democrat, but his arduous duties have never permitted of the requisite leisure for the holding of political office. He is a broad-minded and enterprising member of the community, and his success is proof of well directed energy, and determination to faithfully perform the duties of citizenship.

J. W. COOK. His many years of residence in the far west have familiarized Mr. Cook with the conditions prevailing in the very early days, before the City of the Angels had been prophesied, or the Indians had come to regard with equanimity the presence in their midst of the ambitious and law abiding pale face. He was born in Wheeling, W. Va., April 27, 1836, and was reared in Texas, near La Grange, at Rabes Prairie, whither his father, J. W. Cook, Sr., had removed when his son was a mere boy.

Two years after the removal to the south, the father died, leaving a family of five sons and two daughters, who were more or less dependent upon their own exertions for a livelihood. At the age of sixteen, J. W., not being satisfied with the opportunities presented in Texas, left his home and removed to Sonora, Mexico, and after a few months there, located in California in 1858. Upon the present site of Los Angeles he remained for about a year, after which he took his way to Fort Yuma, where he lived until 1863. On the Colorado river he put in a ferry boat and made big money, his special opportunity being during the trouble between the United States and Texas. Unfortunately, while serving as a go-between with the opposing factions he was arrested and court-martialed, but eventually secured his release and returned to California. He here bought some school warrants for land in the southern part of Los Angeles county, and in 1879 bought ten acres of land on the Fernando road, two miles from the city limits, which is his present home. The hitherto undeveloped property has been made to attain to its greatest fertility and usefulness, the fine house, commodious and convenient barns, and general modern improvements, constituting a truly desirable and profitable rural possession. Various kinds of fruit are raised, and agriculture on a small scale carried on. Mr. Cook has a family of five children, all of whom have been educated at the public schools, the three oldest boys being now men, and independent as far as livelihood is concerned. In national politics he is a Democrat and a strong southern sympathizer. During his early life Mr. Cook had much to do with the Indians, and when but a boy was one of an advance guard for the pack trains that arrived in the country. At the Caves near San Pedro valley, Guadalupe Pass, seventy-five white men were at one time massacred, and Mr. Cook was made captain of a party of three hundred who pursued and captured the assailants.

A. B. SIMMONS, M. D. Dr. Simmons, of Chino, was born in Miami county, Ohio, June 17, 1836, and was reared on a farm. While still a mere boy he went to Kansas to try his fortune in that then sparsely settled region. For a time he was employed in a shingle mill. However, his tastes did not run along commercial lines, and he was ambitious to gain a good education; so he taught school in Iowa, saving the money until he had sufficient to procure for him an academic education, completing his studies in a private school. Four terms of school teaching were followed by a visit to Ohio. In 1862, at Union City, Ind., he enlisted as a private in Company C, Fifth Indiana Cavalry. Shortly afterward he was promoted to the rank of first lieutenant, in which capacity he was serving at the time of his discharge. While with his regiment at the front he was captured by the enemy and for seven months was confined in the prisons at Macon, Ga., Charleston, S. C., and Columbia, S. C.

At the close of the war he matriculated in the Cincinnati Medical College, where he took the complete course, graduating in 1867. His first experience in active practice was gained at Union City, Ind., and afterward he practiced in Kansas for eighteen months, going from there to Illinois, where he spent twelve years at Morrisonville. The exposure to inclement weather and the hardships incident to building up a large practice that extended for many miles in every direction seriously undermined his health. Indeed, so critical was his condition that when he and his wife started for Southern California she had little hope of ever reaching here with him living. When they had gone as far as Kansas his strength failed so completely that he could go no further, so they stopped with friends in Lawrence. After a time he was able to proceed, and in 1886 they arrived in Los Angeles. A change soon became apparent and at the expiration of four years he was completely restored to health and able to begin practice once more. Going to Filmore, Ventura county, he continued there until 1897, when he moved to Chino, and in this place he and his wife have a cozy home on Central avenue. Mrs. Simmons was formerly Elizabeth A. Williams, of Morrisonville, Ill., and they have one son, Morton E., who is now attending the Los Angeles Commercial College.

Since Dr. Simmons came to Chino he has engaged actively in professional work and has built up a practice that covers a wide range of territory. In addition to the management of this, he has served as deputy health officer of San Bernardino county, and in other ways has shown his interest in public affairs and his desire to promote the welfare of the community. His name is enrolled on the membership list of the California Eclectic Association, and in addition he is a thoughtful reader of current professional periodicals, thus keeping in touch with the advance made within the realm of therapeutics.

CHARLES E. PATTERSON. Just about the time that the attention of eastern people for the first time was being turned toward the far west and its possibilities, the gentleman who now acts as postmaster at Burbank and who since 1884 has been a resident of the state, was born in Monroe, Orange county, N. Y., the date of his birth being December 15, 1849. The genealogy of the family is traced to John Patterson, who emigrated from Scotland and settled in Orange county, N. Y., where he discovered and owned a mine. In later years the ore from this mine became famous in the manufacture of guns. A son of this emigrant, George W., was born in New York, where in active life he conducted a hotel, carried on a store, cultivated a farm, and owned the mine discovered by his father. During the war of 1812 he served in defense of the American cause and for the freedom of our ships on the sea. Next in line of descent was Charles Patterson, who was born and reared in Orange county, N. Y., and spent his life as a farmer, merchant and hotel proprietor, but, before success had crowned his exertions, he died at thirty-five years of age. To him descended the ownership of the mine, but he sold it before the value of its ore had become known.

The wife of Charles Patterson was Emeline Ashland, who descended from a Hessian soldier of the Revolutionary struggle. This ancestor, becoming convinced that the cause of America was a righteous one, deserted the English at the battle of Trenton, swam the river to the American army, and there, at midnight, took the oath of allegiance to our country. The next day found him fighting in the colonial ranks. At the close of the war he engaged in teaching school in New York state. Mrs. Patterson spent her early life in that state and after the Civil war moved to Buffalo, where she died at sixty-three years of age. In religion she was connected with the Episcopal Church. The four children of her marriage were named as follows: Charles E., of Burbank, Cal.; John A., who is living in San Francisco; Mary E., deceased; and George W., of Buffalo, N. Y.

When Charles E. Patterson was a boy of seven years his father died. His education was obtained in the public schools of Orange county. Starting out for himself at the age of twenty-two years, he went to Ohio, and followed the trades of machinist and engineer at Cincinnati and Portsmouth. A later location was at Austin, Tex. For five years he traveled in different states, working as a journeyman machinist. For six months he was a member of the Texas Rangers and during that time saw service in the frontier districts. Two years were afterward spent in Kansas City, Mo., and Arizona, whence in 1884 he came to California, and for three years traveled through the northern part of the state. It was in June, 1887, that he came to Burbank, Los Angeles county, and bought forty acres one-half mile northwest of town, where he has since engaged in raising walnuts and alfalfa. Having his own pumping plant, he has mastered the problem of irrigation, and the value of his property is greatly increased. His home is brightened by the presence of his wife (formerly Mary Bell, of Elkhart, Ind.) and their three children, Pearl, Julia B. and Forrest A.

During the Civil war Mr. Patterson volunteered as an engineer in Company D, First New York Volunteer Engineer Corps, and for six months served in the engineering corps under General Grant in the army of the Potomac. In the battle of Petersburg he was wounded in the knee, and at Appomattox and Farmville he also received slight injuries; on another occasion a ball penetrated his hat. At the expiration of his period of service he was honorably discharged from the army. Since the organization of the Grand Army of the Republic he has been warmly interested in its work, and is now a member of Kennesaw Post in East Los Angeles. Another organization with which he is identified is that of the Foresters. Since becoming a voter he has always supported Republican principles, and on that ticket he has been elected to various local offices, besides which he has represented his party as a delegate to county conventions. He was elected supervisor from the fifth district of Los Angeles county, serving for a term of four years. His interest in educational matters led him to accept the office of school trustee and this he filled efficiently for twelve years. In 1898 he was appointed postmaster at Burbank, and in this position he has given general satisfaction, proving himself to be the right man in the right place.

HENRY ADDISON SCOTT. While Mr. Scott has been connected with various enterprises since he came to Downey in the spring of 1885, his most intimate associations are with the banking interests of the community. The year after his arrival he was instrumental in securing the organization and establishment of the Los Nietos Valley Bank, which he conducted for five years as a private institution. The growth of the city demanded banking facilities commensurate with the increase of population and business importance, hence in 1891 the bank was incorporated under state laws, and for the ten ensuing years he acted as cashier and manager, disposing of his interests in July, 1901. The Bank of Downey, of which he is now the manager, was organized under his leadership February 12, 1902, and has already gained an established place in the finances of the community, its high standing being due to the confidence reposed in the manager by the people.

In Benton, near Little Rock, Ark., Mr. Scott was born July 16, 1852, being the elder of two children who attained maturity, the other being David M., who is a farmer at Riverside, Tex. The father, Joseph, was born in Alabama, the son of a South Carolinian, and at the age of six years was taken to Arkansas by his parents. On attaining manhood he selected agriculture for his life work, and by a course of industry and economy acquired a farm and a number of slaves. However, like many other southerners, he suffered severe reverses by reason of the Civil war. For many years he served as county judge and at other times he was called to different local offices of trust and responsibility. His sympathies being with the south, he enlisted in a company of home guards, of which he was colonel until the last year of the struggle, when he joined Price's command, on its raid to Missouri, as a private. When financial troubles came, he might have availed himself of the bankrupt law and evaded the payment of his debts, but not considering such a course honorable, he set himself to the task of paying every dollar of his own indebtedness, besides endorsements he had made for friends. In spite of these discouragements he is now comfortably situated financially, and, at seventy-four years of age, still manages his farm and looks after his various interests. In early manhood he married Elizabeth Dodd, who was born in Alabama and reared in Arkansas, dying there at twenty-four years of age. In religion she was a Baptist, while her husband was connected with the Methodist Episcopal denomination.

When four years of age Henry A. Scott was orphaned by the death of his mother. He was then taken into the home of his grandparents, but, at the second marriage of his father, two years later, he returned home, remaining there until seventeen years of age. His first employment was that of clerk in Benton and Little Rock, and his leisure hours were utilized in study, in order that he might acquire an education. In 1875 he entered the employ of the Iron Mountain Railway Company as agent at Boughton, Ark., from which point he was transferred to Malvern and thence to Fulton. After six and one-half years with the railroad he turned his attention to the mercantile business in Malvern, in which enterprise he continued for three and one-half years. From Arkansas he came to California in 1885 and settled in Downey, where he conducted manufacturing interests a short time, and has since been interested in banking. In addition, he owns and conducts a warehouse for the storage of fruit, and the packing and handling of grain; also superintends his walnut ranch of seven and one-half acres, situated one-half mile from Downey, and forming his homestead. Mrs. Scott was formerly Miss Carrie Smith, of Missouri, and they have an only daughter, Elma A., now twelve years of age. The family attend the Christian Church, with which Mrs. Scott is identified. Politically a believer in Democratic principles, Mr. Scott is always ready to assist such of his friends as are candidates for office in his party, but has never sought or desired official positions for himself. In fraternal relations he is a member of Downey Lodge No. 220, F. & A. M., and Nietos Lodge No. 197, I. O. O. F. His honorable course in business, excellent financial ability and tact in the management of affairs have brought him before the public and have given him a merited reputation for reliability and skill in the conduct of important banking interests.

JOSEPH SMITH. Very few of the citizens of Downey have been identified with its history and development for a longer period than has Mr. Smith, the present postmaster. Arriving in Los Angeles county in 1873, three years later he came to Downey, and identified himself with the interests of this then straggling and unambitious community. In this and adjoining districts he was engaged as school teacher for nine years, and during vacations found employment as clerk in stores. His first appointment to the office of postmaster came in 1889, at which time he held the commission for four years, and then after an interval of four years, was again appointed to the office, which he has since filled with efficiency and energy.

The parents of Mr. Smith were Joseph and Mary A. (Staley) Smith, natives of England, the latter having been born near the birthplace of John Wesley. After their marriage they came to the United States in 1842 and settled in the then frontier county of McDonough, Ill., where the father bought raw land in Eldorado township and devoted his subsequent years to the development of a valuable farm. He was a participant in the Mormon war which threatened the disruption of the neighboring county of Hancock, during the winter of 1845-46. Years afterward, when the Civil war came on, he was eager to assist soldiers and their families and gave his support to the cause of the Union. On the organization of the Republican party he became one of its adherents and afterward sustained its principles by his ballot. Schoolhouses, churches, and all movements for the good of the community received his support to the extent of his ability, and he was public-spirited to an unusual degree. When he died he was four score years of age, and his wife passed away when eighty-one. Both were faithful members of the Methodist Episcopal Church. In their family were three children, namely: Joseph, who was born in Eldorado township, McDonough county, Ill., June 17, 1845, and is now living in Downey, Cal.; Mary A., Mrs. Robinson, and Rebecca, Mrs. William Miles, both of Illinois.

With a desire to acquire a better education than the district schools afforded, Joseph Smith saved his earnings on the farm and at twenty-one entered Lincoln (Ill.) University, an institution under the auspices of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. After having graduated with honors he began to teach school, following the occupation a year in Illinois, and in 1873 coming to California, where he taught at Spadra for three years. Since then he has made Downey his home. In 1872 he married Eugenia Jones, of Lincoln, Ill., who died in 1886, leaving three children: Minnie, wife of W. W. Cocke, of Downey; Joseph Howard, who is engaged in the jewelry business at Colton, Cal.; and William Perry, an employe in the Los Angeles postoffice. The present wife of Mr. Smith was formerly Miss Anna Barnett and has resided in Downey from childhood. In politics he is pronounced in his support of the Republican party. For eight years he served as a member of the school board, besides which he has filled other local offices. In fraternal matters he is connected with the Ancient Order of United Workmen. His activity in religious affairs has extended over a long period of years. In the Methodist Episcopal Church South he has officiated as a trustee and steward, besides filling the office of Sunday-school superintendent.

WILLIAM S. PARKS. In innumerable ways the county of Santa Barbara has profited by the residence upon its fertile acres of William S. Parks, one of the most successful agriculturists in the neighborhood of the town, and one who, as supervisor, has accomplished much in bringing about general improvements. He was born in Baltimore county, Md., in 1847, a son of Peter and Angeline (Treadwell) Parks, who were also born in Maryland. On the maternal and paternal side of the family English descent is claimed, the mother being a daughter of William Treadwell, and the father, who was a farmer in Baltimore county, being a son of Peter Parks, Sr., whose father emigrated from England some time during the eighteenth century.

When a child of tender years, William S. Parks went to live with his oldest sister in the city of Baltimore, and was there reared to maturity and educated in the public schools. At the age of twenty-one he returned to his home in the country, and farmed on the old homestead for three years. He then removed to Indiana, forty miles from Chicago, and engaged in farming for four years. While living in the Hoosier state he married Corinne J. Pierce, a native of Indiana, and daughter of I. B. Pierce, originally from Canada, and an old settler in Indiana. In 1875 Mr. Parks came to California and bought fifty-two acres on the Modoc road, two miles west of the courthouse. To this he has since added so that at present he has one hundred and twenty-eight acres of land, and besides rents sixteen hundred and fifty acres belonging to other parties. He engages in general farming, stock-raising, and bean culture, having sixty acres of the latter product. There is a model dairy on the farm, and one of the most pleasant houses in the county. Milk from the dairy is delivered every day in Santa Barbara, two wagons making stated trips, and supplying a large demand. The railroad runs through the farm, and a nearby station is being considered.

Five children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Parks: Maud, who is the widow of Clare Hilton, of Santa Barbara; I. B., Arthur, Pearl and Harry. The children are objects of special pride to their parents, who are giving them every advantage in an educational way. The sons are of great assistance to their father in the management of his large interests, Arthur especially is worthy of mention, for his interest in everything pertaining to the farms is fully as deep as his father's.

In politics Mr. Parks is a Republican, as was his father before him. In November of 1898 he was elected supervisor of the third district, his re-election following in 1900. His administration has been noteworthy, for, in co-operation with Messrs. Tallant, Broughton, Cox and Baylard, the other supervisors, great results have been achieved. When first elected Mr. Parks found few bridges in his district, but now there are numerous stone culverts, excellent bridges, and the hills have been graded down. The former existing debt has been wiped out, and at present there is more money in the treasury of the third district than in any of the other five. The services of Mr. Parks are fortunately appreciated by his fellow townsmen, who recognize in him one who has the best interests of his neighborhood at heart, and who uses his position of trust as a stepping stone to the highest citizenship possible. Fraternally he is connected with the Ancient Order of United Workmen and the Odd Fellows at Santa Barbara.

L. D. HOCKETT, M. D. Descended from an old southern family, of Scotch-English extraction, and devoted believers in the Society of Friends, the Hockett family was established in the north by Jonathan Hockett, a native of North Carolina and a pioneer of Clinton county, Ohio. His son, Seth, was born and reared in Guilford county, N. C., and in early manhood entered land from the government in Ohio, after which he continued to make Clinton county the scene of his activities. At the time of his death he was sixty-five years of age. His birthright membership in the Society of Friends was never allowed to lapse, but the teachings of the sect were strictly followed in his daily life. In Ohio occurred his marriage to Nancy Garner, who was born in Maryville, Tenn., and in childhood accompanied her parents to Ohio, where she died at forty years of age. Like her husband, she belonged to a strict Quaker family. Of their seven children the oldest, Zimri, was born in Clinton county January 12, 1820, and as a boy became inured to the hardest kind of farm toil, that of clearing a tract of raw land. On starting out for himself he learned the trade of earthenware manufacturing, which he conducted at Martinsville for twenty years. Finally, however, the invention of moulds ruined the trade, and he sought other pursuits. Going to Watseka, Ill., he embarked in the manufacture of drain tile, which he continued for fourteen years, meeting with fair success. On his retirement from business, in 1899, he came to California, settling at Whittier, where he has since made his home.

The wife of Zimri Hockett was Lucinda Bundy, who traced her lineage back to French-Huguenot ancestry and who was a member of the Society of Friends, as is also her husband. They were the parents of nine children, namely: Allen, who died at forty years; Milton, who was thirty-five at the time of his death; Mary, deceased; Silas, who is engaged in the manufacture of gold dry washing machines in San Francisco; Alonzo, M. D., of Whittier; John, of El Paso, Tex.; Newton, who has a large music store in San Francisco, and is also a partner of his brother, Silas, in the manufacturing business; Nancy, Mrs. Tabor, deceased; and Lewis, who is engaged in the piano business in Toledo, Ohio. The two eldest sons were soldiers in the Union army during the Civil war, and the others were equally ardent in their support of the Union, but were too young to be accepted for service.

At Martinsville, Clinton county, Ohio, L. D. Hockett was born August 24, 1854, being a son of Zimri and Lucinda Hockett. During the summer months, when the closing of the schools gave him an opportunity for work, he assisted his father in the manufacturing business. In 1875 he began to read medicine with Dr. L. M. Bundy, of Watseka, Ill., and later attended the Eclectic Medical Institute of Cincinnati, also the Bennett Medical College of Chicago, finally completing his course of lectures in the College of Physicians & Surgeons at Keokuk, Iowa. In 1881 he began to practice at Ash Grove, Ill., and from there in 1892 removed to Cissnapark, also in Iroquois county, where he remained until his removal to California in 1898. Since beginning practice it has been his aim to keep in touch with all improvements and developments in the medical science, hence he has not only been a student of current medical literature and an attendant upon medical conventions, but, in a broader way, he has received help through his post-graduate courses, one of which he took in Bennett Medical College in 1890-91, another in Chicago in 1897, while during his early years of practice, in 1885, he spent three months in the college at Cincinnati where he had first studied.

In 1882 Dr. Hockett married Miss Mary A. Brown, of Joliet, Ill., the daughter of a Methodist minister and herself an active worker in that denomination. They have four children, all at home, namely: Neni M., Harold B., Bessie and Lonnie. At no time has Dr. Hockett been willing to turn aside from professional work to enter the field of political activity, and his only acceptance of official honors was in the position of councilman, which he filled for two years, having been elected to the position by the Republican party. Fraternally he is connected with the Knights of Pythias at Whittier, the Fraternal Aid, Modern Woodmen of America and Lodge No. 322, F. & A. M., of Whittier.

A. H. DUNLAP. Practically the entire life of Mr. Dunlap has been spent in California, as he was a small child when his parents crossed the southern plains to the Pacific coast. Adjoining the city of Whittier stands his homestead of eighty acres, where, in 1890, he erected a commodious and attractive three-story frame residence for the abode of his family. Surrounding the house are extensive and well-kept grounds, adorned by palms and roses and a thrifty orange grove. In the vicinity of Whittier he owns about one hundred and twenty-five acres, all of which (excepting a few acres in oranges for home use) is under cultivation to English walnuts, which he has found to be the most profitable crop that can be raised in Southern California.

From his native county of Perry, Mo., John Dunlap went to Texas in young manhood and entered state land near Belton, Bell county, where he engaged in raising cattle and horses, and was a ranger in the Mexican war. In Texas he married Mary Huston, who was born in Mississippi and died in California in 1900, aged seventy-three years. Desiring to conduct a stock business in California, during 1854 John Dunlap started with his family and his wife's brother across the country, with a drove of cattle and horses. While on the trip the Indians killed his brother-in-law and stampeded the horses, stealing nearly all of them. Impeded by these discouragements, he started to work to recoup his losses, and was so successful that he became a very large stock-raiser. For two years after his arrival in the state he lived on a ranch at El Monte, thence removed to what is now Kern county and bought a large tract of land near Bakersfield. In 1872 he bought a stock ranch of four thousand acres near Redlands, and on this property, known as Yucaipe ranch, he continued stock-raising and general farm pursuits until his death, in 1875, at sixty-four years of age. The success that he gained was due to his persevering industry and energy. Devoting his attention closely to his personal affairs, he took no part in politics aside from voting the Democratic ticket, nor was he identified with any fraternity except the Masonic Order, in which he served as a master mason. After his death the town of Redlands sprang into existence, and his children, on the division among them of the estate of four thousand acres, incorporated what is now the Yucaipa Water Company, which has since supplied water for a part of the city and vicinity. They still own the entire estate, which is very valuable property.

Of eleven children who attained maturity A. H. Dunlap was the second son, and was born near Belton, Tex., December 23, 1849. At five years of age he was brought to California, and as soon as large enough to ride a horse he began to accompany his father in his expeditions, driving as many as four thousand head of sheep from one ranch and grazing them through to Arizona, to ship or sell. During his days as a cowboy he had many thrilling experiences with wild animals and hostile Indians, but with the incoming of settlers and the onward march of civilization this country became more like eastern settlements. After having superintended the Redlands ranch for two years, in 1872 he removed to the vicinity of Rivera, buying forty acres which he planted to walnuts. From there he came to the suburbs of Whittier in 1890. In the organization of the Bank of Whittier he was one of the leading factors and has since been one of the stockholders of its capital stock of $50,000. Reared in the faith of the Democratic party, he continued in its support until the convention of 1896 declared for the silver standard; not believing the adoption of such a measure would be beneficial to the country, he cast his vote for William McKinley for president. Like his father, he is connected with the Masons.

In San Bernardino county, in 1872, Mr. Dunlap married Miss Susan Standefer, daughter of James S. and Caroline R. Standefer, and a native of Texas. In childhood she accompanied her parents to California; her mother died at Pomona April 20, 1888, and one of her brothers, William R., a Californian of considerable prominence, died in the Ranchito district April 4, 1879. Mrs. Dunlap is associated with the Christian Church and an attendant at its services. Born of her marriage are five sons and three daughters, namely: Albert Huston, who is a rancher and horticulturist near Rivera; William Tyler, who died at twenty-one years of age; John, who occupies a large ranch at Redlands; Ross, Randall Montgomery and Minnie, at home; Lena A., who is a student in the Art Institute of Chicago; and Lillian, at home. In all of his dealings with his fellow-men Mr. Dunlap has been straightforward and honorable, by which course of action, continued during the long period of his business activity, he has won the friendship and confidence of associates. Of a modest and retiring disposition, he scarcely does justice to his own capabilities, but ascribes his success to the training of his parents, the efficient co-operation of his wife, and the opportunities which Southern California offers men of determination.

ALLEN J. WILSON. Nowhere within the limits of Los Angeles county can there be found a citizen who takes a greater interest in general horticultural affairs, and particularly in the packing business, than does Mr. Wilson, of Whittier. Favorably known as a self-reliant man of business ability, he has won the confidence of people in the line of his specialty, while as a citizen, no less than as a packer and shipper, he is highly esteemed. Through the exercise of fair judgment and sound common sense, he is meeting with a success that is as gratifying as it is deserved.

Though a native of Cedar county, Iowa, A. J. Wilson spent his early childhood years principally in Kansas, having been only four years of age when his father, James K. Wilson, took the family to that state and settled near Osage. A few years later they came to California, and the son's education was largely carried on in Los Angeles. In 1897 he came to Whittier and the following year the other members of the family joined him here, his father being now engaged in the wholesale fruit business in this town. From boyhood he has been familiar with the fruit business, and soon after his arrival in Whittier he was placed in charge of the packing houses of the Earl Fruit Company. The details of this work occupied the winter months, while in the summer he devoted his attention to buying fruit for the canneries. His next step was the forming of a partnership with his brother, E. E., and the two continued together in the packing and shipping business at Whittier until October, 1901, when A. J. bought his brother's interest and has since operated alone. During 1901 his shipments aggregated in value about $100,000, and included two hundred cars of oranges and lemons and forty cars of potatoes. The output in 1902 will reach about the same amount.

Thoroughly absorbed in business affairs, Mr. Wilson does not participate in political affairs, aside from casting his vote for Republican measures and candidates. In 1901 he married Miss Katherine Black, who was born at San Juan, and has always made California her home. In religious connections she is a member of the Episcopal Church.

THOMAS F. SIMPSON. As superintendent of the Los Angeles county farm Mr. Simpson has been placed in charge of an institution caring for one hundred and ninety-three persons at the present time; while he also maintains a general oversight of the property, consisting of three hundred and forty acres, the larger part of which is under cultivation. Thirty acres have been planted in oranges forming a thrifty grove, now in bearing condition. The neat and attractive appearance of the farm is frequently commented upon by visitors, and proves, better than words could do, the energetic and efficient supervision of the manager.

Of Canadian birth, Mr. Simpson was born in Ontario November 16, 1862. His father, Alexander, a native of Scotland, settled in New York state as a boy, having crossed the ocean with his mother. In his young manhood he removed to Canada, where he married Anne McFadzean, of Scottish birth, but a resident of Canada from childhood. Agriculture formed his occupation from early youth until he died at fifty-two years of age. His wife still survives him. Both were strict members of the Presbyterian Church and possessed all the religious fervor and loyalty characteristic of the true Scot. Of their eleven children Thomas F. was third in order of birth. On completing the studies of grammar and high schools he began to teach when nineteen years of age, and during the next two years taught twenty-two months. For a short time afterward he was employed in Montreal and the lower provinces.

Coming to California in 1884, Mr. Simpson secured employment in Tulare county. Two years later he removed to Los Angeles, where he experienced as a dealer in real estate, all the fluctuations, excitement and reaction incident to the boom, the decadence of which found him "stranded" financially. His next venture was as a prospector in Idaho, Washington and Montana mines, where he met with fair success. Returning to Los Angeles county, he was employed as foreman on a ranch near Englewood, where for ten years he had charge of a grain and stock ranch of sixteen thousand acres. On resigning as foreman, he spent six months in Kansas City, Mo., after which he returned to his former position. About a year later, February 1, 1900, he was appointed superintendent of the Los Angeles county farm at Downey. By his marriage to Miss Della Sherman, a native of Kansas, he has one daughter, Olive. In politics he is a Republican. For several years he acted as deputy sheriff of his district, but aside from that he has held no offices, nor has he desired positions of a political nature. In fraternal relations he is connected with the Independent Order of Foresters and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows.

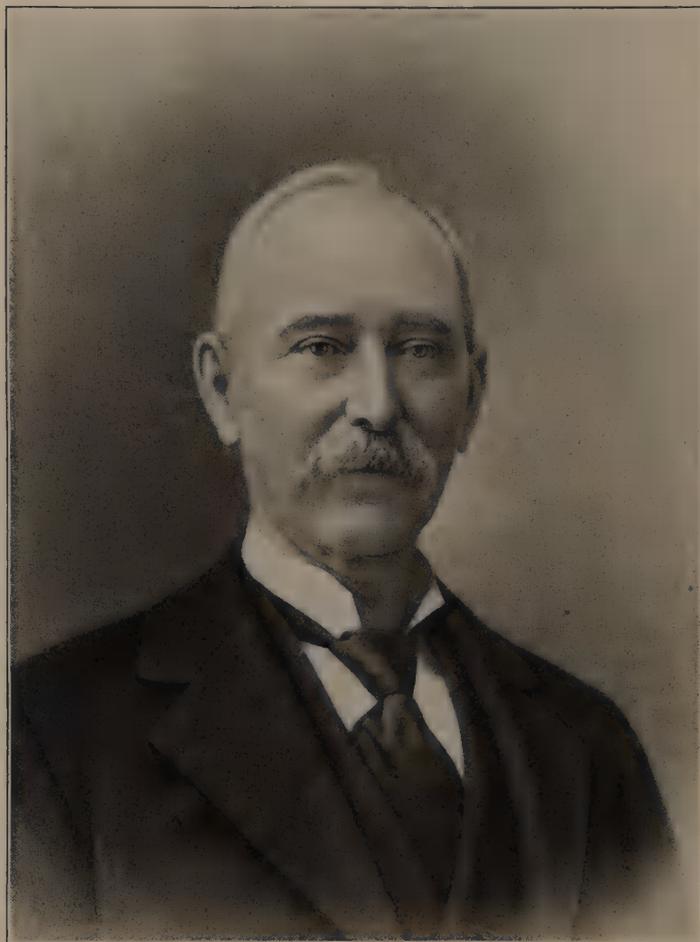

ATWOOD SPROUL. In the colonial period of America's history a Scotchman crossed the ocean from his native land to Maine. At the time of the Revolution he was master of a vessel that fell into the possession of the British, and officers and crew became prisoners-of-war. Realizing that he faced certain death in their hands, he jumped overboard off the coast of Newfoundland and swam ashore, then ran back into the rocks, which furnished him a sure hiding place. He served bravely in the war and afterward returned to Maine, where he lived to be very aged. His son, William, was born in Bristol, Me., and met with fair success as a farmer, also held a number of local offices, given him by the Democratic party. At the time of his death he was sixty-seven years of age. His wife, who bore the maiden name of Susan Bugbee, was born in Maine and died there when sixty-two years of age. They were the parents of thirteen children, eight of whom attained mature years.

Near Augusta, Me., Atwood Sproul was born March 3, 1835, a son of William and Susan Sproul. In 1854 he left home for the distant state of California, where he mined for four years, meeting with alternate successes and reverses. On leaving the mines he went to Humboldt county, Cal., and for a year was employed in a saw and flour mill. Seven months were then spent as a prospector and miner in Trinity county, from which he returned to Humboldt county for the winter. The spring of 1862 found him in what is now Grant county, Ore., where he pursued his mining ventures, built the Humboldt ditch and erected a sawmill on the ditch. This mill he operated with fair success for twenty years. A claim that he opened in the vicinity, known as the Humboldt mine, is still being worked.

In the spring of 1886 Mr. Sproul disposed of his property in Oregon and came to Norwalk, Cal., where he and his brother, Gilbert H., had purchased four hundred and fifty-seven acres of unimproved land in the winter of 1868. The village of Norwalk now stands on his old ranch. Immediately after settling here permanently, he built a livery barn and began the buying, selling and training of horses. At this writing he owns sixteen head of thoroughbred runners, among them being Conveth, a chestnut horse, 187, that sold for $10,000 as a yearling, but was injured when young. The pedigree of this stallion shows the great prominence of the three greatest of England's racing families in the first half of the nineteenth century, viz.: the blood of Waxy, winner of the derby of 1793, as exemplified through the two sons. Whalebone, winner of the derby of 1810, and Whisker, winner in 1815; the blood of Oroville, winner of the St. Leger of 1802, as exemplified in Emilius, derby of 1823, and Muley, who got Margrave, the Leger winner of 1832, and Vespa, winner of the Epsom Oaks in 1833; also the blood of Touchstone, the greatest stallion of the past seventy-five years, as exemplified through Orlando, derby winner of 1844, and the sire of Teddington, winner in 1851. Conveth is by Favonius, dam Cracoviene by Trumpeter and Cachucha; Favonius by Parmesan and Zephyr, all of these being of the finest breeds.

The original property purchased by Mr. Sproul at Norwalk cost only $11 an acre, but through the laying out of the town site by himself and brother, and through the improvements he has made, the value of the land has greatly advanced. Several years ago he sold one hundred and sixty acres in a body, and at other times he has disposed of small tracts, but he still retains a considerable acreage, some under cultivation and some in pasturage and hay. By his marriage to Miss Caroline Sollinger of Norwalk he has two daughters, Carrie and Deatrice. In politics he is a Republican and always votes with the party, although not active in its affairs, nor at any time seeking official honors.

HENRY H. STEVENSON. During the times of religious persecution in Scotland the Stevenson family sought safety in the north of Ireland and from there a later generation crossed the ocean to America, settling in North Carolina. Robert Stevenson and four of his brothers enlisted from that colony for service in the Revolutionary war, where he fought for independence and liberty. Later he migrated to Kentucky and from there went to Caledonia, Belleview valley in Missouri, where he became one of the foremost men of his day and locality. He aided in building the first Presbyterian church erected west of the Mississippi. He was a member of the first state constitutional convention of Missouri, also a member of the first state legislature of Missouri, which met in St. Louis. On the occasion of attending the meeting of that body he was accompanied by his son, John, who, at the time, saw the first steamboat that ever cast anchor in the St. Louis docks. Later the family removed to what is now Butler county, Mo., where this Revolutionary hero and brave pioneer spent his last days.

Born in Kentucky in 1807, John Stevenson graduated from a college in Indiana and studied medicine, but did not engage in practice, turning his attention instead to surveying. As county surveyor and deputy United States surveyor he surveyed the greater part of southeastern Missouri, and laid out the town of Poplar Bluff in Butler county, which he named. On the establishment of the county he was elected the first county judge. In 1850 he crossed the plains to California, in the hope of finding gold, returning east via Panama three years later. Again in 1857 he crossed the plains, this time accompanied by his son, Henry H., and driving a herd of cattle, which formed the nucleus of his herd in Santa Clara county. When he returned to Missouri in 1860, it was his intention to again come to California, but the outbreak of the Civil war changed his plans, and he remained in Missouri, dying in Wayne county. His wife, Elizabeth, was born in Illinois and died in Missouri in 1847. Her father, Abraham Walters, was a native of Virginia and died in Illinois. Of her two children who attained mature years, Henry H. alone survives. He was born in Butler county, Mo., August 28, 1840. His education was received in public schools and Arcadia College.

One of the most vivid recollections in the life of Mr. Stevenson is of the six months' journey across the plains with his father in 1857, when they brought three hundred head of cattle to California. Indians were hostile and numerous, and on one occasion attacked the party. Indeed, from Salt Lake City to Carson continual skirmishing was necessary, and had it not been that many white men had joined forces and made one large expedition, herds and men alike would have perished. Among the men who had joined them were Governor Denver and Bishop, with their government escort, which made an addition so formidable that the Indians concluded retreat was safer than any more fighting. At last the company arrived in California, with their thirty wagons on the end gate of each of which was tied an Indian scalp. As may be imagined, the cavalcade attracted no little attention, for Indian scalps were not seen every day, although fights were numerous with the red men.

Though only a youth of seventeen, Mr. Stevenson did a man's work during all of the trip and stood his turn as guard with the others. In 1860 he returned with his father via Panama, and the next year joined the Missouri state troops under Colonel Hedgepeth while Jackson was governor. While acting as scout under Jeff Thompson he was captured at Greenville by Colonel Boyd's troops and was brought into the colonel's presence and condemned to be shot as a spy. However, he was imprisoned a few days, which gave him his chance to escape. One evening the provost marshal was forced to lie down, suffering from a severe headache. Just before he had asked the prisoner to assist to write out some passes. He availed himself of the provost's absence to make out one pass for himself, and when night came on, he fled, seeking refuge in Arkansas. At the expiration of his year of service he was given his choice between returning home or re-enlisting in the Confederate army. He chose the former, returned home, secured his father's permission to come to California, and in the fall of 1862 arrived in San Francisco via New York and Panama. His condition was not very prosperous, as he did not even have a dollar in his possession. However, health and determination constitute excellent capital for a young man, and he was soon at work. For four years he was deputy county assessor and collector, for two years he was deputy clerk, and for two years deputy recorder. Ill health caused him to remove to Southern California in 1876 and for a year he worked at the carpenter's trade in Los Angeles, after which he bought a farm at Downey, and made his home there from 1879 until 1892. He still owns twenty-four acres of walnuts, which he improved from a wilderness and has made a valuable orchard. The land is one and one-half miles north of Downey and one mile south of Rivera. Since 1892 he has considered Long Beach his home and here he owns and occupies a residence on Fifth street near American avenue. Fraternally he is connected with the Independent Order of Foresters. In Santa Clara county he married Miss Mary M. Walter, who was born in 1852 in what is now Nevada while her parents were en route to California. Her father, George Walter, was a native of Ohio, and after coming to the coast engaged in horticultural pursuits at Downey, but died at Ventura.

In October, 1899, Mr. Stevenson was appointed interpreter and clerk to Major Morrison, judge-advocate of the Philippines, and went to those islands, remaining fourteen months, and returning home in March, 1901. During his stay he was stationed principally at Zamboanga, Mindanao Island. Availing himself of exceptional opportunities afforded him to study resources, climate, soil, people and prospects, he acquired a large fund of valuable information, and was so well pleased with what he saw that he anticipates returning to the Philippines and investing in property there as soon as the difficulties are settled. His study of the political situation, carried on under favorable conditions, has made him an anti-imperialist, with a firm belief that to add the Philippines to our national possessions will not be for the highest good either of our country or of the islands themselves.

CHARLES C. MASON. Scarcely any one now living within a few miles of Santa Fe Springs has made his home in this locality for so long a period as has Mr. Mason, who dates his residence on his present homestead from December of 1875. Impelled to seek California by reason of failing health, he closed out his interests in the central states and came to Los Angeles county, where under the beneficent influence of sunshine and ideal climate his health was soon restored. Shortly after his arrival he bought thirty acres of raw land, the improvement of which represents the arduous labors of succeeding years. In 1876 he planted orange trees, but, later, not feeling satisfied with the results, he replaced them with English walnuts. At this writing he has thirty-three acres of walnut grove near Whittier which has recently commenced to bear and promises well for the future; in addition he still owns his original ranch, a part of which is under nuts and the balance in pasture.

In an early day Robert and Elizabeth Mason emigrated from England. The day after they landed in New Jersey a son was born to them, who was given his father's name. Moving subsequently to Indiana, the son assisted in clearing land and doing other pioneer work. On starting out for himself he bought a farm near the home place, and the patent for this, bearing the signature of President Monroe, is now in the possession of Charles C. Mason. The task of clearing this tract necessitated many hardships and sacrifices, but the attainment of the end fully justified the labor necessary thereto. At the time of his death, when seventy-two years of age, Robert Mason, Jr., left a considerable estate to his children, the result of his industrious and persevering life. For many years he was a leader in the Methodist Episcopal Church. Politically he was a Republican. He married Lodisa Clark, who was born and reared in New York state, and died in California at seventy-three years. Like him, she was devoted to the work of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Of their eight children all but one are still living, Charles C. being the second of these.

At Lawrenceburg, Dearborn county, Ind., Charles C. Mason was born January 1, 1842. After completing public school studies he entered college, but his tastes did not run in the line of book-learning and, as soon as possible, he entered upon a business career. At the age of twenty-one he began buying and selling grain and hay, and trading down the Ohio and Mississippi rivers on flatboats, but the outbreak of the war ruined that trade. Seeking a new location and occupation, he went to St. Paul, Minn., where he became interested in a wholesale boot and shoe house. Much of his time he spent as a commercial traveler, being one of the first traveling men out from that city. With E. P. Johnson as partner, he took the first shoe-manufacturing machinery into Minnesota and owned and operated a factory there. The severity of the winters in those northern regions, added to the strain of heavy business responsibilities, overtaxed his strength, and obliged him to seek another location and business. In this way he happened to come to California, where for a quarter of a century he has been an honored citizen of Santa Fe Springs. In Indiana he married Miss Sarah L. Blasdel, who had been his schoolmate at Lawrenceburg. They have two daughters, namely: Lucinda J., wife of Frederick D. Smith, of Visalia, Cal.; and Emma J., who is with her parents.

Ever since casting a presidential vote for Abraham Lincoln, Mr. Mason has been a pronounced Republican, a constant attendant upon county conventions, a believer in a high protective tariff which will aid our home industries, and a worker in behalf of his party. Elected county assessor in 1886, he filled that responsible position in a satisfactory manner, notwithstanding the fact that its duties were unusually trying by reason of the raising of almost $350,000 to be used for the building of the courthouse and making other improvements. His service lasted from 1887 to 1890 inclusive. As an officer, it was his policy to select honest and intelligent deputies, familiar with property valuations, and to these was given the task of making assessments on real-estate. There were many, not only of his own party but others as well, who bestowed the greatest praise upon his efficient discharge of official duties. In fraternal relations he is connected with the Ancient Order of United Workmen, the blue lodge of Masons and the Eastern Star.

WILLIAM WALLACE ROBLEE, M. D. On both family lines Dr. Roblee has a strain of French blood, his patronymic originally being Roblyrd. He was born near Willoughby, Iowa, February 2, 1872, and received a liberal education, completing his literary studies in Emporia (Kans.) College. In 1889 he was made physical director of the gymnasium department of the Young Men's Christian Association, of Topeka, and about that time commenced the study of medicine under the direction of Drs. Hebben and Jones. Then, going to Oakland, Cal., he held a similar position with the local association of young men and continued his preparation for a medical career. Completing a four years' course in the Cooper Medical College of San Francisco in 1895, he at once settled in Riverside and soon was made a health officer of this place.

In 1896 Dr. Roblee joined the California National Guard, and was commissioned by Governor Budd as assistant surgeon of the Seventh Regiment, with the rank of captain. When the Spanish-American war came on, he accompanied his regiment to San Francisco, and remained in the service until the conflict was over, holding the same rank and office, and since that time has been raised to the post of regimental surgeon, with the rank of major. Until he went to the war service he had been the medical examiner for several old-line life insurance companies and also officiated as a member of the United States pension examining board. At the present time he holds the position of the medical examiner for the local lodges of the Odd Fellows, Knights of the Maccabees, Woodmen of the World, Fraternal Aid and Ancient Order of United Workmen, and is also associated with the American and Riverside County Medical Associations and a member of the National Association of Military Surgeons.

JOHN PADDISON. On a ranch three-quarters of a mile northwest of Norwalk, Los Angeles county, Mr. Paddison is busily engaged in prosecuting the work of a horticulturist and dairyman. With justice he may be denominated a pioneer, since he came to his present homestead in July of 1879 and has ever since been associated with the growth and development of the community. Having only limited means, his first purchase was limited to forty-four acres, which, being unimproved, was secured at a low figure. From time to time he had made additions to the property, until the ranch now contains two hundred and seventy-six acres, principally in pasture and alfalfa. When cheese factories were started, he concluded that the dairy business would prove more profitable than previously; accordingly, he stocked his place with a high grade of cattle and has since sold large quantities of milk. At this writing he milks about thirty standard-bred Holsteins, the majority of which were raised on his place.

A native of Wales, John Paddison was born June 14, 1845, and is a son of George and Ann (House) Paddison, natives of England. On the home farm he passed the uneventful years of youth. At the age of twenty-four years, in 1869, he crossed the ocean to America, proceeding at once to Dekalb county, Ill., where he secured employment on a farm. From there he went still further west, settling in Douglas county, Colo., where he carried on a stock-raising business for three years. Disposing of his interests there, in 1876 he came to California and for two or more years rented a ranch near Downey, after which he came to the property that is now his home. In 1877 he married Miss Anna P. Stokes, of Artesia, Los Angeles county, who was born in England and came to the United States in 1875. Of their union are three children, Edith, Edward and Mabel. The family are members of the Episcopal Church and hold an honored place in the best social circles of their locality. No consideration of politics (for he is independent in his political opinions) and no attractions of fraternal organizations (for he is identified with none) have ever turned Mr. Paddison aside from the thoughtful and constant supervision of his ranch, and, being of a quiet and home-loving disposition, when his day's labors are ended, he finds his greatest happiness in his home and the society of his family; notwithstanding this, he neglects no duty as a citizen, but supports movements for the benefit of his town and county to the extent of his ability to assist them.

GEORGE HUNTINGTON PECK, Sr. This California pioneer of 1849, now residing in Pasadena, was born in Burlington, Vt., March 4, 1819, a son of John and Almira (Keyes) Peck. In 1833 he entered the University of Vermont, where constant study, unrelieved by the athletic sports of the present day, undermined his constitution, so that at his graduation in 1837 he was a chronic invalid. Hoping to be benefited by a change, he made a cod-fishing voyage through the straits of Belle Isle, and as far as the Esquimaux Moravian missionary settlements of Okak and Naim off the Labrador coast. The winter of 1839-40 was spent at the island of Santa Cruz, Danish West Indies, and in touring among the islands of St. Thomas, Porto Rico, Hayti, and Jamaica. In 1841 he was admitted to the bar and began to practice in Burlington, but ill-health again forced him to sea life. From December, 1842, to 1846 he was a sailor before the mast, and visited the southern ports of the United States, West Indies, Rio Janeiro and England, after which he returned to Vermont and became interested in the mercantile business.

December 1, 1849, Mr. Peck landed in San Francisco, and at once, with partners, began farming at Alviso; fifty miles south of that city. In May, 1850, he became the pioneer produce merchant of San Francisco. In those days hay sold for $200 a ton, peas twenty-five cents a pound in the pod, potatoes $25 a cental, and cabbage $1.50 for a bunch of leaves called a head. Everything in California was wild, rough, unsettled and constantly changing. During 1851 and 1852 Mr. Peck was a successful miner on the Middle Fork of the American river. Then, for two years, he farmed in Yolo county, where he owned several thousand acres. February 14, 1854, he opened in Sacramento the first public school in the entire state, outside of San Francisco. In 1857-58 he practiced law in Dutch Flat, a mining settlement in Nevada county. Returning to California in 1858 from a visit in Vermont, he opened a commercial class and was a pioneer teacher of double-entry bookkeeping in San Francisco. In May, 1860, he opened the San Francisco industrial school, and from 1861 to 1863 was grammar master (the highest educational position in California in those days) also acted as principal of a San Francisco school. From 1863 to 1869 he engaged in mercantile pursuits, and in the latter year settled on a farm of about five hundred acres at El Monte, Los Angeles county. At that time the city and county of Los Angeles had about seven thousand inhabitants each. Markets were limited and everything primitive. Mr. Peck had the privilege of admiring his land, paying taxes and waiting for the future. Fortunately for him, teaching was always an available crutch. From 1874 to 1876 he was superintendent of the schools of Los Angeles county. It is a noteworthy fact that, although he entered college the youngest and weakest in a class of forty-eight and through the early part of his life was hampered by ill health, he is now the sole survivor of his class and at eighty-three years of age is the oldest living graduate of the University of Vermont.

The marriage of Mr. Peck, April 30, 1864, united him with Miss Mary W. Chater, an English lady. They are the parents of four children, namely: John H. F., a merchant of Soda Springs, Idaho; George H., Jr., a banker of San Pedro, Cal.; Kate, wife of Albert Gibbs, of South Pasadena; and Mary C., wife of John E. Jardine, of Pasadena. For many years Mr. Peck has been senior warden of the Church of Our Savior (Episcopal) at San Gabriel.

JOHN N. MALLGREN. This pioneer of San Pedro was born in Sweden May 13, 1849, and passed the years of boyhood in alternating attendance at school with work on a farm. In common with many of the lads of his peninsular home, a love for the sea seemed inbred in his nature. While still a mere youth he became a sailor and for some years sailed the salt seas. During 1872 he arrived in New York and from there sailed to the West Indies, later proceeding to San Francisco, where he landed in the fall of 1874. At first he continued his seafaring life on these coasts, but soon gave up the work and came to Southern California, his first objective point being Anaheim. Before the town of San Pedro had sprung into existence, he secured employment on the wharf at Wilmington in the lumber business. After a month he entered the employ of the Southern Pacific Railway Company, as stevedore on all the lighters, and for two years it was his business to receive lumber from ships entering the harbor. On leaving the company's employ he became foreman for Mr. Hayes, assisting the latter for a year in filling the breakwater contract for the government. Meantime, as when with the railroad, he camped on Dead Man's Island, but finally the camp was moved to what is now San Pedro and he built a house on what is now Front street, leasing the land from the owners of the ranch. When, in the fall of 1882, the town was laid out, the Southern Pacific Railway Company gave him notice to vacate, and he bought two lots on Front street, to which he moved his store building. These two lots, together with two that adjoin them, he still owns, and their increase in value has made the investment a profitable one for him.

During the spring of 1883 Mr. Mallgren visited in San Francisco and there met Miss Hannah Wilson, a native of Sweden. They were married October 6, same year, and established their home in a house which Mr. Mallgren had built on Knob Hill, it being the first residence built on this hill. Two days after his marriage his business place burned to the ground, but he was partially secured by an insurance of $1,000, and at once started a small grocery, the first store of the kind on Knob Hill. Continuing in the same building until 1888, he then erected his present two-story brick store building, 45x35 feet in dimensions, and still one of the most substantial structures in the town. Here he has since conducted an increasing grocery business, which has drawn as patrons many of the best people of the city and vicinity. To all his reliable methods of conducting business and his accommodating disposition have commended themselves. His family consists of his wife and daughter, Eva, two other children having died in infancy.

While staunchly true to Republican principles in national politics, Mr. Mallgren believes in local elections the character of the candidate is of greater importance than his views as to expansion, protection and other national problems. Hence he is liberal in town and county matters, supporting the best man irrespective of party ties. As already intimated, he owns considerable property in San Pedro. The society hall in his building was for seven years leased by the Odd Fellows and Knights of Pythias, who instituted their first lodge in it, but more recently have moved to the central part of the town. The hall has since been leased by the Federation of Labor No. 8921. In fraternal matters he has been a member of Bohemian Lodge No. 138, I. O. O. F., at Wilmington, for twenty-four years. During the years 1895, 1896 and 1897 he held the office of school trustee, while from 1896 to 1900 he served efficiently as a member of the board of city trustees.

JAMES HENRY STEVENS. As one of those courageous pioneers who unflinchingly took up the burden of life in the early days of California, and profited by the crude conditions before the advent of the railroad shortened distances and carried freight between the settlements started through man's faith in the future of the state, James Henry Stevens is deserving of the regard and grateful remembrance which brightened his later years, and in no wise diminished through the calamity of his death, November 3, 1893. In the dawn of the last century he was born in Alex, Wayne county, Ky., a son of James B. Stevens, a native of Virginia and an early settler in Kentucky. The first ten years of his life were spent in his native state. From there he was taken by the family to Greensburg, Ind., and lived on a farm until 1839, after which he removed to Miami township, Hamilton county, Ohio, and engaged in farming until 1852. Then, accompanied by his wife and five children, he journeyed from Cincinnati to St. Joseph, Mo., where he fitted out ox-teams and wagons, and took cattle up the North Platte river to Fort Kearney, crossed Wyoming to Humboldt, and thence crossed the mountains to Volcano, Cal., the trip taking six months for completion.

The first year was spent in farming in Santa Cruz county, and after that he engaged in freighting lumber from the mountains to Oakland. For the following fifteen years he lived in Amador county, Cal., and during that time occupied himself with teaming to different parts of the county. In 1869 he removed to Santa Barbara county, and in the town purchased two blocks of land on Garden street, where he built a brick manufactory, and engaged in brick-making, contracting and building. Among the most ambitious of his successes in this line may be mentioned the Santa Barbara court-house, the third schoolhouse, and many large buildings and business houses. Up to the time of his death he was prominent in the business world, and representative of the reliability of Santa Barbara commercial life. He was a Democrat in politics, and was a member of the board of trustees of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

The marriage of Mr. Stevens and Ann Glass, a native of Cleves, Hamilton county, Ohio, occurred in 1839. Mrs. Stevens is a daughter of Robert Glass, who was born in Pennsylvania, and was an early settler at Cleves, where he conducted an hotel. Later he removed to a farm, where his death occurred at the age of eighty-four years. On the paternal side the family is of staunch Pennsylvania-German stock, descended from German ancestry. The paternal grandfather, named James, died in Pennsylvania. The mother of Mrs. Stevens, formerly Catherine Hufford, was also born in Pennsylvania, a daughter of Rudolph Hufford, of Pennsylvania. She was the mother of eight children, all girls, of whom Mrs. Stevens is the second youngest, and the only one living. She was reared and educated in Ohio, and her early training was such as to develop strong and fine traits of character, so conspicuous in her mature years, and so redolent of that kindness, consideration, and thoughtfulness which have raised up friends everywhere and made her one of the most interesting of the pioneer women of California. Since her husband's death, Mrs. Stevens has continued to live in Santa Barbara, ably superintending her many interests, and enjoying the social and other advantages of her beautiful town. The eight children born to Mr. and Mrs. Stevens are: James B., who is a clerk in the office of the public appraiser, at San Francisco; Edgar R., who is a commercial traveler, with headquarters in San Francisco; Mrs. Annie M. Pease, of the state of Washington; Mrs. Belle Leach, of Lompoc; Mrs. May Willard, of Santa Paula; Mrs. Helen McPhale, of Reno, Nev.; Mrs. Elizabeth Dalton, of Santa Barbara; and Thomas C., who is a resident of Santa Barbara. Mrs. Stevens is a member of and worker in the Methodist Church.

CHARLES F. MILLER, M. D. As the sole representative of the medical profession in Gardena, Dr. Miller has an extended patronage, which is by no means confined to the limits of the town. He was born in Milwaukee, Wis., January 17, 1848, a son of Frederick and Wilhelmina Eleanor (Wehe) Miller, natives of Germany, and the former born in Hesse-Darmstadt.

The father of Dr. Miller emigrated to America in 1830, and became a pioneer of Milwaukee, arriving on the site of that now prosperous and beautiful city while it was still in the hands of farmers, who regarded Chicago, Ill., as the nearest center of actual activity. Mr. Miller bought forty acres of land in what is now the city limits, and ten more near the present heart of the city, and became well-to-do and prominent. With the fruits of his toil he came to California in 1863, and settled in retirement in San Francisco, but his death occurred in Oakland in 1889. On the maternal side of his family Dr. Miller comes from a prominent German family named Wehe, his maternal grandfather having served with the great Napoleon from 1812 to 1815 as a non-commissioned officer, and later as road overseer. His mother came to America as a child with her parents, and after her marriage reared eleven children, of whom Dr. Miller is the oldest.

Up to his sixteenth year Dr. Miller lived in Wisconsin on his father's farm, and attended the district schools. He attended the University of California after removing to the west with the rest of the family, and in 1874 had qualified as a physician and surgeon. His initial practice was conducted at Hills Ferry, Stanislaus county, Cal., and in 1887 removed to Ventura, where he practiced until his removal to Gardena in 1900. In 1875 he married Mary Cantlivere, who was born in New York City and came to California in 1861. Dr. Miller is variously identified with the social, professional and political affairs of his county, and takes an interest in everything of a developing and upbuilding nature. He is a member of the County Medical Society, of Ventura, Cal., and has served as pension examiner under the administrations of Harrison, Cleveland and McKinley. As postmaster of the town he began to serve in 1882, under Garfield, and continued to maintain the position until his resignation, fifteen months after Cleveland had assumed the reins of government. At the same time he was notary public, and school trustee. He was member of the county central committee, and has been a delegate at various Republican conventions. The professional skill of Dr. Miller, his humanitarian application of the same in connection with those in need from a financial standpoint, augmented by his genial and kindly personality, have made him an important factor in the affairs of Gardena.

B. E. JONES. After a strenuous and very successful career in the timber regions of Wisconsin, augmented by a large and lucrative lumber business experience near Chicago, Ill., Mr. Jones is enjoying comparative immunity from business cares on his beautiful ranch near Gardena, upon which he settled in 1898.

A native of the vicinity of Lenox, Mass., B. E. Jones was born July 21, 1838, and is a son of Granville and Caroline (Herd) Jones, natives also of Massachusetts. Granville Jones was a farmer in Massachusetts, and removed to Tioga county, Pa., when his son, B. E., was a mere boy. Previous to his retirement he was identified with a mercantile concern, and his death occurred in the Quaker state at the age of seventy-two years. His father-in-law, Elisha Herd, was born in Connecticut, and in later life settled in Massachusetts, from which state he enlisted for a three years' service in the Civil war. He was a farmer during his active life, and died at the age of seventy-two years. To himself and wife were born nine children, of whom B. E. is the oldest.

The rise of B. E. Jones to his present substantial position is not due to any particular early advantages, for he gained his first impressions of life and work as a common farm hand on a Pennsylvania farm. His foundation, however, proved an eminently secure one, for he saved enough money during the ensuing years to remove to the pineries of Wisconsin in 1862 and purchase nine hundred acres of land. Here he erected a saw and planing mill, and the hum of industry was heard thereabouts which piled up a fortune for the industrious owner and wise manager. At the expiration of thirty years, or in 1892, Mr. Jones unsettled himself from the pineries and located in Chicago, and bought two hundred and sixty-five acres of land within thirty-five miles of the city. Here he conducted a lumber yard for four years, and in 1898 sold out and came to Gardena. His ranch on the slope consists of thirty-eight acres, all under alfalfa, and he has built some additions to the house, and put in a private pumping plant of sixty inches capacity.

While living in Wisconsin in 1889, Mr. Jones married Barbara, daughter of John Paulus, the latter born in Germany, and a farmer in Wisconsin. Mr. Jones is a Democrat in political affiliation, but has taken no active part in politics in California, nor does he belong with any fraternal society.

R. D. DOW. One of the most popular, genial, and thoroughly successful ranchers of Gardena is R. D. Dow, who combines the finish and thoroughness of an eastern training with the push and energy of acclimated westerners. Before removing to California in 1888 he had spent his entire life in his native state of Maine, where he was born July 11, 1838, and where he was reared to maturity on the paternal farm. His father, Joseph Dow, was born in Somerset county, Me., whither the paternal grandfather, Chandler, had removed from the place of his birth in Vermont. The father owned and operated a farm of one hundred and sixty acres, upon which he died at the age of eighty-five years. He married Margaret Weston, who was born in Maine, and who became the mother of four daughters and two sons, R. D. being the youngest child in the family.

The ranch in Gardena owned by R. D. Dow, consists of eleven and a half acres under alfalfa and which is highly improved and has a private pumping station with a capacity of fifty inches. Mrs. Dow was formerly Comfort Willey, a native of Maine, and daughter of Turner Willey, a farmer who died in Maine at the age of seventy-five years. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Dow, viz.: Nellie, who is the wife of J. A. Lakey, lives in North Carolina; Rosa, who is the wife of A. W. Eaton; and Willie Wilson. Mr. Dow is a Republican in politics, and is fraternally associated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. His home is the center of a gracious hospitality, and he has hosts of friends and well wishers.

W. S. MYERS. The first location of Mr. Myers, on coming to California in 1895, was in the Antelope valley, but soon he went to Gardena, and from there came to Moneta, his present home. The thirty acres which he owns and operates are improved by an attractive dwelling, erected by Mr. Myers, and another valuable improvement is a private gasoline pumping plant. Of the land six acres are in strawberries, two acres in black and Logan berries, and twelve in alfalfa, the whole forming one of the most thrifty ranches in the locality.

The paternal grandfather of Mr. Myers was Joseph Myers, a native of North Carolina and a farmer by occupation, spending his last years on a farm in Iowa, where he died. The maternal grandfather, William Wymore, was of eastern birth, and spent much of his life in Iowa as a farmer. For miles around he was known as Squire Wymore, and all respected him for his sterling worth of character. While walking alone one day through the woods he was stricken with apoplexy, and when found life was extinct. W. S. Myers was born in Mahaska county, Iowa, April 14, 1865, being a son of George Washington and Margaret (Wymore) Myers, natives respectively of North Carolina and Indiana. When six years of age the father was taken to Indiana. In 1848 he removed from there to Iowa and bought five hundred and sixty acres, which he developed into a valuable farm. On that place his death occurred when he was sixty-three years of age. As he was about to pass away, he called his two sons and his daughter around him and divided the property among them.

The marriage of W. S. Myers united him with Ada Lena Stevens, who was born in Missouri and reared in Iowa. Her father, Elijah Stevens, a native of New York, settled in early life in Missouri, later went to Kansas, afterward settled in Iowa, and finally came to California, where he now makes his home at Gardena. The children of Mr. and Mrs. Myers are Clarence, Ada and Lowell. The family are attendants at the Methodist Episcopal church, to the maintenance of which Mr. Myers is a contributor. He is associated with the Fraternal Brotherhood and in matters political gives his allegiance to the Democratic party, adhering to the faith of his forefathers in this respect.

WILLIAM M. GRAY. Land lying near a large city can always be advantageously utilized for the raising of small fruit and garden produce, and this business can be conducted with gratifying profits in all cases where the soil is fertile and the expense of transportation insignificant. This principle has been grasped by Mr. Gray, of Gardena, who is an extensive raiser of strawberries. When he came to Gardena in 1898 he bought ten acres, on which he erected a cozy and attractive residence and further improved the property by a private pumping plant of eighty inches' capacity. While his principal product is strawberries, he also raises dewberries, raspberries and blackberries, and has a walnut orchard of five acres, besides raising some alfalfa. His own land being insufficient for his purposes, he has a large acreage leased and conducts an extensive berry business, being, indeed, one of the largest berry-raisers in his region.

In Randolph county, Ind., Mr. Gray was born June 14, 1852, being a son of George and Lydia Jane (Macy) Gray, natives respectively of Ohio and Indiana. The former in an early day settled in Jo Daviess county, Ill., where he bought and improved eighty acres. Somewhat later he settled upon an eighty-acre farm in Dallas county, Iowa, where he died at sixty-three years. His father, Nathaniel Gray, was a native of New England and died in Indiana; and his wife's father, William Macy, M. D., was a soldier in the war of 1812. The boyhood years of William M. Gray were passed in Indiana and Illinois. His education was commenced in local schools and afterward he matriculated in the State University of Michigan at Ann Arbor, where he hoped to take the entire course, but after one term the condition of his health was such as to render further continuance at study inadvisable. He then returned to Iowa and took up farm pursuits. The year 1887 found him at Elsinore, Cal., and the following spring he went to Fallbrook, where he made his home some years. In 1898 he came to Gardena, his present home. While living in the east he married Miss Fannie E. Evans, who was born in Illinois. Two sons and two daughters were born of their union, namely: Vernor W.; Eva Myrtle, deceased; Erma Garnet and Ernest John.

At no time has Mr. Gray been desirous of exchanging the tasks of private business affairs for the duties of office-holding, and, aside from voting the Republican ticket, he has taken no part whatever in politics. In religion he is associated with the Methodist Episcopal Church and a contributor to it, as well as to other worthy movements. The Fraternal Brotherhood and blue lodge of Masons number him among their members. As a citizen he favors plans for the benefit of his town and county, and assists in bringing about their fruition.

REASON MONROE THURMAN. In the vicinity of Pomona the name of R. Monroe Thurman is associated with much that is progressive and prosperous. When he came here in 1887 he established his home on Crow avenue, between Garey and Gibbs street, and besides this lot acquired other holdings in local real estate. Yielding to a desire to identify himself with the principal industry of the region he set out fruit trees and has since raised fruit in considerable quantities. In addition during the first years here he also engaged in grading and the improving of streets. When the Phillips estate was in part disposed of he bought twenty-five acres and in addition he rents four hundred acres, using the entire tract for dairy purposes and for the raising of alfalfa. It is said that few men in the community have equaled him as a successful alfalfa raiser, and when it is recorded that he has cut seven crops per year, averaging one and one-half ton per acre, no one will question that he has reduced the business to a science.

Near Ridgeville, in Bledsoe county, Tenn., Mr. Thurman was born July 22, 1841, a son of John and Lettie Jane Thurman. The family of which he was a member comprised ten children eight of whom were living when removal was made to California. These were: Nellie, who married John Hicks; Frank, of San Gabriel valley; Ephraim and Margaret, both deceased; R. Monroe; Stephen D., who was born December 25, 1843, and lives near El Monte; Alexander, also a resident of Los Angeles county, and John S., of Los Angeles. After having lived in Johnson county, Ark., from 1848 to 1852 the family then started with others across the plains for California. With ox teams they slowly made their way toward the setting sun. Many hardships had to be endured, all of which the wife and mother bore uncomplainingly, but she was not physically equal to the strain and was taken ill at the copper mines in Arizona. Her sorrow-stricken family devotedly and anxiously watched over her, but in vain. Sadly they laid her body to rest in a lonely spot and then took up the journey without the one that was dearest to all.

In September of 1852 the family arrived in San Gabriel valley near the present site of El Monte. Leaving the family there the father proceeded to the mines of Tuolumne county, but returned the next year and took up farming and stock raising near the Temple ranch. Little does the present generation realize the hardships endured by the pioneers of the '50s, to instance which it may be stated that Mr. Thurman often drove his stock to market as far as Virginia City, five hundred miles away. However, he prospered in spite of difficulties and soon won his way to a high rank among the farmers of the valley. Selling out in 1865, he bought property between Savannah and El Monte, but in 1867 moved to Willow Grove, where he bought sixty acres of agricultural land. On that place his death occurred July 6, 1876, when he was sixty-eight years of age. A man of far more than ordinary ability, a promoter of charitable and religious movements, a firm believer in education and the public schools, he was a strong man both mentally and morally, and well merited the esteem of his associates.

The establishment of a domestic life marked the first important change in the existence of Mr. Thurman after coming to California. In 1868 he married Dora Belle Fuqua, daughter of Isham and Johanna (Hathway) Fuqua, mention of whom appears elsewhere. The ten children born of their union are named as follows: Nellie, Mrs. John Sutton, who has one daughter, Rena; R. Monroe, Jr., who is married and has one daughter, Myrtle; Annie, Mrs. George Smith, who has one child, Vada; Alice, Mrs. Henry Clapworth; William B., Allen L., Robert D., Bert, Mabel and Clay. The family are well known among the citizens of Pomona, take an active part in various social functions, and merit and receive the respect of all. Fraternally Mr. Thurman is connected with the Ancient Order of United Workmen. He was reared in the faith of the Democratic party and has never wavered in his allegiance to its principles, but has been content to let his vote represent his belief, and has not been prominent in local politics nor a seeker after official positions within the gift of his party.

JOHN B. PYLES. Since coming to Pomona Mr. Pyles has been identified with its business interests and is now a member of the firm of Cooper & Pyles. He was born in Washington county, Pa., in 1874, a son of Paul Pyles. When he was quite small his mother was accidentally burned to death and he was then taken into the home of an uncle, Samuel Pyles. At the age of eleven years he accompanied this uncle to California, settling in Westminster, Orange county. Immediately afterward he began to learn the blacksmith's trade, and when he was sixteen he went to Chino, where he opened a shop. Without doubt he was the youngest man in California to run a blacksmith shop of his own. During the three and one-half years he remained in Chino he built up a fair trade and proved to the people that, in spite of his youth, he was an expert workman and reliable business man.

W. A. Hayes

In 1895 Mr. Pyles disposed of his business in Chino and came to Pomona, where he has since made his home. At first he was a partner of H. M. James, but after a time he formed the partnership with Harvey Cooper which continues to the present and has since given his attention wholly to this business. Enterprising and capable, he is qualified to conduct a business successfully, and he and Mr. Cooper are building up a substantial and important trade in the line of their specialties.

COL. WILLIAM ALSTON HAYNE. Associated with the most conspicuous development of the Montecito valley is the fine and noble life of William Alston Hayne. As long ago as 1867 he came here after a meritorious service in the Civil war, and bought a large tract of land for $20 an acre, upon which no improvements had been made and which was liberally supplied with sage brush and chaparral. At that time not a fruit tree had been planted in the valley, nor had any other American availed himself of the advantages here found, or built himself a house in which to live. He at once began to clear the land, and from San Francisco brought a thousand orange trees which formed the nucleus of the later splendid orange industry in one of the most beautiful valleys in Southern California.

Throughout his life Colonel Hayne maintained the traditions of an enviable ancestry, his forefathers having been prominently identified with the early struggles of the Republic. He was born in Charleston, S. C., April 25, 1821, a son of Hon. Robert Y. Hayne, one of the foremost politicians and history makers of South Carolina, and one of the most eminent statesmen of which that southern state can boast, filling many exalted positions of trust. He was elected a member of congress and United States senator, and finally was honored with the gubernatorial chair of his native state. While governor, it was his privilege in 1832 to issue a counter proclamation to that of President Jackson, in favor of state rights, as against nullification. In the senate, from which he resigned in favor of Calhoun, he was opposed to Daniel Webster in that great debate on Foot's resolution regarding public lands, which drifted into state rights, and eventually brought on the Civil war. The father of Governor Hayne was brother of Isaac Hayne, that courageous and gifted man who, in the estimation of subsequent history, is entitled to a martyr's crown. Governor Hayne married a daughter of Col. William Alston, the aide-de-camp of General Marion, and whose grandmother, Rebecca Mott, was the heroine of many stirring incidents during the Revolutionary war. During the war of 1812 Col. Arthur P. Hayne, a brother of the former governor of South Carolina, served on General Jackson's staff as aide-camp.

Colonel Hayne was educated at Columbia College in South Carolina, and took up the study of law at Charleston, of the same state. His marked ability won a ready recognition, and he was elected to the legislature, being a member of that august body when secession was established. During the Civil war he was aide on the staff of Governor Pickens, who was later United States minister to Russia. However, on account of illness, he could not accompany his regiment to the front. He was later in the quartermaster's department, and during the progress of the war was stationed for the most part in South Carolina, gaining in time for his services the rank of colonel.

After the war Colonel Hayne came to California with his wife and children, the motives animating his departure from his native state being the loss of health and of a large estate which somewhat embarrassed him financially. In San Francisco he had a brother, Dr. A. P. Hayne, and a cousin, E. J. Pringle, an able attorney. He arrived in San Francisco in July of 1867, and, acting upon the advice of his relatives and upon observations made by himself, decided to locate near Santa Barbara in the Montecito valley. In the change of conditions to California he devoted his time largely to agriculture and horticulture. As a staunch Democrat, he became prominent in the political undertakings of Southern California, and among other important positions which his ability drew to him was a membership in the California legislature in 1875. His was a master mind in grasping and fully understanding the opportunities awaiting the settler here in the early days, and his tact and good fellowship were evinced in no more forcible way than by his willingness to cultivate the friendship of the Spanish people, who entertained for him a lasting regard, and with whom he became associated in many business transactions. Like all the members of the family to which he belonged, he appreciated the consolation and friendship of books, and all his life long he was a student, and a keen observer of men and events. He was a member of the Episcopal Church, and, with Colonel Heath and Dr. Shaw, aided in the organization of the church at Santa Barbara, of which he was warden and lay reader for more than thirty years. He contributed generously to the church, and to all other worthy causes which appealed to his intelligence and judgment.

The marriage of Colonel Hayne and Miss Margaretta Stiles, daughter of Edward James Stiles, of English descent, a native of Bermuda and an early settler in Pennsylvania, occurred in Philadelphia in 1847. Mrs. Hayne, who is still living, is the mother of nine children, eight sons and one daughter, of whom the following attained mature years: Judge Robert Y. Hayne, who was formerly a judge of the superior court of San Francisco; William Alston Hayne, who is in the oil business, and resides near San Francisco; Benjamin S., who is engaged in business in California; Brewton A., who is city attorney of Berkeley; Duncan, who is an attorney in San Francisco; Arthur P., who is filling a professorship in the Agricultural College, and who was a volunteer in the Philippines under Generals Wheaton and Lawton. Three children are deceased. Colonel Hayne died March 28, 1901, when nearly eighty years of age.

HARVEY COOPER. The senior member of the firm of Cooper & Pyles of Pomona was born in Walworth county, Wis., in 1862, being the son of Peter S. Cooper, a farmer. After having completed a common school education and aided in the work of the farm until he reached maturity, he started out for himself, first going to Illinois, where he learned the blacksmith's trade. Next he went to Linn, Wis., and opened a shop, which he carried on for a short time. Later he was engaged at his trade in Sharon, Wis., and Hazelton, Iowa. The desire to find a climate that might prove beneficial to the health of his wife led him to come to California. Settling in Pomona in 1894 he worked at his trade as a journeyman for a year after which he formed a partnership with Eugene Cummings and opened a shop on Garden street. Eight months later F. T. Clark bought Mr. Cummings' interest and these two continued together for four years, conducting a general blacksmith's business.

Later Mr. Cooper was alone for a short time and then formed his present connection with J. B. Pyles. One year later they bought property on West Second street, moved off the old house standing on the lot and built a two-story structure, 85x30, with their office in the front part of the building. The floor is of concrete. There are three forges and in the rear a wash-room and closet, also coal depository. The plant is operated by electricity and electric lights furnish illumination. On the second floor is the workshop for the building of wagons and carriages, where are turned out some of the finest vehicles seen in this section. In the rear of the building is a storehouse where is kept a large stock of material for their work. Employment is furnished to three mechanics. It is said by those qualified to judge that this is the most complete blacksmith establishment in the southern part of California, if not, indeed, in the entire state.

The residence occupied by Mr. Cooper has been enlarged and remodeled by him since its purchase. By his marriage to Mary Riley of Wisconsin he had one child, Ada. After the death of his first wife he married Eva Wilkinson of Harvard, Ill., by whom he has two children, Clifford and Mary. The family are connected with the Methodist Episcopal church. Fraternally he is banker of the Modern Woodmen and counselor of the Order of Pendo.

FRANK O. SLANKER. To strangers visiting Pomona Mr. Slanker is usually introduced as "the man who bored the first artesian well in the Pomona valley." Officially he is known as the deputy sheriff and constable of this city, which positions he has filled for a long period of years. He was born in Berks county, Pa., in 1857, a son of Daniel Slanker. At the age of fourteen years he left home and thereafter he fought life's battles for himself, sometimes under the most discouraging surroundings, but always with a firm will and a resolute heart. For three years he worked for his board and clothes in order that he might attend school and thus fit himself for active life. In 1875, with his brother, S. E. Slanker, now street superintendent of Pomona, he came to California, where he engaged in the work of artesian well boring.

In the fall of 1877 Mr. Slanker came to Pomona to bore a well for Captain Hutchinson and Pancho Palomares, this being the first attempt made of the kind. At a depth of one hundred and eighty feet with a seven-inch pipe he secured a four-inch flow of water. At three hundred and forty-five feet he only secured a two-inch flow, due to the fact that the borings had reached red clay. Again he tried, this time at one hundred and eighty-five feet, where the flow was three inches. These wells do not flow now, but are used as pumping stations to supply the water for Pomona. Afterward he bored a well for Colonel Heath at Lordsburg, and at three hundred and forty-five feet got a good pumping well which is in use at the present time.

On turning his attention to other occupations, Mr. Slanker bought a blacksmith business from Mr. Scott and with the assistance of Mr. McKey carried on the same four years. After selling out he followed the business as a journeyman. In 1885 he built a house on the corner of Tenth and Main streets, which he still owns. The large grounds surrounding the house have been developed and improved and are a source of pride to the owner, to whose care and cultivation is due the fine growth of fruit and shade trees. During the year of his home-building he married Miss Sadie, daughter of Morris Keller, proprietor of the Keller Hotel of Pomona. Their children are Lura, Penelope, Etta and George C.

Possessing an inventive turn of mind, Mr. Slanker has patented a number of articles, among them a pruning shears, nut lock and oil cup for machinery. When E. B. Smith was boring for water in different parts of Pomona valley he employed Mr. Slanker to superintend the work of the borers and give advice as to where conditions were favorable for boring. Politically Mr. Slanker is a staunch Republican. In the fall of 1886, the day before the state and county election, he was requested to allow his name to go on the Republican ticket as a candidate for constable. He consented and was elected to the office. At the succeeding election he was nominated and elected almost without opposition, and the people have continued to show their appreciation of his intelligence and fitness for the office by re-electing him every two years. It is said that he has invariably polled the largest vote of any candidate on the ticket in his township. In addition he has served as deputy city marshal and deputy sheriff, and is the possessor of excellent detective ability, which these various positions have developed. Among the societies of which he is a member are the Maccabees, Ancient Order of United Workmen, Fraternal Aid, the Elks, the Fraternal Brotherhood and also the Woodmen of the World.

JOHN O'DONNELL. To say of a man that he came to this country without means or friends and that overcoming great obstacles and enduring great hardships, he finally achieved a degree of success placing him among the substantial men of his community, is to give in brief the life history of John O'Donnell of Pomona. He was born in County Kerry, Ireland, in 1828, a son of Thomas and Jane (Ferris) O'Donnell, and came with them to the United States in 1843, settling upon a farm, where his father died at sixty years and his mother when sixty-five. At the time of the great excitement caused by the discovery of gold in 1849, he crossed the great plains with an ox team, spending some eight months on the tedious and perilous journey. Arriving at Nevada City, he entered the mines and met with more than usual luck, although such were his privations and hardships that the gold he drew out of the mines seemed surely earned indeed. With the means thus secured he purchased a ranch in Colusa county, Cal., and stocked it with cattle. For six years he continued on that place, but the climate brought on chills and fever and so affected his health that he sold the land. His next purchase comprised a ranch near Oakland, and also for a period he was interested in freighting to Carson City, Nev., and Montana. Somewhat later he bought a ranch at Merced, Cal., and improved it with such energy and wise judgment that he sold it for a handsome figure.

His visits to Southern California had impressed Mr. O'Donnell so favorably that he determined to seek a suitable location where he could have the advantage of this climate. In 1887 he purchased eighty acres of the Chino addition to Pomona, and here he built a small house and made the necessary improvements. Through his efforts the farm is now a model estate with all modern improvements. Much of the land is devoted to alfalfa, of which he can cut from six to eight crops each year, and he therefore finds it a very profitable product. Barley is also raised in large quantities. A fine variety of apricots and prunes may be found in his orchard, and these form a considerable addition to his annual receipts. By the development of an independent water system and the building of a large reservoir he is able to supply every demand for irrigation, hence his property is peculiarly valuable. Cattle and horses are raised on the ranch, although the owner considers himself less a stockman than a general farmer. In 1847 he married Elizabeth Long, a native of Ohio. They have four children, viz.: Mrs. Margaret Crawford, Mrs. Mary Stennett, W. Thomas, who is a farmer, and Lizzie, who married Hubbard Bean and at her death left a daughter, who makes her home with Mr. O'Donnell.

People living in California are mostly familiar with the rapid growth of eucalyptus trees, yet they do not often hear of trees that develop as quickly as did the three hundred planted by Mr. O'Donnell on his ranch about 1890. These have grown far beyond his expectations. In 1902 he sold a small portion of the grove, and for the one hundred and twenty-eight cords thus disposed of he was paid $4 per cord on the stump. This furnishes added proof to the statement made by the friends of this well-known gum tree, who assert that on account of the fact that it needs little water and is quite hardy, it is better adapted to our soil than almost any tree now grown in Southern California.

JOHN REBMAN, whose home has been in Los Angeles since 1886, is a native of Germany, born at Stuttgart, Wurtemberg, July 18, 1850, and was the eldest among eight children, six of whom are now living. When he was two years of age his parents, John and Barbara (Reick) Rebman, came to the United States and settled in Somerset county, N. J., where his father, hitherto a government employe, now turned his attention to farming. For some years he has made his home on a farm in Morris county, N. J., and there his wife died.

When only ten years of age John Rebman began to earn his own livelihood, his first occupation being as assistant to a gardener, and later he was employed by a landscape gardener in Plainfield, N. J. At the age of sixteen he resigned his position and began to serve an apprenticeship to the carpenter's trade. In the spring of 1872 he went to Chicago, where he found some of the ruins of the great fire still smoking. Employment at his trade was easy to secure, there being much building in process, and after a time he was made foreman and superintendent of jobs. The following year he went to Shreveport, La., and five months later settled in St. Louis, where he was engaged as a sub-contractor. His arrival in California dates from the spring of 1875, when he became foreman for the large contracting firm of Terrell & Slaven, of San Francisco. After three years with them, he became interested in a hardware business on Sixth street, which was first conducted under the title of Langdon & Rebman and, after Mr. Langdon's death, became Rebman & Chetwood. In 1883 he sold out to his partner and turned his attention to contracting and building, having contracts for many fine residences in San Francisco and the Baptist College in Oakland.

Coming to Los Angeles in the fall of 1886, Mr. Rebman has engaged in contracting ever since, with the exception of the interval between the spring of 1898 and January, 1901, when he was interested in oil and mines in Kern county. From the first activity in the oil business he made investments, but some of these did not prove profitable, although later ventures proved more encouraging. While mining in the Piute mountains in Kern county, he formed the Green Mountain Mining Company, of which he became superintendent and which was developed under his supervision. Resigning in 1900, he then started an oil company in Ventura county, which, under the title of the Santa Paula Gravity Oil Company, operated on Mount Cuyutano, northeast of Santa Paula, the development being entirely under his charge. After a year he resigned this position and resumed contracting in Los Angeles. Among the most important of his contracts may be mentioned the following: California Bank, Bryson block, Stimson block, Currier block, Ontario hotel at North Ontario, San Gabriel hotel at East San Gabriel, Spence residence at Monrovia, Monroe residence in Monrovia, Immanuel Presbyterian Church of Los Angeles, city jail of Los Angeles, Odd Fellows' Hall, the residences of Mr. Newmark, Dr. Graves and many others in or near Los Angeles.

While in San Francisco Mr. Rebman married Miss Frances Davenport, who was born in Illinois. They and their two daughters, May and Ethel, have a comfortable home at No. 1226 West Ninth street.

Among the new enterprises which Mr. Rebman assisted in inaugurating may be mentioned the Los Angeles Iron & Steel Company, which, unfortunately, owing to poor management, did not prove a success. He was also interested in starting the Los Angeles Mantel Company, which was well-known in its day. For one year he operated a marble quarry in Kern county, and meantime he quarried the marble for the Stimson block. For some years he officiated as president of the Builders' Exchange, and he is also connected with the Master Builders' Association. His political views are in harmony with the Republican party, which he staunchly upholds. Fraternally he was made a Mason in South Gate Lodge, F. & A. M., of Los Angeles, while his connection with the Odd Fellows dates from 1877, when he was initiated into the order in Lodge No. 3, of San Francisco.

JUAN SALVIO SOTO. The postmaster of Lordsburg is a member of one of the old Spanish families whose early settlement in California has given a tinge of romance to this western world. His father, José, was the son of Francisco, and a grandson of Juan and Petra (Pacheco) Soto. The immediate cause of the establishment of the family in California was due to the fact that Don Juan Soto, who had charge of the forests of the king of Spain, was sent as an officer under his sovereign to San Francisco and later settled at San José. Identifying himself with the ranching interests of the state, he raised large herds of cattle and horses and became an extensive property holder. In his family there were the following children: José, Ygnacio, Francisco, Guadalupe, Sylverio, Mrs. Rafaela de Pacheco and Mrs. Juana de Lightstone.

Under the instruction of private tutors Don Francisco Soto received an excellent Spanish and English education. Following the example of his father, he became interested in ranching. For a time he operated a ranch at San Ramon, Contra Costa county, after which he removed to Concord in the same county. Next he became owner of the Monte Diablo rancho, the management of which brought him gratifying success. On coming to the eastern part of Los Angeles county in 1879 he bought from Don Francisco Palomares seven hundred acres, on which he built a house. Soon he had the land stocked with cattle and horses. Few settlers had as yet invaded this beautiful valley and for miles in every direction the land stretched out against a blue horizon, without houses or other objects to break the view. He was not long spared to enjoy happiness here, for he died October 17, 1883, only four years after he had established his home in the valley.

In his native town of San José Don Francisco Soto married Miss Concepcion Pacheco, daughter of Juan Salvio Pacheco. Since his death she has continued to reside at the old homestead, which she has remodeled and improved until it is now a scene of beauty, with its picturesque landscape garden, its fruit and shade trees of the rarest kinds. To her family she has given excellent advantages and all are well educated both in English and Spanish. In order of birth her children are named as follows: Jacinto R., a rancher; Merced J., who is deceased; Amada A., who is with her mother; Atalino, a rancher; Salvio Juan, deceased; Juan Salvio, the subject of this article; Emedio C., deceased; Leronzo F., who is employed as bookkeeper; Juanita M., at home; Ysedro L., who is engaged in ranching; Peter R., deceased; Patricio L., at home; and Tomas R., deceased.

The education of Juan Salvio Soto was secured mainly at St. Mary's College in San Francisco, from which he was graduated in 1875. In common with the other members of the family, he speaks several languages fluently. Since the death of his father he has had charge of the estate, and at the same time he has taken a part in local politics, being a local leader in the Republican party. In the positions of constable and overseer of highways he served his township efficiently and his capability and merit were recognized in 1902 by his appointment as postmaster of Lordsburg, in which position he is winning commendation from all, irrespective of political views.

JOHN SUESS. No man in Nordhoff is more deserving of praise for having made a success of life than is John Suess, the popular grocer and merchant, and promoter of the city's best interests. He was born in Switzerland May 30, 1866, a son of John and Susie (Ulrich) Suess, who also were born in the country of mountains and clouds. The family immigrated to America in 1868, taking passage on the steamer Austria, which finally heaved anchor in New York harbor. These enterprising travelers in search of home and occupation settled in Winchester, Ill., where the father followed his trade of blacksmith and wagonmaker with varying success. He later removed to Fort Madison, Iowa, and worked at his trade for five years, going thence to Webster county, Neb., in 1873, where both parents died in 1878.

At the early age of nine years John Suess became practically self-supporting, for at that time he began to herd cattle, and upon the death of his parents in his twelfth year, he was indeed alone in the world. For ten years he continued to herd cattle, and then changed his occupation to that of clerk in a general merchandise store, but eventually engaged in general farming and stock-raising on his own responsibility in Webster county, Neb. In 1888 he removed to Southern California, coming direct to Nordhoff, where he worked at various occupations until about five years ago. He then opened a grocery and hardware store which has been a satisfactory investment, but at the present time he is reducing his stock so as to include only groceries.

In Los Angeles in 1897 Mr. Suess married A. E. Leistico, a native of Minnesota, and daughter of Herman Leistico. Of this union there is one child, J. Gordon, who is one year old. Mr. Suess has built for himself and family a comfortable home in Nordhoff, besides which he owns valuable property in Oxnard. In politics he is a Republican, as was also his father, and cast his first presidential vote for Benjamin Harrison. He is a staunch advocate of education, although in his youth his own opportunities were limited to the years when he was five and six years old, and to twelve months at the public schools in 1874 and 1884. He is serving his second term as a school trustee. He is enthusiastic over the possibilities of Ventura county, and thinks that for business and health it has no superior on the Pacific coast.

R. J. RODGERS. After a career in the educational world that was alike creditable to himself and helpful to the profession, Prof. Rodgers changed the confining work of the schoolroom for the active and healthful life of a horticulturist. For some years he has made his home at Moneta, where he owns and occupies a ranch of twenty-nine acres, and successfully raises all the varied kinds of berries. Of these perhaps his specialty is the strawberry, but he also has an excellent showing of Logan berries, dew and blackberries, and the balance of the land is under alfalfa. An abundance of water is secured by means of his private gasoline pumping plant, which has a capacity of sixty inches.

A resident of California since 1895, Mr. Rodgers was born in Illinois July 2, 1856. His father, John Rodgers, was a native of county Antrim, Ireland, where he was reared to a knowledge of farm pursuits. At the age of twenty-six years he came to the United States and settled in Illinois, where he bought one hundred and forty acres. After many years on the same property, in 1885 he removed to Iowa and bought four hundred acres of unimproved land in the vicinity of Osage. The cultivation of this land occupied his attention during the several following years, but he has now retired from active cares, and is making his home in Osage.

As far back as he can remember, R. J. Rodgers was ambitious to acquire knowledge, and his happiest moments were spent with a book. With the assistance of his father he was enabled to take a course of study in the academy and university at Lake Forest, Ill., and later he was graduated from the scientific course of the Normal University at Lebanon, Ohio. Subsequently two years were spent in the State Normal School at Cedar Falls, Iowa, and he is also a graduate of the Los Angeles State Normal. Through his attendance upon these various institutions, all of them exceptionally high in rank, he acquired a breadth of knowledge that makes him one of the most cultured men in Moneta, and during the year in which he was at the head of the Moneta school he succeeded in introducing many improvements and in advancing the grade of scholarship. However, considerations of health led him to retire from a profession which he had hoped to make his life work.

After coming to Moneta Prof. Rodgers married Miss Minta White, daughter of J. H. White, who is represented elsewhere in this volume. They have one daughter, Gladys. In fraternal relations Prof. Rodgers is associated with the Woodmen of the World, the Order of Macca-bees, Ancient Order of United Workmen, Degree of Honor, and Fraternal Brotherhood. All through his life he has kept in touch with the issues before our government, has voted the Republican ticket, and upheld its principles whenever occasion demanded.

JULIAN CARRION. Very many years ago a soldier in the Mexican army, Casiano Carrion, was stationed at Los Angeles, and upon the expiration of his term of service settled permanently in this county. Taking up the work of a ranchman, he secured large tracts of land and engaged in raising cattle and horses. The remainder of his life was passed in this county, where he and his wife, Josefa (Lopez) Carrion both died. Their only son, Saturnino, was born and reared in Los Angeles, and at an early age took up the occupation in which his father had accumulated a competency. Being of an ambitious and energetic nature, he was prospered in his undertakings. About 1870 he came to Lordsburg and bought five hundred acres, on which he erected a substantial adobe house that is still standing. This property became the scene of his subsequent efforts. In those days stock-raising was the principal industry and he devoted himself to it, having a large number of horses and cattle. However, he also set out several acres in grapes and a number of orange trees, being a pioneer in the industry that has since become of such magnitude and importance. At the time of his death, February 16, 1895, he was sixty-seven years of age. He had married Dolores Navarro, who was born in Santa Barbara, and now makes Lordsburg her home. The children born of their union were named as follows: Ramon R., Julian, Frank (deceased), Josefa, Dolores (deceased), Agatha and Louise.

In the city of Los Angeles Julian Carrion was born in 1865. He was reared on the Lordsburg ranch, to the oversight of which he succeeded upon the death of his father, and in addition to the management of this place, he does considerable butchering for nearby markets. A portion of the ranch has been sold, but three hundred and fifty-three acres are still retained, making a valuable property, especially adapted for grazing purposes, but also containing, from present indications, a supply of oil, for which they are now boring. Mr. Carrion has a pumping plant and two wells on his plant, one of which delivers eighteen inches of water. The family have many friends in and near Lordsburg, and feel the deepest interest in the prosperity and progress of the town, which has been their home for more than thirty years.

T. OLIVER. The ranch owned and managed by Mr. Oliver is situated at Gardena and consists of thirty-three acres. At the time the land was purchase it was not considered very productive, but under his capable management it has been transformed into one of the most profitable ranches in the neighborhood. The reason for this is that he has made a scientific study of the soil, which in some respects is peculiar. One acre will produce a certain crop, while the next acre does not respond to cultivation for this product. Accordingly, he has experimented and discovered to what each strip of land is best adapted and has suited the crop to the soil. No finer barley field is to be found in the entire region than his fifteen-acre tract, and his ten acres of alfalfa are also of the finest quality, while four acres produce the highest grade of grapes, and the balance of the land is in lawns and orchards. Plenty of water for irrigation purposes is secured from a well of two hundred feet, and he also has on the ranch two never-failing springs.

In Worcestershire, England, Mr. Oliver was born in December, 1838, being a son of James and Mary (Hughes) Oliver. His father, who was born in England on the borders of Wales, followed agriculture as a lifelong occupation and on his homestead of seventy acres died in January, 1883. He was a son of Richard Oliver, a Welshman, who was a soldier in the English army and acted as drum-major in the battle of Waterloo. The maternal grandfather, Richard Hughes, was a resident of Wales during his entire life, and engaged in farming. Of the eleven children of James Oliver, the subject of this article was sixth in order of birth. He was educated in national and private schools, and in 1854 assumed the responsibilities of self-support, at which time he began engineering on the railroad out from Worcester. During 1861 he went to Australia, where he secured employment on a railroad, but later became an engineer on a steamboat plying along the coast. From Australia in 1864 he went to the gold fields of New Zealand, where he not only mined, but also carried on a mercantile business. Returning to England, from there in 1882 he went to the famous Kimberley diamond mines in South Africa and while employed there gained a thorough knowledge of the country and its inhabitants, which enabled him to understand the problems leading up to the subsequent war with the Boers. The year 1884 found him again in Australia and later he returned to New Zealand, where he became interested in the Red Coat mine, a placer mine, in which he still owns a controlling interest and which has proved a profitable investment.

Going back to Australia, from there he sailed to the south of France with the hope that the delightful climate of that region would benefit his daughter's health. However, the hope proved futile, and in an endeavor to secure the desired result elsewhere, in 1895 he went to Naples, Italy, but a sojourn of six weeks proved that little could be hoped for there.

Hearing much concerning the United States, Mr. Oliver brought his family to this country in 1897, and after landing at New York traveled through much of the country seeking a suitable location, still bearing in mind as his chief object the securing of an environment that would prove congenial for his only daughter. It was not until he reached California that he found a desirable climate, and here he was gratified by the improvement of his child. For this reason he decided to locate permanently in the far west, and, his worldwide travels ended, he established himself at Gardena, where he bought a ranch and built a residence. With him, besides his daughter Mary (the child of his first marriage) are his second wife, formerly Marie Malett, and their son Thomas. Mrs. Oliver was born in France and reared in New Zealand, where she formed the acquaintance of Mr. Oliver and was united with him in marriage. After having traveled over much of the world, they are thoroughly satisfied to remain in their quiet home at Gardena, where they have an ideal climate, a well-improved ranch, and the advantage of proximity to one of the largest and most cultured cities of the coast.

C. F. BAYHA. Interestingly interwoven in the life of Mr. Bayha of Moneta are experiences of peril during his service in the Civil war and later adventures on the vast western plains, where he was associated with William Cody, better known as Buffalo Bill. Considerations of health led him to come to California in 1898, at which time he settled in Moneta and purchased a ranch of ten acres. The first improvement made thereon was the erection of a neat residence, and he has since engaged in raising alfalfa and various fruits.

In Wheeling, W. Va., Mr. Bayha was born January 20, 1845, being a son of Louis J. and Elizabeth (Eckhart) Bayha, natives respectively of Wurtemberg and Prussia, Germany. In early life the father accompanied his parents to the United States, settling with them in New York City in 1837, but after the death of his father there he took the remaining members of the family to Philadelphia and later to Wheeling, W. Va., where numerous descendants now reside. The lady whom he married came to the United States in childhood with her father, Charles F. Eckhart, who was a furniture manufacturer, and died in Dakota City, Neb.

The family of Louis J. Bayha consisted of three daughters and seven sons. One of the sons, John, is a resident of Anaheim, Cal. Another, Louis J., is cashier of the German Bank of Wheeling, and is one of the best-known financiers of West Virginia. The third among the children was C. F. Bayha, who received a high school education in Wheeling. While he was still a mere lad the Civil war broke out. With a genuine patriotism, as well as the love of adventure characteristic of youth, he resolved to offer himself to his country and accordingly enlisted at Wheeling in Company K, Twelfth West Virginia Infantry, which company was sent out as independent scouts to fight guerillas. Later he was transferred to the Twelfth and then to the Sixth West Virginia Cavalry and was given duty as a messenger between the commander of his regiment and General Rosecrans, remaining at the front until the fall of 1863, when he was honorably discharged.

In the opening up of the vast country lying between the Elkhorn valley and the Black Hills Mr. Bayha was a pioneer, and many an experience did he have with Indians during that time. He went to Omaha when that now thriving city had only three brick houses and the country surrounding it was one unbroken wilderness. For sixteen years he acted as a government surveyor, his work being in the new country and his headquarters at the head of the Elkhorn river. So efficient, indeed, were his services in this respect that at the opening of the Civil war he was offered a government position as civil engineer, but declined. He founded the West Point Republican, the oldest paper in Nebraska, and also edited and published the Dakota City Mail and the Nebraska Staats Zeitung. Indeed, at one time he published all of the papers in the region from Elkhorn valley to the Black Hills. Meantime he was active in politics and did much to secure Republican victories in his district. In 1876 he was a delegate to the national convention that nominated Rutherford B. Hayes for president. At different times he was honored by his party during his residence in Nebraska, various offices of honor and trust having been offered him. For twenty years, while a resident of the Elkhorn valley, he practiced law. In religion he is a believer in the doctrines of the Presbyterian Church, while fraternally he is connected with the Modern Woodmen of America and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows.

At Sun Prairie, Wis., occurred the marriage of Mr. Bayha and Miss Amelia Beechan, a native of New Brunswick. Her father, Robert, was born in the north of Ireland and crossed the ocean to New Brunswick, later going to Wisconsin, where he was a pioneer of Madison. In religion he was a Protestant and in politics a staunch Republican. While Mr. and Mrs. Bayha had no children of their own, they took into their home four adopted children, whom they carefully trained and prepared for positions of usefulness in the world. One of these was Robert B. Kanouse, who at the opening of the Spanish war became leader of a band and went to the front with the Sixth United States Cavalry. In recognition of his bravery in battle he was transferred to the staff of General Bates, at the request of the general himself, who had occasion to notice the young man's valor. At this writing he resides in Madison, Wis.

WILLIAM F. POPE. Immediately after arriving in California in 1895, Mr. Pope established his home in Moneta and here he has since resided. A native of Missouri, he was born near St. Joseph, January 18, 1862, being a son of Robert and Tennessee (Spencer) Pope, natives respectively of Kentucky and Buchanan county, Mo. On his removal to Missouri Robert Pope took up agricultural pursuits upon a raw and unimproved quarter section, and for some years he gave his attention entirely to farm work. On removing to Leavenworth, Kans., he purchased a livery stable and this he operated for five years; his death occurred in that city. He was a son of William Pope, who was born in the vicinity of Louisville, Ky., and was a farmer by occupation. Late in life he accompanied his son to Missouri, where he remained until death. The maternal grandfather, Obadiah Martin Spencer, was born in North Carolina, and there owned a large plantation on which was raised tobacco and hemp. Removing to Missouri he took with him his thirty-six slaves, but the Civil war of course gave them their freedom. On his arrival in Missouri he homesteaded one hundred and sixty acres, to which he added by subsequent purchase until his landed possessions aggregated seven hundred acres. At an advanced age he retired from farm pursuits and removed to Leavenworth, Kans., where his death occurred at eighty-six years.

In a family of ten children W. F. Pope was the third in order of birth. In the usual routine of school work he passed the years of boyhood. When starting out to earn his own livelihood he went west and herded cattle, spending three years on the lonely plains and frontier. During that time he traveled over much of the country from New Mexico on the south to Montana on the north. On his return to Leavenworth he took up farm pursuits, managing a farm for one-half of the proceeds, and this connection with an uncle continued for twelve years, after which he acted as manager of a livery stable in Leavenworth for two years. From there he came to Moneta, Cal., and bought nine acres of unimproved land, which he has since placed under cultivation to strawberries and Logan berries, besides a tract of alfalfa. The residence which he occupies was erected under his supervision and all of the other improvements represent his personal labor and oversight. He owns one-half interest in a gasoline pumping plant located on his place, and of thirty-horse power, with a capacity of one hundred inches. The water from this they sell two and one-half days of each week, receiving ninety cents an hour for the same.

Before coming to California Mr. Pope married Miss Anna C. Drews, who was born in Leavenworth county, Kans., and is a sister of L. W. Drews, of Moneta. Her father, Rudolph Drews, a native of Germany, came to America at an early age and subsequently traveled over much of our country, finally establishing a permanent home in Leavenworth county, where he took up a homestead claim of one hundred and sixty acres. Further reference to his life appears in the sketch of his son, L. W. Drews. The children of Mr. and Mrs. Pope, Katie, Robert and William, are with them in their Moneta home. Political matters have to some extent engaged the attention of Mr. Pope, who votes the Democratic ticket both in local and national elections. Among the offices which he has held may be mentioned those of school trustee and clerk of Moneta district. Fraternally he is connected with the Knights of Pythias, Ancient Order of United Workmen, Degree of Honor and Rathbone Sisters.

J. T. LINVILLE. The transformation of a barley field into a well-cultivated berry farm proves that the years of Mr. Linville's residence in Moneta have been industriously and wisely spent. On his arrival here in 1893 he bought ten acres and this he planted to some extent in fruits and strawberries, reserving two acres for alfalfa. The house which he erected on this property is neat and comfortable and is often the scene of hospitable gatherings of neighbors and friends. Mr. Linville is a native of Missouri and was born near Kansas City May 18, 1850, his parents being David and Sophia (Bales) Linville, natives respectively of Pennsylvania and Tennessee. The maternal grandfather, William Bales, was born and reared in Tennessee, from which state he removed to Missouri, becoming the owner of one of its pioneer farms. In the improvement of the one hundred and twenty acres comprising the estate the balance of his active life was successfully passed. His life was prolonged beyond the usual span, covering about ninety-three years. When a mere boy David Linville left Pennsylvania for the then far west and arriving in Missouri began farm pursuits. His first acquisition of land consisted of a quarter section which he homesteaded, and somewhat later he invested his savings in three hundred and twenty acres. On the large farm thus acquired he devoted himself to agricultural pursuits for sixty years, and at the time of his death was four score years of age. During the Black Hawk war he went into the service to aid other pioneers in defending their homes against the assaults of hostile savages.

Under the supervision of his father J. T. Linville in boyhood gained a thorough knowledge of the tilling of the soil and proper rotation of crops. On leaving the home neighborhood in 1887 he came to California and settled at Vine-land, where he bought five acres. During the period of his residence there he married Miss Emma McIntyre, a native of Canada, and in 1893 they came to Moneta, where they now make their home. In his opinions regarding national problems Mr. Linville is a pronounced Republican, and this party receives his support in local and general elections.

JOHN A. MAY. It is indicative of Mr. May's enterprise and progressive spirit that, since he came to Redondo in 1890, he has not only conducted a successful drug business, but has identified himself with many movements for the benefit of the town. Included among his possessions are six cottages on the beach, and he is also a stockholder in Redondo cemetery. In the office of justice of the peace he has rendered impartial and efficient service. The gratifying degree of success which has rewarded his efforts is particularly worthy of praise because he had no influences to aid him in getting a start, but all that he is and all that he has may be attributed to his determination of character and wise judgment.

In Delaware, Ohio, Mr. May was born November 24, 1851, a son of Bradford W. and Ellen May, natives respectively of Massachusetts and New Jersey. His father, who was a contractor and builder, settled in Delaware, Ohio, about 1840, and later followed his trade in the north-western part of Missouri, twenty-six miles from St. Joseph. The last years of his life were spent in Oregon, where he died. At one time he visited California, but after a short time returned to Oregon. His father, Asa May, was born in England and settled at May's Landing, Mass. The maternal grandfather of J. A. May was John Van Liew, a native of New Jersey, of Dutch descent, and for years a farmer in Ohio. Thence he moved to Michigan, and later to Kansas, where he died.

In a family of five children, four of whom attained mature years, J. A. May was the eldest. His education was sufficiently thorough to enable him to engage in teaching school successfully for fifteen years. Meantime he became interested in the drug business, at which he served an apprenticeship, thus acquiring a complete knowledge of drugs, and when he came to Redondo in 1890 he brought his stock of drugs with him, establishing the business which he has since conducted. Among the residents of the town he is well known as a far-sighted business man and patriotic citizen, who takes an active part in local workings of the Republican party, is also associated with the Maccabees, and is identified with the Methodist Episcopal Church. In 1885 he was united in marriage with Miss Clara L. Davison, who was born in Lincoln, Neb. The two children born of this union are deceased. Mrs. May is a daughter of J. L. Davison, a native of New York, and for some years the proprietor of a grist mill at Lincoln, Neb., but now the occupant and owner of a ranch at Green Meadows in Los Angeles county. Being a woman of ability and intelligence, Mrs. May has devoted considerable attention to acquiring a thorough knowledge of the drug business and her assistance is therefore of the greatest aid to Mr. May in the management of the store, his success, indeed, resulting not a little from her co-operation and counsel.

N. E. COWLES. Varied experiences in different localities have brought Mr. Cowles a ripened judgment and have prepared him to enter into horticultural pursuits with intelligence, industry and energy. Coming to California in 1889 and to Gardena in the spring of 1898, he has since made the latter place the scene of his activities, having in the year last named purchased seventeen acres of partly improved land and erected a neat and commodious residence. By planting a variety of products he has shown sound common sense and foresight. The acreage is divided as follows: Alfalfa, six acres; two acres in strawberries, two in blackberries, three in raspberries, one-half acre in dewberries, one-half acre in asparagus, one acre in grapes and fruit trees, and the balance in pasture. An abundance of water is secured by means of a gasoline pumping plant with a capacity of forty inches.

Mr. Cowles was born in Amherst, Hampshire county, Mass., April 1, 1854, being a son of Jonathan and Sarah (Dickinson) Cowles, also natives of Amherst. His father, who operated a sawmill and also owned three hundred acres of land, died at Amherst in April of 1902. He was a son of Jonathan Cowles, who tilled the soil of the family homestead, the same being a tract which was granted to the great-grandfather by George III. of England. The Cowles family is of English extraction. Mrs. Sarah Cowles was a daughter of Walter Dickinson, a farmer, who spent his entire life in Connecticut. In her family there were three daughters and two sons, and N. E. is second among the four now living. He was given a public school education, supplemented by a year in a New Hampshire seminary. His first employment was as a clerk, after which he became associated with a paper mill, and still later entered the meat business in Amherst, Mass. During 1875 he went to Iowa and purchased a farm near Farnington, Van Buren county. However, not satisfied with the prospects there, the next year he removed to Texas, but after one winter in that state returned to Iowa and became a farmer in Taylor county. After a time he went to Storm Lake, the same state, where he followed farming. The fall of 1877 found him again in Massachusetts, where he took up agricultural pursuits. Two years later he became connected with a tobacco-raising enterprise in that state.

On again coming west of the Mississippi river, in the spring of 1880, Mr. Cowles settled on a farm in Douglas county, Neb. During 1882 and 1883 he acted as agent in Hamilton, York and Pope counties, Neb., for the York Nursery Company of Fort Scott, Kans. On giving up that work in 1884 he bought eighty acres adjoining the town of Valley, Neb., and the cultivation of this engaged his time and attention until 1889, when he crossed the mountains to California. His first location in this state was in Kern county, where he took up a homestead from the government and the quarter section thus secured was his home for seven years and still remains in his possession. After a visit of some months at his former home in the east, in the spring of 1898 he returned to California and purchased the property at Gardena, which he still owns and occupies. As yet he has not identified himself with politics, although he is staunch in his adherence to Republican principles. He is connected with the Fraternal Brotherhood and the Masonic blue lodge, and gives his support to movements along similar lines for the progress of his community and the welfare of his fellow citizens. While living in Kern county he married Mrs. Leonora Battie, who was born in Illinois and in 1887 came to California in company with her father, S. O. Knight, settling in Pasadena. After two years they removed to Kern county, where Mr. Knight took up a homestead claim of one hundred and sixty acres. From there he went to Santa Anita as foreman of E. J. Baldwin's fruit farms, and in 1902 he removed to San Gabriel valley, buying a ranch which is now his home.

CHARLES L. STEBBINS. Throughout the neighborhood of Moneta, where he has made his home since 1897, Mr. Stebbins is known as an enterprising and efficient fruit farmer, and there are few who surpass him in his knowledge of the best varieties of strawberries and the best modes of cultivating the same. Immediately after coming to this place he rented six acres, which were already under cultivation to strawberries. These proved to be of an excellent variety and their sale brought him a neat sum, which was the nucleus of his later-acquired prosperity. He bought six acres of land in 1902 and now cultivates altogether twenty-one acres.

Mr. Stebbins was born in Portland, Me., January 6, 1867, being the only child of Charles H. and Mary G. (Lewis) Stebbins, both natives of Westfield, Mass. His father, who followed the business of cigar manufacturing both in Massachusetts and Maine, removed from New England to Colorado, establishing his home in Pueblo. From that city he removed to Ogden, Utah, and later spent some time in Salt Lake City, coming from there to California in 1895, and settling in Moneta. While the family were living in Springfield, Mass., Charles L. Stebbins attended the public schools there, and during the vacation seasons assisted his father in the cigar business. During 1891, when the family lived in Salt Lake City, he worked for his father there, but the following year started out for himself, coming to California and taking up the berry business at Moneta. He was married in Oakland, Cal., his wife being Miss Maude D. Ames, a native of Downsville, Wis. They have three children, Ethel Marie, Charles Leslie and Inez Grace.

By all who know Mr. Stebbins there is no doubt as to his political views, for he is a very pronounced and active Republican, and always supports the principles of his party. Fraternally he is connected with the Knights of Pythias and the Ancient Order of United Workmen. As a citizen he supports movements for the benefit of his community and may be relied upon to give his earnest allegiance to measures of undoubted worth and progressive character.

C. SEBELIUS. The present home of Mr. Sebelius, at Gardena, forms a striking contrast, in climate and environment, to his boyhood's home in South Hällan, Sweden, where he was born January 15, 1859. His father, Johannes, tilled a farm of one hundred and sixty acres, which he leased for a period of twenty-five years, and on which he died in 1880, at forty-seven years of age. He was a son of Christian Sebelius, a Swedish farmer, and his ancestors were farmers, as far back as the records extend. Since his death his widow has continued to make her home in Sweden. Until twenty years of age the subject of this article attended local schools and worked on the home farm, but in 1879 he started out for himself, becoming a sailor on the Baltic and North seas.

Arriving in the United States in 1882, Mr. Sebelius found employment with the Missouri Pacific Railroad Company in its freight depot at St. Louis, Mo., where he remained for eighteen months. He then came to California and for a year worked in the apiary of T. F. Mitchell at Soledad Canon, after which he engaged in the bee business for himself. The year 1890 found him in Los Angeles, with little money and no friends to aid him in securing a good start. He secured an appointment as janitor at the State Normal School, and this position he held five years. With the savings of these years he invested in twenty acres at Gardena, and this tract he has converted into one of the finest improved ranches in the vicinity. The ranch house was built under his supervision, and the land has been placed under cultivation, two acres being in blackberries, one-eighth of an acre in Logan berries, and the balance of the property in watermelons, muskmelons and alfalfa. A valuable improvement made by him is his private pumping plant, of sixty-five acres' capacity, which not only furnishes an abundance of water for his own land, but enables him to sell some to his neighbors.

While living in Los Angeles Mr. Sebelius married Miss Amanda Charlotte Nelson, a native of Sweden, and a daughter of Johannes Nelson, who was a lifelong resident of that country. They have two living children, Marie Justina and Carl Melville, who were the only children ever born within the walls of the Los Angeles State Normal School. Another child, Edna Amanda, died in Gardena when three years of age. The family are earnest members of the Swedish Lutheran Church, and are highly respected not only by people of their own nationality, but by all who honor integrity, progressiveness and perseverance. Since becoming a citizen of the United States Mr. Sebelius has voted the Republican ticket.

CHARLES DEXTER BALL, M. D. A native of Stanstead, Quebec, born October 5, 1859, Charles Dexter Ball received his literary education principally in the Wesleyan College at Stanstead, while his professional education was obtained in Bishop's Medical College at Montreal, from which he was graduated with honors in 1884. Returning to Stanstead, he opened an office and began a general practice. Three years later he came to California and settled in Santa Ana, where he has built up a large and profitable practice, not limited to the city itself, but extending throughout the country. He has made the study of medicine his lifework. He assisted in the organization of the Orange County Medical Society, of which he served as president in 1893. Besides he helped to organize the Southern California Medical Society, of which he was vice-president in 1898. He is a member of the State Medical Society and also of the American Medical Association. A firm believer in the public-school system, his interest in educational work has been continuous, and for nine years he was actively connected with the board of education in Santa Ana. Fraternally he is connected with the Odd Fellows and the Blue Lodge of Masons, also Orange Chapter No. 73, R. A. M., and Santa Ana Commandery No. 36, K. T. Politically he is independent.

BYRON A. MOORE. While he is still only of middle age, Mr. Moore has become acquainted with life under diverse conditions and varying environments. As a boy he became familiar with the long, bleak winters of Canada and Minnesota; in early manhood he had many thrilling experiences while living the rough and ready life of a cowboy on the western plains; and of recent years he has lived the peaceful life of a horticulturist in Southern California, owning a neat little ranch at Moneta. He was born at Oxford, Ontario, Canada, July 1, 1858, being a son of Andrew and Margaret (Stover) Moore, both of Canadian birth. His father, who was a general merchant, during the later years of his life was unable to engage in business, owing to poor health. It was with a hope of regaining his strength that he came to Los Angeles in 1886, but the anticipation was unrealized and he remained an invalid until his death. His wife, who was the daughter of a Canadian farmer born in New York, is now making her home with her second child, B. A., at Moneta. In the family there are two other children.

When his school days had ended, B. A. Moore started out for himself, and for five years was employed as a cow puncher in Montana. From there in 1887 he came to California and settled near Azusa in the San Gabriel valley, where he bought twenty acres. This tract he planted in oranges, apricots and peaches. However, the venture did not prove successful, so he disposed of the property and removed to Moneta, where he owns a ten-acre place, mostly in barley. He is unmarried, and his home is presided over by his widowed mother. Fraternally he is connected with the Knights of Pythias and the Independent Order of Foresters, while in politics he is a Republican. Whatever of success the future years may bring him will be appreciated and deserved, for he has been a man of perseverance, energy and great industry, who has had no one to aid him in the struggle for advancement.

D. R. HANCOCK, M. D. The family represented by Dr. Hancock of Redondo is among the old-established and honored families of America. One of its distant connections was Gen. Winfield Scott Hancock. The father of Dr. Hancock was himself a man of distinction and ability, and not only filled the position of superintendent of the public schools of Cincinnati for a long period, but at the time of his death was holding the high office of state superintendent of schools for Ohio. In every position to which he was called he proved himself to be in touch with the highest ideals of education as well as the most practical advances made in pedagogy. By his marriage to Elizabeth Jones, who, like himself, was a native of Ohio, six children were born, one of these being W. F., a graduate of West Point, and now a captain of artillery in the United States army.

The youngest of the family was D. R. Hancock, whose education commenced in grammar schools and supplemented by a complete course of high-school study, turned his mind in the direction of the science of materia medica and therapeutics. Deciding to become a physician, he matriculated in the Starling Medical College of his native city of Cincinnati, and there he took the complete course of lectures, remaining until his graduation. Having been born May 11, 1870, he was still quite young when he came to California and settled at Redondo in the spring of 1894. Since then he has conducted a general practice of medicine, including, besides his private practice, the duties of physician for the Redondo Beach Company, and physician for the Independent Order of Foresters. Besides his labors as a practitioner, he has filled the office of city recorder for one term and has been active in the local work of the Democratic party. The Maccabees number him among their members, as do also the Foresters. Fond of the pleasures of life, he intersperses professional labors with the various recreations that appeal most to him, and is a welcomed guest in the best homes of Redondo.

SAMUEL K. WOODWARD. The identification of Mr. Woodward with Southern California covers a long period. It was on the 18th of May, 1868, that he left Austin, Tex., for the trip across the plains to the coast, wending his way hither with a party of men whose wagons were drawn by oxen and mules. A monotonous journey ended on the 12th of August, when he arrived in San Bernardino, and from there he proceeded to Los Angeles in December of the same year. Entering upon the occupation of a builder, he continued the same for twelve years, and meantime (in 1869) bought forty acres near Downey, which he cultivated and improved. During 1879 he came to Gardena, where he rented a tract of farm land. Seven years later he bought seventy-two acres of unimproved land, on which nothing but barley had ever been raised. Here he has since made his home. The land is principally under alfalfa, although twenty-three acres are under cultivation to a variety of products. The house that stands on the ranch was erected under his supervision. Water was reached at a depth of two hundred and thirteen feet, whence it is forced upward by compressed air, the capacity being seventy inches.

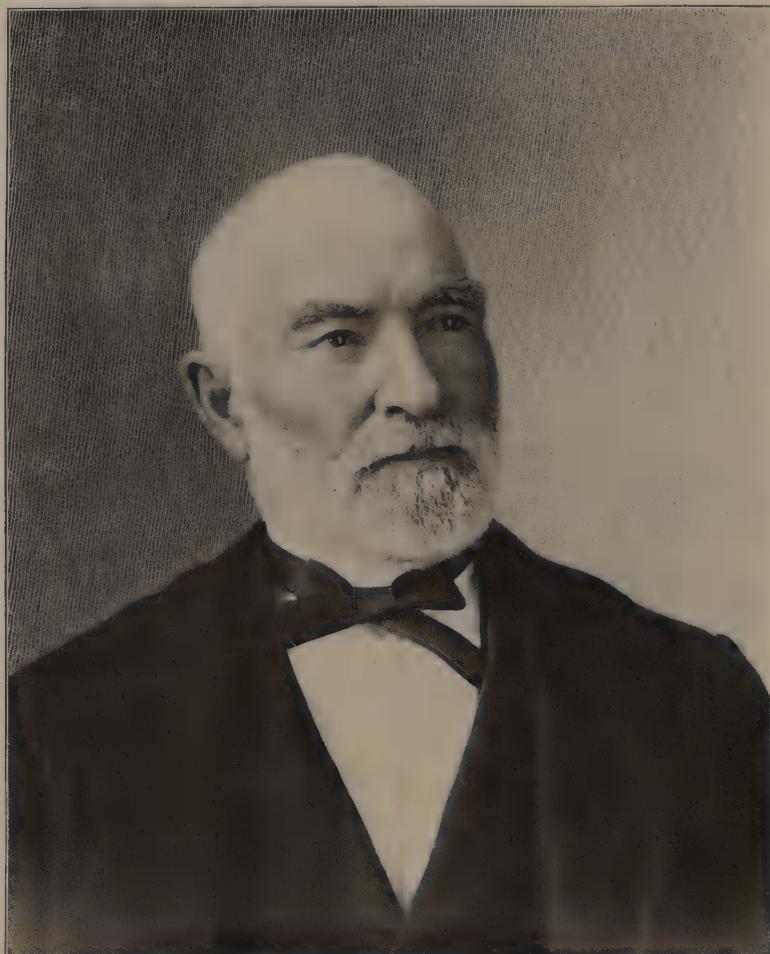

In Jackson county, Ala., Mr. Woodward was born August 31, 1837, being a son of J. B. and Nancy (Kitchens) Woodward, natives respectively of Lincoln county, Tenn., and North Carolina. His maternal grandfather was Samuel Kitchens, a native of North Carolina, and an early settler of Franklin county, Tenn., where he bought a plantation of two hundred acres and spent the remainder of his life. J. B. Woodward was in early life a planter, but later became interested in the running of a saw and grist mill. For some years he made his home in Alabama, but returned to Tennessee, whence in 1856 he removed to Fayette county, Tex., and later established his home in Mason county, same state, where he now owns a farm of one hundred and sixty acres.

In a family of two sons and six daughters, S. K. Woodward was next to the youngest. Reared to a knowledge of farm pursuits, he has always been more or less interested in agriculture, though for a portion of his early life he followed the building business. During the Civil war he served in a Texas regiment for four years, his company being principally on duty east of the Mississippi river, with the army of the Tennessee. After the close of the war he resumed the pursuits of peace, making his home in Texas until his removal to California. He was reared in the faith of the Methodist Episcopal Church South and the Democratic party, and his allegiance to both has continued up to the present time. Fraternally he is a member of the blue lodge of Masons and the Ancient Order of United Workmen. After coming to Los Angeles county he married Eliza Dunn, who was born in Georgia, a daughter of J. A. Dunn. They became the parents of eight children, six of whom are living, namely: Robert R., at home; William B., of Gardena; Carrie L., Henry M., Samuel C. and Earl T., who are with their parents.

L. J. WOOLLEY. The industry in which Mr. Woolley is especially interested has not only brought a fair degree of success to him, but has also proved helpful to his home town of Redondo, as it has brought to the public notice its desirability as a fishing district. It was he who started this business here and he has now built up a good trade, employing three men with three boats and making large shipments each day. Besides, he is the owner of the yacht Ruby. In addition to his local interests he owns stock in copper and lead mines in Colorado.

In Sacramento, Cal., Mr. Woolley was born on the 4th of July, 1867, being a son of John and Cassandra Woolley, natives of Ohio. His father engaged in school teaching as an early means of livelihood and later turned his attention to general merchandising. In 1849 he crossed the plains and settled in the Willamette valley in Oregon. After twelve years he removed to Sacramento, Cal., where he enjoyed a fair degree of prosperity until the floods of 1866 caused a total loss of the savings of years; indeed, he and his family barely escaped with their lives. Discouraged with prospects there, he removed to San Francisco in 1867 and later settled in Santa Barbara, from there going to Ventura county and buying three hundred acres near the present site of Oxnard. The raising of sheep formed his principal occupation from that time until his death.

The youngest of five children, L. J. Woolley received a public-school education and the advantages of a business training in Los Angeles Business College. For a time he was employed as a musician in an orchestra of Los Angeles, from which city he came to Redondo in 1889 and has since engaged in the fishing business. One of the active Republicans of the town, he has done much to promote the success of his party. For two years he served as city marshal and for one term held the office of city trustee. Fraternally he is connected with the Masons and Independent Order of Foresters. After coming to Redondo he married Miss Anna Smith, who was born in Germany, and by whom he has one son, Ross W. Woolley.

JAMES A. BLOOD. On a high elevation among the foot-hills in Santa Barbara county, commanding a splendid view of the ranches of the valley, the changeful ocean, and the distant Channel Islands, is the residence of James A. Blood, one of the first settlers in the Carpinteria valley. He came here in 1867, after various experiences in different parts of the country, interspersed with the successes and failures which fall to the lot of men of marked individuality, and with force of character sufficient to lead them into risks while endeavoring to achieve their expectations.

An interesting light is thrown upon the success of Mr. Blood from a knowledge of the different stages which led up to it. He was born in Boston, Mass., in 1818, a son of Joseph Blood, a native of Salem. His father was a mechanic by occupation, and in 1820 removed to Rochester, N. Y., when that town contained but one public house and one mill, and when the public thoroughfares were filled with stumps of all grades and varieties. James A. lived in Rochester until 1838, when he went west to Peoria, Ill., just after the Black Hawk war, and remained there for twelve years, engaged in the manufacture of plows. He made the first scouring plow in the state, then known as the Blood & Moshier plow, and so great a curiosity was it that people came for miles to witness its workings. Mr. Blood also engaged in farming in Illinois, and at one time owned a quarter section of land. In 1850 he made arrangements to cross the plains to California, taking with him several men who paid him for transportation, and upon arriving at his destination located at Sacramento in July of 1850, being one of the first to cross the mountains east of Sacramento. He then engaged in placer mining for a time on the American river, and the same fall returned east by way of the isthmus, and engaged in the hardware business in Farmington, Ill. A year later he sold out and again crossed the plains, this time settling at Marysville, where he traded with the mining camps in partnership with Thomas Shannon, who later was a member of congress from California.

In the fall of 1858 Mr. Blood returned east with his brother, and on the border of Texas purchased twelve hundred head of cattle, which they drove up the Arkansas river to Pueblo, then on to Denver and Nevada, leaving the cattle to graze during the winter at Big Meadows on the Humboldt river. This deal proved a disastrous one, for the Indians stampeded and stole much of the stock, leaving them about five hundred and fifty head of cattle; the remainder were stolen by the red men. Mr. Blood then went to the Indian valley and engaged in placer mining, and finally struck a good quartz mine, for the crushing of which he built a mill, the investment affording about $100,000 profit. The second year a dividend of $300,000 was declared between the three stockholders. The third year he sold out and took another trip east, and in the spring of 1867 located at Carpinteria, and purchased one hundred and seventy acres of land, a part of which comprises his present home. The land is splendidly improved, and walnuts, lemons, olives, and general fruits are raised in large quantities. For a number of years Mr. Blood was a member of the firm of Blood & Orr, grocers, of Santa Barbara, but after six years he went out of the business and returned to the management of his ranch. He is a director in the Commercial Bank of Santa Barbara, a member of the Chamber of Commerce, and owns considerable real estate in this city.

At Avon, Fulton county, Ill., March 29, 1840, Mr. Blood married Cornelia L. Woods, and it has been his lot to enjoy a most harmonious home life. Fifty years from his marriage he and his wife celebrated their golden wedding. In political affiliation Mr. Blood is a Greenbacker, and in 1881 was a candidate for county treasurer, but was defeated by a small majority.

P. S. VENABLE. Numbered among the few native-born sons of California residing in Redondo is Mr. Venable, who was born in this state January 19, 1862. His father, Hon. J. W. Venable, was a native of Shelby county, Ky., born in 1831, to Samuel and Louisa (Allen) Venable. The Venable family came from Scotland and settled in Prince Edward county, Va., thence removing with Daniel Boone to Kentucky. At the age of sixteen years J. W. Venable served three months in the Mexican war. The next year he came to California and began mining in Placer county, after which he followed farming and stock-raising for thirty years. In 1869 he settled in Los Angeles county and purchased two hundred acres twelve miles from Los Angeles, where he still makes his home. Under his supervision the land has been brought under cultivation, largely to deciduous fruits. In former years he was a prominent Democrat of his community. In 1873 he was elected to the state assembly; from 1881 to 1884 served as assessor of Los Angeles county, acted as supervisor from 1886 to 1888, and while in Contra Costa county held office as justice of the peace and associate justice. Fraternally he is connected with the Masons, Odd Fellows and Ancient Order of United Workmen.

In Placer county, in 1852, J. W. Venable married Angelina Garrett, who died in 1860, leaving a daughter, Elizabeth Louisa, wife of Joseph Albright. The second wife of Mr. Venable was Annie Elizabeth Tate, of Contra Costa county, by whom he became the father of the following-named children: P. S., of Redondo; Caroline, Nellie, Mattie, John A., Villa Marsh, Joseph W., Charles Bush, Mary H., Lulu E., Aggie, Andrew and George. The father of Mrs. Annie (Tate) Venable was Jackson Tate, a native of Maine and a seafaring man by occupation. The subject of this sketch received a public-school education in California. He was seven years of age when the family settled in Los Angeles county, and has spent practically all of his active life here. In this county he married Susie, daughter of William Mallott, and a native of Platte county, Mo. Her father removed from Missouri to Los Angeles county in 1875 and settled upon an alfalfa ranch; his death occurred some years later. The children of Mr. and Mrs. Venable are Hazel, Max, Carrie and Helen, all of whom are at home. The family are connected with the Methodist Episcopal Church.

Fraternally Mr. Venable is associated with the blue lodge of Masons, Eastern Star, Independent Order of Foresters, Maccabees and Royal Arcanum. Reared under Democratic influences, he has seen no reason to change his faith in mature years, and votes for and works with the candidates of the party. He is interested in educational matters, as is shown by his efficient service as school trustee. At this writing he is a director of the Redondo Board of Trade. In addition to his tract of two hundred acres, he leases about twenty-six hundred acres, which is utilized for grain. The supervision of his ranch is under his personal control and none of the smallest details are neglected. However, he finds time for other interests, particularly for contracting, of which he is making a specialty.

Among his contracts are those for the grading of Hermosa avenue in Hermosa, a new beach town near Redondo; the completion of a contract for the Los Angeles & Pacific Railway Company; and the grading of the new car barns for the Redondo & Los Angeles Electric Railroad, all of which contracts he has executed with painstaking skill.

M. R. TOLAND, M. D. In no field of thought has the development of recent years been more remarkable than in that of electricity. It has long been known to students of the science that medical practitioners might advantageously avail themselves of its possibilities in the healing art, but even at the present day comparatively few physicians take advantage of this opportunity. After some years in general practice, Dr. Toland decided to take up the study of electricity, believing it to be one of the greatest remedial agents within the reach of the medical science. Accordingly he went to San Francisco and studied under the most able professors. On the conclusion of his course, in 1885, he opened an office at San Jacinto, but two years later came to Pomona, where he has since made a specialty of electro-therapeutics. His office on Second street comprises a large reception room and three consulting and operating rooms, fitted out with the latest electrical appliances, including the Bertman battery and the X-ray machine. With the advantage of years of experience and study, and with the aid of his modern equipments, he is prepared to treat all diseases that can be benefited by electricity. He is a member of the Southern California Medical Society and at one time served as its vice-president. In addition he has been connected actively with the Riverside Medical Society and the Academy of Medical Science in Los Angeles.

In Columbus, Miss., Dr. Toland was born May 3, 1853, and is a son of Rev. J. F. W. Toland, whose entire active life was devoted to the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal Church South. He was reared principally in Waco, Tex., where he attended the high school and the university. On completing his literary studies he took up the study of medicine, taking two years of lectures in Bryan University and later attending the Atlanta (Ga.) Medical College, from which he was graduated in 1883. Until coming to California he carried on practice in Waco and other southern towns, but he has never had cause to regret his decision to remove to the Pacific coast and devote himself exclusively to the treatment of diseases by electricity. He has acted as medical examiner for the majority of fraternal organizations in this locality and is personally connected with the Foresters, Maccabees and Independent Order of Odd Fellows.

The marriage of Dr. Toland united him with Miss Maud B. Gaines, who was born in Little Rock, Ark., and grew to womanhood in Waco, Tex. They are the parents of eight children, namely: Clarence G. Toland, M. D.; Molly O., who married J. S. Poole, of Valley Mills, Tex., and has a son, Sanford; Mattie E., at home; Minta W., wife of C. F. Downing, of Valley Mills, Tex., and the mother of a daughter, Paulina; Perin H., a student of dentistry in Los Angeles; Ethel L., Marcellin R., Jr., and Joseph F. The oldest son was born in Waco, Tex., in 1875, and after the completion of an academic course began the study of medicine, for which he had showed decided inclination from early boyhood. After graduating from the Kansas City Medical College in 1891, he returned to Pomona and has since assisted his father in his practice. At this writing he is secretary of the Medical Society of the Pomona Valley and a member of the Southern California Medical Society.

B. S. NICHOLS. The varied services rendered by Dr. Nichols in connection with the development of water in the Pomona valley and his long and successful occupancy of the position of president of the Pomona Land and Water Company have brought him prominence and influence among all who realize the importance of the proper solution of questions relative to irrigation. Of eastern descent, he was born in Enosburg, Vt., in 1824, and received his education in that little town, afterward taking up the study of medicine, as taught by the old school. In 1847 he began to practice at Franklin, Vt., but later opened an office at Crown Point, Essex county, N. Y., and still later was a practitioner at Whitehall, N. Y., where he settled in 1851. The constant strain of long drives, exposure in inclement weather and responding to calls by night as well as day, finally seriously undermined his health and obliged him to relinquish his practice. Entering upon a new line of activity, he became a partner of Israel Davy in the manufacture of iron, under the firm title of Davy & Nichols, at Fairhaven, Vt. From there in 1865 he removed to Burlington, Vt., where he made his home until 1886. During the Civil war he helped raise a regiment for service in the Union army, but his men were absorbed by other regiments, and he did not go to the front.

Having disposed of his interests in the east, in the fall of 1886 Dr. Nichols came to California and settled in Pomona, where he has since been associated with the Pomona Land and Water Company. This organization was established in 1881 with C. T. Mills as president and M. L. Wick vice-president. The company's original purchase comprised twelve thousand acres of pasture and unimproved land, all situated in the Pomona valley. The first step of the company was the development of a system of water available for all horticulturists whose land was contiguous to the system. April 20, 1884, Mr. Mills died. He was succeeded as president by H. A. Palmer, and the latter in turn was succeeded in 1887 by Dr. Nichols, who had previously become a large stockholder. Since then a tract of three thousand acres has been added to the original purchase. From time to time portions of the property have been sold to settlers and by them converted into finely improved fruit ranches. In the system, as originally planned, artesian wells were utilized, but they proved inadequate to the demand, and so pumping stations were erected which have since been used.

In addition to being connected with this company, Dr. Nichols is interested in the Pomona water works, also bore a part in establishing the Claremont and Del Monte Water Companies and the Palomares Company. In spite of the fact that these varied interests have demanded much of his time and thought, he has still found leisure to exercise a close supervision of his ranch near Pomona. This spot is one of the most inviting in the neighborhood. The thrifty appearance of the orchards proves that the owner has made a success in his experiments with the raising of tropical fruits. The residence of adobe is one of those typical southern structures that seem happily in harmony with the environment, and around it on every hand may be seen beautiful palm trees, which complete the rural picture of beauty and content.

While living in Crown Point, N. Y., Dr. Nichols married Miss Lucy H. Penfield. The children born of their union are named as follows: Charles P., of Pomona; Mrs. Mary H. Burr, of Bridgeport, Conn.; James H. and Allen P., both of Pomona; and Mrs. Annie S. Barrows. The family are connected with the Congregational Church.

EDWARD J. FLEMING. As a resident of Pomona during almost his entire life Mr. Fleming is especially interested in its progress and familiar with its history. He was born in Cambridge, Mo., March 28, 1872, and was four years of age when he accompanied his mother to California, joining his father, Peter Fleming, in the eastern part of Los Angeles county. Primarily educated in local public schools, he was afterward a student in Pomona College, where he completed his literary studies. When it came the time to choose a life occupation, he decided upon the law, and the decision made in his youth he has had no cause to regret in his manhood. Under the preceptorship of P. C. Tonner, one of the most noted attorneys of Pomona, he began his law studies, and continued the same uninterruptedly until he was admitted to the bar in 1894. It was his good fortune to begin in practice as a partner of his former preceptor, and the firm of Tonner & Fleming continued until the fall of 1896, the junior partner meantime relieving the older lawyer of much of the detail connected with the practice and at the same time gaining much from the constant association with a man of such keen intellect and shrewd judgment as Mr. Tonner possessed. In 1898 Mr. Fleming formed a partnership with Paul E. Ussher, and this association continues to the present, the firm transacting a general law business.

Ever since he began to practice Mr. Fleming has been identified with local matters and, as a public-spirited citizen, has done his part toward advancing the interests of Pomona. As the candidate on the anti-license ticket, he was elected city attorney in 1897 to succeed J. A. Owen. Two years later he was re-elected, but resigned the office October 16, 1899, and Allen P. Nichols was elected to fill the vacancy thus created. During his incumbency of the office he drew up the papers in connection with the issuing of a $30,000 bond for the sewerage; the documents passed the test of courts and the bonds found a ready market. All through this matter he had been firm in adhering to the law, and turned a deaf ear to the advice of many citizens. The result was an honor to him and a credit to the community. While a partner of Mr. Tonner, their firm organized many of the local companies and had charge of the law matters of a majority of the corporations here doing business. In these various ways he has gained a comprehensive knowledge of the technicalities of the law and particularly the management of a civil practice. The success which he has already attained is, in the opinion of his friends, the precursor of a long and prosperous career.

As evidence of his interest in Pomona and the permanency of his residence here, it may be mentioned that Mr. Fleming has erected an attractive dwelling house on the corner of Holt and Gordon avenues. When the Order of Maccabees was organized he became a charter member and has since occupied its various chairs. As an officer he has been connected with the Knights of Pythias and is also a member of its grand lodge. In addition he is connected with the Woodmen of the World and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows.

PAUL E. USSHER. The junior member of the Pomona law firm of Fleming & Ussher was born in Walkerton township, province of Ontario, Canada, June 2, 1878. His father, Henry Ussher, M. D., was a native of Quebec, and spent much of his active life in Canada. On the completion of his literary course he took up the study of medicine, which he continued until he was graduated from McGill Medical College of Montreal with the class of 1861. During the early months of his practice he made his home at Bowmanville, and from there removed to Walkerton, Ontario, during the '60s, being the first physician to settle in that township. Among the people for miles in every direction he was known and respected, and his practice grew to such dimensions that leisure was impossible. Under the strain of years of overwork his health at last broke down, and he found himself obliged to relinquish professional work entirely. Hoping that a milder climate might produce beneficial results in his physical condition, in 1889 he went to Florida, but was disappointed in that region, and so came to California. The climate of Pomona at once proved beneficial. Accordingly he sent for his family and purchased a ranch of deciduous fruits. With his son-in-law, M. W. Cobban, he embarked in the cattle business, having stock both in Los Angeles and San Bernardino counties. In this he continued until his final retirement from business. In the various places where he resided he identified himself with local affairs and always proved himself to be a helpful, resourceful citizen. While living in Ontario he served as county coroner and jail surgeon and in other capacities. Masonry, with its high principles and its spirit of helpfulness, appealed to his nature, and he gave it his interested support. In religion he was a member of the Christadelphian Church. By his marriage to Catherine Gammond, of Montreal, he had four children, namely: Georgiana, who married M. W. Cobban; Marguerite, wife of W. L. Lawrence; Paul E.; and Frederick, who is in the drug business.

The early education of Paul E. Ussher was secured in Canadian schools, and after coming to Pomona he was given all the advantages of the grammar and high schools here. Selecting the profession of law for his life work, he entered upon its study under the tutelage of the talented P. C. Tonner, to whose kindly oversight and guidance he owes much. Upon attaining his majority, in 1898, he was admitted to the bar, and afterward continued with Mr. Tonner for eighteen months, at the expiration of which time the firm of Fleming & Ussher was formed by his partnership with Edward J. Fleming. The young men possess the energy requisite to success and are building up an important practice in all of the courts. Various fraternal societies number Mr. Ussher among their members, including the Woodmen of the World, the Knights of Pythias and the Order of Foresters, in which he has served as an officer. The qualities which he possesses are bringing him a high place in the regard of the people of Pomona, where professionally and socially he has won a host of friends.

ELLEN BURPEE FARR. The artistic taste and executive ability of Mrs. Ellen Burpee Farr are perhaps the predominating characteristics which have won her an unchallenged position among the influential women of Southern California. The old missions perpetuated in all their picturesque interest by her magic brush; the foliage and vivid berries of the pepper tree which have brightened so many of her canvases; her fish, game, and Indian basket studies, have made her name a household one in Pasadena and throughout the state, and brought orders from every part of the United States, and five different countries beyond the sea. So far-reaching a reputation bespeaks a world of tireless application to the best tenets of art, and would in itself, irrespective of her other claims to consideration, constitute the sum of a well rounded career to any woman less splendidly enthusiastic than this believer in all things beautiful and uplifting.

In her youth Mrs. Farr was surrounded with incentives to large accomplishment. She was born in New Hampton, N. H., and is a daughter of Augustus Burpee, a native of Boscawen, Merrimack county, N. H., and a schoolmate of Morse, of telegraphic fame. Her grandfather, Jeremiah, was the pioneer and most prominent potter in the state of New Hampshire, and a master in his line. Augustus Burpee was an exporter of shoo to Cuba and had a very large business. In later life he went into the mercantile business, and continued thus up to his retirement. He died at New Hampton, where he had been very prominent in general affairs, and where he was known as a staunch supporter of Republican politics. He married Sarah Glines Robinson, born in New Hampton, N. H., and a daughter of Benjamin Robinson, whose forefathers had served with Washington in the Revolutionary war. Of the three children born to Augustus Burpee and wife, Mrs. Farr alone is living. She was educated in the New Hampton Institution and at the Thetford Academy, where she met her future husband, with whom she was united in marriage in Portsmouth, N. H., May 19, 1861.

Major Evarts Worcester Farr was born in Littleton, N. H., October 10, 1840, and authentically traced his ancestry back to King Philip. His father, John, was a well known attorney, and his mother, formerly Tryphena Morse, was born in New Hampshire, and came from an old New England family. Major Farr graduated with high honors from the institution at Thetford, Vt., and then entered Dartmouth College, his training there being interrupted by the breaking out of the Civil war. He enlisted from the town of Littleton in the First New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, and served continuously from April 20, 1861, until June of 1865. He was soon transferred to the New Hampshire Second, and was appointed lieutenant June 4, 1861, promoted to the rank of captain January 1, 1862, and while in command of Company G, lost his right arm at the battle of Williamsburg, May 5, 1862. As soon as his wound permitted he returned to the field, and September 11, 1862, was promoted to the rank of major in the New Hampshire Eleventh, as a reward for valorous service in the field. At the battle of Fredericksburg he fought with distinguished gallantry, and won the admiration of his fellow soldiers and commanders. With his regiment he went further west and after the siege of Vicksburg went with General Sherman to attack General Johnson at Jackson, Miss. During the remainder of the war he served principally on court marshal duty, and as judge advocate. For three years he supported the cause of the Union with but one arm, and at the battle of Fredericksburg he rode on the field with the bridle rein between his teeth, and a saber in his hand. His name is enrolled among the greatest of the heroes of the Rebellion, and his unflinching courage in the face of danger served as inspiration to many less stout of heart.

After the war Major Farr returned to his home in New Hampshire and was admitted to the bar in Grafton county, N. H., in 1867. He began to practice in Littleton, and was thus employed, when not holding political office, up to the time of his death November 30, 1880. His many attainments and capacity for public trust called him to offices entailing large responsibility. He was assessor of internal revenues from July, 1871, to the abolition of the office in 1873, and during that time his wife was his clerk. By appointment he served as collector of Grafton county from 1873 until 1876, and in 1876 he was a member of the executive council of his state. In 1878 he was elected to the forty-sixth congress, and re-elected to the same office in November of 1880, and at the time of his death was in the direct road to the United States senate. As a politician he was true to the highest tenets of the Republican party. He was modest in his demeanor, but very successful as an attorney; and as the maker and keeper of friends had few equals.

At the time of her husband's death Mrs. Farr was left with the care of three children. Of these, Mrs. Ida Farr Miller is the wife of Edwin C. Miller, of the firm of Henry F. Miller & Sons, piano manufacturers, of Boston, Mass. Mrs. Miller is a prominent club woman of Wakefield, Mass., and is the organizer of the Faneuil Hall Chapter of the Daughters of the American Revolution. Herbert A. Farr is a resident of Boston; and Edith May, a graduate of St. Mary's School of Concord, N. H., died in Massachusetts at the age of nineteen. Mrs. Farr opened a studio in Boston, Mass., three years after being thrown on her own resources, and in 1887, at the opening of the old Raymond Hotel, in Pasadena, established her studio therein, and steadily worked for five winters. In 1895 she bought an old vineyard upon which she built a studio and residence, the former being of the old adobe mission style, one room being reserved for Indian relics of Southern California. Recently she has removed to No. 243 South Fair Oaks avenue, to make way for the new city park. So great a demand is there for the pepper pictures of Mrs. Farr, that she is obliged to consider them as of primary importance in her work, and in fact her talent is lent especially to the delineation of this interesting and indigenous tree.

In a general way Mrs. Farr has impressed her remarkable ability upon various phases of Pasadena life. To enumerate her services in connection with the city of her adoption is to touch upon all that enlists the sympathy and interest of women of the broadest culture and greatest breadth of mind. She is the president and organizer of the Pasadena Business Woman's club; is an active worker in the Women's Relief Corps; a member of the Shakspeare Club; and of the Eastern Star. As a writer she has contributed articles for various publications. She is a member of the Episcopal Church, and is a Republican in political affiliation.

LEVI VREDENBURGH. The superintendent of the Puente Oil Company of Chino was born at Croton Falls, Westchester county, N. Y., in 1843, and was reared on the farm owned by his father, Henry Vredenburg. At the opening of the Civil war he was a youth of eighteen years, possessing all the love of adventure and longing for soldier's life which is characteristic of that age. Enlisting in Company A, Eighth United States Infantry, he was sent to the front, where he remained for three years, until his term of service expired. The only unfortunate experience with which he met was in the battle of Cedar mountain, 1862, when a bullet entered his left knee, imbedding itself so deeply that it was not extracted until some years later.

The identification of Mr. Vredenburg with the oil industry began in 1865, when he went to Oil City, Venango county, Pa., and learned the business of oil-refining. Wisely he began at the bottom and learned the work through all of its grades and details. After three years he went to Buffalo, N. Y., and from there was sent, by an Oil City company, to manage and fit with machinery a mine in Mohave county, Ariz. He was glad to accept this position, as he hoped that a change of climate might benefit his son, who was in poor health. The Arizona company not meeting with success, he came to California, and soon afterward, in 1898, accepted a position as superintendent of the Puente Oil Company of Chino, which had been established three years before. The careful and painstaking manner in which he has filled this position proved him to be the right man in the right place. Many important additions have been made to the plant under his supervision and at his suggestion, and its large increase in business may be attributed to his executive ability.

As is generally known, Chino was the first town in this region to undertake the beet-sugar manufacturing business, and it has been the centre of much important work along this line. The sugar plant is furnished oil by the Puente Company, and the latter also supplies many other plants, as well as furnishing hot oil for the roads in this section of the county. The plant occupies sixteen acres and has a capacity of one hundred and fifty thousand barrels, daily, of crude oil, besides manufacturing gasoline and refined oil. The storage capacity is one hundred thousand barrels. There are six stills, all of which, together with the condensers, are of iron. The two boilers are of thirty and sixty horse-power respectively, and are used in operating the pumps that furnish oil for the pumping of the water supply throughout the valley.

While giving his attention closely to business, Mr. Vredenburg finds time to keep posted concerning matters of national importance, as well as those lesser affairs which have to do with municipal work. In the Chino Baptist Church he has served officially. While living in Oil City he was active in the work of the Masons and Odd Fellows. His first wife was Annie Terwilliger, of Orange county, N. Y., who died in 1877, at the age of thirty-one years. Two children were born of that union, namely: Elizabeth J., who died at twenty-five years of age; and Irving I., M. D. The present wife of Mr. Vredenburg was formerly Violet Heckathorn, of Buffalo, N. Y.

ULYSSES E. WHITE. As justice of the peace and notary public Mr. White is intimately associated with the present progress and business development of Pomona, among whose early settlers is numbered his father, John J. White. The latter was born in Bartholomew county, Ind., February 17, 1843, a son of James White, and grew to manhood upon a farm. Selecting agriculture for his life work, he has since followed the same, although of recent years his interests have been more especially along the line of horticulture. In 1871 he moved from Indiana to Kansas, where he endured the hardships incident to life in that then undeveloped and sparsely settled state. Through his painstaking industry he laid the foundation of success. However, not feeling satisfied to remain there permanently and hearing much concerning the fine climate of Southern California, he decided to bring his family hither. On disposing of his Kansas property in 1881 he settled in San Diego county, Cal., where he experimented in bee raising, besides carrying on general farm pursuits. The results were less gratifying than he had anticipated, and in October, 1883, he came to Pomona, where he still makes his home. His first purchase here consisted of five acres for which he paid $100 per acre. The land was raw and unimproved, and some experimenting was necessary in order to prove to what products it was best adapted. He planted it in apricots, and while the trees were getting a start he worked at various occupations, principally, however, in the grading of roads.

A subsequent purchase made by Mr. White comprised fifteen acres, ten of which had been planted by A. L. Taylor, while the balance he set out in deciduous fruits after the property came into his possession. At this writing he has eight acres in peaches, three in prunes and the balance in apricots. It has been his aim to raise only the best grades of fruits, and inferior qualities have been rejected as unwise investments. The result of his care in the selection of the best qualities and in the cultivation of the trees is shown in the large yields he has secured; for instance, in 1901 he dried one hundred and five tons of apricots. Substantial buildings enhance the value of the place, which, if placed on the market, would probably bring $300 an acre.

During the Civil war Mr. White served in Company H, Thirty-second Indiana Infantry. In religion he is of the Christadelphian faith. While living in Howard county, Ind., he married Lucy J. Long, who at the time of coming to California was an invalid, but now enjoys excellent health. They are the parents of five children, namely: Ulysses E., Addison T., John D., A. Grace and Lawrence T. The oldest son was born in Howard county, Ind., in 1867, and was a small child when his parents settled in Kansas. His education, begun in district schools of that state, was afterward carried on in the schools of California. In 1889 he completed a course in stenography at the Kimball Business College of Chicago, after which he returned to Pomona and became a stenographer in the office of the late P. C. Tonner, subsequently filling a similar position with Attorney Bell. In 1897 he was appointed chief clerk of the senatorial judiciary committee. To fill an unexpired term in the office of justice of the peace, in 1897 the board of supervisors appointed him to this position. At the expiration of the term he was elected, as the candidate of the Republican party, and has since filled the position, in addition to which he also serves as notary public. He is considered an expert stenographer and has frequently taught shorthand, adhering to the system of Takigraphy which students of various methods believe to be one of the best that has been given to the world. In matters fraternal he holds membership in the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Independent Order of Foresters. By his marriage to Hattie H., daughter of Francis Dexter, he has two children, Gerald B. and George Dexter. Personally he possesses the qualities which win and retain friends, and in the city which has been his home since boyhood he is not only well known, but also highly respected.

FREDERICK H. PAINE. The president and general manager of the F. H. Paine Feed and Fuel Company of Pomona is a native of the far east, having been born near Bangor, Me. When a child he accompanied his parents to the central west and there grew to manhood upon a farm, afterward taking up agricultural life near his old home. In young manhood he married Miss Margaret Stephens, a native of Wisconsin. Born of their union were five children: Warren A., who married Maude Latlin and has a daughter, Pauline; Douglas, deceased; Frederick, Hannah Hattie and Lilah. For years Mr. Paine met with encouraging success from a financial point of view, but, tiring of the severe winters, he decided to spend his remaining years in a milder climate. After visiting various points in Southern California he chose Pomona for his permanent home, and in 1889 brought his family to the then small town.

Renting a business place on Thomas street, between Second and Third, he began in the sale of feed. At first his trade was small and profits meagre, but as the population increased and his reliability as a business man became known, he was given a gratifying increase in trade. A fire destroyed his building November 9, 1895, and he then removed to the Hoop building on Second street, where he remained for six years. At present he occupies the Ruth block at No. 239 West Second street. For a time he was associated with Mr. Latlin, later with Mr. Armstrong, next with Mr. Hunter, and then with Mr. Lee, whom he bought out, and organized the F. H. Paine Feed and Fuel Company in 1897. The stockholders, besides himself, are J. T. Lyons, B. J. Tuttle, J. P. Starks, Robert Graft and W. A. Paine. In addition to a large salesroom the company have built, on the corner of Rebecca and First streets, a warehouse for the storage of hay, this building being 65x120 feet in dimensions. The success of the business is due to the energy and executive ability of the manager, who possesses, indeed, more than ordinary business insight and judgment. Besides the management of this business he was one of the organizers of the Citrus Irrigation Company and has been intimately associated with the same in its varied undertakings. He is a member of the Fraternal Aid and in religious views adheres to the doctrines of the Universalist Church.

GEORGE E. CLARK. It is said that Mr. Clark, of Pomona, is the youngest man in the entire state who conducts a blacksmith shop of his own, he having succeeded to the business on the death of his father in 1901. He was born in Plymouth, Ohio, August 8, 1884, and is a son of Frederick T. Clark. The latter, a native of Paterson, N. J., accompanied his parents to Plymouth, Ohio, and there learned the blacksmith's trade, after which he opened a shop and also carried a line of carriage supplies. For a number of years he continued in the same place, but in 1898 he disposed of his property and removed to California, settling in Pomona and entering into partnership with Charles Sears. Later he purchased his partner's interest and afterward conducted the business alone until his death, which occurred on October 9, 1901, at the age of forty-four years. In addition to his shop he owned other property in Pomona, including a residence and various lots.

Music was the ruling passion of his life, and had he received the education necessary to develop his marked talent in this art he would undoubtedly have achieved prominence as a musician. However, in spite of having no advantages or musical education he acquired a thorough knowledge of the violin and many of his happiest hours were spent in playing choice selections with his children, all of whom he took great pride in training to a knowledge of the art. He was twice married, his first wife being Jennie L. Daniels, of Plymouth, Ohio, who died at thirty-eight years of age, while his second union was with Luella James. His children (all born of his first marriage) are George E., who is an expert in the use of the clarinet; Ethel M., who has mastered the piano, guitar, mandolin and violin; Lloyd, whose specialty is the violin; Bessie M., whose favorite instruments are the piano and harp; and Glenn R., the youngest of the family and still a student.

Being the oldest in the family, George E. Clark succeeded to his father's business and has become the head of the family, assisting in the building of the family residence and being looked to by the others for advice and counsel. He is a member of the Fraternal Brotherhood and in religion believes in the Methodist Episcopal doctrines.

TIMOTHY LYMAN THRALL. On coming to Pomona in 1886 Mr. Thrall rented a small building and opened a feed store, which he conducted about two years. His next enterprise was the purchase of teams and the taking of contracts to level the land for those who had purchased property with a view to horticulture. The work was difficult, as in some instances it cost $700 per acre to remove the knolls and bring the land to a level. Fortunately the soil being very deep was of equally as good quality for citrus culture below as above, and the leveling could thus be done without detriment to the anticipated returns from the soil. At a later date Mr. Thrall opened a livery, feed and boarding stable on the corner of Second and Gordon streets, from which site, in 1901, he removed to the substantial stables on Main street. Here he carries a full equipment of vehicles, single and double, and from the possession of eight horses has increased his holdings to fourteen fine roadsters. At one time he owned an interest in a tally-ho. Besides the management of his livery business he owns and cultivates ten acres of oranges on East Holt avenue in San Bernardino county. This tract he set out in oranges nine years ago and it is now in fine bearing condition.

In Delaware county, Ohio, Mr. Thrall was born in 1837. He grew to manhood on a farm, whence in 1861 he moved to Ogle county, Ill., later going to Kendall county, where he farmed for a year. His next location was in Joliet, Ill., where he conducted a livery business, and later carried on farm pursuits near that city. In 1861 he married Amanda Miller, a native of Ohio. They became the parents of four children, viz.: Clarence, who married Beatrice Hoffman and is now associated with his father in business under the firm title of Thrall & Son; Mrs. Carrie Clarkson, of Winfield, Kans.; Mrs. Lulu Midgely, of Pomona; and Miriam, a student. The immediate cause of the family removing to California was the ill health of Mrs. Thrall, who suffered from asthma in Illinois, but who has regained her health in the unsurpassed climate of her present home.

ROBERT L. BELL. The life of Mr. Bell is worthy of emulation from many standpoints, and whether viewed as a contractor and builder, as a soldier during the Civil war, or as a pioneer, he has been guided by an unswerving rectitude and a tireless industry. A native of Kenosha county, Wis., he was born on his father's farm, twelve miles west of Racine, November 19, 1843, and was educated in the Dane county public schools and Sun Prairie Academy. His father, Robert Carr Bell, was born in Cleveland, Ohio, a son of Robert Lemuel Bell, of Scotch-Irish descent, and the proprietor of a large shoe manufacturing establishment in Cleveland. In time the prosperous shoe merchant lost his eyesight from overwork and exposure and his declining days were spent on a farm in Dane county, Wis., in almost total blindness. Robert Carr Bell was a graduate physician, and in early life settled at Waite's Corners, Kenosha county, Wis., where he practiced medicine. Later he removed to Token creek, Dane county, where he died in 1858, at the age of thirty-eight years. His wife, Mary Ann (Chapell) Bell, was born in New York state, a daughter of Daniel O. Chapell, a native of the east, a blacksmith by trade, and an early settler in Kenosha county, Wis. Mr. Chapell later removed to Union, Rock county, Wis., and afterwards to Iowa, where he rounded out his life work. Mrs. Bell, who died in Iowa, reared to usefulness the following children: Robert L., of Los Angeles; Mary E., who died at Limespring, Iowa; Mrs. Frances E. Bent, of Redfield, S. D.; Frank Newton, who died when comparatively young; and Frank Carr, who lives in Los Angeles.

At the death of his father Robert L. Bell, who was then fourteen years old, was obliged to set forth to earn his own living, and engaged in agricultural pursuits in Wisconsin. In 1860 he was one of a party to start for Pike's Peak with ox teams, their course being up the Platte to Denver, Clear Creek, Black Hawk and Gregory, at which latter place Mr. Bell engaged in placer mining for three months. He then went to Arapahoe, just below Golden City, on Clear creek, and from there to a dairy ranch near Denver. After a time he took his way to Denver, where he worked at the mason's trade, and in the spring of 1861 returned to Wisconsin overland with his uncle, R. O. Chapell, whom he met in Denver, Colo.

September 14, 1861, Mr. Bell volunteered in Company G, First Wisconsin Cavalry. After being drilled for some time, in the spring of 1862 the company went to Benton Barracks, Mo., and then to Cape Girardeau, Mo. He participated in many battles and skirmishes. In the fall of 1863 he joined the army of the Cumberland, and remained until illness resulted in his detention in a hospital at Louisville, Ky. He was afterwards condemned for field duty, and transferred to the One Hundred and Fifty-Sixth United States Veteran Reserve Corps, which was divided into three subdivisions and placed on the hospital boats, viz.: D. A., January, McDougal and Genevieve. Mr. Bell was on the first-named as supply steward on the lower Mississippi, Red River, etc., and cared for the sick and wounded of the Banks expedition. At the close of the war he was mustered out of service February 17, 1865. In 1867 he came to California via the Panama route, visiting first San Francisco and then San José, where he became interested in threshing, after which he went to Carson City and Virginia City, Nev., and teamed and freighted. In time he returned to California, and in 1869 journeyed to Eau Claire, Wis., where he completed his trade of carpenter and builder. He removed to Chicago in 1871, directly after the great fire. For a year he worked at his trade, and then removed to Minnesota and Dakota, and after 3 years again settled in Eau Claire, where he married Catherine Horan, of Canada.

In December of 1874 Mr. Bell came to San Francisco, and the first of January settled in Los Angeles. He has since been engaged in contracting and building, and assisted in completing the cathedral, besides erecting the Phillips, Baker, Newmark, Spencer, Jerry Elich, and Captain Thom blocks, and dozens of others besides. He has his office and residence at No. 908 East Third street. He owns a finely cultivated fruit ranch of one hundred and sixty acres in San Bernardino county, and has twenty acres in almonds, eighteen acres in French prunes, and two acres in assorted fruits. Fraternally he was associated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows at Eau Claire, Wis., and was also made a Mason in that place. In national politics he is a Republican.

Mr. and Mrs. Bell have eight children, viz.: Mrs. Viola Lemuel, Jr., who married Frances Lightner and is connected with the Standard Oil Company; Frank Newton, a clerk in the freight department of the Santa Fe Railroad Company at San Francisco; Nona, Maude Zitta, Evelyn and Genevieve, who are living at home.

MRS. SARAH BARZILLA EMERY. One of the prominent and popular factors in the business and social life of Long Beach is Mrs. Sarah Barzilla Emery, who came to California in 1873, and has lived in this vicinity since 1887. A native of Pilot Knob, Mo., Mrs. Emery is a daughter of James Sampson Dotson, who was born in Virginia, and a granddaughter of another James Sampson Dotson, the latter of whom was born in Scotland, and emigrated to Virginia many years ago. The grandfather was a planter in the south and eventually removed to Missouri, where his declining years were spent, and where terminated his useful and meritorious life. The father of Mrs. Emery was a blacksmith in Missouri, and afterwards directed his energies to the cattle business in Texas. He married Elizabeth Goade, a native of Virginia, and daughter of Booker Goade, who was of English descent, and who died while conducting large farming interests in Missouri. Mrs. Dotson died in Missouri, and during her life treasured a just pride of ancestry, for some of her relatives fought with valor in the Revolutionary war, and all were honorable and industrious acquisitions of their time and place. There were but two children in her family, one son and one daughter, of whom Mrs. Emery is the oldest.

While living on the home farm in Missouri Mrs. Emery attended the district schools, and received that practical insight into life which has been of so great benefit to her in later years. Her first marriage occurred January 1, 1861, and was with Newton Williams, a native of Ohio, and a contract plasterer by trade. He was a man of unquestioned patriotism, for at the first tap of the drum he enlisted in the Thirteenth Missouri, which regiment was consolidated with the Thirty-second Ohio regiment after the battle of Shiloh. During his three years of service he saw much of the grim and terrible side of war, and was twice wounded in the hip. He returned to his home an invalid, and for thirteen months was tenderly nursed by his wife, who carried him in her arms and won him back to a semblance of his former strength. Nevertheless he continued to suffer from the ravages of his awful experience, and died four and a half years after the restoration of peace, in Pierce City, Mo.

In Leavenworth, Kans., in May of 1873, Mrs. Williams married Frederick B. Emery, who was born in New York state and reared in Maine, and who in his earlier days was a farmer. When the gold excitement of '49 swept over the land he and some friends bought a boat in Boston and sailed around the Horn to San Francisco, and realized considerable success while mining for four years in California and Oregon. The east, however, still held its interests, but upon returning to his former surroundings he did not long stay in Maine, but removed to Illinois, from which state he went to Pike's Peak to again try his luck at mining. He soon after returned to Illinois, and in 1870 settled near Pierce City, Mo., where he engaged in farming until his removal to San Francisco in May, 1873. This was directly after his marriage, and after remaining a year in the coast city he settled in Los Angeles and improved a ranch of forty acres, upon which was a combined orchard, vineyard, and farming enterprise. He later bought one hundred and sixty acres of land on the Rosecrans tract, and after improving it and making it desirable property advantageously sold it during the boom for $100 per acre, the original price having been $25 per acre. In 1887 he bought eighty acres of land three miles from Long Beach, upon which he built two residences, and introduced all manner of modern and up-to-date agricultural devices. Orchards were set out and general farming carried on in a highly successful manner, and at the expiration of seven and a half years Mr. Emery moved into Long Beach, and built the home in which his widow now resides, and where his death occurred August 9, 1896, at the age of seventy-two years. He was a Republican in national politics, and was a member of the Baptist Church. He was a remarkably successful business man and agriculturist, and was especially interested in the raising of fine standard bred horses. His stables contained some notably fine examples of horse flesh, including Silver Heels and Whalebone, and Echo Prince, the latter having a record of 2:15. From time to time valuable real estate holdings came into his possession, and he owned lands at Glendale and other towns, and he also bought and sold lands in Los Angeles. He enjoyed an enviable reputation for honesty and fair dealing, and made many friends wherever his interests happened to be placed.

Since the death of her husband Mrs. Emery has attended to his interests with conscientious care, and has developed business tact and investing sagacity. She still owns the ranch near Long Beach, and has bought and sold property in a most successful manner. In spite of the many responsibilities which have crowded her years she has been a devoted mother, and reared her children to be useful men and women. Through his first marriage there were three children: Arlena, who died in 1901; Evaline, who is now the wife of Thomas Weller, of Los Angeles; and Frank, who lives in San Diego. To Mr. and Mrs. Emery were born four children, William, Mabel E., Nahum E., and Sadie E.

WILLIAM B. JULIAN. As the city clerk of Long Beach, Mr. Julian is a representative of that class of young men who are identified with municipal affairs in Southern California and who are aiding in placing our cities upon a substantial business basis. His election, in April, 1900, gave him the position with a fair majority over two opponents, and he immediately entered upon the duties of his term of two years. The incumbency of this position confers upon him other duties and privileges, among them the positions of ex-officio city assessor and ex-officio clerk of the board of trustees, and in addition he acts as deputy tax collector.

The Julian family is of southern descent. Bailey F. Julian, a native of Rutherford county, N. C., became a planter in Forsythe county, Ga. His son, M. S., was born in the last-named county July 14, 1839, and in 1859 went to Pike's Peak, traveling with a mule train from Leavenworth, Kans., and spending eighteen months in the famous mining fields of Russell's Gulch, Lost Cannon and Twin Lakes. In the fall of 1860 he returned to Georgia, expecting to enter school, but the war fever was at its height, and with the loyalty of a true southerner he espoused the cause of the Confederacy. As a first orderly he enlisted and served in the Second North Carolina Battalion, and later received promotion to the rank of captain. At Gettysburg he was slightly wounded and fell into the hands of the enemy, by whom he was confined for two years in prisons at Forts Delaware and Lookout. After the fall of the Confederacy he turned his attention to farming in Georgia. In 1868 he came via Panama to San Francisco and for a time mined in Nevada. Going to San Diego in 1869, he became a prospector and located the first gold mine in the district, which was named Julian in his honor. A postoffice was also so named for him. After three years in mining he served one term as assessor of San Diego county. In 1873 he settled on a ranch near Downey, but soon opened a mercantile store in that town, which he conducted for years. In 1897 he opened the Julian Hotel at Long Beach and this he conducted until 1900, when he sold out. Later he built the Colonial on Cedar street, of which he is now proprietor.

The marriage of M. S. Julian united him with Maggie S. Skidmore, who was born near Waco, Tex. Her father, William Skidmore, a native of Alabama, and a soldier of the Indian wars, became a pioneer of Texas, where he engaged in farming and wagon-making. Accompanied by his family, in 1869 he crossed the plains to California, arriving in San Diego three months after leaving his Texas home. Besides managing a farm which he bought, he engaged in mining and was the discoverer of the celebrated Stonewall (better known as Waterman) mine in Cuyamaca valley. From San Diego county he removed to Downey and bought a farm there, which he operated, in addition to carrying on a large freighting business between Wilmington and Kern and Inyo counties. He was accidentally killed by a runaway team. The three children of M. S. and Maggie S. Julian are William B., of Long Beach; Raymond S., who is telegraph operator for the Southern Pacific road at San Bernardino; and Edward, a student in Los Angeles Normal School. The eldest of these sons was born near Downey December 15, 1873, and received his early education in the local public schools. After graduating from the Woodbury Business College in 1894 he became bookkeeper for Stern Brothers at Anaheim, remaining with them until 1897. Afterward he assisted his father in the Julian Hotel at Long Beach until his election as city clerk. Fraternally he is connected with the Woodmen of the World at Long Beach; Long Beach Lodge No. 210, K. of P.; Company No. 44, U. R. K. of P., in which he has the rank of recorder; Rathbone Sisters, Invincible Parlor No. 74, Native Sons of the Golden West at Anaheim, in which he was formerly recording secretary, and which in 1898 he represented in the grand lodge at Nevada City, Cal.

L. A. PERCE, M. D. Remotely of French lineage, the Perce family has been connected with American history ever since the colonial period. John Perce, who was born in Vermont July 15, 1784, took part in the war of 1812, and afterward was identified with the early history of Circleville, Ohio. In that city was born November 9, 1817, a son, William, by his marriage to Elizabeth Ballard, whose birth occurred in Albemarle county, Va., April 16, 1785, and who was of Scotch extraction. This son removed from Ohio to Illinois during the early '40s and settled in the then village of Springfield. From that time forward he was one of the conspicuous figures in the political life of the town and county. For two terms he served as sheriff of Sangamon county, and at the same time Abraham Lincoln was prosecuting attorney, the two occupying the same office. Thus was formed an acquaintance which ripened into warm friendship and continued uninterruptedly until the tragic death of President Lincoln. Other offices fell to the lot of William Perce, among them being that of chief of police of Springfield. At the opening of the Civil war, with the ardor of a true patriot and the constancy of a true friend, he answered Lincoln's call for volunteers. The Illinois quota being full, he enlisted in the Eleventh Missouri Infantry and was commissioned first lieutenant of Company C., where he served for three months. His re-enlistment made him a member of Company B, Seventieth Illinois Infantry, his term to expire in three years. However, a severe wound in battle caused his honorable discharge one year after his enlistment. Returning to Springfield, he was for some years engaged in the mercantile business, and later operated a farm in the southern part of Sangamon county. In 1874 he removed to Russell, Kans., where he conducted mercantile pursuits. His death occurred there in 1892. In fraternal relations he was a Mason and in religion a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. From the time of the organization of the Republican party (in which he bore a part) until his death he was a champion of its principles, and one of the most thrilling recollections of his later years was of the Republican convention in the Chicago wigwam where Lincoln was nominated for president. Under President Grant he received an appointment as deputy United States marshal for the southern district of Illinois, which office he filled for some years. As already stated, one of his staunch friends was Abraham Lincoln, and there is now in the possession of Dr. Perce a mounted cane which Lincoln presented to William Perce when the latter was chief of police. Among his other warm friends were "Dick" Yates, Oglesby and Madison. In physique he was stalwart and robust, with a large frame and great powers of endurance; his mind and heart were fashioned on the same generous proportions as his body, and he was in every respect "a man among men." The legacy of an honorable life which he has left to his family is one of which they may well be proud.

The wife of William Perce was Roxanna Vitum, who was born in Huron county, Ohio, August 12, 1821, and died at Russell, Kans., February 6, 1899. Of their marriage were born two sons and six daughters, namely: Mrs. Mary Hall, of Sangamon county, Ill.; Josie M., who died in childhood; Elizabeth (Mrs. Shaw), who died at Russell, Kans., in 1878; William, a merchant of Carbondale, Ill.; Roxanna M., who died at the age of two and one-half years; L. A., a physician of Long Beach, Cal.; Mrs. Clara Dollison, of Russell, Kans.; and Angeline, who died in childhood. The younger of the two sons was born in Springfield, Ill., March 8, 1854, when his father was serving as sheriff. He attended the grammar and high schools and Springfield College, after which he took up the study of medicine under Dr. S. L. Reefy, of Edinburg, Ill. In 1873 he entered the Eclectic Medical Institute of Cincinnati, Ohio, where he took the full course of four years, and then engaged in practice at Russell, Kans., for six years. Returning to Ohio, he was graduated from the Eclectic College of Cincinnati in 1882 with the remarkable standing of ninety-seven and thirteen-sixteenths per cent. Afterward he practiced in Forest, Ohio, and from 1887 to 1898 was one of the leading physicians of Bucyrus, that state.

Hoping that a change of climate might prove beneficial to his wife, Dr. Perce came to California in 1898 and spent a few months in Pasadena. March 15, 1899, he came to Long Beach, where he now has his office in the Long Beach Bank building, and makes a specialty of surgery and the treatment of diseases of the eye, ear, nose and throat. It has always been his ambition to keep abreast with every development in the science of medicine, and with this end in view he took lectures each winter for years in the Eclectic Medical Institute and the Cincinnati hospitals. At this writing he is serving his second term as president of the Southern California Eclectic Medical Society, is also connected with the state association, and an honorary member of the Ohio State Eclectic Medical Society, and a member of the Roentgen Society of the United States. For some years he was a member of the pension board in Kansas, and he is now a member of the California state board of medical examiners.

In Russell, Kans., Dr. Perce married Sarah A. B. Miles, a third cousin of General Miles, U. S. A. She was born in Platte county Mo., and educated there. Her father, Manoah Miles, a Kentuckian, removed to Missouri on account of his anti-slavery sentiments, and during the Civil war he and four sons served in the Federal army. Afterward he settled in Russell, Kans., where he died. Dr. and Mrs. Perce have an adopted son, Germaine B. Perce.

During his residence in Ohio Dr. Perce was for years secretary of the county Republican executive committee, and he is now president of the Republican club of Long Beach. He was made a Mason in Long Beach Lodge No. 327, F. & A. M. In the Knights of Pythias he has been chancellor and is connected with the Uniform Rank. The Independent Order of Odd Fellows, Fraternal Aid, Woodmen of the World, Rathbone Sisters, Modern Woodmen of America and Daughters of America number him among their members, and he is examiner for the majority of these. In the Sons of Veterans he acts as division surgeon. For some years he was district commander of the twelfth district of Ohio for the Maccabees and connected with the Tribe of Ben Hur. He is past state counselor of Ohio for the Junior Order United American Mechanics, and is still connected with the same. Religiously he is identified with the Methodist Episcopal Church and a member of its official board.

GEORGE F. HIRSCH. As long ago as March of 1885 George F. Hirsch, the present postmaster of Long Beach, cast his fortunes with the then small village, and since that time, with the exception of a few years spent in different parts of the state, has been an interested spectator of its growth, and a practical aid in its best development. In all respects a self-made man, he chose for his means of livelihood an occupation famed in song and story, and which is none other than that of the busy and ever popular blacksmith. His thorough mastery of every department of his business has opened various avenues of interest in different parts of the country, for as a master workman he has few equals, and no superiors.

A native of St. Louis, Mo., Mr. Hirsch was born July 31, 1861, his father, George, being a native of Hesse-Darmstadt, Germany. The elder Hirsch came to America when a comparatively young man and located in St. Louis, where he worked at his trade of blacksmith. During the Civil war he went to the front as a soldier in Company E, Fortieth Missouri Volunteer Infantry, and served as long as there was need of men of valor and courage. After the war he removed to Jefferson City and industriously plied his trade, and about 1870 settled in Boonville, where he is still engaged in business. He is a member of the Lutheran Church, and is a Republican in national politics. His wife, formerly Mary N. Beyers, was born in Alsace-Lorraine, Germany, but then France, although she is of German descent. She is the mother of four sons and three daughters, George F. being the oldest son and the second oldest child, and the only member of the family in California. He was reared in Jefferson City and at Boonville, in both of which towns he attended the public schools, at the same time acquiring an early knowledge of his father's trade. When fourteen years of age he followed the precedent in European countries and apprenticed to a smith in St. Louis, and after completing the trade rejoined his father, with whom he remained for a few years. In 1878 he yielded to the temptation to try his hand at mining and joined a company bent across the plains with eleven wagons, and bound for the Black Hills. At the expiration of four years he had decided that the life of the miner was not entirely suited to his inclinations, and therefore returned to his father and stayed for four years. Nevertheless, a lingering fondness for the west still visited his waking hours, and in 1882 he removed to Colorado and later to Albuquerque, N. M., where he applied his trade for the Santa Fe Railroad Company. He then came on west to Arizona and then to California and Los Angeles, after which he went to Chino and worked for Dick Gird for a couple of months. Upon returning to Los Angeles he was employed by F. K. Dowler and helped to build the old number 7 glass front street cars. He then removed to Compton and started up a blacksmith business in November of 1884, and after running for a few months was employed by Henry Carson at Compton. In March of 1885 he came to Long Beach, which was then but a straggling village, intending to take a rest and see the country. However, he soon found himself at work again, and was associated with the Long Beach Land and Water Company until October of 1885. He then helped to build the old pier at this place, and in 1886 removed to Wilmington and worked at his trade for Banning Brothers, or the Wilmington Transportation Company for eighteen months. He then returned to Long Beach and afterwards went to Los Angeles and assumed charge of the shoeing shop of the Main Street Car Company. After his marriage in July of 1888 he returned to Long Beach and for a year was in the mercantile business with his father-in-law, W. S. Snell, and then went to Clearwater and engaged in ranching for a couple of years. Although successful, he decided to return to Long Beach, and opened a blacksmith business of his own on First street. This business was most enthusiastically prosecuted from 1890 until January of 1899, when the blacksmith interests were disposed of.

Nettie E Hammond

The commodious and typical Southern California residence built by Mr. Hirsch is presided over by his wife, who was formerly Addie M. Snell, a native of Franklin Grove, Ill. Of this union there are two children, Ruby and Robert. February 14, 1899, Mr. Hirsch was appointed postmaster of Long Beach by President McKinley, and assumed charge of the responsibility March 31, 1899. In March of 1901 he transferred the business of Uncle Sam into the new building, where he is continuing to give the perfect satisfaction which has characterized his entire service. Mr. Hirsch is one of the most progressive and wide-awake citizens of the place, and is identified with many efforts to improve the condition of his adopted town. Fraternally he is a member of the Long Beach Lodge of Masons No. 327, of the Maccabees, of which he is past commander, and with the

H. W. Lawton Camp No. 10, Sons of Veterans, of which he is sergeant. He is a Republican in national politics, and is a member of the central committee. His wife is a member of the Eastern Star, of the Ladies of the Maccabees, and of the Woman's Relief Corps. Mr. Hirsch enjoys a deserved popularity in this community, and he is one of the substantial and progressive citizens of the place.

MRS. NETTIE E. HAMMOND, M. D. The interminable vistas beyond the portals of medical science are today trodden so fearlessly, so intelligently, and so absorbingly by women who desire to aid their sex and tune their lives to infinite possibility that the combination of vast erudition and the eternally feminine has become an integral part of our civilization, and an appreciated influence at our firesides and in our institutions. Nevertheless, in spite of the natural advantages of finer intuitions and more ready sympathies, the successful practice of women implies special gifts and aptitudes as well as ambitious inclinations, a truth forcibly illustrated in the career of Dr. Nettie E. Hammond, one of the foremost ameliorators of the physical woes of Los Angeles.

In her craving for the broader and better and unselfish things of life, Dr. Hammond is a distinct example of the influence of heredity. Of sterling English and German ancestry, she was born in Muncie, Ind., a daughter of John and Mary (Koch) Minton, natives respectively of Akron, Ohio, and Lancaster county, Pa. The paternal great-grandfather, Rev. John Minton, was born in England, and upon immigrating to the United States settled in Ohio, where he preached the gospel from the pulpits of the Methodist Episcopal Church. His son, the paternal grandfather, another John Minton, followed closely in the footsteps of his sire, and was no less earnest and faithful as a preacher and humanitarian. In the disinterested goodness of their lives, father and son were allied with the old-time circuit preachers, who, in all manner of weather, and over roads at times almost impassable, rode many miles to distant charges, and in return for their ministrations received no more substantial remuneration than the consciousness of well-doing. The third John in the family, the father of Dr. Hammond, was a pioneer of the vicinity of Muncie, Ind., where he had a good farm, upon which gas was unexpectedly developed. Although not an ordained minister, he also diligently worked for the improvement and comfort of mankind, and as a missionary in the Methodist Church accomplished his desire to spread the gospel of kindness and good-will. For twenty-five years he was a class leader in the church. He was a staunch Republican, but never entered the arena of political preferment. Through his marriage he became allied with the Koch family of Pennsylvania, well known in the state because of the successful career of the paternal grandfather, who was born in Germany, and turned his national characteristics of thrift and enterprise to good account after immigrating to Pennsylvania. He became a man of large means by reason of his industry and well applied abilities, and was a large landowner and influential citizen. Mrs. Minton, who died in Indiana at an early day, was survived by her husband until 1900. She was the mother of eight children, seven of whom are living, Mrs. Hammond being the fifth.

Dr. Hammond was partially reared in Indiana, and graduated from the high school of Yellow Springs, Ohio, when sixteen years of age. In 1881 she removed to Lindsborg, McPherson county, Kans., and taught school for a year, later being elected principal of schools of the town, a position maintained with credit for four years. While living in the Kansas town she married Dr. Curtis, with whom she removed to New York, and there took a course of two years at the Woman's Medical College. The doctor thereafter located in Colorado, where, in the short space of a year, he died in his new surroundings. Mrs. Curtis then renewed her association with Kansas, and upon settling in Pratt Center was elected clerk of Pratt county, and served in this official capacity for two years. After removing from Kansas to Denver, Colo., she married A. J. Hammond, a native of Lapeer county, Mich., and who has spent his active life in the busy walks of commerce.

In 1894 the Hammond family came to Los Angeles and Mrs. Hammond entered the medical department of the University of California, from which she was graduated in the class of 1896. This research was supplemented by a post-graduate course of six months in New York City, after which she came west to San Francisco and was appointed resident physician at the Maternity Hospital. Six months later she entered upon a medical practice in Los Angeles, and in 1898 appreciably added to her professional knowledge by study in various parts of Europe, two months being spent in the clinics at Berlin, nine months at Vienna in the Algemine Krankenhaus, where she made a specialty of diseases of women, and afterwards traveled extensively over Switzerland and France. In 1900 Dr. Hammond again returned to her native land, and has since practiced in Los Angeles, where she is accounted one of the most successful in the city in her specialty. The office of Dr. Hammond is located in the Homer Laughlin building, and added to a large general practice she is examining physician for various fraternal organizations. She is fraternally associated with the Maccabees, the Fraternal Tribunes, and the Fraternal Union of America.

T. C. DONNELL, M. D. During the colonial period of American history five brothers of the clan of Donnell came from Scotland and settled in Virginia. Later generations removed to Kentucky, where Dr. Donnell's great-grandfather was a noted Indian scout. The grandfather, Robert Donnell, was born in Kentucky and engaged in farming there until 1821, when he removed to the vicinity of Greensburg, Ind. At that time the father, Dr. John H. Donnell, was a child of three years, and hence his earliest recollections were of the Hoosier state. For a half century he engaged in the practice of medicine in Franklin, where he died about 1896. During much of his active life he was a contributor to the press, these articles receiving his attention during the infrequent leisure of a busy professional life. Fraternally he was connected with the Odd Fellows. He married Elizabeth Herriott, who in childhood accompanied her father, Ephraim, from Pennsylvania to Franklin, Ind. The latter was a pioneer merchant of Franklin, but after some years removed to Topeka, Kans., near where he had a farm and engaged in stock raising. Mrs. Donnell died in Indiana. Of her five children who attained maturity only two are living. The older of these, T. C., was born in Franklin, Ind., December 8, 1853, and received his education in the local common schools and Franklin Baptist College. When almost through his college course he left in order to take up the study of medicine under his father and Dr. Theophilus Parvin. Later he matriculated in the Medical College of Indiana at Indianapolis, from which he graduated in 1877 as valedictorian of his class.

From the time of his graduation until his removal to California in June, 1899, Dr. Donnell was a practicing physician of Franklin, where he stood at the head of his profession. His studies had fitted him for a successful career. While in college he had held a position as assistant demonstrator of anatomy under Dr. Eastman, since an eminent surgeon, to whose influence he owes much. His skill brought him into prominence among his professional collaborators, and his position in the fraternity was high. An evidence of his standing is shown in the fact that, without solicitation on his part, he received the appointment as surgeon for the Louisville division of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, in which capacity he continued for eighteen years, resigning on his removal from the state. For many years he has been connected with the International Association of Railway Surgeons, many of whose conventions he has attended. Under both Republican and Democratic administrations for nine years he was a member of the board of pension examiners, and at the expiration of that period he was appointed pension examiner for the southern half of Indiana in diseases of the nose, throat, eye, ear and chest, resigning this position when he removed to California. He was also for years a member of the board of health. Both in the Johnson County and the Indiana State Medical Associations he was long an active worker. In order to keep in touch with the constant advancement made in therapeutics and to fit himself for ever-increasing usefulness in the profession, he frequently availed himself of opportunities for post-graduate work and took special courses in the Medical University of Louisville, the Miami and Ohio Medical Colleges, the Ellsburg Post-Graduate School in Cincinnati, and the Post-Graduate College of New York City. In these various institutions he devoted himself specially to the study of diseases of the eye, ear, nose, throat and chest, to which his practice has been largely confined of recent years. On coming to California he remained in Los Angeles for a few months, and in June, 1900, came to Long Beach, where he now has a fine office suite in the Stafford block on Pine street.

The marriage of Dr. Donnell in Bloomfield, Ind., united him with Addie Huff, who was born in Washington county, that state, and received her education in Earlham College. Both are connected with the Presbyterian Church. In politics Dr. Donnell is a strong and active Republican. He was made a Mason in Franklin Lodge No. 107, A. F. & A. M., and was raised to the charter and commandery in the same town, besides which he joined the Elks at Shelbyville, Ind. His college life was marked by activity in the Phi Delta Theta, and for three years he was president of the Alpha Alumni of the state of Indiana, continuing to hold the position for one year after he came to California.

GEN. EDWARD BOUTON. In his early youth Edward Bouton attended a country school at Goff's Mills, Howard township, and subsequently studied at Rodgersville Academy and Haverling Union School in Bath, N. Y. At the age of nineteen he entered a store at Bath, of which two years later he became part proprietor, and sole proprietor at the age of twenty-three. By this time the business had become extended, and he shipped large quantities of grain, wool, provisions and produce, on the Erie Railway, having purchasing agents at nearly every station. In 1859 he relinquished his Bath connection and engaged in an even more lucrative business at Chicago, Ill., as grain commission merchant, with vessel property on the lakes. When the Civil war broke out he sold his business and, chiefly at his own expense, raised a battery which throughout the war was familiarly known as Bouton's battery, its official designation being Battery I, First Regiment, Illinois Light Artillery. At the time General Bouton organized his famous battery, it was costing the state of Illinois $154 per capita to recruit, transport and maintain troops previous to being mustered into the United States service. Bouton's Battery cost the state only $13.20 per capita, the balance of the expense being paid out of the private purse of General Bouton. He gained promotion to the rank of brigadier-general and participated with honor in the battle of Shiloh and some forty other engagements and many skirmishes and in various expeditions in west Tennessee, northern Mississippi, Alabama and Arkansas. At the close of the war the command was offered to General Bouton of a corps of twenty thousand veterans to be organized to serve as volunteers in the Mexican war with France and a colonelcy in the regular army was also pressed upon him in the most flattering terms, by Generals Grant and Sherman, but preferring to retire to civil life, he declined both of these, and in 1868 removed to California, and purchasing the San Jacinto ranch, ninety miles east of Los Angeles, engaged extensively in sheep raising. Since 1882 he has also been interested in real estate speculations.

January 20, 1859, General Bouton married Miss Margaret Fox, who was born in Avoca, N. Y., and died in California August 14, 1891. He was a second time married, at San Diego, Cal., March 22, 1894, his wife being Elsa Johnson, granddaughter of Count Hogfaldt, of Sweden, and a third cousin of Princess Dagmar. One child, a boy, has been born to them.

WILLIAM SCHILLING. The genealogy of the Schilling family is traced back eight hundred years to the nobility of Germany, where the von Schillings owned a castle at Carlsruhe, the capital of the grand duchy of Baden. Thence one of the name, who had been a lieutenant in the German army, emigrated to America, but after a time returned to Europe and settled in London, England, there founding an academy and becoming its head. One of his daughters, Philippina, was a maid of honor to the queen of Prussia, and her sister married a general in the German army. Among his other children was a son, James, a native of London, England, and in early manhood a merchant of that city, but after 1849 a resident of the United States and a farmer of Greenbrier county, W. Va., where he died at seventy-two years of age. During his residence in his native land he had been identified with the Church of England, but after coming to America he became identified with the Methodist Episcopal Church. He married Louisa Morgan, who was born in Litchfield, England, of an old English family, and died in Los Angeles in 1897 when eighty-seven years of age. Ten children were born of their union, but only two are living, viz: William, of Long Beach, Cal., and Mrs. Arthur Benton, of Los Angeles. One of the sons, Alfred, who died in Bennington, Kans., was a soldier in the Civil war, serving in the same regiment with his brother William.

The primary education of William Schilling was obtained in private schools in London, England, where he was born November 7, 1835. When thirteen years of age he accompanied the family to the United States and afterward studied in private schools in West Virginia. At the opening of the Civil war he volunteered in a local company, which was afterward turned over to the Confederacy by the governor and assigned to the Twenty-seventh Virginia Infantry, the "Stonewall" regiment. Being opposed to slavery, he refused a commission in the Confederate service, but was obliged with his company (two-thirds of whom were Unionists in sentiment) to support the southern flag. He was in the first battle of Bull Run, and at Kernstown he was taken prisoner with three hundred others and sent to Pea Patch Island, Fort Delaware, where he was confined for three months. By a curious coincidence, while there he formed the acquaintance of a cousin, Franz von Schilling, who had come from Germany to get active service in the Civil war and was in command of a battery at Fort Delaware. Through the assistance of his cousin explanations were made to the war department and he was given a pass to his home. Immediately after his return, in March, 1862, he accompanied the family to Harrisonville, Ohio, but did not remain there long. For a short time he served on a gunboat at Pittsburg, after which he was superintendent of the Rathbone oil tract in West Virginia, and then, for several years, acted as superintendent of the Longmoor Oil Company at Volcano, W. Va. In the latter town he also conducted a mercantile business. During 1877 he settled at White City, twenty miles south of Junction City, Kans., where he opened a general store. Next, going to Herrington, he started the first large store in the town and built up a good business, which is now conducted by his son Charles.

During 1888 Mr. Schilling came to California and settled at Hueneme, Ventura county. His first investment was the purchase of one-half interest in San Miguel Island, where he engaged in raising sheep and cattle. Next he made his home at Santa Barbara, and from there came to Long Beach, where he has since made his home. On coming here he bought a five-acre ranch and in 1891 opened a general store, which he still conducts on Pine street. This is not only the oldest business in Long Beach, but is also the largest of its kind here. Since 1898 the firm has been William Schilling & Sons, the latter being William H. and Sidney. He assisted in organizing the First National Bank of Long Beach, has served as a member of the city council, and is a staunch Republican. In Volcano, W. Va., he was made a Mason, and is a charter member of Long Beach Lodge, also is connected with the Ancient Order of United Workmen. For ten years he was superintendent of the Methodist Episcopal Sunday School, served on the building committee during the erection of the house of worship, and now officiates as a steward.

The first marriage of Mr. Schilling united him with Miss Elizabeth Deitz, who was born in West Virginia and died in White City, Kans. The children of this union are named as follows: Mrs. Louisa Loback, of Salt Lake City, Utah; Charles, of Herrington, Kans.; James, a traveling salesman, residing in Oakland, Cal.; Minnie, who died in White City, Kans.; Mrs. Ida Cummings, of Monte Vista, Colo.; Mrs. Hattie Kohler, of Herrington, Kans.; Sophia, who died in Ohio; William H. and Sidney (twins), who are partners of their father; Frederick, a grocer of Long Beach. The present wife of Mr. Schilling was Olive V. Lower, who was born in Missouri and reared in White City, Kans. They have eight children, namely: Eleanor, Flora, Cecil, Arthur, Mary, Ruth, Ernest and Harold.

J. VINCENT HANNON. While the period of Mr. Hannon's residence in Pomona has not been of long duration, he nevertheless has many acquaintances in this portion of Los Angeles county and is well known among his associates in the law. This is due in part to the fact of his previous residence in the city of Los Angeles, where he came in contact with almost all of the practitioners in the local courts. It is said by those who are familiar with the character of his professional work that in the line of corporation law his knowledge is especially varied and comprehensive and his success indicative of his thorough training and practical experience.

At San José, Cal., Mr. Hannon was born in 1869, being a son of J. C. Hannon, a native of London, England, but a resident of California from early life. In his native town of San José he was given excellent educational advantages, and on the conclusion of his literary studies he turned his attention to the law. It was his privilege to study under the preceptorship of the late Senator White, to whose thorough professional knowledge and supervision he owes not a little. On his admission to the bar in 1892 he remained with the senator, but left a year later to accept an appointment as assistant United States attorney under Hon. George Denis. For some time he continued in that capacity, but finally resigned in order to devote himself to private practice.

September of 1899 found Mr. Hannon in Pomona, where he formed a partnership with that able attorney, P. C. Tonner, under the firm title of Tonner and Hannon. The association continued until the death of Mr. Tonner in February, 1900, since which time Mr. Hannon has been alone. By the purchase of his former partner's law library, he has become the possessor of a collection of law books unsurpassed, as to quality, in this part of the state. In the state and federal courts he has conducted a number of important suits, and has the credit of having won the highest damages ($10,000) ever secured here in a case against the Southern Pacific Railroad. His attention is given closely to the details connected with his practice and the oversight of his property interests. Mr. Hannon married Miss Flynn of Illinois, who died leaving three children, Etta, Jeremiah and Zetta.

A. B. ROTHROCK. The opportunities for contract grading in Long Beach have been utilized to no small extent by A. B. Rothrock, under whose capable supervision many of the finest roadways from the ocean inland have been transformed into shining white thoroughfares which are the special pride and pleasure of the multitudes who visit, and those who live in this delightful sea swept town. Linden avenue, from the ocean to Tenth street, and Atlantic avenue, from the Anaheim road to the ocean, as well as Fifth street, are examples of what may be accomplished by one who thoroughly understands the making of roads. General contracting also, including excavating and heavy hauling, are part of the work which Mr. Rothrock carried to a successful finish, and in this connection has been enabled to contribute largely towards the general improvement of this locality. He has improved three different residence parts of the town, and has erected a pleasant and commodious home for himself and family on the corner of Third street and Linden avenue.

In his family connections Mr. Rothrock has been closely identified with the border days of Kansas, and with the historical Quantrell band which was so destructive of life and property in that then unsettled and terror-stricken state. He was born in Lawrence, Kans., June 27, 1868, a son of Abraham and Eliza (Breeze) Rothrock, the latter of whom was born in Missouri, and had several brothers in the Civil war. Abraham Rothrock was born in Johnstown, Pa., as was also his father, another Abraham, and came from a family long represented in the state of William Penn. The elder Abraham was a pioneer of Lawrence, Kans., and was shot and killed in the great Quantrell raid in 1863. The younger Abraham and two of his brothers served during the Civil war in a Kansas regiment, and he settled eventually in Wilson county, Kans., where he farmed and spent the remainder of his days. Besides A. B. there were two other children in the family, and of these, Ward is engaged in mining in Alaska, and Nora is the wife of Curtis Branson, of Spokane, Wash.

On his father's farm near Fredonia, Wilson county, Kans., A. B. Rothrock was reared to be a farmer and was educated in the district schools. When old enough to face his prospects intelligently he decided upon other fields than those to which he had been accustomed in Kansas, and in 1888 came to California, and the same fall located in Long Beach. Forthwith various occupations engaged his attention, and in 1897 he entered upon his successful career as a contractor.

In Chanute, Kans., Mr. Rothrock married Jennie Kinney, who was born in Iowa, and who is the mother of two children, Claude and Olive. Mr. Rothrock is enterprising and progressive, and variously connected with affairs in Long Beach and vicinity. Fraternally he is a member of the Woodmen of the World, the Odd Fellows and the Independent Order of Foresters. He is a Republican in politics and a member of the Christian Church.

LUTHER C. HANNUM. Since coming to California in 1893 Mr. Hannum has made Pomona his home. He was born in Huntsburg, Ohio, February 17, 1852, being a son of Calvin Hannum, who was a manufacturer of boots and shoes. After having completed the studies of local schools, he took up the trade of shoe manufacturing under his father's instruction, and in time became manager of the business. From Ohio he went to Michigan and was employed for some years as a stationary engineer. Subsequent employment was secured in the lumber districts of Wisconsin, after which he entered upon commercial life, and followed the same for fifteen years. He was also engaged in the study of law, but did not complete the course.

An attack of typhoid fever in 1885 left Mr. Hannum in a very weak condition, and with the hope that California climate might prove beneficial he came to Pomona in 1893. The results have been all that he could desire, for he has enjoyed excellent health and has always been able to fill any demands made upon his constitution. For a time he held a clerkship with a clothing firm in Pomona, after which, in the same year, he began to deal in custom-made boots and shoes, at the same time carrying on a repair department, which, indeed, he continued till May 1, 1902. In 1900 his fellow-citizens elected him city recorder and he filled the duties of the office faithfully for one term, being succeeded in 1902 by E. Barnes.

By the marriage of Mr. Hannum to Nettie Curtis, of Huntsburg, Ohio, he became the father of one child, Esther L., now deceased. In matters relating to the welfare of Pomona he maintains an interest, while fraternally he is connected with the Knights of Pythias and the Fraternal Aid, and has passed the chairs of both orders.

GEORGE E. ABBOTT, M. D. Among the colonial settlers of Massachusetts and Maine were representatives of the Abbott family from England, and succeeding generations have been intimately associated with the development of New England. In the family of Jacob Abbott, a native of Maine and a large land owner, were a number of sons, all of whom possessed fine intellects and broad mental equipment. One of the most talented of the family, Samuel P., was accidentally killed in the opening years of manhood. Another, John, filled a pastorate in the Congregational denomination throughout his entire active life and, in addition to worthily serving the cause of Christ, contributed to the literature of the country by a number of valuable works, including Abbott's Napoleon. Gorham became an instructor in a leading educational institution in New York known as the Spinglar Institute. The two remaining brothers, Jacob and Charles E., entered the ministry of the Congregational Church, but both were similarly afflicted in the loss of their voice, after which they pursued educational work. Among the children of Jacob are Lyman J. Abbott, D. D., the noted preacher and litterateur, also Austin, Vaughn and Edward.

The youngest of the sons of Jacob, Sr., was Rev. Charles E. Abbott, father of Dr. George E. Abbott, of Pasadena. He was born in Brunswick, Me., and was graduated from Bowdoin College and Andover Theological Seminary, after which he was ordained to the ministry, entering its work with the expectation of making it a life occupation. However, the loss of his voice three years later caused him to engage in teaching. For a time he was principal of a private school at Norwich, Conn., after which he established and conducted Springside Seminary in Pittsfield, Mass. Later he made his home in Hartford, Conn., and died there when sixty-three years of age. His wife was Mary E. Spaulding, who was born in Ceylon, India, and is now living in Pasadena, Cal. Her father, Rev. Levi Spaulding, a native of New Hampshire and a graduate of Dartmouth College, entered the Congregational Church and immediately afterward offered himself as a missionary to assist in proclaiming the Gospel to the heathen. Under the auspices of the American Board he went to Ceylon, where he spent his entire active life, dying there when eighty-four years of age.

In the family of Rev. C. E. Abbott there are four children, viz: Frank, a graduate of the Berkshire Medical College, now practicing in San Francisco; George E., a physician of Pasadena; Phillips, an attorney of New York City; and Mrs. Mary Bowen, of Pasadena. The second son, George E., was born in Norwich, Conn., August 16, 1848, and as a boy attended his father's seminary and Hartford high school. He took up the study of medicine under Dr. Stearns, a leading physician of Hartford, and superintendent of the Retreat for the Insane at Hartford. His studies were further prosecuted in Harvard Medical College, from which he was graduated in 1872. Returning to Hartford, he became an assistant to Dr. Stearns. One year later he received, by competitive examination, an appointment as interne in the Woman's Hospital of New York City, where he remained a year, and then spent six months as assistant in the Nursery and Child's Hospital. On taking up private practice he continued in New York City, where he was a general physician and surgeon for eight years, and for five years he was instructor of gynecology in the New York Post-Graduate Medical School and Hospital, resigning the latter position in 1894, on removing to the Pacific coast. For four years he was resident physician at the Coronado Hotel, San Diego, and in 1898 came to Pasadena, where he carries on a general practice in medicine and surgery. In 1901 he officiated as president of the Pasadena Medical Society and during the same year was elected vice-president of the Los Angeles County Medical Association. With both of these he has been connected since coming to Pasadena, and he is also a member of the Southern California Medical Association. In common with his ancestry, he believes in the Congregational faith, but, as a matter of convenience, now attends the Presbyterian Church. Though not a partisan in politics, he is a staunch upholder of Republican doctrines and has always supported the party.

RUSSELL C. ALLEN. The Sweetwater Fruit Company, incorporated, is one of the oldest-established and successful industries of San Diego county. Not a little of its present prosperity is due to the wise oversight of its general manager, Mr. Allen. In 1890 he was connected with the organization of the company, which purchased two hundred acres in Sweetwater valley. One-half of the entire acreage is in lemons, of which there are annually raised about twenty thousand boxes or sixty carloads. Fifteen acres are in navel oranges, of which fifteen carloads are shipped yearly. The shipments of oranges will increase each year, so that when the trees are ten years old about one hundred carloads can be shipped each year. The company owns a packing house and prepares its fruit for shipment. On the property there are also two private pumping plants, from which in dry seasons water is secured for the ranch. Besides the lemons and oranges, English walnuts are grown, there being fifteen acres in this product. Thirty acres are in alfalfa. The shipments from the ranch comprise two brands of fruit, Bonita and Hibiscus, both of which have acquired a reputation that insures their sale at fair prices. To add to the equipment of the ranch a store was opened thereon and a postoffice established, and for two years Mr. Allen has filled the office of postmaster.

In Jamaica Plains, Mass., Mr. Allen was born in 1859, a son of Joseph H. and Anna M. Allen. His educational advantages were of the best the country afforded. In 1880 he was graduated from Harvard College with the degree of A. B., after which he was a student in Columbia Law School, New York City, and also studied in the office of Henry C. Atwater. Coming to California in 1882, he settled near El Cajon, San Diego county, where he bought property (now known as Las Paderes ranch) and set out a raisin vineyard and an olive orchard. This place, which he still owns, comprises two hundred and eighty acres and is watered by a private pumping plant. From 1889 until 1899 he was a partner in the El Cajon Packing Company, which engaged in the raisin packing business. His property interests are large, including, as already intimated, a part ownership of the Bonita ranch, of the Sweetwater Fruit Company, and the ownership of Las Paderes ranch. Through his twenty years of practical experience in fruit growing he has acquired a thorough knowledge of the business, and is particularly well informed concerning the adaptability of the soil to certain varieties of fruits. Frequently he has been called upon to furnish articles for fruit growers' journals, and in these papers he has given the result of years of labor and tireless application, thereby enabling inexperienced horticulturists to profit by his experience through all these years.

A. J. BACON, M. D. During the latter years of his life Dr. A. J. Bacon was a resident of Gardena, where he purchased land and erected a commodious residence. He was born near Macomb, Ill., and reared on a farm, his primary education being received at the district schools of his neighborhood. His father, Col. Charles Bacon, was born in Tennessee, was a civil engineer in the earlier part of his life, but after coming to Illinois he settled on a farm of fifteen hundred acres near Macomb, where he eventually died.

The professional training of Dr. Bacon was undertaken at Rush Medical College in Chicago, Ill., and at the Eclectic College in Cincinnati, Ohio. He began his practice in Table Grove, Ill. At the end of twenty-five years he removed to Fairfield, Neb., on account of poor health, and later went to Hastings, Neb., remaining in both of the latter towns two years.

Thence he went to Denver, Colo. After a year and a half in Denver he located in Los Angeles, Cal., and then removed to Gardena, where his death occurred in March, 1900. His first marriage was contracted in Illinois, and of this union there was one daughter, Carrie, who is now the wife of J. M. Leonard, a telegraph operator for the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Company.

May 4, 1865, Dr. Bacon married Miss Miner, born near Table Grove, Ill., October 10, 1841, a daughter of William Miner, who was born in Kentucky, September 4, 1810. Mr. Miner removed from Kentucky to Indiana, and afterward located near Table Grove, Ill., where he had fifteen hundred acres of land, and this property he farmed until his death in 1894. His wife, formerly Phoebe Ward, was born in New Jersey, a daughter of John Ward, who was born in Kentucky, and was both a farmer and preacher. Mrs. Bacon spent her girlhood days in Illinois, and was educated in the public schools and at the seminary at Quincy, Ill. She has one daughter, Mrs. Nellie Barlow, who lives with her mother.

PROF. ALBERT J. COOK. The department of biology, under the charge of Professor Cook, is among the most important in Pomona College. The entire upper floor of Pearsons Hall of Science is devoted to this department. In the south end is the museum, containing a valuable collection, which includes an articulated and disarticulated human skeleton, a disarticulated and sectional human skull, articulated skeletons of all classes of vertebrata, all orders of mammalia, the celebrated Azoux manikin and the Azoux models of the human eye and ear; also a representative collection of insects, another of fossils from all periods of geologic history; and a cabinet of archæological specimens. In the north end are laboratories for zoology, and botany with complete appliances, added to the conveniences of water and gas.

Professor Cook was born in Owosso, Mich., in 1842, and received a thorough education, graduating from the Michigan Agricultural College in 1862. During the same year he came to California and taught in the public schools of Sacramento for some time, returning to Michigan in 1868 and accepting a position in the educational work of that state. His recognized learning and talents led to his appointment as professor of mathematics in the Michigan Agricultural College, in which department he remained for two years, and was then transferred to the chair of zoology and biology. During all of these years he had never relinquished the hope of returning to California, and when he was invited to the chair of biology in Pomona College at Claremont he accepted. This chair he has filled since January, 1894, and besides he has charge of the Farmers' Institute of Southern California, being an appointee of the University at Berkeley. He organized and established the Farmers' Clubs of Pomona valley and Southern California, which have increased to over forty and he is recognized as a power in promoting the success of agriculture and horticulture. To this work he has given considerable attention. The fact that he is a fluent speaker and able writer has brought his services into demand along these lines, and he is now regular correspondent for the California Cultivator and the American Bee Journal. In Claremont he is connected with the local schools as trustee and with the Congregational Church in a similar capacity.

The present wife of Professor Cook was Mrs. J. S. Eldridge, of Pasadena. He had been previously married to Miss Mary Baldwin, of Ohio, who died in 1896, leaving two children. The son, Albert, is engaged in agricultural pursuits in Michigan and is identified with the Farmers' Clubs of his state, being president of the organization. The daughter, Catharine, is the wife of Lyman J. Briggs, who is assistant chief of the Bureau of Soils, Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C.

GEORGE H. BALLOU. The president of the San Diego Chamber of Commerce is a member of an old-established family of New England that traces its lineage to French-Huguenot ancestry. His father, Henry S., a native of Rhode Island, was, during early manhood, a merchant in the wholesale trade, but later gave his attention to the shipping and commission business in Providence. Retiring when advanced in years, he came west to California and spent his last days at Coronado. One year previous his wife, Deborah A., had died in Rochester, N. Y. She was born in Niagara county, N. Y., to which place her father, John L. Davis, had removed from New England. The family was of English descent. To her marriage were born two sons and two daughters, all of whom are still living, except one daughter. One of the sons, Stephen D., was for three years a soldier in the Civil war, after which, in 1866, he came to the Pacific coast, and is now postmaster at San Luis Obispo; at one time he served as sheriff of that county.

In Providence, R. I., George H. Ballou was born October 8, 1848. When only twelve years of age he was graduated from the Providence high school, after which he assisted his father in business. When sixteen years of age, or less, he enlisted in the United States Engineer Corps, and for a time served in the east, after which he was transferred to the west, and at the close of the war was serving in Missouri.

With the rank of sergeant he was honorably discharged at Willet's Point in the spring of 1867, after a service of three years. Going to New York City, he secured employment in an importing house, and later accepted a position with the house of C. P. Low & Co. in Yokohama, Japan. During the following years his time was spent partly in New York and partly in Japan, and he discharged his important duties as manager of the business with efficiency and success.

Through a residence in California between 1883 and 1885 Mr. Ballou had come to know and like the state and its people. On his return from Japan, in 1889, he determined to settle in San Diego, and almost immediately he inaugurated an important business venture. The firm of G. H. Ballou & Co. was established July 1, 1889, and has since continued in business, although since 1896 the title has been Ballou & Cosgrove. The company transact a large business in importing teas and coffees and manufacturing spices and baking powder. In addition to this business, Mr. Ballou is president of an oil company and a director in others. Upon the organization of the Merchants' National Bank he was chosen a director and served as such as long as he was connected with the bank. Elected treasurer of the Merchants and Manufacturers' Association at its organization, he continued in that capacity until the association was merged into the Chamber of Commerce. Of this he served as the first vice-president, has been a director for many years, and in January, 1900, and in January, 1901, was honored by the election as president. This important position he fills with the same efficiency that has characterized him in every post and under all circumstances.

Thirty years ago Mr. Ballou was made a Mason in Lockport, N. Y., and he is now connected with the lodge, chapter and commandery in San Diego, and Al Malaikah Temple, A. A. O. N. M. S., of Los Angeles. He is also connected with the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks. The Republican party has always received his staunch support and he has never wavered in his allegiance to its principles. Frequently he has been a delegate to state conventions of the party and at all times has stood ready to use his time and influence to advance those principles which he believes to be for the welfare of our country, finding an important means of spreading Republican tenets through his membership in the Republican League. In Lockport, N. Y., in 1868, he married Miss Harriet A. Whitchee, who was born in that city. They are the parents of one daughter, Frances Ada, who in April, 1902, married Robert L. Crane of Buffalo, N. Y., where she now resides and is very prominent in social and musical circles.

W. L. Crain

WILLIAM L. CRAIN. A few cabins sheltered all of the residents of San Pedro when Mr. Crain came here in 1882. Seven years before, in May, 1875, he had entered the employ of the Southern Pacific Railway Company as an office boy at Wilmington, San Pedro having at that time not been started. As he proved himself to be industrious and capable, he was given work in the tallying of vessels. Step by step he won deserved promotions, and in 1889 was appointed agent for the railroad at San Pedro, which position he still holds, having entire charge of the company's office, yards and wharf, in addition to which he acts as agent for the Wells-Fargo Express Company.

Near El Monte, Los Angeles county, Cal., W. L. Crain was born December 15, 1858, being a son of William H. and Margaret Jane (Carter) Crain, natives respectively of Springfield, Ill., and Indiana. During 1856 his father came to California, and while crossing the plains met Miss Carter, whose parents were in the same emigrant train with himself. Arriving in California he took up the work of a freighter, and was accustomed to drive to San Pedro for his freight, which he would then haul to various points in this state and Arizona. Removing to Washington Territory in 1871, he took up freighting and teaming there, but died two years later, when forty-three years of age. He was of English extraction, and his father was a native of South Carolina. His widow makes her home in San Pedro, and is now (1902) sixty-nine years of age. Four children were born of their union. Annie, William L., Isabelle and Charles H.

When a boy William L. Crain was a pupil in the old brick school on Spring and Second streets, Los Angeles. He accompanied his parents to Walla Walla, Wash., and after his father's death returned with the family to San Bernardino, Cal. Being the older son, the support of the others fell upon him, and with filial love he cared for his mother and endeavored to provide her with the comforts of life, at the same time supporting the other children until they were able to care for themselves. He secured employment as driver of an eight-mule train from Spadra, the end of the Southern Pacific Railroad, to Panamint, hauling merchandise out and returning with a load of ore. The trip took thirty days and was attended by many dangers. Indeed, more than once he had narrow escapes from sudden death. Often he drove across the desert alone, sleeping on the ground at night and cooking his meals by the roadside. When he abandoned the work of driving, he entered the railroad company's employ, and has continued with them ever since, a period of more than twenty-seven years. His long service is sufficient testimony concerning his fidelity to the company's interests. Fraternally he is connected with Wilmington Lodge No. 198, F. & A.

M., in the works of which he is interested and active.

October 1, 1898, occurred the marriage of Mr. Crain to Mrs. E. J. (Story) Fields, who was born in Haverhill, Mass., and in 1895 came to San Francisco, a year later settling in San Pedro. Her father, Francis Story, was a native of Haverhill, Mass., of English extraction, his ancestors having first settled in New Hampshire, and thence removed to Vermont. During the Civil war he served in the Union army. His death occurred when he was eighty years of age, and he was preceded by his wife, who was Deborah Getchell, of Maine.

HON. JOHN C. CHAMBERS. Many of the men who have since been prominent in the activities of Southern California first became associated with this region in the days of the famous boom, and Mr. Chambers is one of the men who dates his residence in the state from 1887. He was born near Mansfield, Richland county, Ohio, November 18, 1837, a son of James and Mary (Tipton) Chambers, natives respectively of New York state and Monroe county, Ohio. His paternal grandfather, a native of county Armagh, Ireland, and of Scotch Quaker descent, came to the United States and after a few years in New York settled in Belmont county, Ohio, where he cleared and improved a farm. His death occurred in Richland county when he was over four score years of age. The maternal grandfather, Luke Tipton, was a native of Maryland, of Quaker lineage, and became a farmer in Ohio. After years upon a farm in Richland county, Ohio, James Chambers moved to Cedar county, Iowa, in 1864, and settled upon a farm near Springdale. During the stirring days of the war he was a staunch abolitionist and his farm was one of the stations of the underground railroad. Both he and his wife died in Iowa. They were the parents of six sons and one daughter, of whom the daughter and one son are living. During the Civil war one of the sons, Elwood, enlisted in an Ohio regiment, went to the front, bore an active part in campaigns and battles and died from a gunshot wound in West Virginia.

The third in the family was John C., who was born near Mansfield and grew to manhood upon the home farm, receiving his primary education in district schools, later attending the Wesleyan University at Delaware, Ohio. Teaching and farming formed the occupations of his youthful years. In 1863 he accompanied the family to Iowa and afterward bought a farm near Springdale, but in 1867 turned his attention to the mercantile business, which he conducted at Springdale for some years. In 1873 he resumed farming south of town. Meantime he had become prominent and popular and a local leader of the Republican party, on which ticket in 1871 he was elected to the Iowa state senate. He served during the session of 1872 (when Allison was first elected to the United States senate), the extra session of 1873 and the session of 1874. Again, in 1883, he was elected to the senate, serving in the sessions of 1884 and 1886, and taking an active part in securing Senator Allison's re-election for a third term. For twenty years during his residence in Iowa he served as president of the school board and greatly aided in promoting the standard of education in his community.

In Knox county, Ohio, Mr. Chambers married Miss Jennie W. Lewis, who was born in Logan county, that state, of Quaker parentage. They have three sons and two daughters, namely: Elmer L., who is employed in the Riverside postoffice; Walter R., who is with the Pasadena Electrical Railway Company; J. H., who is interested with his father; Edith and Mabel, at home.

For eight years before coming to California Mr. Chambers was connected with the West Branch Bank in Iowa, which he assisted in organizing in 1875, and of which he was cashier for eight years and president for one year. His first location in California was at Wildomar, Riverside county, where he gained his first experience in ranching. Finding the country very dry he organized an irrigation district, but did not meet with success in securing water. Settling in Riverside in 1891, he engaged in selling hay and feed, the most of which was brought in from his large farm at Wildomar. While in Riverside he served as city recorder for four years and also as justice of the peace. Later he turned his attention to general contracting, doing most of the granite street work in that city. In February, 1900, he obtained the street sprinkling contract in Pasadena, at which time he moved to this city and bought property on North Fair Oaks avenue. In his business he uses ten Studebaker sprinklers of the latest approved variety. His interests in Riverside are still retained, including an orchard and residence on Olivewood avenue. In religion he adheres to the faith of his ancestors and is identified with the Society of Friends.

CHIEF A. M. CLIFFORD. The Pasadena fire department, than which no better equipped exists in the southern part of California, owes its present standing among kindred institutions to the untiring zeal of its chief, A. M. Clifford. A long standing proficiency as a general engineer and railroad man led up to the present position of Mr. Clifford, who came to this city in August of 1890 to assume charge of the engine then in use by the department. At that time there were but four men regularly employed by the city to respond to fire alarms, and a great deal of hard work and responsibility fell to the lot of the engineer. Nevertheless, he continued to discharge his arduous duties with commendable credit until his promotion to his present position in May of 1901, directly after the new city charter had taken effect. Under the present liberal management many changes have taken place in this particular branch of municipal control, and facilities for protecting life and property have been augmented by many modern innovations, including ladder, truck and hose carts and a chemical engine.

To Dr. Ephraim and Amanda (Sloan) Clifford were born ten children, nine of whom are living, A. M. being fourth. He was born in Farmington, Van Buren county, Iowa, August 25, 1856, and was reared on the paternal farm until seventeen years of age. Dr. Clifford was born in Vermont, of English descent, and for many years practiced medicine at Fairview, Ind. The strenuous activity incident to a large country and city practice eventually undermined his health, to regain which he removed to Farmington, Iowa, and purchased land upon which to farm and lead an out-door life. He later purchased government land, which now constitutes a portion of the city limits of Des Moines, upon which he rounded out a well conditioned life, his wife surviving him up to the present time. Mrs. Clifford is over eighty years of age and rejoices in the fact that nine of her children are still living. One of her sons, Samuel K., distinguished himself as a soldier in the Third Iowa Cavalry during the Civil war, and is at present a resident of Tacoma, Wash.

When seventeen years of age Mr. Clifford removed to the farm near Des Moines and lived thereon with a brother until his return to Farmington. He then completed his preliminary education at the high school, and in 1875 began railroading with the Keokuk & Des Moines, now the Chicago & Rock Island Railroad. While still a brakeman he changed to the Chicago, Burlington & Kansas City Railroad (then known as the Burlington & Southwestern), in whose employ he was promoted to the position of conductor. For a short time he was employed in a flouring mill at Farmington, after which he began to fire on the St. Louis, Keokuk & Northwestern Railroad, still later becoming an engineer on the Chicago, Burlington & Kansas City road, his route being between Burlington and Carrollton, Mo. At the time of the great Chicago, Burlington & Quincy strike in 1888 he quit railroading in the middle west, and December 25 of that year came to Los Angeles in the employ of the Southern Pacific Railroad as engineer. His route lay between Los Angeles and Bakersfield, and in 1890 he resigned to accept the position of engineer with the Pasadena fire department.

Since coming to Pasadena Mr. Clifford has identified himself with many of the interests here represented. His pleasant residence on Dayton street is opposite the fire headquarters. Mrs. Clifford was formerly Cora M. Getchell, a native of Minneapolis, and she is the mother of one child, Edith A. Mr. Clifford is well known in fraternal circles, having become a Royal Arch Mason in Farmington, of which lodge he is still a member, and he is also identified with the Pasadena Lodge No. 272, F. & A. M., the Pasadena Commandery, the Consistory, and Al Malakiah Temple.

GEORGE G. CRANE. In pursuit of that occupation to which he became accustomed in earliest youth in Ohio, Mr. Crane, in 1883, settled in Ventura county, where he has realized many of his ambitious expectations. He was born in Sharon township, Medina county, Ohio, July 7, 1835. His paternal ancestors were all born and reared in or near Deighton, Mass., where the original ancestor, from England, one Henry Crane, settled in 1654. On the maternal side, Louisa (Briggs) Crane was born in Ontario county, N. Y., in 1815, a daughter of Thomas Briggs, also a native of Massachusetts. Her brother, George G. Briggs, the pioneer fruit man of California, in 1861 became the owner of the Rancho Santa Paula y Saticoy, in Ventura county, and said rancho was subdivided and thrown open for settlement by him. In 1855 Mr. Crane came to California and assisted his uncle, George G. Briggs, in putting out two hundred acres of orchard, in addition to the already large orchard then just bearing, near Marysville. He also assisted him in putting out an orchard of one hundred acres near Oroville, and one of two hundred acres on the Sacramento river near Knights Landing. Remaining in California something over three years, he then returned to his native place in Ohio, married and purchased a farm upon which he resided for ten years, when, selling his farm, he removed to Cass county, Mo. Six years later he removed to Denver, Colo., where he engaged in the wholesale fruit business, shipping from forty to fifty carloads a year from Marysville and Sacramento.

The drought in California of 1877 decided him to quit the fruit business and go to the Black Hills of Dakota, the then new mining region. There, in company with others, he was successful in locating and developing what is known as the Trojan group of mines, near Deadwood, which he and his partners sold in 1883 for $100,000. In the same year he removed with his family to Saticoy, Ventura county, purchased and settled upon the ranch he now (1902) occupies. This land was at once utilized for the raising of lima beans and the setting out of walnut trees. To-day there is a fine bearing orchard of Santa Barbara soft shell walnuts covering fifty acres. Some apricots also are raised on the ranch.

No one has shown more enthusiasm than Mr. Crane in promoting the interests of his neighborhood. To further the cause of the walnut growers he assisted in the organization of the Saticoy Walnut Growers' Association. He was one of the first stockholders in the People's Lumber Company, and has also been vitally interested in the subject of water supply. In addition to his home ranch he owns eighty acres of land west of Pasadena, which can be developed into grape land. Although a Democrat in politics and a staunch upholder of his party, he has never cared for office and has never been a candidate but once, when he was nominated for supervisor. His kindly and agreeable personality has won for him many friends throughout Ventura county. In 1859 he married Adalina Huntley, who was born in Granger township, Medina county, Ohio, in 1836. They are the parents of two children, namely: Amy, who is the wife of E. E. Huntley, of Saticoy; and Abbie, wife of L. W. Andrews, an attorney of Los Angeles.

GEORGE W. FARRINGTON. Before a church had been erected in the now beautiful city of Pomona and before a minister had come to serve the people, the first wedding ceremony was performed by Justice W. T. Martin October 5, 1876, and the young couple whose hopes and happiness were thus made one were George W. Farrington and Harriet I. Reed, daughter of the late and honored pioneer, John G. Reed. It is fitting that they should still remain in the city which they have seen spring up from its beginning and in which they have always been respected residents.

In Brooklyn, N. Y., Mr. Farrington was born April 20, 1846. While he was still a boy the Civil war broke out and, with sympathies fired for the Union, he resolved to enlist. At the age of sixteen he became a member of Company L, Merrill Horse (Second Missouri Cavalry, United States Volunteers). Soon he was made corporal of Company I in the Twenty-third Regiment, V. R. C., and later he enlisted in the United States Army and was promoted to be sergeant of Company G, Fourth United States Infantry, and then was made first sergeant of Company K, Eleventh United States Infantry. At the close of the war he was ordered to the frontier, where he remained until December 11, 1875, and was then honorably discharged at Fort Richardson, Tex., for physical disability. Exposure, long marches, sleeping on the ground and other hardships had undermined his constitution and brought on disease of the lungs. All physicians who were consulted said he was beyond medical aid. However, he himself never gave up hope. Learning that the climate of Southern California had frequently proved helpful for those afflicted with lung trouble, he resolved to come here, and by so doing his life was saved. After a short time in Los Angeles, he secured employment on a ranch for the purpose of getting outdoor exercise. The occupation and climate soon gave him renewed health. For a time he was overseer on the ranch of Louis Phillips. Afterward he became manager of a grocery in Pomona, but the confinement proved injurious and he was obliged to return to outdoor work. Purchasing a team and wagon, he and his wife traveled through the southern part of the state, and while camping at Long Beach (then a new town) he was appointed postmaster under President Cleveland.

After his return to Pomona, in October, 1890, Mr. Farrington engaged in the cigar and tobacco business, having a store with an open front and thus securing an abundance of fresh air. Ever since then he has continued in the business, and his stock is now the largest and most select of its kind in the city. He is well known throughout this locality, and it is always a pleasure to listen to his accounts of the pioneer days of Pomona, when settlers were few, improvements conspicuous by their absence, but when that spirit of hearty hospitality prevailed that is so essentially a characteristic of every new country. He was the first affiliate in Pomona Lodge No. 246, F. & A. M. His activity in Vicksburg Post No. 61, G. A. R., led to his election as commander, which office he filled for two terms.

The father of Mrs. Farrington was born in Schuylkill county, Pa., February 1, 1822, and was reared on a farm. After removing to Ohio he learned the carpenter's trade, which he subsequently followed, together with contracting. He married Lydia Yoe, who was born in Ohio July 19, 1824, a daughter of John Yoe. After his marriage he took his wife to Shelby county, Ind. Some years later he settled in Pomona, led hither by reports of the invigorating climate. Advertisements reported the town to be promising and quite a city, but when he arrived here, October 31, 1875, he found only six houses besides the hotel. However, he had made up his mind to locate in Pomona and did not allow discouragements to change his plans. He bought two lots, building his house on Lot 1, Block 89, and the shop where the First National Bank now stands, which is in the center of the city. The house which he built and which is now occupied by his widow is surrounded by the fruit and shade trees they planted on coming here, and some of these have grown to unusual size. An elderberry tree is two feet thick, the cacti reach as high as twenty-five feet, and the growth of other plants and trees has been equally surprising. In early days his house was used for religious services, and in it was held the first prayer meeting in Pomona; while his shop was used for Sunday-school purposes until a house of worship was built. In contributions to religious movements and, indeed, to all worthy charitable and philanthropic efforts, he was liberal to the extent of self-sacrifice, and many a time he denied himself some comfort in order that the church might be given a needed contribution. In his death, which occurred in 1887, Pomona lost one of its most deserving pioneers, and his name will ever be cherished by those who feel a debt of gratitude to the early settlers. Of his descendants there are living six great-grandchildren, fourteen grandchildren and six children. In order of birth the names of his children are: John A., deceased; Mary L., wife of T. J. Emerick; Henry M.; Harriet I., Mrs. Farrington; Catherine R., Mrs. A. L. Beam; Sarah J. and Martin L., both deceased; Martha A., wife of I. J. Reynolds, and David C., who is a twin of Martha A.

GEORGE W. FORESTER, M. D., Ph. D. In his professional practice Dr. Forester is an exponent of the world's most advanced deductions of the science of medicine and surgery. In Southern California, which constitutes his field of activity, the tendency to specialization is observable in his career, and he is best known as a surgeon, and as an expert on the eye, ear, nose and throat. In the former capacity he has made himself familiar with every phase of the science. In common with others of equal breadth of mind, he believes that for one man to try and learn all about any one branch of science is no longer feasible. Yet Dr. Forester has few equals and few superiors in the general practice of medicine.

A native of Lexington, Sanilac county, Mich., Dr. Forester was born January 6, 1864, a son of Wesley Justus and Esther (Beecher) Forester, natives of New York state, and the former of Ogdensburg. The mother, who died in Los Angeles, and who had four children, of whom George W. is the second youngest, and the only one living, was the daughter of a Methodist Episcopal clergyman. The father, who died when George W. was a mere child, was a government contractor, and was engaged in the construction of large contracts on Lake Huron, at the Point of Banks, and other places. Dr. Forester was reared principally in Cheboygan, Mich., and was educated in the public schools and at the Northern Indiana Normal School at Valparaiso, Ind. Having learned the art of photography, he practiced the same in different parts of the east and west, and upon his first trip to California in 1887 became seriously interested in medicine. For a year he studied in the medical department of the University of Southern California, his preceptor being Dr. C. E. Shoemaker. In 1880 he entered Rush Medical College in Chicago, attending for a year, going then to the College of Physicians & Surgeons at Des Moines, Iowa, which institution was also the medical department of Drake University. There he finished the four years' course in two years, graduating in 1894. The same year he began practice in Elburne, Iowa, and then went to Des Moines, and while in the latter city entered the Highland Park College of Pharmacy, from which he graduated in 1896. While endeavoring to establish a practice at Des Moines he was also the assistant professor of chemistry and bacteriology at the College of Physicians & Surgeons, but owing to the failure of his wife's health he was obliged to seek a change of climate and surroundings. He therefore located in Los Angeles in 1897, and made a specialty of the eye, ear, nose and throat. The following year found him in Pomona, where he continued in the same line of specialties, and where he has since acquired a reputation extending far beyond the town.

In Elburne, Iowa, Dr. Forester married Lillie Williamson, a native of Crete, Ill., and who was educated at the Western University at Toledo, Ohio, and graduated from the Northern Indiana Normal. Of this union there are three children: Hazel, who is ten years of age; William, eight years old; and Frankie, aged six years. Dr. Forester has superior professional training aside from that acquired before starting upon his career of practice. He has taken special post-graduate courses in New York, Philadelphia and Chicago, and has drunk deeply from the knowledge of the most celebrated and erudite physicians and surgeons. For the successful demonstration of his operation theories, which, by the way, concur with those of the most famous in the large cities of Europe and America, he has fitted up an operating room in his office adjoining his residence at 267 Gary avenue, which, for perfect completeness can have few superiors anywhere. It is large and light and fitted with all known devices for antiseptic surgery, and the bedroom for patients adjoining, as well as the suite of rooms at the disposal of those in waiting, are furnished in an elegant and thoroughly artistic manner, and constitute one of the finest consulting and operating enterprises in the country.

In connection with his practice Dr. Forester has developed a liking for horticulture, and has improved a twenty-acre orange ranch, known as the Live Oak Farm, and located four miles north of Pomona. The doctor is a Republican in national politics, and is fraternally connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the Knights of Pythias, the Modern Woodmen of America and the Fraternal Aid, besides several other organizations of which he is examining physician. With his wife he is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

JOHN NELSON. This substantial Swedish-American resident of Los Angeles was born in Wärmiland, Sweden, near Carlstad, August 28, 1863, and was the third child and eldest son in the family of Nels Carlson, likewise a native of Wärmiland. After a lifetime of activity in the lumbering business and the tilling of the soil, the father, who is now seventy years of age, is making his home at Storttäppa, and has largely retired from the cares that filled his younger days. His wife, formerly Koren Johnson, is still living and is now seventy-one years of age.

Following the usual custom, John Nelson served in the Swedish army in early manhood. When a little less than twenty-four years of age, in 1887, he immigrated to America and settled in Minnesota, well equipped for the future by virtue of his knowledge of the lumber business, to which he had been accustomed from youth. For four winters he was employed in the lumber woods of Minnesota, and during the intervening summers followed the trade of a carpenter, which he learned in Minneapolis. During this time he made every effort to improve his general knowledge. To facilitate the acquiring of the English language, and to place himself in touch with the prevailing conditions of his adopted home, he attended the Minneapolis high school for three winters, and among other things learned mechanical drawing. During the last three years of his residence in the northern state he devoted his energies to contracting and building, later removing to Iowa and following the same occupation until 1897, when he located in Los Angeles, as a contractor and builder.

Among the contracts which Mr. Nelson has filled since coming west may be mentioned the following: The Randall building, a three-story brick on the corner of Boyd and Los Angeles streets; eight buildings and residences on Figueroa and Seventh streets; the residence of Charles Hoff; two contracts for the county of Los Angeles, which were filled with scrupulous fidelity; a two-story brick structure on Temple street; the Moreland residence; Santa Rosa hotel, a three-story pressed brick building; the R. M. Baker and Farwell three-story flats; and the enlargement of the engine building, boiler and engine rooms to the Los Angeles county court house. In 1902 he received the contract for the erection of the Los Angeles county jail, with a valuation of $150,000, his contract price being $78,900. He is rapidly becoming recognized as a valuable and responsible contractor, who can be relied upon to fulfill all of his obligations.

In politics Mr. Nelson is a Republican. Reared in the faith of the Swedish Lutheran denomination, he is a believer in its faith and a contributor to its work. He is respected by all who know him and his integrity in business is never questioned.

ROBERT JONES GREGG, M. D. At Carmichaelstown, Greene county, Pa., Dr. Gregg was born September 21, 1843, being a son of William Seaton and Mary (Jones) Gregg, of Scotch-Irish descent. His ancestors settled in Pennsylvania with William Penn. In 1850 his father moved to Wisconsin, and a year later settled in Peoria, Ill., where he engaged in mercantile pursuits. As a boy Dr. Gregg attended the Peoria public schools and later took a special course in Union College at Schenectady, N. Y. Having decided to enter the medical profession, he matriculated in Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia, where he took the regular course, graduating in 1866. Returning to Peoria, he opened an office, but in a short time came to California. When he arrived in New San Diego, October 16, 1868, the town had only one physician, Dr. Jacob Allen, now deceased; hence he has the distinction of being the oldest surviving physician of the place. Both in religion and politics he is independent. In 1874 he married Miss Emma, daughter of Dr. L. C. Churchill, of San Francisco. Six children were born of their union, but three died in infancy. Those now living are Ruth, Molly and Agnes.

DUANE FLETCHER HALL. A resident of North Pasadena since 1891, Mr. Hall was born on St. Johns Island, which is one of the Thousand Islands in the St. Lawrence river. He is a son of Duane Randall and Agnes (Melville) Hall, natives respectively of Watertown, N. Y., and Glasgow, Scotland. The maternal grandfather, William Melville, a native of Glasgow and a weaver by trade, moved to Canada, where he made a home at Odessa. The paternal grandfather, Richard Hall, was born in New York, followed the trade of a wheelwright and died at Gananoque, Ontario. In the latter city Duane R. Hall for some years engaged in manufacturing nails. Later he became a manufacturer of cutlery in Chicago, from which city he removed to Tolleston, Ind., becoming superintendent for the Chicago Club's game reserve there. Since his death his widow has made her home in North Pasadena with her oldest living child. Of her six children, three sons and one daughter survive, Duane F. being the only one in California. It is noteworthy that the day of his birth, March 25, 1853, was Good Friday, and that, with the sole exception of 1862, Good Friday has never since fallen on the 25th of March.

When eleven years of age Mr. Hall began to take hold of life's problems and anxieties, as he then began to work in a wood factory, receiving twenty cents a week for his services. A year later the family removed to Chicago, where he worked at wood turning and polishing, having no chance to attend school except at night. His health being poor, the family were led to remove to Tolleston, Ind., hoping the change would be beneficial to him, and so indeed it proved. For six years he was engaged in hunting and trapping on Little Calumet river, and the game thus secured was shipped to Chicago, New York and Boston, so that he not only improved in health, but also saved some money. Investing his means in a farm of one hundred acres at Highland, Ind., he worked tirelessly to cultivate and improve his land, on which he made his home for fifteen years or more. While living in Highland he married Miss Almira Reed, who was born and reared there, of New York parentage. Christmas Eve of 1880 witnessed their union, and they at once settled upon their farm, continuing on the same place until they came to California. They became the parents of six children, of whom Alexander died in infancy. The others are Duane Randall, Harvey Lewis, Elizabeth, Agnes and Marion.

Four years after his arrival in North Pasadena, Mr. Hall started the North Pasadena express, and now has four horses expressing between this place and Los Angeles. During the past three summers he has been employed as engineer for the North Pasadena Water Company, his oldest son at these times taking charge of the express business. A natural mechanic, he not only does expert carpenter work, but is also a skillful wood turner and polisher, and an efficient stationary engineer. However, he is one of those men who do not rest satisfied with present attainments, but are ambitious to increase their store of knowledge, and at this writing he is taking a course in the International Correspondence School of Scranton, Pa. He and his family occupy a comfortable residence which he built near the corner of Kirkwood and Cedar streets. His wife is identified with the North Pasadena Congregational Church and interested in several of its societies. Fraternally he is connected with the Uniform Rank, K. of P., the Woodmen of the World and the Independent Order of Foresters. His political views bring him into affiliation with the Republican party. While living in Indiana he was quite active in local matters, and served as supervisor of roads, school director and also as deputy sheriff.

WILLIAM H. H. SCOTT. The progress of the city and valley of Pomona since 1877 has been witnessed by Mr. Scott, who has been identified with local affairs ever since the days when large herds of cattle, horses and sheep roamed through the valley, and the raising of stock formed the principal industry of the people. A native of Wheeling, W. Va., William Henry Harrison Scott was born May 5, 1840, a son of Luke Scott, and grandson of James Scott. The latter came from Glasgow, Scotland, and settled in Delaware. At about the age of fifteen, Luke Scott went alone to Wheeling. In 1847 he went to Iowa and settled on a farm near Keokuk, where he died in 1851. His wife, who was sixty-eight at the time of her death, was Rachel Frazier; her father, Peter Frazier, a native of Frankfort-on-the-Rhine, attained the age of ninety-seven years.

At the outbreak of the Civil war William H. H. Scott offered his services to the Union, but was rejected. Not being able to go to war, he decided to join a party about to cross the plains, having been asked by them to act as driver of a team of oxen. In that way he journeyed to Virginia City, Nev., where he followed mining until 1864, and then went to San Francisco, Cal., from there traveling by boat to New York and then returning to his old Iowa home. Shortly afterward he married Miss Elizabeth McCleary, of Keokuk, who was born near Sharon, Pa. They became the parents of five children, viz.: William Henry Harrison, Jr., who died at twenty-one years; James Winfield, who is a court reporter on the Inter-Mountain of Butte, Mont.; Thomas W., of Pomona, who has the reputation of being the fastest orange packer in Southern California; Mae Beatrice, wife of Charles Schwan, assistant postmaster of Pomona; and Lillie Belle, who has taught for some years in the Central School of Pomona. The daughters are connected with the Methodist Episcopal Church of Pomona, while Mrs. Scott is a member of the Christian Church.

Accompanied by his family, Mr. Scott came to California in 1881 and has since made Pomona his home. For six months he was foreman of the Lewis Phillips ranch, and he filled similar positions on other ranches during subsequent years. After the boom in 1881 he erected the first building that was completed in the village of Pomona, this being now occupied by George Weigle's market. Of late years he has engaged in teaming and during the season of marketing fruit he employs from twenty to thirty men to pick and uses six teams to draw the fruit. His work is carefully done and always proves satisfactory. In 1887 he bought two acres on the corner of Myrtle and West Second streets, which he has since improved by the planting out of orange trees and the erection of a residence. While he has never sought office, he has filled several local positions, among them the office of constable, which he filled by appointment for six months; and street superintendent, to which he was twice elected. As overseer of streets he inaugurated the plan of running a team for that purpose, and not a few of the fine streets of the city owe their neat appearance to his skillful oversight.

ERNEST THOMAS HARNETT. One of the most public-spirited of the younger generation of business men of Long Beach is Ernest Thomas Harnett, the genial and successful owner and proprietor of the Long Beach mill. This notable addition to the commercial solidity of the county is the largest of its kind for many miles around, and under the capable and progressive methods of the present management has greatly extended its field of usefulness. Corn meal and graham flour are manufactured in large quantities, a modern sheller and the latest improvements in machinery being among the aids for carrying on the greater part of the work in this section. The principal features, however, are rolled barley and cracked corn, for the perfection of which he has recently added some of the latest improved cleaning machinery. The boiler capacity is twenty and the engine capacity is eighteen horse-power, and twelve tons of barley can be easily rolled out in ten hours. The mill was formerly the property of the Long Beach Milling Company, and was purchased by Mr. Harnett in 1897.

In his make-up Mr. Harnett embodies the sterling and substantial characteristics of his English ancestry, and he is himself of English birth, having been born in Kent county, near Maidstone, October 9, 1874. His paternal grandfather, Thomas, was a native of the same county, where he engaged in farming, and his father, Ernest, owned allegiance to the same historic part of the Albion isle. The father brought his family to America in November of 1889, and in January of 1890 located in Long Beach, Cal., near which town he is still engaged in ranching. He married Julia S. Berrell, a native of London, England, and who is the mother of fourteen children, one of whom is deceased. One of the daughters, Jane E., is a teacher at Long Beach, and a son, J. A., is at present in Long Beach.

The youth of Ernest Thomas Harnett was practically spent in Kent county, and his education was acquired in the public schools of Kent, and of the city of London. He was enthusiastically alive to the advantages of emigrating to America. After coming to Long Beach in 1890 he was interested in ranching for a number of years, and in 1897 entered the ranks of the mercantile business by purchasing the half interest of H. Taylor in the Long Beach Milling Company. He later bought the remainder of the concern, and has since been sole proprietor. Nor does the mill represent the extent of the interest of Mr. Harnett, for he is engaged in the interesting occupation of raising poultry, ducks and hogs, and derives a considerable income from this source of industry. He is a member of the Episcopal Church, of which he is secretary. Socially he is popular among those who are privileged to know him. In political affiliation he is a Republican, but has so far shown no disposition to enter the arena of political preferment.

ARTHUR H. HEBBARD. The steward and manager of the Los Angeles county hospital was born in Rochester, Minn., November 4, 1867, and is a son of Judge Daniel S. and Aurora T. (McManus) Hebbard, natives of Chautauqua county, N. Y. The maternal grandfather, Thomas McManus, a native of New York, and a large contractor in that state, removed from there to Minnesota, where he engaged in government contracting. During 1856 Daniel S. Hebbard became a resident of Rochester, Minn., where later he was a leading merchant and successful business man. His prominence in the community and the universal recognition of his ability led to his election as judge of the probate court, which office he filled for one term. For twelve years he filled the office of county auditor. Leaving that northern city for a sunnier clime, in December, 1885, he settled in Pomona, where he followed horticultural pursuits until his death, in 1898, at sixty-five years of age. Fraternally he was a Mason and in religion a believer in the Presbyterian faith. His wife is still living in Pomona. Of their six children, only one son and one daughter survive.

At the time the family removed to California Arthur H. Hebbard had completed his education in the Rochester schools and was ready to enter upon the activities of life. For four years he made his home in Pomona, during which time he assisted his father in the improvement of forty acres comprising their homestead. At the same time he also took up the study of electrical engineering. Returning east in 1889, he became electrician of the Water, Light & Power Company of West Superior, Wis., remaining with them for some time. In the fall of 1893 he came back to California, where he has since been interested in horticulture, and still owns thirty acres, under oranges and deciduous fruits, on Holt avenue, Pomona. In the work of the Fruit Growers' Exchange he has been very active, and for three years served as a member of its board of directors. In addition he is connected with the San Antonio Fruit Exchange, of whose board of directors he was once a member. For one term he held office as president and manager of the Del Monte Irrigation Company, in which capacity he rendered most efficient service. Since September of 1901 he has been manager and steward of the Los Angeles county hospital, having been appointed to the position by the board of supervisors. The hospital has one hundred and seventy patients and the supervision of its important interests, the oversight of all its work, and the maintaining of a satisfactory regime, leaves him little leisure for participation in outside matters, although he still retains his membership in the Pomona Board of Trade, superintends his property at that point, and keeps posted concerning matters of local and general political importance, casting his ballot with the Republican party. His marriage was solemnized in Los Angeles and united him with Miss Josephine McKay, who was born in New Orleans, La., and received her education in San Francisco.

JAMES B. HUGHES. Ever since settling in Pasadena in 1887 Mr. Hughes has been engaged in contracting and building, and meantime has erected many of the handsome residences of this city, as well as numerous business blocks and stores. Included among his contracts was that for the residence of Professor Lowe, which is one of Pasadena's most beautiful homes. He had the contract for all the mason work on the Mount Lowe Railroad and also erected the pavilion house. Since 1893 he has devoted himself particularly to street and sewer contracting, in which line he has had some large and important contracts. Associated with him in business is Charles Stansbury and they conduct the largest business in grading and street contracting that is done in the city. Among outside contracts were those for two sections of the outfall sewer in Los Angeles and the Storm water system in Redlands.

Mr. Hughes was born in Mentor, Lake county, Ohio, December 5, 1855, and was second among ten children, all but two of whom are living. One of his brothers, Moses A., resides in Ocean Park, Cal., and is a foreman for his brother, James B. The father, Benjamin, was born in county Antrim, Ireland, and there married Mary, daughter of Moses Barr, a farmer of the north of Ireland. Later the family came to America and settled at Willoughby, Lake county, Ohio, where the father who had been a contractor, turned his attention to contracting. Now, at more than seventy years of age, he is living retired in Mentor. In religion both he and his wife are identified with the Presbyterian Church.

When sixteen years of age James B. Hughes began to learn the mason's trade under his uncle, Thomas Hughes, which he afterward followed in the home neighborhood. He remodeled Lawnfield, the home of President Garfield, and at the time of his marriage to Emma Rynd, he and his wife began housekeeping in this home, which was vacant by reason of Mr. Garfield's service in the senate. Mrs. Hughes was born in Painesville, Ohio, a daughter of Lewis and Emily (Chalmers) Rynd, natives respectively of Germany and London, England. Her maternal grandfather, David Chalmers, was born in Kent, England, and followed the printer's trade. Her father was one of the brave soldiers of the Union during the Civil war, serving in the Twenty-ninth Ohio Infantry. Afterward he made his home in Painesville until his death. Of his four children, all but one are living, the three survivors being residents of California. Mrs. Hughes was reared in Ohio and received a fair education. In January, 1878, in Mentor, she became the wife of Mr. Hughes, by which union there are two sons, Arthur and Ernest. The older son is now a foreman for his father.

Interested in Masonry, Mr. Hughes was initiated into the Order in Pasadena Lodge No. 272, F. & A. M., with which he is still connected, and he now also holds membership in the chapter and commandery in Pasadena, the Council of Kedosh, the Pasadena Consistory, and Al Malakiah Temple, N. M. S., the latter of Los Angeles. With his wife he holds membership in the Eastern Star. While not identified with any religious denomination, he contributes to various church and charitable organizations, especially to the First Methodist Episcopal Church, with which his wife is identified. In political faith he is a staunch upholder of Republican principles and takes a warm interest in matters pertaining to local government and national issues.

JOHN HOWELL DARBY. As one who, during his comparatively brief sojourn in Long Beach, favorably impressed those with whom he came in contact in a business and social way, John Howell Darby is entitled to mention among the honored and successful members of the community. As evidence of his enterprise, and recognition of its desirability, the Darby House, one of the oldest hostleries in the place, and one which has longest catered to the demands of the traveling public, was built and managed by him after his removal here in 1891, and after his death, December 3, 1893, passed into the equally capable hands of his wife.

Of southern ancestry, Mr. Darby was born in Keatchie, De Soto Parish, La., and was a son of Drayton Darby, a native of Virginia, and an hotel man by occupation. The elder Darby lived for several years in Tennessee, but eventually removed to Keatchie, where he successfully managed an hotel up to the time of his death. His son, John Howell, was reared and educated in Keatchie, and his first business undertaking was as a merchant in Pleasant Hill, La., where he lived and prospered until 1887. He then disposed of his interests and removed to California, and upon settling in Downey, again resumed mercantile enterprises. Close confinement, however, began to tell on his health, and he therefore moved to a ranch southeast of Downey, and turned his energies to horticulture, particularly the culture of oranges. In 1891 he settled in Long Beach, and in the fall of the same year built the Darby House, a first class hotel, which in time became his special pride, and an all around credit to the town. He was enthusiastic and progressive, and made and retained many friends. No one better than he recognized the splendid possibilities of this well favored locality, and many enterprises for the general upbuilding owe their promotion and subsequent completion to his far-sighted observation and perseverance. He foresaw the benefit to be derived from the building of the wharf, and spared neither time nor money in pushing this really admirable and now indispensable adjunct to the town. With Messrs. Roberts, Wilson and Dunco he succeeded in overcoming much of the original opposition of the citizens, all of whom have since acknowledged the debt to those who were more keenly alive to the situation than themselves.

The marriage of Mr. Darby and Frances Jane Nolan occurred in Sabine Parish, La., in 1881, the Nolan family being an old and distinguished one from North Carolina. Mrs. Darby was born in Greenville, Ala., a daughter of Greenville Nolan, a farmer in Alabama, and who gave up his life for his country during the Civil war. He married into the Hammack family, formerly of North Carolina, and well known throughout the state, his wife, Almeda Hammack, being a daughter of Elijah Hammack, a minister in the Baptist Church. Two of the sons of Rev. Hammack started across the plains from Texarkana during the gold excitement of '49, but were never more heard of. Mrs. Nolan, who lives in Long Beach with her daughter, is the mother of a son, Elijah, who is a resident of this town.

Since her husband's death Mrs. Darby has proved herself equal to the emergency of running the hotel, and has not only kept up the former standing of the house, but has brought about many important improvements. Possessed of unusual tact and discretion, and many other needful attributes inseparable from the successful entertainer of the traveling public, she is well known and respected by the business contingent of the town, and her hotel is the rendezvous of those who desire good accommodations at reasonable rates. Besides her many cares and responsibilities in a general way, Mrs. Darby has found time to superintend the education and training of her ten children, all of whom are bright and interesting, and capable of looking out for themselves. They are named as follows: Arthur, a merchant in Downey; Sammie, Mrs. Clyde Harrell, of Plaquemine, La.; Howell, of Long Beach; Stuart, who is agent for the Texas Pacific Railroad in Louisiana; Gertrude, who is attending the high school of Long Beach; Nolan; Larrie, Raymond, Donald and John. Mrs. Darby is well posted on current events, and is a staunch friend of education and all around advancement. She is associated with the Society of Friends.

J. H. HOLMES. If one were asked to give the name of an institution or industry to which, more than to any other, Pasadena owes its present prominence throughout the United States, unhesitatingly the answer would be given "Hotel Green." Furthermore, when citizens of Pasadena are asked to state to whose influence this hotel owes its prestige as headquarters for tourists, all unite in attributing to the manager, J. H. Holmes, the credit for the gratifying popularity and success that has been attained. At the time of the building of the original structure, Mr. Holmes acted as secretary and treasurer of the Hotel Green Company, and in 1892 he was appointed manager. Beginning with only sixty rooms, there has been a constant increase in the capacity until there are now accommodations for five hundred guests. Every effort is made to secure the comfort of visitors. The large and sunny rooms, all with outside windows, present a cheery outlook, and the comfort of those who are fearful of fires is materially enhanced by the knowledge that the structure is wholly fireproof. To accommodate the employes of the hotel, two hundred outside rooms have been provided. Centrally located in Pasadena, the hotel attracts a large proportion of the multitudes of eastern tourists whom the bleak winters of trans-Rocky regions induce to seek the sunshine and fragrance of Southern California.

Tracing the history of the Holmes family, we find that James Holmes, a Pennsylvanian by birth, settled among the pioneers of Highland county, Ohio, where he developed a raw tract of land. A later place of residence was Athens county, same state. In 1882 he removed to Illinois, where his last days were spent at Nokomis. His son, A. H., was born in Highland county, and for some years carried on a store at Albany, Ohio, after which he settled in Illinois. Returning later to his former home in Albany, he resumed mercantile pursuits, and remained there until his death in 1892. The talents which he possessed fitted him for able service in behalf of the people, and at different times his party (the Republican) elected him to local offices of trust. His ancestry was English and Scotch, and the first of the family in America settled in Massachusetts, later going to Pennsylvania. He married Salonia Kerr, who was born in Washington county, Pa., and is now living in Albany, Ohio. Her father, David Kerr, removed from Pennsylvania to Ohio and settled on an unimproved farm near Albany. The Kerrs are related to the Crawfords of Pennsylvania.

In the family of A. H. Holmes there were seven children, all but two of whom are living, J. H. being the eldest of these and the only one in California. In Albany, Ohio, where he was born May 27, 1858, the years of youth were passed in attendance at public school and academy and in assisting his father in the store. His first experience in business was gained when he was only fourteen and afterward he continued to clerk for his father until 1881, when, forming a partnership with his brother, C. C., he bought out his father. Six years later he sold his interest in the business and came to California, settling at Altadena, where he took charge of Colonel Green's business. In the organization of the Edison Electric Light and Power Company of Pasadena he bore a prominent part and has since acted as a director, besides which he is a director in the San Gabriel Valley Bank and a stockholder in various other local institutions.

In Albany, Ohio, Miss Mary M. Dewing became the wife of J. H. Holmes, and of their union two children have been born, namely: Angie Green, now a student in Mount Vernon Seminary at Washington, D. C.; and John Dewing, who is attending Throop Institute in Pasadena. Mrs. Holmes was born and reared in Albany, to which point her father, John Dewing, removed from Massachusetts. In social affairs she is interested and active, and in religion is connected with the Presbyterian Church. Before leaving Albany Mr. Holmes was made a Mason in the blue lodge there, and after coming west he became a charter member of Corona Lodge, F. & A. M., at Pasadena. In this city he was raised to the chapter, commandery and consistory, and he is also connected with Al Malakiah Temple, N. M. S. He is a member of the Pasadena Board of Trade. Reared under Republican influence, he has always voted with that party, and while living in Ohio served as city treasurer of Albany for some years.

RICHARD LOYNES, manufacturer and brick contractor, living at Long Beach, was born in Jefferson county, N. Y., February 21, 1863, and is a son of Robertson and Dora (Carey) Loynes, the latter a native of England, and the mother of eleven children. Robertson Loynes was born in Norfolk county, England, and when a young man came to the United States and settled in Jefferson county, N. Y. He afterwards became a navigator on the steamers of the lakes, but eventually retired to the farm in Ontario which has since been his home.

When a babe in arms, Richard Loynes lost his mother by death, and was reared in New York state and educated in the district schools. When sixteen years of age he apprenticed to a bricklayer in Kingston, Ontario, and having learned his trade returned to the States and worked in Pennsylvania, Missouri and Ohio, in 1886 taking up his residence in Los Angeles, as foreman for Charles Tossell. In this capacity he superintended the brick part of the Bry son building, the Lankershim building, and numerous others, and in Pasadena was foreman for the Opera House and the White and Gilkes building. At a still later period he was foreman for the San Joaquin Brick Company at Stockton, Cal., and at the end of two years returned to Los Angeles and started a brick yard on Bishop street. He here manufactured brick until 1895, at which time he came to Long Beach and started in to manufacture brick for the Alamitos Land Company. The yard which he now owns was started in 1897, and is located one-half mile west of the city, but within the limits, and soon after its purchase Mr. Loynes moved into the town. He has since engaged in contract brick work, and among the buildings for which he has supplied the brick and put them in place may be mentioned the addition to the bank building, the two gas offices, the Stafford building and the Campbell building. In fact, he has had the contract for nearly all of the brick work in the town. In addition he has erected a fine residence for his family on Chestnut street, near Third street, which is built in the Mission style, and which is a distinct acquisition to the architectural beauty of the town. In Stockton, Cal., Mr. Loynes married Bessie Smith, a native of Wales, and of this union there is one child, Richard. Politically Mr. Loynes is a Republican.

E. E. LINDHOLM. The far-away country of Finland has given very few citizens to the United States, for seldom do its native-born sons stray so far from the snow-clad and lichen-covered hills of their childhood. Somewhat exceptional, therefore, to the history of his countrymen is the life-record of Mr. Lindholm, who was born in Finland June 6, 1864, and who is a member of an ancient family of that country. His parents, August and Mary Lindholm, lived upon a farm there, and the former died in 1865. The second among three children, E. E. Lindholm, passed his early boyhood years in Finland, but at fourteen years of age started out to see the world. Going first to England he made a short sojourn there, and afterward sailed for Australia, where he made his home for thirteen years. Coming to the United States in April, 1890, he settled in Los Angeles, and seven years later removed from that city to Moneta, his present home.

Since coming to Moneta Mr. Lindholm has given his attention closely to the improvement of his tract of fifteen acres, which he has mainly in alfalfa and on which he has built a neat house. The value of the place has been improved by the erection of a private gasoline pumping plant, with a capacity of sixty-five inches. Industry is a marked characteristic of the Finns, and the quality is not wanting in Mr. Lindholm's character; indeed, his patient devotion to the labor at hand is a conspicuous attribute. His neat homestead seems to have everything, with one exception, necessary to his well-being, and in time he may supply this lack by changing from the ranks of bachelors to those of benedicts. The welfare of his adopted country is near to his heart, and he is interested in all that makes for the happiness of his fellow-citizens. The principles of the Republican party have received his support ever since he became a naturalized citizen and he uniformly votes that ticket. Fraternally he is connected with the Independent Order of Foresters and the Knights of Pythias.

J. S. JOHN. Not the least of the distinctions due Mr. John is the fact that he is the oldest business man in Long Beach, and yet another and more vitally important one arises from an unusually meritorious service during the Civil war. He comes of a family of Welsh descent and long represented in Pennsylvania, in which state he was born in Washington county September 15, 1842. His father, Josiah, was also born in Washington county, whither the paternal grandfather, Joseph, had removed from the western part of the state. Josiah John was a farmer in his native state and county, but eventually removed to Ohio, where the remainder of his days were spent. His wife, formerly Albina Grave, was also a native of Washington county, as was her father, John Grave, a farmer by occupation. Mrs. John, who died in Pennsylvania, was the mother of eleven children, five of whom are living, J. S. being the youngest of those who attained maturity.

The youth of Mr. John was uneventfully passed on the paternal farm, and the first break in the even tenor of his ways was the culmination of the strife between the north and south. In 1862 he enlisted in a company of independent scouts for Company C of the Ringgold Cavalry, and saw extensive service in the Shenandoah valley, keeping vigilant watch upon all happenings in this now historic locality. In 1864 he became a soldier in Company D, Twenty-second Pennsylvania Cavalry, and in this capacity served until his mustering out May 22, 1865. He participated in the battles of Gettysburg, Winchester, Spottsylvania, the Wilderness, Cold Harbor, and many minor skirmishes, and experienced the terrible deprivations of devastating war times. In the mean time his father had removed to Salem, Ohio, and thither he repaired after the restoration of peace, and the following year removed to Illinois and remained a year in Iroquois county. In 1868 he became identified with Kansas, and homesteaded a claim five miles up Smoky river from Salina, where he farmed with considerable success until 1884. However, Kansas as a permanent residence place did not appeal to Mr. John with particular force, and he therefore removed to Los Angeles and lived there until 1887. He then became identified with Long Beach, and began in a small way the feed business which has since assumed gratifying proportions. Connected therewith is a large wood, coal, hay and grain business, which includes a power plant for working up the wood. The enterprise is located on Second street and Pine, and is not only the oldest but the largest of its kind in the town. The upright business methods of Mr. John have brought about the desired results, and his progressive and public-spirited influence has penetrated many sides of public enterprise.

In Salina, Kans., Mr. John married Lydia Goodwin, a native of Illinois, and of this union there is one child, Edwin M. Mr. John is a Republican in political affiliation, and served as city trustee for one term. While in Kansas he served on the school board, and in Long Beach he has exerted himself in improving the school system, and in promoting general educational facilities. He is allied with the Independent Foresters, and with the Long Beach Post, G. A. R. The confidence of the community of Long Beach has been sustained by years of faithful business service, and a deserved financial standing has rewarded the effort to make the most of surrounding chances.

ALVA D. S. MCCOY, M. D., one of the best informed and most popular physicians of Pasadena, was born in Arcade, Wyoming county, N. Y., May 24, 1871. His earliest youth was spent in his native state, but he was reared in Chicago, Ill., where his father, Judge Alexander McCoy, was a practicing attorney. Judge McCoy had an enviable reputation as an exponent of legal science in Illinois, and he was at one time district attorney of Peoria county. In 1887 he removed to Beaumont, where he discontinued his practice after two years, and in 1889 located in Pasadena. His last days were spent upon the tract of land purchased by him near the city of Pasadena, and upon which he died in 1892. His wife is still living.

During his second year in the Chicago high school Dr. McCoy removed with the rest of the family to Pasadena and graduated from the high school in this city in the class of 1891. He then entered the University of California and was graduated in 1895 with the degree of Bachelor of Science. His professional training was received at the Cooper Medical College in San Francisco, from which he was graduated from the four years' course in 1899. Through competitive examination he received a year's practical experience as house physician of the City and County Hospital in San Francisco, and at the expiration of that time located in Pasadena, where he has since engaged in a general practice of medicine and surgery.

Since coming to Pasadena Dr. McCoy has married Helen S. Crawford, who was born in Illinois. Dr. McCoy is a member of the Pasadena Medical Society and the Southern California Medical Association. He is a member of the Board of Trade, and is fraternally connected with the Knights of Pythias. In national politics he is a Republican. The doctor is one of the most genial and promising of the practitioners of this city, and although practically a new comer to social and professional ranks, has made many friends and won an appreciative practice.

J. A. MADDOCK. Lying in the foothills at Duarte is the attractive homestead of Mr. Maddock, who, though he owns allegiance to no flag save the Union Jack, is, nevertheless, an enthusiastic Californian, with the firmest belief in the permanent progress and prosperity of this great state. When he came to this country in 1886 he bought a ranch of thirty acres, later acquiring twenty acres at Azusa and planting the same in oranges. He is now the owner of a ranch of forty-two acres at Duarte, one-half of which is under cultivation to oranges. Two and one-half acres are in nursery stock, with ten thousand trees, embracing all the leading varieties of citrus fruits. On his ranch he has developed a private well, flowing fifteen inches, and providing an abundant supply of water for irrigation purposes.

The Maddock family is one of the oldest in Hampshire, England. Rev. Samuel Maddock was for forty years rector of a church there and continued in the ministry until his death. His son, Edward Knight Maddock, was born in Hampshire and in early manhood became a minister in the Church of England, in which capacity he went to India and for seventeen years officiated as military chaplain at Calcutta. Returning finally to England, his last years were spent in his native country. His wife was an American lady, Miss Lucinda Smith, and by their union three children were born, one of whom was J. A. Maddock, whose birth occurred in the East Indies December 3, 1848. Sent to England to be educated, he was placed in the Blackheath Proprietary School in Kent, where he completed the regular course of study. On starting out for himself he went to the Argentine Republic in South America and engaged in cattle raising and general farming on a ranch that covered two square miles, or twelve hundred and eighty acres. From there he went to Canada in 1878 and turned his attention to civil engineering, and has since filled the position of dominion land surveyor of Canada. From there he came to California in 1886 and has since prosecuted horticultural pursuits in Los Angeles county.

While a resident of Canada Mr. Maddock was united in marriage with Miss Agnes Whitaker, whose father, G. Whitaker, was for years the provost of Trinity College in Toronto. The children born of their union are named as follows: Arundel, Genifer, Arthur Gordon, Edna Helen and Margaret. In religious connections the family are identified with the Episcopal Church.

FERDINAND A. HEIM. To Mr. Heim is due an immense amount of credit for the success which he has made of his life, and for the courage with which he has faced discouragements and drawbacks. He was born in East St. Louis in 1870, his father, Michael, being a native of the Tyrol, Switzerland, where he was reared and educated. In company with his brother, Ferdinand, Michael Heim immigrated to the United States and engaged in ranching and dairying, afterwards going into the manufacture of rope in Winchester, Ill., and later in East St. Louis. They worked up an excellent trade in the Missouri city and had a large plant, which, however, was destroyed by fire in 1874. Nothing daunted, the brothers soon rebuilt their establishment and proceeded as before with ever increasing success, until the death of Michael Heim in 1883. He was a prominent financier and a director in the East St. Louis Bank. His death proved a heavy loss to his wife and children, who were not only deprived of an affectionate father and husband, but were, as well, the victims of the dishonest settlement of the uncle, Ferdinand. Owing to some laxity in the business arrangements, no partnership papers or will were found, and as the business had not yet been incorporated, they were at the mercy of their relative with no opportunity of redress. Little of what was due them ever came within their reach, the mother, formerly Anna Biel, being the heaviest loser. Mrs. Heim, who afterward married Mr. McArthur, and is again a widow, is now in business with her son, Ferdinand, and is a resident of Los Angeles. She is the mother of two sons, of whom George is in Elmwood, engaged in the wholesale liquor business.

Ferdinand A. Heim was but thirteen years of age when his father died, and at the time he was being educated in the public schools of East St. Louis. With his mother and brother he came to Los Angeles in 1887, and entered the business college, but before graduation they were sent by the uncle Ferdinand to a ranch in the desert, where they lived in the Indian country, one hundred and sixty miles from the railroad, for a whole year. Not being able to endure the loneliness and inconvenience any longer, Ferdinand A. returned to civilization, and engaged in the wholesale liquor business in Santa Monica for two or three years. He then started a soda-water manufactory and bottling business on a small scale, gradually broadening his business as trade increased, his plant being located on the site of the old Ramona mineral spring. The medicinal properties of this spring have received the endorsement of some of the greatest chemists and most learned physicians in California, and it proved particularly efficacious in rheumatism and diseases of the stomach. It is used as a foundation for the various bottled goods turned out by the manufactory, including Coca Cola Soda, Belfast Ginger Ale, and Sarsaparilla and Iron Tonic. They also manufacture a full line of fruit syrups and ciders for fountain use, and are able to meet any demand along their line, however varied or extensive.

In January of 1901 Mr. Heim started in the brewing business, and May 7, 1901, incorporated the Ferdinand Heim Brewing Company, of California, with his wife as president, his mother as vice-president, and himself secretary, treasurer, and manager. They built the brewery at No. 346 Avenue Thirty-nine, in East Los Angeles, and are manufacturing Weiss beer. A large concrete building houses the enterprise, and the bottling is done at a separate bottling department. The company has without doubt the largest trade in the city. Mr. Heim is prominent in many different ways in Los Angeles, and is public spirited. Considerable property has come into his possession from time to time, and besides residence property in Los Angeles, he has real-estate also in Santa Monica. He is a member of the Chamber of Commerce, and is fraternally associated with the Knights of Pythias, the Knights of the Royal Arch, the Fraternal Order of Eagles, No. 102, and the Foresters of America.

In Los Angeles Mr. Heim married Maude M. Cooke, who was born in Chicago, Ill., and is a daughter of B. J. Cooke, who is a piano tuner, and a pioneer of Los Angeles. Two children are the result of this union, Anna and Bartlette.

SANFORD S. SMITH. The name of Sanford S. Smith is not only connected with the most ambitious and extensive building and contracting accomplishments in Long Beach, but with the possession of practical moral and intellectual attributes, enthusiastically exercised for the general upbuilding of the community. As a prominent member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and as an untiring worker in the Sunday school, he has become known throughout the whole of Southern California, where his extensive and well-directed services have won for him the name of "Sunday School" Smith. As a prohibitionist also he is widely known, and his advocacy of total abstinence is as pronounced as it is convincing. The amount of good accomplished by Mr. Smith in his varied capacity as moral reformer is incalculable, and his influence is such as at all times and under all circumstances to command the utmost consideration from even those who radically differ from him in belief.

That the desire to do good is in a measure the result of example and inheritance is not questioned by Mr. Smith, who attributes many of his finest and most praiseworthy impulses to the training of a father for fifty years connected with the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He was born at Sanford, Broome county, N. Y., May 21, 1862, and is the youngest in a family of six children, five of whom are living. His father, Rev. Welcome Smith, was born in Binghamton, Broome county, N. Y., in which city his grandfather was a merchant during his long and active life. The Rev. Smith moved to Nebraska in 1878, and while in that state was associated with the Lincoln conference of which he was presiding elder, at the same time making his residence near St. Joe, Hamilton county. From there he removed to Grand Island, which was his home for six or seven years, after which he came to California, and is now a resident of Redondo Beach, of which town he is county recorder and justice of the peace. He is a Republican in national and local politics, and is fraternally a Mason. Although seventy-six years of age he is still hale and hearty, and promises to continue the precedent of longevity established by his ancestors.

The mother of Sanford S. Smith died when he was but seven months old, and at the time she was thirty-eight years of age. He was reared in New York state and primarily educated in the district schools, supplemented by further training at Onondaga Valley Seminary. In 1878 he accompanied his father to Nebraska and continued his schooling at the College Corner public school. He soon, however, began to learn the carpenter's trade, and having completed the same, worked thereat in St. Joe, and during 1882-3 was employed in a trade capacity by the Union Pacific Railroad Company in Wyoming, Utah, Idaho and Oregon, and was finally offered the superintendency of a division of the passenger coach repair shop. This, however, was refused, and after returning to Nebraska to be married in October of 1884 he came to California and settled in Elsinor, Riverside county, being one of the pioneers of that town. He here found a good field for the exercise of his trade and at the same time he bought sixty-one acres of land which he improved and upon which he lived for four years and two months. The boom which promised such a brilliant future was destined to end in disaster, and, thoroughly disenchanted, Mr. Smith removed to Santa Ana and engaged in farming and contracting for fifteen months. He then settled in Los Angeles and contracted and built and farmed for a couple of years, and also spent seven years at Gardena. In November of 1899 he located at Long Beach and began to build and contract, since which time some of the finest residences and most substantial public buildings have gone up under his capable direction. Among his most ambitious efforts may be mentioned the residences of J. M. Arnold, Alice Howell, Professor Frews, D. M. Brewer, Miss E. F. Burgess, the Evans home and Mrs. N. T. Waldron's rooming house.

In Nebraska Mr. Smith married Jennie E. Edson, a native of La Porte, Ind., and a teacher for several years in Indiana and Nebraska. Two children have been born of this union, Arthur Ernest and Welcome B. Mr. Smith is fraternally connected with Long Beach Lodge No. 327, F. & A. M., with the Knights of the Maccabees, the Modern Woodmen of the World, and the Independent Order of Good Templars.

REV. A. MOSS MERWIN, A. M. Significant of Mr. Merwin's patriotic ancestry is the fact that he is a member of the California chapters of the Society of Colonial Wars (in which he is chaplain), the Sons of Colonial Governors, and the Sons of the Revolution. Among his forefathers was Hon. Robert Treat, a colonial governor of Connecticut, a fearless Indian fighter and a hero in many a battle with the savages. Another ancestor, Col. Timothy Taylor, was a leading officer of the Revolutionary war, leading a Connecticut regiment of volunteers through many a closely contested engagement. Rev. Samuel Merwin (the grandfather), who traced his lineage to one of three brothers who emigrated from England to America and settled at Merwin Point near New Haven, was for more than fifty years pastor of the North Congregational Church of New Haven. His son, Timothy T. Merwin, was born in that city and after graduating from Yale took up the study of law, but later became a member of the brokerage firm of Merwin & Gould, of Wall street, New York. When a young man he married Hannah B. White, who was born near Danbury, Conn., and died in that state. Her ancestry, like that of the Merwins, was English, going back to the early settlement of Connecticut. Her father, Col. E. Moss White, a farmer and extensive merchant, gained distinction through his capable service as an officer in the war of 1812. One of the members of the family took an active part in the founding of Yale College, and it was at his home that a few public-spirited men gathered to organize an educational institution and select the text books to be used in the curriculum of study. In that unostentatious way was founded an institution destined to become one of the greatest in the world.

The family of Timothy T. and Hannah B. Merwin consisted of three children, namely: Augustus W., who became a manufacturer and died in Wilton, Conn.; Mary A., of Brooklyn, N.

Y.; and Alexander Moss, of Pasadena, Cal. The last-named was born in Norwalk, Conn., September 3, 1839, and was reared in New York City and Brooklyn. In 1863 he received the degree of A. B. upon graduating from Williams College and in 1866 was given the degree of A. M. from the same institution, while a few years later Yale College conferred the same degree upon him. On leaving Williams College he matriculated in Princeton Theological Seminary, where he prosecuted the study of the theology, graduating in 1866 with the degree of B. D. The ceremony of ordination was solemnized at Cornwall-on-the-Hudson, where he had attended a boarding school near the home of Nathaniel P. Willis, who had been a classmate of his father. While there he and his friend, E. P. Roe, were converted and decided to study for the ministry.

Immediately after his graduation Mr. Merwin went to Valparaiso, Chile, where for a time he served as supply preacher to a large English congregation. Meantime he studied Spanish, and at the end of a year was able to preach his first sermon in that language in Santiago, where he helped to organize the first Spanish Protestant congregation in Chile, and a year later also established the first in Valparaiso. During his ministry of almost nineteen years he started many missions, organized the first orphan asylum in Chile, and acted as editor of the first Spanish Protestant religious periodical in the country. With the exception of Rev. Mr. Gilbert, he was the first missionary in Santiago. At first bigotry and fanaticism opposed the work of the Protestants and culminated in the burning of their church property, but as the natives began to understand them better, the work of the Protestants became successful and they were highly respected. During all of these nineteen years Mr. Merwin returned to the United States only three times. In 1885 he brought his family back to this country and spent six months in Florida, but in 1886 came to California, where for six months he filled the pulpit of the Santa Barbara Presbyterian Church. The next year he came to Pasadena, where he has since labored as a minister among the Spanish people, and has organized Presbyterian churches at Alhambra, Lamanda Park and South Pasadena, besides which he is now connected with the Spanish churches at Azusa, San Gabriel and Los Angeles, also the Girls' Home and School in Los Angeles.

With the aid of two helpers, who are of Spanish descent, work is carried on in several other places. Mr. Merwin has published a number of tracts in the Spanish language, and has also secured the translation into Spanish of different religious English works.

Among the local activities with which Mr. Merwin is identified may be mentioned the Twilight Club, which he assisted in organizing and of which he has been president for six years. Ever since the organization of the South Pasadena public library he has officiated as its president. His home is a five-acre orange grove on South Fair Oaks avenue, where hours of leisure are happily spent in the society of family and friends, and in the supervision of his citrus interests. His wife was formerly Elizabeth Burnham, of Manchester, Vt., member of a very old family of New England and a graduate of the Montpelier Ladies' Seminary. They are the parents of two children now living, Mary A. and William B., and have lost three: Arthur, Elizabeth and Grace, who died at the ages of three, five and thirteen years respectively. The Chilean climate proved very unhealthful for his family, and it was with the hope that a change might be beneficial to them that Mr. Merwin relinquished the labors into which so much of his life had been put. It has since been a source of no small gratification to him that the seed sown by him in Chile has since been cultivated by faithful workers and is now bearing fruit in the upbuilding of churches and the conversion of many souls.

A. F. MESERVE, manager of the La Pintoresca Hotel at Pasadena, is one of the few very successful men in his line on the coast, and holds a justly responsible position. In thus directing his efforts into useful and creditable channels he is maintaining a precedent established by an enviable ancestry, many of whom attained to prominence and even distinction, and who claim as their most remotely authentic forefather Jean Mesesservy, who resided in the parish of St. Martin's, Isle of Jersey. The American branch of the family was first located in New Hampshire, and the Meserve farm of fourteen hundred and sixty acres on the Isle of Jersey testifies to the thrift and English enterprise of the first settlers.

A native of Jackson, N. H., Mr. Meserve was born January 26, 1863, his father, John P., and his grandfather, Colonel Jonathan, being natives of the same locality. The grandfather was one of the first settlers and largest landowners around Jackson, and won his title through connection with the New Hampshire regiment of militia. John Meserve was a farmer during his active life, and in politics a staunch adherent of Democratic principles. He died on the farm which he had done so much to improve, but was survived by his wife, who was formerly Louise Rogers, daughter of John Rogers, one of the pioneer farmers of the vicinity of Jackson, N. H. The Rogers family was also a very old one, and was presumably of English origin. Mrs. Meserve is still living at the old home near Jackson, and of her six children three are living, A. F. being the youngest of all.

A. F. Meserve was educated in the public schools of Jackson, N. H., and at Eastman's Business College at Poughkeepsie, N. Y. After his graduation from the latter institution he was immediately ushered into the business of which he has made so thorough a study, and came under the training of that veteran and thoroughly superior hotel man, General Wentworth. For many summers he was cashier of Wentworth Hall, and during the winter seasons was identified with various hotels, among the number being the Pineywoods Hotel at Thomsville, Ga., and the old Raymond, of Pasadena, of which he was steward four seasons, or until it burned to the ground, April 14, 1895. During one season Mr. Meserve was connected with the Frontenac at the Thousand Islands, St. Lawrence river, and for four months, during 1895-6, he made an extensive tour through Europe. In November, 1897, he came to Pasadena as cashier of the hotel with which he is now connected as manager, the latter position having been assumed in 1901. The La Pintoresca is one of the well equipped and palatial hotels of the city, and the genial and tactful manager enjoys the confidence and good will of all with whom he comes in contact.

In Bartlett, N. H., Mr. Meserve married Alice Chandler, and thus became allied with another old and prominent New Hampshire family, who had contributed their share towards the upbuilding of pioneer days. To Mr. and Mrs. Meserve have been born two children, Marion and Norman Albert. Mr. Meserve is a Republican in political preference, but aside from the formality of casting his vote, has never entered the arena of office-seeking. While in Jackson, N. H., he was for a time superintendent of public schools. Mrs. Meserve is a member of the Congregational Church.

WILLIAM L. NEWLIN, M. D. In point of years of continuous practice Dr. Newlin is the oldest physician now in Whittier, being the only practitioner left of those who were engaged in professional work on his arrival in 1895. During the years of his identification with the professional activities of the city he has become known through his careful diagnosis of disease and his skillful prescription of remedial agencies applicable to the case in question. While he has not accumulated a fortune, he has met with an encouraging degree of success and established a practice that is steadily increasing.

In Paoli, Orange county, Ind., Dr. Newlin was born October 4, 1843. His father, Thomas, who was of Irish parentage, was a native of North Carolina, and about 1820 removed to Indiana, buying land in Orange county. From there he removed to Kokomo, Howard county, Ind., where his death occurred at ninety years of age. When a boy he was given advantages exceptionally good for those days and the knowledge thus acquired he utilized in teaching school and in work as a civil engineer, but later in life agriculture formed his principal occupation. Upon the disintegration of the Whig party he allied himself with the Republicans, whose original principles he assisted in rendering popular. In religion he was identified with the Society of Friends, whose peaceful doctrines he exemplified in his quiet and upright life. By his marriage to Candice Love, who was born in North Carolina, of Scotch extraction, he had twelve children, all of whom attained mature years and five are now living.

Until thirteen years of age William L. Newlin remained on the home farm in Orange county, but at that time moved with the family to the vicinity of Kokomo, Ind., where he was educated in public and normal schools. At the age of twenty he began to teach, which occupation he followed for five years, not, however, with the intention of making it his life work, but with the object of securing needed funds for professional studies. For three years he read medicine with Dr. Pickett of New London, Ind., after which he took the regular course of lectures in the Eclectic Medical College of Cincinnati, from which he was graduated in the spring of 1872. Returning to New London he there gained his first practical experience in professional work. In 1884 he removed to Eudora, Kans., where the ensuing eleven years were spent in active practice, and in September, 1895, he opened an office in Whittier, his present location. While in Eudora he was made a Mason, in which order he is still actively interested, and he is also connected with the Ancient Order of United Workmen. As a Republican he has been interested and active in local party affairs, while in religion he is a Congregationalist and serves his church in the office of deacon.

The marriage of Dr. Newlin in 1868 united him with Miss Viola A. Wickersham, of New London, Ind. They have three sons, namely: Lester C., an officer on a sailing vessel; Carl E., who is assistant superintendent of the Scranton School of Correspondence at Oakland, Cal.; and Ross L., who is employed as salesman for the Armour Packing Company in San Francisco.

PETER LALLICH. Austria is the native land of Mr. Lallich, and his parents, George and Mary (Marich) Lallich, were likewise natives of that country, the former holding a position similar to that of mayor and continuing to be prominent in local affairs until his death in 1898. In the family of six sons and three daughters, the seventh in order of birth was Peter, born January 10, 1860. No pleasures fell to his lot when a boy, but poverty and toil early stamped their deep impress upon his soul.

J. H. Von Der Loh

While he was still a mere child he left home and entered upon a seafaring life, being for six years employed on sailing vessels and steamboats. The course of his voyages led him to South America, where he remained for seven years in the employ of an English syndicate. Leaving there he sailed on a ship to Pensacola, Fla., and from there came to California.

When Mr. Lallich arrived in this state April 15, 1888, he came at once to Gardena, where he has since made his home. His first purchase was large, embracing two hundred acres, but subsequent years of drought led him to sell much of the property, and his possessions are now limited to twenty acres. The land is under cultivation to barley and small fruits, principally strawberries, and is further improved by two wells. In connection with his other enterprises, he conducts a dairy on the farm, and is building up an excellent trade in this line. In religion he adheres to the Roman Catholic faith, in which he was reared. Fraternally he is connected with the Independent Order of Foresters and the Ancient Order of United Workmen. After coming to Los Angeles county he established domestic ties, his marriage in Wilmington uniting him with Miss Frances Ragusa, daughter of G. B. Ragusa, a native Californian. They are the parents of four children, Mary, Louise, George and John, all at home.

JOHN H. C. VON DER LOHE. Rosedale, which has a reputation as the most ideally beautiful city of the dead in Southern California, has, in the demand created by its vast possibilities, inspired a most loyal and fine devotion in its present superintendent, Mr. Von Der Lohe. A native of Germany, whence have come the greatest masters of landscape gardening in the world, he was born in Soltau, Hanover, October 27, 1865, and is descended from a titled family of ancient lineage, an authentic record of which has been kept for at least six hundred years. His father, Henry J., and his mother, Magdalene (Brooks) Von Der Lohe, were also natives of Soltau, and the former was a farmer up to the time of his death in 1870, his wife surviving him until 1880. There were five sons in the family, viz.: Henry, who is a farmer near Bertrand, Neb.; William, who is also a farmer in Nebraska; J. H. C., our subject; H. P. D., who was a cement contractor in Los Angeles, but who returned to Johannesburg, South Africa, where he was formerly employed by Oom Paul Kruger in building the Boer fortifications; and Frederick, who is employed by his brother, J. H. C.

In his native city of Soltau Mr. Von Der Lohe received a practical education in the public schools, and in 1881 came to America where, in Otoe county, Neb., he found employment on a farm until 1883. In the fall of the same year he came to Los Angeles in the employ of the Stengel Nursery Company, with which he remained until the opening of Rosedale in 1884. He then became assistant superintendent of the new enterprise, his uncle, John Vorwerk, being superintendent. The selection of Mr. Vorwerk for the laying out of the grounds and the general development of Rosedale was a happily conceived idea on the part of the management, for no more capable appreciator of the art of landscape gardening ever came to the west. He was a horticulturist, agriculturist, and floriculturist, and a graduate of that famous institution, the Heidelberg Agricultural College. Under the guidance of this experienced teacher Mr. Von Der Lohe worked unceasingly for the improvement of Rosedale, and upon the death of his uncle in 1894 he naturally assumed the responsible position maintained with so much dignity and satisfaction by the older man.

The ground upon which Rosedale is located was homesteaded in 1875 and laid out, but nothing definite was accomplished towards making it a practical enterprise before 1884. The management then bought seventy acres of land for $25,000, and added to this by a later purchase of nine acres, for which they paid $9,000. Of the eighty acres one-half is laid out and all is enclosed, and the wealth of flora, enchanting drives, shadowy nooks, and the highest art of the sculptor, are interwoven in one harmonious whole. In 1898 the management bought one hundred and forty acres of land three miles west of Rosedale, which also has been improved, and in time will equal if not rival its predecessor. To the care of both cemeteries Mr. Von Der Lohe devotes his entire time, and his interest is increased from the fact that he owns stock in both places. He is also interested in mining to some extent, and is the owner of a ranch of one hundred and sixty acres at Beaumont.

In Los Angeles Mr. Von Der Lohe married Amanda G. H. Warncke, who died January 1, 1896, and who also was a native of Germany, and born in Elmson, Holstein. Of this union there were three children, William, Alma, and Arnold. The second marriage of Mr. Von Der Lohe also occurred in Los Angeles, and was with Bertha G. D. Warncke, also a native of Holstein, Germany. Mr. Von Der Lohe is popular and widely known fraternally, and is associated with the Ancient Order of United Workmen, the Woodmen of the World, the Fraternal Brotherhood, the Modern Woodmen, and the Maccabees. A Republican in national politics, he has actively supported the best interests of his chosen party, and has held positions of trust and responsibility. He is a member of the German Methodist Episcopal Church, and is one of the board of directors. Mr. Von Der Lohe has a large acquaintance in Los Angeles and vicinity, and his valuable services in behalf of that portion of the city's welfare which is especially under his supervision, has met with appreciation from all classes.

NEWEL HARRIS MITCHELL. A pioneer of 1863 in California, Mr. Mitchell was born in Columbus, Ohio, December 10, 1843, and is a son of James L. and Harriet Newel (Harris) Mitchell. His paternal grandfather, Sylvanus Mitchell, who was of Scotch descent, served during the war of 1812 and later became a pioneer farmer of Granville, Ohio. The founder of the family in this country was his father, who crossed the ocean to Massachusetts and afterward served his adopted country during the trying period of the Revolution. From this ancestor later generations inherited the Scotch thrift, uprightness and high principles of honor. For many years James L. Mitchell conducted a store in Columbus and built up a wholesale trade that extended far into the south. It was the custom in those days to sell on credit far more than is done to-day, and when the Civil war disrupted the nation and overwhelmed the southerners with financial misfortunes his losses proved so heavy that he practically lost the accumulations of a lifetime of toil. The latter years of his life were passed in Granville; his wife died in the same town April 27, 1898, at the age of eighty-two years. She was a daughter of Rev. Timothy Harris, who was born in Williamstown, Mass., March 15, 1781, and received a collegiate education, afterward being ordained to the Congregational ministry. Removing to Ohio in 1808 he engaged in home missionary work there, building up congregations and preaching the Gospel in remote frontier settlements. A helpful Christian life passed into the grave when he entered into rest March 28, 1822, while still in the prime of manhood.

In a family of three sons and three daughters, of whom two sons and two daughters are living, Newel Harris Mitchell was the third child, and he alone of all the children came to the western coast. His primary education was obtained in Columbus schools, after which he studied in Denison University at Granville, Ohio, among his classmates in that institution being Judge Harmon. Leaving college in 1863, he started across the plains for California, starting from Granville March 22 and arriving in San Francisco July 31, via the Platte, Salt Lake, Reese river, Wellington Station, Virginia City and South Pass. Prospects were not very encouraging for the young fortune-seeker, who arrived in the far western port without even a penny. However, youth and energy form a valuable capital, and both of these he possessed, hence his penniless condition did not discourage him in the least. On a sheep ranch in Alameda county owned by his cousin, William Knox, he first secured employment, after which he was employed in a livery at San Leandro.

During 1868 Mr. Mitchell came to Southern California. After a year as a farmer and stock-raiser he built a barn on Center street, Anaheim, and opened the first livery business in Orange county. In 1870 he was elected the first city assessor on the incorporation of the town. During his business life he has met with several heavy losses through fire. In 1901 his livery barn was burned to the ground. He also lost by fire the Planters' Hotel in Anaheim, which he built, and of which he was proprietor. After its destruction he leased the Del Campo and conducted it for three years. In 1894 he bought the Balmoral of Pasadena, a three-story building, 75x120 feet, which he has since conducted under the name of Hotel Mitchell. During his residence in Anaheim he was one of its leading citizens and aided in the organization of various important local enterprises. He was interested in starting the Orange county fair and in laying out the fair grounds at Santa Ana. Some of the horses that he raised received premiums at these fairs; indeed, he was known all through the county for the high grade of his stock. As a committee worker he did much to advance Republican interests in Orange county, and he was also active in the lodge of Odd Fellows at Anaheim. His marriage in San Bernardino united him with Harriet Melsheimer, member of a prominent family of Berlin, Germany. They have two children, Willis S. and Blanche, both of whom are talented musicians. The son was a member of the Seventh California Infantry during the Spanish-American war and is now a practicing attorney of San Francisco.

Patriotism is one of Mr. Mitchell's prominent traits of character and the same love of action and desire to serve his country which led his son to offer his services at the time of the war with Spain impelled him to enlist in the Union army when President Lincoln issued his first call for volunteers. He became a member of Company I, Twenty-first Ohio Infantry, and served during the summer of 1861, being honorably discharged with his regiment at the expiration of his time. This spirit of patriotism has made him a loyal citizen of California. Indeed, no one is more interested than he in the state's progress. The old days of the '60s he recalls with pleasure, contrasting the appearance of California at that time with the improvements of the present day, and he revives old memories when associated with the members of the Los Angeles Society of Pioneers and the Southern California Historical Society, to both of which he belongs. In an early day he founded the Anaheim and Wilmington stage line, and Prof. J. M. Guinn was one of the men who arrived in Los Angeles on his stage. With the building of the railroad from Los Angeles to Anaheim in 1875 it was no longer profitable to run the stage, which was therefore discontinued. One of his recollections of other days is that of conveying Helen Hunt Jackson over parts of Southern California when she was here in order to secure material for Ramona, and the carriage in which she rode at that time was to be seen January 1, 1902, covered with roses, and one of the chief attractions of the Pasadena tournament of roses.

LEONARD PERRIN. In the list of banking institutions whose conservative records have given prestige to the financial standing of Southern California due mention belongs to the Pasadena National Bank. At the time of its establishment, in 1886, Pasadena had but one bank, hence its organization filled a need on the part of business men. During the years that have since elapsed it has maintained a record for careful investments, safe loans and the greatest precaution to conserve the financial welfare of depositors. In 1900 Mr. Perrin became president of the bank, which under his leadership has retained its high position in the confidence of the public.

The name of Perrin indicates that the ancestry is French. However, several generations have been residents of America, the grandfather of Mr. Perrin of Pasadena having been a citizen of Rochester, N. Y., where the father, Leonard, Sr., was born and reared. Removing to London, Canada, the latter there reared his family of eight children, all of whom are still living. Leonard, who was third in order of birth, was born in London, Canada, August 24, 1828, and in boyhood learned the occupation of a pharmacist, later was employed in a grain business. In 1864 he came to the United States, where his first home was in Waupaca, Wis., and in that town he acquired important and remunerative lumber interests. Subsequently he became interested in the banking business in New London, Wis. In 1894 he came from Oshkosh, Wis., to Pasadena, Cal., intending to spend the afternoon of life in leisure, but, after a few years of recreation, his fondness for commercial and financial activities reasserted itself, and he allied himself with one of the foremost banks of Pasadena. In this bank his only son, Leonard, is a clerk.

During his active business career Mr. Perrin has had little leisure for participation in public affairs, even had his tastes inclined him toward politics. Besides voting for Republican candidates he takes no part in municipal matters. His connection with Masonry began during his residence in New London, Wis., where he was initiated in the blue lodge. At this writing he is a member of Pasadena Lodge No. 272, F. & A. M., also the chapter, commandery and council in Pasadena and Al Malakiah Temple, N. M. S., of Los Angeles.

EATON T. SAMS. No member of the community of Pasadena is more unselfishly devoted to the promotion of all that is high in character and attainment than Eaton T. Sams, general secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association; nor does any reach so large a number of people from so admirable a vantage ground. With a splendidly vital energy he enters heart and soul into the lives of the members of this organization in Pasadena, which, from a comparatively small branch, has now reached a membership of nearly four hundred. The general equipments are of a superior order, the gymnasium and baths being excellent features. Those who have allied themselves with this noble work have every advantage accorded members in older and larger centers of activity.

To the prosecution of the duties of his present position Mr. Sams brings a wide business experience and a keen knowledge of men and affairs. His example is therefore not that of a visionary, but of a capable, enterprising and practical man, in touch with the temptations and possibilities of average human nature. He comes of rugged English ancestry, and was born at Hillsboro, Ohio, September 2, 1863. His grandfather, Professor Isaac Sams, one of the foremost educators of his time in the east, was born in Bath, England, in 1788. He brought his family to America in the early part of the nineteenth century and in 1824 founded Rock Hill Academy at Elliott Mills (now Elliott City), Md., of which he was president for many years. In 1835 he sold his school interests in Maryland for a large farm near Hillsboro, Highland county, Ohio, which he improved, and upon which he lived up to the time of his death in 1880, at the age of ninety-one. Nevertheless, while ostensibly an agriculturist, he did not relinquish educational work until after his seventy-fifth year, and during his long career as an educator had under his tuition many of the boys afterward the most noted in the United States. His last charge was a private school at Hillsboro, maintained in connection with the management of his farm. Politically he was an abolitionist and Republican. He was the founder of an Episcopal church at Hillsboro, of which he was senior warden for twenty-five years. His name is enrolled among the most superior trainers of intellect of his day and generation, his methods being in advance of many of his contemporaries.

The father of Eaton T. Sams was for forty years a pharmacist, having at the age of fourteen entered the drug store of Rushton & Aspinwall in New York City. So well did he succeed in his chosen occupation that at the age of twenty-two years he became a partner in the concern, and was thus interested until failing health enacted a change of occupation and surroundings. He therefore removed to Hillsboro, Ohio, in 1838 and while living on the paternal farm became prominent in general affairs of his locality. During the Civil war he became internal revenue collector of Ohio, his term of service extending from 1864 until 1868. During the latter year he removed to Tiffin, Ohio, and engaged in the drug business, which was disposed of in 1875, Mr. Sams thereafter living a retired life until his death in 1893 at the age of seventy-nine years. He was a Republican in politics, and, like his father, a member of the Episcopal Church. In 1849 he married Marianne Stuart, a native of Greenwich, England, and daughter of James Brown Stuart, a country gentleman who traced his descent to Prince Charles Henry Stuart. Mrs. Sams was a woman of broad culture and among other accomplishments spoke four languages. Her death occurred in Tiffin, Ohio. She was the mother of eight children, seven attaining maturity, and six are living, Eaton T. being the youngest.

From his seventh year Mr. Sams was reared in Tiffin and his education was due solely to the training of his gifted mother. While still a student he engaged as a clerk at the age of sixteen in a queensware store, and in time had charge of the tea and coffee department. When twenty-four years of age he became a member of the grocery firm of Unger & Sams at Tiffin, and in connection therewith filled the positions of bookkeeper and manager of the tea and coffee department. From 1886 until 1892 the firm maintained a large business in Tiffin and Mr. Sams was especially successful also as a raiser of fine poultry. He had a very pleasant home upon fifteen acres of land, and beginning with 1881 worked up a large and profitable business as a breeder of first-class fowls. He had from three hundred to five hundred of the finest stock on the market, and took prizes in all the principal towns of the state. He also shipped stock and eggs west to Denver and east to the Atlantic, and had all manner of appliances, including incubators and brooders, for the successful carrying on of his business. He disposed of his grocery business in 1892, and his chicken business in 1895, at which time his health was much impaired and a change seemed an imperative necessity.

Upon removing to the west in 1895 Mr. Sams lived for nine months at Riverside and located in Pasadena September 15, 1896. In December of the same year he engaged in the real estate business on East Colorado street, removing his headquarters later to South Raymond avenue. As in Ohio, his business energy and ability found ready recognition and he soon had a large real estate and insurance patronage. This enterprise was disposed of to McNally & Son in the fall of 1901. While yet a youth he became interested in the work of the Young Men's Christian Association in Ohio, and upon coming to Pasadena his enthusiasm was by no means diminished. So keenly did he make his influence for good felt that in 1897 he was appointed one of the board of trustees, and in 1899 became president of the board. November 1, 1901, he was made general secretary of the Pasadena Association. Mr. Sams is a member of the Pasadena Board of Trade, of which he was for two years a director, and he is in political affiliation a Republican, having maintained a lively interest in the new city charter fight. As a member of the Episcopal Church he has held every office in that denomination, and while in Ohio was for years superintendent of the Sunday School. He enjoys the universal respect and good will of the community, and no one more than he has promoted the moral growth of the city.

GEORGE DANIEL SNYDER. The genealogy of the Snyder family in America is traced to George W. Snyder, a native of Holland, who accompanied his parents to America shortly before the Revolution and settled with them in New Jersey, later, however, removing to Seneca county, N. Y. During the war with England he served as a scout under General Washington and experienced many hardships and dangers. Three times he was captured by the Indians, but fortunately each time was rescued or made his escape. Once the soldiers opportunely arrived just as he had been tied to a stake at which a fire was being kindled. When the exciting experiences of war were over, he resumed the quiet life of a farmer, and the remainder of his ninety-four years of life was happily and peacefully passed in the midst of the scenes of his boyhood in Seneca county.

Porter Snyder, son of George W. Snyder, was born in Seneca county and there engaged in farming, but while still young removed to Calhoun county, Mich., and improved farms out of raw land, also engaged in the building business at Marshall. For one term he was sheriff of Calhoun county. At the time of his death he was sixty-two years of age. After the death of his first wife (by whom he had two sons now living) he married Sarah Jane Eddy, who was born in Calhoun county, Mich., and is still living at Marshall. Her father, Daniel Eddy, went from New York to Michigan and became one of the very earliest settlers of Calhoun county, where he acquired extensive farm lands. In the family of Porter and Sarah Jane Snyder there were three sons and one daughter. Two of the sons, George Daniel and W. P., are contractors in Ocean Park, Cal.

Near Marshall, Mich., George D. Snyder was born April 12, 1859. In boyhood he learned the carpenter's trade, and after 1879 learned the machinist's trade in the Michigan Central Railroad shops at Jackson, Mich. Later he followed millwrighting until 1886, when he came to California. Entering the employ of the Southern California road as foreman of their building department, he took charge of repair work and the erection of buildings. Later he was made storekeeper for the track, bridge and building department, with headquarters in San Bernardino. However, much of his time was spent on the road between Barstow and San Diego. After the strike in 1894 he resigned and removed to Los Angeles to take up general contracting. From there in 1899 he came to Ocean Park (South Santa Monica), where he has since engaged in contracting and building. He has erected over one hundred cottages here, forty-five of these having been built in 1901. During that year he also erected, in twenty-four days, the Holborow hotel, a $10,000 job, closing the work with forty-eight men under him the last week. The rapidity with which the work was completed attracted general comment, and it is said the record he made at that time has not been surpassed, for a building of the same size. He owns three houses on Hill street and has other property interests in Ocean Park. The fact that he is not only a competent builder, but also a practical machinist and millwright makes his presence in a community of value, and his skill in these various lines is being constantly utilized. Frequently he is called to Los Angeles and other places to put up houses and public buildings, and many of these are from plans of his own drawing, for he is an architect in addition to a contractor and builder. While in San Bernardino at one time he met with a very serious accident and, indeed, was left for dead, but his excellent constitution enabled him to withstand the effects of the accident, although a sufferer for ten weeks.

In Jackson, Mich., Mr. Snyder married Jennie C. Keeler, who was born in Racine, Wis. They have two children, Alma and Clyde. Mrs. Snyder is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church and the family attend its various services. Fraternaly Mr. Snyder is connected with the Maccabees, the Mystic Circle, Ancient Order of United Workmen and Independent Order of Odd Fellows. In the Santa Monica Board of Trade he is a member of the executive committee. Although his father was a Democrat, he imbibed Republican principles in his youth and his first ballot was in support of Republican men and measures. This seems natural, when it is known that his first vote was cast within a stone's throw of the old oak at Jackson, Mich., under whose wide-spreading boughs the Republican party was organized. His interest in politics has been manifest in every community where he has made his home and at Ocean Park, his home town, he has served as a member of the city central committee, and as a delegate to various conventions.

GEORGE E. PLATT. That a scientifically conducted grade dairy is not only a congenial source of occupation but is as well a paying investment, has been practically demonstrated by George E. Platt, the representative dairyman of Los Angeles, and the possessor of what is generally conceded to be one of the finest dairies in the world.

A résumé of the career of Mr. Platt strengthens the impression conveyed by his success, that he is a man whom early good fortune passed by and left to work out his own unaided destiny. He was born in Waterbury, Conn., December 17, 1861, and comes of English ancestry, the emigrating members of which settled in Rhode Island. The paternal grandfather, Enoch, who was born in Rhode Island, was a brass moulder for the Ansonia Copper Company, and was a soldier in the war of 1812. Sylvester H. Platt, the father of George E., was born in Cheshire, Conn., and like his father was a brass moulder, plying his occupation first in Waterbury, and spending many years in the employ of the Ansonia Copper Company. A soldier also like his father, he fought for the cause of the Union during the Civil war, and is now living in Ansonia. He married Julia L. Hazzard, a native of Rhode Island, and a daughter of William H. Hazzard, the latter of whom was born in Rhode Island and was of English descent. Mrs. Platt, who died in Connecticut, was the mother of two sons and two daughters, three of whom are living, George E. being the youngest. A daughter, Mrs. Webber, is a resident of Los Angeles, and a son, Dr. B. C. Platt, lives in Philadelphia.

In the quaint old town of Suffield, on the Connecticut and Massachusetts line, Mr. Platt received his education in the public schools, and his first insight into the dairy business was acquired at Aguam, on an old New England farm. In 1881 he came to California and located on a farm in Sonoma county, where he engaged as butter maker, and, beginning in August of 1882, engaged for a year in horticulture at Sierra Madre. A later occupation was as an employe of the commission house of I. C. Goff & Co., whose stock business he managed, but which he relinquished in 1884 to start in an independent stock business. At the same time he formulated embryonic plans for future extensive dairy operations, and during the next three years bought and sold over one thousand cows in partnership with Platt & Co. After the dissolution of this arrangement he located on East First street and inaugurated a wholesale dairy, and began building on a large scale, his business being conducted under the name of the Enterprise dairy. In 1897 he purchased his present property on Stephenson avenue, and almost immediately expended over $16,000 in buildings alone. To supply his very large trade four teams and wagons are required, over thirty horses are in constant demand, and twelve hundred families receive the best milk obtainable.

To facilitate his enterprise Mr. Platt utilizes a farm of eight hundred and ninety acres of land, a portion of which is leased, and the remainder is devoted to pasture, alfalfa and corn. Five hundred acres are under the irrigating ditch, and for irrigating and stock there are two steam boilers and engines, one with a capacity of sixty gallons a minute, and the other with a capacity of two hundred and twenty-five gallons per minute. In the near future wells will be put down and more water developed. The main barn on the farm is 392x64 feet ground surface, with a wing attachment 40x104 feet. Two hundred cows may here be conveniently housed and fed, although the owner has about three hundred cattle, two-thirds of which are milkers. In the three silos six hundred tons of food may be stored and two hundred tons of grain, and in feeding Mr. Platt uses balanced rations supposed to give the most satisfactory results. There are special buildings to cool the milk, in which is a two-ton refrigerating machine. Among his cattle Mr. Platt has many fine Jerseys brought from the east, one hundred and twenty-five of which are registered, and he has five registered Jersey bulls, three of which are imported, King Marigold being at the head. In this ideal dairy retreat the utmost cleanliness prevails, and a fine system lightens labor and produces even and therefore expected results.

The substantial residence erected in Los Angeles by Mr. Platt is under the capable and hospitable management of Mrs. Platt, who was formerly Miss Emma Belle Sturdy, a native of McLean county, Ill. Of this union there are two children, Nellie Belle and Ethel Marion. Mr. Platt is a Republican in national affiliation, but his time has been devoted rather to promoting of dairy interests than to the seeking of official recognition from a political standpoint. He is a member of the Chamber of Commerce, and is the treasurer and one of the organizers of the Southern California Jersey Breeders' Association. He is also the treasurer of the Southern California Dairyman's Association, of which he was one of the organizers, and the first vice-president. He is fraternally associated with the Maccabees, and is interested in several of the social and other organizations in which Los Angeles and vicinity abound. Mr. Platt is a man who maintains his inherited and cultivated sterling New England worth, and in thus upholding in its best form one of the imperative and cleanly enterprises of a great commonwealth, he has won the appreciation of all who feel a just pride in their honorable and commercially strong citizens.

ABRAHAM H. VEJAR. The founder of the Spanish family of Vejar in California was Salvador Vejar, who was born in Mexico and came across the border to assist in the construction of some of the pioneer missions and public buildings. Being a plasterer and builder he was able to secure steady employment in the erection of the primitive adobe structures then in vogue. He was employed in the building of San Gabriel Church, founded by the Mission Fathers September 8, 1771, and he also worked on the church in the plaza of Los Angeles. At the time of his death he was quite aged, while his wife, Josefo Lopez, died of smallpox when one hundred and three years old. Both were strong and active up to the last. Their children were Magdalena, Pablo, Ricardo, Emilio, Crisostomo, Lazaro, Francisco, Nazaria, Ramona and Jose Manuel. Of these Ricardo was born in San Diego, Cal., and at an early age entered upon ranching pursuits, beginning with only a few cattle and a small tract of land. By wise judgment and great energy he gradually accumulated thirteen thousand acres and hundreds of cattle and horses. His residence stood near the present site of the Phillips homestead, and there, in addition to the adobe house, he had two stores. The house stood for many years and was a reminder of pioneer days and a mode of construction peculiar to those times. Verandas were built around the house, both on the first and second stories, and the stairs to the second story were on the outside of the building. One advantage the pioneers had over the people of the twentieth century was the abundance of water secured from the springs at the foot of the hills. For this reason stock-raising could be conducted easily and profitably. The Indians in the neighborhood were friendly, but they had trouble with the Indians that came from over the mountains, and they often came and stole their cattle. Wild animals abounded but seldom troubled the settlers; on the contrary, they furnished provision for the larder in days when other supplies were scarce.

The children of Ricardo and Maria (Soto) Vejar were Maria, Pilar Francisco, Ramon, Josefa, Antonio, Concepcion, Magdalena and Ignacio. The second of the sons, Ramon, was born in San Gabriel December 24, 1830. As his share of the estate he received two hundred and seventy acres, which he still owns. Ten acres of the property are in vineyard, while a small tract is in prunes, another in olives and oranges, the balance being in barley. He is among the largest land owners in Pomona valley. It has been his aim to improve his property and make of it a remunerative and substantial homestead. That he has tastes for the beautiful is shown in his care in laying out drives, walks and lawns, and in planting fruits and flowers so as to secure the most harmonious results. In this work of developing an attractive homestead he has been assisted by his wife, Teresa Palomares, member of one of the pioneer Spanish families of this region. They are the parents of the following children: Jose, who married Vicenta Yorba; Zoilo, deceased; Ricardo; Maximiliano; Francisco, husband of Francisca Yorba; Constanca, who was married in 1889 to Prudencio S. Yorba, of Yorba, Orange county, member of one of California's pioneer Spanish families; Ignacio; Estella; Ramon; Abraham, who was born in Pomona and has always made his home here, being recognized as one of the enterprising and capable young men of the valley; Carolina, wife of Manuel S. Carrizosa; and Riginaldo. The family are staunch adherents of the Roman Catholic Church and generous contributors to its maintenance.

WILLIAM A. PENNEY. Where Nova Scotia meets the Atlantic ocean lies the county of Guysboro, with a rough and rugged coast whose shores are washed by the ever-restless waves. The port of Guysboro possesses a fine harbor and is made the headquarters of fishermen and captains, fishing being the principal industry of the region. Among the men engaged in the coasting trade was Capt. Thomas Penney, whose active life was devoted to this work, but who now, at the age of seventy-four years, enjoys the leisure merited by industry and perseverance. His father was a sea captain, while his wife, Frances (McKough) Penney, was the daughter of a captain of Scotch descent. Among their six children there are two sons who lead seafaring lives. The youngest of their children is W. A. Penney, of Ocean Park, Cal. In the Nova Scotia town of Guysboro he was born March 17, 1865. From childhood he was accustomed to go to sea with his father and at the age of fifteen began to make fishing expeditions for himself. The life was one of great peril, for storms are of frequent occurrence on that bleak coast. Several times he was cast away and once his boat was burned to the water's edge, the life boats just reaching him in time to prevent an untimely fate.

Abandoning the sea at twenty-one years of age, in 1887 Mr. Penney came to California, where for three years he farmed in Colusa county. Next he served an apprenticeship to the plumbing business under a brother. In 1895 he began to work at his trade for the Los Angeles & Pacific Railroad Company between Los Angeles and Santa Monica, and still later served as inspector of the lateral sewers between Sixth and Seventh streets. On the completion of that work he turned his attention to general plumbing. At the time of the opening of Ocean Park he began contract plumbing here, and since 1900 has been a member of the firm of Penney & Rogers, who have practically all the plumbing in Ocean Park, besides doing an important business in Santa Monica. They have their headquarters at the corner of Lake and Hill street and are doing a successful business. Among other important contracts they had charge of the plumbing for the Kinney and Dudley water system. Mr. Penney and his wife, formerly Ora Jeanes, who was born in Alabama, have an attractive home at No. 1228 Third street, Ocean Park.

L. S. ROBERTS, proprietor of La Casa Grande at Pasadena, one of the finest places of the kind in Southern California, was born in New York City in April, 1846. The remote ancestry of the family was centered among the sheltering hills of Wales, from whence emigrated the first American representative, who presumably settled in Vermont. The family was enrolled among the martial hosts of Washington, and the paternal great-grandfather, Christopher Roberts, was the third man to enter Fort Ticonderoga after the surrender. The paternal grandfather, Martin, was born in Vermont; was a farmer on a large scale and a man of affairs, and was major-general of the Vermont state militia.

Charles Roberts, the father of L. S., was born in Vermont in 1809, and as a young man removed to New York City, where, for over forty years, he was engaged in the building material business in the old seventh ward on the east side of the city. His last years were spent in retirement in Brooklyn, N. Y., and his death occurred while on a visit at Bellefonte, Pa. He married Emma Sinclair, member of a Quaker family of Ellicott City, Md., whose father, John Sinclair, was an architect in Baltimore. Mrs. Roberts, who died in Bellefonte, Pa., was the mother of five children, three of whom are living, L. S. being the youngest. One of the sons, Charles, served during the Civil war as a member of the signal corps, with the rank of first lieutenant.

The education of L. S. Roberts was acquired in the public schools of New York City, his graduation at the grammar school being followed by a three years' course at the Princeton Preparatory School and a partial course at the University of New York. Owing to ill health he then engaged in educational work, first at Logansport, Ind., where he taught at the Academy for a year, and then at the Academy at Bellefonte, Pa., where he taught until 1869. He then started a private school at Glencove, L. I., and maintained the same for a period of four years, thereafter spending several years in teaching and recreation. In 1882 Mr. Roberts started his East Orange private school at Orange, N. J., and at the end of nine years disposed of the same, locating in Pasadena in 1891. Since then he has been identified with the Casa Grande, of which he made a distinct success.

In Bellefonte, Pa., Mr. Roberts was united with Maria J. Humes, a native of Bellefonte, and of this union there have been born three children: William Humes, prominent Mason of Pasadena, a graduate of the Cooper Medical College, of San Francisco, and one of the most prominent and successful eye, ear, nose and throat specialists in Southern California; Richard S., vice president and director of the Pasadena Hardware Company; and Elizabeth V. Mr. Roberts is a member of the Pasadena Board of Trade, and is in politics a Republican. He is a member of the Presbyterian Church.

CAPT. WILLIAM C. ROBERTS. The long service of William Chalmers Roberts as captain of the police force of Los Angeles was received with approval by the community, and his retirement, August 1, 1900, was accompanied by the sincere regret of all who had for so many years rested in the security of his ability to cope with the contending elements of a large and cosmopolitan city. Upon the foundation of a position requiring the greatest tact, knowledge of human nature and common sense he increasingly maintained a judgment in accord with his responsibility, and gained not only the confidence but good will of all who were associated with him in his effort to bring about law and order. At times, as in the past, he is still to be seen in the front ranks of the city's disciplinarians, and he may be relied upon in times of special stress, when the crowds tax the control of the regular working force.

The oldest in a family of seven children, Captain Roberts was born near Dayton, Ohio, September 23, 1839. His father, James, was born in Delaware. The paternal grandfather, also named James, settled at an early day in Cincinnati, Ohio, and died at the age of eighty-seven years. James Roberts, Jr., was for many years a school teacher in Ohio, and died in Miamisburg, Montgomery county, in 1854, while principal of the schools of that place. He was a devoted member of the Presbyterian Church. His wife, formerly Mary J. McClain, was born near Carrollton, Ohio, a daughter of James McClain, a native of Kentucky, and a farmer and early settler in Ohio. James McClain served his country in the war of 1812, and in later life removed to Schuyler county, Ill., about 1852, where his death occurred at the age of seventy-seven years. He married a Miss Dodds daughter of Gen. William Dodds, of Revolutionary fame, and whose son, Joseph Dodds, was killed by the Indians. Mrs. Roberts died in Illinois when about eighty years of age.

Her father was known as "Honest Old" Jimmy McClain, and her grandfather, McClain, was killed by the Indians when James McClain was a babe in the early days of Kentucky. Of the seven children born to Mr. and Mrs. Roberts three of the sons were old enough for army service during the Civil war. Charles served in the One Hundred and Fifty-first Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and died in 1899 in Macomb, Ill. He was a farmer in Schuyler county, Ill. Thomas enlisted in the Sixty-second Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and was raised to the rank of lieutenant, and is now a Presbyterian minister in Oregon, Mo.; Edward resides in Macomb, Ill., where he is engaged in building and contracting.

In 1856 Captain Roberts left his home in Ohio, where he had been educated by his father, and removed to Schuyler county, Illinois, where he found plenty of work to do on his Grandfather McClain's farm. At the time of his enlistment in the Civil war, in August of 1861, he had seventy-five cents to his name, yet this fact did not dampen his enthusiasm for the cause or interfere with his service in Company H, Second Illinois Cavalry. He was mustered in at Camp Butler and was sent to Paducah Garrison, Ky., later going to West Tennessee, where he engaged in cavalry dashes and skirmishes. At the battle of Holly Springs, December 20, 1862, he was shot through the body from side to side, and was laid up in hospitals until well enough to return to his home. After a three-months furlough he rejoined his regiment and participated in the campaign of Vicksburg until June of 1863, and was then discharged on account of disability resulting from a gunshot wound, which prevented his riding a horse. After returning home and recuperating he engaged in farming for a time, later turning his attention to painting, and still later to the music business. This latter occupation he followed in Illinois until 1880, when he located in Los Angeles in the employ of the Day Music House, a position which he maintained until 1885. He was then appointed policeman, and was continuously a member of the force until the time of his retirement. For four years he was a patrolman, and in 1889 was appointed captain of police, his service since having been marked by attention to duty, strict integrity, and unselfish devotion to the public welfare.

In Los Angeles Captain Roberts has a comfortable residence at No. 1614 Essex street, and his home is presided over by Mrs. Roberts, who was, before her marriage, Alice Brunner, who was born in England. Of this union there is one child, Charles. By a previous marriage with Elizabeth Ballou, who was born in Tennessee, and died in Pasadena, there were two children born to Captain and Mrs. Roberts, Frank, who died at the age of eighteen years, and Mamie, who is living in Los Angeles. Captain Roberts is a staunch Republican, and is fraternally a Mason being a member of the Southern California Lodge of Los Angeles. He is associated with the Stanton Post 55, G. A. R. Mrs. Roberts is a Presbyterian.

James M. Loney

JAMES H. DOVEY. A comparatively recent addition to the ranks of contractors in Long Beach, Mr. Dovey arrived here January 28, 1901, accompanied by such a firmly established reputation as a master workman that he has since spent no time whatever in looking for work. He makes a specialty of cement contracting, and coming to California in 1890 has accomplished much since in grading streets and putting in curbs and sidewalks, as well as the mason work and stone work of the foundations of large buildings.

In his youth Mr. Dovey had the example of an industrious and capable father, and of an exemplary home life. He was born in Syracuse, N. Y., June 5, 1861, and is the oldest in a family of fourteen children, all of whom are living. His father, William Dovey, was born in Axbridge, Somersetshire, England, as was also his grandfather, James, who was an hotel man during his years of activity. As a boy the father came to America in search of larger opportunity, and gradually became interested in the manufacturing business in Syracuse, N. Y., working his way up from the bottom round of the ladder. He finally removed with his family to a farm near Coldwater, Mich., where he died January 3, 1902, at the age of sixty-seven years. The mother, formerly Elizabeth Telford, was born in Ireland, and in spite of the care and responsibility of rearing her large family is still living and in good health.

After the family removal to Coldwater, Mich., in 1869, James H. Dovey lived on the home farm and attended the public schools, and in time learned the miller's trade at the Blackhawk Mill in Coldwater. After serving an apprenticeship for five years he removed in 1886 to Denver, Colo., and engaged in the creamery business, and in 1888 associated himself with railroad affairs as a fireman on the Denver & Rio Grande Railroad between Denver and Salida. After two years he located in Pasadena in the employ of the Pasadena Water Company, and helped to build their two large reservoirs, being principally engaged upon the cement work. This task finished he branched out into a general contract cement business, and many of the streets, curbs and sidewalks in Pasadena are the work of this master in his line. Among the foundations of buildings for which he received the contract may be mentioned the Dodsworth block, the Throop annex, and the Catholic Church, all of which were executed in a most substantial and skillful manner. In fact so extended were the undertakings of Mr. Dovey in Pasadena that it may truthfully be said that he accomplished more than any one other man in the same line of business. As heretofore stated he came to Long Beach in January of 1901, and has since had no cause to regret the change in his field of activity.

The marriage of Mr. Dovey and Helen Horan was solemnized in Denver, Colo., Mrs. Dovey being a native of Cedar Rapids, Iowa. Of this union there are four children, James Albert, William Henry, Florence, and Agnes. Mr. Dovey is a Democrat in politics, and while living in Pasadena was prominent in political affairs, serving on the Democratic City Committee. Fraternally he is associated with the Independent Order of Foresters.

CONRAD SCHEERER. One of the popular and successful German-American contractors of Los Angeles is Conrad Scheerer, who was born in Wurtemberg, Germany, November 25, 1861, his father, Bruno, being also a native of the same locality, near Ballingen. Bruno Scheerer was a carpenter in his youth and later became a builder and contractor, his entire life being spent in his native land, where he died when his son, Conrad, was fifteen years of age. The same year witnessed the death of his wife, Genevieve (Schmidt) Scheerer, who also was born in Germany, and was the mother of five sons and five daughters, of whom three sons and three daughters are in America. One of the sons, Joseph, is a contractor in San Francisco, while Clement is the manager of his brother Conrad's quarries in Oro Grande.

Mr. Scheerer was reared in Wurtemberg until his fourteenth year, when he immigrated to America by way of Hamburg, visiting the Centennial Exposition in Philadelphia, and later going to San Francisco, where his brother, Joseph, was a contractor. Under his instruction he learned the trade of carpentering, and was afterwards apprenticed to the trade of plumbing, in time becoming a master plumber. He then acted as foreman of the California Paving Company until the spring of 1887, when he resigned to locate in Santa Barbara. He organized the Santa Barbara Paving Company, and opened the asphalt mines at Carpinteria, and successfully continued in the business until his removal to Los Angeles in November of 1887. Since then he has been uninterruptedly successful as a contractor of paving cement, concrete and general stone work, and also for grading, sewer work and general city improvements. In December of 1899 he incorporated the firm of C. Scheerer & Co., general contractors, of which he is the proprietor, the office of the concern being at No. 237 West First street. The firm do a large business all over California, and are among the substantial and reliable business houses of the state. Mr. Scheerer has done much for his fellow workers, has anticipated their needs and formulated methods in accordance with their best interests. He is one of the organizers and the treasurer of the Cement and Concrete Contractors' Association.

A particularly shrewd and far-sighted business man Mr. Scheerer adapts himself readily to the opportunities by which he is surrounded, and turns them to the most advantageous account. His enterprise and strict commercial integrity have yielded him large returns for money and labor invested, and he is one of the large landed proprietors of Los Angeles. In the city proper he owns besides his residence at No. 832 West Seventeenth street, and his plant and yards at No. 718 East Third street, other business and residence property. In the country he owns a lemon and orange ranch at Vineland, a ranch at Riverside, as well as nine hundred and sixty acres near Piru, Ventura county. His ambition has extended also to the oil business, in which he holds large interests, and to extensive mine holdings in Southern California and Arizona. A Mason of the thirty-second degree, he is affiliated with Los Angeles Lodge No. 42, Los Angeles Chapter, Commandery No. 9, the Consistory and Al Malakiah Temple, N. M. S. He is also connected with the Benevolent Order of Elks No. 99, the Red Men, Foresters of America, Maccabees, Turn Verein, the Sons of Herman, the Chamber of Commerce, and the Builders' Exchange. In politics he is an uncompromising Republican.

In San Francisco Mr. Scheerer married L. C. Tossman, a native of the Golden Gate city, her parents being very early settlers of California. Two children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Scheerer, Conrad, Jr., and Myrtle J.

HIRAM K. SNOW, Jr. One of the most promising of the ranchers and horticulturists of Ventura county is H. K. Snow, Jr., who not only possesses a wide knowledge of fruit raising in general, but is likewise adapted to intricate business transactions, and has the true western spirit of progressiveness. No better illustration of the enterprise, patience and good judgment exercised by this honored member of the community need be advanced than the ranch and nurseries over which he has supervision, and which are in fine bearing condition and are profitable. Every tree and shrub was planted by the enterprising manager. Success of the business is the result of his wise and judicious planning, as well as the needful improvements. In connection with his father he owns one hundred and twenty-five acres of land under walnuts, and personally owns twenty acres of lemons, two acres under oranges, eight acres under apples, besides renting one hundred and fifty acres for beans, and eighty-five acres for beets. An attractive home is one of the features of the place made beautiful by vines, shrubbery and hedges.

A native son of California, Mr. Snow was born in Vallejo, Solano county, September 5, 1865, a son of H. K. Snow, Sr., who was born in New Hampshire, and Cynthia O. (Downs) Snow, who was born in Wisconsin. The family history appears elsewhere in this volume. In 1888 Mr. Snow married Minnie Norman, daughter of Robert Norman, a native of South Carolina, and who came to California at the age of ten and married while living at Tustin. Of the union of Mr. Snow and Miss Norman there are two boys, Ralph M. and Robert S. H., who are now attending school at Oxnard, and who will receive every possible educational and other advantages. Mr. Snow is a Republican in politics, and cast his first presidential vote for Benjamin Harrison. He has been prominent in local and county political affairs, and has served as delegate to numerous state and county conventions. For the past five years he has been affiliated with the Masonic fraternity, having joined the organization at Hueneme, and now a member of the Oxnard lodge, and is a member of the club having charge of the construction of the new Masonic Temple. He is also a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows in Orange county.

WILLIAM R. STAATS. The numerous and firmly established undertakings upon which rests the splendid business reputation of William R. Staats, investment banker and broker of Pasadena, bespeak personal characteristics which find their highest expression and greatest appreciation among the prolific opportunities of the far west. As the name implies, the Staats family is first heard of in Holland, from which conservative country one Major Abram Staats emigrated to America in 1642. He settled in Rensselaerwyck and in 1643 became a member of the council of the colony. He was a surgeon and for a time practiced his profession, but soon engaged in the trading and freighting business on the Hudson river between Albany and New York. He accumulated considerable property and in later years settled on his large plantation near what is now the town of Claverack. Abram Lansing Staats, the paternal grandfather of William R., was a merchant in Troy, N. Y., and later removed to New York City. His son, Henry T., the father of William R., was born in Hudson, N. Y., and was a graduate of the Wesleyan University at Middletown, Conn. Later he entered the ministry of the Congregational denomination, in which he preached for many years in Connecticut, and in 1888 removed to Pasadena, where he has since been pastor of the North Congregational Church. He married Mary J. Macy, a native of Hudson, N. Y., and member of an old Massachusetts Quaker family of Nantucket. Mrs. Staats died in Connecticut, leaving four sons and two daughters, of whom William R. is the third son.

The youth of Mr. Staats was spent in New Haven and Bristol, Conn. He was born in Orange, New Haven county, in August, 1867. He attended the public schools in Bristol and afterward studied at the Wesleyan Academy at Wilbraham, Mass. Mr. Staats came to Pasadena in 1886 and entered into the real-estate business, which has since assumed such large proportions. The business was incorporated in 1894 under the firm name of the William R. Staats Company, of which Mr. Staats is president, and is doing a general real-estate, insurance and investment business. This enterprise, however, represents but a minor part of the commercial ventures of Mr. Staats, who is one of the organizers of the Title, Insurance & Trust Company, the Los Angeles Trust Company, and the Edison Electric Company of Los Angeles, in all of which he is a director and influential factor. He is a member of the Pasadena Board of Trade and the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce.

Since residing in Pasadena Mr. Staats has married Mrs. Helen I. Watson, a native of Toledo, Ohio. Mr. Staats is as well known socially as he is in the business world of Pasadena, and takes an active interest in outdoor sports, and the general amusements prevalent in the west. He was one of the organizers, and for years has been a director of the Pasadena Country Club, a director in the Valley Hunt and member of the California Club of Los Angeles. Fraternally he is associated with the Masons. He is one of the most thoroughly successful men in Southern California, and is as genial and popular as he is liberal and enterprising.

PERRY WHITING. An industry which goes hand in hand with the building up of a city is the business of wrecking the handiwork already accomplished, and which is often overlooked in enumerating the forces responsible for the splendid structures of the present. And yet renewal must be attended by removal, else we had always the old with us, and the architects and builders of America would be in the sorry straits of their brothers across the water. In this connection the work of the Whiting Wrecking Company is justly entitled to mention and consideration, for they have removed more of the early architecture than any other firm in the city of Los Angeles, and have paved the way for builders with ideas of safety, sanitation, and convenience, than which nothing was more remote from the ideas of their predecessors in business.

Perry Whiting, the organizer and manager of the Whiting Wrecking Company, and the Whiting Lumber and Supply Company, was born in North Branch, Lapeer county, Mich., April 21, 1868, a son of Ryerson and Melissa (Healey) Whiting, natives respectively of Michigan and Nova Scotia. The paternal grandfather, Samuel, was born in New York, and was one of the first settlers of Lapeer county, where he conducted a farm for many years, and where he is now living at North Branch, at the age of eighty-two years. He married a Miss Swartout. Ryerson Whiting was a lumberman in Charlevoix county, Mich., and died at the early age of twenty-four years. His wife was a daughter of Charles Healey, of Halifax, Nova Scotia, who settled in Charlevoix county, Mich., where he was a pioneer and accumulated considerable property, and where he was killed in a wind-storm. Mrs. Whiting, who now lives in Grand Rapids, Mich., had but one child, Perry. She still owns the old farm in Charlevoix county, where her son was reared, and near which he was educated in the public schools, a training supplemented by study in the Grand Rapids high school.

In the fall of 1890 Mr. Whiting left the surroundings of his youth and went to Denver, Colo., where he followed the carpenter's trade, and where he contracted and built until the fall of 1891. He then removed to Grand Junction, Colo., and engaged in the mercantile business and also managed an hotel, ventures which seem to have proved unsuccessful, for upon arriving in Los Angeles in 1893 he had but $35 in available assets. For a year he worked at his trade, and this opened the way for later building and contracting which he followed until 1898. He then started the wrecking company, and in January of 1902 organized the Whiting Lumber and Supply Company, into which has been merged the wrecking concern. A large and increasing business has rewarded the well laid plans of Mr. Whiting, and the amount of building materials supplied by the company in the course of a year argues well for the confidence entertained for the management by the public of Los Angeles. An average of thirty employes is sustained the year round, and eight teams are required to deliver goods and do the general hauling. Mr. Whiting has other interests besides those which claim his principal attention, and he is an appreciator of the oil possibilities of the state, in support of which statement he has invested in stock in the Pure Oil Company, of which concern he is a director. In addition to tearing down some of the old landmarks in the city, he has built up many parts of the town, and is the owner of much valuable city real-estate. He has also taken down buildings in Pasadena, and has done similar work in other towns of the locality.

In Wichita, Kans., Mr. Whiting married Ada

Pearl Barrick, who was born in Blue Mound, Macon county, Ill., a daughter of Jonah Barrick, a pioneer of Macon county, and now a resident of Los Angeles. To Mr. and Mrs. Whiting have been born two children, Darrell, who died in Denver, and Ila Ione. Mr. Whiting is fraternally associated with Los Angeles Masonic Lodge No. 42, Los Angeles Chapter No. 9, R. A. M., Los Angeles Commandery, K. T., and the Fraternal Brotherhood. He is a Republican in political affiliation, a member of the Chamber of Commerce, and identified with the Westlake Methodist Episcopal Church, of which he is a steward. Mr. Whiting is one of the admirable citizens and successful business men of Los Angeles, and his response to public demands upon his purse and time is the most forcible reminder of his vital influence in all matters of importance in the community.

BENJAMIN F. WHIPP. One of the beautiful homes of Pomona is owned and occupied by Mr. Whipp. On selecting a suitable location for his family he purchased the residence at one time owned by E. E. Cole at No. 933 North Garey avenue. Under his supervision the residence has been remodeled and enlarged and is now an attractive and commodious dwelling, surrounded by grounds that always attract the admiring attention of passers-by. Especial attention is given to cultivating rare species of plants, and these are propagated in his greenhouse and then transplanted to the gardens. Among other interesting features of his collection may be mentioned one hundred varieties of rare cacti, some of which are not to be found elsewhere in Southern California. By the exercise of refined taste in the arrangement of flowers and shrubs the lawns have been transformed into a bower of beauty, and with the walks and drives show what can be done in this region toward making an ideal home.

In Sweetwater, Menard county, Ill., Mr. Whipp was born in 1840. At the age of fourteen he entered the merchandise establishment of his uncle at Sweetwater, going to school at the same time. He was engaged in merchandising in Illinois and Missouri for a short time, where he met with the success that his ability and wise judgment merited, but later turned his attention to farming. Learning much about the splendid climate of Southern California he came to the state on a prospecting tour and settled in Los Angeles in 1884. He staid there about fourteen months, when, hearing of an excellent opening in Pomona, he came here and bought one hundred and forty choice acres from the Jacoby Land Company. On this tract he has since engaged in the raising of alfalfa, of which he cuts from six to eight crops a year, the same being of fine quality. A portion of the property has never been under irrigation, but, being low land, retains the moisture from the infrequent rains, and has yielded more to the acre than that portion which is under irrigation. Besides this property he is the owner of fifty acres at Spadra, which his son now controls.

It was Mr. Whipp's intention to retire permanently from business pursuits on leaving Los Angeles, but he has occasionally taken up such work temporarily. At one time he purchased a stock of merchandise of Morris & Post and closed out the same to good advantage. At another time he purchased the Wakefield shoe store, which he also closed out advantageously. However, with these exceptions, he has held aloof from business enterprises and has devoted his attention to alfalfa-growing and to the society of family and friends. For many years he has been a member of the Christian Church and a regular contributor to its maintenance, besides which he has rendered helpful service in the capacity of deacon. While living in Missouri he married Miss Lucy J. Callaway of Callaway county. The thirteen children comprising their family are as follows: Ella, wife of J. W. Campbell; Flora, at home; John, who married Annie Long; Sallie, wife of Arthur Hazelwood; Ida, who is with her parents; Lizzie, Mrs. Grant Pitzer; Carrie, who married James Hicks; Bertha, Mrs. Loran Hardesty; Ernest, who married Louella Buff; Melissa, Effie, Elsie and Lottie, who are students in the Pomona schools.

JOHN B. WILKINSON, horticulturist and real estate dealer of Pasadena, was born in South Boston, Mass., October 29, 1857, and is a son of George and Harriet (Butterworth) Wilkinson, natives of England, and the latter born in Coventry. George Wilkinson received the substantial early training of the average English youth of the middle class, and after completing his education at the public schools learned the silversmith's trade. This he applied as a means of livelihood for some time in his native land, and was equally successful with his trade after removing to Boston, Mass. For a time he lived in Providence, R. I., and while there was identified with the Gorham Manufacturing Company until his retirement. He was a master silversmith, and had a particular fitness for his work, and was a man of high character. He lived to be seventy-four years of age. His wife, who died in Providence, R. I., was the mother of twelve children, eleven of whom attained maturity, and ten are living, John B. being sixth in order of birth, and, with his sister, the only members of the family in California.

In Providence, R. I., John B. Wilkinson attended the public schools and the Friends' school, and from earliest boyhood learned considerable from his father of the silversmith's business. In 1879 he removed to Chicago, Ill., and engaged in the manufacture of jewelry store fittings, his place of business being located on Madison street, and conducted with his brother W. S. as a partner. The brothers became well known in Chicago as conservative and reliable business men, and their special line of activity netted them gratifying results. In 1895 Mr. Wilkinson sold out his business and came to Pasadena, and the following year bought his present place south of Lamanda Park, which contains six and a half acres located on Rose avenue and San Pasqual street. He is engaged in horticulture and the poultry business, and the latter especially is conducted on a large and scientific scale. In 1902 he embarked also in the real estate business on West Colorado and De Lacey streets and has already handled considerable property in the city.

In Chicago, Ill., Mr. Wilkinson married Anna K. Ford, a native of Troy, N. Y. Of this union there are four children, Alice W., Harriet B., John B., Jr., and Russell F. Mr. Wilkinson is a Republican in politics, and is fraternally connected with the Independent Foresters. He is a member of the Episcopal Church.

J. W. WOOD, M. D. At the time of Dr. Wood's arrival in Long Beach, in October, 1887, he found a town of five hundred inhabitants. During the years immediately following, the decadence of the boom rendered any development of local resources impossible, but with the revival of prosperity throughout Southern California, with the drawing to it of men of wealth and enterprise from all parts of the country, and with the building up of homes and business industries, every town became a participant in the general growth, and Long Beach in its turn took on new life, since which time its prosperity has been continuous. From the time of the city's incorporation until 1898 Dr. Wood served as health officer, after which he was for two years a member of the city council. Since 1894 he has been a member of the school board, of which he was clerk two terms, and in 1897 he took an active part in the erection of the high school building. He is a stockholder and director in the Bank of Long Beach. At the time of the organization of the First National Bank he became a stockholder and continues his interest in the same. He is a stockholder and director of the Long Beach Hotel Company that built the finest hotel in the city. Besides taking part in the organization of the Piru King Mining Company, he has acted as its president since its establishment. In addition to his other interests, he is president of the Chuckawalla Mining, Milling and Water Company operating in Riverside county. His connection with various local business concerns and municipal affairs and his membership in the Board of Trade, does not prevent his devotion to professional duties nor interfere with his success as a physician. He is a member of the Los Angeles County, Southern California and American Medical Associations, head physician for the local lodge, Independent Order of Foresters; physician for the Modern Woodmen of America and the Knights of Maccabees in Long Beach; also local surgeon for the Southern Pacific Railway Company and the Long Beach division of the Salt Lake Railroad Company. In his private practice he makes a specialty of surgery and gynecology. He has his office in the Coughran block.

From Newcastle, England, John Wood came to America and settled near Geneva, N. Y., where he improved a farm from the woods. This property was inherited by his son, John M., who was born there and continued to make the old farm his home until his death, in August, 1901, at eighty-three years of age. During his active years he devoted himself to cultivating its four hundred acres and to discharging his duties as a citizen, an elder in the Presbyterian Church, and a kind husband and father. His marriage united him with Rebecca Rupert, who was born two miles from Geneva, N. Y., and died in 1867. Of this marriage there was one son, our subject. By a previous marriage there were four sons and one daughter. The oldest son, John Henry, was a soldier in the One Hundred and Twenty-sixth New York Cavalry during the Civil war and now lives near Cincinnati, Ohio; Dr. G. A., a graduate of Long Island Medical College, became a resident of Long Beach in 1886, founded the first drug store here, and died in Los Angeles in 1893; Philip R. lives in Rockford, Ill.; Denton D. occupies the old homestead; J. W., who was born in 1856 near Geneva, began the study of medicine in his native town, and later studied under Dr. S. L. Kilmer, of South Bend, Ind., after which he was a student in Rush Medical College, Chicago, for two years. The degree of M. D. was conferred upon him at the time of his graduation from the College of Physicians and Surgeons, Chicago, in 1883. Ten years later he returned to Chicago and took a course of lectures in the Post-Graduate College.

The first active experience of Dr. Wood as a physician was gained in Palestine, Tex., and Juniata, Adams county, Neb., from which latter point he came to Long Beach, Cal. During his service as health officer here he secured the passage of many sanitary measures and was influential in improving the general condition of the town. By his party (the Republican) he has been chosen a delegate to state and county conventions, and has been an active worker in its behalf. His home at No. 125 Cedar avenue is presided over by his wife, nee May McDonald, whom he married in Nebraska in 1884 and who was born in South Bend, Ind., of Scotch descent. They have two children, Edith M. and Donald.

JAMES F. WARD. The alternating periods of success and adversity which fall to the lot of all miners have been experienced by Mr. Ward, who not only understands the feeling occasioned by realizing thousands of dollars from a mine in a single day, but also appreciates the less attractive position of being without money in a land of strangers. The fascination of mining still clings to him, and, although he makes his home in Los Angeles, he still enjoys a visit to his mine, which he patented a few years ago and is now developing.

Early in the nineteenth century Christopher Ward crossed the ocean from England, bringing with him his wife, who was a native of Ireland. Having learned the stone-cutter's trade at his English home he experienced no difficulty in securing employment at this occupation, which he followed in Albany, N. Y. Through his perseverance and energy he became the owner of a large stone yard and filled large contracts, in which he employed as many as one hundred and fifty men. When he died at the age of fifty-one he was accounted one of the prosperous men of Albany. His wife had died when their son James F. was six months old, and the latter, born in Albany, N. Y., March 16, 1835, grew up without the devoted and loving care of a mother. Lacking the counsel of a mother and misunderstood by his father, he became a reckless and wild lad. When he was fourteen his father punished him for some offense and he ran away from home. He had learned the carver's trade and secured employment at this in Saratoga, N. Y., but soon learned that his father had detectives looking for him, so gave up his work and went to Fort Edwards and then to Chicago, Ill. Both of these places, however, he left to keep from being taken back home. Hoping to get beyond the reach of his father he went to Missouri and from there crossed the plains with Sheppard, driving a band of horses to Sacramento.

In 1859, when making his fourth trip across the plains with the Sheppards, five of the party of fourteen were killed by Indians, including Mr. Sheppard himself and two of his sons. They were murdered in the neighborhood of the Mountain Meadow massacre. After killing the men the savages took the horses and also robbed the wagons of the freight. Fortunately they overlooked some money hidden in a wagon and with this Mr. Ward bought three yoke of oxen and thus was enabled to convey the balance of the party to a place of safety. On his return to California he resumed mining and prospecting and developed a number of mines there, also several in Idaho and Nevada. In November, 1869, he located Mineral Hill mine, which two years later he sold for $500,000. Feeling the need of some recreation after his years of western life he made a tour of Europe, visiting many points of historic interest. During that trip he married Miss Agnes N. Fleming, a native of Canada. In December, 1872, he brought his wife to Los Angeles, and they now reside at No. 1121 South Grand avenue, having with them their five children.

Among the first purchases made by Mr. Ward in Los Angeles was the block of five acres between Eleventh and Twelfth streets and Hope and Grand avenue, the greater part of which he still owns. In 1873 he built a two-story frame house for his family, selecting as a site for the same a desirable location on Grand avenue, which was at that time the finest residence street in the city. Besides his real estate in Los Angeles he owns large ranches in the vicinity. His time is principally spent on his farms or at his mine. City life does not appeal to him, and especially is this the case since Los Angeles has increased so greatly in population that where years ago he knew everyone, now he can walk for many blocks without seeing a familiar face, thus giving to him, as he says, the feeling of a "tenderfoot." In former days he took great pleasure in his horses, and raised and owned some of the best and fastest in the entire city. At no time has he been active in politics, but he keeps well posted in such matters and votes with the Republican party. He is a member of the Pioneer Society of Southern California and a contributor to the Presbyterian Church, with which his wife and children are identified.

HON. JAMES A. GIBSON, member of the law firm of Bicknell, Gibson & Trask, of Los Angeles, is a descendant of Scotch-Irish ancestors who were identified with the colonial history of New England. While still a mere boy he gratified his desire for a taste of ocean life and made a cruise on the sea. When he was seventeen he was given employment in a large manufacturing establishment in Massachusetts, and rose, by gradual steps, until he was placed in charge of one of the departments.

Resigning his position in 1874 he came to California, settling first in San Francisco, but later going to San Bernardino. While in the east he had commenced the study of law, and this he completed after coming to California. June 13, 1879, he was admitted to the bar in the district court of San Bernardino county, and later he was admitted to practice before the supreme court of the state; afterward to the supreme and federal courts of the United States. After having carried on a private practice in San Bernardino for a time he was elected judge of the superior court of that county. His discharge of official duties was thorough and gratifying. May 3, 1889, he was appointed a member of the supreme court of California commission, and this high position he held until January, 1891, when he resigned in order to resume private practice.

COL. RUSSEL HEATH. The fact that Colonel Heath is the oldest surviving American settler in the valley at Carpinteria is but one out of his many claims to prominence in his locality. During the half century of his identification with the history of Santa Barbara county, he has been intimately associated with many of the movements that have brought prosperity to this section of the state, and in every instance he has been in the forefront of those whose aim was the development of local resources. Born in Little Falls, Herkimer county, N. Y., in 1826, he was a son of Henry and Mary (Casler) Heath. His paternal ancestors were of Puritan stock, early settlers of Massachusetts and Connecticut, and removed to New York in 1806. The maternal forefathers were among the early German settlers of the Mohawk valley. General Herkimer, the hero of the battle of Ariscany, was a great-uncle of Mrs. Heath; her grandfather Casler was colonel in General Herkimer's regiment in this same battle, which turned the tide of warfare toward victory for the colonial army. Colonel Heath's father, Henry Heath, established at Little Falls the first iron foundry west of Albany, N. Y., and for many years engaged extensively in the manufacture of machinery. At the same time he was also active in politics. His death occurred at Little Falls in 1879.

As early as 1700 the Heath family came from Surrey, England, and settled in Lebanon, Conn. Joseph Heath volunteered and served under Colonel Nickerson in the expedition against Montreal in 1710. Colonel Heath's grandfather, Hezekiah Heath, settled at Little Falls, N. Y., during 1801, and in that same town his son, Henry, afterward became the proprietor of the Heath foundry. Russel Heath was reared in this same town and received his education in Fairfield Academy. An appointment to the United States military academy was tendered him, but declined. Instead, he turned his attention to the study of law, in which he was engaged at the time the report spread through the east that gold had been discovered in California. With his customary promptness of action, he was first to leave Herkimer county for the gold fields. By way of Mexico, he traveled to California, coming up the Pacific ocean on a sailing vessel from Mazatlan to Santa Barbara. On the 10th of July, 1849, the ship landed at Santa Barbara, being out of provisions. Many of the passengers refused to go further, and he was one of the number. Thus it

After ten days in Santa Barbara the Colonel, in company with Gil Ewing of Ohio and others, proceeded to walk to San Francisco, and fifteen days later they reached their destination. It had been his intention to locate in San Francisco, but on account of the poor water, he decided to go elsewhere. His first experiences in mining were gained on Mormon Island, where the Folsom prison now stands. Next he engaged in mining on the North Yuba river. In 1852, on account of ill health, he came to Santa Barbara, where he was soon benefited by the fine climate. Turning his attention to the practice of law and public affairs, in 1852 and 1853 he became interested in the organization of the county, under American law, the court of sessions having appointed him district attorney. During the two years (1852-54) that he held the office, he obtained the first conviction for murder under American law. When the county was placed under American system in 1853, he opened the county clerk's office books, which were the first records in the county under this system. Appointed sheriff in 1854, he was ordered to enforce the law against gamblers and law-breakers, and had many thrilling experiences in the discharge of his duty, but his service was so satisfactory to the law-abiding element that at the expiration of the term he was elected to the office, which he filled until the fall of 1858. He then took his seat in the state legislature, having been elected on the Democratic ticket. In this position, as in every other to which he was called, uprightness and fidelity marked his discharge of duties, and a progressive spirit made his service acceptable to his constituents. On his retirement from the legislature he again accepted the position of district attorney. In 1859 he was one of the commissioners chosen to lay out the first state road under American law from San Francisco through Santa Barbara county to Los Angeles. Further opportunity for public service was tendered him in 1869, when he was again chosen to represent his district in the state legislature, where he served during the term of 1869-70.

Meantime, while filling public offices and practicing law, Colonel Heath also became interested in ranching and fruit-growing. In 1858 he bought a ranch at Carpinteria which was then in small native timber. The following year he began the improvement of the land. Through subsequent purchase he became the owner of several hundred acres in the valley, but now has reduced his possessions, by sale, to two hundred acres. The first walnut orchard in the state was started by him in the fall of 1858, the seed being secured from Mr. Wolf-skill's garden in Los Angeles, and it in turn coming from trees planted by the Mission Fathers. At this writing he has one hundred and sixty acres in walnuts, from which he secures about one hundred thousand pounds each year. In addition to his walnuts, he has a fine orchard of lemons, his specialties being the Sicilian and Lisbon varieties. He was the first horticulturist in Southern California to import lemons and the citron of commerce from Sicily, and he also brought a new variety of olives from that same island. All of these he now produces on his ranch. Besides his ranch, he owns several blocks of improved property in Santa Barbara, including the Heath block and ten business houses. For two years he filled the president's chair in the First National Bank, of which he is now a director. The recent oil discoveries in California have awakened his interest and he has been foremost in his efforts to make this one of the leading industries of the state. With his son, he is interested in a well in the Rincon fields that has good prospects.

Until 1895 Colonel Heath was one of the local Democratic leaders, but the adoption of the silver standard by the Democratic party caused him to transfer his allegiance to the Republican party, and in its interests he stumped the southern part of the state during the campaign of 1900. Fraternally he has passed all the chairs in the Santa Barbara Lodge, I. O. O. F., and is past noble grand. The Society of California Pioneers numbers him among its prominent members. After he had been in the west some years, Miss Harriet E. Sherman, one of his childhood's playmates in Little Falls, came to San Francisco to meet him and they were married there in 1856. Three years later she died, leaving an only child, James R. Heath.

MILO M. POTTER. While it is a fact that Los Angeles has no immense metropolitan hotel, few cities on the continent are blessed with a wider range of comfortable, home-like hotels, and chief among those which have been placed at the service of the public within the past few years is the well-known Hotel Van Nuys. In all its appointments this hotel is modern, convenient and beautiful, and under the management of its proprietor, M. M. Potter, it has come to the front as one of the finest hotels on the Pacific coast. It is said by well posted authorities to be one of the two or three most elegantly appointed and best conducted hotels west of New York City. The Van Nuys, centrally located at the corner of Fourth and Main streets, within a few blocks of the entire business section of the city, is a building six stories in height, and, owing to its situation on the corner, there is not a dark room in the house. It was completed in 1896, and was furnished throughout with new, handsome equipments. The proprietor is businesslike and courteous,

Mr. Potter was born in Dundee, Monroe county, Mich., in May, 1854. In 1888 he came to Los Angeles, and upon his arrival here took charge of the Westminster Hotel. During the eight years of his connection with that high class hotel he won the respect and confidence of the local public, and a reputation for fairness and business-like methods which has served him in good stead. Mr. Van Nuys determined to invest some of his capital in another and finer building. Thus the Van Nuys Hotel came into existence, and everyone concedes that no better manager could be found than Mr. Potter. His success is in a great measure due to his generalship, he having that rare tact and talent to thoroughly organize the forces at his command, so that complete harmony prevails in every department. He is also in charge of Hotel Van Nuys, Broadway, which he built three years after the completion of the Hotel Van Nuys, Main street. These two hotels have a capacity for accommodating about five hundred guests.

STEPHEN HATHAWAY MOTT was born June 21, 1828, near Saratoga Springs, N. Y., in the historic village of Schuylersville, where the British general, Burgoyne, surrendered. He is the son of John R. and Abbie (Hathaway) Mott, who were natives of Saratoga county, N. Y., and both died in that same county, the father when seventy-one and the mother when eighty-four. When he was nine years of age our subject was taken into the home of his maternal grandmother. In 1854 he turned his course of destiny westward. He traveled extensively through the southern and western states, and in 1855 landed in St. Paul, Minn., and accepted a clerkship in a wholesale and retail dry goods house.

After a short time in that position he went eighty miles south of St. Paul and opened a general store among the Indians at St. Peter, Minn., but, finding difficulty in getting transportation, he settled in Shakopee, where he remained from 1861 to 1864, arriving in Los Angeles May 3 of the latter year. In 1868 he bought what is now known as the Mott tract. He has been a director of the Los Angeles City Water Company since 1869 and its secretary almost thirty years. "Self-made" is a title that will fit Mr. Mott. From his first training in school for his battle of life on up to the stern realities thereof, he has come alone, unaided by friends or wealth. Of schooling, as now understood, he virtually had none. Education he has, a wealth of practical information, which would be more helpful to a young man thrown upon his own resources than all the training of all the colleges of theory alone.

HENRY M. DAKIN AND FAMILY

HENRY M. DAKIN. After a youth of adventures such as fall only to the lot of sailors, followed by years of steady labor as an employe of the government, Mr. Dakin finally came to California and some years later, in September of 1887, settled in San Pedro. Buying property for business purposes, he embarked in the hardware and plumbing business, which he has since conducted. During the years of his residence in this city he has been identified with many of its important public measures, particularly with its library board, of which he has been president for six years.

Mr. Dakin was born at Boardman, Mahoning county, Ohio, September 6, 1835, being a son of Homer and Susan (Crane) Dakin, natives respectively of New York and Connecticut. His maternal grandfather, Rev. Stephen Crane, was an influential minister of his day and locality. The father settled in Ohio about 1832, taking up the trade of a carpenter in Boardman, where he made his home for many years. Finally, however, he removed to Ellsworth, Mahoning county, and there his life came to a close when he was sixty-nine. During the war of 1812, when he was a mere lad, he had offered his services to the country and expected to go to the front, but sickness kept him back. In politics he adhered to Whig principles, while in religion he was a Baptist. His wife was a believer in the doctrines of the Congregational Church. Her death occurred in Poland, Ohio, in the spring of 1863, when she was sixty-nine years of age, and she was buried in Ellsworth cemetery. Of their twelve children, all but one attained years of maturity. The youngest of these, Henry M., was sent to school until sixteen, when he was apprenticed to learn the tinner's trade, at which he served for four years. In the fall of 1855 he went to New York City and from there shipped on a whaling cruise, going with his vessel around the Cape of Good Hope, thence to New Zealand, from there to the Hawaiian Islands, and finally returning to New York after a voyage of four years, during which he had sailed around the world. However, the ship in which he first sailed had been burned, and he returned on the William Henry, of New Bedford, Mass.

A later cruise took Mr. Dakin to the West Indies. In 1859 he returned to Ohio, where he took up his trade in Cleveland. During the spring of 1864 he enlisted in Company F, One Hundred and Fiftieth Ohio Infantry, which was sent to guard a fort near Washington, D. C. At the expiration of one hundred days the company was honorably discharged at Cleveland. Afterward for eighteen years Mr. Dakin was employed as a letter carrier in Cleveland, where, the number of carriers being far less than employed at the present time, he was obliged to do double duty and work exceedingly long hours.

On resigning from the government employ he came to California in 1882 and for five years worked as foreman for Chapman & Paul, on Commercial street, between Main and Los Angeles streets, in the city of Los Angeles. From there he came to San Pedro in 1887 and has since devoted himself to the tinware, hardware, and plumbing business. Formerly he voted with the Republicans, but the evil wrought by the liquor traffic has more recently caused him to ally himself with the Prohibition party.

At Cleveland, Ohio, in August, 1861, Mr. Dakin married Miss Harriet E. Stevens, who was born in Michigan. Five children were born of their union, but two died at an early age and George W. was drowned when the steamer Kewana went down. Those now living are William S. and Charlotte E., Mrs. Frederick Wyman, of Massachusetts. Mrs. Dakin is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church and interested in its various activities.

JOTHAM BIXBY. The distinction of being, perhaps, the largest landholder in Southern California belongs to Mr. Bixby. Possessing far more than ordinary ability, it is said that when he was a mere boy those who knew him predicted that his future would be marked with decided success. Through the substantial qualities of his character he has been able to gain for himself financial prosperity, and that which is still more to be desired, the esteem of his associates.

When the discovery of gold in California fired the hearts of ambitious young men in the east, Mr. Bixby was one of those who resolved to seek a fortune in the far west. In 1852 he sailed via Cape Horn to San Francisco, and thence proceeded to the mines in the central part of the state, but did not meet there the success he had hoped for. In 1857 he went to Monterey county and began to raise sheep. Later we find him a resident of San Luis Obispo county, and from there, in 1866, he came to Los Angeles, having the previous year bought the rancho of Los Cerritos, a tract of twenty-seven thousand acres. This property, lying east of the San Gabriel river, and fronting on the ocean, includes the present sites of Long Beach and Clearwater. On this place he has since engaged in the stock business, and under his supervision a company was organized which purchased seventeen thousand acres of the Palos Verdes rancho and a one-third interest in Los Alamitos of twenty-six thousand acres, besides six thousand acres in the rancho of Santiago de Santa Ana. This entire acreage was devoted to stock-raising. At times the company had on the Cerritos as many as thirty thousand head of sheep, producing two hundred thousand pounds of wool annually.

More recently, however, the company has made a specialty of raising cattle and horses, and has owned as many as thirty thousand head of cattle.

JOSEPH A. BUCKINGHAM. At the time that Mr. Buckingham came to Santa Ana, in 1876, few had as yet been attracted to the possibilities of this region. Shortly after his arrival he bought fifty acres of the San Joaquin ranch from James Irving and settled down to the important task of improving a farm out of the raw land. Among his early improvements were the building of a house and barn, and he also planted an orchard. Four years later he traded the property for sixty acres south of First street, now within the city limits of Santa Ana, and on this land he engaged in farming until 1882, when he sold out. His next purchase comprised twenty acres on Orange street, in the city limits, and here he has since made his home. The land has many qualities that enhance its value, noteworthy among these being its natural seepage which enables the owner to raise six or seven crops of alfalfa each year without resorting to irrigation. He has his own water-works, which provide water for domestic use and for the stock as well.

JOHN PHILIP GREELEY. From boyhood the tastes of John P. Greeley have been in the direction of literature. Diligently pursuing his studies in the Belfast high school and Castine normal, he fitted himself for the work of teacher, and for nine years he engaged in educational work in Maine. At the expiration of that time, in April, 1884, he crossed the continent to California, and resumed the occupation which had engaged his attention in New England. Near what is now Placentia, Orange county, he taught school for five years, continuing until the formation of this county and his simultaneous election, in 1889, as superintendent of schools, a position that he has filled with efficiency and success. In addition to the discharge of official duties, he gives some attention to the management of a fruit ranch that he owns in this county.

HON. A. A. CALDWELL. A leader in the Republican party, the sterling worth of Mr. Caldwell was recognized by the members of this party in his nomination, in 1900, for the state senate, representing the thirty-ninth senatorial district, composed of Riverside, San Bernardino and Orange counties. By a majority of almost twenty-one hundred he was the winner in the race. In the thirty-third session of the state legislature he served as chairman of the constitutional amendment committee and a member of the judiciary committee.

Few of the men now prominent in California's public life were born in this state, but Mr. Caldwell is an exception, as he was born in Oakland, January 12, 1869. His parents, Edwin and Martha A. (Hayt) Caldwell, were natives of New York, where they were reared and married. In 1849 the father crossed the plains from the Missouri river, with an ox-team, and engaged in mining on the American river and other mining camps. In 1871 he brought his family to Riverside and five years later joined them here, turning his attention from mining to horticulture, in which he engaged until his death, in 1890. His wife died in 1893. The first death in the Riverside colony was that of his son, Harry, a lad of seven years, who died December 18, 1871.

The public schools of Riverside and the high school of Oakland furnished Mr. Caldwell with the elements of his education, after which he spent one year in the University of California. In 1890 he matriculated in the Hastings College of Law, a department of the State University, and from this institution he was graduated in 1893. Returning to Riverside, he opened an office for the practice of the law, and has since made this city his home. He was made a Mason in Evergreen Lodge, F. & A. M., and is also connected with Riverside Chapter, R. A. M., and Riverside Commandery, K. T., also Al Malakiah Temple, N. M. S., of Los Angeles. In the local lodge, B. P. O. E., he is a charter member. He is connected with Arrow Head Chapter, Native Sons of the Golden West, in San Bernardino, and is a member of the Beta Theta Pi and the Phi Delta Phi of his alma mater.

In Riverside Mr. Caldwell married Clara M. Keith, who traces her ancestry direct to one of Robert Bruce's field marshals, also to Peregrine White, the first white child born in America, and whose mother, widowed before his birth, became the first bride in the little Mayflower colony. Mr. and Mrs. Caldwell have one child, Duncan Keith Caldwell.

J. M. OLDENDORF. One of the finest orange groves in Riverside is owned and conducted by Mr. Oldendorf, to whose intelligent and constant oversight is due the attractive appearance of the grove. He came to this city April 1, 1882, and in June of the same year bought ten acres, seven of which were in seedling oranges. The balance of the land he set out in navels, and he has also budded the seedlings to the navel variety, so that the entire property is now improved with a high grade of fruit. He makes it his aim to keep the trees in a thrifty and healthful condition, and he also trims them with care, in order to secure a symmetrical appearance. The property is further improved by a comfortable and neatly appointed residence, standing at No. 247 East Central avenue.

In Mount Carmel, Ill., J. M. Oldendorf was born May 27, 1855. He was reared on a farm and received a high school education. Going to Indianapolis, Ind., in 1876, he engaged in the mercantile business, which he conducted until his removal to California in 1882. Besides his property in Riverside, he is the owner of valuable real estate in Los Angeles. From the time of attaining his majority he has voted with the Republican party and has assisted its progress by committee work and in other ways. He is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church and a liberal contributor to religious and charitable enterprises. He has always taken an interest in educational work and in June, 1901, was elected trustee for the Arlington school district.

H. A. BINGHAM. The most ambitious creamery aspirant could hardly hope for larger returns for his labors than has fallen to the lot of H. A. Bingham, one of the most successful creamery men in the state of California. In this, the paradise of creamery enterprises, Mr. Bingham has continued an occupation begun in youth, and for which he inherits a liking and special aptitude. He was born in Lunenburg, Mass., November 3, 1857, and comes of ancestors whose founder in America sailed away from the shores of England in 1698, and settled in Massachusetts. The paternal grandfather, Horace Bingham, was a farmer in the Puritan state, and Henry Bingham, the father of H. A., was born at Carlisle, Mass., and engaged for the greater part of his life in the dairy business at Fitchburg. He lived to be fifty years old. On the maternal side Mr. Bingham is related to another Massachusetts family, for his mother, who was formerly Frances Kilburn, was born near Charlestown, Mass., and was a daughter of Milton Kilburn, a ship carpenter in the navy yard. Mr. Kilburn later turned his attention to farming, and was thus employed at the time of his death. Mrs. Bingham, who died when her son H. A. was four years of age, was the mother of one other son, Eugene, who is one of the superintendents of the creamery. Of the second marriage contracted by the father there were also two children, Earnest, the only one living, being also in the employ of his brother, H. A.

At the public schools of Fitchburg, Mass., Mr. Bingham received a practical education, and while still quite young gained considerable knowledge of the creamery business. After the death of his father he continued the dairy successfully, but in the spring of 1889 sold out his interests and two years later located in California. In January of 1891 he started a creamery business in Santa Ana, and built the first factory in the Newport district, within the walls of which he began to manufacture the celebrated Santa Ana butter. Two years later he located in Los Angeles and established stations at several different points, notably at Tipton, Rincon, El Monte, Lancaster, Clearwater, Downey, Norwalk, Fairview, and Tustin, and in 1896 established his factory and headquarters at Los Angeles on Sixth street and Broadway. In 1902 he built a two story brick building, 90x110 feet, on the corner of San Julian and Seventh streets, which he will use for his growing business.

The better to understand the enormous business carried on by the Bingham Creamery it is necessary to state that the milk of over six thousand cows is utilized with perfect practicability, and the output is one and a half tons of butter a day. The milk capacity is more than six hundred gallons a day, and the cream capacity from fifty to three hundred gallons a day. There are fifteen separators used for the cream, and forty-three hands are employed to carry out the plans of the head of the largest creamery in Southern California. Twenty-five horses are used for general purposes, and three wagons are required to deliver goods to the trade. In connection with his creamery Mr. Bingham delivers milk to many of the local dealers in Los Angeles and Pasadena, and for several years conducted a large and successful delicatessen business on South Broadway. Aside from his own immediate business concerns he has been instrumental in raising and maintaining a high grade of excellence in the general butter market, and to further his interest in this connection he organized the Butter Board of Trade of Los Angeles and Orange Counties, presided as chairman at the first meeting, and has since the beginning of its days of usefulness been treasurer of the board. He is also identified with the Merchants and Manufacturers Association.

In Fitchburg, Mass., Mr. Bingham married Miss Linnie Victoria Halliday, a native of Clinton, Mass., and of this union there are seven children: Hubert, a graduate of the high school and at present bookkeeper for his father; Francis, a graduate of the high school; Milton, Ruth, Beatrice, Dorothea and Bertram. Mr. Bingham is an appreciator and promoter of the best possible educational methods, and is in favor of supporting all wise plans for the general improvement of the community. As a business man he brings to his interesting and remunerative work a rare intelligence and ready understanding of affairs in general, and embodies in his personality those admirable attributes which constitute noble and helpful citizenship. In political affiliation he is a Republican.

HON. ALVAN TYLER CURRIER. The management of his varied interests makes Mr. Currier a very busy man. The most important object of his care is his large alfalfa, grain, stock and fruit ranch, comprising twenty-five hundred acres, situated three miles west of Pomona, just off the Southern Pacific stations of Spadre and Lemon. Here a considerable portion of Mr. Currier's time is spent. His energy is such that he is constantly at work, directing, superintending and managing every department of the farm work; this, too, although there is no longer the necessity of hard work there was in earlier years. His ranch is watered by artesian wells. In every respect it shows the painstaking care of the owner and his intelligent supervision.

In Franklin county, Me., Mr. Currier was born, April 30, 1840, a son of Alvan and Nancy (Clough) Currier, natives of Maine. In the winter of 1861-62 he saw California for the first time. However, he did not remain here, but went to Idaho and mined for gold and silver. In the fall of 1867 he left Idaho and returned to California. Soon he went back to Maine to visit his relatives and friends, and in the spring of 1868 he came via the Isthmus of Panama from New York to San Francisco. He has crossed the isthmus three times altogether. In the spring of 1869 he came to Los Angeles county and purchased the ranch where he still makes his home.

Politically Mr. Currier has been an active factor in the Republican party, and is counted one of its local leaders. In 1881 he was elected sheriff of Los Angeles county, which office he filled for two years. In 1898 he was elected to the state senate from the thirty-eighth California district. As a senator he manifested deep interest in the welfare of his constituents.

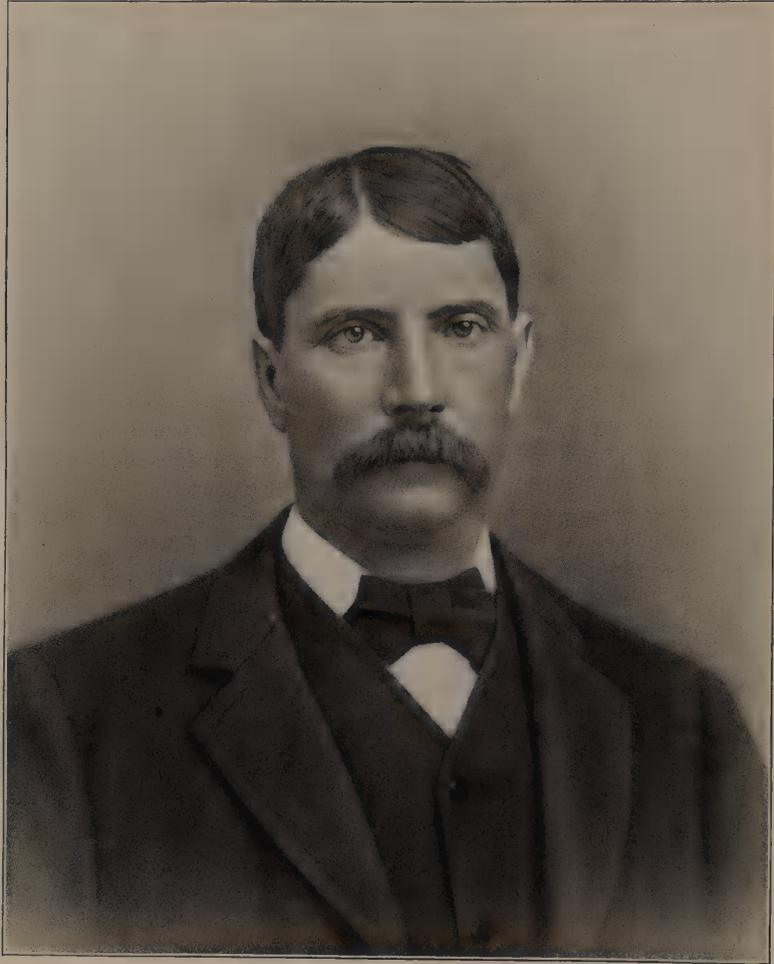

DANIEL P. CRAWFORD. To Mr. Crawford belongs the distinction of being the pioneer walnut grower of Olive precinct, Orange county, and of having set out the first trees for the future harvests of this much desired product. He was born in Cumberland county, Nova Scotia, September 15, 1847. A fair education prepared him for the responsibilities of the future. In 1868 he left the familiar surroundings of his boyhood days in Nova Scotia and migrated to California via the Panama route. For a time he lived in San Francisco, and while there improved his time by studying at and graduating from the Pacific Business College. During the spring of 1870 he went to San Luis Obispo, where, for several years, he was successfully engaged in the dairy business. From there he went to Los Angeles county and became interested in farming at Green Meadows, remaining there until he came to Olive precinct, Orange county, in 1880.

In formulating his plans and successes in life, Mr. Crawford has been ably assisted by his wife, formerly Annie Taylor, of Indiana. To Mr. and Mrs. Crawford have been born eight children, six of whom are living: Clinton B., who is a resident of Kern county, Cal.; Ethelyn R., Jennie C., Earl M., Lela R. and Hazel R. The five last-named children are living at home. Mr. Crawford is a Republican in national and local politics, and is a firm believer in the merits of prohibition. He has held some important local offices, and has for several years been a trustee of the Olive public schools. He is an appreciator of the advantages of education, and the promoter of all that tends to uplift humanity and improve general conditions. Fraternally he is associated with the Masonic order, and with his family is a member of the Presbyterian Church.

J. ROSS CLARK. One of the flourishing industries of Southern California is the Los Alamitos Sugar Company, of which Mr. Clark is vice-president and the general manager. Shortly after coming to Los Angeles he established the business which has since grown to its present proportions, taking rank among the successful enterprises of this section. The firm takes its name from the location of the plant, which is at Los Alamitos, thirty miles from Los Angeles, while the offices of the company are in the Douglas block in Los Angeles.

J. Ross Clark was born April 10, 1850, near Connellsville, Pa. At six years of age he removed with the family to Van Buren county, Iowa. There he acquired a public school education; his academic studies were pursued at Bentonsport Academy. However, he is principally a self-educated as well as a self-made man. On attaining his majority he was attracted to the far west, where, in company with his brother, Joseph K., he engaged in the United States mail contract business, making his headquarters at Horse Plains, Mont., the route being from Missoula, Mont., to Pend d'Oreille Lake in Idaho, a distance of two hundred miles. In 1876 he removed to Butte, Mont., and engaged as bookkeeper for the Dexter Milling Company, owners of one of the first quartz mills built in Butte. After one year, in 1877, he took a position as cashier in the bank of Donnell, Clark & Larabie, a well-known banking institution in the west, where he continued in the same position until 1886. In 1884 he acquired Mr. Donnell's interest in the institution and shortly afterwards Mr. Larabie retired, when the firm name was changed to W. A. Clark & Bro., and as such continues to the present day, the partners being William A. Clark and J. Ross Clark, the latter still giving attention to the bank and its management.

During his residence in Montana, April 16, 1878, Mr. Clark married Miss Miriam A. Evans, who was born in Ohio, but at the time was a resident of Montana. They have two children, Ella H. and Walter M. The family are connected with the First Congregational Church of Los Angeles. In 1892 Mr. Clark established his home in Los Angeles, and has since become known as one of the most reliable business men of the city.

D. W. Strahan

D. W. STRAHAN. No influence has entered into the upbuilding of Santa Ynez more progressive than that exerted by D. W. Strahan, who, among other interests, is conducting a large general mercantile business in the town of his adoption. He was born in Clayton, Brown county, Ill., November 23, 1846, and was reared on the farm of his parents, Alexander and Malinda (Slagle) Strahan, natives respectively of Kentucky and Illinois. The father came to Illinois at a very early day, and was successful and prominent in the neighborhood in which he settled. There were fourteen children in the family, of whom D. W. is second, and the only one in California. In 1855 he accompanied the rest of the family to Lamar county, Tex., and was there when the hostility between the north and south culminated in the Civil war. During the latter part of the war he was conscripted into the Confederate service, and was detailed on guard duty at his own home, though he and all his people were known to be Union men.

In 1866 Mr. Strahan left Texas and went to Kansas for a year, being accompanied by the whole family, who also later went with him to Arkansas. His separation from the parents and the rest of the children occurred in 1875, when he made his way to Prescott, Ariz., where he became interested in farming, stock-raising and mining. In all of these enterprises he was successful, and he still owns property and interests there. Owing to somewhat impaired vitality he came to California in 1891, having bought property here in 1888. Upon locating in Santa Ynez, he erected a concrete store, and laid in a stock of general merchandise. At the present time he has the largest place of the kind in the town, and is catering to a constantly increasing trade.

Fine financial and executive ability have conspired to make Mr. Strahan one of the most substantial of the citizens of Santa Ynez, and he is foremost in all worthy undertakings with the object of progression. He exerts that solid influence known only to men who have made a success of what they started out to do, and who have been amply rewarded for their pains by a considerable accumulation of worldly goods and chattels. He has a beautiful home two miles out of the town, erected by himself with an eye to comfort and modern convenience, and surrounded by trees and shrubbery and a fine fruit-bearing orchard. Mr. Strahan is a Democrat in politics, but has no time for political office holding. His first vote was cast for Greeley, and he espoused the cause of free silver by voting for Bryan. Fraternally he is a Mason, and is associated with the blue lodge of Prescott, Ariz.

While living in Cincinnati, Ark., in 1867, Mr. Strahan married Susie Ellis, a native of Illinois, and a daughter of M. O. Ellis, formerly of Xenia, Ohio.

LOUIS ROEDER. The ship on which Mr. Roeder came to California entered the Golden Gate May 10, 1856. He remained in San Francisco until the 28th of November, and then came to Los Angeles, where he commenced work at his trade in the shop of John Goller, who was the first, and at that time the only, wagon manufacturer in Los Angeles. He was located on Los Angeles street, between Commercial and Laguna streets. For seven years, and until 1863, he remained with this employer. He then leased a lot on Main street, adjoining the present German-American Bank on the north, and, making some improvements thereon, he conducted a wagon-making business on the site for five years. From 1865 he had the late Louis Lichtenberger associated with him as a partner. In 1866 they purchased a business lot at No. 128 South Main street and erected thereon the two-story brick Lichtenberger block, which still stands. Three years later they built the two-story brick block now owned by J. Khurtz, at the northwest corner of Second and Main streets. The partnership with Mr. Lichtenberger continued about three years, when Mr. Roeder retired from the firm, selling his entire interest to his partner. Mr. Roeder's next step was the purchase of one hundred feet frontage on Spring street, adjoining the Nadeau hotel, where he established himself as a wagon manufacturer. The north fifty feet of the lot he improved, erecting thereon a commodious and substantial brick block. Later he built a like structure on the south half of the property. For four years he did business in the first building he erected. The property became valuable for renting purposes and he finally retired from business, since which time he has given his attention to the oversight of his extensive real-estate holdings in the city.

FRANK D. BULLARD, A. M., M. D. After having been connected with the Sierra Madre College, Pasadena, for one term as an instructor, Dr. Bullard passed the teacher's examination in Los Angeles county and in 1885-86 was principal of the Azusa schools. In the fall of 1886 he entered the medical department of the University of Southern California, where he continued his study of the science he had commenced some years before. While carrying on this course he was for a year resident student in the Los Angeles County Hospital, and in 1891 he spent a year in the same institution as assistant county physician. Shortly after his graduation from the university and his marriage to Dr. Rose Talbott (which occurred May 3, 1888), he and his wife went to Europe, where they spent some months in the study of medicine under the best instructors of Germany, and also had considerable hospital experience in Vienna. Returning to Los Angeles, they opened an office in this city, and since June, 1896, have occupied a suite in the Bradbury block. They are actively identified with the State and Southern California Medical Associations, and of the latter society he is now secretary. They are also connected with the County Medical Society, of which he was the president in 1899, and his wife the secretary. They have an only child, Helen, who was born May 15, 1892.

For five years Dr. F. D. Bullard was editor of the Southern California Practitioner, but afterward sold his interest to Dr. Walter Lindley, since which time he and his wife have acted as associate editors. At this writing he is professor of chemistry in the medical department of the Southern California University. All forward movements, especially those of a professional and literary nature, receive his warm support and encouragement. He is connected with the University Club, of which he is secretary at this writing. He is also connected with the Y. M. C. A., and his wife with the Y. W. C. A., of which she is first vice-president. In those circles where high intellectual gifts and broad knowledge are recognized as the sine qua non of culture, both have an assured standing. Dr. Bullard is the author of "The Apistophilon," a poem bearing a resemblance to the "Rubáiyát" of Omar Khayyam, but breathing the highest optimism, in direct contrast to the pessimistic spirit of the Oriental poet.

GEORGE FROST. Having disposed of his interests in the east, in the fall of 1882 Mr. Frost came to Riverside, where he at once identified himself with horticultural and farming interests. His connection with the Riverside Water Company dates from 1887, and for the past eight years he has been its president. Since the organization of the Orange Growers' Bank of Riverside he has been a director, and during the first six years of its existence served as its vice-president. Since the electric system has been the motive power of the local street railway cars he has been president of the Riverside Electric Street Railway Company, which now has seven miles of line in operation, two miles in process of construction, and four miles, all within the city limits, now under consideration. Financially interested in the Concrete Pipe Company, he is a director in that organization.

The benefit of the Riverside Water Company, of which Mr. Frost is president, cannot be over-estimated, as under its auspices almost the entire development of this region has been made possible. Its history extends back to 1871, when the Southern California Colony Association purchased from Louis Rubidoux the old Rubidoux tract, on which they laid out a city and provided canals for irrigating purposes. Five years later the colony was merged into the Riverside Land and Irrigation Company, while the canals became the property of the Riverside Canal Company. In 1885 the Riverside Water Company was organized and incorporated, and this organization absorbed the Riverside Canal Company. Since its incorporation there have been five presidents, namely: Mr. Everest, A. P. Johnson, John G. North, Dr. Jarvis and George Frost, the last named having held the office since 1893. By means of iron pipes in 1885 the domestic supply for the city was secured from an artesian well, ten miles up the valley. The pressure of from sixty to eighty pounds to the inch is sufficient to furnish protection for the highest buildings in Riverside. Not only is the plant the largest in the city, but its system is being enlarged from year to year. Aside from the valuable lands and the improvements that came from the Riverside Canal Company, the plant represents an investment of $175,000, and the total valuation of the property is $305,000. In addition the irrigating system, from artesian wells and Warm creek, a tributary of the Santa Ana river, represents an investment of $870,000. The company owns over eight hundred acres of artesian land, which has been purchased for the protection of the irrigators and as a future source of water supply, the same representing a value of nearly $150,000. The minimum supply of water during the irrigating season is about twenty-seven hundred inches, measured at the head gates, and this irrigates about ten thousand acres of land.

Under the co-operative system the twenty-four thousand shares comprising the stock of the company are apportioned among the owners of the twelve thousand acres of land provided with irrigation, the rate being two shares of stock for each acre of land. The shares are not transferable, except on an exchange of the title to the land. The price of irrigating water is fixed by the city board of trustees at fifteen cents per inch for twenty-four hours' service, the average cost per acre being $8 per annum. At no time have the stockholders been limited in the quantity of water used, but each one has been allowed to use whatever in his judgment seemed advisable, and this procedure has proved satisfactory to all.

JOSEPH M. MILLER. Very few remain of that heroic band of emigrants who crossed the plains in 1849. The large majority, after having escaped or overcome the hostility of Indians and confronted dangers seen and unseen through a long period of pioneer years, have finally succumbed to that last enemy of all, Death. Worthy of mention among those who are still spared to enjoy the civilization of the twentieth century is Joseph M. Miller, who now makes his home at No. 1212 Grand avenue, Los Angeles. He was born in Womelsdorf, Adams county, Pa., June 15, 1832, and at the age of five years was taken by his parents, Valentine and Meribah Barton (Moon) Miller, to Mount Carmel, Ill., where the father carried on a drug business.

At the time gold was discovered in California Mr. Miller was a youth of seventeen. Possessing a love for adventure, which had received added impetus through two trips on flatboats down the Mississippi river to New Orleans, he at once began to plan a trip across the plains, and his constant urging of the plan at last interested his father, who decided to accompany him. The two, with several others who had become interested, fitted out an ox-train with ten yoke of oxen and started for the far west. After a tedious journey of seven months, during which all but one yoke of oxen died or gave out, they arrived at Longs Bar on Feather river, October 20, 1849. The little band, with only one yoke of oxen and little stock of provisions, did not present a prosperous appearance, but they were ambitious, and in those days results and not appearances counted. Like all miners, they had their ups and downs, yet in the main they were not unsuccessful.

After two years Mr. Miller's father went back to Illinois, where the son joined him in the spring of 1854, and in the fall of that year the entire family, consisting of father, mother and six children, with all their worldly belongings, started across the plains with four four-horse teams and two riding animals. They came through Beckwith's Pass and arrived at Eureka Mills, in Plumas county, with one wagon and two horses, the other sixteen horses having died on the journey. There were in the family Adolphus, Edward and Georgiana, all of whom are now deceased; Joseph M.; Mrs. E. M. Birmingham, of Strawberry valley, Yuba county; and Mrs. Virginia Bedell, whose home is near Bangor, Cal. While the father followed mining much of the time, he also devoted some attention to the development of a ranch which he purchased near Bangor, Butte county. On that place he died in 1893, having survived his wife six years. Both were active and strong until shortly before they died. While his father was ranching and mining, J. M. Miller devoted his attention almost wholly to merchandising and mining, and in his search for favorable openings traveled through Mexico and all of the great west. Indeed, it is said by some that there is not a mining camp or a prospect in all of these states with which he is not familiar. He sank the first hole on Miller's Creek, near Salmon river, Idaho, and devoted much time to prospecting there. Sometimes fortune favored him and he made large profits; again, luck was against him and he would have to meet heavy losses, so the years passed by with their failures and successes, their joys and sorrows. In 1866 he settled in Ventura, but the next year went to Soledad Pass in Los Angeles county, where he engaged in general merchandising, thence going back to Ventura, where in 1876 he was elected sheriff on the Democratic ticket. This election was a tribute to his popularity, for the county was Republican by a large majority. Another office which he filled while there was that of school trustee. He was also agent for the Coast Line Stage Company and Wells-Fargo Express Company. In 1880 he moved to Los Angeles, which he had first visited in 1862 and which is still his home. His marriage united him with Josephine, daughter of Louis and Josefa Arenas, and a native of Azusa, Cal. Three children were born of their union, namely: Charles A., of Los Angeles; Ida, wife of Frederick Sennett, of Los Angeles; and Virginia, Mrs. Frank J. Palomares, also of this city.

Out of fifteen persons comprising the party who crossed the plains with Mr. Miller in 1849, the only ones now living are Dr. C. W. Bush, who resides in Los Angeles, and John Bush, who resides in Sidney, Ohio. The remainder have crossed "The Great Divide."

JAMES M. PARK. In these days of extraordinary accomplishment, of utilized forces once hardly understood, of overcoming obstacles in the light of luminous and progressive science, there seem interminable vistas for all, however different their capacities, or how varied their natural gifts. In the exuberance of our admiration for all who develop to the extent of their power their special talents, we cannot fail to note as worthy of mention James M. Park, a rancher at Montecito, and a gentleman of broad culture, fine literary discrimination, and extensive horticultural knowledge. He was born in Columbus, Ohio, March 2, 1852, a son of Plumb M. and Charlotte (Peck) Park, and his education was acquired at the Institute for the Deaf at Columbus, and at the National Deaf Mute College, near Washington, D. C., at which latter institution he took the degree of A. B.

For the following seven years he was engaged in educational work at the School for the Deaf at Columbus, and in 1883 came to Santa Barbara, locating on a ranch in the Montecito valley purchased the year before. The land was raw and unimproved, and he at once began its development, planting a portion of the forty acres with orange seeds, and later budded to three varieties of lemon. One-third of the trees are sixteen years old, and the balance are about seven years old. The crop is increasing each year, and in 1900 he had two thousand boxes to show for the care exercised. For the size it is one of the healthiest and most productive groves in Montecito, and this is surprising when it is known that when first taken in hand by Mr. Park there was no water for irrigating. In order to meet this dire necessity he purchased a water right from the creek, developed and piped the water to a reservoir built by himself and holding two hundred thousand gallons, from which it runs by gravity to the trees. The well is much lower than the pipe, and the water is brought to the surface by syphon. All these improvements have been undertaken under the personal supervision of Mr. Park, and his entire time is devoted to the management of his property.

The marriage of Mr. Park and Elizabeth Reed, a native of Louisiana, occurred in Columbus, Ohio, in 1876. To Mr. and Mrs. Park have been born three children, James, Mabel, and Edwin M. Mr. Park has been prominent in the affairs of the Republican party, and served on the board of school trustees of the Montecito school district for one year.

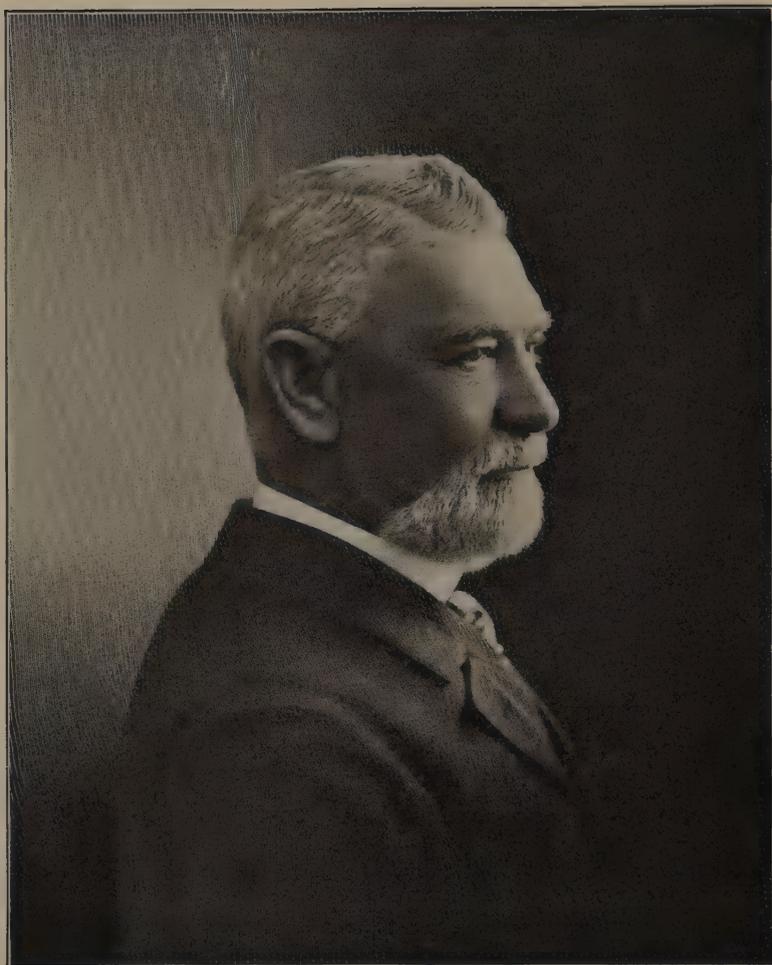

HENRY FERN. Since 1888 Mr. Fern has made his home in Santa Barbara and has been engaged in contracting and building. He was born in Gloucestershire, England, August 6, 1834, and is a son of William and Lucy (Reed) Fern, natives of the same shire as himself. His paternal grandfather, who came from Derbyshire, was a brick mason and contractor, while the maternal grandfather was a dry-goods merchant. Of a family of twelve children, Henry Fern was the only one to come to America. It was in 1871 that he crossed the ocean and established his home in the United States. His first location was Kansas City, where he engaged in contracting and building. In 1873 he came to California, where he first followed his chosen occupation in Woodland. After some seven years he removed to Bonanza Springs, Lake county, and, while regaining his health, which had been impaired by overwork, he kept a summer hotel. As soon as he was strong enough to resume contracting he came to Santa Barbara, where he is a well-known contractor and brick manufacturer. Among his contracts were those for the Fithian block, and the Whitehead, Alexander and Kellogg residences. About 1893 he built a brick yard on West Haley street, which has a capacity of five thousand brick per day. In politics he is independent and in religion a member of the Christian Church. By his marriage to Elizabeth Fewkes, a native of Nottingham, England, he has two daughters: Lizzie, wife of J. T. Peed; and Dora, who is a professional nurse in Los Angeles.

JOHN T. PEED. The Kent family is of English ancestry, and many successive generations were born in East Kent, including the subject of this article, his father James, and grandfather, James, Sr. The last-named was for many years employed in the coast guard, while the father was for thirty-three years a foreman in the government shipyards at Sheerness on the sea, being finally retired on a pension. At the age of seventy years he makes his home now at East Church. His wife, who bore the maiden name of Mary Quest, was born in East Kent, where her father, George, was a farmer and for a time also a government employe. At the time of her death, in 1894, she was sixty years of age. Of her nine children all but one are still living. John T., who is the only one of the family in America, was born Wednesday, September 6, 1859, and received a limited education in Sheerness. At the age of eleven years he began to learn the painter's trade under George Ayre in Sheerness, with whom he worked for eight years.

During 1881 Mr. Peed came across the ocean, proceeding by steamer through the Straits of Magellan and going to Valparaiso, South America, thence to Callao, Montevideo, and other ports of that country, where he worked at his trade. Later, going to the Sandwich Islands, he was similarly employed. In 1883 he first saw California, at which time he secured employment at his trade in San Francisco. From there, in 1885, he came to Santa Barbara, where he worked on the Dibblee mansion about eight months, and has since engaged in contracting in this city, with the exception of three and one-half years spent in San Francisco at the same line of business. Among his contracts have been those for interior decoration of the Crocker mansion, Old Ladies' Home, Huntington mansion and others in San Francisco, and the residences of Mr. Hopkins, Mrs. Chamberlain, Mrs. Rogers and Mrs. Drayer, the Cottage hospital, Fithian block, Country Club house, the residence of William Alexander and the Alexander block, and the Howard, Kellogg and Spaulding residences; also many fine residences in Montecito. He erected the residence which he occupies at No. 318 West Carrillo street. Fraternally he is connected with the Woodmen of the World; the lodge of Odd Fellows, in which he is a past officer; the encampment, in which he is now an officer; and in these various fraternities, as well as in general movements calculated to promote the public welfare, he takes a warm interest.

In Santa Barbara, July 14, 1888, Mr. Peed married Miss Lizzie Fern, who was born in

W. H. Workman

Nottingham, England, and received an excellent education in San Francisco, where she had the privilege of study under a celebrated musician of the west.

WILLIAM H. WORKMAN, the president of the Workman Company, has resided in Southern California since 1854, when he, a boy of fifteen years, was brought to the state by his parents, David and Nancy (Hook) Workman. He was born in Boonville, Mo., in 1839.

In the family of David and Nancy Workman there were three sons. The eldest, Thomas H., was killed by the explosion of the steamer Ada Hancock in Wilmington harbor April 27, 1863. The second son, Elijah H., settled at Boyle Heights, and the third son, William H., is also a resident of Los Angeles. The last-named followed the printer's trade for a time after coming to California, and then for twenty years was connected with his brother in the saddlery and harness business. For some years he has given his attention to the real estate business, in which he has important interests. Particularly has he been interested in the improvement of Boyle Heights, by the introduction of water, street car lines and other improvements.

During 1887 and 1888 Mr. Workman filled the office of mayor of Los Angeles, and he has also been a member of the city council and the board of education. In his political views he is a Democrat. His marriage, in 1867, united him with Miss Maria E. Boyle, daughter of A. A. Boyle; they are the parents of two sons and four daughters.

ARTHUR N. SANBORN. The name of Sanborn is well known in Pomona, not only by reason of the connection of A. M. Sanborn with its brick-contracting interests, but also on account of the prominence of his father, Isaac Sanborn, who was connected with important enterprises here for some years. The family descends from old and substantial New England ancestry. The parents of Isaac were John D. and Huldah A. (Frye) Sanborn, natives of Sanbornton, N. H., and pioneers of Medford, Minn., where they took up a tract of raw land far removed from civilization. All their supplies had to be hauled sixty miles. Indians were their only visitors, and for miles around there was no white woman except Mrs. Sanborn. Through all of these privations and hardships they worked their way to independence and comfort.

In Sanbornton, N. H., Isaac Sanborn was born August 11, 1831, and there and at Lowell, Mass., he learned the early lessons of life. For many years he followed brick-mason's trade, first in the east, then in St. Paul, Minn., next at Medford, thence to Clinton Falls, and finally to Owatonna, which was the county-seat of Steele county. On leaving Minnesota he settled in Sedalia, Mo., and from there moved to Windsor, same state, where his parents died. Not feeling satisfied with the climate he came to California and selected Pomona as having the most healthful climate, in his opinion, of any of the towns of this locality. In 1888 he became vice-president of a company which erected a brick building and established a cannery. At first he was connected with J. H. Mertz, who was president, and later C. C. Morse and J. E. Ball were admitted to the firm. Employment was furnished to almost one hundred hands. At the expiration of three years he sold his interest in the factory and entered into the brick-contracting business, but in 1901 the failure of his health necessitated his retirement.

The marriage of Isaac Sanborn united him with Flora A., daughter of Joseph and Anna C. (Sawyer) Sawyer. She was born in Warner, N. H., and graduated from Mount Holyoke Seminary in 1857, after which she engaged in teaching. With her parents she removed to Medford, Minn., where she was a pioneer teacher, first having a school in her father's cabin, and later teaching in a small frontier school house. In later years she has maintained her interest in pedagogy and has broadened her sphere of knowledge by general reading. This she has done in addition to carefully rearing her sons and daughters and preparing them for fields of usefulness in the world. Born of her marriage were the following-named children: Arthur N.; Jessie L., wife of W. C. Robertson, of Los Angeles; Alice M. and William H., both deceased; Alice M., at home; Charles H., who is in Los Angeles; Bertha, a teacher in a high school in Los Angeles; Amy, wife of J. T. Allen, Ph. D., of the State University at Berkeley; and Flora, a teacher of the Pomona high school. The family are connected with the Congregational Church and Mr. Sanborn is a trustee in the same.

In Owatonna, Minn., Arthur N. Sanborn was born in 1859. Until twenty-one he followed farming, after which he learned the brick business and worked as a journeyman. In 1887 he came to California. For eight years he worked in Los Angeles, in the meantime doing contract work also in other towns. From there he came to Pomona, his present home. Among his contracts may be mentioned those for Armory Hall, Odd Fellows' building, Main Street stables, Bartlett and Wright buildings, electric light plant, pumping plant, the Brady block, Union block, Hansler, Stein block, besides numerous other public buildings. Since 1900 he has built several structures in Los Angeles, where he has also done considerable remodeling. By all who have given him contracts he is conceded to be a master mechanic and an expert workman, one who thoroughly understands all the details of his business.

Fraternally he is connected with the Knights of Pythias, and in religion is a member of the First Methodist Episcopal Church. In 1885 he married Miss Lucy A. Dickinson, who was born in London, England, and came to America with her parents, John and Anna Dickinson, settling in Missouri upon a farm. After the death of her father Mrs. Dickinson removed to Pomona, of which she is now a resident. The children of Mr. and Mrs. Sanborn are John H., Carlos Herbert, Leslie Franklin, Ethel May and Ruth Carroll.

JAMES E. SLOAN, the genial and well known Santa Barbara agent for the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, was born in Vallejo, Solano county, Cal., August 10, 1870. His father, James Sloan, is a native of Ireland, and of Scotch-Irish parentage, while the mother, Annie (Foster) Sloan, was born at Niagara Falls, where the Foster flats are named after her father. James Sloan came to California in 1852, and since that time has lived in the same little house in Vallejo, and held the same position in the steam engineering department at Mare Island navy yards. His home and his own unobtrusive, kindly personality form one of the landmarks of the town which has for nearly half a century accounted him an honored member of the community.

In the Vallejo public schools Mr. Sloan received his initial education, which formed the nucleus for ever continued reading and observation. In 1884 he entered the employ of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, during the construction of the California and Oregon road, and later filled positions as agent at several places throughout New Mexico and Arizona. For two years he was located at Fresno, Cal., and in 1897 was transferred to Summerland, and has since held the first and only agency of the road at this point. No one has endeavored to promote the best interests of the place more than he, or has more rapidly and surely gained a firm footing in the commercial and social world here represented. Since coming here he has become interested in the oil industry, and is one of the stockholders in the North Star Oil Company, which is operating seven wells. He is also interested in several other wells, and owns considerable real-estate in Summerland, his purchases indicating a profound faith in the continued prosperity of his adopted town, and his appreciation of the manifold advantages of residence here. He is a member of the Masonic Order at Santa Barbara, is a Royal Arch Mason and has passed all the degrees obtainable in America. He is also a charter member of the local Knights of Pythias. In 1895 Mr. Sloan married Miss Clason, and of this union there is one child, Bernice Helen Sloan.

RUFUS D. SMITH, Sr. A resident of Santa Barbara since 1876, Mr. Smith is of eastern lineage. His father, Johnston Smith, was born at Topsham, Vt., in 1797, and became a farmer, mill-wright and mill-builder. In 1868 he removed to Spring Valley, Minn., where he died in 1877, aged eighty years. His mother was a member of the Johnston family, of the colonial period, and he was also descended from the Smiths, Thompsons and Wilsons, who emigrated from Londonderry, Ireland, and were pioneers of Londonderry, N. H. The wife of Johnston Smith was Emeline S. Wilson, a native of Sutton, Vt., and descended from north of Ireland ancestry. At this writing she makes her home with her son, Rufus D., and is eighty-four years of age. Of her family, four sons and two daughters attained mature years, and all but one daughter are still living. They are named as follows: J. W., of Santa Barbara, who was captain of Company K, Eighth Vermont Infantry, during the Civil war; Charles E., also of Santa Barbara, who was a member of Company B, Eleventh Vermont Infantry, which was changed to the First Vermont Heavy Artillery; Rufus D.; Frank J., a business man and farmer of Spring Valley, Minn.; and Mrs. Helen J. Garfield, of Santa Barbara.

In Newark, Caledonia county, Vt., Rufus D. Smith, Sr., was born May 2, 1846. He was reared on a farm near Newark, Vt. In November, 1861, he volunteered in Company K, Eighth Vermont Infantry, and accompanied Butler's expedition to New Orleans. He and his brother, J. W., were captured in September, 1862, and for ten weeks remained in Vicksburg and other prisons, after which they returned to New Orleans on parole. Three months later they were exchanged, and at once joined their regiment at what is now Morgan City, La. Somewhat the worse for his prison experiences, Mr. Smith was honorably discharged in April, 1864, and returned to Vermont. In February, 1865, he enlisted in Company D, Ninth Regiment Veterans Reserve Corps, and served for a time at St. Albans, Vt., but later was sent to guard the White House at Washington, D. C., where he remained until his discharge, November 20, 1865.

From Vermont in 1867 Mr. Smith moved to Spring Valley, Minn., where he engaged in farming, and later acted as police judge. In 1876 he came to Santa Barbara and became a tobacconist. Only a year after settling here he was obliged to have his right leg amputated, as a result of the sufferings of his prison life. During that same year (1877) he was elected justice of the peace, and two years later was re-elected, serving until he resigned March 1, 1880, to accept the position of under sheriff with C. E. Sherman. Three years later he was chosen under sheriff with R. J. Broughton, with whom he remained for twelve years, and then remained under T. H. Hicks for four years. He is now serving under Nat Stewart, this being his twenty-first year in the office, and he is considered the best posted man in California in matters relating to the sheriff's office and the duties thereof. Politically he is a pronounced Republican. While living in Minnesota he was made a Mason and is now a member of Lodge No. 242, of which he has been secretary. Starr King Post keeps alive his interest in the Grand Army and the veterans of the Civil war. In the First Church of Christ, Scientist, he is a member of the board of trustees and the present clerk of the same.

In Barton, Vt., January 9, 1867, Mr. Smith married Miss Lucy M. Lebourveau, who is of French descent. They have five children now living: Gilman W., and Rufus D., Jr., who are engaged in the livery business; James W., a graduate of the Hastings Law School and a practicing attorney; Lyndol J., a clerk; and Edson A., who is in the real-estate business with W. W. Burton. The sons are residents of Santa Barbara, where they are very popular.

RUFUS D. SMITH, Jr. When his parents came to Santa Barbara, Mr. Smith was a mere lad. He was born in Spring Valley, Minn., November 10, 1869, a son of Rufus D. Smith, Sr., who has been under sheriff of Santa Barbara county for twenty-one years. Educated in the public schools of this city, the youth began to take an active part in life's realities at an early age. When fourteen he secured employment with Cooper & Dreyfus, in surveying. His next work was with Lawrence & Comstock, of the Santa Barbara Transfer Company, after which he was one year with Capt. George F. Ellis. In 1891 he went to San José, where he was employed by the San José Cab Company for three years. Returning to Santa Barbara, he was deputy county recorder under Neil J. Murphy for a year, and for a similar period served as a contractor for street grading. His next position was as agent for the Santa Barbara Transfer Company, and in the fall of 1895 he became agent for the Los Angeles Transfer Company. After having filled that position until December, 1896, he returned to his former position as agent for the Santa Barbara Transfer Company, but June 30, 1901, he resigned in order to give his entire attention to the livery business, in which he had previously become interested. With his father he had bought out the livery interests of W. H. Meyers, in October, 1899, thus acquiring the ownership of the Fashion Stables, at No. 532 State street. As manager of this business, he finds his time fully occupied. The building is 50x150 feet in dimensions, with thirty stalls. The vehicles are of modern style, the surreys and buggies being cloth-lined and first-class in every respect. A specialty is made of the winter tourist business, a number of drives to interesting points having been arranged in such a manner that sightseers may secure a splendid idea of life on the coast, at a comparatively small expenditure of time and money. The principal drives are those to Hot Springs, Montecito Valley, the Crocker-Sperry lemon ranch, Carpinteria, Goleta and the Mountain and Mesa drives, also those to the Cooper, Hollister, Stow and Shepard ranches, and Bartlett canon.

A charter member of McCook Camp, Sons of Veterans, Mr. Smith continued his connection with this camp during its existence. In politics he is a Republican. He is a charter member of the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks in Santa Barbara and is associated with the Fraternal Brotherhood. In Santa Barbara he married Miss Mary E. Tucker, by whom he has one child, Fred Tucker Smith. Mrs. Smith was born near Boston, Mass., a daughter of C. G. and Catherine G. Tucker, natives of England. Her father, who was an architect and builder in Massachusetts, came to Santa Barbara in 1886, and afterward erected some of the most substantial and costly residences in this city. His death occurred in November, 1900, soon after he had completed a handsome residence for his son-in-law, Mr. Smith, at No. 1230 Garden street.

G. F. STEPHENSON. The Stephenson family is of English descent, its most illustrious representative having been George Stephenson, the inventor of the steam engine. In every family certain inherited traits are noticeable, and this family has been especially characterized by mechanical skill. However, George A., father of G. F. Stephenson, won his first success in an occupation widely different from that in which many others of the name have engaged, being through all his active life a practitioner of the medical profession. Reared in Greenville, Pa., where his father was a mechanic, his surroundings were such as to give him a taste for mechanical arts, but instead he early showed an inclination for the practice of medicine. After graduating, he practiced in Cleveland, Ohio, then in Michigan and later in Iowa. During the Civil war he served as surgeon of a Pennsylvania regiment.

It was after he came to California, about 1874, that Dr. Stephenson first actively engaged in the occupation which his father and other ancestors had followed. His inherited mechanical skill found an outlet in the manufacture of surgical instruments, in which he met with encouraging success, and he continued a manufacturer until his retirement, since which time he has made his home in Los Angeles. After coming to California he was married, in Sacramento, to Fredericka Loeplich, of German descent. Four children were born of their union, namely: G. F., whose birth occurred in Sacramento May 29, 1877; Arthur G., a business man of Los Angeles; Herman P., who served in the Philippines for two and one-half years as a member of Troop B, Fourth United States Cavalry; and Mabel, of Los Angeles.

When about five years of age G. F. Stephenson was taken to Chicago and later to Independence, Kans., coming in 1888 to Los Angeles, where he attended the grammar and high schools, and in 1895, at the conclusion of a night course, was graduated from the Los Angeles Business College. Meantime he had served an apprenticeship of three years with the Pacific Manufacturing Company, and at the expiration of his time he became a workman at the trade, being for a time in Los Angeles and then in San Bernardino, where he had charge of the water plant. On his return to Los Angeles he secured a position as machinist and engineer in charge of the plant of James Jones & Co., remaining there until 1900, when he was appointed first assistant engineer of the Van Nuys Hotel. In recognition of his thorough knowledge of engineering, he was promoted in June, 1901, becoming chief engineer of both of the Van Nuys hotels. During the summer of 1901 he gave his attention to the remodeling and enlarging of the plant, which is now without a peer of its kind through all the west. Hydraulic elevators have been introduced, new engines provided, and a private system for the lighting up of the hotels established.

In the spring of 1902 Mr. Stephenson erected the power house used for the new Potter Hotel of Santa Barbara, which is one of the largest on the Pacific coast. He also superintended the putting in the hotel of the plumbing and electrical plant. The supervision of the large plant is a work of great responsibility, and the discharge of his many duties leaves Mr. Stephenson little time for participation in outside matters; hence he has taken no part in politics aside from voting the Republican ticket, and is connected with no fraternal society except the Foresters of America, while along the line of his special occupation he is interested in the National Association of Stationary Engineers, Los Angeles No. 2, in the work of which he maintains a deep interest.

STEPHEN S. SKIDMORE. Through his connection with the J. M. Griffith Lumber Company Mr. Skidmore is associated with one of the leading concerns of Downey. At the time of the incorporation of the company in 1887, he became a stockholder and has long acted as manager. In Cass county, Tex., Mr. Skidmore was born October 25, 1855, a son of William and Caroline (Williams) Skidmore, natives respectively of Kentucky and Tennessee. His father, who was a son of Thomas Skidmore, went to Alabama in youthful years and there learned the blacksmith's trade. The year 1836 found him in Paris, Tex., where he ran a blacksmith shop and also conducted a hotel business. About 1851 he removed to Cass county, Tex., and in 1869 came to California. After two years in San Diego he removed to Downey. During the Mexican war he was a ranger and a member of the home guard and at the time of the Civil war his sympathies were strongly on the side of the south. In politics he always voted with the Democrats. His death occurred at Downey in 1877 when he was sixty-five years of age. His wife passed away in 1898, aged eighty-three. They were the parents of the following-named children: John T., who died at fifty years of age; Marian, a resident of Long Beach, Cal.; George E., who died March 26, 1899; Edward U., of Downey; Margaret, whose home is at Long Beach; and Stephen S., of Downey.

At the time of coming to California Stephen S. Skidmore was a boy of fourteen, and two years later he settled with his parents at Downey, which he has since considered his home, although engaged in business at other points at different times. For two years he was employed as a baggageman on the Southern Pacific Railroad in Arizona and for two years he was employed in Los Angeles by the J. M. Griffith Lumber Company, with which he has been connected continuously since 1881. In the city where he now lives he married Miss Eliza Paulsell, by whom he has a son, Grey M., a promising young man, now employed in the Los Angeles office of the J. M. Griffith Company as collector and order clerk. With his wife, Mr. Skidmore holds membership in the Christian Church, in which he holds the office of elder.

W. B. VAIL. Before the Southern California boom had reached its climax, bringing with it a motley throng of settlers and followed by the years of depression and discouragement, Mr. Vail came to this state and identified himself with the promising city of Pasadena, where he has since made his home. At once after coming here he took up the business of contract painting, which he had previously followed in Kansas. Besides this special work, in which he has executed some of the most important contracts in the city, he also does considerable landscape painting.

In Perry county, Ohio, Mr. Vail was born June 1, 1850, a son of Sanford A. and Maria Ann (Rogers) Vail. His father, whose native place was Orange county, N. Y., cleared and improved a frontier farm, situated in Perry county, Ohio. After many active and busy years in that locality he removed still further westward, settling in Piatt county, Ill., in 1850, where he again found himself surrounded by pioneer environments. Once again, in 1870, he followed the march of civilization toward the west, establishing his home in Emporia, Kans. His death occurred in Topeka, that state. His wife was born near Pittsburg, Pa., and died in Emporia. They were the parents of nine children. One son, Stephen, now of Kansas, was a member of Company D, Seventy-third Illinois Infantry, during the Civil war and while fighting in the ranks at Perryville received a severe wound. Another son, Jackson, now living in Missouri, served in the same company and regiment. The sixth among the children was W. B., of Pasadena. He accompanied his parents to Illinois when nine years of age and to Kansas at the age of twenty. Hence his youth was spent principally amid the surroundings of the frontier and he had no special advantages for the acquirement of a finished education. In youth he learned the painter's trade, which he has since followed faithfully and well, winning approbation by reason of painstaking care with all contracts.

While living in Emporia, Kans., Mr. Vail married Miss Hattie L. Hart, of that city, by whom he has one son, Clarence E. The family are connected with the First Christian Church of Pasadena. Though not a partisan, Mr. Vail has opinions of his own concerning matters that affect the welfare of the nation, and gives his support to the Democratic party and its principles. Fraternally he is connected with the Knights of Pythias, Uniform Rank.

DON ANTONIO FRANCO CORONEL.
The ancestry of the Coronel family is traced back to the old world, where, according to tradition, the king of Spain was rescued from an otherwise fatal accident during a hunting expedition and the gallant hero of the occasion took the monarch to his home, where he nursed him back to health. In recognition of the deed, the king called him to the throne and knighted him, conferring upon him the name of Franco-Coronel. Later generations accompanied Cortez to Mexico, where the family still has numerous representatives. Don José Ygnacio Franco Coronel was a distinguished lawyer, and an officer under General Yturbe. On the breaking out of the Mexican war for independence, the tyranny which the people suffered led him to ally himself with the revolutionary cause. With him in this movement went the other members of the viceroy's royal guard. Private meetings were held in his house and the guard was equipped from his private purse, while his father, a man of large estate, furnished horses and saddles for all. For thirteen years he was an officer in the army. When Mexico had gained its freedom, he once more sought private life, and, exhausted by the hardships of many a severe campaign, he sought the recreation of a sea voyage, coming with the first colony to California. He was appointed to establish a seminary in Sonoma, but, the people not appreciating the opportunities thus afforded, he decided to return to Mexico. However, on reaching Los Angeles, he was prevailed upon to remain. Under his supervision was established the first school in this city, and this he conducted under the Lancastrian system. The schoolbooks used in this pioneer school have been carefully preserved and are among the prized possessions of Mrs. Mariana Coronel. In this city his family joined him, and here he made his home until his death in 1862.

At the time the family came to California Antonio Franco Coronel was a youth of seventeen years. He had studied for the priesthood in Mexico, but before the completion of his course, as his mind matured and his tastes became more pronounced, he realized that he was less fitted for this profession than for others. In this decision he was influenced somewhat by his desire to remain with his mother and minister to her comfort. He was ever a dutiful son, worthy of the affection of his mother, who was in many respects a remarkable woman. That she possessed unusual ability is proved by the fact that, during her husband's absence in the army and when necessity thrust upon her the support of the family, she learned the tailor's trade and established a large business. When her husband returned home he found the business so large that twenty-five men were required to conduct it. During the war she twice went into the enemy's camp, and on one occasion rescued her two young brothers by disguising them in women's clothes and sending them away, while she remained in their place, thereby narrowly escaping execution.

In 1836 Don Antonio Franco Coronel entered a tract of land from the Mexican government. This large property was situated in Los Angeles and formed the family homestead. He also became the owner of several ranches in Los Angeles and Orange counties. In many ways he proved himself a helpful, public-spirited citizen. He assisted the mission priests in compiling their annual reports to be sent to Spain and Mexico, and thus became acquainted with the native Indians, whose cause he warmly espoused. In securing data for "Ramona" Helen Hunt Jackson was greatly aided by himself and wife, and he furnished the data for the account of Father Junipero, the founder of California missions. Throughout all of his active life he was interested in movements for the development of local resources and the prosperity of the state. Many offices of importance were held by him. In 1838 he was appointed assistant secretary of tribunals for Los Angeles, in 1843 was made judge of first instance (justice of the peace), in 1844 was appointed inspector of southern missions, in 1846 was a captain and sergeant-at-arms in the Mexican army during the war with the United States, in 1847 and 1848 was a member of the body of magistrates, in 1850 and 1851 served as county assessor, in 1853 was elected mayor of Los Angeles, for thirteen years was a member of the city council, for some years efficiently filled the position of school director, and from 1866 to 1870 was honored with the office of state treasurer. A staunch believer in Democratic principles, he aided his party through his active and intelligent service as a member of county and state committees, and in other ways labored to win victory for its principles. At one time he was president of the Spanish-American Benevolent Society, while in the State Horticultural Society and in the Southern California Historical Society he was well known and highly honored. His father was a member of the first Masonic lodge organized in the City of Mexico, but he himself never became active in fraternal organizations, finding greater pleasure in the cultivation of his literary tastes. One of the delights of his later years was the collection of curios, Spanish, Indian and Mexican, and after his death Mrs. Coronel presented the collection to the city of Los Angeles. Since then it has been on exhibition in the Chamber of Commerce.

Not only was the name of Don Antonio Franco Coronel a power among the Spanish residents of California, but his influence was also great among the American residents. Born and reared in the city of Mexico, he had in youth acquired the polished and courtly manners characteristic of the sons of that southern city. Added to these he had the broad mind which education alone can give and the wide knowledge which indicates cosmopolitan tastes. Like his father, his sympathies were always with the people, and, though himself of a most aristocratic family in which pride of ancestry blended with pride of personal honor, he was essentially a man of the people, kind in his intercourse with all and charitable toward those in need. After seventy-seven active years, he died April 17, 1894, at his home on Seventh street and Central avenue, Los Angeles, and thus passed from among us one of the greatest and most honored representatives of the Spanish régime in California, as well as one of the most loyal supporters of our government under the subsequent American rule.

MRS. MARIANA W. DE CORONEL. Equal in many respects to the prominence which Don Antonio Franco Coronel attained among the citizens of Los Angeles was that gained by his talented wife, whose intimate connection with many charitable institutions and whose philanthropic spirit and recognized ability easily place her among the leading women of the city where for so many years she has made her home. On every hand are to be found evidences of her wise benevolence. Yet, numerous as are the enterprises in which she is interested, they are surpassed in number by the helpful charities which she has planned and the realization of which she hopes to consummate in future years. Ever active in promoting the welfare of others, for years she was the devoted counselor and companion of her husband, and since his death has given herself to carrying forward those movements with which he was in sympathy and toward which he was a liberal contributor.

The family of which Mrs. Coronel is a member traces its ancestry to the days of William the Conqueror, and the first of the name accompanied their cousin, Admiral Nelson, to America. Her grandfather, Rev. John Williamson, was a Methodist Episcopal minister, who in 1806 removed from Maine to Ohio and settled near the Harrison family, of national fame. Later they removed to the vicinity of Newport, in Campbell county, Ky. Her father, Nelson Williamson, was born in Wiscasset, Me., March 16, 1802, and was the oldest son in the family. When thirteen years of age, with a boy's eagerness for adventure, he left home and went to New Orleans, where he secured a position as second mate on a Mississippi river steamer. By a miracle, he escaped during a shipwreck in which the vessel sank. He then went to Texas and joined the volunteers under Gen. Winfield Scott, serving in the battles of Vera Cruz, Palo Alto, Buena Vista, Cerro Gordo, Cherubusco, Chapultepec, San Pascua and Tobasco. After the war he settled in San Antonio, Tex., where he engaged in contracting and building and also held the office of judge.

The discovery of gold in California turned the tide in the life of Mr. Williamson. As soon thereafter as his affairs could be adjusted he sought a home on the Pacific coast. While his party were proceeding through Eagle Pass, they were attacked by Comanches and all but three were killed. Fortunately, he escaped with only a slight wound in the knee. With this experience to discourage him, he returned to Texas, but found that a cyclone had destroyed his old home. The following year (1853) he again started west, and this time no catastrophe impeded his progress. Coming to Los Angeles, he bought property near San Gabriel mission. On securing a contract to erect the reservation buildings at Fort Tejon, he went there, but was informed by the quartermaster that lumber would not be ready for three weeks. To fill in the interim, he decided to go to the Kern river mining region, but while there was accidentally shot by a friend, who took him for a bear. The friend fled and it would have fared ill with the wounded man had not another friend happened along that way. With the aid of this man, he was taken to the stage and started back to Los Angeles, but it was three years before he had recovered from the injury and was able to resume work. Meantime his partner had sold all the property and left the country. Six years after he left for Texas he returned to San Antonio and brought his family to California, traveling via New Orleans and the Tehauntepec route and thence up the ocean to San Francisco. Arriving in Los Angeles in the latter part of 1859, he turned his attention to the real-estate and mercantile business, in which he continued until his death in 1893.

The marriage of Nelson Williamson united him with Gertrude Roman, daughter of Mariano and Francisca (Montollas) Roman. Her father was a large freighter in Texas and died of yellow fever when returning home from a freighting expedition to Galveston. During the revolution in San Antonio, when Santa Ana ordered all of the residents to leave, Mr. and Mrs. Roman were among those who were forced to abandon their homes. Shortly after they had left the city, in their cart, their daughter, Gertrude, was born. They settled in New Mexico, and some of the family were afterward massacred by the Comanche Indians there. The Montollas family had been massacred by the Taguacanos and Comanche Indians in New Mexico. Mrs. Gertrude Romana de Williamson died in San Antonio in June, 1894, in the faith of the Roman Catholic Church, to which she had always been a faithful adherent. Of her marriage four daughters and two sons were born, namely: Mariana, Mrs. Coronel; Elena, wife of L. C. Pollard, of Los Angeles; Roberto Owens, who died in 1890; Antoina Jefferson, who died young; Louisa, who married Dr. R. N. Hutchinson, of Santa Paula, and Gertrude, the wife of Charles F. Earl, of Azusa, who is engaged in the banking business in Chiapas, Mexico.

Only eight years of Mrs. Coronel's life were passed in Texas, and ever since then she has made Los Angeles her home. December 18, 1873, she was united in marriage with Don Antonio Franco Coronel, and during the twenty-one years of their happy married life she gave herself to promoting his happiness and ministering to his comfort. Since his death she has superintended the estate, which includes valuable property in Los Angeles and a ranch of six hundred and fifty acres at Whittier, besides important mining interests in Aliso Canon and Oaxaca, Mexico. Possessing a mind that is keen and active, the management of her property does not represent the limit of her energy. Among the numerous organizations with which she is actively connected may be mentioned the Indians Rights Association, the Southern California Historical Society, Ladies' Aid Society, Children's Home Society, Society of Los Angeles Pioneers, and others which are similar to the above in their purposes. In many a suffering home the rigors of want have been softened by her kindness. To homeless children and women her heart has ever gone out with the largest sympathy, and many have reason to remember with deepest gratitude her helpful assistance.

WELCOME SMITH. Originality of character and devotion to the cause of religion have been dominant traits in the personality of Mr. Smith. While still a mere lad he began to preach and in this labor he continued for about a half century, only ceasing from the work when the infirmities of age began to render his efforts too fatiguing for mind and body. In March of 1895 he came to California and settled in Redondo, where he owns three cottages on the beach and also three lots northeast of the planing mill. In spite of his seventy-seven years, he is quite robust and active, and is now at the head of a contracting business, employing others, however, to do the manual work connected with the same. In addition, he holds the offices of city recorder and justice of the peace.

From Rhode Island Stephen Smith went to Pennsylvania and later bought a farm of one hundred and sixty acres, on which he afterward engaged in farming. His death occurred there when he was eighty-two years of age. After going to Pennsylvania he married Lovina Tewksbury, who was born in that state and died there at eighty-five years. Her father, Thomas Tewksbury, was a native of Connecticut and a farmer by occupation; he lived to be eighty-three years of age, his wife dying at the age of ninety-three years. Welcome Smith received a common-school and academic education, making his boyhood home near Brooklyn, Pa., where he was born May 12, 1825. When eighteen and one-half years of age he began to preach in the Methodist Episcopal Church, and, although so young, he was said to rank with preachers many years his senior. Believing that he had been called to preach, he endeavored to do his duty in every respect, and made his chief ambition in life the conversion of men and women to Christianity. In 1855 he was ordained to the ministry at Binghamton, N. Y., by Bishop Morris, and two years later he was ordained an elder by Bishop Baker. For forty years he preached as an itinerant minister, traveling through northern Pennsylvania, southern New York and central Nebraska.

Perhaps no labor in which Mr. Smith engaged was more self-sacrificing in its nature or more gratifying in its results than that among the Onondaga Indians in New York, with whom he labored as a missionary for seven years. At the same time his present wife was the teacher of the mission school, and the two accomplished much in the way of civilizing the Indians and bringing them under the uplifting influences of Christianity. They organized the first lodge of Good Templars among the Indians and inculcated among them principles of temperance and sobriety. Indeed, along every line of uplifting work, they proved themselves true friends to the red men. Like all truly helpful influences, their work was done quietly and unostentatiously, and the extent of the good they did cannot be measured or estimated.

In Abington, Pa., Mr. Smith married Miss Teresa A. Sutton, who was born in Springville, Pa., and died in that state. The following children were born of this union: Ransom Wesley, Edmund Olin, Evaline, S. S., Stephen H., deceased, Ida E. and Sanford Stephen. The second marriage of Mr. Smith was solemnized in 1863 and united him with Hannah Vandervoort, who was born in Schoharie county, N. Y., being the daughter of Cornelius Vandervoort, a native of Pennsylvania and of Holland-Dutch ancestry. The four children born of this union are as follows: Elanora, wife of F. L. Whitney, of Lincoln, Neb.; Mamie, wife of F. H. Baillie, of San Bernardino, Cal.; Isabel, who is in San Bernardino; and Roy W., who remains with his parents. Both Mr. and Mrs. Smith are still deeply interested in the work of the Methodist Episcopal Church, she being a teacher in the Sunday-school as well as superintendent of the Junior League. The Eastern Star numbers her among its most influential workers, and at the time of the convention in San Francisco she was appointed a delegate, besides which she has filled various offices. Thirty-two years ago Mr. Smith was made a Mason in New York, and he is now a member of the blue lodge in Redondo. Although he was reared in the Democratic faith, he has voted with the Republicans ever since that party was organized, and during national campaigns his eloquence as a "stump" speaker brought many into a stanch advocacy of party principles, while at the time of the war (denied admission himself on account of poor health) he was instrumental in enlisting many volunteers to aid in preserving the Union.

N. S. SOUTHMAYD. As might be expected of one who has made his home in California much of the time since 1876, Mr. Southmayd is thoroughly in touch with the progress made by the state and is deeply interested in its welfare and growth. He was born in New York July 19, 1853, and is a son of Stephen and Lucinda (Winch) Southmayd, natives of Essex county, N. Y., the former of English descent, and the latter of Welsh ancestry. During middle life Stephen Southmayd removed to Wisconsin and settled upon a farm. Later he went to Iowa and still later established his home in Meade county, S. D., where he took up one hundred and sixty acres of government land. Of his thirteen children all but one attained mature years, N. S. being the fourth among these. He received such advantages as the country schools near his home rendered possible. At the age of thirteen he accompanied his parents to Wisconsin, where he assisted in the development and improvement of a farm. Later he worked on a farm in Blue Earth county, Minn., whence after three years he removed to California.

During the first two years of his life in the far west Mr. Southmayd engaged in farming near Sacramento, after which he spent four months in Portland, Ore., and next worked in the state of Washington for two years. Returning to Portland, he spent two years on a farm there. From there he came to Los Angeles, and afterward for five years was employed by the State Forestry board at Santa Monica. A later location was at Coldwater Canon, where he bought a farm of forty acres. On selling that place, he came to Gardena and purchased eighteen acres of partly improved land. Here he has built a house and barn, also has a well one hundred and sixty-six feet deep, and also another of ten inches. The greater part of his land is in barley and alfalfa, besides which there is a thriving orchard, and excellent pasturage for his ten cows. His income is increased by the sale of milk from his dairy. Though not active in politics he is a stanch Republican. In religion he is identified with the Methodist Episcopal Church.

The marriage of Mr. Southmayd took place in Los Angeles in 1889 and united him with Miss Hattie Louise Barton, who was born in Maine and was the youngest in a family of ten children. Her father, Joseph Barton, was an extensive and successful farmer in Maine, where his death occurred about 1899.

A. T. ARMSTRONG was reared in Augusta, Va., where he was born March 4, 1844. On the old ancestral homestead, inherited by his father, Archibald, he learned to be a model farmer, and received such education as was imparted at the public schools of his neighborhood. When twenty years of age he enlisted in the Civil war, and during the whole of his service was under the famous cavalry commander, Gen. Fitzhugh Lee. After the war Mr. Armstrong returned to the old Virginia homestead which he inherited at his father's death and farmed the same until 1868, when it passed by right of sale into other hands. He then removed to Rockbridge county, near Lexington, and purchased four hundred acres, which was sold after three years. From there he came to the vicinity of Santa Ana, Orange county, which has since been his home, and purchased the one hundred and ten acres comprising his ranch. He has come to be regarded as an authority on matters pertaining to scientific and modern farming in his neighborhood, and is the reporter of the agricultural department of Orange county, Cal., for the United States government.

CHARLES C. CHAPMAN, the owner of Santa Isabel rancho in Orange county, was born in Macomb, McDonough county, Ill., July 2, 1853. His father, Sidney Smith Chapman, was a native of Ohio, having been born in Ashtabula county in 1826. He was a descendant of one of three brothers who came from England to Massachusetts about 1650.

Sidney S. Chapman went to Macomb when about eighteen, and two years later was united in marriage with Rebecca Jane Clarke, eldest daughter of David and Eliza (Russell) Clarke, both natives of Kentucky, where the daughter was also born. To Mr. and Mrs. S. S. Chapman were born ten children, seven of whom grew to maturity and six of whom are still living, as follows: Frank M., of Covina; Charles C.; Christopher C.; Dolla, wife of W. C. Harris, of Los Angeles; Samuel James; and Luella, wife of J. Charles Thamer, of Chicago. Emma E., who became the wife of L. W. B. Johnson, died in 1888, leaving two children. The mother of Charles C. passed away at the family residence, No. 263 Walnut street, Chicago, January 2, 1874. The father died in October, 1893. He had led an active business life and was highly esteemed wherever known. Both were members of the Christian Church and charter members of the West Side Church of Chicago.

Charles C. Chapman received his education in the common schools of his native town and early began to make his way in the world. He was messenger boy in 1865, and remembers well carrying the message announcing the death of President Lincoln. For a time he was employed as clerk in a store. In 1868 the family moved to the village of Vermont, Ill., where Charles went early the following year. Under the instruction of his father, who was engaged in the building business, he learned the bricklayer's trade. December 19, 1871, he went to Chicago, where for a time he followed his trade. In that city, when only twenty, he superintended the construction of several buildings. In connection with his father and brother, Frank M., he followed mercantile life for a time, and subsequently alone for a year.

During the years 1876-77 Mr. Chapman engaged in canvassing in the interest of a local historical work in his native county, and in 1878 inaugurated this business for himself at Galesburg, Ill. He was soon joined by his brother, Frank M., but for a few years the firm name remained C. C. Chapman, when it was changed to Chapman Brothers. They engaged extensively in publishing local historical and biographical works. The company was subsequently merged into the Chapman Publishing Company.

In 1880 Chapman Brothers moved their office to Chicago, where for a dozen years the firm enjoyed prosperity, enlarging its business until it had an extensive printing and publishing plant. Several large buildings were also erected during this period. Among them were those at Nos. 87-93 South Jefferson street, 71-73 West Monroe street, and 75-77 of the same street; the Kenmore apartment building at Loomis and Plum streets; and the Vendome hotel building at Oglesby avenue and Sixty-second street, all in Chicago. Besides, there were over twenty dwellings. During the World's Fair, in 1893, Chapman Brothers engaged quite extensively in the hotel business. Owing, however, to the financial panic which swept the country, crippling the attendance at the great Fair, these enterprises caused heavy losses to the firm.

Early in January, 1894, Mr. Chapman went to Texas in order that his wife, who was suffering from pulmonary trouble, might have the benefit of the climate. In June of the same year he landed in California, taking up his residence in Los Angeles. Here, on the morning of September 19, 1894, while residing at the corner of Figueroa and Adams streets, Mrs. Chapman passed away. Her remains were laid at rest in Rosedale cemetery. Mrs. Chapman, formerly Miss Lizzie Pearson, daughter of Dr. C. S. and Nancy (Wallace) Pearson, was born near Galesburg, Ill., September 13, 1861. They were married at Austin, Tex., October 23, 1884. To them were born two children, Ethel Marguerite, born June 10, 1886, and Charles Stanley, January 7, 1889. Mrs. Chapman was a member of the Christian Church.

September 3, 1898, Mr. Chapman was united in marriage with Miss Clara Irvin, daughter of S. M. and Lucy A. Irvin, and a native of Iowa. She is a member of the Christian Church.

Mr. Chapman has been a member of the Christian Church since he was seventeen. He has served as superintendent of the Sunday school, deacon and elder for many years. For years he was a member of the Cook County Sunday-school Board, a member of the general board of the Young Men's Christian Association of Chicago, and the board of managers of the West Side department. He was one of the organizers of the board of city missions of the Christian Churches of Chicago.

Mr. Chapman is identified with many of the local movements in the interest of the community, and has held the office of president of the Anaheim Union Water Company. Upon coming to California he engaged in the fruit business, growing and shipping oranges and walnuts. He has made of the Santa Isabel rancho, in Orange county, one of the finest orange properties in California, and the brand under which the fruit is packed, the "Old Mission Brand," has a reputation second to none in the state.

W. W. SEAMAN. The responsible position of chief engineer of Hotel Green at Pasadena has been filled by Mr. Seaman since the first part of 1896, prior to which, since the fall of 1895, he had been employed in the capacity of second engineer. Under his supervision a new engine house has been erected and new machinery put in, the supervision of which work and the subsequent operation of the plant have been under his efficient management. He is connected with Los Angeles Local No. 2, National Association of Stationary Engineers, and maintains a keen interest in everything pertaining to advance and development along engineering lines.

The Seaman family was founded in America by George W., a native of Prussia, and the sole representative of his people in this country. His son, Charles S., was born at Milan, Ohio, where the father engaged in the manufacture of furniture for years, dying there when sixty-three. In religion he was a Lutheran. He married Margaret Meyers, who was born in Prussia and is now living in Milan, at eighty-four years of age (1902). Six sons and one daughter were born of their union, two of whom, Charles S. and William B., were soldiers in the Fifty-fifth Ohio Infantry, and the latter, who ranked as sergeant, fell in the battle of Bentonville. Charles S. Seaman was born November 6, 1846, and was only fifteen years of age when he volunteered in Company C, Fifty-fifth Ohio Infantry, which was mustered into service November 9, 1861. Among the battles in which he participated were those of Cross Keys, Va., second Bull Run, Fredericksburg and Chancellorsville. He was wounded May 3 and fell into the hands of the enemy, by whom he was taken to Libby prison. About seventeen days later he was paroled at College Green Hospital, Annapolis. On his return to the army he fought at Missionary Ridge and accompanied Sherman through Georgia to Atlanta, taking part in the many engagements of this campaign. At the expiration of his time he was honorably discharged November 11, 1864.

After his return home Charles S. Seaman learned the carpenter's trade, which he followed in Ohio, Iowa and Kansas. In 1887 he came to Pasadena, Cal., where he worked at his trade until 1896, since which time he has had charge of the carpentering department of Hotel Green. In Boone county, Iowa, he married Hallie Corbin, who was born in Illinois. Her father, James Corbin, a native of Ohio, became a miller in Boone county, Iowa, and later made Sumner county, Kans., his home, dying there when sixty-four years of age. The children of Charles S. Seaman are W. W., of Pasadena, and Mrs. Lena West, of Los Angeles. The son was born near Winfield, Sumner county, Kans., November 12, 1871, and in his infancy was taken by his parents to Toledo, Ohio, in 1878 accompanying them to Marshalltown, Iowa, where he attended the public schools. In 1887 he accompanied the family to Pasadena, where he completed his studies. On the completion of his apprenticeship to the trades of plumber, steamfitter and engineer, he entered the employ of the Hotel Green Company, and has since remained with them. He was married in Pasadena to Miss Mary Lewis, who was born in Boston, Mass. Fraternaly he is connected with the Maccabees.

WILLIAM H. WILEY, formerly of Pasadena, but now deceased, deserves recognition among our earliest pioneers. He made the overland journey with a younger brother, Joseph, crossing the Missouri river April 26, 1852, with a spring wagon drawn by four mules, and finally landing in California after three months and nine days on the plains. Mr. Wiley was born in Harrison county, Ohio, April 15, 1836, a son of Joseph and Ann (Roberts) Wiley, the former of Scotch ancestry, the latter of Welsh descent. His father, who was born in Westmoreland, Pa., was a member of one of the pioneer families of western Pennsylvania. Removing to Ohio, he followed farm pursuits and also devoted considerable attention to inventing, among other things inventing a fulling mill and cylinder thresher. After settling in Harrison county he married Miss Roberts, who was also of Pennsylvania parentage. They became the parents of six sons and six daughters, but only three are now living. Two sons, James and Wheeler, came to California during the exciting days of '49, two others, John and Thomas, followed in 1850, while William H. and Joseph came two years later. The survivors are John and Joseph.

When only three years of age William H. Wiley lost his mother, and six years later he was wholly orphaned by his father's death. When a boy he was employed on Illinois and Mississippi river boats for three years, also acted as steward of a boat (belonging to his brother-in-law) that sailed up these rivers and the Missouri and Ohio. On coming to California he engaged in the dairy business in Calaveras (now Amador) county; also engaged in mining and had a quartz mill at Sutter. In 1861, at the time of the Salmon river excitement in Idaho, he went there and was among the pioneers in the Boise Basin. During 1866 he prospected and mined in Old Mexico and Arizona, traveling over the country on horseback. Buying horses at Visalia, he took them to Nevada, then went to San Diego, Cal., and from there to New Mexico where he held a government position, also had a contract for carrying the mail. In 1870 he started a livery business at Anaheim, Cal., but soon went back to Idaho, from there went to Washington, and in 1878 returned to California. In the capacity of foreman for French & Drew he was engaged in building grades at San Diego and also graded the depot grounds at National City. His next location was Downey, where he carried on a livery business. In 1883 he came to Pasadena and started a livery business, soon after which he bought the site at No. 64 Colorado street. When he came there were only a few buildings in the business part of the city. In addition to the management of his livery barn, he owned and superintended an orange ranch. His death occurred August 1, 1902.

September 18, 1872, in Anaheim, Mr. Wiley married Mary Grace Evey, who was born in Illinois and in 1870 settled in Anaheim with her father, Judge Edward Evey, who later filled the position of supervisor, judge, county clerk and member of the constitutional convention. Mrs. Wiley is a member of the Christian Church. Her only living child is Mrs. Laura Kimball, of Fresno county, Cal. A son, Francis, died at one year of age. While at Mokelumne Hill, Cal., Mr. Wiley was initiated into Masonry, and later was connected with Pasadena Lodge No. 72, F. & A. M. He was a member of the Pasadena Board of Trade and in politics was a staunch Republican. Could all of his experiences during pioneer days be written out in full, it would form an interesting and large volume, and many hours could be passed entertainingly in his company, when, in a reminiscent mood, he turned back to the past, and narrated his experiences in taking out the first gold from quartz in Idaho, or in traveling up Snake and Columbia rivers in a skiff, driving a herd of hogs from Oregon to Idaho, or any of the other many events that made thrilling and interesting the pioneer days.

WILSON C. PATTERSON. Wilson C. Patterson, the president of the Los Angeles National Bank, was born in Ross county, Ohio, January 10, 1845. He was one of a large family whose father was a farmer. He grew up under rural influences and attended the local district school, where he obtained the rudiments of his education. At the age of about fifteen he commenced a course of study in Salem Academy at South Salem, Ohio. Upon the breaking out of the war between the states he, then a youth of eighteen years, joined the federal army and was mustered into Company A, First Regiment, Ohio Volunteer Heavy Artillery. He remained in active service from July, 1863, until the close of hostilities. On his return home he resumed his academic studies, but the necessity of earning his own support forced him to leave school a few months later. Soon after leaving the academy he went to Chillicothe, the county seat of his native county, where he secured a clerical position in the office of the county treasurer. Later, as an accountant, he was employed in the office of M. Boggs & Co., wholesale grocers of Chillicothe. With that firm he remained in positions of trust for upwards of nineteen years, when, owing to impaired health, in 1888 he came to California.

He was soon benefited in health, and, becoming socially attached to many of the city's progressive people, he decided to make it his home. In 1890 he was made a director of the Los Angeles Board of Trade and the following year was elected its president, which position he held for two years. In 1894 he was elected a director of the Chamber of Commerce and likewise of the Merchants' Association. In 1895 he was chosen president of the Chamber of Commerce, which position he filled with marked ability for two years. He is still a member of that body and chairman of the committee on commerce.

Mr. Patterson was for twelve years the head of the house of W. C. Patterson & Co., wholesale produce and commission merchants, and for ten years sole owner. For several years he was a director of the First National Bank of Los Angeles, and in November, 1898, he was elected president of the Los Angeles National Bank, to succeed George H. Bonebrake. He is also a director of the Southern California Savings Bank. He takes a warm interest in all matters of practical benevolence and is a director of the Associated Charities. As president of the Land of Sunshine Publishing Company he has been identified with one of the leading publications of the Pacific coast. Fraternally he is connected with Stanton Post, G. A. R., and is a thirty-second degree Scottish Rite Mason. In 1894 and again in 1896 his name was prominently mentioned in connection with the mayoralty of Los Angeles, but he adhered to his resolution of former years to keep out of politics, and therefore declined the proffered honors.

In February, 1896, Mr. Patterson was delegated a representative of the Free Harbor League to go to Washington, D. C., to appear before the congressional committee on rivers and harbors, in the interests of the deep-water harbor at San Pedro. The characteristic faithfulness, energy and success with which he performed this important mission had a pronounced and salutary effect upon the outcome of the San Pedro harbor controversy. His labors in that behalf were cheerfully recognized by the body he so ably represented and by a grateful public. In April of the same year he again went to the national capital on a similar mission as chairman of a delegation of citizens to lay the claims of San Pedro harbor before the committee on commerce of the United States senate, and the splendid work of this delegation is a part of the history of Southern California.

CHARLES E. FRENCH was born in Athens, Somerset county, Me., June 3, 1841, and was educated in the public schools and seminaries of that state. When about sixteen years of age he entered a business house in Boston where he was rapidly advancing in positions of trust. On the breaking out of the Civil war he enlisted in the Ninth Regiment of Maine Volunteers and was assigned to the Army of the Potomac, being afterwards transferred to Commodore Dupont's naval expedition which bombarded and captured the forts at Port Royal, S. C., in November, 1861. Continuing in the service until failure of his health necessitated his retirement from the army, he came to California via Panama route in 1864 and located in Yreka, Siskiyou county, where he engaged in mining and general merchandising. After spending a few years on this coast he returned east and in November, 1868, married Miss Emma L. Waugh of Boston.

Resuming business in Maine, Mr. French became a member of a boot and shoe manufacturing firm and was also appointed assistant assessor of internal revenue by President Grant. Finding it impossible to endure the rigors of eastern winters, he resigned his office, sold out his business in 1870 and returned to San Francisco where he expected to permanently reside, but being advised by his physicians to seek a more genial climate, he came to Southern California in April, 1871, and assumed the general management of the extensive land and stock business of Irvine, Flint & Co., whose holdings then comprised the Ranchos San Joaquin, Lomas de Santiago and part of the Santiago de Santa Ana, upon which latter ranch the city of Santa Ana is now located. At that time there were very few white inhabitants residing in the country southeast of Anaheim, between the Santa Ana river and San Diego. The entire country from the foothills to the sea was one vast cattle and sheep range. Mr. French had over one hundred thousand acres of land under his control and at times during his administration there were over fifty thousand head of sheep grazing upon the broad sweep of the San Joaquin, where to-day is heard the busy hum of modern machinery, harvesting thousands of acres of waving grain grown upon these fertile lands.

In 1876 Mr. French removed the ranch headquarters to the present location east of Tustin and erected the commodious ranch house now occupied by the owner, James Irvine and family.

Two years later, in 1878, he relinquished the management of the company's business and removed to Santa Ana where he had previously made investments. He engaged in the land business and at once took an active interest in the upbuilding of the town. In 1886 he erected the brick block adjoining the Bristol and Rowley block on the east and in 1899 he built the Grand opera house block, the largest in the city. He served as postmaster at Santa Ana, holding office under Hayes, Garfield, Arthur and Cleveland. He took an active part in securing the main line of the Santa Fe Railway through Santa Ana, to which undertaking he freely devoted much time and means and was twice elected a director of the California lines of that system, which has been such an important factor in the growth of Southern California.

Mr. French devotes his time largely to his banking interests and real-estate holdings. He is president of the Orange County Savings Bank and a director of the First National Bank of Santa Ana. When the first street railway for Santa Ana was projected, Mr. French took an active part in establishing it and served as its secretary for several years. The road has now become a part of the interurban railway. He was also one of the promoters and incorporators of the Los Angeles & Ocean Railway Company and held the office of vice-president of the same until the road merged into the Los Angeles Terminal, now the San Pedro, Los Angeles & Salt Lake Railway.

JAMES GORDON BAIRD, M. D., was one of ten brothers and sisters. Born October 20, 1846, near Ottawa, Carlton county, Ontario, he received his higher education in Ottawa Collegiate Institute and after a four years' course in the medical department of McGill University, at Montreal, was graduated in 1870 with the degree of Doctor of Medicine. The same year he commenced practice in the Montreal General Hospital, spending six months there profitably. Then, during the ensuing period of eighteen years, he was established at Pakenham, Canada, after which he went to London, England, for the purpose of taking some post-graduate work and special branches. Fourteen months were spent abroad, a portion of the time being passed in Paris and Edinburgh, and the hospital experience he thus acquired has been of great value to him. In the autumn of 1889 he returned to Canada, and in the following February came to Riverside. In 1900 he took a post-graduate course in Chicago. Making a specialty of diseases of the nose, throat and lungs, and carrying on a large general family practice in medicine and surgery, he is justly classed among the leading members of his profession in Southern California.

As previously mentioned, Dr. Baird gives considerable attention to horticulture, and now owns two flourishing orange orchards in this city, one of eight acres, located on Indiana avenue, and the other, a tract of ten acres, being situated on Kansas avenue. In 1899 he built a handsome modern residence over which presides his estimable wife, formerly Miss Marion Lett, of Canada. They are identified with the Episcopal Church of Riverside and move in the best social circles of the city. One daughter blessed this union, F. Agnes Baird. The Doctor was initiated into Masonry in Pakenham, Canada, and also is a Knight of Pythias. In politics he is a Republican.

FRANK LEVERETT SPAULDING. By the side of Dr. Warren in the battle of Bunker Hill fought a man as brave as that illustrious general, but who by the fortunes of war is less known to fame. This soldier, Capt. John Spaulding, saw his general fall in battle and himself suffered severe wounds, but no disaster lessened his valor, and he remained a true patriot until finally the British arms were defeated, after a struggle of seven years. Little is known of his life, save that he was born in Nashua, N. H., and spent his entire life in that state. His son, Joseph, a native of Rumney, N. H., followed contracting and building, as did also the next in line of descent, Hon. J. Lyman Spaulding, a native and lifelong resident of Rumney, and a man of prominence in his state. Several times he was elected selectman, for one term served as sheriff of Grafton county, and also received from his party (the Republican) election as a member of the state legislature, where his service was an honor to the man and to his constituents. Fraternaly he was a Knight Templar Mason.

The marriage of J. Lyman Spaulding united him with Mary Ordway, who was born in Utica, N. Y., and now resides in Boston, Mass. Her father, Joseph Ordway, a native of New York, was a member of a colonial family of New Hampshire. The five children of J. Lyman and Mary Spaulding are living, one son, Quincy, being a contractor and builder in Los Angeles, as is also the third child, Frank L. The latter was born at Rumney, N. H., October 27, 1858, and attended the grammar and high schools of his native town, later graduating from Newhampton Seminary and Commercial College. From boyhood he has been familiar with the building business. In 1880 he went to Massachusetts to act as superintendent for Mead, Mason & Co., one of the largest firms of contractors in New England, and later he was connected with Norcross Brothers, a well-known firm in the same line.

A vacation trip to Los Angeles in 1888 gave Mr. Spaulding such a delightful impression of the country that he determined to remain. Until the La Verne Land Company closed out its business he had charge of its building operations. Since 1890 he has engaged in contracting for himself, meantime having the contracts for the California Health Resort's buildings at Strawberry Valley, Rivera Hotel at Long Beach, the First Church of Christ, Scientist, at Riverside, the First Church of Christ, Scientist, in Los Angeles, Bonner & Puck block, First Baptist Church, Westlake Methodist Episcopal and German Baptist Churches of Los Angeles, the Long Beach Presbyterian Church, Long Beach grammar school, Gephard block in Los Angeles, etc. Much of his work has been in the building of church edifices and his success in this specialty has brought him into notice throughout Southern California, where he has had the contracts for more than thirty churches. In addition to contract work, he has done some building for himself, including the erection of his residence at No. 737 East Twenty-seventh street. He is a director in the Rivera Hotel Company of Long Beach. In the Builders' Exchange he is a member of the board of directors, while he is a charter member of the Master Builders' Association. Two sons, William Lyman and Leverett Tileston, have been born of his union with May J. Lyman, who was born in Montana, but grew to womanhood in California. In politics he is a loyal Republican, while fraternaly he is connected with the Masons, the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Maccabees.

JOHN L. ADAMS, the chief engineer of the Distilled Ice and Cold Storage Company of Los Angeles, was born in Newburgh, N. Y., February 20, 1866. His father, William Adams, was born near Belfast, Ireland, and when a child came with his parents to America and located in Newburgh. Possessed of business ability and high character, he soon became identified with the substantial commercial interests of the city, and as a partner of Stephen McKinstry ran a large tannery up to the time of his retirement. He is a Republican in national politics, and is connected with the Presbyterian Church. His wife, formerly Susan Lowrey, was born in the north of Ireland, and when a babe in arms came with her parents to America. Mrs. Adams was the mother of two sons and one daughter, of whom John L. is the only survivor.

When eight years of age John L. Adams lost his mother by death, and he continued to live with his father at Newburgh on the Hudson, where he was educated in the public schools and graduated from the high school. When eighteen years of age he began to serve an apprenticeship of four years as a machinist with Ward, Stanton & Co., the well-known shipbuilders of Newburgh, following which he worked at his trade in New York City with the firm of Delemarter & Co., shipbuilders. For a time he was associated with Captain Erickson while constructing his solar engine, and was afterwards with the Pictet Artificial Ice and Engine Company, and later still with the Newburgh Ice Machine and Engine Company. In the latter capacity he served as erecting engineer and traveled all over Canada, the south and middle states, and finally came to the coast in the interests of the firm in July of 1900. After putting in an engine for the Southern California Ice Company at San Bernardino and instructing the engineer in its use, he returned to the east, and later superintended the erection of the plant for the Distilled Ice and Cold Storage Company at Los Angeles. This is one of the important concerns of the kind in Los Angeles, and as chief engineer Mr. Adams has a large responsibility for which he is admirably fitted. The plant is modern in all of its appointments, and has a capacity of thirty-five tons per day.

Mr. Adams is enterprising and wide-awake to the interests of his adopted town, and is variously associated with its social and material circles. At Newburgh he was connected with the Masonic Lodge No. 309, and is still a member of that organization, and he was also a member of the Lawson Hose Company of Newburgh, of which he is still an honorary associate. In political affiliation he is a Republican every day in the year, and is a staunch supporter of the issues and principles of his chosen party. He ranks high among expert engineers of the country, and his success has more than justified his early selection and aspirations.

RICHARD ARENZ. When a boy the home of Mr. Arenz was in Dusseldorf, Germany, and his earliest memories are of that beautiful old town, with its attractive villas and gardens lying on the right bank of the Rhine; with its historic old castle; its famous Academy of Art, founded in 1777; its museums, observatory and charitable institutions. In this city he was born June 22, 1868, the fifth among eight children and the only son in the family. The records show that the Arenz ancestry has possessed valor in battle and energy in business. At the battle of Waterloo Johann Arenz, a boy of seventeen years, fought with such bravery that he was awarded two medals in recognition of his valor, and one of these is a valued possession of the soldier's grandson, Richard Arenz. Not only did this brave youth serve in the Prussian army from 1812 to 1815, but one of his brothers also shared in the vicissitudes of the Napoleonic campaigns, but after the ill-fated march to Moscow he was never heard of, and it is supposed that he perished with so many of those gallant soldiers who left home never to return.

During the war of 1848 Frederick William, son of Johann Arenz, served in the German army, and afterward became proprietor of a tannery at Dusseldorf. In 1880 he sold the business and brought his family to America, where he is now living retired. To some extent he has drifted from the religious faith of his forefathers, who were of the Reformed Church, his membership now being with the Methodist Episcopal denomination. His wife, Caroline Polhaus, was born in Germany and died there before he came to the United States. Their son, Richard, was educated in German and English, and studied under a tutor in Chicago, also in the night schools of that city. About 1881 he was apprenticed to the trade of painter and finisher, remaining for five years with the Bruske Furniture Company, after which he worked for wages. In 1887 he began in business for himself, first taking contracts only for finishing and polishing, but afterward becoming a contracting painter as well. During 1889 he followed his trade in Portland, Ore., but returned to Chicago and spent two more years there.

The first year (1892) that Mr. Arenz spent in Los Angeles, he worked for others. Afterward he began to take contracts for painting and is now a member of the firm of Wing & Arenz, which has the leading business in its line in the city, having had among other contracts those for the Laughlin building, Posey residence, Christian Science Church, Van Nuys residence, Raymond hotel, Angelus hotel, Mrs. Harding's residence on Chester Place, etc. Along the line of his chosen occupation, Mr. Arenz is a member of the Builders' Exchange and the Master Painters' Association, while fraternally he is connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. Since coming to this city he has married, his wife having been Miss Emma C. Rattey, a native of Wisconsin. They are the parents of four children: Eunice Ruth, Mildred May, Violet Beatrice and an infant son. Their home is at Nos. 533-535 Wall street. The family are connected with the First German Methodist Episcopal Church, to the maintenance of which Mr. Arenz is a regular contributor. Loyal to the institutions of his adopted country, he is especially interested in movements tending to promote the progress of California and increase the commercial importance of his home city. Both in local and national elections he votes the Republican ticket, being a firm believer in the principles of this party.

J. A. ALTHOUSE. One of the well-improved berry ranches of Gardena is owned and occupied by Mr. Althouse and comprises sixteen acres, largely under cultivation to Logan berries and strawberries, with other varieties of fruits, while five acres are under alfalfa. A substantial ranch house provides a comfortable home for the family, while that perplexing desideratum of California ranches, good water, is secured by a well two hundred and eighteen feet deep, operated by a windmill. On his place are granary, barns and the other improvements of a first-class estate.

A resident of California since 1887, Mr. Althouse was born near Brush Valley, Pa., March 14, 1861, and is a son of Rev. Henry and Julia Ann (Myers) Althouse, natives of Pennsylvania. His father devoted all of his active years to the preaching of the Gospel, being a minister of the German Evangelical Association from the age of twenty-five until he was retired by reason of the infirmities of years. During 1867 he removed from Pennsylvania to Iowa, where he served the church at Muscatine one year, that at Dubuque one year, and later presided over the congregation at Independence, Iowa, for two years, after which he was stationed in Hardin county, that state, for two years. The year 1878 found him in Nebraska, where he held pastorates in Cass county for three years, and in Stanton county for seven years. During his residence in the latter county he was transferred to the ranks of superannuated ministers. In 1887 he came to Los Angeles and retired wholly from active labors. His death occurred in Los Angeles in 1895, when he was seventy-six years of age. His wife was a daughter of a lifelong resident and farmer of Pennsylvania. By their marriage six sons were born, J. A. being the third of these. His boyhood years were passed in Pennsylvania and Iowa and his education was obtained in common schools. When sixteen years of age he accompanied the family to California, after which he assisted his father in his various horticultural and farming affairs. About 1894 he came to Gardena, where he has since made his home.

The marriage of Mr. Althouse took place in Los Angeles and united him with Miss Bertha Boeck, a native of Germany. They have three children, Benjamin, Henry and Edith, all at home. The family are believers in the faith of the German Evangelical Association, in which doctrines Mr. Althouse was reared under his father's kindly guidance. Though he has at no time been active in politics, he is a decided adherent of Republican principles, and always supports them in local and general elections.

THOMAS A. ASBRIDGE. The Asbridge family are of colonial Virginian ancestry and remote English extraction. Martin Killian Asbridge, a native of the old Dominion and a soldier in the war of 1812, became a pioneer of Kentucky, where he was postmaster and a merchant of Saratoga, Lyon county. At an advanced age he retired from business pursuits and removed to an adjoining county, where he died at little less than one hundred years of age. His wife, who bore the maiden name of Nancy Rich, was also a Virginian and at the time of her death had almost rounded a full century. Their son, Joseph Killian Asbridge, was born in Kentucky, and owned and occupied a farm of six hundred and fifty acres near Eddyville, Lyon county. For a wife he chose Martha Harris, who was born in Kentucky, of Virginian parentage. Both died on the Lyon county homestead. Of their eight children, Thomas was the fourth child and oldest son, and is now the sole survivor of the family. He was born on the homestead near Eddyville May 11, 1859, and was twelve years of age when his father died. In his early manhood he married Miss Anna Rice, who was born in Syracuse, N. Y. Afterward he continued to operate the home farm for a time.

When the railroad was building between Paducah and Elizabeth, Mr. Asbridge was engaged as a sub-contractor on its construction, although up to this time he had never seen a railroad train. Later he took contracts in other parts of Kentucky, also in Ohio and Missouri. In 1874 he went to Pocahontas, Ark., where he engaged in the freighting business, also took railroad contracts, and at the same time learned the trade of bricklayer and mason, completing the trade in Union county, Ill., and working in the building of the insane asylum at Anna, that state. Between the years 1879 and 1881 he engaged in contracting and building in New Mexico. During the latter year he removed to New Mexico, where he aided in building the Plaza hotel in Las Vegas and built the academy, the opera house and a number of residences and business houses there.

After having spent the summer of 1883 in Silver City, N. M., which was then in the midst of a boom, Mr. Asbridge came to California in the fall of that year and for three years engaged in contracting and building in Los Angeles. He built a home on West Tenth street which he sold for $5,500. In 1886 he went to Ukiah, Mendocino county, this state, where, in addition to having a livery barn, he took contracts for running stage lines and carrying mail. From there he returned to Los Angeles in 1893 and has since built the residence at No. 1020 West First street which he now occupies. Among the contracts that he has filled may be mentioned the following: Lankershim block, Lawyer's building, Jones, Foster and Ralph buildings; the masonry work on the first school buildings in Los Angeles and on the Times building, besides contracts for many residences, among them being some of the finest in the city. The masonry work in the residence of D. L. Althouse and that of Judge Banning indicates the substantial character of his contracts. He had the contracts for the Wright & Callender block, the Fox building, the Spurl wagon and carriage factory, the Southern Refining Company's plant, Bacon building, and the warehouse for the paper manufactory. He is a member of the Builders' Exchange and vice-president of the Master Masons' Association. In addition to his large contracting business, he owns oil stock, and is interested in valuable oil lands in Kern county, also in Black mountain. The importance of opposing the liquor traffic has caused him to ally himself with the Prohibitionists, whose principles he upholds, both in practice and in theory. An active worker in the Church of the Nazarene, he is at this writing a member of its official board and has always been a generous contributor to its maintenance.

J. A. ATCHISON. The ranch of which Mr. Atchison is manager and in which he owns a half interest comprises forty acres at Gardena. Of this tract twenty-eight acres are in alfalfa, five acres in berries, and the balance in assorted fruits. An abundance of water is obtained by means of a private pumping plant, with one hundred inches' capacity. In addition to maintaining a close oversight of this place, Mr. Atchison owns an interest in the Bingham Pasteurized Milk Company, which he assisted in starting and which now has an output of almost eight hundred gallons daily.

In Bruce county, Ontario, Canada, Mr. Atchison was born January 11, 1872, being a son of Thomas and Ellen (McFarland) Atchison, natives respectively of Huron and Bruce counties, Ontario. His paternal grandfather, William Atchison, was a native of county Donegal, Ireland, and about 1845 emigrated to Canada, where the improvement of a farm occupied his remaining years. The maternal grandfather, Joseph McFarland, was also of Irish birth. In the family of Thomas Atchison there were two sons and two daughters, of whom J. A. was the second in order of birth. His boyhood years were passed in the usual manner of Canadian lads, whose sports were naturally very different from those of the children of Southern California. When the time came for him to assume life's duties and responsibilities, he turned his attention to farming and also learned the blacksmith's trade, but, tiring of the quiet round of duties in his Canadian home, he sought a diversion by coming to Montana, where he secured employment as a cow puncher. During 1895 he came to California, settling at Cerritos, Los Angeles county. Four years later he removed to Los Angeles and bought one-half interest in the Bingham Pasteurized Milk Company, the success of which has been enhanced by his efforts. In 1902 he came to Gardena in order to assume the management of a ranch, in which he was a part owner. While in Los Angeles he married Miss Louise Burwash, who was born in Canada, and by whom he has one son, Allen. Though a recent comer to Gardena, he takes a warm interest in the prosperity of the town, is active in local Republican matters, and believes in supporting all measures for the benefit of town, county and state. Fraternally he is connected with the blue lodge of Masons and the Independent Order of Foresters.

HENRY AUFDEMKAMP. To his occupation of building and contracting Mr. Aufdemkamp brings an extensive experience and a thorough European training. He was born in the city of Hanover, Germany, February 2, 1865, and is a son of Ernest and Mary (Graefenkamper) Aufdemkamp, also natives of Hanover. Ernest Aufdemkamp enlisted in the German army in 1848, and served as captain in the Schleswig-Holstein war in 1866-7. He was a builder for many years of his active life, and died in the land which he had faithfully served as soldier and upright business man. His wife, who is still living, is the mother of nine children, eight of whom are living, Henry being the third.

The youth of Mr. Aufdemkamp was not devoid of hardship and responsibility, for at the age of ten years he began to work with his father at the carpenter's trade, and when fourteen years old was apprenticed to a contractor with whom he remained for three years. He subsequently engaged as a journeyman carpenter, and while plying his trade managed to see considerable of the country and became familiar with the different provinces. At the age of twenty he arrived in New York, whence he at once proceeded to Madison, N. J., and at the end of eighteen months went to Trenton, N. J., in both of which cities he worked at carpentering.

In October, 1887, Mr. Aufdemkamp located in Los Angeles, a stranger in a strange land, and having little to start with save his own determination. He was not long in securing something to do in his favored line, and the following year began to contract, an occupation in which he has met with success. Among the buildings attributed to his ingenuity may be mentioned the Times building, the barracks at the Soldiers Home, the addition to the dining room and hospital at the Soldiers Home, fire house No. 12, Los Angeles, built in 1899, besides numerous public buildings and private residences. On his own responsibility Mr. Aufdemkamp has erected a number of residences in the city, besides his own comfortable home at No. 520 East Twelfth street, which is presided over by his wife, formerly Mary Willauer, a native of Alsace, and whom he married at Trenton, N. J.

Fraternally Mr. Aufdemkamp is a member of Goodwill Lodge No. 323, I. O. O. F., is past noble grand, past district deputy grand master, and a member of the Encampment and the Canton. He is also associated with the Elks.

T. A. Golish

A staunch Democrat, he has never sought political office, and is sufficiently broad in his inclinations to vote for the best man regardless of political ties. With his wife he is affiliated with the German Methodist Episcopal Church, of which he is a charter member and a member of the board of trustees, as well as ex-secretary of the board and of the Sunday-school. Mr. Aufdemkamp is not in need of praise for the extent of his contributions toward the upbuilding of Los Angeles, for his work speaks for itself, and the patronage of which he is the recipient is proof of the confidence of his fellow-townsmen.

JAMES ARNOLD BARROWS was born in Mansfield, Tolland county, Conn., February 25, 1830, a son of Joshua P. and Polly (Bingham) Barrows, descendants of a long line of Connecticut ancestors. He was one of three children, of whom the only daughter was born August 11, 1823, and died May 5, 1890. His father was born April 12, 1794, and died February 21, 1887; while his mother was born May 14, 1790, and died April 17, 1864. The paternal grandparents were Joshua and Anna (Turner) Barrows, and the maternal, Oliver and Lucy (Moulton) Bingham.

The younger years of our subject's life were spent upon a farm. After he became of age he went to Massachusetts and for some years was employed in a shoe factory. While there, in 1855, he married Miss Abby Barrows and they returned in 1858 to his old home at Mansfield, where she died. July 5, 1860, he was a second time married, his wife being Cornelia Storrs Swift, daughter of Earl and Lucy (Bailey) Swift, both lifelong residents of Connecticut. Her father died April 17, 1865, at the age of fifty-seven years, and her mother June 7, 1864, at the age of fifty-two; there were three children in the family, Mrs. Barrows and two brothers who live in Connecticut. Of the children of Mr. Barrows, Abby was born May 20, 1861, and died July 26, 1893; Lucy was born May 15, 1864, and died April 10, 1865; Carrie M., born October 6, 1865, married P. J. Wilson, a merchant at University, Los Angeles, and they have two daughters, Hazel and Juanita. Jennie M., born January 4, 1874, became the wife of George A. Shepard, who is now engaged in mining in Alaska.

In 1862 Mr. Barrows enlisted in the Twenty-second Connecticut Infantry and served for ten months, being discharged at the expiration of his time. Returning to the old farm, he remained there until 1868, when the place was sold. In April of that year he and his wife, with their two children, left New York on the steamer Ocean Queen for California, coming via the isthmus and stopping at Acapulco and Manzanillo. At Panama they took the steamer

Golden Age for San Francisco, and in just one month from the time of starting arrived in Los Angeles, May 16, 1868. During the first year here Mr. Barrows clerked for his brother, and afterward he and his brother bought the dairy of L. J. Rose, which comprised one hundred head of cattle. Of that he had charge for seven years, when the dairy was sold. After his brother retired from the hardware business, he took it up and continued in it for ten years, since which time he has lived retired from business cares. He is a charter member of the Society of Los Angeles Pioneers and has always been interested in that organization. He and his wife were charter members of the first Congregational Church organized in Los Angeles and have always been liberal contributors to the work of that denomination, besides taking an active part in the various activities of their church.

TONY A. GOLISH. While he is by birth a German, having been born near Berlin, January 21, 1870, Mr. Golish has no recollection of his childhood home, as he was only two years of age when the family crossed the ocean and settled in Northfield, Minn. His parents, Jacob and Annie Golish, were natives of Germany, the former following the milling business there and in Minnesota. In 1887 he came to Los Angeles, where his wife died and where he still makes his home. In the family of ten children, all but one are still living. The third among these is T. A., of Pasadena. While still a boy he was employed in a grist mill for three years and after that time learned the machinist's trade with the Ames Milling Company at Northfield. The year 1888 found him in Los Angeles, where he secured a position as engineer with the Consumers' Gas Company, and in the two years of his connection with them he also learned the manufacture of gas.

Returning to Northfield, Minn., in 1889, Mr. Golish became machine tender in the mills. Two years later he came once more to California. The Chino beet sugar factory was then in process of erection and he assisted in putting in the machinery, engines, pumps, etc., after which he remained with the company as machinist. In 1891 he came to Pasadena as assistant foreman for the Lowe Gas Company, in which position he continued for two years, and then was promoted to be foreman. When the concern was merged into the Pasadena Consolidated Gas Company he continued with the new organization in the same capacity, and is still holding the responsible position of foreman. Under his supervision the plant has been enlarged, until it is now three times as large as at first, having a capacity of two hundred and twenty-five thousand cubic feet per day. In addition to being an expert machinist and engineer, he is also a gas-maker, and while in Los Angeles assisted W. C. Boyer and L. C. Clark in the manufacture of gas from crude oil. Politically he votes with the Republican party. By his marriage, in Los Angeles, to Miss Adelia Cuen, a native of Mexico, he has five children, Lillian, Frank, William, Amanda and Raymond Arthur.

JOHN H. BEAN. A resident of Los Angeles since the fall of 1895. Mr. Bean is of eastern birth and remote English descent. His father, Levi, and grandfather, John Bean, were natives of Chittenden county, Vt., of which the great-grandfather was a pioneer farmer. During the war of 1812 the grandfather went to the front with the Green Mountain boys and bore a brave part in securing victory for American arms, taking part in several important engagements, among them the battle of Plattsburg. During 1856 Levi Bean moved from Vermont to New York and settled at Burke, Franklin county, where he improved a farm from the forest, turning his attention to agriculture from contracting and building, in which he had previously engaged. After years of successful connection with farming, in 1885 he returned to Vermont, to spend his last days in the midst of the scenes familiar to him in early life. His death occurred in the fall of 1900 when he was eighty-five years of age.

The wife of Levi Bean was Cornelia Hill, who was born in Milton, Vt., and died at Burke, N. Y., when fifty-seven years of age. Her father, Capt. John Hill, also a native of Milton, was owner of a farm and also ran a small sloop. During the war of 1812, in which he served, he took the commodore of the American fleet out on his sloop to reconnoiter the lakes. He also helped to place the cannon on the bridge and to remove the plank that kept the British out of Plattsburg. At the time of his death he was ninety-six, while his wife, Olive, lived to be ninety-eight. In the family of Levi and Cornelia Bean there were nine children, all but three of whom are still living, J. H. being next to the youngest. He was born August 28, 1865, on the home farm in Franklin county, N. Y., of which he is now the owner. While still a boy he learned the carpenter's trade under his father, and when sixteen he took his first contract, this being for the erection of a large barn. From that day to this, with the exception of two years, he has followed contracting and building, being in Burke, N. Y., from 1881 to 1895, and in Los Angeles since 1895.

On first coming to this city, Mr. Bean followed the carpenter's trade in the employ of others, and was foreman for Jacobi, later for Harriman. In May, 1898, he began to take contracts, since which time he has erected, among other residences, those for E. W. Gilmore, E. B. Roth, Major R. N. Smith, Dr. Fish, Mr. Phillips and the Concordia Club, corner of Sixteenth and Figueroa streets. He superintended the erection of the buildings of the American Oil Asphalt Works in Los Angeles. All his contracts are carefully filled and promptly executed. System and despatch are noticeable in all of his work. Among the builders of Los Angeles he holds a recognized position. Though not active in politics, he keeps posted on all such questions and affiliates with the Democrats. In the Independent Order of Good Templars he served as past officer four terms and was also representative. Other fraternal orders with which he has identified himself are the Independent Order of Foresters and the Masonic Order, his initiation into Masonry having taken place in Chateaugay Lodge No. 517. While living in New York, he married Miss Jennie Wright, who was born in Franklin county and died there, leaving two sons, Clarence and Alton. His second marriage was solemnized in Los Angeles and united him with Miss Alice Denton, of this city.

OTMAR BAUER. The name of Otmar Bauer conveys a sense of security and solidity from both a commercial and social standpoint, and illustrates in emphatic manner the possibilities behind sterling integrity combined with financial and executive ability. A native of Adrian, Mich., he was born November 16, 1848, and was the youngest in a family of three sons and five daughters. His parents, L. and Caroline Bauer, were both born near Stuttgart, Wurtemberg. The father came to America in 1848, settling on a farm in the vicinity of Adrian, Mich., where he was a pioneer. He died ten years after taking up his residence among the Michigan agriculturists.

In his youth Mr. Bauer had few of the advantages now at the disposal of the rising generation, and his education at the district schools near Adrian was limited because of many arduous home duties. At the age of fourteen he was apprenticed to a tinner in Adrian, and after completing his trade, began to look around for a desirable field of activity. In 1866 he went to Iowa and investigated the chances of livelihood, but soon started overland to Oregon, and got as far as Laramie, where illness interfered for the time being with further progress. The better to regain his health he returned to Iowa, and from there went to the copper mines of Michigan in the fall of 1867, locating in the Lake Superior region at Keweenaw Point. This venture proved remarkably successful, and in time he assisted in the re-organization of the Copper Falls Mining Company, of which he was subsequently surface superintendent for eighteen or twenty years. In the meantime his life had expanded into various channels of activity, and one year had been spent in travel throughout the west. In 1879 he was one of the active and interested spectators of the great Leadville boom, from which he realized a larger profit than fell to the share of the majority who thought to make a quick fortune.

In 1898 Mr. Bauer became interested in the horticultural possibilities of the peach belt in Allegan county, Mich., and was fairly successful up to the time of his removal to Los Angeles in 1891. Upon coming here he purchased five acres of land on Thirtieth street, and an additional five acres on Twenty-eighth street, since which many valuable pieces of city and county property have come into his possession. He is the owner of ninety acres of land on West Adams street, adjacent to the city limits, and laid out the Juanita tract of five acres on West Twenty-eighth street, nearly all of which has since been built up. At present he is interested in perfecting plans for the Bauer tract of five acres on Thirtieth street, which promises to be a distinct addition to the available and desirable building properties of that part of the city. Mr. Bauer is a stockholder in the Los Angeles Edison Electric Company, and is still interested in various mining companies in Michigan and the west.

In Marquette, Mich., Mr. Bauer married Anna K. Warner, who was born near Adrian, Mich. Of this union there are three children, viz.: Alice R., who is now Mrs. Kelts, of Los Angeles; Nora A., who is attending the Ramona College; and Owen W. Mr. Bauer is a Republican in political affiliation, and is fraternally connected with the Masons at Eagle River, Mich. In the promotion for all worthy enterprises in Los Angeles he may be counted on to contribute his practical aid, and his liberality and good judgment indicate the man of broad ideas, and ready understanding of the needs of a cosmopolitan community.

F. O. ENGSTRUM. In Sweden's beautiful capital city, Stockholm, Mr. Engstrum was born January 4, 1848, the youngest among the three children of Col. Frederick and Christine Engstrum, the former an officer in the Swedish army and a member of a very old family there. The family being in comfortable circumstances, the son was given good educational advantages. While still a boy, he began to learn the carpenter's trade under his father, who was a contractor and had a large shop. Later he followed the national custom of serving for three years in the army. The year 1871 found him in New York City, ambitious to try his fortune in the new world, with its vast opportunities. From that city he went to Louisiana and four months later settled in Houston, Tex., later following the carpenter's trade in Palestine, the same state, and thence going to Fort Worth, where he had the contracts for the warehouse of J. H. Brown, the First National Bank and many other large buildings.

Coming to California in 1886, Mr. Engstrum began contracting in San Diego, but soon removed to Escondido, where he built the principal residences, churches and banks, also the high and grammar school buildings. From there he came to Los Angeles in 1892 and has since built up a large business as a contractor in this city, where he has his office at No. 539 Byrne building. He was engaged in the erection of the Stimson building, the Posey and Hellman residences, the home of John J. Fay, Jr., on Adams street and Grand avenue, all in Los Angeles; some buildings of the Oxnard sugar factory and houses for the company, the Oxnard Bank building, schoolhouse and hotel, the Masonic Temple, and many residences for citizens, all in Oxnard; the bath house at Santa Barbara, said to be without exception the finest on the coast; the Santa Barbara high school building, and the courthouse at Ventura. Recently he completed a residence for his family in Ellendale Place, and besides this property he owns other real estate in Los Angeles, and property at Oxnard; also is a stockholder in the Oxnard Bank and a director of the Oxnard electric railroad. For the owners of the Salt Lake Railroad he built the depot and turntable in Los Angeles, and the bridges, culverts and other special work between this point and Pomona; also had the contracts for the Conservative Life Insurance building, Western Paper and Box Company building, and Union Oil and Tool Company's house and shops. As a member of the Builders' Exchange and in other ways, he keeps in touch with movements and organizations for the benefit of the craft, and is rightly esteemed to be one of the leading representatives of the occupation in which he engages.

By the marriage of Mr. Engstrum to Elizabeth Weatherly, who was born in Alabama and is a member of a prominent southern family, there are three children, namely: Frederick, who was graduated from the University of California in 1898 and is now engaged in business with his father; Blanche and Paul. In religion the family are of the Baptist faith. Fraternally Mr. Engstrum is associated with the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks in Santa Barbara; the lodge and encampment of Odd Fellows at Oxnard; the Knights of Pythias of Los Angeles; Hueneme Lodge, F. & A. M., in which he was made a Mason; Ventura Chapter and Commandery, and Al Malakiah Temple, N. M. S., of Los Angeles. While he is interested in each of these organizations, his main interest lies in his occupation, and nothing is allowed to interfere with it, but his time and attention are closely given to the filling of his contracts in a careful and painstaking manner.

JAMES BOTHWELL, the chief engineer of the Cudahy Packing Company's plant at Los Angeles, was born in Pittsburg, Pa., September 23, 1845, and comes of Scotch descent on both sides of the family. His parents, John and Jane (McVeigh) Bothwell, were natives respectively of county Antrim and the vicinity of Belfast, Ireland. The father came to America when a young boy, settling in Pittsburg, where he engaged in general contracting, and died some years before the breaking out of the Civil war. Three children were born into the family, and all served during the Civil war in the One Hundred and Twenty-third Pennsylvania Infantry. Henry, who was a soldier in Company E, was a machinist, and died in Allegheny City; and William, a member of Company H, and but fourteen years of age when he started for the war, was killed at the first battle of Fredericksburg, December 13, 1863.

Up to the time of the war James Bothwell lived in Pittsburg, and received his education in the public schools. In Allegheny City in 1862 he enlisted in Company A, One Hundred and Twenty-third Pennsylvania Infantry, and was mustered in at Harrisburg for nine months. He saw much of the grewsome and terrible side of warfare, and fought in the battles of Bull Run, South Mountain, Antietam, Fredericksburg (where his brother was killed), Chancellorsville, the Wilderness, and many other battles and skirmishes. After being mustered out in Harrisburg in 1864, he returned to Allegheny City and learned the trade of machinist with the Pittsburg, Fort Wayne & Chicago Railroad Company, by whom he was sent to Crestline, Ohio, as foreman in the repair shops and round house. He afterwards became engineer between Crestline and Alliance, and then was sent to Mansfield, Ohio, as master mechanic of the Toledo Division. A still later position was as master mechanic with the Belt Railroad in Chicago, Ill., under Manager George S. Griscom, after which he was located at Baraboo, Wis., as master mechanic under Manager J. D. Layng for the Chicago & Northwestern Railroad. Two years later, in 1884, he resigned to come to California on account of his wife's health, and upon locating in Los Angeles, bought a ranch seven miles south of the city and engaged in horticulture for two years. The land was eventually traded for city property, and Mr. Bothwell secured the position of chief engineer for the Los Angeles Electric Light Company, with whom he remained for five years. This position also was resigned to take charge of the engineering department of the Temescal tin mines, in Riverside county, which, after fourteen months, were obliged to suspend business, and

Mr. Bothwell returned to Los Angeles. In 1892 he accepted his present position as chief engineer of the Cudahy Packing Plant, and his skill and ingenuity have resulted in practically the entire rebuilding of the power department. He is in charge of six different stationary engines of three hundred and fifty horse power, and twenty-four pumps, besides an ice machine of one hundred and eighty tons' capacity.

In Gallion, Ohio, Mr. Bothwell married Hattie Reed, who was born in Crestline, Ohio, and died in Los Angeles. Of this union there were three children, viz.: Charles L., who died at the age of seventeen years; LaMoynes, who died when eight years old; and E. R., who was an operator at Port au Prince, Cuba, during the Spanish-American war. Mr. Bothwell has by no means confined his interests to his chosen occupation, but has been substantially allied with the political and other affairs of the places in which he has lived. He is the owner of two commodious residences in Los Angeles, and has other property in this and other surrounding towns. As a staunch Democrat he has served his party in various capacities, is an ex-member of the county central committee, and while living in Mansfield, Ohio, served four terms in the city council, and for two terms was president of the council. He is a man of broad general information and practical opinions upon current events, and as an engineer has few equals and no superiors on the Pacific coast.

KNOWLTON REUBEN BRADLEY. A more than local reputation has followed in the wake of the large building accomplishments of Knowlton Reuben Bradley, one of the most skillful and resourceful of the contractors of Los Angeles. Although a native of Laporte county, Ind., born August 15, 1868, Mr. Bradley has spent the greater part of his life in the city whose prosperity he has so materially aided, for he was but nine years of age when his parents, Reuben R. and Hester (Knowlton) Bradley, natives of New York state, came to the west. His father was reared in New York state and became an early settler of Michigan City, Ind., where he was a locomotive engineer, and where he lived until his removal to Los Angeles in 1879. He readily found employment with the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, and has since tendered them his faithful services. Owing to ill health he is no longer the vital power behind the engine, but is serving in the more peaceful and less wearing capacity of flagman. He married in his young manhood into the Knowlton family, the paternal grandfather Knowlton having been a farmer in New York. Five children were born to this couple, of whom Knowlton Reuben is third.

After leaving the public schools of Los Angeles at his fifteenth year, Mr. Bradley apprenticed to a bricklayer for three years, and afterwards followed his trade until 1892. He then began contracting and building, and in 1896 formed a partnership with Mr. Berg, under the firm name of Bradley & Berg, an association amicably continued until its dissolution in 1900. Since then Mr. Bradley has carried on an independent business, and, judging from the extent of his contracts, must have very nearly realized his expectations. Among the buildings attributable to his skill of construction may be mentioned the Lankershim building, the O. T. Johnson building on the corner of Seventh and Main streets, the Chamberlain building, the O. T. Johnson building on the corner of Ninth and Los Angeles streets, the county hospital for the insane, the Northern Machine Shop on North Main street, and many others of equal importance. Among the fine residences are the Wilcox residence, that of H. C. Hooker on Adams street, the Keeley (now the Laughlin) residence, also on Adams street, the Newhall residence and numerous others as imposing and deserving of mention. Los Angeles alone has not profited by his ability, for his artistic appreciation and substantial merit have made his services in demand in Yuma, San Diego, Pomona, Redlands and Santa Monica.

In Los Angeles Mr. Bradley married Maud Dezell, a native of Northern California. Politically Mr. Bradley is independent, and believes in voting for the best man. He is a member of the Builders' Exchange, and of the Junior Order United American Mechanics. Mr. Bradley is popular in Los Angeles, and his services in promoting the artistic improvement of the city are generally recognized.

CHARLES ELTON. The administration of Mr. Elton as chief of police of Los Angeles has been well received throughout, the prevailing impression being that he has brought order out of chaos, and has placed the department on a footing with its most exacting and systematic contemporaries. His association with this part of municipal control began in January of 1900, at which time he received his appointment from police commissioners Ling, Scarborough, Day, Parker, and Mayor Eaton, to fill a vacancy, and was re-appointed in January of 1901, for two years, by the present board of police commissioners. Great tact and good judgment have characterized Mr. Elton's discharge of his responsible and never enviable position, his thorough understanding of himself and those associated with him resulting in the harmonious adjustment of whatever difficulties arise while dealing with the unruly elements of a large and cosmopolitan city. It is conceded also that his personal honor and devotion to truth and principle have had no little bearing upon a situation too often desecrated by private gain at the expense of public loss, and this laudable manifestation is appreciated.

During his unusually active life Mr. Elton has been variously occupied, and his experiences have qualified him to be a leader of men. He was born February 5, 1855, at Hudson, Columbia county, N. Y., on the banks of the historic and beautiful river of that name. His father, William M., was born in Connecticut, and his grandfather, Elijah, who was a saddler by occupation, was born in New York and died in Connecticut. William M. Elton was a merchant at Hudson up to the time of his death at the age of sixty-three years. He was county supervisor and justice of the peace, and was a prominent Mason, being a member of Lafayette Commandery No. 7. His wife, Lydia (Shadick) Elton, was born in Columbia county, N. Y., and came of Holland ancestry. Mrs. Elton, who died in Hudson, was the mother of four children, two of whom are living, one son and one daughter, Charles Elton being the youngest.

From youth up Mr. Elton was trained in the mercantile business, and assisted his father in the carrying on of his store in Hudson. He was sixteen years of age at the time of his father's death, after which he learned to be an engineer in the machine shops at Hudson, and after qualifying, ran a stationary engine in the brick-yards near the city. In search of larger fields he removed to New York City in 1873, and for two years managed a stationary engine. With every intention of going into the railroad business in the far west he visited Los Angeles in 1875, but, finding the business overcrowded, he turned his attention for a time to ranching. Delighted with the climate and general advantages to be found in the "City of the Angels," he returned to the east and settled up his affairs, and in the fall of 1876 was again in the west and employed in Los Angeles by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, as a fireman between here and Yuma, Ariz. At the end of fourteen months he was promoted to the position of engineer, and for eight years had an unusually lucky experience while taking trains through Arizona, as far east as Dragoon Summit. In 1884 he resigned from his position and engaged in the truck and transfer business with C. V. Boquist, a more recent partner being E. H. Barmore, the interest of Mr. Boquist being eventually purchased by Mr. Elton. The business of the firm was conducted under the title of the California Southern & Atlantic & Pacific Transfer Company, to which was later added the Sunset Transfer Company, the two interests being incorporated as the Los Angeles Transfer Company. Of this company Mr. Elton is still vice-president, although when most active he did the outside work.

Various city properties have come into the possession of Mr. Elton. He is extensively interested in the development of oil, and with Mr. Barmore has sunk two wells and is now attempting another. He has further oil interests near Newhall, where he owns a ranch. In politics he is a Republican, and was a member of the county central committee for some time. Fraternally he is a member of the East Gate Masonic Lodge, of Los Angeles, and is associated with the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks. He was married in Pasadena to Annie De Forest Phillips, who was born in Rensselaer county, N. Y., and came to Los Angeles county in 1874. To Mr. and Mrs. Elton have been born four daughters and two sons: Winnifred, Laura, Ray, Ada, Dorothea and William.

ROBERT BEYRLE. Almost every department of contracting known to practical building has been mastered with scientific accuracy by Robert Beyrle, whose name is not only associated with some of the most ambitious general building enterprises of Los Angeles, but is invested with added distinction because of his phenomenal attainments along the line of dams, tunnels and general cement work.

In his personality Mr. Beyrle embodies the sterling characteristics of his countrymen, traits fostered and matured during his early education and training in Marmoutier, Alsace, Germany, where he was born May 20, 1859. His father, Andrew, and his mother, Mary (Houser) Beyrle, were natives of the same part of the country, and the former was engaged in the shoe business during the greater part of his active life. In 1869 he brought his family to Dallas, Tex., where terminated his useful life, and where the mother is still living. Of the ten children in the family eight are now living, and of these, Andrew, is also a resident of this state, and is identified with the California Planing Mill Company of Los Angeles. As the oldest of the children Robert Beyrle was early confronted with the necessity for assisting in the family maintenance, and as became a youth in his station began to learn a trade at the age of fourteen in Dallas, Tex., whither he had come with his parents when ten years of age. Having learned the carpenter business, he removed in 1882 to Sweetwater, Tex., and two years later began to build with considerable success.

After becoming identified with Los Angeles in 1887, Mr. Beyrle formed a partnership with his brother, Andrew, the firm name being Robert & Andrew Beyrle, and this association was amicably continued until 1890. Since then Mr. Beyrle has proceeded upon independent lines, and among the buildings which attest his skill may be mentioned the high school, Burbank theatre, Santa Fe depot, Capp building, and many more of equal importance and substantiality of construction. Nor must it be supposed that Mr. Beyrle has not extended his activities to the necessities of surrounding towns, for he was the successful builder of the Andrews block in San Luis Obispo, the Ardizzie & Olcese block and the schoolhouse in Kern, San Diego Jail, besides many fine residences and business blocks in Los Angeles.

California, renowned for its many large undertakings, has among other things of note the largest tunnel in diameter in the world, viz.: the Broadway tunnel, which was completed by Mr. Beyrle in twenty-one months. The tunnel is forty feet wide, twenty-two feet high, and seven hundred and sixty feet long. The excavation was made for the tunnel fifty feet wide and twenty-four and a-half feet high, and this having a six-foot wall at bottom tapering to a two and a-half foot top center. The enterprise was a decided success, and won for the builder encomiums of praise from all sides. Mr. Beyrle has been equally successful in constructing numerous dams in different parts of this county, and has made a special study of all kinds of heavy and important masonry, whether in concrete or cement.

While in Dallas, Tex., Mr. Beyrle married Katie Reeb, a native of Alsace, Germany, and reared in Illinois and Texas. Of this union there are four children, Oscar R., Robert A., Charles and Katie. Fraternally Mr. Beyrle is associated with South Gate Lodge No. 320, F. & A. M., at Los Angeles; Signet Chapter, R. A. M.; the Maccabees, and Royal Arcanum. He is a Democrat in national politics, and is a member of the Builders' Exchange. Mr. Beyrle represents the highest type of builder in the state which numbers so many experts among its citizens, and he is one of the progressive and substantial members of a community whose greatest pride is the character and high attainments of its members.

JOHN BREINER. The family represented by Mr. Breiner, of Pasadena, is of German extraction. His father and grandfather, both of whom bore the name of John, were natives of Baden-Baden, and on coming to America settled at Bloomville, Ohio, where the grandfather engaged in farm pursuits during the remainder of his life. The father went to Pittsburg, Pa., and for thirty-five years was employed as foreman for a large blacksmithing house in that city, occupying this position at the time of his death, when fifty-five years of age. He is survived by his wife, Catherine (Zeigler) Breiner, who was born in Baden-Baden and now makes Pittsburg her home. Born of their marriage are five children now living, of whom John was the oldest and the only one to settle in California. He was born in Pittsburg March 16, 1858, and at the age of thirteen began an apprenticeship to the butcher's trade in his home city. At the expiration of his term of service he began to follow the trade as a journeyman, working in various states of the north and south.

During 1884 Mr. Breiner arrived in California, where for two years he was employed in San Francisco. In 1886 he came to Pasadena, where he has since engaged in the meat business, first as an employe in the Excelsior market, but since 1887 as proprietor of the City market, at No. 118 East Colorado street. His market is well equipped with modern conveniences and has large refrigerator capacity. Not only is he one of the oldest meat dealers in Pasadena, but he is also among the oldest-established business men of the city, and in his long connection with the business interests of the town he has met with financial success, besides gaining a reputation for reliability and uprightness in all transactions.

The home of Mr. Breiner, at No. 826 East Colorado street, is presided over by his wife, who was formerly Miss Irene Gardner, of San Francisco. They have three children, John, Jr.; Lester and Edna. While Mr. Breiner is not a partisan, he is well informed concerning public questions and gives his influence to the Republican party. The Pasadena Board of Trade and Merchants' Protective Association number him among their members. Outside of business matters and the enjoyment of his home circle, there is nothing in which he feels a deeper interest than in Masonry, and we find him quite prominent in that order. After coming to Pasadena he was made a Mason in Lodge No. 272, to which he now belongs, and he was raised to the chapter and commandery in this city, and to the Mystic Shrine in Al Malakiah Temple, N. M. S., of Los Angeles. During his residence in San Francisco he was initiated into the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and on settling in Pasadena transferred his membership to the lodge at this point, also is connected with the encampment, in which he is a past officer. Other organizations with which he is identified are the Maccabees, Woodmen of the World and Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, while, with his wife, he is also associated with the Eastern Star.

DAVID BRIAN. A resident of Los Angeles since 1891, Mr. Brian was born in Lawrence county, Ill., December 14, 1855, being the third child in the family of John M. and Leah (Landis) Brian, natives respectively of Hesse-Darmstadt, Germany, and Richland county, Pa. In 1835 his father came to America, having served in the Prussian army for ten years as a commissioned officer. During his entire residence in this country he made his home in Lawrence county, Ill., where he first followed the milling business, and later carried on a farm. In religion he adhered to the Lutheran faith, in which he had been reared, and he continued faithful to its teachings until his death, at sixty-eight years of age. His wife, who also died in Lawrence county, was a daughter of Samuel Landis, a Pennsylvanian who spent his last years in the then frontier state of Illinois.

In a family of four sons and two daughters, all of whom are still living except one son, David Brian was third in order of birth. The district schools afforded him fair educational advantages, while on the home farm he learned lessons of industry, thoroughness and perseverance. Engineering in some of its branches has been his occupation ever since he was eighteen, at which time he became a switchman in the St. Louis yards of the Indianapolis & St. Louis Railroad. Two years later he secured employment as stationary engineer with James A. Cunningham, of Vincennes, Ind. On the burning down of the factory, he turned his attention to agriculture, and for two years carried on a farm in Wabash county, Ill. However, engineering was more to his taste than farming, and he resumed his old occupation, taking a position as stationary engineer in a flour mill at Sumner, Ill.

On coming to Los Angeles, in May, 1891, Mr. Brian was employed to assist in putting in the plant of the Los Angeles Consolidated Railway Company (now the Los Angeles Railway Company), and on the opening of the plant he was made second assistant engineer, afterward being promoted to first engineer. The latter position he resigned in June, 1898, in order to accept a place with the San Gabriel Electric Company, whose plant he started with one engine and four boilers. The capacity is now five thousand horse-power, having been doubled since the first engine was put in. He continues in the position of engineer, and his services here, as elsewhere, have proved acceptable and satisfactory. Along the line of his chosen occupation, he is identified with Los Angeles Division No. 2, Stationary Engineers, while fraternally he is associated with the Independent Order of Foresters; the Uniform Rank, K. O. T. M.; and the Odd Fellows, being connected with the lodge in Sumner, Ill., where he was initiated into the order.

The marriage of David Brian and Frances L. Fisher was solemnized in Lawrence county, Ill., at the home of the bride's father, M. C. Fisher, a pioneer of Richland county, Ill., but for years a resident of Lawrence county. The home of Mr. and Mrs. Brian, at No. 727 Clinton street, is brightened by the presence of their children, of whom there are six, namely: Callie, Ora, Elmer, Flora, Ina and Cyrena. The family are members of the Methodist Episcopal Church and attendants at its services, besides being interested in various societies connected with the congregation. While Mr. Brian is a staunch Republican, yet his interest in politics has never led him into partisanship nor has he ever sought official honors or political prominence, his tastes being in the direction of business pursuits and domestic pleasures rather than public affairs.

W. P. BUTCHER. Santa Barbara has no more enthusiastic advocate of her manifold charms than W. P. Butcher, lawyer, scholar and man of letters. Of English descent, he was born in Camden county, Mo., February 14, 1854, a son of John Wesley Butcher, a native of Granger county, Tenn. The paternal grandfather was born in England, and married a German lady, and upon immigrating to the United States located in Montgomery county, Md. The mother of W. P. Butcher, one of the most noble and interesting of women, was formerly Esther Young Callison, and was born at Abingdon, Va., a daughter of John K. Callison, who removed from Scotland to Virginia, and there engaged in farming. Mrs. Butcher reared her sons and daughters to be useful and capable men and women, and herself lived to the age of four score and one years. Of the sons, John H., who was a practicing lawyer in Rolla, Mo.; Oliver and James, who were farmers, were soldiers in the Union army during the Civil war; Marion is a farmer in Missouri, and Roland died in the Iron state; Mary, Almira and Sarah are deceased; and Juliette is living in Missouri.

John Wesley Butcher was a clergyman in the Baptist Church, and preached for several years in Missouri. Upon coming west he built a flat boat upon which he traveled down the river to Cairo, then by boat to St. Louis, and up the Osage river to Camden county, near Linnecreek, where he entered land and improved a farm, clearing it of timber and preparing the soil for the reception of crops. In 1854 he removed to Laclede county, Mo., and settled in the heart of the wilderness ten miles from any house, and there also he endured the hardships of the pioneer, but developed a most successful stock-farm. In Missouri also located his brother, David, who emulated him in success, but differed in political affiliation and general character, for he was in all things a southerner, and consequently a slaveholder. As a freesoiler and an abolitionist, John Wesley Butcher exerted quite an influence in his locality, but it was unfortunately an antagonistic one, for his was the only family within a radius of ten miles which was loyal to the Union. His oldest son, John H., was a fearless man and a radical abolitionist, and with his brothers, James and Oliver, served all through the war. He was promoted to the rank of major in the Missouri regiment of infantry in which he served, and was wounded while engaged in conflict with Colonel Coffee. It is not surprising that in the face of such undaunted courage the neighbors who had formerly been friendly with the Butcher family resorted to all manner of devices to indicate their displeasure at their attitude in regard to the Union, and that they emphasized their hostility by burning their fences, outhouses and crops. In the face of this calamity the family were reduced to dire straits, particularly so because the father had died in 1860, and the sense of personal responsibility fell heavily upon the sons of the house. As the oldest son, it behooved W. P. Butcher to leave home and face the problem of self-support, and it is no exaggeration to say that his lot was an unusually hard one, and that his perseverance and grit alone overcame the conflicting obstacles.

At the age of twenty Mr. Butcher began to teach school, having acquired his education by dint of hard study and attendance at the public schools. There materialized also the opportunity, long sought, to study law, and his first instruction in the science was under State Senator W. I. Wallace, of Lebanon, Mo., and resulted in his admission to the bar of Missouri in 1881. Until his removal to California in 1883 he practiced in Lebanon, Mo., and his first four years in the west were devoted to travel through different portions of the state. After locating in Santa Barbara in 1887 he engaged in a general law practice, and his wide understanding of legal principles has gained for him an enviable reputation among the professional men of the city. In his literary capacity Mr. Butcher contributes to a wide range, his productions including prose and poetry. Among the latter, "An Evening by the Sea" and "A Morning by the Sea" are considered particularly fine expressions of poetic license.

The marriage of Mr. Butcher and Laura Hurtzig occurred in Santa Barbara. Mrs. Butcher was born in Forest Hill, Cal., and is a daughter of Franz Hurtzig, deceased, a graduate of Leipzig, Germany, and one of the pioneers of California. One of the best educated men in the state, he was a graduate physician, although he did not practice, and had one of the finest libraries of Greek and Latin literature to be found in the west. He was formerly engaged in mining and owned a very rich and promising mine, but failed to realize his expectations because of the dishonesty of his partners, in whose judgment and good management he relied. Two children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Butcher: Tillie, who is eleven years of age, and William Preston, Jr., who is nine years of age, and a natural poet. Mr. Butcher is fraternally associated with the Masons, the Knights of Pythias, and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and with his wife is a member of the Eastern Star. In politics he is a Republican.

Thos. Stroline.

CHIEF THOMAS STROHM. A strenuous and many-sided activity has characterized the career of Chief Thomas Strohm, and no tinge of narrowness or misdirection has marred the ambitions and abilities out of which has grown an enviable popularity, and fashioned what the community of Los Angeles acknowledges one of its strong and desirable citizens, as well as the most efficient fire department chief the city has known for years. Out of his multitudinous observations of life Mr. Strohm has evolved a philosophy regarding perfect health and general physical well-being, which pre-supposes that the possessor of this inestimable boon called health, has in a corresponding degree a clear intelligence, high morality, and capacity for all-around common sense and well doing. Acting upon this conviction he has spent many years of his life in teaching people the art of physical development, and is one of the expert authorities in a line of study which is receiving more and more the sanction and approval of thoughtful minds. In this connection he organized the Los Angeles Athletic club in 1885, and for two years was the instructor of physical culture.

The traditions and accomplishments of the Strohm ancestry have their location in Wurtemberg, Germany, and in this prosperous and renowned portion of the empire, near the city of Ulm, Chief Strohm was born, November 5, 1846. His father, Matthew, who was born in 1808, was also a native of Wurtemberg, as was his mother, Anna Barbara (Jauch) Strohm, daughter of Mathias Jauch, representative of a very old and distinguished Wurtemberg family. The elder Strohm was a master mason, contractor and builder in Germany, and in 1852 brought his family to America, the sailing vessel from Havre to New Orleans making the long journey in three months. He then sailed up the Mississippi and Ohio rivers to Cincinnati, where he engaged in contracting and building, an occupation continued until his death, July 2, 1860. His brother, Capt. Thomas Strohm, received his commission in Germany by reason of valiant service in the Wurtemberg cavalry. The mother, who died in Cincinnati in 1879, at the age of sixty-seven years, was the parent of eleven children, seven of whom grew to maturity, and four are living. Thomas and John, the latter of whom is lieutenant of chemical engine No. 2, are the only members of the family on the coast. Another son, Prof. Matthew Strohm, is instructor of gymnastics in the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis, and has held the position for thirty-four years.

Chief Strohm was reared in Cincinnati, Ohio, and educated in the public schools. In 1865 he was apprenticed to learn the trade of machinist in the A. B. Hollabird shops, and at the same time perfected himself to become professor of gymnastics. In 1868 he removed to Kansas City, Mo., and was employed as leading machinist in the J. B. Green shops for eighteen months, and simultaneously taught gymnastics in the Turn-Verein. Upon removing afterwards to St. Louis he was employed by the Missouri Pacific Railroad Company in their shops, and was leader of the St. Louis Turn-Verein until 1872. During that year he settled in San Francisco, and was for three months in the Pacific machine shops, also was connected with the Turn-Verein. He was then in the shops of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company at Sacramento, and in the latter part of 1873 went to Marysville, this state, where for eighteen months he worked in the shops of Booth & Co. during the day time, and taught gymnastics during the evening. After returning to San Francisco he was a machinist for three months in the United States mint, after which he yielded to the solicitations of the Los Angeles Turn-Verein and became their gymnasium instructor, coming to Los Angeles in March of 1876. At Wilmington he was later employed in the shops of the Southern Pacific Railroad, and after the removal of the shops to Los Angeles he continued in his former capacity until 1878. A later venture was the starting of a grocery business on the corner of First and Vine streets, which was continued for seven years, and then substituted by the manufacture of ice and soda. For the carrying out of the latter enterprise extensive ice machinery was put in, also soda works, and after a time soda alone was manufactured. This business is still having an uninterrupted era of success, at No. 323 Towne avenue, and is known as the Excelsior Soda Works, being run by the sons of Mr. Strohm.

Since 1876 Mr. Strohm has been from time to time connected with the Los Angeles fire department and was at first with the No. 1 Engine Company. In August of 1887 he was elected chief of the fire department of Los Angeles, and resigned from the position in 1888, his re-election followed in 1889. After resigning again in 1891 he returned to his gymnastic teaching, and in 1893 was elected councilman from the seventh ward and served for one term. In April of 1900 he was again elected chief of the Los Angeles fire department, and has ever since filled this responsible position with credit to himself and the city which he represents. Under his administration the department has been greatly improved and enlarged, and is now a full-paid department of one hundred and twenty men. Of the eighteen different houses four are double, and there are eleven engine companies, five hose companies, two chemical engine companies, and four hook and ladder trucks, eighty horses being required in the department. All the latest and most expeditious devices for extinguishing fire are adopted regardless of cost, including the latest electric fire alarms.

In Los Angeles Mr. Strohm married Emily Schubnell, who was born in Oregon, and of this union there are four children: Lewis R., Anna B., Clarence B., and Walter T. Mr. Strohm is prominent fraternally, and variously interested in the best organizations in the country. He was made a Mason while living in Marysville, and is now associated with Los Angeles Lodge No. 42, in which he is past master; was raised to Los Angeles Chapter No. 33; is a member of the Council, R. & S. M.; Commandery No. 9, K. T., in which he was captain-general in 1883; and is also connected with Al Malakiah Temple, N. M. S. The Ancient Order of United Workmen and Benevolent Protective Order of Elks number him among their members. He is associated with the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce and the Germania Turn-Verein, in which organization in various places he has been active for forty years. A Republican in politics, he has served on county and city central committees, has been active in his ward, and was a delegate to the state convention in 1898 which nominated Hon. H. T. Gage for governor.

REV. EVERETT L. CONGER, D. D. Representative of a family holding an honored place in the annals of our nation is Dr. Conger, who by his own useful and helpful life has added lustre to the family name. He was born December 23, 1839, in Cherry Grove, Knox county, Ill., where his parents, L. E. and Mary W. (Hurd) Conger, natives respectively of New York and Vermont, located in 1837. His father was a rugged pioneer farmer who entered government land with every dollar he could earn and became an extensive dealer in cattle and lands. He was one of the founders of the Republican party, a champion of its principles and a personal friend of Abraham Lincoln. He moved to Galesburg in 1850, where he was one of the prime movers, and gave largely of his increasing fortune in founding Lombard College, under the auspices of a liberal theology, and the first institution (after Oberlin) to open its doors to women for an equal education with men. In 1870 he moved to Iowa and established a bank at Dexter, where he died two years later. Of his thirteen children all but two attained maturity, E. L. being the third of these.

The eldest son, George W., enlisted in the Civil war and sleeps in an unknown grave. Harriet married John Thomas, of Cedar Rapids, Iowa. Hannah W. married O. P. Williams, of Dexter, Iowa, where she died. Edwin Hurd, who graduated from Lombard at nineteen, enlisted as a private in the Civil war, rose to the rank of captain, marched with Sherman to the sea and was honorably discharged as brevet-major at the close of the war. After graduating from the Albany (N. Y.) law school, he settled in Iowa, where he served his fellow citizens as county supervisor, county treasurer, state treasurer, and for three terms as congressman, finally resigning this position to become minister to Brazil under President Harrison. Under President McKinley he was transferred to Peking, China, where he so honored his country and immortalized his name in the dreadful siege of July, 1900. Helen, Mrs. George Pierce, died in Des Moines, Iowa. Alta married Charles Baldwin, now deceased. For many years she has been in Washington, D. C., with the botanical division of the agricultural department. Frank is with the Graham & Morton Steamship Company in St. Joseph, Mich. John W. is agent for the Douglas-Lacy Company, bankers and brokers of New York, at Prescott, Ariz. William became a prominent banker and financier in Iowa and died at Fresno, Cal. Mary W. is the wife of Capt. E. A. Edwards, of the Twenty-fifth United States Infantry, who was wounded at San Juan Hill in the Spanish war and is now detailed at Washington, D. C., in writing up the records of that struggle for the war department.

E. L. Conger was graduated at Lombard College with the degrees of A. B. and A. M. He received his theological education at St. Lawrence University, in New York. Buchtel College of Ohio gave him the honorary degree of D. D. During his ministerial work of forty years he has held only four pastorates, these being at Monroe, Wis.; Taunton, Mass.; Concord, N. H., and Pasadena, Cal. The large and prosperous Universalist Church at Pasadena was organized and built up under his leadership. He was also a close adviser and co-worker with his parishioner and friend, Hon. A. G. Throop, in establishing the Throop Polytechnic Institute. For some years he was financial agent for Lombard College in Illinois, whose endowment and patronage he largely increased, besides starting its theological department, which was afterward named the Ryder Divinity School, in honor of Dr. William H. Ryder, of Chicago, a very liberal giver to its endowment fund.

Dr. Conger's first wife, Jenny Biddlecome, died in Monroe, Wis., leaving a daughter, Jenny, who is the wife of E. C. Conger, of the Union Hardware Company, Los Angeles. His second wife, Annie Smith Dwinell, is buried with their daughter, May, in Taunton, Mass. In 1875 Dr. Conger married Miss Harriet A. Drowne, a native of Providence, R. I. They have two children, Ray, who is now in the Union Savings Bank of Pasadena; and Lyda, wife of Richard A. Vose, a native of Maine, now living in Clinton, Iowa.

Failing health from overwork compelled the doctor to relinquish the arduous duties of a large parish, but his deep interest in the welfare of others keeps him active in the educational, charitable, philanthropic and religious work of the community.

CAPT. D. W. MARTIN, chief of police of Santa Barbara, is a popular and efficient officer, and has realized, in his administration, the expectations of those who placed him in his present responsible position. During the years that have elapsed since 1883 he has been continually before the public eye, and in one capacity or another has been called upon to defend life and property against the unruly. Yet during all that time, while thrown with the vicious, the desperate and the misguided, he has maintained a dignity of demeanor, a common sense judgment, and a consistent understanding of human nature, compatible with his duty as a public servant and gentleman. Furthermore it is emphatically asserted by those who know of his coming and going that at no time have his various positions been used for personal gain at the expense of public confidence, a catastrophe which only too often darkens the career of less public-spirited and less honorable men.

A southerner by instinct and training, Mr. Martin was born in Louisville, Ky., November 19, 1854, a son of Thomas C. Martin, who was born in Nashville, Tenn. The paternal grandfather, Thomas, was also born in Tennessee, and there engaged in farming until his removal to near Louisville, Ky., where, in July of 1876, he attained to the age of ninety-nine years. He was of Scotch descent, and served in the war of 1812, his father, equally patriotic, having been a soldier in the war of the Revolution. Thomas C. Martin removed from Kentucky to St. Joseph, Mo., when his son, D. W., was six months old, and there engaged in the livery business and also was a veterinary surgeon. With hopes of more rapid financial gain he went to Montana in 1860, and for eight years was engaged in mining with fluctuating success. It is surmised that the result of his experiment was the conviction that after all a sure and steady business career was the most desirable if not the most exciting, for he returned to Atchison, Kans., and re-engaged in the livery business until removing to Santa Barbara in 1875. In the beautiful Southern California city he lived until his death in February of 1890, his wife having died in 1883. Before her marriage the mother of Captain Martin was Sarah Shumake, who was born in Kentucky, and became the mother of eight children, three of whom are living, the youngest being Captain Martin.

Captain Martin was educated in St. Joseph, Mo., and Atchison, Kans., and in 1869 went to work on farms in the vicinity of the latter-named city. He eventually became associated with the Hannibal & St. Joe Railroad, and ran from Atchison to St. Joe. In November of 1876 he engaged in ranching in Santa Barbara county, Cal., and for the following three years was interested in teaming. He then entered the employ of Col. W. W. Hollister, and in 1883 was appointed special night officer for the city of Santa Barbara. From then on his promotion was in accord with his pronounced ability as an officer, and in 1884 he was elected marshal of the city for two years, his re-election following in 1886, 1888 and 1890. Though defeated for the office of marshal in 1892, he was elected in November of the same year a constable, and re-elected in 1895 for four years, and in April of 1896 was elected marshal for two years, and re-elected for an equal length of time in 1898. In January of 1900, when the new city charter provided for the appointment of a chief of police, he secured the appointment, and now has six officers under him. Captain Martin is an ex-member of the county central committee. He is a member of the Chamber of Commerce, and is prominent in fraternal circles, being associated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, Santa Barbara Lodge No. 156, and with the Encampment; with the Ancient Order of United Workmen, of which he is financier; with the Foresters of America, and with the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, of which he is a charter member in the Santa Barbara Lodge.

In Santa Barbara Mr. Martin married Frances Sanchez, a native of Ventura, Cal., and a member of one of the old Spanish families. To Mr. and Mrs. Martin have been born six children, Ida May, Daniel A., Walter B., Mabel, Dora and Blanche.

JOHN TEMPLETON CHAMBERS. As chief engineer of the Los Angeles city hall, Mr. Chambers discharges one of the many important responsibilities which have come his way, and which have won for him a deservedly high reputation among his fellow craftsmen. Nor is a minute understanding of wheels and cogs and pistons his only claim to recognition, for wherever his wandering life has temporarily found repose and occupation, whether on the large waterways of the country, or in the wild and dangerous mining localities of Montana, Wyoming and Utah, he has found interests other than his boyhood occupation, and has had a voice in the political and general advancement.

A descendant of Gen. John Templeton, who shouldered his musket during the earlier part of the Revolutionary war, and later directed the muskets of his subordinates, Mr. Chambers was born in Cincinnati, Ohio, October 23, 1850, a son of James Monroe and Anna (Linton) Chambers, natives respectively of Berks county, Pa., and Clermont county, Ohio. James Monroe Chambers was a marine engineer on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, and lived at times in Cincinnati, St. Louis and New Orleans. During the Civil war he was engineer on the Federal gunboat at the siege and battle of Vicksburg, and afterward put in the machinery in the mills and manufactories at Naples. On the return trip by boat to St. Louis he disappeared, and it is supposed that he was murdered for his money. His wife died in Centerville, Ohio, in 1897, leaving three children, of whom John Templeton is the second, and the only one on the coast.

From earliest youth Mr. Chambers was associated with his father on the river boats, and received his educational training in St. Louis and Ohio. When fifteen years old he went to work as striker or assistant engineer under his father, and ran from Cincinnati to New Orleans on the Mary Hines. Later he ran on the same boat up the Red river, then on the Luminary between St. Louis and New Orleans. Mr. Chambers became identified with the Memphis & Cincinnati Packet Company as assistant engineer, and ran between Cincinnati and Memphis, Cincinnati and Big Sandy, and up the Cumberland. For three summers he was with the Northern Line Packet Company and ran between St. Louis and St. Paul on the Sucker State, Minneapolis and Rob Roy, and during the winter seasons ran south to New Orleans and to tributaries of the river. In 1868 he crossed the plains to Salt Lake City in the employ of the Wells-Fargo Company, but the following year returned to St. Louis, where he took out his last boat (the Richmond) on the Mississippi river.

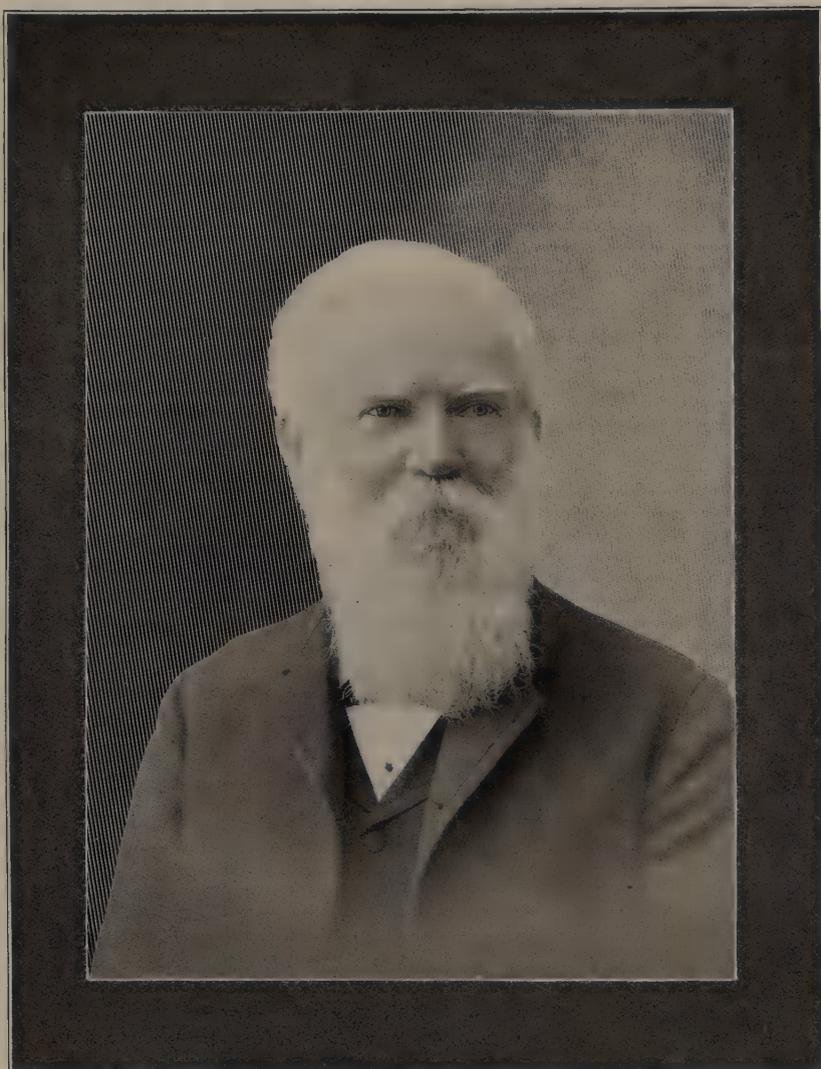

In 1870 Mr. Chambers went to Dayton, Ohio, and from there to Fairplay, Park county, Colo., where he engaged in prospecting and mining, and became an important factor in the general affairs of the town. He served as deputy postmaster under Mr. Stafford, who was also county recorder, and was fairly successful as a miner. 1872 found him in Laramie City, Wyo., as fireman on the Union Pacific Railroad between Laramie and Rawlins, his promotion to engineer following at the end of six months. This was continued until 1878, after which for two years he was engineer of the Armour plant, and for nearly seven years was with the Fowler Brothers Packing Company, in charge of the refrigerating department. This plant had a horse power of five hundred, and Mr. Chambers continued its superintendency until 1887, after which he resigned and located in San Diego county, Cal. At Escondido he superintended the building of the waterworks, and managed the same for seven years, and was one of the substantial and progressive factors in the development of the city. As the first city treasurer his administration gave general satisfaction for five years, and he also served on the school board, and sought to elevate the educational standard of the community. In the fall of 1893 he resigned from the waterworks position to become foreman of the water service of the Santa Fe Railroad in California, with headquarters at San Bernardino. The following year he came to Los Angeles as assistant engineer for the Los Angeles Railway Company on Seventh street and Grand avenue, and was next night engineer for the Los Angeles Electric Light Company's plant. After erecting the plant and putting in the machinery for the Acme laundry, he continued its management for two years, and in January of 1897 was appointed chief engineer in the city hall. So satisfactory have proved his services that his reappointment followed in 1899 and 1901.

In Madison county, Ill., Mr. Chambers married Mary L. Richards, a native of Ohio, and of this union there have been three children, Mamie L., who is now Mrs. Kistler, of Los Angeles; Ida Belle; and Howard. Fraternally Mr. Chambers is associated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, which organization he joined in Kansas City, and he is a member of the Los Angeles Commercial Lodge and the Veteran Association. As a member of the National Stationary Engineers he is secretary of the employment committee, and represented the association at the national convention in St. Louis in 1899. He is a Republican in politics, and is a broad-minded, progressive citizen, well abreast of current events, and in sympathy with all intelligent advancement.

J. A. CAMPBELL. As superintendent and manager of the Moneta Cannery Company, Mr. Campbell is connected with a growing and important industry, which furnishes abundant opportunity for the exercise of wise judgment and keen energy. A native of Iowa, born January 14, 1878, and educated in the schools of that state, he came to California in 1894 and entered the employ of G. H. Waters & Co., of Pomona, with whom he remained for seven years, coming from there to Moneta in the capacity of superintendent of the cannery. With him in the cannery is his brother, Kemper, while the third brother, Vernon, formerly manager of the cannery at Moneta, is now in charge of a cannery at Ontario, this state. The three brothers built this cannery in 1900, and now have a plant valued at $10,000, with a capacity of ten thousand cans per day. Fruits and vegetables of all kinds are turned out, the sale for which is limited only by the capacity of the plant. Connected with the cannery is a pumping plant, capacity one hundred and seventy-five inches, a part of this water being used in the cannery, while the larger portion is sold.

The father of Mr. Campbell was S. B. Campbell, M. D., who was born in Vernon, Ind., and received the degree of M. D. from the University of Michigan. For twenty-five years he practiced medicine in Iowa, meantime also carrying on a drug business. During the Civil war he was engaged as assistant surgeon of Company D, One Hundred and Thirty-second Indiana Volunteer Infantry. The demands of his practice and various business interests proved too great a tax upon his health, and, hoping that a rest from his labors and a change of climate would prove beneficial, in 1892 he came to California. An immediate benefit was realized and the following year he returned to Iowa, but soon afterward died. During 1874 he had married, in Iowa, Miss Carrie Otterman, who was born in Montgomery county, Md., a daughter of Joseph and Melissa (Westfall) Otterman, natives respectively of Virginia and Ohio. Her maternal grandfather, Cornelius Westfall, was a farmer of Kentucky, from which state he removed to Indiana, and there died. Mr. Otterman followed the occupation of an architect in Indiana, and from there in 1864 removed to Iowa, where he bought and improved a farm of four hundred and sixty acres. Some years since he retired from active cares and is now living, retired, in Adel, Iowa. Of his two children, Mrs. Campbell was the older. Her education was received in grammar and high schools in Iowa, and there in 1874 she became the wife of Dr. Campbell. Born of their union were six children, namely: Vernon, of Ontario, Cal.; Hazel, who is with her brother in Ontario; Joseph A., the subject of this article; Garnett, Kemper and Gladys, all living with their mother at Moneta. The family are identified with the Christian Church.

SAMUEL CALVERT FOY. As a citizen of Los Angeles Mr. Foy was identified with its history from the very early pioneer days until his death, a period covering almost a half century. During all of the intervening years he was a witness of its growth and a contributor to its development. It is difficult for the present generation to comprehend the remarkable transformation wrought in the aspect of this city and the personnel of its citizens; indeed, little remains the same as when he first saw it except the matchless climate and the beautiful scenery. All else is changed, and it was his happy privilege, not only to assist in this transformation, but to enjoy its fruition during his last days.

The Foy family is of Irish descent. The name was originally spelled Fahy, but the present form has been in use ever since the records began to be preserved by Capt. John Foy. The latter was a native of Cashal, near Castlereagh, county of Roscommon, province of Connaught, Ireland, and was the youngest of sixteen children. On coming to America he settled in Kentucky, where he followed civil engineering.

Through the influence of Henry Clay, whose warm friend he was, employment was secured for him in the Washington botanical gardens and he filled that position with ability and success. The National Intelligencer of August 25, 1833, states that "For many years, as superintendent of the Capitol grounds, he greatly contributed by his taste and industry to the embellishing and beautifying of the park and making it what it is to-day, one of the finest in the world." He married Mary Calvert, who was born in Kentucky in July, 1800, a daughter of Christopher and Eliza (Cox) Calvert, natives of Virginia, the former descended from John Cecil Calvert of Baltimore.

Three sons and one daughter (the latter deceased in infancy) were born in Washington, D. C., to the union of Capt. John and Mary (Calvert) Foy. By a later marriage the latter became the mother of two children, of whom the survivor is Josephus W. Rich, of Covington, Ky. Samuel Calvert Foy was born September 23, 1830, and received his education in Burlington (Ky.) Academy. After learning the harnessmaker's trade in Cincinnati, Ohio, he followed the occupation in Natchez, Miss. Stories of the discovery of gold in California aroused in him an ambition to try his fortune in the far west, and in 1852 he arrived in California via Havana and Panama. From San Francisco he proceeded to the mines on the Feather river, but soon went to Sacramento and from there to the Calaveras mines. January, 1854, found him in the then Mexican town of Los Angeles, which, though containing only two or three thousand inhabitants and boasting few buildings except adobes, pleased him so greatly that he determined to remain. His first step was the opening of a harness shop on Main street, adjoining the present site of the Farmers and Merchants Bank. Later he was joined by his brother, John M., and the two continued together until 1865, when John sold to Samuel his interest and removed to San Bernardino, remaining there until his death. The oldest of the three brothers, James C., came to California in 1850, and returned to Kentucky in 1854. At the opening of the Civil war he raised Company A, Twenty-third Kentucky Infantry, and was commissioned captain of Company A, but later received a promotion to the rank of colonel, in which capacity he accompanied Sherman on the Georgia campaign. In the battle of Chhattahoochee, July 9, 1864, when on the north bank of the Chhattahoochee river, he was wounded by a shell, from the effects of which he died about ten days later.

For nine years, beginning in 1856, Samuel C. Foy, in addition to his other enterprises, drove cattle to the mines and sold them to the miners, this proving a profitable venture. Having sold the cattle business, in 1865 he returned to Los Angeles and devoted himself exclusively to the saddlery and harness business. As a business man he bore the highest reputation. Integrity was his watchword in business. Through his honorable dealings he won the friendship of associates and the respect of acquaintances. Especially was he interested in Masonry, and the lofty doctrines of that noble order found in him an ardent disciple; his connection as past master of Los Angeles Lodge No. 42, F. & A. M., and past high priest of Los Angeles Chapter No. 33, R. A. M., gave him prominence and influence in the fraternity. To his brethren in the order, to his associates in business and to his circle of personal friends, the news of his death, which occurred April 24, 1901, brought with it a realization of deep loss, a feeling of personal bereavement. That fast-lessening circle of pioneers mourned him in death, while more recently established settlers, appreciative of his work in rendering possible the present conditions, gave him the tribute of respect which his life merited.

Some years after coming to Los Angeles Mr. Foy established domestic ties. He was married October 7, 1860, to Miss Lucinda Macy, who was born in Knox county, Ind., a daughter of Dr. Obed and Lucinda (Polk) Macy, natives respectively of North Carolina and Knox county, Ind. Her maternal grandfather, Charles Polk, was born at Fort Detroit, four months after his mother had been captured by the Indians and carried from Kentucky into Michigan. After the close of the war Captain Polk traveled eight hundred miles through the wilderness in search of his wife, whom he found and brought back to Kentucky. The Polks trace their lineage to Virginia and are of the same family as was ex-President Polk. The Macys are from Nantucket, Mass., where Thomas Macy was one of the earliest settlers.

Born in 1801, Dr. Obed Macy was a graduate physician and practiced in southern Indiana. In 1850, accompanied by his wife and nine children, he started for California, making the long journey with ox-teams and spending nine months on the road. One of the children, Charles P., died on the journey. At the time the daughter, Lucinda, was in her sixth year. Though so young the trip made an indelible impression on her mind. She recalls the perils of the journey which proved so hard upon the oxen that, to lighten the load, the women and children walked much of the way. On Christmas day they looked out upon San Bernardino valley, which on account of the early and abundant rains was a charming picture of springtime. Looking around him upon the broad and beautiful expanse, the doctor exclaimed to his wife, "Mother, this is Paradise." New Year's day of 1851 they spent at what is now Pomona and proceeded gradually from there to San Gabriel mission. At every ranch they were received with the greatest hospitality. They settled at El Monte, where the doctor, wishing to relinquish the practice of medicine, took up farming pursuits. In 1852 they came to Los Angeles, where he became proprietor of the historic Bella Union hotel, now the St. Charles. From the management of this he retired in 1855. He died the following year and his wife passed away in 1872. They were the parents of thirteen children, of whom the following attained mature years: Mrs. Urania Cheesman, of San Francisco; Oscar, a horticulturist at Alhambra, Los Angeles county; Mrs. Nancy P. Woodruff, of Nevada county, Cal.; Louisa, Mrs. John M. Foy, who died in Los Angeles in 1896; William, of San Francisco; Obed, of Los Angeles; Lucinda, Mrs. Samuel C. Foy; and Mrs. Mary J. Evans, of Oakland. These eight children arrived in California in December, 1850, with their parents.

On coming to Los Angeles Lucinda Macy was a pupil in the pay schools and later attended the first public school established under the American rule. Among her early recollections are those of seeing the first brick kiln built and burned. In the larger growth of the city she has maintained the deepest interest, being keenly alive to its magnificent possibilities, and thoroughly in touch with educational, commercial and religious development. Her home still remains at No. 651 South Figueroa street, in the residence which Mr. Foy erected in 1873. Some years ago she was very active in the Order of the Eastern Star, in which she enjoys the distinction of having been a charter member and matron. Of the ten children born to her marriage six are living, all in Los Angeles, viz.: Mary E.; James Calvert, manager of the wholesale and retail harness business and a member of Ramona Parlor No. 1, Native Sons of the Golden West, of which he is past president; Cora; Edna; Alma, now Mrs. Thomas Lee Woolwine; and Florence.

DAVID L. BURKE. Since the bicycle first came into popularity David L. Burke has been an unquestioned authority on this particular method of amusement and exercise. Not only has he been able to discourse on gears and pedals, saddles and frames, but he has also more than once heard the thunders of applause that greeted his successful termination of some particularly hard-won race. Now that the wheel has passed its "boom" days and has entered the ranks of necessary commodities, he is still the versatile authority on the best brands of wheels and sells thousands each year.

A native of Pennsylvania, Mr. Burke was born near Chambersburg, March 15, 1864, a son of Jeremiah and Lucinda (Taylor) Burke, natives respectively of Maryland and Pennsylvania. His father removed from Maryland to Pennsylvania, where he engaged in farming until his death. The mother is now living with her son, David L., in Los Angeles. In her family there are seven children now living. A half-brother, Major Wilson Burke, of Austin, Tex., won his rank as an officer during the Civil war. Another half-brother, Jerome, was at one time United States warden in Washington, D. C. Dr. George Burke, now of Newcastle, Ind., was a surgeon in an Indiana regiment during the Civil war. J. K. Burke, a brother and partner of David L., was reared and educated principally in Illinois and came to California with the brother whose partner he has since remained, his attention having been given especially to the management of the plumbing department. Politically he is a Republican and fraternally a member of the Woodmen of the World and Ben Hur. In the estimation of all who know him he stands high. Three sons have been born of his union with Miss Willetta Pearce, a native of Mendota, Ill., and daughter of Captain Pearce, now of Los Angeles.

When eight years of age David L. Burke was taken by his parents to Illinois and thereafter received his education in the public schools of Sterling, Whiteside county. During his vacations he learned the plumbing business, completing his trade later in Chicago. Coming to Los Angeles with his brother in 1886, the firm of Burke Brothers was organized for the carrying on of a plumbing and contracting business, and a store was opened at No. 456 South Spring street, which is still the firm's location. In 1888 he began bicycle racing on the coast. In 1894 a bicycle store was opened in connection with the plumbing business, he giving his attention especially to the former. As a racer he was remarkably successful and took many medals along the coast, also for three years held the Pacific coast championship. He captured a medal at Morrison, Ill., in addition to those in the west. Since 1895 he has not engaged in racing. In his sales he makes a specialty of the Thistle wheel. The firm acts as agents for this justly popular make of machine, having agencies at Oakland, San Diego, Riverside, San Bernardino, Pomona and Pasadena. Between three and four thousand of this make have been sold in Los Angeles alone. It is a general favorite, although they carry other styles. In addition he manufactures bicycles, his "Swell Burke" taking a high rank among desirable machines.

Aside from the interests of his bicycle business, Mr. Burke is the owner of thoroughbred English greyhounds, with Lady Edith at the head. His dogs have taken prizes at many exhibits and are among the most valuable of their kind in the city. Politically Mr. Burke is a Republican. Identified with various athletic and social organizations in the town, he is a member of the Cycle Dealers' Association, formerly served as president of the East Side Tennis Club, and for years was a member of the Los Angeles Athletic Club, in which he maintained the championship. Throughout Los Angeles he is very popular, as a whole-souled, generous man, in touch with the needs of his friends and associates, and enjoying the confidence of a large circle of business and social associates.

STEPHEN FISK CARPENTER. Very early in the history of America three brothers came from England and settled in Massachusetts. From one of them descends the branch of the Carpenter family represented by S. F. Carpenter, of Santa Monica. His father, Loring C., a native of Massachusetts, became a millwright in Vermont, but in 1855 removed to Preston, Fillmore county, Minn., later returning to Vermont and there remaining until death. During the war of 1812 he served in the American army. He married Caroline, daughter of Stephen Fisk, who was a native of Massachusetts, of English descent, and during much of his life engaged in farming in Vermont, from which state he enlisted in the Revolutionary war. Mrs. Caroline Carpenter was born in Vermont and died there. Of her two daughters and two sons, only the youngest survives, Stephen Fisk Carpenter, who was born at Highgate, Franklin county, Vt., March 29, 1834. In boyhood he learned millwrighting, and after going to Fillmore county, Minn., in 1855, he devoted seven years to the building of mills. At the same time he entered a tract of one hundred and sixty acres. When the Sioux war broke out he was a member of a local company of militia and accompanied them to the scene of trouble, where he assisted in quelling the disturbances.

During 1863 Mr. Carpenter came to California via New York and Panama to San Francisco. For a time he mined and prospected at Gold Hill, Nev., and later was interested in different mining companies. The year 1882 found him in Santa Monica, where he followed the carpenter's trade and also took a number of contracts for building houses. In the fall of 1901 the city trustees appointed him superintendent of streets, which position he has since filled with marked efficiency, his careful oversight of the work being apparent in the improved condition of the streets of the city. Since 1895 he has been a member of the school board and is now serving his second year as president of the board. During the period of his service the high-school building has been erected and many improvements in other buildings have been made. Besides his labors as superintendent of streets and president of the school board he has been interested in horticulture and has improved five acres adjoining Santa Monica on the railroad, where he now has an orchard in bearing lemons and a pumping plant with a well of two hundred and seventy feet.

The home place of Mr. Carpenter, on the corner of Oregon and Fourth streets, was sold in 1902, and on its site was built the City Hall. He now owns a home at No. 334 Fifth street, which is presided over by his wife, Madeline, whom he married in Preston, Minn., in 1862. She was born in Ontario, and at the age of twelve years was taken to Minnesota, where she grew to womanhood. Her father, Henry Webb, a native of England, crossed the ocean to Ontario, and there married Salinda Hall, daughter of Elijah Hall. Accompanied by his family, Mr. Webb removed to Minnesota, and from there came to California, settling at Visalia, and thence coming to Santa Monica in 1875, immediately after the first sale of lots had been made. Mrs. Webb died in Santa Monica. Of her ten children six are now living, all being in California. The only child of Mr. and Mrs. Carpenter is Laura, now Mrs. Albert Hawes, of Santa Monica. She is the mother of one son, Stephen T. Garey, born of a former marriage. Both Mr. and Mrs. Carpenter are interested in the work of the Eastern Star, in which the latter has been an officer. Fraternally he was made a Mason in the Santa Monica Lodge. For more than forty years he has been connected with the Odd Fellows, in which he has served officially, and he is also past officer of the Encampment. While living at Gold Hill he became connected with the Ancient Order of United Workmen and at one time he also affiliated with the Knights of Pythias. His wife was also formerly active in the Rebekahs and the Independent Order of Good Templars. In his politics he is a Republican and votes for the men and measures advocated by his party.

E. CHILD. Prior to his arrival in California in 1866, Mr. Child had been a resident of New England and the central states. He was born in Lincoln, Middlesex county, Mass., August 23, 1832, a son of Elisha and Elmira (Rice) Child, natives respectively of Sudbury and Wayland, Mass., and both members of very old families of the Bay state. The father was for years a farmer at Lincoln, but finally removed to Waltham, and there spent his last years. In the family of five children all but one are living, the subject of this article being next to the oldest child and the only son. His education was commenced in the Waltham schools and completed in an academy under Prof. Abner Rice. Afterward he learned the sash and door business at Medford, Mass. Going to Minnesota in 1852, he settled at St. Anthony's Falls, now a part of Minneapolis, and there became manager of lumber works and a sash and door mill. After two years he turned his attention to flat-boating on the Mississippi and with a partner ran boats as far south as Memphis, a trip that consumed six weeks. Two years were spent in this business, after which he settled in Memphis as manager of a sash mill, but the opening of the Civil war made his location unpleasant for a man with strong abolition views, so he returned to Massachusetts and resumed work at his special calling.

During the year 1866 Mr. Child came via Panama to California, and for more than three years engaged in contracting and building at Sacramento, after which he followed the same occupation in Oakland for fifteen years. During his residence in the latter city he had charge of building the Congregational Church, which cost $85,000; also the Alexander residence, at a cost of $20,000, and many substantial business blocks and private houses. From 1886 to 1888 he was manager of the mill at Colton owned by Perry Mott & Co. The two following years were spent as a contractor in Redlands, since which time he has made Los Angeles his business headquarters, and now resides at No. 1430 Seventeenth street, east of Central avenue. For ten or more years he has been a member of the firm of Child, Hatton & Field, which had the contracts to build the Union Ice Company's plant in Los Angeles, Unity Church in this city, the Northam residence at Hollywood, Mrs. Waldron's home in the same suburb, the Meyer residence in Westlake district, the Johnson home in Los Angeles, a number of warehouses in East Los Angeles, and many other private and public buildings. The office of the firm is in the Builders' Exchange, Los Angeles. From 1897 to 1902 Mr. Child made Santa Monica his home, continuing, however, to have his office in Los Angeles, and in February of the last-named year he returned to this city with the intention of becoming a permanent resident. His first wife, who was Miss Lucy A. Stearns, was born in Waltham, Mass., and died there. Afterward he was married to Miss Augusta Costellow, who was born and reared in Bangor, Me.

The first identification of Mr. Child with Masonry dates from his residence in St. Cloud, Minn., and he is now a member of the blue lodge of Oakland, Cal. While in Sacramento he was initiated into the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and afterward served as noble grand of Oakland Post, also was a member of the association in that city. From the time of casting his vote he has been staunch in his adherence to the Republican party, in whose principles he is a firm believer. He is a member of the Builders' Exchange and in other ways keeps in close touch with movements for the benefit and welfare of contractors and builders.

Thomas Harwood

THOMAS HARWOOD. That early responsibility is oftentimes the making of men is proved in the life of Mr. Harwood, one of the most substantial and honored of the pioneers of Santa Clara valley. He was born in Gibson county, Ind., November 24, 1835, a son of Thomas Harwood, who was born in New York, and Sarah Harwood, who was born in England. The cradle of the ancestry of the family is in England, and from the shores of his Albion land the grandfather, Ruthland Harwood, took his departure many years ago, and settled in New York. Of the six children born to Thomas Harwood, Sr., and his wife, two only survive. Of these, Thomas W., Jr., lived on his father's farm until 1850, at which time he crossed the plains with an ox-team and drove of cattle, although he was then but fifteen years of age. After landing in Placerville, Cal., he worked out by the month on the surrounding farms for a year, after which he went to Sacramento and purchased a freighting outfit, and for about eighteen months freighted between Sacramento and the gold mines. For the next two years he worked in the gold mines at Laporte, Cal., and in 1855 again took up freighting, this time from Marysville to points in the northern mining district. This interesting and at times hazardous occupation was continued for nearly sixteen years, and at one time he did such a large business that to carry his merchandise required three ten-mule teams. His route also extended to Virginia City, and other points in the same state.

In 1866 Mr. Harwood enjoyed the fruits of his incessant labor, and broadened his knowledge of the world by travel in Europe, accompanied by his mother and sister. In their pursuit of interest in the old world they visited England, Switzerland, London, and Paris, their wanderings among the storehouses and wonders of Europe consuming the greater part of two years. After his return in 1868 Mr. Harwood located in Butte county, Cal., where he purchased two thousand and four hundred acres of land, and raised thereon sheep and cattle. His average number of head was more than three thousand, the net income being about $3,000. This remunerative venture terminated in 1884, at which time Mr. Harwood sold out and bought one hundred and fifty acres in the Santa Clara valley, which was formerly a portion of the Wilby and Crisman tract. The land was entirely unimproved, but to-day constitutes one of the most valuable investments in the county, being fitted with all modern improvements as far as barns, houses and implements are concerned, the general convenience being increased by a private pumping plant for irrigating, which supplies twenty inches of water. The principal products are at present beans and apricots, although in the past large quantities of oranges, lemons, and other citrus fruits have been grown with gratifying results, and are still raised for home consumption.

In all affairs pertaining to the development of the valley Mr. Harwood is a moving force, and his assistance may be counted on wherever the public welfare is at stake. His interests extend into various grooves of activity, and he is a stockholder in the Santa Paula Co-operative Store. He was formerly a stockholder in the Farmers' Ditch Company. A Republican in politics, he is active in the affairs of his town, and has served as a school trustee for several years.

In 1876 Mr. Harwood married Miss E. A. Mastin, who was born November 14, 1859, in Quincy, Plumas county, Cal., of parents who were born respectively in Georgia and South Carolina. Of this union there are five children: Thomas F., born September 26, 1879; Oliver, December 4, 1881; Henry Irvin, October 9, 1883; Frederick W., born in Ventura county, August 21, 1887; and Herbert Walter, born May 25, 1891. Mr. and Mrs. Harwood are members of the Congregational Church.

JAMES COOK. This pioneer of California has been engaged in the tannery business in Los Angeles since 1885. He was born in Simsbury, Conn., November 6, 1835, a son of James Cook, of Scotch descent, and who settled in Connecticut when a young man. James Cook, Sr., was a farmer by occupation, and married Rebecca Middleton, also of Scotch descent, and who died in Connecticut. Of the twelve children in the family, six were sons and six daughters, and two of the sons were soldiers in the Civil war. Alexander, who is now deceased, served in the Fifth Connecticut Volunteer Infantry, and had a long and interesting war record. Samuel Cook was a member of the United States navy during the war, and died in Butte, Mont.

The eldest in his father's family, James Cook, Jr., was educated in the public schools of Connecticut, and at the age of fifteen began to paddle his own canoe, his services for a time being in demand by a horse dealer, who lived on a farm near Bloomfield. In 1856 he thought to brighten his prospects by removal to the west, and aboard the Moses Taylor, that staunch old craft that plied so persistently between New York harbor and the Isthmus in the early days, he succeeded in reaching Aspinwall, and eventually landed in San Francisco. Like most of the sojourners to the coast in the early '50s he determined, if possible, to wrest a fortune from mother earth, and in furtherance of his desire went to Marysville, where he had a very hard time and a very gloomy outlook for a few months. When the excitement was most intense he spent some time at Yankee Hill and Gravel Range, and later turned his attention to the less visionary but more sure method of livelihood to be found on a milk ranch. After a year spent in early rising and hard work on the ranch he learned the butcher business in Marysville, and for a time had a shop of his own in the town. Not entirely satisfied with the prospects in this line of activity he engaged in the manufacture of soap at Marysville, under the firm name of J. Cook & Co. and in partnership with his brother-in-law, T. W. Corder. A large trade rewarded the efforts of the firm and they continued to supply reliable soap to the community for about twelve years. The same firm afterwards located in Oakland, Cal., and engaged in wool pulling and the tannery business under the name of Cook & Corder for six years. After severing his business relations with Mr. Corder and after recovering from a severe siege of pneumonia Mr. Cook went into the sheep and butcher business, and in 1884-85 returned to the scene of his childhood days in Connecticut, twenty-nine years having elapsed since his departure therefrom.

In 1885 Mr. Cook located in Los Angeles and bought the site of his present factory, which covers half a block on West Main street, by the Kirk street bridge, where he has since engaged in wool pulling and tanning. He has also built a residence on West Lake avenue, and owns a ranch of eight hundred acres in Antelope valley, Los Angeles county, which is devoted to stock-raising and is well equipped with modern improvements, besides having a fine water supply. Mr. Cook has been prominent in many avenues of activity since coming to California, and here, as elsewhere, he has continually strengthened a reputation for sterling worth and integrity. A Republican of the true-blue order, he has held offices of trust and responsibility, and in Marysville was councilman for two terms. Also, while living in Marysville, he was a member of the Home Guard, an organization which had abundant opportunity to prove its loyalty to the Union, for there were many strong southern sympathizers in the neighborhood, and the guard just managed to save the state for the government. On more than one occasion Mr. Cook's life was threatened, but he courageously stood by what he thought right in the face of the greatest danger. Fraternally he is affiliated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, having joined the organization in 1865, a member of Yuba Lodge No. 5. At present he is a member of Oakland Lodge No. 118, and of the Ancient Order of United Workmen, No. 55, at Los Angeles. As regards religion, while not associated with any church, his creed is the Golden Rule, and he believes in giving food and shelter and help, wherever it is needed and merited.

In Marysville, Cal., Mr. Cook married Mary M. Corder, who was born in England and came with her parents to New York when a child, removing with them in 1856 to California via the Panama route. Of the four daughters and one son in her parents' family, all are living, and all are residents of Los Angeles, except the son, William J. Cook, who is in Oakland, Cal.

M. S. CUMMINGS. During the Revolution and the war of 1812 the Cummings family had representatives who fought for the American cause, while later generations were among the brave pioneers who settled on the frontier of Indiana and endured hardships and peril from the hostility of the near-by Indians. W. M. Cummings, who was born at Shelbyville, Ind., settled at Oskaloosa, Iowa, in 1849, and entered large tracts of land, which he developed into valuable farms. At one time he served as captain of the Home Guards. Continuing to make his home in Iowa he died there when seventy-three years of age. His wife, Clarinda (Levi) Cummings, was born in Indiana and died in Iowa. Their ten children attained mature years and all but one are still living, but none has come to California excepting M. S., of Los Angeles. He was the third son and one of twins, born at Oskaloosa, Iowa, May 28, 1854. At an early age he began to be useful in the improving of the farm, and when only nine years old drove seven yoke of oxen to a twenty-seven-inch plow in an effort to remove from the land a thick growth of hazel brush ten feet high.

The first visit of Mr. Cummings to California was in 1879, when he was employed as foreman on the Gum Tree ranch. This position he held from February 17, 1879, until June 18, 1881, and meantime raised the first sugar beets in the United States, having five hundred acres that averaged thirty tons to the acre. On his return to Iowa he resumed farming and threshing. In 1887 he again came to California, since which he has been a general contractor in Los Angeles. Among his contracts have been those for important and large jobs in excavating, the laying of miles of street in Los Angeles and Long Beach, including in the latter city American avenue, Sixth street, Magnolia avenue, First and Seventh streets. He also had contracts for Mesa, Twelfth and Beacon streets in San Pedro. His specialty is cement and asphalt paving and the grading of streets, but he has also done other general contracting, including those for a large number of public buildings and private residences.

In Oskaloosa, Iowa, June 21, 1885, Mr. Cummings married Miss Maggie A. Griffith, who was born in Scranton, Pa., and received her education in the Oskaloosa schools. They and their three children, Celia, Glenn and Hazel, have an attractive home at No. 1302 West Twenty-second street, which has just been erected by Mr.

A Longfellow

Cummings. The family attend the Congregational Church, and Mrs. Cummings is a member of the same. Since coming to Los Angeles Mr. Cummings has been made a Mason in Hollenbeck Lodge, F. & A. M., and he is also identified with the Woodmen of the World. While in national politics he is a staunch Republican, in local affairs he believes party issues are of less importance than the election of men of honor, uprightness and ability, and he admires the man in office, whatever party he may represent, who is a staunch supporter of the rights of the people and who carries out his convictions of justice to his constituents.

AUGUST LANGENBERGER. During his long and steadfast life in Anaheim August Langenberger impressed his worth and fine personal characteristics upon the community which he strove to improve, and of which he was one of the first settlers, and the pioneer merchant. He was born in Hanover, Germany, in 1824, a son of Dr. Amadeus Langenberger, a prominent physician and surgeon of Stadshagen.

In his youth Mr. Langenberger was favored with exceptional educational advantages, and in later years not only spoke four languages, but was a man of deep and profound research, and remarkably well informed on current literary and other events. When old enough to assume responsibility he was trained to a mercantile career, and was thus engaged in his native land until his emigration to New Orleans in 1847. To his ambitious and expectant nature the rumors of western gold came as an opportunity not to be ignored, and the following year he set out for California, and for a time engaged in mining with fair success. In 1850 he chose rather the more certain methods of money-making of his original occupation, and upon settling in San Gabriel engaged in the merchandise business. In 1852 he located upon the Juan Pacifico rancho, and on an extensive scale turned his attention to the raising of cattle, and became one of the largest cattle raisers for miles around, his stock being driven for disposal to the San Francisco market. In 1857 the town of Anaheim was started on a portion of the ranch occupied by Mr. Langenberger, and on the site he erected the first merchandise store and continued its management up to the time of his death, April 3, 1895. For thirty years he was the agent for the Wells-Fargo Express Company, and in innumerable ways promoted the well-being of the city. He was mayor of the town for some time and a member of the city council, and was president and director of the Anaheim Union Water Company. For several years he was supervisor of Los Angeles county.

W. K. COWAN. The pioneer of the bicycle business in Southern California is W. K. Cowan, who has represented the Rambler on the coast since 1890, and is now engaged in the sale of high-grade wheels and automobiles at Nos. 207-9 West Fifth street, Los Angeles. A native of Greenfield, Dade county, Mo., Mr. Cowan was born March 17, 1863; a son of H. G. and grandson of Hon. Alfred Cowan, the latter a native of Virginia, and one of the early settlers of Blunt county, Tenn. He became a commanding figure in Tennessee politics and served as a member of the legislature from his county, in after years removing to Greenfield, southwest Missouri, of which locality he was one of the pioneers.

H. G. Cowan was born in Blunt county, Tenn., and became a farmer near Greenfield, Mo., from which state he went to the Mexican war as a member of a Missouri regiment. All through the Civil war he served as a non-commissioned officer in a Missouri regiment, and his name is therefore enrolled among the veterans of two wars. About 1868 he located near Fort Scott and homesteaded a claim, which was improved and upon which he lived until locating in Douglas, near Lawrence, Kans., in 1876. He later farmed near Baldwin City, Kans., and was still later a resident of Lawrence, and in 1888 came to Los Angeles, which is still his home. In comparative retirement from business and other cares, he is passing his latter days among delightful surroundings, and though seventy-four years of age, is in the possession of those faculties which have placed him in the front ranks of noble and patriotic American citizens. In his youth he married Eliza Garrison, a native of Indiana, and daughter of Mark Alexander Garrison, who was born in the east, cultivated farms in Missouri and Kansas, and died near Olathe, Kans. Mrs. Cowan is the mother of six children, all of whom are living, W. K. being the eldest of the family.

The education of Mr. Cowan was acquired in the public schools of Kansas and in Baker University at Baldwin City, which institution he attended for two and a half years. He then entered Park College in Missouri and remained for two and a half years, but left during the junior year to learn the jewelry business under William Rowe. After mastering the craft he removed to Los Angeles in 1887 and found employment with Mr. Harris, the jeweler, for a year. He then started up an independent jewelry business on South Spring street, and at the expiration of two years removed to Chicago and took a course in the watch-making school. This finishing touch to his already extensive knowledge of the jewelry business made him a peer of the master mechanics in his line. Upon returning to California he located at Riverside and engaged in business on Main street until 1892. While at Riverside he became interested in the sale of bicycles and was the first in the town to carry a stock of bicycle goods, his stock being disposed of in 1892 in order to start a similar business in Los Angeles.

Arriving in Los Angeles he opened a shop on the corner of Spring and Fifth streets, and has since sold many high-grade machines, but has carried the Rambler as a leader ever since starting in business. He is the oldest Rambler agent on the coast, and at one time had the agency for entire Southern California and Arizona, but since 1896 had taken charge only of Los Angeles and vicinity. At present he is selling a great many Waverly electric automobiles, and represents this admirable machine in Southern California. During 1892 and 1894 Mr. Cowan was interested in bicycle racing, and became an expert in his line, but he found that the wear and tear hardly compensated him for the necessary falling off of his general business. He therefore gave up racing and has since attended strictly to legitimate business and has more than realized his expectations from a financial standpoint.

In Los Angeles Mr. Cowan was united in marriage with Mattie Hare, a native of New York City, but who came at an early age to California, where she was reared and educated. To Mr. and Mrs. Cowan has been born one child, June Cowan. Mr. Cowan is fraternally associated with the United Moderns, and has for years been a member of the Los Angeles Wheelmen. He is also a charter member of the Southern California Bicycle Association, and is a director in the same. He is a Republican in national politics, and is a member of the First Presbyterian Church. He enjoys the confidence of the business contingent of Los Angeles and vicinity, and has the faculty of making and keeping many friends.

CHARLES D. DAGGETT, capitalist, real estate man, and ex-president of the Pasadena Board of Trade, was born in Milwaukee, Wis., in May of 1851, and is a son of Samuel S. and Ruth S. (Bishop) Daggett, natives of Massachusetts, the latter born in Attleboro. The family is of English extraction, and the emigrating ancestor came to America with Governor Winthrop in 1640 and settled in Massachusetts. Samuel S. Daggett located in Milwaukee about 1843, and there organized the Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Company, of which he was president up to the time of his death. He was a remarkably successful man, an astute financier, and prominent in the general affairs of the Cream city. It is said that when the first risk of the Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Company fell due the company was not far enough along in premiums to meet it, and that therefore Mr. Daggett himself raised it on his individual note.

The only child in his father's family, C. D. Daggett was educated in East Hampton, Mass., where he graduated from the Williston Seminary. Afterward he entered upon the study of law with Finches, Lynd & Miller, of Milwaukee. He was admitted to the Wisconsin bar in 1874, and practiced his profession in Milwaukee until his removal to Kansas City, Mo., in 1878. Upon locating in Pasadena in 1888 he relinquished the practice of law to look after his various investments in California, and has since been in the real estate business, since 1897 in partnership with his cousin, Frank S. Daggett, under the firm name of Daggett & Daggett. Beginning with 1899 Mr. Daggett was for three years president of the Pasadena Board of Trade, and under his able management this important city enterprise attained to a high standard of excellence. For a number of years he has been a member of the board of trustees of Throop Polytechnic Institute, being vice president of the board and a member of the executive committee. He is one of the most conservative, substantial and influential citizens of this city, and known not only in business circles, but among the most exclusive social organizations. For two years he was president of the Valley Hunt Club, and he is a member of the Pasadena Country Club. Mr. Daggett is a Republican in national politics, and an attendant of the Episcopal Church.

The marriage of Mr. Daggett and Mary Stewart occurred in Milwaukee, Wis., Mrs. Daggett being a daughter of Rev. John B. Stewart, D. D., a Presbyterian clergyman. To Mr. and Mrs. Daggett have been born four children: Ruth, who is a graduate of the Monticello Seminary; Helen, who is also a graduate of the Monticello Seminary, and is now Mrs. Byron S. Harvey, of Kansas City; Maud, who is a graduate of the Throop Polytechnic Institute, Pasadena; and John, who was educated at the Leland Stanford University. Mrs. Daggett is an authoress of note, who has not only contributed to numerous periodicals in different parts of the country, but whose novels, Maripossilla and Broad Aisle, have been enthusiastically received.

JOHN ERICKSON. Among the very old families of Sweden is that represented by Mr. Erickson, of Pasadena, whose father, Erick Anderson, and mother, Anna Johnson, were identified with the farming community of the town of Hedemora, on the Wester-Dal, and were faithful members of the Lutheran Church. The father died at the homestead when he was sixty-five years of age, leaving five children, of whom John and a daughter are the only representatives in America. The oldest son in the family, John was born at Hedemora February 18, 1864, and at the age of fourteen years began an apprenticeship of three years to the carpenter's trade in Stockholm. Meantime he also attended night school, where he acquired a knowledge of draughting.

It was during the year 1888 that Mr. Erickson came to America via England to New York, from which point he proceeded to Chicago. One year later he went west to Seattle, Wash., where he worked at his trade. In 1891 he began to take contracts for the building of houses and continued to do a large business until after the fire. Since 1895 he has made Pasadena his home, and since 1898 has taken contracts for buildings in this city and vicinity, having, among other residences, built those of Messrs. Swan (on East Colorado) and Smith (on West Colorado), also that of R. Eason, with numerous other private homes and a number of public buildings, including the Bentz block. His own home, erected by himself, stands at No. 864 North Orange Grove avenue, and is presided over by his wife, formerly Miss Mathilda Nilson, who was born in Smaland, Sweden. They have one son, James Lester. In religion the family are believers in the Lutheran faith, in which Mr. Erickson was reared. Fraternally he is connected with the Ancient Order of United Workmen and is a past officer in the Independent Order of Foresters.

GEORGE RUTHERFORD, Sr. Numerous are the evidences of industry and success to be found at the busy little blacksmith shop of George Rutherford, Sr., on West Cañon Perdido street, Santa Barbara. Indeed, the genial and capable manipulator of the hammer and bellows has few superiors in his line, as evidenced by the noble steeds that come to him for proper coverings for their pedal extremities. His regular customers include some of the bluest blooded horses in Santa Barbara county, and his trade extends far beyond the city limits. A canny Scot, Mr. Rutherford was born near Kelso, Roxburyshire, Scotland, September 30, 1840, his father, William, and his grandfather, George, having been born in the same shire. Both men were stock-raisers, and accumulated a fair competence by reason of their industry and good management. The mother of George Rutherford, Jessie (Balmar) Rutherford, was also born in Roxburyshire, a daughter of Thomas Balmer, a Scotch land steward. Mrs. Rutherford, who came to California in 1872, is now living with her children, and is aged eighty-two years. She is the mother of fourteen children, twelve of whom grew to maturity, and eleven are now living, George being the second youngest. Janet is now Mrs. Hunter, of Berkeley; Thomas is a stockman in Scotland; William is also a stock-raiser in his native land; Isabel is now the wife of William Fisher, of Lompoc;

Stephen is a farmer at Naples; John is a farmer in Shasta county; Waite is engaged in blacksmithing in Reading, Cal.; Mary is the wife of Albert Salts, of San Francisco; Andrew and Frank are engaged in farming at Goleta.

At the age of four years George Rutherford removed with his parents to Heddingtonshire, where they lived on a farm, and where he attended a private or pay school. At the age of sixteen he was apprenticed to learn the trade of blacksmith and horseshoer, and after serving for four years went up to London and was employed by Mavar Brothers, the largest veterinary establishment in the city. In 1866 he returned to Heddingtonshire, and worked in the shop where he had served his apprenticeship until 1873, and in June of the same year came to America, sailing from Glasgow to New York on the steamer Australia. Upon arriving in California he worked for Rice & Collins, horseshoers, in Santa Barbara, and in 1880 started the business for himself which has since been such a pronounced success.

In London, England, Mr. Rutherford married Mary F. Findley, who was born in Aberdeen, Scotland, and died in Santa Barbara. Six of the children of the family are living: Maggie, who is the wife of R. W. Greer, of San Francisco; William, who is running a horseshoeing establishment in Oakland, Cal.; George, who is a horseshoer and has his own establishment in Santa Barbara; Thomas, who is in business with his father; Daisy, who is the wife of Henry Kercher, of Santa Barbara; and Florence, who is the wife of E. Loomis, of Aguas Calientes, Mexico. Mr. Rutherford is a Republican in politics, and is a member of the Chamber of Commerce. In religion he is a Presbyterian.

E. W. DAVIES, the proprietor and manager of the Santa Barbara Granite and Sandstone Company, also a contractor for granite, stone and marble work, is an adept in his line, and receives a patronage in proportion thereto. Many fine examples of his work remain as permanent monuments to the adornment of the city, among them being the stonework of the Alexander block, the receiving vault at the cemetery, the Duryea mausoleum, and others equally substantial and practical.

A native of Kewanee, Henry county, Ill., Mr. Davies was born March 29, 1855, and was reared on the homestead in his native state. His father, Hugh Davies, was born in Wales, at Conway Castle, Flintshire, and when a young man immigrated to America, settling in Connecticut. He later removed to Henry county, Ill., and from 1852 until 1869 engaged in gardening and general farming. He then took up his residence near Mankota, Minn., where he continued to farm, and where his death eventually occurred. He married Margaret Wilson, who also was born in Wales and likewise died in Minnesota. There were seven sons in the family, six of whom are living, E. W. being the third. In 1869 the latter accompanied his parents to Minnesota, where he completed the education begun in the public schools of Henry county, Ill. When twenty-one years of age he went to Mankato and engaged in the marble business as a stone cutter, continuing the same for five years, when he turned his attention to contracting and building.

In 1882 Mr. Davies removed to Denver, Colo., and worked as a stone cutter. The fall of the same year he repaired to Salt Lake City and engaged in contracting and building, and in 1884 located in Helena, Mont., also contracting and building. There he became well known as a master workman and secured the contract work for the best residences and public buildings in the city. In 1888 he came to California, locating at Riverside in the stone business, but soon removing to Los Angeles, where he lived for a year, and was foreman on the Brushwaller brownstone monument at Buena Vista. Later he had a contract job at Pasadena, and then removed to Sespe and ran the quarries until 1891, when he went to Ventura and was foreman on the Ventura Bank building. In Summerland Mr. Davies was foreman during the construction of the Crocker Lemon house, and in 1898 came to Santa Barbara, where he has since lived and prospered. Among his most praiseworthy undertakings here has been the placing of the viaducts, culverts and general stone work for the Southern Pacific extension. He also operated the boulders and put in a remarkable plant for sawing stone, twenty-five engine power, and located near the Southern Pacific Milling Company's plant. This plant is a general marble, stone, granite and sandstone affair, cuts in any dimensions and is particularly useful in monumental work.

In Minneapolis Mr. Davies married Carrie Andrews, a native of Canada. He is a member of the Chamber of Commerce and otherwise identified with the business and social life of Santa Barbara. He is liberal in religion and politics. Fraternally he is associated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, which he joined in Mankato, Minn., and is now a member in Santa Barbara, and vice grand of the Channel City Lodge. In addition he is connected with the Ancient Order of United Workmen.

JOHN L. DEANE. The genealogy of the Deane family is traced back to the Daine family of England. From that country the great-grandfather of John L. removed to Scotland, where he died. The grandfather, John L., Sr., by whom the name was changed to its present form, was born in Ireland, but grew to manhood in Scotland, and crossing the ocean became a pioneer of Kentucky, where he improved a tract of raw land. During the war of 1812 he and his brother enlisted in the American army; the fate of the brother was never known, but it is supposed that he was killed in the battle of New Orleans. Capt. David H., son of John L., Sr., was born in Breckinridge county, Ky., and for some years during his active life followed contracting in the Blue Grass state. Later he lived in New Mexico, and is now living, retired, in Texarkana, Tex. During the Civil war he enlisted in the Union army and served as captain of a Kentucky company of volunteers. One of his brothers, William, was killed in the battle of Buena Vista during the Mexican war. It may be seen from the ancestral history that the family inherits patriotic loyalty and a love for military affairs.

The marriage of Capt. David H. Deane united him with Miss Fannie Porter, who was born in Maysville, Ky., and died in New Mexico. Six children were born of this union, five of whom are living, John L. being the eldest of the number. He was born at Cloverport, Breckinridge county, Ky., April 23, 1858, and was reared principally in Hartford, Ohio county, until fourteen years of age, when he accompanied the family to Paducah. Under his father's oversight he early acquired a thorough knowledge of the carpenter's trade, which he followed until he took up contracting. From 1882 until 1888 he engaged in the building business at Nevada, Vernon county, Mo., and in the latter year came to California, since which time he has made Los Angeles his home. During all of this period he has followed contracting in or near Los Angeles, with the exception of eighteen months (1900-01) spent in the Cordeline mining district at Wallis, Idaho, where he not only followed his occupation, but also had mining interests. Since his return home he has erected a residence for his family on Washington street near Central avenue. The Builders' Exchange numbers him among its members, and in other ways he aims to keep abreast with the developments in the building business. All of his contracts have been conscientiously executed. Accurate work has been one of his mottoes. Painstaking care is evident in all that he does, and many residences and public buildings stand as monuments to his skill and fidelity. Numbered among his contracts may be mentioned those for the Rowan, Solana, Rodman, Hershey, Tyler and Schroeder residences.

By his marriage to Miss Amanda C. Young, who was born in Hopkins county, Ky., Mr. Deane has two children, C. Rex and D. Herbert, but an affliction has fallen upon the family in the death of the older son at the age of thirteen years. In religion Mr. Deane is a believer in Baptist doctrines, while politically he votes with the Democratic party, and in matters fraternal holds membership in the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Order of Washington.

PETER JOHN DREHER. Undoubtedly the greatest service which Mr. Dreher has rendered his adopted state of California is in connection with the securing of harmonious and concerted action on the part of the citrus-fruit growers in the shipment of their products. With the maturing of his orange grove at Pomona his attention was called to the very unsatisfactory methods employed in the disposition of crops, and he at once realized that, if the orange grower would receive any profit, a radical change must be resorted to. The success he achieved in bringing about needed reforms in the plan of shipment was so pronounced that the attention was attracted of horticulturists throughout the entire state, and the amount of good thus accomplished can scarcely be overestimated.

As his name indicates, Mr. Dreher is of German lineage. The son of Karl Dreher, he was born June 4, 1848, in the village of Feckweiler, principality of Birkenfeld, Germany, about fifty miles west of Bingen-on-the-Rhine. In August, 1855, he accompanied the family to the United States, and in June of 1856 settled at Summerfield, Ill., where he attended the public schools for six winters. Later he took a course in book-keeping in Rhorer's Commercial College in St. Louis. In 1864 he learned the shoemaker's trade under his father, whose business he took charge of the next year, but in January of 1866 left home to learn the dry goods trade in Kansas City, Mo. Returning in September of the same year, he opened a general store in St. Claire county, Ill., at a cross-roads called Lenzburg. The building he occupied was 14x22 feet in dimensions and was stocked with general merchandise, such as could be purchased with his original capital of $442. In a short time he was appointed postmaster at a salary of $12 per annum. At first he made slow progress, but his pluck and perseverance eventually won the day. His integrity and fair business dealings won him the confidence of the people, among whom his standing was of the highest. November 1, 1869, he married Miss Margaret Griebel, to whose efficiency as a helpmate much of his success may justly be attributed. They are the parents of six children, all of whom are in California: Mrs. F. D. Dudderar, C. J. Dreher, Mrs. I. W. Brink, G. P., E. L. and L. F. Dreher, the latter of whom is in San Francisco.

When the Cairo Short Line Railroad was built through St. Clair county, Ill., in 1871, it passed three-quarters of a mile from Lenzburg, and business therefore was attracted to other towns. With an energy characteristic of him Mr. Dreher a few years later purchased a tract of land along the railroad and laid out Lenzburg station, building a depot for the railroad company and erecting a large two-story brick building for a store as well as residence. In addition to conducting a mercantile business there he acted as postmaster, notary public, station agent and express agent, all of which positions he held until April, 1885, when he moved to Belleville, Ill., having disposed of his large mercantile interests in the fall of 1884. In the spring of 1884 he was elected supervisor of Lenzburg Township and a member of the county board.

After two years of recreation, during which he looked into the future prospects of Kansas, Colorado, New Mexico and California, he finally decided to locate in Pomona, Cal., where he arrived with his family on October 17, 1886, and where he has since made his home. For six months he engaged in the real estate and insurance business, after which he devoted himself to citrus culture. In 1888 he represented Pomona with a large exhibit of fruits at Columbus, Ohio, and was gratified by the high compliments which press and people paid the exhibit. On the organization of the National Bank of Pomona in 1891 he was chosen a member of its board of directors.

On the maturing of his first crop of oranges, in 1892, Mr. Dreher found no market for the fruit, but plenty of middlemen who were ready to handle them on commission, but take no financial risk. Believing a remedy for this evil could be found, he concluded to handle his own crop at least. Largely through his efforts in November, 1892, a conference was held in Claremont of seven neighboring citrus growers, and at that time the Claremont (Cal.) Fruit Growers' Association was launched into existence with Mr. Dreher as president. This was the first co-operative society organized in the state, doing its business successfully direct with the eastern dealers (excepting possibly the Pachappa Association at Riverside, the existence of which was unknown to him at the time) and the first to make direct shipments of navel oranges in car lots to England, April 7, 1893. The membership was small and only twenty-one cars of oranges were shipped the first year, but the plan proved successful. The citrus industry of the state being in a deplorable condition and under the pernicious consignment system, citrus growers were soon attracted by the success of these co-operative movements. Delegated meetings were held to organize all citrus growers of Southern California, all of which he attended. Mr. Dreher acted as secretary of the first meeting (for organization) held in Los Angeles, and was one of the committee of five who drafted the plan and basis upon which the Southern California Fruit Exchanges were organized. In all the councils of organization he bore an active part, and (excepting T. H. B.
