

~~REFERENCE DEPARTMENT~~ CALIFORNIANA

BOOK NO.

ACCESSION

979.455 T495s

298379

NOT TO BE TAKEN FROM THE LIBRARY

FORM 3427--5M--12-39

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2011 with funding from California State Library Califa/LSTA Grant

HISTORY OF SAN JOAQUIN COUNTY

CALIFORNIA

WITH

Biographical Sketches

OF

The Leading Men and Women of the County Who Have Been Identified with Its Growth and Development from the Early Days to the Present

HISTORY BY GEORGE H. TINKHAM

ILLUSTRATED
COMPLETE IN ONE VOLUME

HISTORIC RECORD COMPANY
LOS ANGELES, CALIFORNIA
1923

* 979.455
T495 e
298379

CONTENTS

CHAPTER I

SAN JOAQUIN COUNTY THE GATEWAY OF THE VALLEY.....	33
The Valley Gateway—The Inland Sea—Nature, the Soil Builder—The Work Complete—The Spring Floods—The Tule Land—Fish Aplenty—The Underground Springs—A Climate Unsurpassed—Varieties of Soil.

CHAPTER II

THE FIRST LANDOWNERS.....	38
Indians Everywhere Found—Name and Location of Tribes—Their Food Supply—Indians versus Bears — Physical Appearance — Indian Wikiups — Their Clothing — Courtship and Marriage—Woman's Degraded Position—Childbirth—Form of Government—Famous Chiefs—Estanislao, the Warrior Chief—His Fight with Soldiers—He Defeats General Vallejo—Jose Jesus, the White Man's Friend—The Indian's Religion—The Sweat House—The Ravages of Disease—A Night of Mourning—Disposal of Their Dead—A Sorrowing People—Calaveras River, How Named—An Extinct Race—A Brutal Law—The Barr Collection.

CHAPTER III

THE DAWN OF CIVILIZATION.....	46
Moraga Discovers the San Joaquin Valley—Hunters and Trappers—The Trail of John C. Fremont—First Family in San Joaquin—Captain Charles M. Weber—El Campo de los Franceses—Weber's Treaty with the Indians—Indians Kill James Lindsay—The Murder Avenged—Gulnac Sells His Half of Grant—Weber Again Tries to Locate Settlers—Tuleberg's First Inhabitants—Indian Raids.

CHAPTER IV

THE DISCOVERY OF GOLD.....	52
Marshall Discovers Gold—Great Excitement at Tuleberg—The Stockton Mining Company—Stockton's First Mercantile Store—The First Murder—The First Merchants—Christmas and July 4th—The Great Fire on Christmas, 1849—Stockton a Lively Burg—The Rush of '49—The Population of State, County and City.

CHAPTER V

COUNTY ORGANIZATION AND LAND GRANTS	57
The Mexican War—The Rush to California—First Constitutional Convention—Fight to Seat Delegates—San Joaquin County Elects Senators—The Van Buren-Fair Contest—Resignation of Assemblyman—Boundary of County—Origin of Name San Joaquin—The County Land Grants—Settlers Fight with Southern Pacific—First County Election—Citizens Oppose Taxation—The People Score the Court—Creation of Townships—Staten Island—Efforts to Divide County—The Scheme a Failure—Court House Square and Title—The Court House and City Hall—The Old Time Dirt Roads—Beginning of Good Highways—The Father of Good Roads—The Educational Campaign—The Result.

CHAPTER VI

BUSINESS DAYS AND BUSINESS WAYS.....	74
The Rush to California—Mountain and Valley Population—The Magic City—Stockton's Business Center—Benjamin F. Cheatham—Importation and Exportation of Merchandise—Food Prices—Business Losses—Foreign Miners' Tax—Ships Block the Harbor—The Brig Adelaide—Great Fires in History—The Era of Frame Buildings—Fire of July 30, 1855—Fire of February, 1855—Fire Limit Ordinance—The Spectacular Fire of 1864—A Block of Fire Traps—A Horrible Death—Destruction of City Property—Building Progress—The First Up-to-Date Buildings—Merchants and Their Locations in 1864.

CONTENTS

CHAPTER VII

COMMERCIAL EVENTS UP TO 1869.....	85
South Stockton—The Pioneer Steamer—Criminal Neglect of Life—Explosion of Steamer Stockton—The American Eagle on Fire—The Mosquito Fleet—Excitement Over Steamboat Competition—Merchants' Steamboat Company—The Project a Failure—Merchants' Social Customs—State Telegraph Established—Stockton Boys Learn Telegraphy—An Enthusiastic Editor—Atlantic Cable Celebration—Advertisements and Boycotting—Early Auctioneers—A Wild Horse Sale—The Drayman on Duty.

CHAPTER VIII

EARLY DAY TRANSPORTATION.....	93
The Pioneer Ferryman—First River Ferry Boat—Heath & Emory Ferry—The Benson Ferry Tragedy—Woods Ferry—The Fighting Ferryman—The Staples Ferry—Bridges of County—Stockton the Mining Depot—The Mule of Commerce—A Pack Mule Train—First Freighting Business—The Mogul Teamsters—The Commission Merchants—China John—Prairie Schooners—Hauling Big Loads—Expert Mule Drivers—The Bell Mule Team—Heavy Freight Shipments—Miners Short of Food—The Road Stations—The Camping Ground—Highwaymen Hold Up Stages—Decrease of Mining Population—The Copper Excitement—Teamsters' Association—Marrying the Mountain Maids—Staging to the Mines—Fisher Brothers' Stage Line—The Live Yankee Stage Man—The Coaches and Routes—Overland Mail Line.

CHAPTER IX

JUSTICE COURTS—SQUATTERS—MOB LAW.....	105
Respect for Law—A Riot of Crime—Courts and Law—David S. Terry's First Duel—The Stocktons Alcaldes—Tragic Death of Alcalde Belt—Punishment for Crime—The Chain Gang—A Fake Shakespearean Actor—Judge Reynolds Holds Court in Saloon—The Prison Brig Susanna—Heavy Jail Expenses—Market Street Jail—Imperfect Land Titles—The First Squatters—A Rough-handed Proceeding—The Battle of Waterloo—The Comstock Affair—A Mob Law Court—Russell, the Sydney Duck—The Vigilance Committee.

CHAPTER XI

THE MAYOR AND THE COMMON COUNCIL.....	115
Necessity of Law—The Unfortunate Town Council—Preliminary City Government Meeting—Report on City Government—Judge Williams Orders an Election—A Nonpartisan Ticket—First City Election—Samuel Purdy and David S. Terry—The First City Survey—Laying Off a Big City—Naming the Streets—The Flood of 1852—Reception to Peter Rothenbush—The Bridgers and Diggers—Mayor Kenney's Administration—Assassination of William A. Brown—Disposal of the Dead—The City Burial Place—J. M. Buffington's Administration—The City Rents Property—Victory of the American Party—A Banker for Mayor—Deserting the Democratic Party—Mayor Bours' Farewell Message.

CHAPTER XI

THE VOLUNTEER FIRE DEPARTMENT.....	126
The Fire Heroes—Social and Civic Leaders—Preliminary Organization of the Department—The First Hook and Ladder Truck—The Weber Bucket Company—Organization of Weber Engine Company—City Buys Fire Engine—Protection No. 1 Organized—Reorganization of Weber Company—The New Yorkers Secede—The Eureka's Housewarming—The Button & Smith Engine—San Joaquin No. 3—The Firemen's Favorite Daughter—Presentation of Diamond Pin—A Gift of Banners—Howard Engine Company Visits Stockton—Eureka's Make a Return Visit—Patriotic Firemen—The Weber's Flag Pole—First Steam Fire Engine—Dedication of Engine House—The Horse-Drawn Steamer—The City Fire Wells—"Old Betsey"—Members of Weber Engine Company—The Young Fire Volunteers—Water Playing Contests—Eureka Members—Marshall Hook and Ladder—Members of Protection No. 1—The Eureka Serenaders—The Double-Deck Engines—The Eureka Association—Eureka Steam Fire Engine—"The Day We Celebrate"—Decoration of Graves—The Fire Bell—The Babcock Chemical Engine—San Francisco Exempts Visit Stockton—Stockton Exempts—Bad Morale of Fire Department—The Paid Department in Politics—The Splendid Department of Today.

CONTENTS

CHAPTER XII

TEN YEARS OF DEMOCRACY..... 142

California a Free State—The Congressional Fight—The Slavery Question—First County Convention—Ben F. Moore, Lawyer and Fighter—Purdy Whips an Editor—Party Hatred—Sheriff Nominees and Election—Democratic Convention of 1853—Campaign Speakers at Stockton—The Bigler Campaign—George Kerr, State Printer—The American or Know-Nothing Party—The Campaign of 1855—Terry Deserts His Party—The Know-Nothing Victory—Henry A. Crabb—His Tragic Death—Judge Weir, the Filibuster—Crabb's Fugitive Slave Law—The Sale of a Slave—David S. Terry Stabs Hopkins—The Democratic Rallying Song—United Whigs and Democrats—The Republican State Organization—Republican County Organization—First Republican County Ticket—Democrats Again Win—An Exciting Campaign—The United Democracy—Terry's Abusive Speech—The Republican Convention—Reception to Latham—The Death of Broderick—The Farcical Murder Trial of Terry.

CHAPTER XIII

THE FOREIGN POPULATION..... 154

America the Melting Pot—Stockton's Foreign Population—The Mexican People—The Mexican Home—Occupation of the Men—Expert Horsemen and Thieves—Joaquin Murietta—Organization of Outlaws—The Capture and Death of Murietta—The Fandango or Spanish Dance—The Cascarone Ball—Hanging of Judas—The Flour Battle—Rooster Pulling—Jewish Occupations and Characteristics—Building a Synagogue—A Hebrew Marriage—The Jewish Place of Burial—The Oppenheimer Duel—The Jewish Reform Movement—Dedication of the Temple—Arrival of Chinese—An Outrageous Affair—Burning of Chinatown—Persecution of Chinese—A Tong War—The Joss House—A Chinese Funeral—The Chinese New Year.

CHAPTER XIV

THE PROGRESS OF CHRISTIANITY..... 164

The First Sermon Preached in Stockton—Arrival of Protestant Pastors—A Noisy Church Service—Whisky Barrels for Seats—Organization of the Church—Captain Weber Donates a Lot—Dedication of Church—A Strenuous Life—A Handsome Brick Church—The Presbyterian Choir—East Side Presbyterian Church—Grace Methodist Episcopal Church—Christian Church or Disciples of Christ—The Church Choir—The Congregationalists—Celebration of Forefathers Day—First Baptist Church—Elder Knapp—A Baptist Church Secession—The Episcopalians—St. Mary's Catholic Church—San Joaquin Cemetery—Memorial to Father O'Connor—Central Methodist Church—People's Temple—German Churches—Colored Congregations—Unitarian Society—The Christian Science Church—The Hindu Temple.

CHAPTER XV

SAVED TO THE UNION..... 178

Slavery and State's Rights—Secession Threats—Birth of the Republican Party—New Year's Day, 1860—City Election of 1860—The Fourth of July, 1860—State and National Democratic Conventions—Abraham Lincoln for President—Local Campaign of 1860—Election of 1860—Talk of a Pacific Republic—Bear and Secession Flags—Washington's Birthday—Secession News from the South—War News and City Election—The Famous Woodbridge Meeting—Republican County Convention—The Fourth of July, 1861—The Secessionist Pastor—State Democratic Convention—Budd-Underhill Debate—Exciting Meetings at Woodbridge and Liberty—Tyler's Assault on Budd—Republican Campaign Eve of Election—Union Men Rejoice—County Convention—Hook's Sensational Speech—Union Clubs Formed—News of Gettysburg and Vicksburg—Campaign of 1863—Fall of Atlanta—State Campaign of 1864—Loyal Business Men—Close of the War—Assassination of Lincoln.

CHAPTER XVI

HOTELS OF OTHER DAYS..... 192

Baltimore House—Eagle Hotel—Dickenson House—Stockton House—The Magnolia—New York Hotel—Crescent City Hotel—Golden Lion Hotel—The Gault House—United States Hotel—Stockton Bakery Hotel—The Cottage Home—The Weber House—The Yosemite House—Hotel Stockton and Hotel Clark.

CONTENTS

CHAPTER XVII

NEWSPAPERS OF YESTERDAY AND TODAY*..... 197

Stockton Record—Fight with Judge Reynolds—Stockton Journal—Tabor's First Encounter—San Joaquin Republican—Death of Mansfield—Secession of The Republican—Stockton Argus—Biven-Dorsey Duel—A. C. Russell's Duels—Daily Herald—Minor Newspaper Publications—Stockton Independent—Its Editorial Writers—Stockton Evening Mail—Ladies Public Special Edition—Commercial Record—Stockton Daily Record—Boycott of the Record—The Mail's Graveyard.

CHAPTER XVIII

THE MILITIA AND THE PATRIOT..... 206

The First Two Military Companies—First Fourth of July Celebration—Death of Henry Clay—Stockton Blues—Union Guard—Drilling the Company—Colonel E. D. Baker—The Guards Volunteer—Captain Weber, the Patriot—Third Regiment Call's Volunteers—Off for Service—Washington's Birthday—A Patriotic July Fourth—The Fighting Men of San Joaquin—Money Given Freely—Sanitary Commission Fair—The Stockton Dragoons—Vicksburg and Gettysburg Celebration—Stockton's Light Artillery Company—Stockton Guards—Resignation of Captain Lyons—Guards Attend Inauguration of Governor Perkins—Stockton Rifle Cadets—Emmet Guard—St. Aloysius Cadets—Moquelemos Grant War—Centennial Celebration, 1876—Visit of President Grant—War with Spain—President McKinley's Visit—His Memorial Service—Torpedo Boats Visit Stockton—The Liberty Bell—The World War—Welcome Home.

CHAPTER XIX

HISTORY AND PROGRESS OF EDUCATION..... 224

Hazelton Public School—Private Schools—Secretarian Schools—Stockton Female Seminary—Van Doren's Seminary—Dr. Hunt's Seminary—St. Agnes Academy and Catholic Schools—State Public School Law—Organization of Public Schools—Stockton's First Public School Building—School Discipline—Examinations—Rewards of Merit—Funeral of Schoolmates—First School Piano—Holidays—May Day Celebrations—Patriotic Days—The Colored School—Abolishment of Color Line—Music in the Schools—Death of William A. Houghton—Public School Buildings—First High School Building—Annexation of School Districts—Early Progress Difficult—A. H. Randall—A New Era—Stockton High School—Selling a Gold Brick—Rally for School Bonds.

CHAPTER XX

THE BUILDING OF RAILROADS..... 244

First Railroad Convention—Congress Takes Action—Stanford Appears Before Council—Wrangle Over Right-of-Way—The Last Spike—The Great Celebration—Stockton's First Passenger Train—Overland to New York—Western Pacific Railroad—Special Election—Stockton & Copperopolis Railroad—Bonds Defeated—Another Route Found—Council Refusds to Take Action—No Liquor to Be Sold—Merged With Central Pacific—San Joaquin Valley Railroad—Stanford's Proposition—Stockton & Visalia Railroad—Annexation Scheme—Road Sold to California Pacific—Stockton & Tulare Railroad—Tesla Coal Road—Spreckels Road—Santa Fe Railroad—Western Pacific.

CHAPTER XXI

SECRET AND BENEVOLENT ORGANIZATIONS 257

First Masonic Lodge—San Joaquin Lodge—Morning Star Lodge—Delta Lodge—Stockton Lodge—York and Scottish Rite Bodies—Eastern Star—Homo Chapter—Golden Poppy Chapter—Masonic Events—Masonic Halls—Odd Fellows—Charity Lodge—Stockton Lodge—Truth Lodge—Rebekah Degree—Lebanon Degree Lodge—Rainbow Lodge—Odd Fellows Celebrations—Canton Ridgely—Decoration of Chivalry—Odd Fellows Hall—Grand Lodge Meets at Stockton—Odd Fellows Building—The Traveler—Visit of Grand Sire—Odd Fellows Cemetery—Independent Order of Red Men—Montezuma Tribe—Iroquois Tribe—Degree of Pocahontas—Knights of Pythias—State Conclave—Pioneer Society—Grand Army of the Republic—Story of Gridley and His Sack of Flour—Dedication of Gridley Monument—Woman's Relief Corps—Native Sons of the Golden West—Native Daughters of the Golden West.

CONTENTS

CHAPTER XXII

COURTS AND CRIMINALS..... 275
Mexican Courts—California Courts—Hanging of Mickey Lyons—Execution of Jose Barillo—Tom Bell, the Highwayman—Joseph Esses Murdered—A Tragedy at Medina's—J. P. D. Wilkins Murdered—Swaney Poisoning Case—Executed for Stealing Horses—Wm. McHale Murdered by Jacob Elyea—William Crawford Kills John B. Lewis—Ford-Cresson Murder—Double Hanging—Black Bart.

CHAPTER XXIII

POST AND RAILROAD TOWNS..... 285
French Camp—Ripon—The Ripon-Finch Murder—Manteca—Lathrop—The Murder of David S. Terry—Farmington—Clements—Lockeford—Collegeville—Thornton—Navigation of the Mokelumne River—First Steamer to Lockeford—Woodbridge—Woodbridge Academy—Mokelumne City—Linden—Escalon—Ellis—Tracy. —Linden—Escalon—Ellis—Tracy.

CHAPTER XXIV

LODI, THE TOKAY CITY..... 304
Pioneer Building—Big Fire of 1887—Lodi Hall Association—Lodi Lodge, I. O. O. F.—Flora Rebekah Lodge—Knights of Pythias—Chosen Friends—July Fourth, 1885—Hartford Post, G. A. R.—Moquelemos Grant Celebration—Salem District School—Emerson School—Union High School—Methodist Episcopal Church—Burning of the Church—Congregational Church—The Episcopals—Incorporation of Lodi—First City Officers—Water Works and City Hall—Lodi Fire Department—First Board of Trade—Lodi Press—Post Office—Lodi's Progressive Banks—Tokay Carnival—Lodi Prohibition Movement—Women's Improvement Club—Woman's Club House—Carnegie Library—The Heroic Dead—Armistice Celebration—Welcome Home.

CHAPTER XXV

AGRICULTURE — HORTICULTURE — MANUFACTURES 317
Land Acreage and Price—Fencing the Land—Plowing the Fields—Harvesting the Crop—Wheat Transportation and Prices—A Few Figures—Farming Machinery Inventions—From Reaper to Combined Harvester—The Grange Movement—The Delta or Peat Lands—Beginning of Reclamation—Shiftless Farmers and Thrifty Farmers—Horticulture—Orchards, Vineyards, Gardens—Stockton a Manufacturing City—Manufacturers of Food Products—Blacksmiths and Wagon-makers—Tanneries and Leather Workers—Paper Mill Products—Woolen Mill—Stockton Iron Works—Shipbuilding—Agricultural Machinery—National Carton Works—Cigar Manufacture.

CHAPTER XXVI

MOSAICS OF HISTORY..... 329

INDEX.

A
Abersold, Charles	1566
Abersold, Christian C.....	1519
Abshire, John L.....	1520
Adams, Christopher N.....	1108
Adams, Guy	1119
Adams, Joseph N.....	1343
Adams, William Henry.....	1216
Agien, Mrs. Mary Thoman...	1184
Albert, Gustav	771
Albright, Christ	556
Alders, Edward	1183
Alegretti, Gaetano	1477
Alegretti, John	877
Alegretti, Joseph	1477
Alexander Bros.....	1440
Allen, Anderson	1191
Allen, Dolphus W.....	1196
Allen, Fred C.....	1520
Allen, James A.....	727
Allen, James Leonard.....	1566
Allen, Robert H.....	1196
Allen, William C.....	1566
Altenhoff, Gustav H.....	1347
Anderson, A. E.....	1211
Anderson, Carl F.....	1506
Anderson, Charles Profit	861
Anderson, James A.....	1116
Anderson, John	543
Anderson, Rev. Paul A.....	1351
Anderson, William H.....	523
Angerina, John	1567
Angier, Melbourne E.....	755
Antonini, Virgil	1567
Arbios, Peter	1368
Archer, Alfred W.....	1268
Archer, Ellsworth	1116
Arlington Cafeteria	1568
Armbrust, Henry J.....	1052
Arndt, Michael S.....	596
Arrabit, John B.....	1410
Arthur, Samuel R.....	657
Asher, J. N.....	1212
Athearn, Frank F.....	1215
Atherton, Judge Warren H....	1271
Austin, James H.....	1192
B
Bacigalupi, Louis	1360
Bacon, Charles A.....	644
Bacon, Ellen Vincent.....	644
Bacon, Eugene C.....	644
Baerwald, Fred.....	1568
Bailey, Charles Kimball.....	958
Bailey, Edward Franklin.....	1319
Bailey, Harry T.....	1115
Bainbridge, Barry M.....	1324
Bainbridge, Edwin Darwin... 1099
Bainbridge, Dr. James A.....	1099
Baldwin, John	900
Baldwin, John Kirk.....	1292
Ballantyne, John N.....	1108
Bancroft, George Mason.....	1528
Banta, Bert Bethford.....	883
Barber, Edward H.....	1529
Barber, George L.....	1567
Barbour, Nathan R., M. D... 527
Bardill, Ulrich	1569
Bardin, Hazard Zollie.....	964
Bare, John V.....	1275
Barkis, Henry Bruce.....	916
Barnes, Albert L.....	1355
Barnett, Francis Marion.....	618
Barnhart, W. O.....	1112
Barnicol, William F.....	1271
Barr, James A.....	460
Barron, Ira Clark.....	617
Barron, Jack	1276
Barton, Mrs. Clara A.....	1111
Barzellotti, Louis F.....	1276
Bates, Mrs. Wakeley J.....	1307
Batterman, Christoph M.....	528
Battilana, Guisepppe	727
Battilana, Marcells G.....	1432
Baumbach, Conrad O.....	1248
Baumbach, David	1224
Baumbach, K. G.....	1521
Bava, Mrs. Florinda.....	1324
Bawden, Mrs. Susan A.....	760
Baxter, Thomas F.....	727
Beane, Samuel C.....	1264
Beauchamp, J. O.....	915
Bechthold, Abraham	1624
Bechthold, Henry	1119
Bechthold, John	1115
Bechtold, Charles O.....	1308
Beckman, Frank W.....	654
Beckman, Henry Christopher. 1327
Beckman, Theodore H.....	508
Beckwith, Aaron Russell.....	1119
Beecher, Austin Howard.....	1521
Beidleman, Walter W.....	1347
Belluomini, Augusto	1327
Bender, Charles J.....	900
Bender, Eugene G.....	1569
Bender, John A.....	1521
Bender, Theodore C.....	1522
Benedict, Bert A.....	1478
Benedict, Gordon L.....	1565
Bennett, John Lyman	1569
Bernadicou, John L.....	1570
Bertch, George	823
Bessac, Harry W.....	495
Bianchi, Joseph	1328
Bigger, James M.....	511
Biggs, Donald M.....	1416
Billigmeier, Otto	1244
Binger, Henry D.....	908
Bird, Charles G.....	1104
Bird, Dan W.....	751
Bittner, Samuel	1211
Black, Charles A.....	1020
Blair, James W.....	1570
Blanchard, Eli J.....	1271
Blanchard, Mrs. Lillian E....	1331
Blewett, Stephen N.....	1570
Blodgett, John M., D. D. S... 698
Blohm, Hermann	1571
Blohme, Henry	407
Board, Arthur L.....	1571
Boden, Wesley Palmer.....	1135
Boehmer, Arthur C., M. D.... 705
Boggs, Hon. Frank S.....	403
Bolliger, Mrs. Sophia.....	1296
Bona, Andrew J.....	1107
Bonnet, Joseph William.....	1331
Bonney, Richard W.....	677
Bordenave, Lucien	1479
Bottini, Harry	1272
Bowers, Anthony V.....	1443
Bowman, Albert C.....	1479
Bowman, James F.....	1571
Boyce, John	728
Boyce, Robert	678
Boyd, Albert	1522
Brack, Henry	720
Brack, Jacob	381
Braddock, Mrs. Mary Downing 464
Braida, Emil	1572
Brandt, Louis Rudolph.....	734
Braas, John C.....	1355
Bregante, Domencino	1304
Breitenbucher, Frank	1523
Brennan, John J.....	1506
Brennan, Patrick	1451
Brennan, Stephen E.....	1308
Brennan, Mrs. W. L.....	1482
Briare, Frank B.....	689
Brichetto, John	1279
Brichetto, Joseph C.....	1355
Bridge, R. C.....	1355
Bronich, Louis	1579
Broun, Mrs. Johanna.....	500
Brown, Frank G.....	799
Brown, George W.....	877
Brown, Mrs. Jennie H.....	1455
Brown, Miles Joshua.....	1356
Browne, Thomas Robert.....	622
Buchanan, Walter Scott.....	1452
Buck, C. Herbert.....	1323

- | | | | | | |
|-------------------------------|------|--------------------------------|------|--------------------------------|------|
| Buck, Charles H..... | 1107 | Changala, Domingo | 1436 | Couper, Hobart J..... | 748 |
| Budd, Henry B..... | 575 | Chapelain, John A..... | 1624 | Courtright, George | 1532 |
| Budd, Hon. James Herbert... | 579 | Chapman, Herbert S., M. D... | 1420 | Covell, Elbert Allen..... | 1583 |
| Budd, John E..... | 1311 | Chappuis, Louis J..... | 1577 | Cowell, Adelbert M..... | 920 |
| Budd, Hon. Joseph H..... | 580 | Charles, Robert John..... | 1359 | Cowell, Alfred L..... | 391 |
| Buell, Mrs. Ada Moore..... | 1283 | Charlesworth, John | 1048 | Cowell, Arthur W..... | 1069 |
| Buell, P. A..... | 1283 | Chicard, Louis Eugene..... | 472 | Cowell, F. M..... | 740 |
| Bunch, John | 839 | Chirhart, Joseph M..... | 1395 | Cowell, Joshua | 504 |
| Burge, Delavan M..... | 671 | Chrisman, John | 448 | Cowen, Jay P..... | 1582 |
| Burge, Simeon S..... | 671 | Chrisman, John C..... | 1367 | Cox, Henry Murlin..... | 1456 |
| Burgess, Dwight E..... | 1351 | Christesen, Fernando | 1523 | Craig, Judson L..... | 1388 |
| Burgess, Mrs. Sarah Emma... | 862 | Christy, George J..... | 1523 | Crary, Archibald West, M. D. | 647 |
| Burgess, Wilford H..... | 1423 | Church, Milo Miletus..... | 1103 | Craviotto, John Vincent, M. D. | 1279 |
| Burk, Henry | 1568 | Clancy, Cecil B..... | 1103 | Crawford, John..... | 1076 |
| Burleigh, Fred D..... | 940 | Clancy, Ellmore S..... | 1099 | Creighton, Charles L..... | 1374 |
| Burlington, Earl Edward..... | 1451 | Clancy, Hull J..... | 1096 | Crittenden, Hon. Bradford S.. | 803 |
| Burns, Dennis | 351 | Clancy, John H..... | 747 | Crose, Joseph D..... | 1439 |
| Burns, James | 984 | Clark, Asa, M. D..... | 486 | Croswhite, William Harvey... | 1532 |
| Burrow, Lee R..... | 1452 | Clark, Asa Mountjoy..... | 647 | Cundell, Joseph P..... | 1581 |
| Busch, Carl C..... | 1455 | Clark, Cornelius | 1565 | Cunningham, Thomas | 385 |
| Buschke, Adolph G..... | 839 | Clark, Harvey Smith..... | 912 | Currey, Capt. John T..... | 1016 |
| Buschke, Gustav August D... | 1352 | Clark, W. Sam..... | 872 | Curtis, Bradner | 381 |
| Buttrick, Frederick W..... | 697 | Clarke, Fisher R., M. D..... | 408 | Curtis, Fornia S..... | 367 |
| Butts, Howard L..... | 1507 | Clements, George R..... | 1107 | Cusick, Maxwell H..... | 1550 |
| Buzzell, Willard J..... | 907 | Clements, Mrs. Jennie (Sprott) | 1500 | Custer, Altha C..... | 685 |
| Byrnes, Maurice Joseph..... | 1640 | Clow, John R..... | 1501 | Cutting, Lewis M..... | 485 |
| C | | Clowes, Mrs. Charlotte Bab- | | Cutts, Oliver C..... | 1550 |
| Cady, Elmer E..... | 1572 | son Wheeler | 943 | | |
| Caletini, Louis | 1482 | Coale, Harwell Woodrow.... | 776 | D | |
| California Plating Works..... | 1585 | Coates, James Y..... | 438 | Dangers, August | 576 |
| Callaghan, Edward Francis... | 1104 | Coates, Stephen B..... | 556 | Dangers, Carl | 580 |
| Calori, Peter | 1396 | Cobb, Frank Dyckman..... | 367 | Daniels, Fred E..... | 1332 |
| Camozzi, Pietro Pasquale.... | 1586 | Cody, Charles | 747 | Daniels, Wesley | 1283 |
| Campbell Auto Works..... | 1432 | Coffelt, Charles W..... | 1548 | Darak, Alex T..... | 1513 |
| Campbell, Charles F..... | 452 | Coffman, C. W..... | 1484 | Darter, Robert L..... | 1287 |
| Campbell, Ernest P..... | 1432 | Colberg, William C..... | 733 | Davidson, Charles H..... | 815 |
| Campbell, George Wentworth | 527 | Coley, James W..... | 924 | Davidson, Isaac P..... | 1431 |
| Campbell, Thomas Eugene... | 772 | Coley, John A..... | 658 | Davidson, Morris | 1363 |
| Campbell, William | 537 | Collins, Frank E..... | 1279 | Davis Bros. | 1459 |
| Campion, Howard A..... | 1585 | Condit, Clyde E..... | 1435 | Davis-Heller-Pearce Co..... | 1431 |
| Campodonico, John J..... | 1207 | Condon, Joseph Douglas..... | 1387 | Davis, Jason Hamilton..... | 1424 |
| Campodonico, John J., Sr.... | 1215 | Condy, Alva B..... | 1502 | Dean, George A..... | 739 |
| Campodonico, Joseph M..... | 1167 | Condy, James A..... | 1387 | Deaton, Jackson B..... | 1428 |
| Canessa, Giobatta B..... | 1484 | Conklin, Chester W..... | 1428 | De Carli, Charles..... | 1547 |
| Cannon, Grat E..... | 1268 | Conklin, Fred L..... | 1070 | De Ferrari, Louis | 1582 |
| Capurro, Emanuel | 1508 | Conklin, James E..... | 1070 | Degener, August Fred..... | 1532 |
| Capurro, Frank R..... | 1500 | Conner, James | 544 | Delmege, Charles G..... | 1582 |
| Carigiet, Adolph | 1360 | Cook, William F..... | 800 | Delmege, Louie J..... | 1583 |
| Carleton, Mrs. Fannie V..... | 795 | Cooney, Edward M..... | 1474 | Delucchi, Eugene William.... | 1431 |
| Carlson, Charles M..... | 791 | Cooper, Charles F..... | 1456 | Delucchi, Joseph | 1392 |
| Carr, Mrs. Nannie Haller.... | 816 | Cooper, J. Oliver..... | 1459 | Delucchi, Louis | 1485 |
| Carroll, Edward B..... | 911 | Cooper, Mrs. Marie Ott..... | 856 | Denehy, Judge D. M..... | 831 |
| Carroll, James L..... | 1111 | Copello, Nick | 1283 | De Antoni, Peter H..... | 1288 |
| Carroll, James P..... | 812 | Corell, Harvey J..... | 1501 | Devine, E. W..... | 1586 |
| Cary, Edwin Hamilton..... | 1203 | Corell, William | 723 | DeVinny, R. Harold..... | 1363 |
| Cassidy, Bernard | 1172 | Cornwell, Frank L..... | 1367 | Dewey, James C..... | 547 |
| Catts, George E..... | 552 | Corson, Joseph M..... | 723 | Dias, Manuel R..... | 1368 |
| Causey, Loren H..... | 1379 | Cory, John B..... | 682 | Dick, James Wilmer..... | 1128 |
| Celayeta, Saturnino | 1135 | Cory, John Randolph..... | 524 | Dickenson, George L..... | 712 |
| Chain, O. H..... | 1280 | Costa, Angelo | 1359 | Dickinson, Clarence L..... | 1291 |
| | | Costello, James Francis..... | 815 | Dietrich, F. Joseph..... | 617 |

INDEX

iii

Dietz, George H.....	1291	Fagan, Dillard S.....	1227	Franklin, William Thomas...	932
Dietz, Otto	1586	Fagg, John H.....	1295	Fraser, Philip Barry.....	995
Doan, Charles Edward.....	1391	Fairbank, Herbert A.....	843	Frederick, Charles	1335
Doan, Roland E.....	1513	Fake, George J.....	831	Frederick, John	947
Dockendorff, John W.....	734	Fake, Mrs. Lena S.....	831	Frederick, John W.....	947
Dodge, Jonathan Holt.....	476	Fallman, Frank A.....	430	Frederick, Mrs. Martha Alice	1414
Dohrmann, George W.....	412	Fanning, D. W.....	584	Frederick, Mrs. Susan J.....	559
Donelon, Patrick	1460	Fanning, Harry T.....	867	Fredrickson, Charles	1592
Doneux, Jules	1123	Fanning, Howard Malcolm...	903	Freeman, Charles A.....	823
Donovan, Thomas F.....	1391	Faretti, Alfonse	1515	Freggiaro, Giacomo	1591
Douglass, Judge E. E.....	1364	Farrell, Margaret	848	Freggiaro, Louis Andrew.....	1315
Douville, Louis N.....	424	Farschon, John W.....	1535	Freitox, Joseph E.....	1633
Doyle, Patrick	1587	Faust, William H.....	1272	French, George Monroe.....	605
Drace, James	844	Fee, Harry T.....	1272	French, Henry Sidney.....	1574
Drais, Edward M.....	935	Feeley, John A.....	1123	Frerichs, George Louis	1409
Drais, H. H.....	1148	Fenley, Charles P.....	1572	Frerichs, Henry A.....	947
Drais, Madison J.....	796	Ferguson, Eli Stewart.....	1409	Frewert, Capt. Carl Conrad...	1075
Droge, John C.....	811	Ferguson, George S.....	1443	Frioux, George E.....	868
Dubois, Luther J.....	733	Ferguson, John	1295	Fuller, Horace S.....	1633
Duff, William R.....	1315	Ferguson, William	622	Fuller Lumber Co.....	1633
Dunne, Edward	697	Fergusson, William E.....	681	Funk, John E.....	784
Duplisea, John A.....	1463	Fessier, Eugene N.....	1292	Funk, Paul C.....	1312
Dustin, Charles R.....	1120	Filippini, Peter	1573
Dutcher, Fred	1463	Fimbel, Emil	1284	G
Dutton, John C.....	471	Finck, Harry Carson.....	835	Gaedtke, Julius J.....	716
Du Vall, Bruce R.....	1464	Finck, Henry	1413	Gaia, Caesar	1219
Dwelly, Nelson S.....	1373	Fine, Elisha Holt.....	638	Galassi, O. J.....	1460
		Fink, C. H.....	1573	Galgani, Chester	1634
E		Finkbohner, Mrs. Agnes S...	355	Gall, Joe	701
Eaton, Monroe D.....	1485	Finkbohner, David	1533	Gall, John D.....	705
Eaton, Orison	1367	Firpo, Louis M.....	1554	Gallego, Frank	1410
Eccleston, Oliver H.....	690	Fischer, Henry A.....	1533	Gambetta, John J.....	1555
Eccleston, Ransom	430	Fisher, Bert A.....	792	Gamble, Edward L.....	1597
Echandi, Rufino	1514	Fisher, Redwood W.....	452	Gann, Mrs. Susan M.....	1160
Eckstrom, Oscar W.....	658	Fisher, Thomas E.....	1268	Gardner, Dr. John M.....	1183
Edwards, Lawrence	1396	Fisher, William R.....	452	Garibaldi Bros.	748
Edwards, William M.....	1587	Fitzgerald, Andrew A.....	1063	Garibotti, George B.....	1284
Eggers, Mrs. Lena	815	Fitz Gerald, W. E.....	719	Garlick, Frederick C.....	1320
Eichenberger, Julius	1514	Fitzgerald, William W., M. D.	460	Garner, Charles C.....	739
Eicke, Judge Dana P.....	1275	Floyd, Walter A.....	1064	Garner, Floyd E.....	871
Ekenberg, C. C.....	1514	Focacci, John	1533	Garner, Thomas	847
Ekholm, H. W.....	1468	Focacci, Joseph L.....	1533	Garretson, George R.....	1534
Ellis, George E.....	1316	Focacci, Matthew D.....	1444	Garrison, John W.....	1335
Ellis, Henry F.....	915	Foltz, Edward P.....	1163	Garrison, Major Walter E....	599
Eltringham, John	1075	Foote, Forrest	1336	Garrow, Alexander L.....	1413
Engel, Jacob Peter	1587	Foote, Robert Nelson.....	1332	Garside, Alton	1555
Engellandt, Jacob	1448	Foppiano, Angelo M.....	1595	Garvey, William F.....	719
Englander, Julius E.....	1467	Foppiano, Louis	1596	Gatelli, Fred	1420
Enterprise Planing Mill.....	1588	Foppiano, Victor John.....	1633	Gatzert, Jacob	1598
Ericksen, Andrew G.....	1280	Forbes, C. W.....	1573	Gaul, Alois	648
Escalon Union High School..	1468	Ford, Mrs. Margaret.....	622	Gawne, Charles W.....	1556
Eshbach, Frank	1468	Fore, Claude Elmo.....	1534	Gaylord, George E.....	1597
Eshbach, Henry	653	Fore, Mrs. Eliza Demoretta..	944	Gayou, John E.....	1120
Evans, Thomas	1069	Forsyth, Robert Blackstone...	912	Geffroy, Mrs. Hannah S.....	363
Evans, Thomas C.....	1467	Forty-Nine Drug Co., Inc...	1554	Geffroy, Thomas B.....	363
Ewing, John Worthington D.	1404	Foster, Fred N.....	1070	Gerard, Mrs. Caroline C.....	852
		Fottrell, Elia Francis.....	1335	Gerard, James Steven.....	939
F		Fowler, Joseph Miner.....	467	Gerard, James Steven, Jr....	939
Fabian, Neil B.....	516	Fox, Ernest	1485	Gerard, Raymond L.....	1096
Fabian, Philip	515	Francesconi, Frank	1574	Gerlach, Gustave A.....	904
Faccini, David	614	Franklin, Mrs. Millie L.....	395	Gerlach, John Clemens.....	512

Gerlach, Louis	633
Gianelli, Amerigo E.....	807
Gianelli, Joseph	927
Giannini, Mrs. Candida.....	992
Gibbons, W. E., M. D.....	516
Gibson, Daniel Clifton.....	1474
Gibson, George A.....	1239
Gibson, George H.....	1556
Gieseke, Ernest	811
Gilbeau, Joseph P.....	1176
Gilbert, John D.....	1332
Gill, Thomas Jefferson.....	634
Gillies, Daniel	1204
Giovacchini, Adolph	1599
Giovacchini, Angelo	1598
Giovanetti, Marco	1343
Gleason, Thomas F.....	1100
Gnekow, Edward L.....	1095
Gnekow, Rudolph	563
Goehring, Phillip J.....	1530
Goëtjen, Ahren F.....	1123
Gomes, Andrew	1535
Goodell, Fred E., D. D. S....	1507
Goodman, Harvey A.....	1547
Goodrich, Edwin Chandler...	1524
Goodwin, Benjamin A.....	588
Gordon, Arthur Emmett.....	1529
Gordon, Mrs. Eliza J.....	693
Gordon, Elmer E.....	1475
Gotelli, Giovanni B.....	1599
Gotelli, John B.....	1530
Gould, N. B., M. D.....	1312
Graham, Eugene Douglas....	567
Graham, Eugene Myrle.....	923
Graham, Mrs. J. S.....	1460
Graham, Robert L.....	520
Graham, William Henry.....	1256
Grattan, Morris Henry.....	899
Graves, James Walter.....	433
Graves, John C.....	480
Gray, Albert A.....	988
Gray, Homer Louis.....	1339
Green Electric Company.....	1599
Green, Frank T.....	1600
Green, Henry P.....	719
Green, Robert Franklin.....	694
Gregory, Mansfield F.....	424
Grider, Grover A.....	780
Griffin, Mrs. Ellen.....	1600
Grimsley, L. F.....	1192
Grimsley, Lewis E.....	694
Griswold, Charles Augustine..	1311
Grubb, Daniel H.....	1601
Gruwell, John D.....	681
Gruwell, Robert C.....	693
Guernsey, Frank A.....	996
Guernsey, Fred Aurin.....	744
Guggolz, Charles R.....	1320
Gustavson, Henry	1507
		H
		Haas, Charles	1092
		Haight, Louis M., M. D.....	665
		Haley, Ronald B.....	1299
		Hall, John T.....	1228
		Hall, Joseph E.....	1600
		Hall, L. R.....	1580
		Hammond, Alden	1087
		Hammond, John Culver.....	455
		Hamsher, Francis R.....	1035
		Handel, Emanuel	1602
		Handel, Gottfried	1601
		Handel, Jacob G.....	1260
		Handlin, Michael	1152
		Hanks, William Edson.....	1036
		Hanna, Robert W.....	1548
		Hannaford, Edwin Thomas...	843
		Hannan, John C.....	555
		Hannan, John W.....	407
		Hansel, Walter	1163
		Hansel, Willard	819
		Hansen, August	1531
		Hansen, Peter	803
		Hanson, Gus M.....	1602
		Hara, Joseph	1535
		Harder, Ernest Christopher...	1144
		Harder, Paul William.....	812
		Hardy, Jesse	1508
		Hareison, Edmund	671
		Hareison, John Burgess.....	396
		Harkins, James P.....	677
		Harkins, Capt. John.....	701
		Harney, John S.....	1231
		Harper, George	685
		Harrington, Mrs. Sophia.....	1383
		Harrington, Walter D.....	808
		Harris, Clarence E.....	1580
		Harris, Edward F.....	415
		Harris, Mrs. Emily M.....	1531
		Harrison, Timothy John.....	1581
		Harry, Rees	1235
		Harshner, Andrew M.....	610
		Harshner, Winfield Scott....	610
		Hartman, Joseph	1095
		Hawkins, E. Henry.....	1508
		Hawley, Earle R.....	1287
		Hawley, Richard Augustus...	1612
		Hayes, James J.....	459
		Hearty, Lawrence	605
		Heath, Robert J.....	1479
		Heeney, Richard James.....	1176
		Heil, Peter	1364
		Heil, William	836
		Hemphill, George W.....	1549
		Hemphill, John Lester.....	1549
		Hencmann, Charles E.....	1612
		Henery, George P.....	1235
		Henke, Theodore	1131
		Henning, Abraham Parsons..	672
		Henning, Mrs. John.....	1475
		Herbert, James T.....	832
		Herbert, Stanley D.....	848
		Herrick, Emerson B.....	1087
		Herzog, John W.....	1613
		Hess, Edwin H.....	1267
		Hewitt, Arthur W.....	1028
		Hewitt, M. S.....	665
		Hibbs, Eddie L.....	1232
		Hickok, Asher D.....	1180
		Hickok, Mrs. Celesta Ann....	447
		Hickok, William	447
		Hickox, William J. S.....	1040
		Hieb, John W.....	948
		High, Mr. and Mrs. James Hamline	1004
		Hild, Mark William	1476
		Hild, Mrs. Melinda C.....	1581
		Hildebrand, Stephen D.....	1469
		Hill, Alpheus M.....	1535
		Hill, Joseph H.....	1613
		Hoag, Charles W.....	1560
		Hobron, Mrs. J. Belle.....	1470
		Hodgson, Thomas M.....	743
		Hoff, Fred	1549
		Hogan, Frank E.....	629
		Hogge, George	629
		Holbrook, Charles Daniel....	1091
		Holbrook, William Frank....	1470
		Holdsworth, George	572
		Hollenbeck, Mrs. Amelia E...	1469
		Holm, F. Julius.....	1613
		Holm, K. Peter.....	1560
		Holman Bros.....	855
		Holman, Mrs. Hattie.....	1040
		Holman, John	1614
		Holman, Neal S.....	852
		Holt, Benjamin	339
		Holt, Pliny E.....	634
		Hooper, James J.....	1295
		Hopkins, Silas W., M. D.....	743
		Housken, Frank Oliver.....	887
		Housken, William Christopher	1480
		Hovard, Noah	1164
		Howell, Benjamin F.....	1614
		Howland, Melville R.....	1547
		Hubert, Henry Thomas.....	968
		Huck, Frenz W.....	1132
		Hughes, Clarence Loyd.....	895
		Hughes, George Teagard....	1088
		Humphrey, Anthony Byrd....	824
		Humphrey, Elmer A.....	1235
		Humphreys, John R.....	1560
		Humphreys & Matthews....	1296
		Hunt, Oliver H.....	1288
		Hunter, Anthony	442
		Hunter, Mrs. Eliza J.....	442
		Hunter, Miss Jennie Mateer..	447
		Hunting, Charles W.....	520
		Hunting, Luther	520
		Huntley, Mrs. Hattie E.....	1470
		Hurd, Mrs. Alice Lasell.....	452
		Hurd, Charles E.....	499

INDEX

Huron, William Wilson..... 928
 Hutchins, John 618
 Hutchinson, Frank 1195
 Hymer, James A..... 1603

I

Ingram, Dellivan Cameron ... 1471
 Ireby, Frank F..... 1423
 Ireby, Grover C..... 1602
 Ivey, William E..... 1472
 Ivory, Mrs. Rebecca J..... 587

J

Jack, Mrs. Susan Jane..... 399
 Jacobs, George W..... 1561
 Jacobs, Ray L..... 1536
 Jacobsen, Mrs. Mary Cecelia.. 847
 Jacobson, Jacob 799
 Jahant, Charles Albert..... 1075
 James, Charles A..... 740
 Jeannelle, Ralph C..... 1626
 Jeffrey, Renaldo J..... 1627
 Jensen, Lawrence F..... 1299
 Jesch, Ferdinand 1627
 Joens, Peter 768
 Johnsen, William H..... 724
 Johnson, Adolph 1299
 Johnson, Carl Oscar 1307
 Johnson, Fred H..... 791
 Johnson, James R..... 1471
 Johnston, Albert G..... 1347
 Johnston, James Edward..... 1232
 Jones, Amos 1339
 Jones, Hampton 1627
 Jones, Hiram M..... 638
 Jones, Hugh L..... 1472
 Jones, John Wheeler..... 392
 Jones, William Joseph..... 1628
 Jons, John 1135
 Jory, Charles 763
 Jory, James 467
 Jory, John Edward..... 467
 Joyce, James C..... 1044

K

Kaiser, Henry 600
 Kampschmidt, Samuel L.... 1328
 Kaplan, Harry E., M. D..... 1627
 Keith, William S..... 1629
 Keitle, Gilbert D..... 1419
 Keller, John C..... 1163
 Kelley, James Edward..... 1476
 Kelley, John C..... 1323
 Kelly, Charles E..... 1629
 Kels, Alexander A..... 1628
 Kennison, Joseph C..... 1480
 Kerr, James Garfield..... 1536
 Kile, John M..... 363
 Kincaid, Russell B..... 1474
 Kinney, Henry C..... 1083
 Kirschenmann, Fred T..... 1630

Kirschenmann, John 1630
 Kirschenmann, Theopold 1561
 Klein Bros. 1236
 Klinger, William Henry..... 538
 Klink, Abraham 1537
 Knecht, Theodore 1629
 Knoll, Jacob J..... 1211
 Knollenburg, Peter 438
 Knott, Miss Margaret..... 1630
 Knowles, Mrs. Veda Belle Hull 957
 Knowles, William H..... 952
 Knudsen, Charles 1537
 Knutzen, Thomas F..... 1631
 Kolb, Fred F..... 1631
 Koontz, George Milton..... 1472
 Koontz, William Henry..... 1473
 Kosta, George E..... 1632
 Koster, Nicolaus 820
 Krieger, Isaac G..... 1537
 Kruschke, Herman O..... 1373
 Kuckuk, Frederick 1216
 Kuechler, Henry J..... 768
 Kuesthardt, G. W..... 1473
 Kurtz, Edward 1175
 Kurtz, Jacob 1538

L

Lachenmaier, Lot 1008
 Ladd, George Allen..... 951
 Ladd, George Samuel..... 503
 Ladd, Harry H..... 919
 Ladd, Ira B., M. D..... 832
 Ladd, Ira W..... 643
 Ladd, John S..... 779
 Laggas, John Daniel..... 1562
 Lagorio, Angelo Victor..... 1619
 Lagorio, Domenico 1379
 Lagorio, John A..... 1379
 Lagorio, Vittorio 1464
 Lahaie, Pierre 1619
 Lamb, Hon. Charles..... 368
 Lamb, Warren 891
 Lamb, William W..... 1147
 Lambert, Peter F..... 888
 Lammers, Diederich 916
 Lammers, Martin 430
 Landmann, Phil 1447
 Lane, Thomas 1538
 Lange, Herman Anthony..... 1562
 Langhorst, Fred 1380
 Langridge, George W..... 544
 Laogier, Basilio 400
 Larranaga, Joseph 1575
 Larson, Lawrence M..... 433
 Latta, Edward W..... 1620
 Lattin, Fred A..... 891
 Laudenschach, Henry 1575
 Landenbach, Robert 1575
 Lauxen, Richard 387
 Lawrence, G. E..... 1195
 Lawrence, Lee Grant..... 788

Lawry, George C..... 935
 Lawton, Mrs. Clara B..... 1307
 Layman, John F..... 1023
 Lea, Malcolm 1516
 Leach, Charles I..... 471
 Leal, Joseph 1383
 Lease, Chauncey A..... 1188
 Leetzow, Max 1414
 Le Feber, George 1515
 Leffler, Ernest W..... 479
 Leichter, Mark M..... 1515
 Leistner, George W..... 1427
 Leonardini, G. B..... 1616
 Leonardini, Victor N..... 1420
 Leventon, R. E..... 1617
 Levy, Fred 1614
 Lewis, Bert, Sr..... 1516
 Lewis, Jesse Stewart..... 400
 Lewis, Lyman Moore..... 1374
 Lewis, Mrs. Mary A..... 951
 Lewis, Thomas David..... 1614
 Lima, Manuel J..... 1615
 Lind, Carl T..... 1323
 Lindemann, Henry, Jr..... 1383
 Lindsey, Hiram..... 1136
 Linne, Adolph H..... 892
 Linne, Henry A..... 1384
 Litter, Charles Clay..... 1480
 Littebrant, Hartman 560
 Littebrant, Gen. William
 Thomas 1031
 Littleton, Tillman B..... 630
 Livingston, Robert A..... 1539
 Lloyd, George Washington... 1539
 Locke, Dean Jewett..... 547
 Locke, George H..... 551
 Locke, Nathaniel Howard... 609
 Lockwood, James O..... 1175
 Lodi Academy 1616
 Loffelbein, Emanuel 1615
 Long, Charles M..... 1344
 Lopes, Antone Louis..... 1220
 Lopes, Manuel A..... 1616
 Lord, William 1423
 Lorenz, William H..... 499
 Lorenzen, Theodor 1139
 Louis, Charles H..... 783
 Louttit, James A..... 606
 Louttit, John Randolph..... 1219
 Louttit, Thomas S..... 1084
 Love, Floyd R..... 1617
 Lowe, Frank E..... 1139
 Lubeck, John R..... 1212
 Lucas, George W..... 1220
 Lucas, Leon James..... 840
 Luhrsen, George J..... 883
 Luke, Thomas H..... 1415
 Lund, John William Martin.. 1103
 Lund, Martin J..... 352
 Lund, Nels J..... 420
 Lyman, David B..... 1243

Lynch, Patrick 895
 Lyon, Floyd A. 1617
 Lyons, William H. 779

M

MacGarva, George T. 1540
 Madonna, Paul 1606
 Madsen, Hans 1605
 Maestretti, Walter E. 1481
 Maghetti, Henry A. 836
 Mahaffey, Newton Walter. . . 1519
 Maier, Fred C. 1606
 Mainland, John Grant. 1319
 Maisel, John George. 855
 Mangini, G. Lorence. 1606
 Mann, Herbert Justin. 1239
 Manteca Cream and Butter Co. 1607
 Maple, Larry P. 1199
 Marceau, Seraphin 1540
 Marchand, Fred Leo. 1540
 Markham, George Marion. . . 919
 Marraccini, Giovanni 896
 Marshall, Joseph C. 1008
 Marshall, Oscar. 386
 Marshall, Thomas 386
 Martin, Harry 1419
 Martin, Irving 563
 Martin, Samuel L. 904
 Mason Hospital of Lodi. 1541
 Matteoni, Frank L. 1609
 Mattesich, Mrs. Catherine. . . 776
 Mattesich, Geo. F. 775
 Mattice, Freeman J. 1542
 Mauro, Rosario 1607
 Mauro, Salvador 1607
 Maxey, John D. 807
 McCall, Marquis Lafayette. . . 908
 McCarty, Arthur R. 1608
 McCausland, Edward G. 1543
 McClung, Leon E. 1399
 McComb, Eugene S. 1099
 McComb, Harry H. 1040
 McCormick, Andrew 372
 McCown, James Calvin. 519
 McCoy, Henry R. 1419
 McCuen, George B. 1240
 McDonald, William Leslie. . . 1526
 McDougald, John Duncan. . . 771
 McEnerney, Peter Francis. . . 1139
 McFarland, J. Edwin. 775
 McGurk, Raymond T., M. D.. 1243
 McIntosh, Thomas B. 771
 McKain, Fred J. 1168
 McKeany, John Owen. 958
 McKellar, John Duncan. 968
 McKindley, Ernest M. 932
 McKindley, Josiah 629
 McLain, Judge Samuel S. . . 967
 McLeod, George R. 1395
 McMullin, Capt. John. 388
 McNeil, Warren T., M. D. . . 1243

Mecklenberg, William 1400
 Megerle, Christian 996
 Meissner, George L. 1200
 Mellmann, Edward 1199
 Melone, Capt. George H. 451
 Melton, Robert T. 840
 Menking, Frederick G. 967
 Menzel, William H. 1608
 Mercer, Mrs. Oney. 1517
 Merrill, Henry F. 1543
 Merrill, Joseph F. 1551
 Merrill, Wilbur P. 783
 Merrill, Willis N. 775
 Merz, John A. 772
 Metzler, Charles 855
 Meyer, Frank A. 702
 Meyer, Herman C. 1399
 Meyer, Leland 796
 Meyers, Emiclie 924
 Mieke, William G. 760
 Miller, Charles H. 1416
 Miller, David Wiley 1131
 Miller, Edmund 524
 Miller, Frank Lee. 1518
 Miller, John Martin. 1552
 Miller, Newlen J. 1204
 Miller, W. H. 1517
 Miller, William Payson. 395
 Mills, Everts F. 1609
 Mills, Freeman 490
 Mills, Freeman B. 983
 Mills, George 490
 Mills, L. A. 923
 Mills, Ralph Emmett. 1223
 Mills, Roy S. 490
 Miloslavich, Charles 1609
 Mindach, Felix C. 1184
 Mindach, Paul R. 1610
 Minges, George E. 964
 Miramontes, Pablo 1481
 Mitscher, Henry 767
 Mix, Samuel G. 1610
 Mobley, W. D. 952
 Model Hat Shop, The. 1637
 Mohr, Henry 963
 Moll, William R. 983
 Molloy, John J. 1435
 Montanelli, Caesar 1621
 Montgomery, John S. 599
 Montgomery, John W. 877
 Moore, Fred B. 963
 Moore, Henry 543
 Moore, Thompson Marion. . . 1553
 Moran, Dennis 1518
 Moran, Emmet A. 416
 Moran, John Edmund. 662
 Moran, Walter R. 1223
 Moran, William 396
 Moresco, Louis 1611
 Morrell, Ralph P. 1443
 Morris, Wesley A. 987

Mortenson, William 1610
 Moss, Capt. William S. 767
 Mowry, Milton Jasper. 519
 Munch, Andrew J. 800
 Munford, Mrs. Kittie L. 995
 Munger, Harris Brenner. 1618
 Munson, Henry B. 1518
 Munson, Urban J. 592
 Murdoch, Charles A. 1172
 Murdock, William C. 609
 Murphy, James P. 1400
 Murphy, Martin D. 788
 Murphy, William A. 1439
 Murrell, James Grant, M. D.. 971
 Muthel, Charles 1127
 Muzio, A. Pietro. 1611
 Muzio, John A. 1488
 Myers, Edris B., Jr. 1436
 Myers, Howard A. 1618
 Myran, Albert G. 1303

N

Nagel, Robert F. 759
 Narbaitz, Raymond 1404
 Nasman, Abraham 1611
 Naylor, Fred D. 1056
 Nazro, John 1621
 Needham, Charles E. 555
 Negrete, Marcello 1400
 Nelli, Giovanni 1611
 Nelson, Carl Henning. 1260
 Nelson, George 896
 Nelson, James A. 884
 Nelson, James E., M. D. 1167
 Nelson, Mary Alice. 884
 Ness, Paul L. 816
 Neubauer, Otto 1621
 Neuharth, Karl 1620
 Neumiller, Charles L. 892
 Neumiller, Christian 888
 Newcomb, Lemuel P. 1252
 Newton, Charles L. 434
 Nicewonger, Charles H. 1171
 Nichols, Robert, Jr. 1488
 Nickel, Eugene F. 1552
 Nies, Edward 1248
 Nixon, Byron A. 1622
 Noack, Edward H. 1079
 Nolan, James Patrick. 625
 Northrop, Raymond Arthur. . 1132
 Norton, Hon. Charles Willis. 356
 Nourse, A. J. 971
 Nowak, John J. 1481
 Noyes, Marion Talmay. 764
 Nunes, Manuel T. 1622
 Nutter, Bronson S., D. D. S. 1489

O

Oard, Paul 944
 Obad, Nicolaus 1489
 O'Brien, Jerry, D. D. S. 1415

O'Connell, M. J..... 1489
 O'Connor, Rev. William B... 368
 O'Connor, William E..... 1035
 Odell, Harvey M..... 871
 Ohm, Henry Thomas..... 972
 Ohm, Mrs. Rebecca..... 975
 Olivieri, Leonida, M. D..... 1284
 Olson, John 1623
 O'Malley, John B..... 468
 Ortman, Charles L..... 408
 Oser, Carl W..... 756
 Ospital, Jean 1490
 Ott, Frederick William..... 1490
 Oullahan, Alexander C..... 347
 Oullahan, Robert B..... 1079
 Owen, John H..... 1263
 Owens, David F..... 1553
 Owens, Mrs. Ella Thew..... 1553
 Oyarbide, Jose 1622

P

Pache, Jules 472
 Pacific Carpet Cleaning Co... 1443
 Palermo, Angelo 1388
 Pardini, Massimeno 490
 Parker, Frank F..... 1175
 Parker, Joseph D..... 613
 Parker, Thomas B..... 463
 Parkinson, Herman O..... 1583
 Parsons, R. J..... 878
 Patton, Mrs. Effie A..... 476
 Paul, Max 1336
 Payne, John Wilkes..... 1236
 Pazneski, Ludwik S..... 400
 Pearson, James L..... 1584
 Pearson, Jesse W..... 995
 Pearson, Stith A..... 987
 Pedro, John J..... 1403
 Peirano, G. 763
 Peletz, Louis S..... 1483
 Perrin, Henry 1263
 Perrin, J. Louis..... 1575
 Perrin, Jules 1477
 Perrott, Fred Grieves..... 1576
 Perrott, James R..... 538
 Perrott, John 755
 Perry, John C..... 1208
 Perry, John M..... 751
 Perryman, Charles E..... 1553
 Petersen, Henry Christian,
 M. D. 1247
 Peterson, John Alexander... 878
 Peterson, Otto 1491
 Phelps, William 1180
 Phillips, Orville 1147
 Pickering, James L..... 1259
 Pierce, Ed. N..... 861
 Pierce, James A..... 1087
 Pimm, John J..... 1267
 Platt, John Wesley..... 1584
 Platt, Philemon E..... 475

Plotz, Mrs. Thresie M..... 1348
 Polenske, Frederick R..... 1007
 Pool, Osellus 1576
 Pope, John J..... 868
 Pope, Oscar C..... 744
 Pope, Mrs. William H..... 976
 Porterfield, John A..... 1127
 Posey, Charles A..... 1577
 Posey, John Evert..... 1577
 Posey, John M..... 706
 Post, Ansel William..... 511
 Post, Frank 511
 Post, Ralph J..... 1577
 Post, W. H..... 511
 Potter, George L..... 1563
 Poundstone, Lawrence 1490
 Powell, Ernest 1491
 Powell, Robert 419
 Powers, Allan R., M. D..... 1027
 Prentice, James B..... 1251
 Prentice, James M..... 1088
 Preszler, Edward 1124
 Preszler, George 648
 Preszler, William 1084
 Preece, Harmon E., M. D..... 1264
 Pritchard, J. W..... 1127
 Proud, Robert 1492
 Pulich, Nick 1248
 Purdy, Augustus 1563

Q

Quenell, Nelson 1541

R

Raggio, John 595
 Raines, Thomas J..... 1043
 Ralls, Frank De La 1032
 Ralph, C. R..... 511
 Rasch, Charles 1564
 Raspo, Joseph J..... 1124
 Rathbun, Mrs. Hattie E..... 1542
 Rathjen, John 975
 Rathjen, John A..... 975
 Ratto, Antone J..... 1493
 Ratto, Benedetto 1492
 Ratto, John J..... 1493
 Reasoner, Clarence A..... 1224
 Reed, Ora 1564
 Rees, Joseph Trimble..... 584
 Reibenstein, Richard R..... 419
 Reichmuth, Frank 1503
 Reid, Edward Andrew..... 1542
 Reimche, George 1502
 Reimche, John 1564
 Reiney, William B..... 1432
 Rendon, Cecil P..... 1478
 Reyner, Francis Delbert..... 980
 Reynolds, David R..... 441
 Reynolds, Edward 931
 Reynolds, Eldridge L..... 451
 Reynolds, Sydney W..... 1503

Reynolds, William James..... 1502
 Rhoads, William J..... 867
 Riba, Battista 1565
 Rich, Charles F..... 1591
 Richards, Thomas 991
 Richmond, Rexford B..... 940
 Richter, W. J..... 1543
 Ridenour, Eli H..... 991
 Riecks, William H..... 613
 Riley, Edward H..... 1240
 Riley, J. F..... 1043
 Rinn, Herman 1592
 Ripon Hospital 1504
 Ripon Union High School... 1504
 Risso, David 1593
 Rivara, Andrew 862
 Robbins, Curtis M..... 1505
 Robbins, Henry E..... 1505
 Roberts, Arthur 976
 Roberts, Arthur F..... 662
 Robinson, Isaac H..... 654
 Robinson, Lyon and Irey.... 1602
 Robinson, William J..... 515
 Rode, Julius 1593
 Rode, Rudolph E..... 1593
 Rodgers, Albert F..... 1143
 Rodgers, Joseph Leslie..... 1524
 Roesch, George F..... 416
 Rohrbach, John 1594
 Rolerson, Mrs. Faustena Mon-tora 979
 Ronkendorf, Henry P..... 1505
 Ronkendorf, Peter 1505
 Rosin, Charles E..... 999
 Ross, Charles D..... 1493
 Ross, Gilbert McMillan..... 1594
 Rothenbush, Walter P..... 1247
 Ruff, Charles W..... 1440
 Ruhl, Frederick August..... 1043
 Russell, Charles A..... 1000
 Rustan, Andro 1143
 Rutherford, Walter T..... 657
 Rutledge, Charles R..... 1047

S

Saccone Bros. 1594
 Saddlemire, Jesse C..... 1494
 St. Joseph's Home and Hospital 1403
 St. Patrick's Parish..... 991
 Salbach, Capt. Fred..... 1091
 Salfield, August F..... 1595
 Salfield, David 1494
 Sanderson, Henry Ellis, M. D. 1251
 Sandman, Otto E..... 1159
 Sanguinetti, Emile S..... 1244
 Sanguinetti, Fred A..... 1640
 Sanguinetti, James 1147
 Sanguinetti, Louis F..... 1495
 Sanguinetti, Louis R..... 871
 Sanguinetti, Mrs. Maria..... 1000

- Sanguinetti, Nat 1596
 Sanguinetti, Pete 1595
 Sanguinetti, Pietro 1596
 Sanguinetti, Thomas 1631
 Sargent, Jacob Preston, M. D. 448
 Sargenti, Peter 1578
 Saunders, Francis H., D.V.M. 1495
 Saunders, Ira E. 1495
 Saxton, Glen E. 835
 Scally, Thomas F. 751
 Schaur, Herbert M. 1255
 Scheffel, H. B. O. 1495
 Schenkenberger, John 1544
 Scheurer, John J. 1444
 Schilling, Prof. George E. 1632
 Schimmelpfennig, Frederick
 W. 980
 Schleef, Fred J. 992
 Schlossman, William 1019
 Schmidt, Henry Charles. 1156
 Schmidt, Peter P. 1144
 Schmiedt, John J. 1080
 Schnaidt, Edmund C. 1544
 Schneider, Mrs. C. G. 795
 Schneider, Fred G. 1632
 Schneider, Martin 1259
 Schofield, James M. 533
 Schombucher, Ernest 1140
 Schroeder, Henry W. 976
 Schwartz, Leon C. 1179
 Scott, Charlotte 1544
 Scott, Capt. Edward. 1215
 Scott, William J. 1483
 Seamands, Oscar Allen. 1011
 Seclmeier, John B. 1496
 Seifert, Lorenz 630
 Sellman, Mrs. Anna. 376
 Sellman, Lafayette 376
 Semenza, John 1634
 Serventi, Angelo 1392
 Seymour, Dr. Arthur T. 1147
 Sharp, Henry Mabel. 591
 Sharp, Henry W. 591
 Shattuck, John W. 1047
 Shaughnessy, Michael P. 715
 Shaw, Allen C. 1179
 Shepherd, Charles H. 1496
 Shepherd, George W. 787
 Shepherd, Jesse F. 1200
 Shepherd, Lee A. 784
 Sheridan, Mrs. Isabella. 459
 Shinn, Heman D. 1635
 Sibeck, Charles A. 1635
 Siegfried, F. Stanley. 1424
 Siemen, Kornelius H. 1496
 Siemering, Henry 1636
 Sigelkoff, Harry 1498
 Sigelkoff, John H. 1498
 Silk, Hubert Frederick. 1637
 Silva, Manuel 1637
 Silver, Joseph A. 1227
 Simms, Fred B. 1316
 Simon, Jacob 423
 Simpson, Andrew W. 504
 Sinai, Nathan 1486
 Slack, Charles A., Jr. 1148
 Smith, Andrew H. 1328
 Smith, Charles F. 996
 Smith, Charles R. 1497
 Smith, David H. 1497
 Smith, Miss Estella M. 1545
 Smith, George Falkenborough 666
 Smith, Peter John. 724
 Smyth, Mrs. Caroline M. 851
 Smyth, James H. 851
 Snedigar, Willis Spencer, M.D. 720
 Snow, George E. 808
 Snyder, Charles Peter. 807
 Snyder, Jacob P. 804
 Snyder, William H. 1498
 Sola, Andrew 1512
 Sola, Luvigi 1636
 Solari, Antonio L. 1448
 Solkmore, John H. 1256
 Sollinger, Mrs. Barbara J. 716
 Solomon, Elsie A. 1637
 Sommers, James C. 1487
 Sorter, Frank 1638
 South, Mrs. Grace J. 1011
 Southrey, John Nicholas. 728
 Southwell, John H. 653
 Sowles, John D. 1076
 Spenker, Otto 1545
 Sperbeck, Mrs. Minnie. 1638
 Spiekerman, Ed. 1151
 Spooner, William A. 634
 Sprott, Fred 1136
 Stabell, Louis F. 1546
 Stacks, Willis Ware. 1079
 Stagg, Thomas H. 1003
 Stanley, Harry C. 1044
 Stanley, Robert J. 702
 Stark, John Frederick. 464
 Steely, Charles A. 560
 Steely, George W. 560
 Stein, Mrs. Mattie M. 1638
 Steinmetz, Edward C. 1427
 Steinmetz, George 1427
 Stephens Bros. 1051
 Stephens, Thomas J. 411
 Stephenson, Frank J. 1015
 Stevenson, James M. 1512
 Stewart, Robert 500
 Stier, Henry 927
 Stitt, P. H. 564
 Stockton Coffee Club. 1485
 Stockton Plumbing Supply Co. 1064
 Stoeven, William R. 1625
 Storey, Granville T. 1639
 Stowell, Fred B. 1179
 Stribley, Thomas Rooke. 1196
 Strieff, Henry 1525
 Strieff, John J. 1525
 Strobbridge, Salma Seaver. 1168
 Strong, Nathan Moreton. 548
 Strong, Truman Alvin. 1303
 Strother, Alfred R. 1578
 Stuart, Joseph F. 1003
 Stuckenbruck, James Wilson. 1151
 Sturla, Paul 1167
 Sullivan, Mrs. Mary. 1513
 Sunset Macaroni Factory. 1639
 Superior Manufacturing Co. 1340
 Swain, Cornelius 528
 Swain, John A. 533
 Swain, Joseph H. 495
 Swass, Mrs. J. L. 547
 Sweem, Charles J. 1447
 Sweem, James Frederick. 1463
 Swett, Alfred L. 820
- T
- Tabacco, Mario 1588
 Taisen, John C. 748
 Taisen, Walter H. 752
 Taylor, F. H. 1579
 Taylor, Howard B. 1625
 Taylor, Hugh Edward. 1526
 Teixeira, Joseph 1340
 Templeton, Walter H. 1499
 Tennyson, Clarence B., D.D.S. 1546
 Thiessen, Henry, Sr. 1626
 Thiessen, Henry C., Jr. 1626
 Thomas, Charles W. 1191
 Thomas, Edward 429
 Thomayer, William J. 1160
 Thoming, George 1039
 Thompson, Elmer E. 595
 Thompson, Emery A. 1048
 Thompson, George Francis. 1055
 Thompson, John 1051
 Thompson, John Chatten. 621
 Thompson, John Vernon. 1589
 Thompson, Rees Bowen. 382
 Thompson, Reese B. 1499
 Thompson, William Henry. 1546
 Thompson, Wilson Henry. 1055
 Thornton, Arthur 1304
 Thornton, Frank Sumner. 1007
 Thornton, John Milan. 1004
 Thorp, James E. 1059
 Thrush, George 523
 Thrush, William H. 523
 Thurman, George M. 1590
 Tinkham, George H. 352
 Tinkham, Henry 372
 Toal, Levi M. 1300
 Toda Bros. 1499
 Toda, William J. 1501
 Todd, Helen E. 1637
 Todman, Harry S. 1498
 Tomlinson, Josiah 1525
 Tone, Mrs. Alice M. 571

INDEX

ix

Tone, John Nicholas..... 571
 Tons, John Frederick..... 1509
 Towne, Clarence A..... 792
 Trachiotis, Emanuel 1588
 Tredway, Mary A..... 486
 Tredway, William H..... 486
 Tremain, Emery E..... 661
 Tretheway, John 476
 Triolo, James S..... 1164
 Triolo, John P..... 1525
 Trondhjem, Svend Otto..... 1456
 Troy, Martin 1207
 Tryon, E. P..... 1156
 Tschierschky, Ernest Maxmil-lian 844
 Tschierschky, William Theodore 1015
 Tubbs, Robert C..... 1083
 Tucker, Frank 1487
 Turner, George Clinton..... 587
 Turner, Walter W..... 1488
 Tye, Hugh J..... 1180

U

Upton, Harvey F..... 1039

V

Van Buskirk, Charles Lever.. 972
 Van Gelder, Claude Whitney. 764
 Van Gelder, Morris..... 764
 Van Keuren, Claude R..... 1159
 Van Loon, Mrs. Laura B..... 856
 Van Pelt, Edwin S..... 626
 Van Til, Clarence..... 1510
 Van Vranken, Edward..... 1231
 Ventre, Lawrence L..... 1589
 Vickroy, Harvey E..... 643
 Villihorghi, Lewis 1100
 Villinger, Fred H..... 1590
 Villinger, Leon, Sr..... 489
 Vincent, Walter 1509
 Vinet, Joseph P..... 472
 Vinet, Peter 472
 Vischi, Gabriel J., M. D..... 1187
 Vogelsang, Otto M..... 644
 Vollbrecht, Charles W..... 1590
 Vollbrecht, Herman 1039
 Vomburg, Mrs. Lucy..... 1171
 Von Glahn, Borchert H..... 1557
 Von Sosten, William F..... 1016

W

Wadsworth, George 1032
 Wagers, James W..... 1252
 Wagner, Charles 575
 Wagner, Edward C..... 568
 Wagner, Jacob 412
 Wagner, Solomon 1112
 Wakefield, Andrew Eugene... 1059
 Wakefield, Jesse W..... 1155
 Walker, Harold A..... 1187
 Wall, Fred F..... 1384
 Wallace, B. C..... 404
 Wallace, Gerald Beatty..... 534
 Wallace, Minard 1219
 Wallace, Peter J..... 1579
 Walling, Luther C..... 1526
 Walter, Carl A..... 984
 Walt, Dudley I..... 661
 Ward, Lafe 1510
 Wardrobe, Alfred D..... 887
 Watkins, Alfred Gwynne..... 596
 Watkins, John P..... 1060
 Weaver, Kyle H..... 1509
 Weber, Capt. Charles M..... 340
 Weber, Charles Oscar..... 999
 Weber, John K..... 1603
 Webster, Joshua Bertram.... 420
 Wehr, Mrs. Nellie..... 1447
 Welsh, Clark Garrett..... 720
 Wencil, Paul 1604
 Wenzelburger, Chris 1527
 Wenzelburger, Fred 1527
 Werner, David D..... 1511
 West, Fred A..... 438
 West, Joseph S., M. D..... 437
 West Side Irrigation District. 1155
 West Side Union High School 1020
 West, Warwick W..... 1019
 Weyand, G. 1604
 Wheeler, William Earl..... 1605
 White, Corwin Douglass.... 1228
 White, John Cox..... 1151
 White, Joseph G..... 1036
 Wiederrich, John R..... 1352
 Wigginton, George 936
 Wilcox, R. R..... 1511
 Wilder, Wirt Eldred..... 1060
 Wilhoit, George Ewell..... 360
 Wilhoit, Mrs. Jessie Lee.... 360
 Wilhoit, John Newton..... 363
 Wilhoit, Roley E..... 359
 Wilkinson, Lauren E..... 591

Wilkinson, Thomas 591
 Wilkinson, Thomas Edgar.... 591
 Williams, Ansel S..... 551
 Williams, Charles Edmund... 948
 Williams, Clifton C..... 1255
 Williams, David 1063
 Williams, E. Guy, D. D. S.... 1348
 Williams, Edwin A..... 614
 Williams, Robert Franklin... 988
 Williams, Robert Georgia... 1558
 Williamson, Herbert E..... 552
 Williamson, Thaddeus E..... 1140
 Willis, George 496
 Willis, Herbert Q., M. D.... 1179
 Wilson, Edward P..... 638
 Wilson, Mrs. Mary Ann..... 382
 Wilson, Orrin C..... 715
 Wilson, William H..... 1052
 Wisler, Lester Orville..... 1024
 Wisner, E. T..... 1605
 Wittmeier, Edward 1623
 Wolf, Andrew 686
 Wolf, David 1208
 Wolf, Everett H..... 957
 Wolf, George 1356
 Wollam, William B..... 759
 Woock, Herbert J..... 928
 Woock, Julius 1380
 Woock, Walter R..... 1340
 Woodhull, Lloyd R..... 1188
 Woodruff, Edgar 583
 Woods, Clarence L..... 1528
 Woods, Dervin K..... 567
 Woods, Ezekiel Williamson
 Smith 348
 Woods, John Newton..... 344
 Woods, Mrs. John Newton... 347
 Worden, Russell T..... 1557
 Wurster, Fred W..... 943

Y

Ylarraz, Nick 1452
 Young, Wesley Albert..... 1012
 Young, William J., M. D.... 500
 Young, William L..... 764
 Yroz, Domingo 1624

Z

Ziegler, William J..... 364
 Zinck, Fay Reed..... 967
 Zitlau, August J..... 456
 Zornig, Peter 1511

Geo H Pinkham

HISTORY OF SAN JOAQUIN COUNTY

By George H. Tinkham

CHAPTER I

SAN JOAQUIN COUNTY, THE GATEWAY OF THE VALLEY

NATURE, in her creative work, designed San Joaquin County as the gateway of the great San Joaquin Valley. The slope of the land proves this. If it were possible to start rolling a large ball from the head waters of the Sacramento River, unobstructed by bush, tree, hill or river, it would land at a point not many miles distant from Stockton. A ball set rolling from the headwaters of the San Joaquin River would stop at nearly the same point. These two rivers rising in the Sierra Nevada Mountains, nearly 300 miles apart, flow into Suisun Bay, an air-line distance from Stockton of less than thirty miles. The slope of the Sierras is towards this point, as is proven by the rivers' flow. The Sacramento River flows less than ten miles from the northwest boundary of San Joaquin County; and into it flow the waters of the Cosumnes and the Mokelumne rivers. The Stanislaus, Tuolumne, Merced and Fresno rivers flow into the San Joaquin River, whose waters ever flowing only three miles from Stockton, mingle with the waters of the mighty Pacific. Hence, as I have stated, Nature planned this county as the Central California gateway to the ocean and in the future it is destined to become one of the largest populated sections in the United States.

This valley, or basin, as it is often called, 250 miles in length and averaging fifty miles in width, was at one period an inland sea. Its waters for ages beat against the foothills of the Sierras and washed the hills of the Coast Range. In course of time, says the Indian legend, "the mountain tops burned red, the earth shook and trembled, the mountains broke asunder, and the waters ran out into the ocean." Where did the Indians learn this legend? It seems like a dream or the fanciful imagination of a disordered mind. The truth of the legend is proven, however, by geological evidence. Along the base of the Sierras there are many indications to a scientific student that this valley was in the ages past beneath the waters. Oyster and clam shells have been found in the foothills and the imprints of fish upon the rocks. E. L. Flower, born at Knights Ferry and a student of geology, says in that locality that the cobble stones are all polished and rounded by water action, and no rough edged stones are found. Fish imprints have been found, he states, and at one time in a pebble stone, broken open, the imprint of a crab was seen. Another close observer of the creative period of California, E. L. Branch, says in his History of Stanislaus County, "If a person goes from Knights Ferry to Dry Creek, he will observe along the hillside three water marks, at different heights, just as if it had been a lake. Those marks can be seen for many miles. When in early days the soil had not been plowed up, it was covered with little knolls and sand just as may be seen in the bottom of lakes." As to the Indian legend "that the mountain tops burned red" we have proof of that even in our own day. Within the past three years, Mt. Lassen, in Lassen County, has been belching out fire and smoke, and throwing out acres of lava into the valley. Scientists tell us that Mt. Diablo and Mt. Tamalpais are extinct volcanoes. As to the earthquakes splitting the mountain asunder, ask the citizens of San Francisco regarding their experience of the earthquake that occurred in April, 1906.

Before the creator can create, he must have the material at hand. And millions of years before this valley become dry land the Sierra Nevadas had been thrown up by volcanic eruptions, miles in height. We have ample proof of this in the granite and sandstone found at Columbia, products of that period of which the Bible speaks when it says, "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." The Coast Range was formed in the later part of the secondary period. There soft coal is found, a product of vegetable matter that had been buried for time indefinite. Time passed; by means of glaciers, icebergs, avalanches, snow slides and heavy rains, Nature began sending debris into the valley below. After a time shrubs, plants and trees grew upon the new-made earth. Then they disappeared, covered by mountains of new soil. Through aeons of time, this soil-building continued until the Sierras were worn down to the present height, an average of probably 6,000 feet. The soil has been deposited over the inland lake to a depth unknown. Borings have been made in this county to a depth of 2,000 feet with no indications of any different type of soil than mountain soil. How many years was Nature at work in the building up of the valley we have not the remotest idea, except from the great flood of 1862. In that year the entire valley was covered with water for nearly two weeks, and during that time the soil was covered with debris from one to four inches in depth. Old Mother Earth is still soil-building along the river bottoms, and upon the swampy lands. The rivers are fast filling up from the debris brought down by the spring floods—even San Francisco Bay is filling up—and one of the great problems of the day is how to keep our navigable rivers from destruction.

Nature having practically finished her work, let us view it as the first discoverers beheld it. Albert C. Parker, the son of a pioneer, gave a very pleasing description in the opening lines of his poem:

Snow-capped Sierras to the eastward rise;
 Their rugged peaks uplifted to the skies,
 And in the west, bedecked in emerald hue,
 Low rolling hills lie mirrored in the blue;
 Like sentinels of old these ranges, twain,
 Guard well the borders of a broad domain;
 And down the poppied way that lies between
 In silent grandeur flows the San Joaquin.

In this county on the return of Spring, Nature carpeted the soil with wild flowers of every variety and color, and with a fragrant perfume the air was heavy laden. In those days grass, filaree, oats and clover grew luxuriantly, and in some localities, especially along the Calaveras River, the grass grew over six feet in height. It was the hiding place of squirrels, rabbits, quail and other small game, and the food of thousands of wild animals, including elk, deer, antelopes, bears and mountain lions. Coyotes or wild dogs were also plentiful, and as late as 1850 a lodger in the town complained that "the coyotes have already become vociferous and their hungry barking has nightly disturbed our slumbers for some nights past." Deer also were seen by the hundreds roaming over the plains, and, although later driven to the mountains, they were there ruthlessly killed for their hides. As late as December, 1881, it is recorded, "Williams & Moore yesterday shipped 540 deer hides. During the past two months, the firm has shipped over a thousand hides."

Along the river banks wild roses grew in great profusion, and strawberry and blackberry bushes. The blackberry bushes were filled with berries and in the fall of the year the pioneers would form picnic parties and go blackberrying. Chinamen would gather the berries and hawk them about the street. Well do I remember one little Chinaman waddling along with his heavy baskets, one in front and one behind him, upheld by a bamboo pole, crying out in his piping voice "black-ba leese." The adobe belt was covered with a literal forest of white and live oaks. In Stockton there were thousands of these trees—

And along the streets from out the sighing trees
 The song birds caroled sweetly to the breeze.

There were thousands of these blackbirds in the tree tops and sweetly they sang. They obtained much of their food from the barley wasted by the teamsters in feeding their mules upon the streets. The press in referring to them said, "Blackbirds are thick in the suburbs (now Sutter and Weber Avenue) and almost as gentle as barn fowl, but they are fast being reduced, as the Kanakas and Frenchman are shooting them for food." These birds were with us, singing throughout the day, until about 1870; then some wise individual imported and turned loose a number of male and female English sparrows. Propagating fast and being very aggressive they drove out all of the native birds.

Returning to the forest of oaks, they varied in size from slender saplings to gigantic trees three feet in diameter and with an average height of forty feet. Some of these oaks were growing when in 1492 Columbus discovered America, while others are not over one hundred years of age. Thousands of those majestic oaks that have braved the storms of many a century were cut down for firewood. For over twenty years they supplied the homes, flour mills, factories and steamboats with fuel. In the flood of 1862 over one hundred cords of white oak, piled upon the river bank for steamer use, were swept onward to the Golden Gate. Single or small groups of these trees are still growing in various parts of the city and county. In the State Asylum grounds there is a grove of some thirty trees as truly in their natural state as when the wild Indians passed beneath their shade. There is another grove, now a public resort, called "Good Water Grove." What is the age of these trees?

Experts claim that the largest are at least 500 years old. There is one oak tree now growing in the rear of the Christian Science Church on Flora Street whose age we positively know. It is the usual height, forty feet, and nine inches in diameter six feet from the ground. It has grown from an acorn planted by little Miss Nettie Van Valear on April 15, 1865, in her father's garden, in memory of President Lincoln, who was assassinated the previous evening by John Wilkes Booth.

The Spring Floods

Upon the Mokelumne River, near Lockeford, benches of land were formed; they are dry and very productive during the summer months, but they are completely covered with water during the spring season. The Calaveras River, a dry canal eight months of the year, becomes a deep rushing torrent of water during the spring thaw of snow. Lapham and Mackie, who made a soil survey of the Stockton area in 1906, reported in regard to the Calaveras River, "About one-half of the area surveyed consists of the valley-plain proper, at one time covered by the waters of an ancient pleistocene lake or bay. The central part is traversed in a general southwesterly direction by the Calaveras River and Mormon Channel, the waters of which enter the San Joaquin a little below Stockton. Mormon Channel is a branch of the Calaveras River, which it leaves a short distance outside of the northeastern extremity of the area (Bellota) and now carries nearly all of the water which at one time found its way through the Calaveras River. The bed of the lower course of the Mormon Channel is filled to the depth of many feet by detritus derived from the waste of the mountains, which is frequently carried by winter and spring floods into the still waters of Stockton Channel, forming bars and impeding navigation or entirely blocking the harbor until removed." The Mormon Channel in the season of the heaviest freshets, before the arrival of the pioneers, overflowed its north bank at what is now Hazelton Avenue and Stanislaus Street, and cutting a deep channel to the northwest, emptied into Stockton Channel at Weber Avenue and Hunter Street. Stockton Channel, which is the most valuable asset of the city and county, and which empties into the San Joaquin River, extended eastward some two miles. It was formed by the overflow from Mormon Channel. The flow of melting snows from the Sierras was so heavy at times that hundreds of shallow water courses were formed; dry in summer, but wet and boggy in winter, these water courses made a complete network of shallow streams. Along the banks of the deepest waterways a continuous line of high land existed, making dry spots for the pioneers in springtime. I have recorded the condition of this city in the beginning that we may see the wonderful progress that has been made in land filling during the past years.

The Tule Land

To the west of the high land there are thousands of acres of peat or tule land, estimated by Surveyor C. D. Gibbs in 1850 at 133,000 acres. This soil, which was covered with water a large part of the year, was Nature's last work. And she continued building up the land, very slowly, it is true, until man stopped the work by reclamation. It is now known as the Holland of America. Lapham, in describing this soil, says, "In typical section the soil consists of six feet or more of fine alluvial river and tidal silts, intimately commingled with partially decayed vegetable matter, undecomposed plant roots, stems, and fibers occurring in great profusion. This material is dark brown to black, of an exceedingly smooth and pasty consistency when wet, of spongy texture and generally saturated with water at a depth of two or three feet. This tule or peat land became, during the winter season, the feeding place of thousands of ducks and geese that flew from the north at the first approach of the Arctic winters. Then everybody that could fire a shotgun went hunting. They had not far to go. Where now stands the Crown Flour Mills was all tules, and I have known Frank Giovanessi, a dead shot, to leave his home at sundown and return two hours later loaded down with game. Ducks were so plentiful that in November, 1859, "Over the city in flocks, thousands of ducks and geese are flying, and their 'honk, honk' may be heard night and day. Hank Saunders shot thirty-nine ducks and geese and the following day he got forty-two. Ducks are selling at 25 cents a pair." Now they are selling at one dollar a pair and scarce at that price. There are now no general feeding places for ducks, as the swamp land has all been reclaimed or sold to corporations. And the only men who can hunt game are members of gun clubs who have money to purchase reservations. One of the beautiful sights annually occurring in the fall of the year was the burning of miles and miles of tules. They were set on fire by the hunters to clear the land and drive out the game, making it easier to locate a flock of ducks or geese. It was indeed a beautiful sight, especially at night—"the ocean of fire," as one writer expressed it—when the flames rushing along at racehorse speed, licking up with their red-forked tongues the dry tules. One writer of that day said, "The most magnificent spectacle we have ever witnessed delighted us on Tuesday last. The morning opened with a cloudy sky and a stiff wind was blowing from the northwest, which increased in velocity as the day advanced. About ten o'clock huge columns of smoke arose from the banks of the San Joaquin, which in time became so dense it flung a shadow upon the earth. The vast flames quickly spread, fanned by the wind and soon the entire land was a vast conflagration. But it was as the evening set in that the picture presented its sublimest aspect. The red glare shot across the heavens and was reflected again upon the city and 'all men stood and gazed.'"

These annual fires continued perhaps twice or three times a year until along in the eighties. Often they were very annoying, especially when the wind was from the west, as the streets and the housetops would be thickly sprinkled with burned tules. The family washing hung out to dry would become so smutted that it would have to be again rinsed out in clean water, and the small boys would have a jolly time blackening their own and the other fellow's face.

In the tules and along the river banks might be found thousands of raccoons, otter, badger, beaver and other fur bearing animals. Beaver were plentiful in that region, as late as 1870. Robert Dykeman, a hunter, trapped 256 of the valuable fur-bearing animals, and also shot large quantities of game for market. The beaver was found on French Camp slough, and attracted to that locality the trappers of the Hudson Bay Company, an English corporation. The streams abounded in fish, and they were so plentiful that a directory published in 1852 said, "The Stockton Channel and the San Joaquin River contain an abundance of fish. There are salmon, trout, sturgeon, and an infinite variety of smaller kinds to the heart's content. We have seen children stand on the city wharves and fill their baskets with small fish in the course of an hour, amid the commerce. The salmon has a delicious flavor, and the trout is as delicate as an Apicius might desire." It was great sport for many boys to go fishing, perch being the principal fish caught. Richard Reibenstein and others would tell of their catching perch where now stands the Hotel Stockton, the Weber Hole, as it was called for many years. Some thirty years ago the Government began propagating black bass. Later a large number were placed in the Stockton Channel. From some cause, soon after, the perch all disappeared and none have since been seen. Up to the middle seventies salmon and halibut were sold in the fish markets at 12½ cents a pound. Sometimes an Italian would land at the wharf with a whale-boat load and sell them like hot cakes at from 50 cents to $1 each, according to size. Then came the fish corporations and they stopped the cheap sale of fish. Now with thousands of tons of fish in the rivers and ocean it is higher priced than the first cuts of meat.

Underground Springs

The water flowing over the land was not the only supply of Nature. Through the earth there runs thousands of streams of clear water from mountain to sea; these streams are fed by the springs, lakes and acres of melting snow that percolates through the soil. Here in San Joaquin, water for domestic purposes may be found at a depth of twenty feet. The best drinking water, clear and cool is found at a depth of from fifty to eighty feet. The nearer the mountains naturally the deeper must be the well, and in the extreme eastern part of the county wells were dug to a depth of sixty or more feet, and walled up with brick or rock. Then in early days the old-fashioned windlass was used, and "the old oaken bucket that hung by the well" has been replaced by turbine wheels which are set in the bottom of the well and the water lifted to the surface. The Italian gardeners, and many persons in Stockton set up windmills for household purpose and irrigation. In 1858, before establishing the city water works, 256 windmills were counted in the city. Now the farmers and gardeners use gasoline engines, and extensive irrigation is carried on by this means.

Some idea of the depth of the soil, with which Nature filled this valley, and the depth of water is best given by illustration. In 1854 an artesian well was bored in Stockton on the west side of the Court House Square, but they discontinued work at a depth of 200 feet for lack of money, although water was found the entire distance. The following year work was not continued, because someone had dropped a large stone into the well and it could not be dislodged. A new well, twenty feet distant from the first well, was bored to a depth of 1,000 feet, at a cost of $10,000. Now by the use of improved machinery they cost 50 per cent less than by the hand labor of early day. Through the entire distance the auger brought up only fine gravel, clay and sand, which in the classification of the geologist indicates a late formation of the soil, five thousand years or more ago. At a depth of 340 feet the auger bored through a redwood stump. During 1919 an artesian well was bored at the Pacific tannery, located on what was formally the bank of a water channel. The well was sunk 280 feet and at a depth of 170 feet, the auger passed through the limb of a tree. In the courthouse well, from a depth of 340 feet, the water was forced to within three feet of the surface; at a depth of 560 feet the water arose three feet above the earth, and at 910 feet a body of water was forced up seven feet in height. The temperature of the water averaged 77 degrees F. in summer and winter. Down 500 feet a strong smell of gas was noticeable, and upon the completion of the well this gas was confined and found to be a fair quality of illuminating gas. There are now several hundred artesian wells in the county; included in the number are twenty-seven artesian wells from which Stockton receives its water supply, for domestic, manufacturing and fire purposes. These wells vary in diameter from twelve to twenty inches, and in depth from 250 to 800 feet. By means of their large pumps the corporation can furnish 17,000,000 gallons of water a day, water, save for a little sulphur in the winter season, the purest and healthiest in the state. Salt water is found at a depth of 1,000 feet, this positively showing that the mountain greets the sea. There are in Stockton several gas wells, the gas being used for illuminating, heating and cooking purposes. The pioneer gas well was bored by Cutler Salmon at his ranch home two miles east of French Camp. The well was bored for the purpose of obtaining a good supply of water, but sufficient gas was found to furnish him a supply for lighting and cooking purposes.

A Climate Unsurpassed

Travelers tell us that the climate of San Joaquin is equal to or superior to the climate of Naples, Italy; that the climate is unsurpassed for its salubrity, comfort and healthfulness goes without saying. So mild is the winter season roses bloom throughout the year, and almond trees are in bud in February. In the Court House Square there are palm trees growing throughout the year; as this is a strictly tropical plant it causes surprise to strangers who know not the equability of the climate. Orange trees blossom and the fruit forms and ripens during the early spring. As to the seasons we have but two, summer and winter; the warm weather begins in March, the fields are covered with wild flowers, the early fruit trees begin budding and the garden plants are again in color. Easter finds a wealth of flowers of every shape and hue. From March until November we have sunshine and cool westerly winds with a varying temperature from 60 to 104 degrees. The warmest months are July and August. There are clouds, occasional rains and heavy dew in April, May and October. The winter season begins in November and ends in February. The only cold months are December and January, the month last named being the coldest, the thermometer occasionally dropping below the freezing point. The 1920-21 winter was an open winter and water was frozen four times only during the season. The rainfall during the spring and winter season varies from ten to fifteen inches. Occasionally there is severe cold weather continuing for a week or more, and five times during the county's history there has been a light fall of snow. According to one writer 1848 was a very severe winter; he says, "It rained and continued to rain; the rivers rose until the whole country round about was covered with water. Stockton was completely surrounded by water for a time. In December the cold was intense. Snow fell all over the valley. The channel froze down to the river and a passage had to be cut to get a launch up to the land here." There was a spell of cold weather in 1854 and the San Francisco steamer plowed ice as she came up the channel. In 1878 there was a period of six weeks of cold weather; every morning the house pumps were frozen solid, McLeod's lake was frozen over and ice a quarter of an inch thick was formed on the watering troughs. There was another long cold spell in 1885, and ice was formed, but it melted before midday. A fall of snow is so rare that children have never seen it except upon the Sierras. In 1880, January 22, snow began falling and continued for several hours, but in the warm sun it quickly turned to water. The heaviest fall of snow ever recorded occurred January 31, 1882. The previous evening the weather was very cold and the following morning about eleven o'clock snow flakes began falling with increasing velocity until it lay two inches deep upon the earth. Sleds were hastily constructed and the boys and those from eastern homes enjoyed sleigh riding throughout the day. That evening a heavy rain soon melted the snow.

Varieties of Soil

The soil of the county as classified by Mackie is divided into ten different classes which may be condensed for all practical use to adobe or clay loam, sandy loam, gravelly soil and peat or tule land. The clay loam comprises a belt of land in the center of the county about eight miles in width and sixteen miles in length. It begins at Stockton and ends just beyond Linden. Some persons called it the black land, because of its dark brown and black color. Mackie in describing it says, "The soil is of a close compact structure, polishingly highly upon the soil auger, is exceedingly tenacious and of a stiff, putty-like consistency when wet, checking at the surface in large blocks, by deep surface cracks upon exposure." In other words, the soil in summer time unless irrigated becomes very dry and cracks open into irregular blocks a foot or two in depth and a couple of inches wide. In winter the soil becomes solid by being wet, holds water and is exceedingly adhesive. The ground contracts in summer and swells in winter, thus making it difficult to keep level streets or sidewalks. The soil is very fertile, although somewhat difficult to cultivate. On this belt grew the oak trees and it produces heavy crops of wheat, barley, hay and vegetables. The sandy loam lies upon the north and south side of the adobe belt. On the north it extends from the Calaveras River to the county line, and on the south from French Camp to Stanislaus County. For over thirty years it was considered of little value except for pasture land. Irrigation, however, has produced wonderful results. In the Lodi section grapes were planted and the land produces bountifully, with no irrigation but the rains.

The gravel or San Joaquin loam, as Lapham calls it, lies in the eastern part of the county. In describing it he says, "It forms the upland of the lower or first foothill slopes and extends to the margins of the nearly level plains below. These slopes or rolling hills are treeless and devoid of rock outcrop save the occasional appearance of the underlying hardpan." This section of the county comprises some 5,000 acres. Nature's last production is the western part of the county, the peat or tule land. Berkeley, you remember, said

"Westward the Star of Empire takes its way;
The first four acts already past,
The fifth shall close the drama with the day;
Time's noblest offspring is the last."

And William H. Rhoads, the young Stockton pioneer, in a poem read at the fair of 1859 affirmed the Berkeley poem when he said in his closing lines,

"Where then in Eden; Ah, why should I tell
What every eye and besom knows so well?
Why name the land all other lands have blest
And traced for ages to the distant west?
Why seek in vain the historic page
For Eden's Garden and the Golden Age?
Here, brothers, here, no further let us roam,
Here is the Garden, Eden is our home."

CHAPTER II

THE FIRST LANDOWNERS

HAVING laid a broad foundation for the history of the county, who were the people placed here to enjoy its luxuriant and fertile soil, its delightful climate and the beautiful scenery of mountain, hill and valley? Indians, just Indians, a race of people not much higher in intellect than the animals that roamed the plains. Strange that so much beauty and value of soil should be wasted for five hundred or more years, for the Indians have lived here man knows not how long. We know only this, that Christopher Columbus found Indians, when in 1492 he landed at Cuba. It was to him a new race of people. Believing that he had landed at India, he named them Indians. Hernando Cortez, sailing to Mexico, there found the same race, Indians. His soldiers married the Indian women, from whence sprang the Mexican race. We will find many of them in Stockton. In 1542 Cabrillo, in sailing along the California coast, found Indians at every point of landing. When Sir Francis Drake landed in the bay that bears his name, the Indians crowded around him in great numbers. The Franciscan fathers traveling up the coast found Indians in every valley, and they assisted the padres in building their missions. Lieutenant Gabriel Moraga, in 1812, crossing the mountains into the San Joaquin Valley, found hundreds of Indians in the Valley of the Tulare. So it seems upon this entire continent of North America the Indians were the land-owners and the sons of Nature.

Names and Location of Tribes

In San Joaquin county there were but five tribes of Indians according to Colonel F. T. Gilbert, who, in 1879, made a study of the county Indians. Three of these tribes, the Mok-el-kos, the La-las and the Ma-cha-cos lived on the Mokelumne River: the Cos-os on the Cosumnes River and the Ya-che-kos in the vicinity of the present site of Stockton. The Ma-cha-cos tribe occupied the territory from Athearn's Ferry to Campo Seco, the tribe claiming the land upon both sides of the river. The La-las were a small tribe later absorbed by the powerful Mo-kel-kos. They inhabited the land between what was known as Staples Ferry and Athearn's Ferry. The Cos-os lived on the Cosumnes River and they gave the river its name. The Mo-kel-kos were the land grabbers of that day. They were a large tribe, numbering some twelve rancherias of about 3,000 Indians, and they held undisputed possession of all of the land between Lockeford and New Hope Dry creek and the Calaveras River. They had four chieftains, all brothers, and to hold this large tract of land, Sena-a-to lived at Staples Ferry, which was about four miles west of Lockeford; Lowe-no at Woodbridge; An-to-nio on the Calaveras, and Max-i-mo near Benedict's Ferry. The Ya-che-kos tribe were also a powerful tribe, probably the strongest tribe in the county; they lived in the vicinity of Stockton and owned all of the territory to French Camp. It was not a very large stretch of land, but it produced an abundance of food, and like the tramp of today, if the Indian could get plenty of food easily he was satisfied.

The high cost of living in no manner affected the Indians, for Nature provides for its own. In case of a scarcity of food among the larger tribes, they would declare war upon a weaker tribe and capture their food supply. However, as it was, they had plenty of food. In the spring time they lived on a species of clover that grew abundantly on the plains; it was soft and contained sufficient nutriment to sustain life. When the clover had grown too rank for food, they substituted young tule roots; they also lived on seeds, bugs, frogs, non-poisonous snakes and grasshoppers. This insect was considered quite a delicacy, as they would roast them, mash them into a paste and mix with other edible foods. Their staple foods were fish, seeds and acorns; the latter they obtained in great abundance in the fall of the year. The acorns were ground to a powder in their mortars and made into bread. They obtained plenty of fish during low water, the streams abounding in salmon, perch and sturgeon; the last named fish were plentiful in the Mokelumne River and salmon in the San Joaquin. They shot these big fish with their bows and arrows, speared them with long, sharp-pointed poles, and were quite dexterous in catching them by hand. Although as a rule too lazy to hunt for large game the braves would occasionally go out and kill rabbits, birds and squirrels, and sometimes a deer or antelope, with their bows and arrows. They never molested a grizzly bear, says Carson, and at the sight of a bear they quickly hid from sight. When the fish and acorns were the most plentiful, namely in the fall of the year, they would have a big feast. It continued for several days, during that time they would gorge themselves with food until they became torpid.

For some unknown reason the grizzly always had it in for the Indian, says James A. Carson, from whom much information was obtained regarding the custom and habits of the tribes. When a bear was seen by a white man, if not wounded by a bullet, he would immediately run away. But when the grizzly met the Indian Mr. Lo would immediately turn and escape, if possible, for bruin invariably followed after him. Hundreds of Indians have been killed by bears.

The Indian in his physical appearance, like the Chinese and Japanese, seemed to have no distinctive feature, to the average white man. They all looked alike, were scarcely more than five feet, eight inches in height and a man over six feet in height was a wonder. Bancroft in describing them said they had "a low retreating forehead, black, deep set eyes, thick bushy eyebrows, high cheek bones, a nose depressed at the roots, and wide-spread at the nostrils. They had a large mouth with projecting lips, large white teeth, ears and hands and large, flat feet." They had great strength, according to a pioneer writer, and it was astonishing to see the loads they could carry without tiring.

Indian Wikiups

In this mild, equable climate of San Joaquin almost any kind of a shelter was sufficient during the winter months. One should remember also, that the winter climate then was much milder than at the present time, for the thick forest of trees tempered the cold wintry blasts, and the warm weather was modified by the same means. During the summer, according to Carson, their wikiups were built of the flimsiest material and with the smallest amount of labor. They consisted of a number of long poles fastened together at the top with grapevines or willow branches and covered with grass or tules. In Winter the outside of the huts were plastered with wet, soft adobe which dried and hardened in the sun. A large hole was made in the top of the hut to permit the passage of smoke and then fires were built inside. In these habitations lived the entire family, until compelled to move out because of the filth and vermin. Then the wikiup was set on fire and burned to the ground and a new shelter constructed. So filthy and beastly were the Indians that the remains of food and other refuse was permitted to accumulate around their huts until the stench was something horrible. Carson said, "They were in the scale of life so low, that there was but little difference between them and a grizzly bear, their superiority consisting in the fact that they could build a fire and talk." Otherwise they lived on the same kinds of food and their habits were similar to that of bruin.

The dress of the maids of the forest and the young braves was ever the same. No change of the fashion worried their minds nor the minds of their fathers as to their extravagance in costumes. The women wore a short apron suspended from their waist made of tule or grass. They were in the fashion of 1920, short below and short above. For additional warmth in winter they wore over their shoulders a short fur cape made of rabbit skins. The men during the summer months were naked and in winter they also wore a mantle of the skin of some fur-bearing animal. We may think that with so little clothing they suffered greatly with cold during the winter months, but such was not the case. They were the sons of Nature, hardened from birth to their surrounding conditions. There was much good sense in the reply of an Indian to General Marino Valjeo on one occasion when the general asked a naked Indian, "Are you not cold?" "No," replied the brave. "Why are you not cold?" Said the Indian, "Is your face cold?" "Not at all," replied the General. And the Indian came back, "Indian all face."

Courtship and Marriage

Among the Indians there were no long days of courtship, or uncertainties and palpitating hearts. With the young brave, it was like many in the present generation, a matter of business. How much is she worth, not in money but as a laborer. When he wanted a wife, he watched her carefully and observed the young maiden who was the most industrious in gathering acorns or in digging edible roots; one also who could carry heavy loads. When the young Indian had made his selection, he went to the chief and stated that he wanted the maiden for his "helpmate." The consent of the chief must always be obtained and seldom did he refuse to grant the "marriage permission." This was all the marriage ceremony necessary. The girl could refuse to live with the young man, but she was severely punished, because she became the common property of the tribe. Sometimes the buck desired the maid of another tribe, and if the chief would not give his consent, he would lie in ambush and kidnap the sweetheart of his desires. This was a cause of war between the two tribes. It is recorded that on one occasion, like the Trojans of old, the two tribes fought for twenty years over a dark-hued Helen. An Indian could divorce his wife; it required neither judge or a lawyer. It was just as easy as many of the divorces of to-day; it was only necessary for the husband to drive his wife out of the wikiup. Adultery on the part of the woman was always a cause of divorce. The woman could have but one husband; the man could have as many wives as he could feed and shelter.

Supporting a wife was easy, for the position of the woman was one of degradation and drudgery, as they were nothing more than slaves. They were compelled to cook the food, gather all of the firewood, and carry heavy loads. There was no release from the household drudgery, even though the woman had a young baby to care for. The papoose she carried upon her back in a basket suspended from her head by deer thongs; and the master, what did he? He lay around the wikiup, mending his bows and arrows, nets and fish-hooks—a Herculean task.

Form of Government

The tribes were governed by chiefs and sub-chiefs, who had full control and authority respecting their tribes. Each tribe had what was known as a "captain chief" and each family and their relatives were under the authority of a sub-chief, he being subject to the captain chief. The tepee of the captain chief was much larger than that of his tribe, and if the wikiups were erected in a circle his hut occupied the center of the circle. Considerable dignity was given to him and his family, they were treated with the greatest respect. After his death his widow and daughters were considered as Indians of nobility, and they were not compelled to labor as were the women of the common people. A kind of aristocracy was prevalent even among the uncivilized race. The chieftaincy among the sub-chiefs was hereditary along the male line. At the father's death, the eldest son succeeded him. Sometimes, however, the son would be deprived of his rightful authority, as the captain chief would appoint to the office some favorite son, because of some exploit or bravery in a horse-stealing expedition.

Famous Chiefs

In civilized life a man may be famous among his relatives and friends and yet be a nonentity to the general public. So was it among the Indian tribes. An Indian chief was famous in his tribe although he did nothing to win either fame or glory. The only chiefs of any renown, so far as the writings show, were Estanislao and José Jesus. Two of the chiefs of the La-las tribe were named Ah-a-moon and Al-no; the tribe itself was so few in number that in 1879 three only were living, a mother, son and daughter. The chiefs of the Ya-che-kum-na were many in number, for it was a large tribe. Their last big muck-a-muck was Mauries-to, and he was described by an Indian who knew him as a tall, powerfully-built man. His rancheria was near the present site of Stockton. Al-wi-no was the last big gun of the Ma-cha-kos tribe; he was said to be about six feet four inches and lived to be eighty years of age. The Mok-el-kos considered their tribe as the aristocrats of the California tribes, because of the fact that a large number of them were christianized by the Franciscan fathers. Although calling themselves Christians or "gente de reason" (Indians of reason), "they kept up their monthly feasts and dances," says Gilbert, "and invoked the spirits to crown the seasons with plentiful crops of ground nuts, and an abundance of game. Their medicine men performed their incantations to pacify the evil spirits, ward off pestilence and disease and to heal the sick. Their prophets and seers orated on the traditions, past prowess and glories of the tribe, and forecast the horoscope of the future." Their last great prophet and seer, Mau-ritz, was said to have lived to be 115 years of age; he was seven feet in height and at that age stalwart and imposing. A pioneer in speaking of this chief at the age of ninety years, says, "I thought him the most remarkable Indian I had ever seen—tall, handsome, graceful, and well-timed in his actions, with a well-formed head; he was the beau ideal, an impassioned orator, and he had a magical influence over his hearers." The last chief of the Ya-che-kum-na tribe was old Manuel. L. C. Branch in writing of the old chief in 1881, said, "He was a large, fleshy Indian, had rather an intelligent look and when taken, all in all, was much superior to the average among his tribe. He had several wives and a pretty daughter. She decorated herself with feathers and beads, had a pleasant look, and always carried a plate which she passed around and took up a collection. By this device the Indians were enabled to gather together enough money to buy whisky sufficient to keep them drunk for a week or two. They all drank, and when the law prohibited the selling of liquor to Indians and the whites refused to let them have it, they managed to procure it from the Chinese store keepers. When drunk they would fight amongst themselves and beat their women unmercifully."

Estanislao, the Warrior Chief

This chief was one of the historical figures of California, for after him was named the Stanislaus River, because of the fact that on that river he defeated and completely routed the Spanish soldiers in command of General Mariano Vallejo, he being the Government's best fighter. Estanislao had been one of the Indians at the San Jose Mission, had there been educated, was a man naturally bright and therefore far more intelligent than the average Indian. The Indians in all of the missions were deprived of their freedom, and upon every opportunity they ran away and re-joined their native tribes. Estanislao succeeded in escaping and he became the chief of the Si-yak-um-nas. His confinement in the Mission San Jose had not increased his admiration of the Spaniards nor the Mission fathers and he hated them with all of the hatred of an Indian.

The Indians loved good eating when they could get it, and they were especially fond of horse meat. Frequently they would make a raid on the mission stock and steal a band of horses. To stop these raids so far as possible, the Government sent out expeditions to punish the thieves. All prisoners were driven into the missions and there attempts made to christianize them. In one of these expeditions, that of 1829, Lieutenant Alfred Sanchez was sent out with a company of forty men, well armed, to rout Estanislao. He found the Indians fortified in a thick wood on the Stanislaus River. Sanchez made an attack but was defeated, with the loss of two soldiers killed and eight wounded. The Indians' loss was one killed and eleven wounded. Sanchez, unable to drive out the Indians from their stronghold, returned to San Jose.

The Government now concluded to send out their best general, who had just come back from a victorious battle, having routed and killed forty-eight "braves" in the "Valle de los Tulares." Vallejo, marching from San Jose Mission, on arriving at the San Joaquin River, was immediately greeted with a shower of arrows from the Indians in their stronghold. Crossing the river, Vallejo soon learned that he could not drive the Indians from their fort and he commanded his men to set the willows on fire. The Indians were driven out, several of them being killed, but the following day, from a heavily wooded thicket near the Arroyo Seco, they again challenged Vallejo to fight. The General now tried to parley with them, but they would neither compromise nor surrender. The soldiers then made another attack bringing into action a small cannon which they had brought with them. The fight continued during the day, the Indians slowly retreating to a series of earth trenches they had thrown up. Before night the Indians had badly wounded eight more soldiers, and his ammunition giving out, Vallejo was compelled to cease fighting. The following morning Vallejo returned to the Mission. As he had not accomplished the object of his expedition, the defeat and the destruction of the tribe, his work was a complete failure due to the bravery of Estanislao. Now comes the result of this battle, unimportant as it may appear to the reader, the Indians fought so bravely they cowed the Spaniards, and from that time they dare not invade this section of the valley.

José Jesus, the White Man's Friend

After the death of Estanislao, José Jesus became the chief of the Si-yak-um-na tribe. He was an Indian over six feet in height, well built, clean in his person, proud and dignified in manner. He had been educated at the San Jose Mission and at one time was alcalde—the peace officer—of San Jose. He usually dressed in the gala-day attire of a Spanish grandee with a cotton shirt, and trousers, calzonazos, sash, serape and sombrero, and created quite a stunning appearance. He was a bitter enemy to the Spaniards, and never would he smoke the pipe of peace with them. He believed that he had been wronged by the mission fathers and on one occasion he made a raid on the mission stock and drove away over one thousand horses to his mountain home where they were killed for food. When Captain Weber located on the Campo de los Franceses he sent for José Jesus and made a treaty with his tribe to keep peace with the white men, and never afterward did José Jesus or any of his tribe violate that treaty. After the arrival of the "gold seekers" the chief, like many of the whites, would get on a glorious "jag." And on one occasion while at Knights Ferry, he engaged in a quarrel with a white man, who shot and badly wounded the chief. Captain Weber, learning of the wounding of his Indian friend, engaged Dr. William M. Ryer, a surgeon, to attend José Jesus. The Indian recovered and Captain Weber paid the surgeon $500 for his services. A few years later, in another fight, the chief was killed, however the tribe remained friendly to the whites because of the treaty and quite a number of them were employed by Captain Weber as vaqueros.

The Indian's Religion

Going ahead of our story about ten years we will return to the Indians of San Joaquin as seen by the first arrivals in the valley. In regard to their religion, James H. Carson says they had "no idea of a Supreme Being, and when questioned upon that subject would grin and shake their heads." The only faith in which they believed was necromancy, and their medicine men performed incantations to ward off evil spirits and to heal the sick. They regarded any mysterious act as something supernatural. Their religious belief seems to have been different in different parts of the county for, says another writer, they had a belief that the good would inherit eternal life and the bad would forever die. They believed a good chief was especially honored in the happy hunting ground. After death "his heart went up among the stars, to enlighten the earth, and the heavens were ablaze with the hearts of departed good Indians."

The Indian Sweat House

Poor Lo had no cure for disease except incantations and the sweat house. The sweat house seems to have been the universal remedy for the cure of disease among all of the Indians of the coast. One California writer in his book, "What we can learn from the Indians," tells of his being nearly roasted in a Southern California sweat house. The tribes were located at all times in the vicinity of a stream of water, and the sweat house was built on the bank of the channel. Sometimes the house was made of willow poles placed in a circular shape and plastered with soft earth, and again they would make it by digging a large hole in the earth and making it air tight. When they wished to use the sweat house the Indians would build a large fire in it, and the patient or patients would enter the place, close the entrance and there remain until they were perspiring freely, then running out they plunged into the cold water. It was a kill or cure remedy every time. If the patient was cured they praised the sweat house and if he died they said he was possessed of an evil spirit.

There came a time when no sweat house was large enough to hold those stricken with disease, for a pestilence swept over the land. De Mofras, the great French scientist and traveler, tells of a scourge, the cholera, that swept the valley in 1824, and it carried off 12,000 of the Indians of this valley and county. Two years later a fever broke out among the Indians of the Sacramento Valley and 8,000 died.

James J. Warner, the trapper, traveling over the county in 1832 said, "On no part of the continent on which I had then, or since traveled, was so numerous a population subsisting upon the natural products of the soil and waters as in the valleys of the San Joaquin and Sacramento. On our return late in the summer of 1833 we found the valleys depopulated. From the head of the Sacramento River to the great bend of the San Joaquin we did not see more than six or eight live Indians; while large numbers of their skulls and dead bodies were to be seen under almost every shade tree, near water, where the uninhabited and deserted villages had been converted into graveyards; and, on the San Joaquin River, in the immediate neighborhood of the larger class of villages, which the preceding year were the adobes of a large number of those Indians, we found not only many graves but the vestiges of funeral pyres."

Traveling on to Kings River, the trappers found a large number of live Indians but the plague was there, and Mr. Warner, continuing his account of that terrible period, said, "We were encamped near the village one night only and during that time the death angel passing over the camping ground of the plague-stricken fugitives, waved his wand, summoning from the little remnant of a once numerous people, a score of victims to muster into the land of 'Manitou,' and the cries of the dying, mingled with the wails of the bereaved, made the night hideous, in the veritable valley of death."

Disposal of Their Dead

According to authorities the Indians seemed to have practiced cremation, and also the burial of bodies in mounds of the earth. Colonel F. T. Gilbert says, "The Indians bury their dead, bestrewing their graves with beads and shells. Along the Mokelumne River in 1879 there were a large number of mounds in which the Indians declared the dead were buried who had died during the plague." On Roberts Island, at one time on the ranch of Joseph Hale, a large mound was discovered containing a large number of skeletons. They were the bones of bucks, squaws and papooses together mingled in one mound. In the burial, the body of a chief was placed in a sitting position with his face to the east to await the rising sun. Their weapons, charms and tools, such as they possessed, were buried with the male Indians. Indian mounds were found in many places around Stockton, and on February 8, 1862, the Stockton Independent said, "Captain Hayes and Ben Sanborn yesterday made a trip down the channel where an old Indian burial ground had been discovered, the flood having washed the earth from several of the graves. The parties dug up several skulls and bones beads, arrow heads and ornaments and brought them to this city. The curiosities may be seen in the rooms of the Natural History Society in the Agricultural Society rooms." Many years later, public school superintendents, J. A. Barr and Edward Hughes, found many articles that told of the history of the Indians.

That it was the custom of some of the Indians to burn their dead is undoubtedly true, as two such cremations were witnessed by James C. Carson and L. C. Branch. Mr. Carson wrote, "The first of these funerals which I noticed was on the Cosumnes River. The rancharia, to which the deceased belonged, was a large one, situated in a beautiful valley from which arose tall pines, whose spear tops formed a canopy above; around it arose high and rugged hills that gradually rounded until their tops were topped by the everlasting snows, and through it moved the crystal waters of a fine creek. The scene in all was beautiful. On a clear piece of ground a vast heap of dry wood was placed on which the dead was to be laid and consumed. The sun had set and night was drawing her sable mantle over the earth, when the entire tribe began chanting unearthly incantations around the fires of their huts, and they so continued until darkness had completely enveloped the scene. Then arose a hideous scream out of the hut of the departed that was answered by every one in the camp—torches were lighted and by their glare the corpse was borne to the funeral pyre. The body was placed on top of it and more dry wood heaped around. Then came the wild chant, an incantation for the dead. The chief applied the first torch to the pile and in a moment it blazed forth in a hundred places. The forked flames that enveloped the body shot up among the tall pines and lighted up the shadows. When the body had become charred by the fire the Indians with sharp pointed poles would stir up the body to aid the fire in its work of destruction, and amidst the howling of the Indians the work was continued until the body was consumed." The burial customs of the Indians did not change for Branch relates a funeral which he saw at Knights Ferry, when a boy, twenty years later than the one described by Carson. "The funeral of a chief," he says, "was attended with more ceremony than that of the common Indian and the whole village was thrown into mourning, which continued for several days. In preparing the body for burning it was decorated with feathers, beads and flowers, and after remaining in state a few days was conveyed to the funeral pyre. The flowers, feathers and beads, in fact everything belonging to the dead chief was burned with him amidst the howls and lamentations of the tribe."

When a male Indian died there was howling and wailing in the rancharia for several days. "If the dead were a chief," says Miss Ellen C. Weber, "the marriageable maids daubed upon their foreheads and cheeks a kind of grease composed of ashes and pitch and day and night they howled the wailing cadence, hoo-ah-hoo, hoo-ah-who." Branch says the mourning grease was composed of the ashes from the pyre and it was mixed with pitch brought from the mountains for mourning purposes. The stuff was permitted to remain until it wore off. During the period of mourning the widow's person was held sacred, and she was exempt from all manner of work or drudgery. Branch in boyhood lived near the Indian rancharia at Knights Ferry and he declares that the Indians held an annual dance of mourning, at which time the most lamentable groans and howls were kept up by the entire rancharia. "We heard them frequently clear across the river and it seems as if they kept it up all night."

In the days of the Indian the Calaveras River was full of fish, and the beautiful oaks along its banks yielded an immense harvest of acorns, consequently it was a very desirable tract of land. At one period there was a scarcity of food and the Si-yak-um-na tribe, encroaching upon the territory claimed by the Ya-che-kos, a big battle took place in which many warriors were killed. Neither side made any attempt to bury their dead and the skeletons lay for many years bleaching in the sun. After a long period of time, a Spaniard named Jose Noriega, passing over the country, camped one night on the bank of the river, where the bloody battle had been fought. He was much surprised on arising the following morning to find that he had been resting among hundreds of human bones and skulls. Because of this fact he named it Calaveras, a Spanish word meaning "place of skulls." Some time previous to the naming of the place by Noriega, the Hudson Bay Company, in making a map of the place for trapping purposes, gave it the name of Wine Creek, because of the wild grapevines growing along its banks.

At one time the sole owners of North America, the American Indian is practically extinct. Here in California, before the arrival of their white destroyers, they numbered, it was estimated, about one hundred thousand. Trappers said there were in this section about ten thousand papooses, squaws and bucks. Driven out of the county by the white settlers they retired to the mountains and a little directory published in 1852, said, "Soon after the white faces appeared on the river (the San Joaquin) their numbers were thinned, and the remnant of the tribe removed to the wild country of the coast range." It was the custom of the chiefs, however, after C. M. Weber settled upon this grant, to pay that gentleman an annual visit and to give and receive presents, and the reciprocation, on the part of that gentleman of kindnesses, generated a feeling of respect toward him. These visits had been discontinued for three years, but on January 10, 1852, the remnant of the tribe again appeared on the levee opposite Mr. Weber's residence. Ten families only were left of the Sivak-um-nas. In that year a state census was taken by legislative law, and the Indians in San Joaquin County at that time numbered, male and female, 293, and 158 of them were over twenty-one years of age. According to this report 40 of the number located on a rancheria at Athearn's Ferry, and fifty-five at Staples Ferry on the Mokelumne River; about twenty at Doak & Bonsell's Ferry, San Joaquin River, and 275 at Dent and Valentine's Ferry, near Knights Ferry. The poor unfortunate Indians were treated by the brutal white men as outcasts and unworthy even of humane treatment. They were shot and killed upon the slightest provocation, and frequently used as targets, were shot down in cold blood. Their women and children were outraged and they had no redress, even in the courts.

A Brutal Law

To crown it all, the legislature of 1852, passed a law "for the protection and government of the Indians." It declared that no Indian in a court of law could testify against a white man. An Indian convicted of stealing might be fined or punished by whipping not exceeding twenty-five lashes. In the light of today the reader may not see the sarcasm and brutality of that law. The whites took up all of the land and the Indians could obtain no food either from the land or water. If they stole food they were punished by fine or whipping, if they could not obtain money to pay a fine, and cruel brutes took great delight in laying on the lash. But that was not all of those humane laws passed by a pro-slavery legislature. An Indian arrested as a "vagrant" was put up at auction by the justice of the peace and sold to the highest bidder, and he was compelled to work for his master for a term not exceeding four months.

The Barr Collection

The following paper gives a very interesting and exhaustive account of the implements of the California Indians. It was written by James A. Barr of Stockton, who is an expert on Indian relics, having made it a study for many years.

The Barr Collection comprises nearly 4000 pieces of "finds." It is the result of twenty-eight years' work in studying and exploring the archaeological field in that State. While the collection illustrates the various sections of the State, by far the greater part was secured in the great valleys of Central California.

In the northern part of the State the aborigines were modified by contact with tribes from Oregon while in Southern California they were modified in a more pronounced way by tribes from Nevada, Arizona and Mexico. In the great central region stretching for 150 miles from the Sierras to the Pacific and from the northern to the Southern points of the San Joaquin-Sacramento Valley (a distance of about 400 miles), the typical California Indian was developed. This large territory comprising about three-fourths of the State has been neglected for the most part by collectors. It is practically unknown in the literature of archaeology. Even the Government Reports devote themselves mainly to the Channel Islands and to other parts of the southern California section.

Climate and environment combined to make the Central California region an ideal home for the Indian. The many rivers and channels were filled with fish and mussels. Water fowl swarmed in countless thousands. Elk, antelope and deer were plentiful. The native California oak furnished a yearly supply of acorns. With such a varied and unailing food supply, with a mild climate, and protected by mountain ranges for the most part from the incursions of the tribes to the north, east and south, the Indians of the great Central California region developed through generations a culture peculiarly their own. With a constant food supply and with little need for war, they had ample time for the manufacture of implements representing the highest type of Indian workmanship. Many distinctive forms in obsidian, stone, bone, shell and clay were developed in this favored region.

The Barr collection represents the exploration of more than 300 village and camp sites since 1878. It is the largest and most representative collection of Indian antiquities from the Central California region yet assembled, or that, in all probability, could be assembled at this late day. The collection has been carefully catalogued, the catalogue giving all available data for each "find." Something over a year of such time as could be spared was taken in reducing the field notes to catalogue form.

In the catalogue 2401 numbers are used. In many cases one number represents a large number of implements or ornaments. In many instances a "find" is given a catalogue number, the facts recorded and the implements and ornaments stored in boxes for a closer classification in the future. The collection includes fully 1,000 feet of beads or "wampum" (bone, shell and stone). With the exception of a few unique specimens, all beads are numbered by "finds." For instance No. 231 is a string of thirteen feet found with one skeleton.

OBSIDIAN CUTTING, OR CEREMONIAL KNIVES—BARR'S COLLECTION, STOCKTON, CALIFORNIA

The collection is rich in obsidian implements—curves, arrow-points, spear-heads, knives and drills. It is doubtful if any obsidian implements in the world exceed in beauty of workmanship the "Stockton curves." There are 158 of these curves in the collection. The Smithsonian Collection has six. So far as known no other collection has a single specimen. Dr. W. H. Holmes of the Smithsonian Institution after studying the Barr Collection in Stockton said of these curves, "Implements of this class may have been used for cutting or sawing, but obsidian is so brittle and fragile that it hardly seems possible, unless used on comparatively soft material. These curves are peculiar to Central California."

These curves vary from $\frac{3}{16}$ to $4\frac{1}{2}$ inches in length. A few are without serrations. Some are serrated on the convex edge; some on the concave edge; some on both edges. Most of them are notched as if for a handle. A few are double curves; in two the outer edges form a right angle and the inner the segment of a circle. Three are of soapstone while all others are of black obsidian.

Bone implements are especially numerous on the Pacific Coast. Those from Central California have a much better appearance than those from the Islands and other parts of the southern section of the State. The bleached and weathered appearance of the latter is replaced in the former by a smooth, finished surface, yellowed or browned with age. On some pieces a remarkable high polish remains. Among the bone implements in the Barr Collection are awls or perforators, whistles from $1\frac{1}{4}$ to $9\frac{3}{8}$ inches in length, game bones, nose and hair pins, knives, daggers, spears or harpoons, scrapers, flakers, root-diggers, fish hooks or fish-hook shaped ornaments, etc. A few of these implements are etched or engraved.

The aborigines of Central California were profuse in their use of shells for purposes of ornament. The number and variety of shell ornaments found in the burial places of this section are probably unequaled by any other part of America. Three varieties of shells were most in use—the mussel, the abalone and the olive. Besides fully a thousand feet of beads (mostly shell), the collection comprises every variety of shell ornament from the simple square bangle to the carved, etched and polished gorget.

A form peculiar to the Central California region is the so-called "pottery ball." With the exception of a brief reference in one of the later Smithsonian reports, they have never been figured or described. They were doubtless used to take the place of rocks (which were scarce in the valleys) in slings or in cooking. The collection shows these "pottery balls" in all shapes and sizes. Some are crudely fashioned from clay, in instances showing the imprint of the hands. Some are globular or cylindrical; others are bell-shaped, spool-shaped, pestle-shaped, cone-shaped, cup-shaped, etc., etc. Some are ornamented—one with triangles, others with lines or dots, thumb nail markings, etc.

Among the stone implements in the collection are mortars, pestles, boat-shaped vessels, steatite jars and dishes, metates, grinders, rubbing stones, cup-stones, pipes, plummets of "medicine stones," perforated stones and discs, hammer-heads, grooved stones, labrets, etc., etc. Pipes are unusually scarce in the Central California district. In twenty-eight years but 21 have been found, varying in length from $1\frac{1}{4}$ to $8\frac{3}{4}$ inches. The collection includes one clay pipe, most of the 21, however, being made of steatite. The 57 "plummets" or "medicine-stones" in the collection include many fine pieces, fine in workmanship, form and material. Among the 60 mortars and 194 pestles are all types found in the region. Among the pestles are 38 of the rare "phallic" form, representing many distinctive types.

CHAPTER III.

THE DAWN OF CIVILIZATION

The first white man to enter the San Joaquin Valley, so far as known, was Lieutenant Gabriel Moraga, who left the Mission San Jose September 21, 1806, says Doris West Bepler, for the purpose of exploring the interior lands for suitable locations for missions, and to gain information about the Indians, and establish friendly relations with them. No missions were founded east of the Coast Range, and Moraga came no nearer to San Joaquin County than Dos Palos, near the junction of the Merced and San Joaquin rivers. Our interest in the man lies in the fact that he named the San Joaquin River, although he was not the discoverer.

Cowper in one of his poems sings, "God moves in a mysterious way His wonders to perform," and who would have ever dreamed that the little beaver, otter and raccoon would be the means by which the entire Pacific Coast would be discovered and explored. The interior was immensely rich in fur-bearing animals, and twenty years after Moraga's discovery of the valley, English and American hunters and trappers were moving up and down the San Joaquin and the Sacramento rivers and their tributaries in search of these animals. The first of these trappers to cross the Sierras was Jedediah Smith. As early as 1825 he entered the San Joaquin Valley, in command of a company of hunters, trapping along the rivers during that season, he then traveled to Oregon. In the fall of 1832, Ewing Young led a company of men to this part of the valley. One of his party was James Warner, whom I have quoted in regard to the Indians. The trappers in which we are directly interested are those of the great English corporation, the Hudson Bay Company. We are the most interested in them, for we know positively that they trapped beaver in this county at Castoria, the beaver settlement.

The Hudson Bay Company with their California headquarters at Yerba Buena, later called San Francisco, and their nearest outpost French Camp, trapped in this county during the seasons from 1828 until 1845, under the leadership of John McLeod. Later he became a warm friend of Captain Weber, and in his honor McLeod's Lake was named. Following McLeod, other trapping parties were sent down from Fort Vancouver led by Mr. Ogden, Michael La Framboisé and John Ermientinger. The trappers were principally French Canadians, and as many as 400 men have been located at French Camp at one time. Hence the title which gave name to the locality—French Camp—and to the Weber land grant, "El campo de los Franceses"—the camp of the Frenchmen.

The Trail of John C. Fremont

While those Englishmen were located at French Camp, and their government had in view occupation and future possession of the western coast, John C. Fremont was sent out by the United States Government with the same ideas as those of England. This, however, is state, not county, history and we will confine our record to Fremont's journey across the county and his description of it, in March, 1844. Then on his journey to the East he left Sutter's Fort, and traveling south, he wrote, March 25, in his diary, "We traveled for twenty-eight miles over the same delightful country as yesterday, and halted in a beautiful bottom at the ford of the Rio de los Moke-lumnes, receiving its name from another Indian tribe living on the river. The bottoms of the stream are broad, rich, and extremely fertile; and the uplands are shades with oak groves. On the 26th we halted at the Arroyo de los Calaveras (skull creek), a tributary of the San Joaquin. The place is beautiful, with open groves of oaks, and a grassy sward beneath, with many plants in bloom, some varieties of which seem to love the shade of trees." After crossing the Calaveras at a point where now stands the Lockeford post road concrete bridge, he continues, "March 27, today we traveled steadily and rapidly up the valley making about four miles an hour." Arriving at the locality near the present city of Stockton he wrote, "During the earlier part of the day our ride had been over a very level part of prairie, separated by lines and groves of oak timber, growing along dry gullies, which are filled with water in seasons of rain; and perhaps also by the melting snows. Over much of this extent the vegetation was sparse, the surface showing plainly the action of water, which in the season of flood the San Joaquin spreads over the valley." Then leaving the adobe soil and entering the "sand plains," as it was called in early days, he says, "At one o'clock we came upon innumerable flowers, and a few miles further fields of the beautiful blue flowering lupin, which seems to love the neighborhood of water, indicating that we were approaching a stream. We continued our road for about half a mile, interspersed by an open grove of live oaks, which in form were the most symmetrical and beautiful we had ever seen in the country. The ends of the branches rested on the ground, forming somewhat more than a half sphere of regular figure with leaves apparently smaller than usual." Fremont at this time was at French Camp, as he describes the oaks as they were on the banks of that stream. "The California poppy of a rich orange color, was numerous. Today elk and several bands of antelope made their appearance." Fremont was not only a lover of flowers and plants, but he also had an appreciation of God's own country, for riding on he wrote, "Our road was now one continued enjoyment, and it was pleasant riding among this assemblage of green pastures with varied flowers and scattered groves, and out of the warm green spring to look at the rocky and snowy peaks. Emerging from the timber we came suddenly upon the Stanislaus River." As this river forms the southern boundary line between Stanislaus and San Joaquin counties, we must bid good bye to Captain Fremont, to meet him again in 1856 as the first Republican nominee for President.

First Family in San Joaquin

Two years before Fremont, going south across this county, admired its beauty, another man riding north about the same time of year so admired its beauty and commercial location that he resolved to possess it. As his story continues through many years we must pass it at present and record the short but tragic account of David Kelsey's wife and children. Kelsey crossed the plains in 1843 with the Applegate family, who traveled on to Oregon. Kelsey moved south and he was met at the Cosumnes River by William Gulnac, who was endeavoring to induce immigrants to locate on the Weber grant. He offered Kelsey a square mile of land if the family settled in El Campo de los Franceses. He accepted the offer and Kelsey, his wife, little America, Josephine and Elisabeth, camped at French Camp in August, 1844. It was a lonely spot, the only neighbors the Indians and the only house within a distance of thirty miles was Lindsay's tule hut at Stockton. Gulnac presented Kelsey a small swivel cannon and every evening the gun was fired to frighten away the Indians. A tule house was erected. Late in the summer their provisions ran low and for two months the family lived on milk, boiled wheat and mint teas made from leaves gathered along the bank of French Camp slough. Then burying the small cannon the family moved on to San Jose to obtain provisions and remain during the winter. In the spring of 1845 a part of the family rode back to the grant, Josephine and Elisabeth remaining in San Jose. A few weeks after their return to French Camp, Mr. Kelsey was taken sick and his wife, packing up the family goods, started for Sutter's Fort to obtain medical aid. On arrival at Lindsay's hut he persuaded Mrs. Kelsey to remain over night, stating that his partner, Jim Williams, could cure Mr. Kelsey. He gave the sick man a dose of medicine and the following morning he was broken out with that dreaded disease, smallpox, having caught the disease at the pueblo San Jose while visiting a sick Indian. Immediately Lindsay and Williams fled from the camp for they had a mortal fear of the disease. Thousands of Indians had died of it, and Captain Sutter had threatened to shoot any man arriving at the fort with the disease. It was a brutal command but in the wilderness without physicians, medicines and the comforts necessary for the sick, harsh measures were necessary. The family left alone, were compelled to do the best thing possible under the conditions. In a few days the mother took the disease and became blind and little America, then but eleven years old, was compelled to act as nurse. Three weeks later the father died. Fortunately for the little girl a party of traders camped that night near the family. The next morning one of the traders, Geo. Wyman, assisted little America in the burial of her father near McLeod's Lake, now the southwest corner of Fremont and El Dorado streets. There is often a happy ending to a tragedy, and some years later little America married George Wyman. At the time of Mr. Kelsey's death the elder daughters were in the pueblo of San Jose, where they became acquainted with Charles M. Weber. Some time later Josephine Kelsey married Grove Cook, who crossed the plains in the same party with Weber. After Cook's death she became the wife of Dr. Christopher Grattan and died August 15, 1854. Elisabeth married Mr. Buzzell in 1847, and while living at Tuleberg (Stockton), she gave birth to a girl, on September 9, 1848, named Elisabeth Agnes, and she was the first white child born in the town. She married Christopher Grattan, a nephew of Dr. Grattan, in March 1867. Her photograph, showing a fine-appearing woman wearing long curls, hung for many years in the ante room of the San Joaquin Pioneer Society.

Captain Charles M. Weber

The man who crossed San Joaquin County two years previous to John C. Fremont was Charles M. Weber, the founder of Stockton. In Hamburg, Germany, he was born February 14, 1814, the kingdom then having been conquered by Napoleon I of France. His father, a Protestant minister, was desirous of educating the boy for the ministry, but overtaxing his strength, he was compelled to leave school.

He then engaged in business. Although of Germany birth, he was not a believer in the European idea that kings ruled by divine right or that they were born to tyrannize over and enslave their people. He believed in the freedom of man and his thoughts were of the United States. Perhaps he obtained many of his ideas from his father, and it may have been that letters from his uncle, Judge Hilgard, had controlled his thoughts. Be that as it may, before he was twenty-one years of age he was planning to emigrate to the "land of the free." In the fall of 1836 with a companion he took passage on a sailing vessel for New Orleans, and a few weeks later he landed in the Crescent City.

Various incidents, among them the yellow fever, military life, fighting the Mexicans in Texas, and business engagements, kept him in the South until 1841, and in the spring of that year he concluded to pay his uncle a visit in Belleville, Ill. On arrival at St. Louis he found a very busy town and great excitement, for hundreds of emigrants and trappers were hastily making preparations for their long six-months journey to the Far West. St. Louis was their depot of supplies, the last place that they could get food before their march across the great desert and two lofty ranges of mountains. Young Weber, watching these caravans as they moved from the frontier town, talked with many of the men, and being fond of adventure and excitement, he concluded to defer the visit to his uncle and travel west. Most of the emigrating parties were on their way before the young man concluded to take the trip. He succeeded, however, in joining an expedition composed of three parties. One party was bound for Oregon; the second party, a company of Jesuit priests, were going to Idaho, there to carry on missionary work among the Indians. Weber joined the third party under the command of Capt. J. B. Bartleson. Included in the company was Josiah Belding, later judge of Santa Clara County; John Bidwell, strong prohibitionist, farmer and politician, and Mrs. Benjamin, the first woman to cross the plains. Entering the San Joaquin Valley by way of Walker's Pass, they followed down the Stanislaus and San Joaquin rivers to Dr. John Marsh's rancho in Contra Costa County. Marsh, by letters to his Illinois friends, had told them of his location near the foot of Mt. Diablo. At this point the party separated.

Weber brought with him a letter of introduction to Capt. John A. Sutter of Sutter's Fort, and with a companion started horseback for the fort, Weber there expecting to obtain employment. Riding back up the river to a convenient point for crossing, they swam their horses over the San Joaquin River and soon arrived at the present site of Stockton. Weber, reining up his mustang, greatly admired the locality. The large forest of stately oaks; the virgin soil with grass knee high, the beautiful scenery, the deep clear waters flowing to the sea, and he resolved, if possible, to obtain possession of the land. Remaining at the fort one year, during which time he became acquainted with the Murphy family, and his future wife, who had just crossed the plains, he concluded to go to the pueblo of San Jose and engage in business.

Again crossing San Joaquin County, he had a greater admiration for it than upon his first visit and was more than ever before resolved to own the land. On arrival in San Jose in 1842 he formed a co-partnership with William Gulnac, a former resident of New York. And among his acquaintances he met the two Kelsey girls, and Miss Helen Murphy. Gulnac & Weber not only engaged in a general merchandising business, obtaining their goods from the merchant vessels that visited the coast, but they erected a flour mill run by water power, established a salt works and a boot and shoe factory. The partnership, however, lasted only a few months. In addition to his native tongue the young trader could fluently speak the French language and he now learned the Mexican dialect and became very friendly with the Mexicans. During the Mexican War, General Jose Castro offered to make Weber a captain of a native military company, but he quickly refused the offer for he had become naturalized and he believed to be an American citizen was the highest honor that could be given him. Later he raised a company of mounted riflemen, and was elected captain; the San Jose riflemen were mustered in by a United States officer and they did splendid service in the conquest of California.

El Campo de los Franceses

Captain Weber was a far-sighted, clear-headed man and he had a vision of a city of considerable commercial importance at the head of the Stockton Channel. It was a good location for a trading post, as all of the travel between San Jose and Sutter's Fort was by the way of Stockton. All of the immigrants entering California by the northern route were compelled to pass this way in traveling to the settlement. In his business transactions, the captain frequently met La Framboisé, the French Canadian leader and Ermientinger, another Hudson Bay Company manager, and both advised Weber to settle near French Camp, because they considered it exceedingly advantageous for a settlement. The obtaining of a grant of land at that time was easy, for the Mexican government was giving free of cost grants of land to native born or naturalized citizens, hundreds of citizens renouncing their country and obtaining land. Weber, however, was not of that stripe, but shrewd and sharp, he concluded to get the land through Gulnac, who was a naturalized citizen, had married a Mexican wife and was the father of seven children. Gulnac could obtain the land for himself and family, and Weber requested him to obtain the grant of land known in general terms as the Camp of the Frenchmen. After the land was obtained Weber was to have one-half of it. A petition dated June 14, 1843, was drawn up in due form to "His Excellency, the Governor of the Department of Both Californias," granting to Guillermo Gulnac and family the land known as El Campo de los Franceses, which by the bounds selected contained about 48,747 acres. Gulnac, taking the petition, started out to find the Governor, Manuel Micheltorena, to obtain his signature. He found the Governor on his way, the trail between Monterey and Sutter's Fort. The Governor without any hesitation signed the petition. He then directed Gulnac to go to the "Prefecture of the First District and obtain his signature showing that the land is not occupied by any person." Sutter, who was a naturalized Mexican, readily signed the petition. It was also signed by Prefecture Jose Ramon Estrada, he having no objections. The Governor, on January 13, 1844, granted the eleven square leagues of land petitioned for by Gulnac. The grant was approved June 15, 1846, by the Mexican Departmental Assembly, then in session at Los Angeles. At the close of the Mexican War, California was ceded to the United States and Congress in May, 1852, sent a Board of Land Commissioners to California to quiet and perfect all perfect titles and reject all fraudulent claims. One of that board was Edward L. Stanton, Secretary of State during the Civil War. The board confirmed Weber's claim in May, 1855. The United States patent was granted to Captain Weber in February, 1861, by the United States Surveyor General, and March 18, 1861, it was approved and signed by the President, Abraham Lincoln. The President had never before seen such a large land grant and was very much surprised "at such a big farm."

Weber Makes a Treaty with the Indians

The Mexican government required all grantees to make a settlement upon their grant of at least twelve families within a year after the granting of the land. Captain Weber immediately began planning for a settlement. He thought it best, however, to do as Captain Sutter did at New Helvetia, make a treaty with the Indians of the county and thus prevent any attack upon the families of the grant. Having this object in view Weber again visited Sutter's Fort to see Jose Jesus, the captain of the tribes in this vicinity. On arrival at the fort the Indian captain was not there. A runner, however, was sent out to bring in the chief and arrange for a place of meeting. Jose Jesus soon arrived and a treaty was formed. The settlers were never molested so far as the first settlers were concerned, and the chief remained friendly up to the day of his death. Jose Jesus was something of a diplomat. He hated the Spaniards with a bitter hatred, and he believed in making the treaty of peace with the whites, they would assist him in his battles with the Spaniards. They assisted, but not as he anticipated, for in the Mitcheltorena and Mexican War, Jose Jesus and his tribe fought with the whites.

Indians Kill James Lindsay

Weber at this time had quite a large number of horses and cattle on his San Jose rancho, and he made arrangements to have them driven to the El Campo de los Franceses. The stock was driven to that place by Gulnac, his son Joseph, Peter Lassen, after whom Lassen County was named, together with several Mexican vaqueros. On arrival at the grant Gulnac intended to camp at Stockton. He found, however, that the Hudson Bay Company trappers had left French Camp for the season and, fearing the Indians, he moved on to the Cosumnes River. He would there be under the protection of the settlers living at Sutter's Fort against any Indian attacks. Gulnac then went on to the fort and Sutter gave Gulnac a swivel gun such as was used in the navy when they made an attack from small boats. The gun was not very destructive, but when fired it made a loud noise and answered every purpose by frightening the enemy. After the treaty of peace had been made the stock was driven back to the grant and a man named James Lindsay was placed in charge. He created a number of brush tents on the land now known as Lindsay's Point, and had as helpers a number of Mexican and Indian vaqueros. In some manner, perhaps from David Kelsey, the Indians in this vicinity were attacked by the smallpox and all of Lindsay's vaqueros fled to the Coast Range Mountains. Lindsay was left alone. Learning this, the Lo-lum-na Indians of Amador County, sweeping down from their mountain rancherias and killing Lindsay, set fire to all of the tents and drove all the stock to their retreat. They killed the animals for food.

A short time after this a party of settlers on their way from the Mitcheltorena War to Sutter's Fort passed this way. They expected to find Lindsay, the "major domo," as the Mexicans called him. But to their surprise they found the brush wood and tule huts in ashes and the overseer nowhere in sight. Surmising that he had been killed by Indians they began hunting around and soon found Lindsay's body floating in McLeod's Lake. Drawing the corpse to land they found it pierced with six arrows. The settlers buried the remains on the point that now bears his name. Riding on to the fort they reported the murder to Captain Sutter, who was at that time a Mexican civil official, "Prefecture of the First District." It was learned that the Polo Indians of Tuolumne County were the chief instigators of the murder, instead of the Lo-lum-nas. To punish the savages a company of settlers was organized. After a three weeks' journey, riding most of the time after dark, they discovered the tribe near the headwaters of the Tuolumne River. Employing their usual strategy in their Indian raids the settlers noiselessly approached the rancharia and just before dawn made their attack. The Indians were taken completely by surprise, and the 300 warriors fled up the mountain side firing back their arrows as they ran. The settlers killed many bucks, destroyed their wikipups and all of their supplies of food.

Gulnac Sells His Half of Grant

William Gulnac sold his half of the grant April 3, 1845, to Don Carlos Maria Weber, as he was called by the Mexicans, and the deed was signed by Gulnac's wife, Maria Isabel Cesena de Gulnac, and by each of her five children. Weber then planned Stockton for a stock ranch and rodeo ground. He formed on the grant five corrals, one at the Five Mile House, Lower Sacramento Road; one at the John Moore ranch, Calaveras River; the third on the Marsh ranch, now being sold in town lots; the fourth at French Camp, and the fifth at Weberville. The corral at the point last named was constructed and selected not only to confine the stock but to protect them from Indian raids. The place selected was at the point of the peninsula now known as Weber's Point. A fortification of oak trees was erected across the peninsula from Stockton Channel to Lindsay Channel, along what is now known as Center Street, and a wide ditch was cut on the outside of the stockade. Within the enclosure the best of the vaquero horses and 100 head of milch cows were driven each evening.

After the murder of Lindsay by the Indians, Weber's efforts to locate settlers was very discouraging, for the news of the murder was known throughout all of the pueblos. In the spring of 1846 he succeeded in getting Napoleon Schmidt and seven families to live at Weberville. Then came the Mexican War and everybody, fearing the wrath of the Mexicans, hastened to the pueblo of San Jose.

At the close of the war Captain Weber concluded to live at his new home. He again endeavored to get settlers to locate on the grant, and riding into the Sierras he met the incoming immigrants and tried to persuade them to locate here. As an inducement he offered to give them free of cost 160 acres of land and a lot in the town, but they laughed at the proposition, as they said the place was too far distant from the town, there was danger from Indian attacks and the land was of no value. One of the immigrants approached by Weber was John Doak, later one of the most enterprising of Stockton's citizens. Crossing the country in the fall of 1847, five months and seventeen days from Illinois, Weber met the party of 100 persons and thirty-seven wagons in the Sierras and tried to induce them to locate on his land. He agreed to give them 160 acres, but said Doak, "I would not give ten dollars for all the land between Stockton and Sacramento."

Tuleberg's First Inhabitants

At the close of the Mexican War Captain Weber again made an effort to settle up the grant. He was successful after considerable hard work and in the fall of 1847 the following immigrants, hunters and trappers located at Tuleberg: Andrew Baker, John Sirey, George Fraezer, P. B. Thompson, James McKee, Joseph Buzzell, Eli Randall, a clerk in Weber's store; Harry F. Fanning, a former sailor on the sloop Portsmouth, and William H. Fairchilds, who had just crossed the plains with the Nicholas Gann party. The party, on their arrival here en route to San Jose, camped on the peninsula for the night. Weber, however, persuaded them to remain throughout the winter. While here the wife of Nicholas Gann gave birth to a son, whom they named William. This was the first boy born in San Joaquin County. Colonel F. T. Gilbert, compiler of Thompson's San Joaquin history, says that about this time twins were born, a boy and a girl, to the wife of Turner Elder on Dry Creek; he also says that the first marriage in the county was that of Edward Robinson to Mrs. Christina Patterson, a widow then living at Dry Creek. Her husband died of fever while crossing the plains.

The people that were located on the grant gave Weber some hopes of a permanent settlement and he had the land surveyed and sectionized by Walter Herron, a deputy of Jasper O'Farrell, the surveyor of Yerba Buena (San Francisco). He also had surveyed into town lots a block of land on the south side of the channel, said block now lying between Main, Center, Levee and Commerce Streets. There the men lived in tule and brushwood tents. Whether they agreed to remain permanently and accept land from Captain Weber does not appear. We know, however, that Joe Buzzell was a permanent resident, and Carson in the spring of 1848 speaks of "Joe Buzzell's log cabin with a tule roof." He also received 160 acres of land that he selected on the north side of the Calaveras River. The land later passed into the hands of Jeremiah Sarles as a dairy ranch, John W. Moore being one of his employes. Then it was owned by John W. Doolley, the stage proprietor, and later by Henry Barnhart, who died a millionaire.

There were quite a number of immigrants who settled outside of the Weber grant and took up government land. They were Missourians, pro-slavery men who would accept no favors. Among the number were Dr. J. C. and James Isbel, who took up land in November, 1846, on the north and south side of the Calaveras River on what is now known as the Waterloo and Lockeford roads. It is stated that John C. Fremont camped under a tree at that point in 1844, and there crossed the river on his way south. Dr. Isbel erected a log cabin which stood on the place for over thirty years. In 1848 the doctor sold the ranch to a Mr. Hutchington and he in turn sold the land to Jonathan A. Dodge in 1858. The land is still in the possession of the children of the deceased pioneer. Turner Elder, his wife and three children, came into the county about the same time as the Isbels, November, 1846, erected a log cabin on Dry Creek and later the town of Liberty was there founded. Elder remained there about a year, then removed to the so-called "Benedict Rancho." Thomas Pyle and his family settled at what was later known as Staples Ferry on the Mokelumne River, but in 1848 they removed to San Jose. After Thomas Pyle left, the place was occupied by his brother, John F. Pyle, he and John W. Laird becoming partners. These two men sold to Staples, Nichols & Company in February, 1850, and then was established Staples Ferry. "Johnny" Laird, as he was familiarly called, remained with his family in this county until the early '60s. A strong secessionist, he then removed to Stanislaus County, where he could find company more congenial to his political ideas, and there became a prominent citizen of the county.

Indian Raids

The territorial and gold-seeking pioneers as a rule were not humanitarians in any sense of the word; they believed that "an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth" was the only prevention of crime. Death, they believed, was the only proper punishment for horse and cattle stealing, and woe to the Indian cattle thief whenever caught. On the other hand, the mountain Indians, not having the rich valley lands to supply them with acorns, seeds, game and fish, thought it no great wrong to drive off a few cattle or horses to their mountain home for their winter food for women and children. So in the fall of 1847 they made a raid on the settlers of Livermore, San Ramon, Pacheco and Martinez Valley and drove off nearly all the horses. The settlers in the various parts of the district joined together and organized companies to punish the thieving Indians. The settlers in those valleys sought Captain Weber's assistance, as they knew him to be a brave and well-disciplined military man, because of his great work in the Mexican War. A number of the settlers who had been fortunate enough to save their horses rode up to Tuleberg, bringing with them a document from James Weeks, alcalde of San Jose. It was addressed to Captain Charles Weber and authorized him to arrest the criminals, even though it be necessary to resort to the use of arms. After making hasty preparations for the expedition such as getting food supplies, warm clothing, equipments, etc., Weber was ready for the start late in January. He had organized a company of about 200 men, most of them friendly Indians. The ride across the county was slow and tiresome, as there had been heavy rains and the horses sank deep in the mud. The party were considerably worried over their slow progress as they were anxious to find the thieves before they had killed all of the animals. Traveling up the mountains to the snow line they soon found the rancherias of the tribe, but all of the horses had been killed. Attacking the Indians they were completely routed and most of the bucks were killed. Taking a few prisoners, women and children, the party returned to Tuleburg.

A treaty had been made by Captain Weber with all of the tribes in this section of the county except the Polo and the Chowchilla tribes, who were very aggressive and refused to make any peace treaty. To bring them to terms Weber now began the organization of a large company of men. He first proposed attacking the Chowchillas, for they had been stealing the property and murdering all of the settlers who crossed their pathway. It was necessary to organize a large company, at least 400 men, as they were a powerful, warlike tribe and had among them many Christian Indians who, being educated, knew how to carry on a successful battle. They were well supplied with firearms, having obtained them in the missions. An event of world-wide importance saved them from extermination, that event was the discovery of gold at Coloma, in January, 1848.

CHAPTER IV.

THE DISCOVERY OF GOLD

ALTHOUGH historians give but little notice to the discovery of gold in California, it was one of the greatest events in the first half of the eighteenth century, as it quickly populated the western coast, revolutionized the metallic currency of the world and assisted greatly in saving the Union during the Civil War. Its discoverer, James W. Marshall, came to California across the plains in 1845; during the Mexican War he was with Fremont's battalion, and when peace was declared he visited Sutter's Fort looking for work. He proved to be an excellent mechanic and as Sutter was thinking of building a saw-mill, he sent Marshall into the mountains to find a good location. He found a site near the present town of Coloma, so men were sent to that point and began digging a mill-race. On the morning of January 24, Marshall, while examining the work, discovered a metal he thought was gold. Not being sure, however, he took specimens to Sutter at the Fort. The old Swiss tested it by the encyclopedia formula and pronounced it pure gold, sixteen carats fine. Sutter foreseeing the result, was desirous of possessing the land and he immediately sent two messengers on horseback to Monterey with a petition to Governor Mason for a pre-emption grant to the land. The Governor sent back word that the land belonged to Mexico and he had no authority to grant his request.

Sutter, very anxious to keep the discovery a secret, commanded the couriers to tell no one of their mission to Monterey, but the men that night stopped at Tuleberg and showing the specimens, told the settlers all about the gold discovery. Most of them became wild with excitement and wanted to start for Coloma the following morning. The cooler heads persuaded them to wait until the "Captain" returned. Captain Weber arrived the following day from the mountains and when told of the gold discovery, was in no sense surprised, for he had received small quantities of gold dust from the Indians while trading at his store in San Jose; knew several hundred dollars worth of dust had been taken from San Fernando Creek, and that indications of gold had been seen in the mountains of Santa Barbara. Gold having been found at those points why not at Coloma? If the creeks and the American River bed east of Sutter's Fort contained gold, why not the rivers and creeks south of that point? A company was formed, and traveling to the Stanislaus River, they began digging for gold but found none. The gold lay twenty miles higher up the river. Then marching north they prospected in every gulch and stream, but found no gold until their arrival at the Mokelumne River. There they found a pocket of gold dust. Then traveling on they found plenty of gold in every river and on reaching Coloma, they began prospecting and found an abundance of the precious metal. Setting up their camp on the bank of a creek, they named it Weber's Creek, and to this day it holds its name. The company, hastily departing from Tuleberg, did not take a very large quantity of supplies and placing two men in charge to hold their claims they returned to Tuleberg, Captain Weber having preceded them.

The Stockton Mining Company

Under Captain Weber's instructions a joint stock company was now organized, known as the Stockton Mining Company. The word Stockton was used for the first time, Weber selecting the name because of his great admiration for Commodore Robert F. Stockton, the naval commander-in-chief and governor of California during the Mexican War. The company was organized for the purpose of carrying on a general merchandising business at the creek. Among the members of the company was John M. Murphy of San Jose, Joseph Buzzell, Andrew Baker, Thomas Pyle, George Fraezer and Dr. J. C. Isbel. The company again started for the gold fields, taking with them supplies of goods and implements from Weber's store, and twenty-five head of cattle. Weber had agreed to furnish all of the necessary supplies, but not having sufficient stock for an extensive mercantile business, he went to San Francisco in a whale boat, and there bought additional supplies. They were shipped by water to Sutter's embarcadero, and transferred from there to the creek by ox teams. Among other things which Weber bought was calico, beads, small silver coins and other trinkets to exchange with the Indians for gold nuggets. They highly prized the silver coins as ornaments to hang around their necks. The Indians at first had no idea of the value of gold, and Gilbert tells us that Dr. Isbel's wife made a piece of old cotton cloth into short skirts, and the doctor sold them to the Indian squaws for ten dollars in gold dust.

CHURCHMAN BATH COMPANY
 215 N. 1ST ST. STOCKTON, CALIF.
 BATHS, CLOSET, & C.

ROBINSON BROTHERS
 100 N. 1ST ST. STOCKTON, CALIF.
 FURNITURE, CARPENTRY, & CO.

100 N. 1ST ST. STOCKTON, CALIF.

THE LAGER
 100 N. 1ST ST. STOCKTON, CALIF.
 BREWERY

E. S. HOLDEN
 100 N. 1ST ST. STOCKTON, CALIF.

STATE HOTEL STOCKTON, CALIF.

WIGGS & WALKER
 100 N. 1ST ST. STOCKTON, CALIF.

WATCHES & JEWELRY
 100 N. 1ST ST. STOCKTON, CALIF.

EARLY SCENES AT STOCKTON

Previous to his departure for Yerba Buena, Weber sent word to Jose Jesus, then living at Knights Ferry, to send him twenty-five able-bodied young Indians to dig for gold. Weber was of a firm belief that gold in paying quantities could be found south of Coloma and he wanted to have these Indians learn how to prospect for gold. He would then have them work the streams in this territory. In time the young native sons arrived here, and accompanied with a guide they rode horseback to Weber's Creek. The Indians, after being properly instructed, found plenty of gold. During this time the company were selling goods and beef at enormous prices and prospecting for a pastime. The Indians when well coached in prospecting were sent home with instructions to prospect in the Tuolumne and Stanislaus rivers. If they found gold, they were to report that fact to the "major domo" at French Camp. Prospecting in the Stanislaus River near their rancheria at Knights Ferry they found some coarse gold. They took the specimens to the overseer and in accordance with previous instructions he sent the news and gold by an express rider to Weber. On receiving the news Weber was greatly pleased and announced that fact by the blowing of a tin horn, which was the usual method in that day of proclaiming an unusual event and calling together the crowd. The miners came flocking in and seeing the large pieces of coarse gold, were very much excited over it. A consultation was then held and the company concluded to abandon the creek claim, close out the merchandising business, and engage in prospecting in the new gold region. Captain Weber without doubt was behind this entire movement. Leaving two men to close up the business the entire company returned to Tuleberg. Replenishing their stock of goods they moved to the Stanislaus River and began prospecting for gold. With them were quite a number of new men who had accompanied the Stockton company to this place. The prospectors slowly moving up the Stanislaus into the mountains found plenty of gold. Then took place that restless, feverish, roving movement so common to the tens of thousands who followed later; the men were not satisfied with making big wages in one locality but scattered in every direction looking for gold. Then were founded dozens of mining camps, many of them named after the men who founded them such as Carson's Creek, Jamestown, Angel's Camp, Murphy's Camp, Sullivan's Diggings, Wood's Creek, Sainsevain Bar, etc. In September, 1848, the Stockton Mining Company was dissolved.

Stockton's First Mercantile House

The founding of these mining camps was the forerunner of Stockton as a great trading depot, and Weber's store was the pioneer. Was it keen foresight, sound judgment or just luck on the part of Captain Weber in settling up the wilderness now called Stockton? Call it what you may, the founding of this merchandising store formed a very important part. As we have already stated, he founded a trading store in San Jose, planning at some time in the near future to establish a similar store on El Campo de los Franceses. The Mexican War caused a postponement of all of his plans. In the fall of 1847, however, he came to Tuleberg and erected a log cabin on the south side of the Stockton Channel, near the foot of what is now Commerce Street, there established a small trading store. His customers were the settlers, travelers and immigrants that passed over the road to and from Sutter's Fort to San Jose. The goods, bought in San Francisco, were transported to Stockton in whale boats, Eli Randall acting as his clerk. The discovery of gold in the mountains east of Stockton, changed completely the route of travel and hundreds began passing through the settlement eastward and westward bound.

As these travelers must of necessity have food and other supplies Captain Weber now concluded to establish a large commercial house. He planned to locate his store on the peninsula, as the most suitable spot for a wholesale and retail house, but the mistake of the supercargo in misunderstanding Weber's orders caused Stockton to be founded on the block lying between Levee, Commerce, Main and Center streets. Going to Yerba Buena Weber chartered a vessel with instructions to sail to Santa Cruz and for a load of redwood lumber and transport it to Weber's embarcadero, the settlement being known by a half dozen different names. The supercargo had been ordered, on arrival at Webeville, to unload the lumber on the north bank, but he unloaded on the south bank and Weber was compelled to erect his store where the lumber was because of a scarcity of laborers, and no bridges nor boats to move it across.

When this, the first commercial house in the San Joaquin Valley, was commenced or completed we do not know. John Doak, who arrived overland in the fall of 1847, said in July, 1877, "On arrival I found but one house to be seen, and that a mere shed on the bank of Stockton Channel, somewhere in the vicinity of Reed's Landing," Warehouses now cover that site. There was also a tule tent on the peninsula occupied by Mexicans and Indian vaqueros employed by Weber. In May, 1865, a pioneer in the press said, "I arrived here in the latter part of September, 1848, with Bernard Murphy and Thomas Knell. We met Daniel Murphy, who had just arrived from San Jose, and a man named Eli Randall, who was keeping store for Captain Weber. We camped two or three days up the slough, after which two of the others went below (San Francisco). Captain Weber having arrived, engaged me to erect a store and kitchen for him. I built the kitchen first, which was the first frame building ever erected in Stockton, and the store was not completed until January, 1849." A. H. T. says, "My first view of the village of the San Joaquin was from the deck of a launch which I had chartered, at a cost of $600, from that old pioneer, Robert Parker, to bring a load of merchandise to Weber's Landing as Stockton was then called. The launch would carry about ten tons and it took six or seven days to make the trip. The trip was made in the latter part of 1848. The stream was tortuous and winding and the distance eighty miles from the mouth of the San Joaquin to Weber's embarcadero. In due time we entered the slough on which Stockton is now situated. After passing up about three miles we found we were near the settlement. It comprised one partly constructed wooden building on the slough belonging to Captain Weber, a few tents occupied by George Belt and Lunt & Grimes as a trading post, and these with a few tule tents were all we found to constitute the settlement. After placing our cargo in a room allotted to us through the kindness of Captain Weber the launch returned to San Francisco. We stayed through a long and tedious winter, living on beans, canned meats, ducks, geese and hard bread. Once in a while some daring hardy miner would make his way here, generally on foot, swimming streams and carrying his wet blankets, sleeping under trees or in the open air, sometimes drenched to the skin, in his walk of sixty or eighty miles."

The First Murder

There is a stream of blood that runs through San Joaquin County's history from 1848 up to the present time. The mercy and compassion shown to murderers today by juries who have pity for the life of the murderer, but none for the slain, in no manner lessen the amount of crime. And the law of the pioneers, a life for a life, or at least a severe prison sentence without any hope of pardon, checked crime at a time when murder was easy and detection almost impossible because of the surrounding conditions. Among the men located upon the grant were James McKee and B. K. Thompson. The record of the last named individual was very bad, as he was credited with being a gambler and having killed three men. As the story goes as told by Gilbert, the two men were in the channel New Year's Day, 1848, and for some reason Thompson shot and killed McKee. At that time there were no courts nor officers here and Captain Weber had Thompson arrested and taken to Sutter's Fort and tried for murder. A man named St. Clair was then alcalde at the fort, and although it was a deliberate murder Thompson was acquitted. He came back to the grant but was shunned by all of the settlers, and soon after with a small company, he started overland for the Eastern States. On the way, while in camp at Sweetwater, he had trouble with Robert Tagart, a nephew of Dr. Isbel. Tagart, taking no chances, shot and killed Thompson, and the company refusing even to give Thompson a decent burial, left him where he fell "to become food for the coyotes and buzzards." McKee was buried beneath an oak tree on the bank of a shallow stream of water, where now stands the three-story brick Giovanessi building, on the south side of Main Street. In digging the foundation for this building, in 1880, workmen uncovered the remains, and for a few hours created an exciting sensation. Finally, H. F. Fanning, hearing of the finding of the body, remembered the incident.

The march of the goldseekers began in the fall of 1848, and over the trail from Stockton to the southern mines they traveled, a few hundred in number at first, but increased in five years to tens of thousands. A few located here for the purpose of going into business; some landed here with a load of merchandise intending to push on to the mines, but the road was in such a bad condition, the transportation facilities and the price of freight so high, they concluded to locate in Weberville. A. H. T. in speaking of the conditions that winter said, "The teams of ox-carts and pack mules had gone with the winter supplies for the mining camps, the rains had already set in and by November the roads were impassable." One of the first firms to open up for business was a bakery owned by Murphy & Ferguson, who pitched their tent on the Levee near Hunter Street. John Sirey & Whitehouse in December, 1848, opened an eating place, now the southwest corner, Hotel Stockton. Captain Weber's store we have already mentioned, and south of the store, corner of Center and Levee, Nelson Taylor and George G. Belt, set up a tent for the sale of general merchandise. In that same month John Davis built a house on the Levee and opened a saloon. The following year the Gillingham brothers, Elmer Lane, and Grayson & Stephens opened general merchandising stores. The firm last named were located at the corner of Center and Levee. They were a very enterprising firm, with their main store in San Francisco. They also opened a branch store in Grayson on the San Joaquin River and had four mule teams engaged in hauling goods. Thompson &

White opened a store in a tule hut on the Levee, and R. A. Parker came here and opened a wholesale liquor store. One of his patrons was "little" Jack Keeler, who opened "The Shades Saloon." He was so named to distinguish him from his brother "big" Jack Keeler. Quite well supplied was the settlement with merchandise and whisky, but there were others in various lines of business. Isaac Zachariah and his brother opened a little clothing store, 6x10 on the Levee, with an investment of fifty dollars in clothing, and in six months they made over $20,000. They went back East for their families, returned to California and planted an orchard and flower garden on the northeast corner of Park and Grant Streets. In 1854 they sold ripe peaches at three dollars each.

Monroe Robinson, the first blacksmith, was still in business in 1852 on Channel Street near San Joaquin; James Journeay, who made the first wagon from oak-tree timber, later became a livery stable keeper and then a rancher. Wm. H. Fairchilds erected a blacksmith shop for the Owens brothers. They made plenty of money and returned East. That winter the shop was sold to Westbay, Churchill & Pierce; it was a rather unique building, being sided with oak-tree limbs and then covered with adobe, and the forge and chimney were constructed of adobe brick. In the spring of 1850 "Uncle John" Andrews had an eating and refreshment place in a tent, where later stood the Presbyterian Church. Hety & Reynolds kept a hay store on Weber Avenue, later Lane's mill. The building was not expensive, a tent made of brushwood. Captain Jordan sold lumber from a store-ship and Dr. Moses Hammond was another dealer in lumber. The post office was in a store on the Levee, midway between El Dorado and Main. It comprised a box set on the counter, and J. Gould Buffum, a printer who came out with Stevenson's regiment, was the postmaster. The first tailor was B. Howard Brown, who in his later years kept a produce stand on the Levee near Center. Arriving in California in April, 1850, he came to this city, bringing with him from the East a bolt of shirting and of overall cloth. He engaged the pastor's wife, Mrs. James Woods, and a Mrs. Lane to roughly sew the garments as he cut them out. They made a dozen pair a day and he made big money selling them at four dollars a garment. Later he opened the "Blue Wing" saloon and refreshment resort, and sold boiled eggs at three dollars a dozen, oysters one dollar a can, ice cream twenty-five cents a plate and drinks at a quarter each; cigars that cost him two dollars per hundred he sold at two for fifty cents.

Christmas and July 4th

"The first July 4th celebration in Stockton," said Francis D. Clark, later secretary of the New York California Pioneer Society, "was a banquet in 1849 in Sirey's & Whitehouse store. The price of admission was thirty-two dollars. At the dinner were Nathaniel Lyons, one of the first generals to be killed in the Civil War, Meyer Miller, Lewis Tredwell and several others, all of whom attained military rank in in the Civil War."

In the previous year, 1848, the settlers celebrated Christmas in great style. In the morning Peter MacQueen, a former sergeant in the Stevenson regiment, later a San Joaquin farmer, took up a collection and, visiting the three trading stores, bought the ingredients for an old fashioned Scotch punch, MacQueen mixing the ingredients to the "Queen's" taste. As they sat in the little cabin drinking from the "wassail" bowl as it was passed around and telling stories of hunting and adventure, little did they dream that their little group of twenty persons would be increased in number to over 50,000 by Christmas of 1920. In the afternoon Captain Weber invited the settlers over to his residence to enjoy a Christmas dinner. They crossed the channel in whale boats, and upon returning to the camp, concluded, as a final climax to the celebration, to put up a ten-gallon keg of whisky at auction. As each bidder had to test the liquor to see if it were the pure stuff, the keg was half empty before it was sold, and by that time the would-be purchasers were so drunk they never knew who bought the keg.

The Great Fire of Christmas, '49

The Christmas of 1849 was indeed sad, for on the previous morning a fire broke out and in less than an hour the entire settlement bounded by Main, Commerce, Levee and Center, was destroyed. And yet on Christmas day no growling nor grumbling was heard, for the settlers were a hopeful group, ever ready to meet misfortune with a smile. Although the places of business were nothing but brushwood, tule or canvas shacks, the loss was over $200,000 because of the destruction of all of their food supplies, clothing, blankets, etc., for these articles were scarce and very high in price. They suffered severely from cold as they were compelled to sleep out in the open air, and the thermometer ran below zero. There were no fire engines in the town and the citizens tried to check the flames by forming a bucket brigade and forming two lines of men from the fire to the channel, they passed up full pails of water on one side while the empty pails went down on the opposite side. Thus was formed what was later known as the Weber bucket brigade.

The Rush of '49

There was such a crowding of events, the one into the other during the first ten years of San Joaquin County's history, that it is impossible to separate them. And we have recorded "A rush and whirl of human beings" without laying any foundation for that event. Hildreth, the historian, gave the best description in concise words that I have ever seen of the rush of 1849. He wrote: "The discovery of the immense mineral wealth in California at a time when it was passing into the possession of the United States promised to produce as powerful an effect upon the American mind as that of the New World did upon the Old when its riches were explored by Columbus. From East to West, from North to South, the spirit of emigration invested the hearts of the people. It seized the old as well as the young. It pervaded city and county, mountain, glen and valley; it decimated the ranks of every profession. In almost every town and village throughout the land adventurers started, associations were formed, and eager companies of hopeful, ardent and enthusiastic pioneers, who resolved on seeing the new El Dorado for themselves, started across the plains. The highways and thoroughfares in every part of the land were alive with the multitude seeking a place of departure. The wharves of the seaports were thronged with those who were willing to pay any price for a passage and submit to any privations by the way, so that by some means they might reach the golden shore. Ships were everywhere in great demand. A system of crowding and packing, second only to that of the notorious African slave trade, did not deter or dishearten the adventurers. Band after band hurried away, some by the Isthmus, some for the dreary and exhaustless overland route, and others, again, for doubling Cape Horn, with all the tedium and discomforts of a six-months voyage. Without experience in traveling, unused to the hardship and privations of pioneer life, poorly provided with even the necessaries for the voyage, thousands left their homes only to perish by the way or to seize the first opportunity to return."

Population

The news of "gold in California" flew to all parts of the civilized globe and in a few months thousands took up the cry, as Hildreth said, "On to California." Stevenson's regiment of nearly 1,000 men was already here, having arrived in 1847. The first arrivals came from the Southern states by the way of Mexico. They landed in the territory as early as May, 1848. A few arrived about the same time by the way of Cape Horn and by the Isthmus route. The multitude arrived in California, however, by sailing vessels in August, September and October, 1849. We cannot tell the number of arrivals for no census was taken until 1852. A record was kept, however, by the harbor master at San Francisco, and he reported that from April 12 to December 31, 1849, 22,069 Americans and 7,000 foreigners entered the Golden Gate. Of the entire number 800 were females.

The legislature of 1850 ordered that a census of the state be taken. The census manager reported in 1852 that the inhabitants numbered 91,625, and of this number 25,146 came from foreign lands. There were 3,050 from England, 2,452 from Ireland, 2,926 from Germany, 1,446 from France, 228 from Italy, 660 from China, and 6,656 from Mexico, Chile and other south coast countries. Regarding our own United States, 10,756 came from the New England States; 16,000 from the Middle States, namely New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey and Delaware; 17,817 from the Southern States, and 14,340 from the Western States. As to sex, there were 44,770 males and 1,586 females, their ages ranging between twenty and thirty years. There were 21,450 males and 180 females between thirty and forty years of age, 4,439 males and 833 women over forty years of age. The children under fifteen numbered 5,557.

Coming now to San Joaquin County, in which we are most interested, we find a population of only 3,042—214 being women. Twenty-seven of these women were colored, brought here by their former masters from the South. The foreign-born population numbered 1,361. There were 148 children under fifteen; 215 boys and 36 girls between fifteen and twenty; 1,711 young men and 64 young women between twenty and thirty years; 912 men and 42 women between thirty and forty, and 574 persons, 19 being women, over forty years of age. Not a man or woman in the county was 70 years of age. The census marshal found in the county 868 families, each family in a separate home. Notice carefully these statistics, the small number of women and children in proportion to the men and the age of the men, nearly all of them under thirty-five years; the large number of foreigners, over one-third of the country's population. Three-fourths of the men were unmarried and they rushed to California to make their fortune in a few months and return home. Not making their "pile" as quickly as they anticipated, some sent East for their sweethearts to come to California, others went East and marrying the "girl they left behind" returned again to the land of gold. Intellectually they were the brightest body of men that ever assembled in one spot. Hundreds of them came from the academies and colleges of the New England and Southern states and from the best schools of the Old World. Those not educated in book learning had served apprenticeships in all kinds of mechanical lines, hence many of them were first-class carpenters, brick masons, blacksmiths, wagon makers, tailors, merchants, clerks, bookkeepers, etc. In politics the American citizens were as badly mixed as at the present time. Today we find pro-league and anti-league, Republicans and Democrats. Then they were Democrats and Whigs from the North, opposed to slavery; and Whigs and Democrats from the South, in favor of slavery. The foreigners, many of them, left their country because opposed to kingly reign, and not a few were refugees. Nearly all of the Americans had come from Christian families. A few were professing Christians. And unfortunately there also came some of the deepest-dyed villains of the earth, gamblers, forgers, robbers and murderers. We now have briefly told the characteristics of the citizens of San Joaquin, and next follows their record.

CHAPTER V

COUNTY ORGANIZATION AND LAND GRANTS

WHERE did we get this land, California, within whose bounds lies San Joaquin County? Stole it from the Mexican government. It is so declared in milder terms by nearly all of the later days historians, Channing declaring, "The Mexican war was in reality an attack on a weak nation by a strong one." General U. S. Grant, a captain in the Mexican War, emphasizes Channing's statement when he says in his memoirs, "I regard the war as one of the most unjust ever waged by a stronger against a weaker nation." "It was in no sense of the word a righteous or a justifiable war, for there was no cause for war, but the South wanted California for the extension of slavery, and James Russell Lowell in his Bigelow papers aptly expresses it when he wrote

"They just wanted this Californy
So's to lug new states in,
To abuse ye and to scorn ye,
And to plunder ye like sin."

At that time the South was the dominating power in Congress and President James K. Polk, a Southerner, was at their command. To obtain California was easy—just to reach out and get it though the flimsy reason of the President making this declaration, "Mexico has shed American blood upon American soil. War exists, and exists by the act of Mexico herself." Even before war was declared, in May, 1846, Commodore John D. Sloat, in command of the U. S. vessels, was lying off the coast of Peru waiting for the news of war, when he was to quickly sail and take possession of California; John C. Fremont, under the guise of an exploring expedition, was sent out as early as 1844 to spy out the land; and Stephen W. Kearny, with troops, was on the march for California in less than a month after the declaration of war. It was purely a Southern war fought principally by southern soldiers and commanded by southern officers, thousands of them, who later became pioneers of California, controlled its political affairs, held nearly all of the official positions and engaged in business pursuits. It was one of the shortest wars in history—less than twelve months of actual fighting. On September 14, 1847, General Winfield Scott, riding a white horse, at the head of his troops, made his spectacular march into the City of Mexico. In the treaty of peace signed at Guadalupe Hidalgo on February 2, 1848, Mexico was compelled to cede to the United States all of that territory now known as Nevada, Utah, Nebraska, Kansas, Colorado, Arizona, New Mexico, in fact all of the land west of the Rocky Mountains north of the Gulf of Mexico and south of the south Oregon line. Col. R. B. Mason was in command of the California troops at this time, but he did not learn of the treaty of peace, officially until March, 1848. Hence his answer to Captain Sutter and his refusal to grant the Swiss pre-emption rights to Coloma. I have laid this foundation of the Mexican War as we will find it later on the cause of squatter difficulties, political agitations and slavery difficulties.

The Rush to California

The news of gold in California flew on the wings of lightning to every port in the civilized world. And in less than eighteen months there were 100,000 people in California. They came from every state in the Union, and from England, France, Germany, Ireland, Scotland, China, Mexico and Chile. The number reported to Congress by the memorial committee of the constitutional convention was 107,000. They were estimated as to nationality, as follows: 5,000 foreigners, 13,000 Californians—native born, and 76,000 Americans. As an additional report the harbor master at San Francisco reported that from April 12 until December 31, 1849, 29,069 immigrants entered the Golden Gate. And carefully note this, of the last number mentioned, 800 were females. Thousands more came by way of New Mexico from the south over the Santa Fe trail, and overland across the Sierras by the way of Sutter's Fort. In that vast multitude of "goldseekers" most of them expecting to make their fortune quickly and return home, there were hundreds of criminals of every shade and color and deep-dyed in every crime imaginable. It was a condition of things never before seen in the world's history. And without any form of government, property and life were not safe for a day.

First Constitutional Convention

Something must be done and done quickly. The people assembled in meetings in San Jose, Sacramento and San Francisco, called upon Bennett Riley, then in command of the United States coast army and Governor of California, to call a constitutional convention for the organization of some form of state government. For several weeks he refused to take any action, declaring that the Government at Washington had not authorized him to organize a government. A man of good common sense, however, seeing the condition of affairs, he finally agreed to call a constitutional convention. For without any means of communication with Washington except by an overland horseback journey it would be a year at least before he could receive any instructions from the Government. From his headquarters at Monterey, June 3, 1849, General Riley issued his proclamation recommending the "formation of a state constitution or a plan for a territorial government." For the purpose of electing delegates to said convention, he divided the territory into ten districts giving as far as possible an equal number of inhabitants to each district. At the time of the calling of the convention, the San Joaquin district was the least inhabited and its bounds, said the proclamation, included "all of the country south of the Sacramento district bounded on the south by the Cosumnes River and lying between the Coast Range and the Sierra Nevada." That was some district. It was allotted four delegates, but so fast did the district increase in population, the people were entitled to and elected fifteen delegates.

We have no record of the election in the district, but we know from the constitutional debates that San Joaquin had a lively fight in seating her delegates. The leading champion for San Joaquin was Wm. M. Gwin, the leader in the convention, and even at that time a notable figure in national politics. His reasons for championing the cause of San Joaquin is not known, since he was a delegate from San Francisco. Gwin's labor was virtually wasted, for six delegates only appeared and took their seats. They were an interesting six. J. M. Jones, a bright young lawyer from New York, had been in the territory just six months; he died before the close of 1851. Thomas H. Vermuele, thirty-five years of age, another lawyer, had been three years in California. O. M. Wozencroft, thirty-four years of age, a physician from Louisiana, had been four months in the country. He was afterwards appointed an Indian pension agent. J. M. McHollingworth, twenty-five years of age, was a lieutenant in Colonel Stevenson's regiment. Last, but not least, came Ben T. Moore, twenty-nine years of age, born in Florida, a lawyer by profession and a sporting man by choice. One of the Texas Rangers in the Mexican War, he came to Stockton with George W. Trahern in 1849. This convention, one of the most notable in the United States because of the fact that they established a state constitution without any constitutional authority, adjourned October 13, 1849, sine die, after framing a state constitution that answered all state purposes for over thirty years. And it was as a matter of fact a far better instrument than that framed in 1879.

Among other commands the state constitution declared that a state election should be held November 13, 1849, for the election of state officers, to hold office for two years. The legislature should comprise a Senate and an Assembly, the former elected for two years and the latter for one year. The election was held at the appointed time throughout the state. In the San Joaquin district there were no voting places and John Kerrand and Francis D. Clark, traveling a circuit of ten or twelve miles, on horseback, carried a ballot box with them and obtained votes for the candidates. They obtained a large number of votes. Some of the defeated candidates objected to that kind of voting and had the enterprising ballot clerks arrested. The prefect, Wm. L. Dickerson, discharged the defendants as there was no law against traveling ballot boxes. The district was entitled to four senators and six assemblymen. The election was won by David F. Douglas, Benjamin S. Lippincott, Nelson Taylor and Thomas Vermuele. Of these senators only one, D. F. Douglas, remained in the county any length of time. Ben S. Lippincott, who came to California with the Stevenson regiment, was a politician; after his term expired he went to Tuolumne County and was again elected senator. He was a leading factor in the Broderick senatorial fight in 1855, and later returned to New Jersey. Thomas Vermuele resigned in two months and became city attorney of San Jose. Nelson Taylor was a very negligent senator for he did not appear in the senate until the end of the first week, and January 21, he asked a ten days leave of absence. It was granted and failing to show up on time his colleague, David Douglas, moved that Taylor's seat be declared vacant. Taylor was elected sheriff of the county in 1853, was the owner of considerable property and during the Civil War sold out, and going to New York entered the army of volunteers.

Van Buren-Fair Contest

The assemblymen elected were J. S. K. Ogier, a native of Alabama, Ben F. Moore, of Florida, Charles M. Creanor, Richard W. Heath and John Van Benscrotten of New York; Charles M. Creanor resigned in April, the legislature having elected him judge of the Fifth judicial court comprising the counties of San Joaquin, Calaveras, Tuolumne and Mariposa. Two months previous Heath and Van Benscrotten resigned. To fill these vacancies an election was called for March 2, 1850. There were three candidates for the office, William D. Fair, E. L. B. Brooks and Thomas B. Van Buren. Brooks received 115 votes, and Van Buren's vote exceeded the Fair vote by over 800 majority. He was a very popular man, perhaps because he had the name of a Democratic President. He was the first July 4th orator at Stockton, and later appointed Minister to China. Both Fair and Van Buren were bright young lawyers from the south, Fair meeting a tragic death in 1861. He married the famous Laura D. Fair, who shot and killed the noted San Francisco attorney, A. P. Crittenden. Fair's marriage was unfortunate, and on her account he shot and killed himself, December 27, 1861. As Van Buren had been elected to fill a vacancy only, his time expired in December, 1850. In September, Governor Peter H. Burnett issued a proclamation for an election October 7, for several state officers, a district attorney, a senator and two assemblymen for San Joaquin. There were seventeen advertised candidates for the assembly but the voters narrowed the number to seven, Frederick Yeiser, 528, and W. C. McDougal, 312, receiving the highest votes. The senatorial fight was again contested between W. D. Fair and T. B. Van Buren. It was a close contest slightly in favor of Van Buren. The county clerk, A. C. Bradford, later a land office registrar and a grand master of state Odd Fellows, issued the election certificate to Van Buren. Fair, in the senate contested the election, each attorney presenting his own case. The contest was very interesting and Fair presented his evidence "with all the skill and talent of a lawyer of the first class and Van Buren showed himself an honorable and high-toned gentleman," said one who was present. It was shown during the contest, said the legislative report, that there were many illegal ballots cast, Mexicans, foreigners and even Indians, voting. In one precinct the county judge acting as an election judge left the precinct and went out and brought in illegal voters to cast their ballot for the judge's favorite candidate. The Senate after hearing all of the evidence gave the seat to Van Buren by a vote of nine to three. They asserted that although there was much illegal voting it was about equally divided and Van Buren polled the most votes.

Resignation of Assemblyman

In those days, even up to 1860, there were scarcely any laws governing elections and the citizens then, as now, took no interest in the election of officers unless personally interested. Another queer election took place March 20, 1850, to fill the seat made vacant by the resignation of Assemblyman Heath. The poll was at the Stockton House and voting commenced at 10 a. m. and closed at 4 p. m. There were four candidates. In the county vote E. B. Bateman received 197, J. W. Paine, 102, and R. A. Duthel, 65. We have no record of the mountain camp vote except at Sonora. Bateman received twenty-five majority. He was a young physician, a pioneer of 1847 and the manager of a private hospital. He was of course well-known and a very kindly gentleman. A little later over twenty-five prominent citizens of the town, in a published letter requested him to present his name for county superintendent of schools. Regarding the election, the voting was very informal especially in the Isbel ranch precinct, now known as Waterloo. The judge was David J. Staples, later very prominent in the insurance business in San Francisco. During the afternoon he concluded he had better go out and look for some lost cattle, leaving the clerk, A. W. Brush, in charge. Staples rode away on his horse and was not again seen for several days. Later Mr. Brush, telling of the incident, said "everything voted" and fifteen votes were polled.

While the political wire pullers were advancing the claims of their friends for office—for there were six elections that year—the legislature was at work passing some exceedingly necessary laws. One of these laws was an "Act subdividing the State into counties." They cut up the state into twenty-seven counties, and many of them being very large they were later subdivided, there being today fifty-eight counties. Some of these counties are small in size and others very large, because of their mountainous districts, and small population. San Joaquin County, then as now, was one of the smallest counties in size, but one of the largest in wealth and population. The boundary of the county as defined by the committee and approved unanimously by the legislature was as follows: "Beginning at the junction of the San Joaquin River and the large slough, which is the outlet of the Mokelumne River and Dry Creek; thence up the middle of said slough to the mouth of Dry Creek; thence up the middle of Dry Creek to the southeast corner of Sacramento County; thence in a southerly direction to a point one mile north of Lemon's ranch; thence in a southeast direction to a point on the Stanislaus River one mile north of Knights Ferry; thence down the middle of the Stanislaus River to its confluence with the San Joaquin River; thence in a north westerly direction following the summit of the Coast Range to the southwest corner of Contra Costa County; thence in a northerly direction following the eastern boundary line of Contra Costa County to a point on the west channel of the San Joaquin River known, and laid down by C. D. Gibbs' map, about ten miles below Moore & Rhoads ranch, at a bend where the said channel, running downward, takes a general course north; thence down the middle of said west channel to its confluence with the main San Joaquin River; thence down the middle of the San Joaquin River to the place of beginning." This boundary line, although at present somewhat confusing, especially in the tule section, was the original act passed and approved February 28, 1850, by Gov. Peter H. Burnett.

Origin of Name San Joaquin

The senate appointed a committee to give the "derivation and the definition" of the names which they had given to the twenty-seven counties. The names are all of Spanish origin except ten, and eight of these are derived from Indian names. The name of Butte County is French; a county is named after Captain Sutter; General Mariano G. Vallejo, a Spaniard, was chairman of this committee and probably none were better qualified to explain the meaning of the names than he. In their report, referring to San Joaquin County, the committee stated "The meaning of this name has a very ancient origin, in reference to the parentage of Mary the mother of Christ. According to divine revelation Joachim signifies 'preparation of the Lord' and thence the belief that Joaquin, who in the course of time was admitted into the pale of sanctity, was the father of Mary. . . . In 1813, Lieutenant Gabriel Moraga, commissioned on an expedition to the valley of the rushes (valle de los tulares) gave the appellation of San Joaquin to a rivulet which springs from the Sierra Nevada and empties into Lake Buena Vista. The river San Joaquin derives its name from the rivulet, and baptizes the county with the same name. Stockton is the seat of justice." The committee, then commenting on Stockton declared, "It is pleasantly situated on a channel of the San Joaquin River, on a plain thinly overspread with oaks and shrubs, and within a day or two of the rich placers, is destined to become a city of the San Joaquin notwithstanding the lack of poetry in its name."

The boundary lines of San Joaquin County as defined by the legislature in no manner affected the grants or their boundaries as approved by the Mexican government. In fact it was declared that no Mexican acts, if valid, should be disturbed or annulled. These grants of land were given to Mexican, or naturalized citizens of Mexico, the parties selecting the land wherever they desired. All that was necessary was to locate the grant, define its boundaries as near as possible and then petition the Governor for the land. If no other party had petitioned for the same piece of land the Governor usually signed the request. The acres were of no value, as I have stated, and the boundary lines were very indefinite, an extension of a mile or two over the original boundary not making much difference. When the land became valuable, because of the influx of population, then it was different, and the indefinite boundary lines led to squatter troubles, law suits and sometimes murder. A person desiring land in a certain locality would be his own surveyor and measure off the land, making some tree, bush, river, lake and occasionally some mountain peak his boundary line. With a friend, both on horseback, they would measure off the four sides of the grant with a riata or rope. Another way of measuring was the time measurement, the party would ride a horse on a walk a certain distance, keeping the time by his watch, and in this way he would ride around the grant. Is it any surprise that there were so many land fights in California? We will note some of them in San Joaquin, one fight resulting in a most cowardly murder.

Land Grants

In this county there were four grants, El Pescadero, Campo de los Franceses, Los Moquelemos, and the Thompson rancho. The remaining acres, upland and swamp land, belonged to the state.

The El Pescadero grant in the southwestern part of the county was given to Pio Pico, twice Governor of Mexican California, by Governor Micheltorena in 1844. Pico presented his claim to the board of United States Commissioners sitting in San Francisco, in 1852. They rejected his claim as not valid. He then appealed to the United States District Court for the northern district of California. They, in April, 1856, declared his claim legal. The claim was approved by President Buchanan in January, 1858. Pico sold the grant to Wm. A. McKee and Frank W. and Hiram Gaines. They in turn sold it to Timothy Paige, a Stockton capitalist. In August, 1858 Paige appeared before Judge Charles M. Creanor of the Fifth Judicial Court and he approving the patent, it was recorded by Timothy Paige in September, 1858. The land is now very valuable as it can be irrigated by the Paradise cut canal, and two railroads run across the middle of the grant.

El Campo de los Franceses—I have treated of this grant in a former chapter. It is the most valuable grant of land in the county and one of the most valuable in the state. It is difficult to define its boundaries except in surveyor's terms. In general terms, however, it extends north of Stockton two miles, northeast six miles, including Waterloo, to the south four miles including French Camp and to the west one mile.

The Los Moquelemos grant in the northeastern part of the county, has been the cause of trouble for many years, because of squatter and railroad claims. The grant containing eleven leagues, was granted to Andreas Pico in 1846, by his brother Governor Pio Pico. His claim to the grant was not approved by the commissioners, because of insufficient proof of his claim. The District Court reversed the decision of the commissioners, but the United States Supreme Court sustained the land commissioners, and remanded the case for further evidence. In the meantime farmers began settling on this land in good faith, believing it was government land. Andreas Pico however continued to lay claim to the land and acres were sold over the farmers' heads. On January 18, 1857, these farmers held a meeting in the Henderson schoolhouse and declared that "the selling of Pico lands over their heads was wrong and the settlers' rights should be considered as extending to the limits and bounds as recorded and admitted by his neighbors. Resolved, That the passage of a law declaring all contracts for the sale of lands in the actual possession of a third party absolutely null and void, is imperatively called for by the conditions of land titles in this state." John P. Bradie, attorney in fact for Andreas Pico, two days later replied to the settlers' resolution in a published card, saying, "I agree fully with the resolution adopted that the purchase of Pico titles over the heads of actual settlers is wrong. The plan of Mr. Pico is to allow the settler to purchase a title to his land at a reasonable and moderate rate and I have sold no lands over the heads of settlers, which have been settled on in good faith in the supposition that such land might be the property of the United States." It was a very complicated and tangled problem for twenty years, still further complicated in 1864 by the Western Pacific Railroad laying claim to a part of the grant.

Southern Pacific Railroad

In 1862 Congress granted to the Western Pacific railroad, later called the Central Pacific and now known as the Southern Pacific, a subsidy of land along their proposed railroad, the odd sections on each side of the road within ten miles. The Moquelemos grant, they claimed, was within the limits of their subsidy, and as the Pico title had not been perfected, they claimed lands occupied by the settlers. A number of the leading farmers denied their rights to the occupied tracts, and a test case known as Newhall versus Sanger, of a quarter section of land, was tried in the courts. Joseph H. Budd was the farmers' attorney. After several years of litigation the Supreme Court of the United States, saying in the conclusion of their decision, "As the premises in controversy were not public lands, either at the date of the grant or of their withdrawal, it follows that they did not pass to the railroad company." Among the settlers there was great rejoicing. And at a celebration at Lodi, J. H. Budd, the orator, said, "The booming of cannon, the waving of flags, the glad sound of music and the immense concourse of people express more forcibly than I can do it, the feelings of the justice of the cause which we are here to celebrate. The history of the long struggle of the people against the avaricious grasp of land monopolists has been a most interesting one. The land monopolist endeavored to wrongfully appropriate the land which the settlers had, by long and patient toil, reclaimed from the barren waste, making the 'wilderness to blossom as the rose.' After settling in their peaceful homes for years they were astonished to see a corps of engineers, marking out the lines of a pretended grant, called the Chabolla grant, covering the homes of hundreds of settlers in this county. After a struggle involving years of costly litigation, the fraudulent Chabolla grant was removed and the people congratulated themselves that they would never be troubled again. But alas, there came another. I refer to the grant Los Moquelemos covering this very territory. It received the endorsement of the District Court of San Francisco, but the U. S. Supreme Court, then as now free from corruption, repudiated the false claim, and again the people thought they were free from the land monopolist. But they were again mistaken. In 1862 a road received a grant of land to aid its construction easterly from Sacramento to Dutch Flat and over the Sierras. They had no shadow of right to build a road in this county. A contract was drawn up between Charles McLaughlin, who claimed to be a contractor, with the institution known as the Contract and Finance Company. A company was formed, to which the Central Pacific Railroad Company said, 'Give us the bonds which you expect to steal from the Government and we will give you the land.' The Central Pacific had no more right to give away these lands to McLaughlin than the Devil had when he tried to tempt the Savior, but they got a ratification of the contract and on that McLaughlin obtained a certificate from the General Land Office. It was believed by the settlers that the railroad had no right to the lands and they again determined to buckle on their armor for the vindication of their right. Ross C. Sargent first started the fight . . . and he appealed to the Secretary of the Interior who declared that the railroad company had no right to a foot of land in this county. The settlers thought that finally ended it. They were again mistaken. The power of money is almost omnipotent and it was liberally used in this case. After the case had been fought, after the decision had been rendered, after patents to the land had been issued, Secretary Delano reversed his decision, and said the land belonged to the railroad company. Their men were seen . . . actively at work urging the settlers to settle . . . and they succeeded in getting many people to take their quit-claim deed for lands they never owned. McLaughlin then prepared an agreed case. G. D. Newhall, a nephew of McLaughlin, sued Charles W. Sanger, a brother-in-law and a default was taken. It was appealed to the U. S. Supreme Court in the hope of getting a final decision in the same quiet and secret manner. Judge C. L. Robinson made the discovery of the manner of the proceeding and notified the settlers, who agreed to defend the Newhall case and prevent the wished-for judgment by default. Newhall suddenly found that he had more advocates for his case than he desired, as he was anxious to be defeated, and when the decision came sustaining his title to the land and with it the title of hundreds of settlers now living upon the grant, it was to him like a clap of thunder from a clear sky, filling him with astonishment."

First County Election

The Legislature in December, '49, passed a law calling for an election April 1, 1850, for the following state and county officers, a clerk of the Supreme Court, a district attorney for each judicial district, a county judge, sheriff, clerk, recorder, assessor, treasurer, and coroner. Although the county had not a dollar in their possession to pay office-holders' salaries, the candidates for office were as numerous as political grafters around a nominee. Ben Williams, John P. Jones and J. P. Brush were aspirants for the judgeship; Dr. Richard P. Ashe, Thomas K. Wilson and William B. Stockton wanted to fill the sheriff's office; Samuel Booker was out for the district attorneyship, and John B. Clements, after whom the town of Clements was named, and C. D. Perkins were after the coroner's office. Perkins had many warm friends, and anxious to have him elected they published the following card in the Times: "The friends of Captain Caleb Durham Perkins (vulgarly called Sikey) announce him as a candidate for coroner At the same time they would call the attention of the public to his distinguished services in the late war with Mexico." Strange to say, the heroes of the Mexican war were no more popular than the heroes of the Allied War and he was defeated by Dr. Clements, ten to one. The precincts in the county were seven in number and we give the vote in each precinct. The figures also show the small number of voters in the county. Athearn and Davis ranch 33, Isbel's ranch 15, Red Tent 13 San Joaquin City 44, French Camp 50, Knights Ferry 44, Stockton 632. The total vote of the county for all of the candidates was as follows: Clerk of the Supreme Court, E. L. Thorp 571, W. G. Morey 235, W. E. Shannon 95; district attorney, Samuel A. Booker 1007; county judge, Ben Williams 509, J. P. Brush 410, J. W. Jones 227, W. B. Sloan 96; county clerk, A. C. Bradford 433, J. A. Patterson 415, J. A. McLellan 102, N. MacEachran 262; county attorney, E. L. B. Brooks 367, Henry A. Crabb 313, J. R. Shaffer 301; sheriff, Dr. R. P. Ashe 436, John Taber 353, Thomas K. Wilson 213, J. E. Nuttman 235, W. B. Stockton 218; assessor, B. F. Whittier 572, Thomas McSpeddon 558; recorder, A. A. Mix 344, W. M. Willowby 287, M. Robertson 101, J. M. Schofield, 34; treasurer, H. W. Alden 509, C. J. Buffum 505; coroner, Dr. J. B. Clements 985, C. D. Perkins 47; surveyor, Walter Heron 827, A. K. Flint 129.

The Stockton vote for county officers resulted as follows: District attorney, Samuel A. Booker 632; county judge, Ben Williams 243, J. P. Brush 354, J. W. Jones 198, Wm. B. Sloan 95; sheriff, R. P. Ashe 253, John Taber 243, John B. Nuttman 200, T. K. Wilson 181, W. B. Stockton 15; clerk, A. C. Bradford 383, N. MacEachran 231, J. Potter 193, J. A. McLellan 97; attorney, H. A. Crabb 261, E. L. B. Brooks 232, J. R. Shaffer 230; recorder, C. A. Marriner 216, W. M. Willowby 235, A. A. Mix 192, M. Robertson 92; coroner, Dr. J. B. Clements 691, C. D. Perkins 13; assessor, Thomas McSpeddon 355, B. F. Whittier 414.

The young pioneers of Stockton were hot-headed and impetuous, even those who in later years became its best and most-honored citizens, and before the county government was completely organized they scored severely the Court of Sessions for doing its duty in accordance with law. At that time the Court of Sessions in each county attended to all county business, whatever its nature. A special law of the legislature passed April 10, 1850, authorized the San Joaquin County court to levy a tax for the building of a court house, and a tax for county revenue. The tax for a revenue licensed about every thing in sight; merchants doing business were taxed $30 for two months and $100 for twelve months, and country peddlers from $10 to $33. Saloons were taxed $75 a year and livery stables $100 for the same time. Butcher shops and draymen were taxed, and even mechanics at their trade; blacksmiths for twelve months were taxed $100, carpenters and tanners $75 and watch makers and shoemakers $50 for the same period of time. The county clerk, A. C. Bradford, in a published notice, June 29, requested all merchants to appear at the treasurer's office for a license to carry on business. Instead of obeying the mandates of the law, by means of placards posted in every section of the town, they called upon all citizens to attend a mass meeting July 18, "on the public square near the Presbyterian Church, to consider the most appropriate means to rid themselves of the present tax of the Court of Sessions." At the time appointed, 8 o'clock, "a large concourse of the inhabitants assembled," says the Stockton Times. The meeting was called to order and Dr. George A. Shurtleff was elected president of the meeting, Hiram Green and H. B. Underhill, vice-presidents, and J. C. Norris, secretary. The president in opening the meeting said, during his remarks, that "the tax was levied on all classes except ministers, doctors and lawyers and that it was an opprobrious and unjust tax as it was unequal." The merchant with a large store and an extensive business was taxed $100, the same as a poor trader with a small business. Moreover the laboring mechanic was directly taxed. This was unjust. A committee of five was appointed to report at a subsequent meeting "as to the best means to be adopted in order to obtain relief from this oppressive taxation."

On the following Tuesday a second mass meeting was held on the square and after the president had called the meeting to order, the committee of five, namely, Hiram Green, Dr. R. P. Ashe, H. W. Wallis, John Grewell and Dr. George A. Shurtleff, offered the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted: "Mr. President and Fellow-citizens; your committee after having given the subject due consideration have come to the conclusion that the act of the Legislature giving to the Court of Sessions the power of levying a tax upon the honest industries of the county is an arrogant assumption of power wholly unprecedented in the annals of history. Your committee would also remind you to the fact that California is still a territory and until she is admitted as a state she has not a shadow of right to enact and enforce such laws. Resolved, that a committee of nine be appointed to visit Judge Williams and request him to erase from the records the order of the court levying said tax."

That was certainly an insolent demand, although the committee were correct in declaring the Legislature an illegal body, but listen to this: "Resolved that if the above request is not granted that we, the citizens of Stockton, do solemnly pledge our sacred word of honor to resist the operation of the law even to the shedding of blood." The committee called upon Judge Williams. In reply he said in a lengthy address, "The licenses referred to were the acts of the Court of Sessions and cannot be repealed by that court. Your resolution is addressed to me as an individual; as such I have no discretion in the matter. Had you appealed to me as Judge of the Court of Sessions, I can only say that the request if granted would be one for which any judge would be liable to impeachment, and any legal action in the premises can be had only by the Court of Sessions composed of a county judge and two associate judges at a regular term for holding said court." It was later shown that the clerk had made several mistakes in levying licenses and the matter was smoothed over. In this incident we see the activity, the energy and the spirit of the pioneers in demanding their rights and justice, as they understood it—the men whose history will fill these pages during the next twenty-five years.

Creation of Townships

Soon after California's admission into the Union, September 9, 1850, the Government sent out surveyors to divide the state into townships and sections. Each township was six miles square and each section one mile square. In locating the east and west base line of the central part of the state the surveyors selected the highest peak of Mt. Diablo as their starting point and this line runs due east through French Camp to Trigo, a small railroad station on the Oakdale line of the Southern Pacific. The Court of Sessions in defining the boundaries of the three townships, O'Neal, Castoria and Elkhorn, created by them, gave no attention to the township area of the Government surveyors. In fact it was not necessary to limit a township to six square miles as outside of the townships named the county was scarcely inhabited.

O'Neal township, created in 1853, was so named after John O'Neal, a popular southern man and sheriff of that day. The township embraced the whole of the Weber survey, El Campo de los Franceses and nearly all of the swamp and overflowed land to the west. Then it was a vast area of tules and the home of wild game. To-day, much of it reclaimed, it is the richest fruit and vegetable raising land in the state.

Castoria, a Spanish word, meaning beaver, was also created in 1853. It took in the entire county south of the base line. Its bounds were the San Joaquin River on the west and it extended to Knights Ferry on the east with the Stanislaus River as its southern boundary. At the present time Lathrop and French Camp are within its bounds.

Elkhorn township was also created by the Court of Sessions, 1853. It was so named because of the large quantity of elk horns found in that locality. The township, like that of Castoria, was exceedingly large. North of the Weber survey, it extended east from the Mokelumne River to Calaveras County, with Dry Creek its northern and the base line its southern boundary. Lodi and Woodbridge to-day are within its bounds. The township is famous for its wonderful grapes and bounteous supply of fruits.

Elliott township was established in 1855, the supervisors cutting off the entire eastern half of Elkhorn township to form the new territory. Its bounds were the same as those of Elkhorn, except on the west. The division was made at the request of the settlers in Lockeford, for that town and Woodbridge were rivals for business and township honors. Within the present township are Lockeford and Clements.

Tulare, probably named because of its immense tule growth, was created in 1856. The reasons for its being set aside as a township I cannot imagine, unless it be that John Westley Van Benschoten was anxious to make Grayson a prominent township village. The township included all of the land within the county west and south of the San Joaquin River. Irrigation of the sandy land and reclamation of the swamp land is now making the section very productive. In this township lies Tracy, Banta, Vernalis and San Joaquin City. The territory in which Grayson is situated was given, in 1860, to Stanislaus county.

Dent township was created by the supervisors, February 17, 1859. It was named after George W. Dent, a resident of Knights Ferry and a brother-in-law of Captain U. S. Grant. The township was formed by cutting off the east half of Castoria and the south part of Elliott township. This formed a township nearly twelve miles square, with the Stanislaus River as its southern boundary, Calaveras County its eastern and Douglas township—created at the same time—as its northern boundary. The following year, 1860, the legislature, slicing in half Dent township, and taking a part of Douglas township, gave it to Stanislaus County. The division included the town of Knights Ferry, then a prosperous town of over a thousand inhabitants, and the act was one of the many political tricks of that day. Ripon, Burwood and Atlanta are the towns of Dent township.

Douglas township was named in honor of David F. Douglas, senator from the San Joaquin district. The township was created in 1859. In forming the township the supervisors cut off the southern part of Elliott township. It is bounded on the north by Elliott, east by Stanislaus County, south by the base line and west by the Weber survey. The legislature in giving additional territory to Stanislaus County in 1860 also took a part of Douglas township. Within this district lie the towns of Peters, Linden and Farmington.

Liberty township was created at the request of many residents in that section in June, 1861. As the territory then was all allotted the new township was carved out of the northern portion of Elliott. The only town is Acampo. There was a town founded and prospered for a season called Liberty, but the establishing of a railroad station at Mokelumne City ruined the after prospects of Liberty.

Union, the last created township, was formed in May, 1861, from the western part of Elkhorn township. The original territory was largely swamp and overflowed land, but now reclaimed; the passing through of the Western Pacific Railroad made this rich land very valuable. Land is valuable principally for resident or productive purposes and no land can be of value unless given cheap and quick transportations to market.

Staten Island township comprises one of the soil-richest islands in the state. It lies between the west and south fork of the Mokelumne River, the west fork of that river being the boundary line between Sacramento and San Joaquin County, according to the original Gibbs survey of 1850. Along in the middle '70's Staten Island, having been reclaimed, Sacramento was very anxious to annex the island to that county for as was stated later it contained 7,000 acres and was assessed at $14 per acre. By some political "hocus pocus," as the Independent expressed it, they succeeded in getting the legislature of 1876 to annex the island to Sacramento County. The island by nature and the original county law belonged to San Joaquin County and the residents of the township were quite wrathful over its loss. One reason of their anger was that it compelled the residents on the island to cross the Mokelumne River and travel to Sacramento for all official business. At the following legislature, in 1878, Assemblyman Ross C. Sargent of San Joaquin introduced a bill, which passed, reannexing Staten Island to San Joaquin County. The legislature only performed their duty and corrected a wrong, but some of the citizens of the Capital, peeved at the result, strongly censured Assemblyman Grove L.

Johnson, father of Hiram Johnson, for not preventing the passage of the bill. Johnson in reply said, "I got the bill referred to the Sacramento and San Joaquin delegation and then getting possession of it, I locked it up in my desk and kept it there until Sargent threatened to introduce a resolution demanding me to report it." Johnson by this trick kept the bill secreted for nearly two months and then San Joaquin came into its own.

Effort to Divide County

Some years previous to the Staten Island affair, an effort was made to dismember the northern part of San Joaquin County and create a county to be known as Mokelumne County. And because of the proverbial slowness of the citizens of Stockton, it came near being successful. The scheme was engineered by John M. Benson, then the owner of Benson's Ferry over the Mokelumne River a short distance below the present town of New Hope. He planned to form a new county and make his land near the ferry the county seat. Benson was very active in the movement and by making the farmers believe that the value of their land would be increased and their taxes decreased, he obtained hundreds of signatures petitioning the legislature "that the south half of Sacramento County and the north half of San Joaquin, embracing 600 square miles and an agricultural population of between two and three thousand be formed into a county known as Mokelumne." It was a splendid scheme on the part of Benson, but unfortunately for him, just one month after the introduction of the bill into the assembly, he was shot and killed February, 1859, by Green Palmer, one of his employees.

Previous to his tragic death Benson had been assisted in the project by J. E. Sheridan, assemblyman from Sacramento County, who lived in that section of the proposed new county, and he, carrying on the work, introduced many petitions from citizens asking that the new county be created. Their argument was that they were remote from the county seat; which in the winter season was inaccessible because of the bad condition of the roads; and that they were heavily and unjustly taxed for criminal and hospital expense, incident to counties containing a population like that of Stockton, and being exclusively agricultural and containing no cities their taxes would be much lighter than at present.

In reply, hundreds of the citizens of San Joaquin opposing the new county creation, declared that the most far distant part of San Joaquin County was only thirty-five miles from the county seat, and the new county if formed would be only ten miles from Stockton. Assemblyman George C. Holman of San Joaquin, in speaking against the bill, said, "This project to dismember the county will take one-tenth of her taxable property, and that the most valuable portion; and one-tenth of her entire revenue. We are now in a healthy financial condition, her bonds are at par, something I believe cannot be said of any other county, and we have only a small debt, and I protest in all sincerity against this division." "At this time," said the Sacramento Union, "the citizens of north San Joaquin had awoke from their lethargy, for they had learned that to reach the proposed county seat, they would be compelled to travel within a few miles of Sacramento, because of the many waterways between the plains and the Sacramento River. Nearly every man below the proposed line, as well as those living on Grand Island, have signed the remonstrance." Notwithstanding this fact the pro-division men pushed the bill and March 30 it passed the assembly by the large majority of 42 to 22.

The day following the passage of the bill was "April Fool's" day, but it was no joke day for San Joaquin, for if they failed to bestir themselves, the Tokay belt would have been segregated from the county. "Early in the morning," says the Republican, "groups of men were seen standing on the street corners earnestly discussing the county division question." After some deliberation as to what course to pursue to prevent the loss of that productive tract they concluded to call a mass meeting that evening in the city hall, "to discuss and take some action on the bill." Circulars were posted about town and that evening the hall was crowded. Madison Walthall called the meeting to order, and Judge A. C. Baine was elected president, H. B. Underhill and George R. Choate, vice-presidents, and V. M. Peyton and S. T. Nye, secretaries. A committee of five was appointed to present resolutions and the committee returning offered the following which were unanimously adopted: "Resolved, that we solemnly protest against the proposed division of our county, and urge not only upon our own immediate representatives, but upon the members of the senate generally, that the interests of the people of this county imperatively demand that they shall resist in every proper measure the division of the county." "Resolved, that we shall consider any member of the legislature who supports the measure now pending to divide the county as hostile to our interest and unworthy of our confidence and support for any office, State or National." A committee comprising Judge A. G. Stakes, Thomas J. Keyes, P. A. Athearn and Wm. Lanus was appointed to visit the Capitol and interview the senators. On the day of their arrival, April 2, the senate received notice that the assembly had passed the bill. Ten days later by a vote of 13 to 9 the bill was indefinitely postponed. Senator Bradley, who voted in the negative changed his vote to yes and moved a reconsideration of the vote. On the following day they refused by a vote of 19 to 14 to reconsider their vote of the previous day. Then again came the vote on indefinite postponement of the bill which carried 16 to 15. It was a close call.

This was the second attempt to divide the northern part of the county, the first bill to that effect having been introduced in 1857, but met with no response. For the third time a division bill was introduced in 1860, money having been freely expended in order to carry out the scheme. The leader in the movement was Jerry R. Woods, the founder of Woodbridge; he was well supported by his two lieutenants, Assemblymen Campbell of San Joaquin, who superseded the honest assemblyman, G. C. Holman, and Goodman of Sacramento county. So sure were these men that the county bill would become a law during the winter they published in the Sacramento newspapers, "Lots for sale in the proposed new county of Mokelumne," said the Sacramento Standard. During the winter Woods had been industriously engaged in getting the farmers to petition the legislature for the creation of the new county. He made the same argument as did Benson that their taxes would be decreased, and their land increased in value, and again they fell for it. The bill was introduced into the assembly January 26, 1860, by Assemblyman Campbell, petitioning for the formation of the new county, with its boundary line just south of Sacramento County "and seven miles south of the former line." The southern line would have included the towns of Woodbridge, Liberty, Lockeford, Clements, and the present towns of New Hope, Lodi and Acampo.

Fortunately for this county a sudden change of opinion took place among the farming community, and said the correspondent, "those who formerly favored it now bitterly oppose it. One reason, the people did not clearly understand the proposition, and were made to believe that the taxes would be less, but they have discovered that the argument was fallacious. Another reason is that although the lands would be increased in value by having the county seat there, it would be of no advantage to the farmers, for many of them have no titles because of the Chabolla grant, and would have to pay the increase or be ejected; and thereby lose all the improvements nor will it raise any more grain or raise the price of wheat." Andreas Pico, as we have already noticed, claimed almost this entire section of country.

There was another set-back to Woods' scheme, namely, the claim of William Fugitt, that his town, Liberty, should be the county seat. His friends claimed that it was "the center of the population of the proposed county as well as the natural center. Mr. Fugitt had erected a new hotel, as well as other buildings at considerable expense. Woods, fearing that the bill might be defeated by the strong opposition, had the bill changed and the south line extended three miles," "so as to get additional votes," and the correspondent declared, "at any rate we of Woodbridge have got them." "The bill came up for action in the assembly February 28 with five of the members from San Joaquin and Sacramento counties favoring the bill, with Thomas Laspeyre of San Joaquin opposing it." Already 1,000 names have been sent up," said the Republican, "and 300 more today. The signatures represent $3,000,000 and such interests should not be disregarded by the legislature." John C. White, a farmer who was inside the limits of the new proposed county, strongly opposed the change and said he would give $1,000 to have the bill not pass, as the new county would be burdened at the outset by a debt of $36,000. He, however, had no objection to the bill if his ranch be excluded. Laspeyre declared that "from its origin—in 1859—until the present time, private speculation, political aspirations and office seekers had been the 'motor' which had been propelling and advancing this measure." The bill came up for final action in the assembly March 15, and after a long and spirited debate it was indefinitely postponed by a vote of 34 to 23. It was a boomerang to the pro-new county men and Goodman, changing his vote from no to yes, moved a reconsideration of the vote on the morrow. The vote on Goodman's motion stood aye 19, no 34.

Court House Square and Title

Among the many valuable donations of land given to Stockton and San Joaquin County, none are more valuable than block No. 3, now known as the Court House Square. It is valued at $600,000, some say $1,000,000. Previous to 1885 it was believed, and such was the fact, that the city and county had an equal share in the property. That year, however, the board of supervisors commenced suit against the city for the full possession of the block in order that they might build a new and much larger court house. The two judges of the superior courts, Swinnerton and Patterson, sitting en banc gave a very peculiar decision. It was a fifty-fifty decision that began and ended nowhere. They said in substance that Captain Weber deeded the square to the public for a court house and for public use only, as the fee remained in the Weber heirs.

"The legislative authority of the City of Stockton is empowered to manage and control the use of said square" "and that the county has a right to a reasonable space for a county court house and other buildings as the legislative authorities of said city shall deem advisable, for public use and benefit. The city also shall have a reasonable space for public buildings." The Ninth section of this remarkable decision reads as follows, "that since the right to manage and control the said block within the scope of the use dedicated rests with the legislative authority of the city and since said officials are not parties to this suit the court cannot adjudicate therein how much of said square said plaintiff is entitled to use for a court house."

Back of this decision there lies an interesting history. When Captain Weber laid off the site of the present city of Stockton, he, with his usual foresight, designated block No. 3 on the map as a "public square" for the purpose of erecting a court house and other public buildings. In some manner he overlooked or forgot to give the county a deed of the property. "After the first session of the Court of Sessions the attention of the donor was called to the matter and he readily signified his willingness to give the county a title deed to the block," said the grand jury report to Judge Root in 1853. A deed was made but as it was not in legal form it was returned to the grantor together with a blank, legal in form. This blank deed was not filled out so far as known. At that time Captain Weber had no perfect title to his grant and a magistrate of the county, Hariston Amyx, squatted upon the southwest corner of the block, claiming that it was Government land. The Court could not dispossess the squatter, by the law of possessory action as they never had possession. The court, however, employed an attorney, and under Captain Weber's name the squatter was ejected. But no record was made by the court of this action, and they did not perfect the title.

In August, 1851, Captain Weber deeded the "public square" to the City of Stockton in trust for the county. Why the change was made is not known, but the grantor probably was very much displeased because the county had failed to perfect its title to the block. The Republican editor commenting on this change said in August, 1852, "Thus the city were appointed guardians of this portion of the county property with no limited power and they have shown a determination to hold on to it." Mayor Kenney, in his message to the city council the same year said, "The deed is expressed in such doubtful and vague language that the parties who hereafter are to exercise control have as yet come to no final agreement as to their authority and rights in the matter." The county affairs moved along smoothly, the city and county together erected a court house, and the board of supervisors, appointed in 1855 "learned with surprise that the county had no legal right to the county square." The matter was settled in August, that same year, when the common council passed an ordinance authorizing the conveyance of one-half of the public square to the county. The deed was recorded October 25 of that year. The city and county officials lived in peace and harmony until 1884. Then there was a great need for a new court house, for the old dilapidated building had outworn its usefulness. The board of supervisors, determined to hold possession of the ground, made several propositions to the city council, but they could come to no agreement. The supervisors without any delay commenced suit against the city, claiming ownership of the block since 1851. The city denied their claim, and the trial took place September 4, 1885, before the judges above named. The county was represented by the district attorney, Ansel Smith, and Joseph H. Budd, the city was defended by the city attorney, Frank Smith and W. L. Dudley, and Hall McAllister of San Francisco guarded the rights of the Weber heirs. The judges, October 2, gave that 50-50 decision. The present court house was built, finished in 1891, and by agreement, the city of Stockton officials were to occupy the north half of the first floor for fifteen years, the time dating from February 7, 1891. In February, 1901, the supervisors by resolution notified the city council that their lease expired in 1906 and the supervisors desired to give them sufficient notice so that they could build a city hall or secure suitable rooms. Two years before the expiration of their lease, the common council of the city pleaded for a further ten-year lease of the rooms they were occupying. This request was refused by the board of supervisors. They, however, granted the city an extension lease from year to year. Time went on, however, there was no effort made by the lessors to move and February 4, 1909, the supervisors passed a resolution which they enforced, "Resolved, that the City of Stockton be asked to procure other quarters as soon as possible" for the county was overcrowded for room. Unfortunately for the progress of the city, at that time the Hotel Stockton was being erected, and the city obtained rooms in the annex of that hotel. They are there today paying a heavy rent—an unnecessary expense to the city. This is the exact spot, where in 1860 Captain Weber offered the city the entire block free of cost for a city hall or market place.

Court House and City Hall

Poverty makes no distinction between the individual and the corporation poor, and as the young county had no money or revenue they were compelled to rent rooms. These rooms were in what was then known as the McNish Building, a large two-story wooden structure on the northwest corner of Hunter and Channel streets. It was occupied by the county officials, the court of sessions, lawyers' offices, sleeping apartments and jail. The prison was in the basement. The expense to the county was heavy, $7,900 a year, this including $290 a month for two watchmen to guard the jail. The grand jury in their December, 1851, report to Judge Stakes said, "the rent money, if applied to the erection of an edifice (court house and jail) would give to the county suitable buildings and relieve the county of one of its heaviest expenses." "The county at the time was heavily in debt, $45,000," said the judge, "and the county securities were almost valueless." We must keep in mind that the court of sessions managed the entire business of the county, and the county was enabled to considerably decrease the debt during the following two years, says the Times, "for the court is disposed to economize in every particular in order that public buildings soon may be erected." The press was strongly partisan and the editor continuing, says, "Albeit Judge Stakes is a Whig, we must do him the justice to say he has exhibited a sincere desire to place the county financially on a stable basis." Necessity is oftentimes the mother of action, and the court losing no time, in the spring of 1853, a bill was introduced into the legislature and passed granting them permission to erect a court house and jail. The city council also took action, and in May both agreed to the plans and specification and bids were called for, for a court house and jail. The call was signed by Judge A. G. Stakes for the county, and B. E. Owens, P. E. Jordan, two merchants of the city, and W. W. Stevenson, a pastor of the Christian Church, for the city of Stockton. The contract to erect the court house was signed early in July, the work was rushed along, and in August the foundation was ready for the laying of the cornerstone.

This honor was offered to the San Joaquin Lodge of Masons; they refused to accept it because F. E. Corcoran, the architect of the building and a member of the lodge, had not been appointed as constructing supervisor. The invitation was then offered and accepted by the two Odd Fellow lodges, Charity No. 6 and Stockton No. 11. The laying of the cornerstone, August 6, 1853, was a very crude affair. The Odd Fellows, assembling at their Center Street hall at 9 o'clock in the morning, marched to the site of the new building. The articles to be placed in the cornerstone were placed in a glass jar and sealed, the cap of the stone was then cemented in place by Deputy Grand Master Edward W. Colt; an address was delivered by Judge Stakes and an oration by George Ryer, a favorite actor then playing an engagement in the city. This was the only cornerstone laid by the Odd Fellows save their own building in 1867. The Masons cornered all of the subsequent honors.

The building, of the Doric style of architecture, in size 60x80 feet and about 50 feet in height, was completed late in 1853, and occupied jointly by the city and the county officials. The city occupied the south and the county the north half of the building. There were twelve rooms on the lower, two court and two jury and a city hall on the upper floor, with a single stairway. The building was of brick, walls and foundation faced with Vallejo sandstone. There were two wide halls on the first floor leading to the entrances on the four streets of the square. The city hall was the assembling place of the common council, firemen and military balls, church festivals, political conventions, etc., until the erection of the agricultural hall in 1861 on the east side of the square. In that year the court house clock and bell tower were erected, both of which are now on the Hunter Street engine house. The building is said to have cost about $80,000 and to have been paid for equally by the city and county, but in the court evidence in 1885, S. Williams, a supervisor in 1855, testified that the city paid the principal part of the debt, as no great revenue was derived from the county until 1870 because the land was of so little value.

For some time no effort was made to improve the square, but in 1858 a chain fence was built by the city and county at a cost of $1,700. It was a curious fence made of posts painted and sanded; in each post four holes were bored, through which one inch link chains were run. It was neither rabbit nor hog proof, but it would have kept out the stray horses and cows, had the gates to the enclosure been put in place. This neglect caused the editor to inquire in 1861, "The cows were in the plaza Sunday afternoon regaling themselves on the flowers, shrubs and trees recently set out. Where are those whirling contrivances to be put upon the posts?" In 1860 there was a complete change in administration, from Democratic to Republican, and Mayor E. S. Holden presented a plan to the council for beautifying the plaza. The council accepted the plan and immediately appropriated fifty dollars for the work. An additional $100 was obtained by subscriptions. The ground was plowed up, sown with Bermuda grass and trees, shrubs and flowers planted from the beautiful home gardens of Dr. E. S. Holden, B. P. Kooser, George West and Captain Charles M. Weber. These improvements remained until the erection of the present court house; then the trees and flowers were all uprooted and the present single terraced blue grass lawn and palm trees planted.

Old Time Dirt Roads

Traveling today at thirty-five miles an hour, the speed limit of the law, over the 488 miles of good roads in San Joaquin County how many realize the time, trouble and expense it took to bring those highways up to the present standard? The present roads have been in existence less than fifteen years. Previous to that time the roads, with two or three exceptions, were thick with dust during the summer and deep with mud in winter. The winter of 1860-61 seems to have been unusually bad and the reporter said, "At no period have the roads been as bad for many years as this year and the footman in coming into the city is compelled for a half mile at a time to work his way along the fence rails."

The Legislature of 1850 passed an act concerning roads and highways and under this act the Court of Sessions appointed road overseers, one to each township. So large was the area under their jurisdiction and so few the population, they accomplished nothing, for no roads were laid out or surveyed. The farmers purchasing ranches, laid off roads to suit their own convenience. They wanted the main road to pass their door thus increasing the value of their land. One farmer, Dr. L. C. Chalmers, a Southern man and friendly with the Government officials, persuaded them to drive the Government wagons, en route to Fort Miller, Fresno County, over his road. This made it a Government road and to this day it is a public highway, and known as the Mariposa Road. Chalmers later founded Collegeville, now known as Eight Mile Corners.

The Court of Sessions in 1852 appointed road commissioners and authorized them to lay off roads 100 feet in width to the ferries, as the population had increased largely and there were well defined lines of travel to the Doak & Bonsell, the Slocum, and the Heath & Emory ferries on the Stanislaus and San Joaquin rivers, to French Camp, Knights Ferry and the Woods and Staples ferries on the Mokelumne River. The laying off of the highways compelled the traveler to ride along certain lines, and an old pioneer, complaining of the Lower Sacramento or Woods Ferry Road, declared, "I have traveled this road for the past ten years and hope to see the time when it will not be necessary to box the compass in going a distance of less than two miles on the level plain. The time was when we had graceful curves in the mud to keep on high ground, but since the county has become civilized we are obliged to turn square corners and go through bottomless pits of mud and through neighbors' fields and pay toll." He was also complaining of the location and the crooked condition of the road. If the road were straight and "there are no valuable lands, no improvements such as houses, barns, orchards or trees to prevent the road being run in a straight line it would intercept the northern extremity of El Dorado Street. But in the space of three quarters of a mile there are two obtuse and two right angles which causes the road to end 300 yards west of El Dorado Street." This year, 1921, the city council paid $3,000 for a lot 100 feet front, in order to straighten the roadway and make it safe for the speeding automobiles, probably 3,000 a day passing that point. The old pioneer condemned the road, as "the land for the most part is wet alkaline soil, which it will cost a large sum of money to make passable during the winter. And if the supervisors think such a road will be tolerated just because one or two individuals own the land and want to get their hands into the county pocket for land that is worthless they will soon hear from the public." The land is some of the best in the county and for many years Italian gardeners have been cultivating it. It was at that time a very poor location for a public road and we find that in 1860 the road commissioners, I. V. Leffler and Thomas K. Hook, and Duncan Beaumont, the county surveyor, called for bids for the replanking of nine culverts and the building of a bridge over Mitchell slough, at a cost of $1,600, within a distance of three miles.

The automobilist finds that almost every road has many unnecessary crooks and turns, and I will give one more reason for the cause. The so-called Sonora Road does not run to this city but connects with the Mariposa Road about two miles out. The road commissioners were desirous of laying a straight road towards Sonora, on what is now called the Copperopolis Road, which extends from Main Street east. But the farmers held them up and demanded exorbitant prices for the right of way. In the meantime Captain Weber and General Conner succeeded in obtaining rights of way for a road leading from the gravel pits two miles from town, directly east. Then Alexander Burkett, James Marsh and others got out an injunction stopping work on the new road. Judge Creanor dissolved the injunction, declaring that the road commissioners had full power to build the road where they deemed it advisable.

Beginning of Good Roads

There was much trouble, lawsuits, fights and one or two murders over the question of public roads. Happily it ended in the new era, the building of gravel turnpike roads by public-spirited men. Stockton, for over three months during the winter season, was cut off from the interior by the insurmountable sea of mud that surrounded it. If it were possible to reach French Camp, travel from there to the mountain camps over the sandy road was easy. Late in the '50s a movement to build a winter road to that point was unsuccessful. In March, 1867, another move was made to build the road and a number of merchants and farmers met in the office of Simpson & Gray, lumber merchants, for the preliminary organization to build a turnpike from Stockton to the "camp." They again assembled in the Court House, April 22, and effected a permanent organization by electing Edward Moore, president; Herbert E. Hall, secretary; B. W. Bours, treasurer, and Louis M. Hickman, Samuel Fisher and Martin McClelland, directors. The company was organized with a capital stock of $20,000, with 800 shares at $25 each, the corporation to remain in existence twenty years. In the meantime subscription books had been opened and Wm. McKee reported $12,075 had been subscribed. Henry B. Underhill offered a resolution in the meeting, which was adopted, that they proceed to begin work as soon as possible and without any delay. John Wallace, the pioneer surveyor, was ordered to report the cost of three routes to French Camp. He reported that the route on the west side of the race track, now called the Hogan Road, five and a half miles in length, covered with gravel and including culverts, would cost $77,040. The middle or present French Camp route, three and a half miles in length, would cost approximately $42,104, and the present west embankment road, four miles in length, forty feet in width, covered with sand thirty feet in width, twelve inches deep in the middle, would cost $42,104. As the company had nearly enough money subscribed to pay for the last-named road the capital stock was increased to $30,000 and the work was commenced and completed in September, 1867. It was a toll road and so heavy was the travel the road averaged seventy-five dollars a day, the secretary, Andrew W. Simpson, reported, and the first year they paid off $2,000 of the mortgage.

It has been the great trouble with Stockton that when one party would start a progressive movement, some other element, instead of encouraging and boosting the project, would start a counter movement. This envy on the part of fossil citizens killed the enterprise. In the good roads project the case was different, for the city could not have too many good roads leading to it, but even in this they came near ruining the whole movement by overdoing it, for in 1868 four projects were started and subscriptions requested for several lines of turnpikes.

In March, 1867, a meeting was held in the city hall for the purpose of building a gravel turnpike to the thriving village of Linden. It was quite a large settlement, and they wanted a winter road into Stockton. Rynerson & Wasley, proprietors of the Linden flour mill, had subscribed $1,000. L. M. Hickman $750, and Dr. Christopher Grattan $5,000 in gravel from his ranch gravel pit at twenty cents a load. The meeting was a complete failure. Alderman C. G. Hubner, an enterprising German, who later founded Hill's Ferry in Stanislaus County, said: "I am ashamed to tell you how many were there, they were so few in number. I went home very much disheartened and discouraged." The success of the French Camp turnpike seems to have given the weak-hearted projectors courage, as a year later the Stockton and Linden Turnpike Company was organized and carried on to completion. The capital stock was placed at $20,000, with 800 shares at $25 each. The time of existence twenty years. Roley E. Wilhoit was elected president, Charles S. Stevens, secretary, and B. W. Bours, treasurer. Henry Ortman, William Tierney, Charles Moreing, John Wasley and Thomas Corcoran were the directors. A survey was made by Engineer Wallace and a gravel road completed to the home of Henry Ortman, eight miles out. Winter travel was possible from that point into Stockton from Linden, as it is a gravelly soil.

In April, 1868, the Calaveras Chronicle, having in mind the failure of the Stocktonians to build the Linden turnpike, presented this not overdrawn picture: "On Monday last our town was invaded by a pack-mule train comprising fifty mules owned by Louis Beysser of Stockton. They were loaded with freight of various kinds for our merchants. This means of conveyance was necessary in consequence of the glutinous condition of the black mud of the valley, which being about the consistency of glue, will not allow the passage of teams. Where are the gravel roads of which our Stockton friends have been raving about for years? We would advise our merchants to patronize the Latrobe railroad to Sacramento, over which goods can be obtained any time of year."

The citizens and farmers were now trying to outdo each other in road building. In March, 1868, a petition was presented to the board of supervisors requesting the grant of a charter to James Gillis, Alexander Burkett, James Marsh and James Smythe to construct a gravel road seven and a half miles out on the Copperopolis road. This was the first traveled Sonora road and, as Copperopolis was a big thriving town because of the discovery of copper, there was heavy travel over that route. The supervisors granted the charter. The company was organized with James Smythe, president; George W. Melone, secretary, and Edward Hickman, treasurer. The capital stock was $30,000, divided into 1,200 shares at twenty-five dollars per share. Twenty years was the time of life.

Another turnpike projected and constructed at this time was the Cherokee Lane gravel turnpike. John Grattan, the pioneer farmer who lived upon that road, said in speaking of the natural road, "The conditions had become so bad that it was almost impossible to reach Stockton by a rig." One year his family had consumed all of their flour, and Mr. Grattan, going to Stockton on foot through the mud, purchased a fifty-pound sack of flour and packed it home on his back. It is therefore not surprising that he was very enthusiastic over the construction of a gravel road. At this time a gravel road had been constructed a mile in length from East Street of the city to Madame Fisher's. There the road forked, as it does today, the right hand dirt road running to Waterloo, Lockeford and Sutter Creek, and the left hand or Cherokee to Sacramento. In April, 1868, a petition was presented to the supervisors for the construction of this road. The petition was signed by L. U. Shippee, John Grattan, Cornelius Swain, Elias Hildreth, Joseph C. Davis, W. D. Ashley, W. H. Post, George Moshier, John E. Moore, Dan McCoy and Lois M. Cutting. The officers were L. U. Shippee, president; Henry T. Compton, secretary, J. M. Kelsey, treasurer, and James C. Gage, L. H. Bannock, Cornelius Swain and W. D. Ashley, directors. The estimated cost was $30,000. As many of the city streets were impassable in winter, the company were compelled to start their road on Poplar Street, and running north connect nine miles distant with the sandy soil. The gravel was obtained from the Hildreth gravel pit and the road was completed in time for the winter travel. The travel over this route was very heavy, as all the mountaineers came into Stockton over that road.

Another gravel road constructed at this time, June, '69, was the Waterloo gravel turnpike. One might suppose that the farmers would have built the road long before this time. The following item gives the reason why. April 7, 1867—"A gentleman informs us that there are eight wagons stuck fast in the mud on the Waterloo road not much more than a mile from the city. One farmer yesterday had to be hauled out with ropes, and a driver of a light wagon had to pay an Italian two dollars for the privilege of driving over his land." But there were many knockers in that day and when W. H. Fairchilds, W. L. Overheiser and many others petitioned the supervisors for a charter, these knockers protested. They declared a free public road was an absolute necessity and if the petition be granted there would be no road to Lockeford free of expense. Paying no attention to the silly argument the supervisors granted the charter, fixing the following rate of toll: Man and horse, 12½ cents; horse and sulky, 25 cents; horse and buggy, 37½ cents; two horses and buggy, 50 cents; two-horse wagon, 25 cents; six-horse wagon, 75 cents; pack animals, 12½ cents each; loose horses or cattle, 5 cents; sheep or hogs, 3 cents. The toll gate was at the fork of the road.

Determined to have a good winter road, about seventy farmers assembled in Ripley hall, Waterloo, April 16, '69, to discuss the ways and means of constructing the road. The meeting was called to order by Jonathan H. Dodge, and H. H. Thurston was elected president, and R. P. Heath, secretary. After considerable discussion they decided to obtain the money by taxing those whose property was alongside the road two dollars per acre, and one dollar per acre for those farmers who would be benefited by its construction. In this way they expected to obtain about $15,000. Among those who would be most heavily assessed were W. H. Fairchilds $1,000, W. L. Overheiser $1,600, J. R. Corey $540, Seth Pierson $460. The company was incorporated April 30, 1869, under the laws of California, and W. H. Fairchilds was elected president, Thomas P. Heath, secretary, and John H. Tone, treasurer. The road was surveyed by Engineer Wallace, six and one-half miles, a gravel road, forty feet wide, with a covering of twenty-five feet of gravel, nine inches deep in the center. The estimated cost was $38,731. The road was completed that year and in time became a free road in accordance with the state law of 1868. This law declared that a board of supervisors could purchase a toll or turnpike road at any time; and at the termination of the life of a corporate turnpike it became a free public road.

San Joaquin County, although conservative regarding many progressive movements, was the leader in California of our present splendid public highways. J. M. Eddy, a newspaper writer of San Joaquin County, is the father of good roads here. For many years he would frequently write editorials on good roads and water conservation, and when, in 1907, the legislature passed the so-called Savage Act concerning highways, Mr. Eddy believed the time had arrived for action. Getting in touch with the Federal Government at Washington, then being secretary of the Chamber of Commerce, he requested the Government to send an expert road builder to Stockton for the purpose of constructing an "object lesson" road; the Government complying with the request sent out R. G. Morton, who arrived in March, 1908, and without any preliminaries began a study of the different kinds of soil over which the road might be built, the quality of rock at hand and the climatic conditions affecting roads.

Mr. Eddy's next move was to organize a State Good Roads Association. With this end in view Chamber of Commerce letters were sent out to the counties of the state requesting them to send delegates to a state convention, to meet at Stockton June 1, 1908. Over thirty counties responded and sent their delegates. The secretary reported the following as delegates from the Stockton Chamber of Commerce: John M. Perry, M. J. Gardner, James A. Barr, George F. Hudson, J. P. Sargent, D. A. Guernsey, Louis H. Frankheimer and John T. Lewis; from the Good Roads Bureau the delegates were Pliny E. Holt, Frank E. Ellis, Charles L. Neumiller, Frank A. Guernsey, Charles E. Littlehale, George L. Luhrsen, John Brichetto. The Highway Commission also were delegates. They assembled in the rooms of the Chamber of Commerce and perfected their organization by electing Charles D. Daggett of Los Angeles, president; Mike L. Tarpey of Fresno, vice-president; W. E. Gerber of Sacramento, second vice-president, and J. M. Eddy, secretary-treasurer. The delegates that evening attended a good roads meeting in Lodi. They were welcomed by Mayor George Lawrence. The following day they visited the object lesson road then under construction, "for the fact that a two-mile strip of road is being constructed under the supervision of the United States Government has attracted the attention of the entire state."

Several weeks previous to this time much preliminary work, which was required by the Savage Act, had been carried out. A Good Roads Bureau had been organized and they not only began an educational campaign by visiting every precinct in the county, but they obtained over 10,000 of the names of the voters at the previous election. It was a petition to the supervisors, petitioning the board to appoint a Highway Commission to "pave the way for a bond issue." The supervisors granted the petition May 4 and named as commissioners Frank A. West, Burton N. Towne and Stewart P. Elliott. These three young men had accepted a big responsibility and for several months assisted by the Government engineer and George L. Cooley, a road expert, they gave their thought and time to this work. Their only recompense was fifty cents an hour while engaged in road work.

In locating a strip of road for his object lesson, the Government engineer selected a piece of road some two miles on the Mariposa route, commencing about a half mile east of the race track. He had selected for his experiment "one of the worst stretches of black soil, the most difficult soil on which to construct permanent roadways known to experts." The proposed road was to be covered with macadam then rolled with a heavy roller, and covered with asphalt oil. The supervisors then called for bids for the work. It was something entirely new in contract work and the contractors were afraid to bid. There was only one bid, that of John Perry, president of the Chamber of Commerce, and April 25 the supervisors accepted his offer to do the work for $16,400, "the actual cost of the improvement." The work was commenced May 17 and completed late in the fall of 1908. Although they have learned many things about road building since that time—one that a permanent road must have a concrete foundation—that piece of road was so well constructed it held good for six years of the heaviest of county travel. The money to build this road was subscribed by the Chamber of Commerce, the supervisors and public-spirited citizens.

In accordance with the state law the highway commission, after several months work, February 11, 1909, reported to the supervisors the result of their labor. They recommended that 288 miles of road be constructed of the best rock macadam and covered with asphalt oil, the highways to be from sixteen to thirty-two feet in width, according to the location and the amount of travel, the main highways to have a sixteen-foot macadam two inches thicker than at the sides. Taking the object road as their estimate of cost they recommended that the supervisors call a special election for the peoples' decision on a bond issue of $1,890,000 to run for forty years. The supervisors granted their recommendation, and called an election for March 16, 1909. The commission recommended the construction of the following roads, the numerals indicating the proposed length of each road. The Lower Sacramento Road, 20 to the county line; the Cherokee Lane 14, from Lodi to Lockeford 4, to Woodbridge 2, to New Hope 14, along the Waterloo road 19, along the Linden road 12, along the Copperopolis road 8, to Farmington 13, along the Mariposa road 17, the Hogan road 9, over the French Camp road 13, and over the Roberts Island and the Jacobs Road, each road six miles of macadam. On the West side, 23 miles were to be constructed.

Educational Campaign

Now came the hardest of all the work, the education of the people, for the progressive men had learned after many years that any progressive movement must be preceded by an educational campaign of the citizens. A campaign was planned, meetings were held and addressed by interesting and sound, logical speakers in every precinct of the county. Questions were asked the speakers from every point of the subject by skeptics, tightwads and unbelievers and every question successfully answered, for the speakers were well fortified with the facts as to the cost, the taxable rate and the beneficial results. The farmer was shown by actual demonstration that on the new road he could haul more tons with two horses and at a less cost than with six animals over the dirt road. He could reach the market with his produce at any season of the year, an impossibility in winter. Commercial, secret and professional associations indorsed the bond issue. The physicians, in indorsing it said, "Many lives have been lost through the inability of the physician to reach the bedside of the patient in time." The experience of Dr. Grattan in the '50s was proof of this fact. While visiting a patient, several miles in the country on horseback, for the roads were deep in mud, the cholera broke out in Stockton and his wife was attacked with the disease. When the physician returned she was beyond recovery. In telling me of the incident some years ago he said "I could have saved her could I have gotten back in time." Some men who opposed the bonds later saw the error of their ways. One of this number was Augustus Muentner, the extremely frugal capitalist and financier. "I was against the bonds at the start," he said, "but I have changed my mind, a thing I don't often do." Meeting E. E. Thrift, that gentleman told Mr. Muentner he was going to vote for the bonds. The capitalist quickly exclaimed, "Don't you know that Stockton will have to pay two-thirds of the taxes." "Yes," he replied, "but we have been bottled up all winter and I am willing to pay my share of the taxes for good roads and get out of the mud once for all." "That set me to thinking," said Mr. Muentner. His change of base made many votes for the bonds, for the vacillating voters said, "If Muentner approves of spending the county money it surely is all right." Another great help was the indorsement of the bonds by the labor unions. We are all of us guided in our actions to some extent by the opinions of those we believe to be well informed on the subject. Many votes were obtained, especially among the Catholics, by a published indorsement for the bonds, of Father William O'Connor, one of the most progressive men in the county. During the campaign there was scarcely any money expended. There were no fireworks, flags, automobile hire, not even a brass band. It was a heart of heart talk on a vital question, the future progress of San Joaquin. The result was pleasing to everybody, even the knockers. Some men are so constituted they enjoy defeat.

The total county vote was 6,184; for the bonds 5,449; opposed 1,685. As it required 4,122 votes, the necessary two-thirds majority to carry the election, the majority for the bonds was 377. Stockton voted for the bonds over three to one, the vote being 2,320 for and only 728 no. Four precincts, among them Lodi, gave a small majority against the bonds, and yet when they learned the result of the vote the citizens "paraded up and down Sacramento Street blowing horns and whistles and the bells rung out the joyful news." During the campaign the Chamber of Commerce offered a beautiful silk flag to the precinct giving the greatest pro rata vote for the bonds. Strange to say the flag was won by the small village of Germans living in Bethany, in the extreme southwest part of the county. They cast an unanimous 44 votes for the bonds. The bonds were sold in sections, and as soon as possible work was commenced on the Lower Sacramento Road to the county line. In 1911 a continuous highway had been completed from the middle of the steel bridge over Dry Creek through Stockton to the county line, the middle of the bridge over the Stanislaus River. In that year the Cherokee Lane Road was completed to Lodi. Since the county bond issue 200 miles more of good roads have been constructed. The state, under the $1,800,000 bond issue, has taken over all of the main lines in the county.

CHAPTER VI

BUSINESS DAYS AND BUSINESS WAYS

IN THE history of the world there is no event like the rush to California "in the days of '49." The march of the Crusaders to the Holy Land was somewhat similar. There was, however, this difference; the Crusaders invaded a land already populated and with food, shelter and comforts a-plenty, while the Argonauts rushed into a territory almost a wilderness, with none of the necessities of life. Thousands of pioneers landed upon California's shore without food or extra clothing, many of them with only a few dollars. They hastened to California with the idea that the earth was covered with gold and that the "first arrivals would get the entire crop." Others, wiser in their day, formed companies and chartering ships for a voyage around Cape Horn filled their vessels with cargoes of provisions sufficient to last them many months. My father was one of a company of men who in 1848 chartered the brig Lenark for a voyage from Boston, Mass., around the horn to San Francisco. They loaded the brig with provisions sufficient to last them for two years, and entering the Golden Gate after an eight months' voyage sailed up the San Joaquin to Stockton. Leaving the ship in charge of the captain, the company went to the mines. Returning a few months later they found that the captain had sold all the provisions at a high price and had sailed for China. In the New York Tribune, Horace Greeley in describing this rush of goldseekers, wrote, "Bakers keep their ovens hot day and night, turning out immense quantities of ship bread, without supplying the demand; the provision stores of all kinds are besieged by orders. Manufacturers of rubber goods, rifles, pistols, bowie knives, etc., can scarcely supply the demand." Mechanics brought their tools, tailors brought bolts of cloth, as we have noticed in the case of Benjamin Brown, and a brick mason, William Saunders, brought a quantity of brick. He sold them to Captain Weber at one dollar per brick, and erected in his home the first brick chimney in the San Joaquin Valley.

Population

The estimate of the population in 1849 sent in a memorial to Congress by the first constitutional convention was 107,000. In the spring of 1848 there was in the territory a population of native and foreign born numbering 10,000. They were located almost entirely in the pueblos (towns) of San Diego, Los Angeles, Monterey, San Jose, Yerba Buena (San Francisco) and Sonoma. There were a few foreigners at Sutter's Fort, and a few at Tuleburg, now Stockton. Then came the wild rush and in a few months the Sierra Nevada Mountains from "the Fort" to Mariposa were alive with gold diggers prospecting for gold nuggets. At that time Sacramento had an estimated population of 5,000, San Francisco 10,000, and Stockton 2,000. There were at least 15,000 in the so-called Southern mines—all of the territory south of the Cosumnes River. This population was largely increased month by month by new arrivals, and according to the United States census of 1860 there was that year 374,560 men, women and children in California. In the counties of Amador, Calaveras, Tuolumne, Tulare and Mariposa there was a population of nearly 50,000, and 50 per cent of the number were strong, vigorous men between the ages of twenty and forty years. This was the aggregate population, as I have stated in 1860, but in 1870 it had been reduced to 24,118. The miners were fast leaving the mountain camps and locating in the valley. Stanislaus, Merced, Fresno and other counties had been created, and therein settled many of the mountain inhabitants. San Joaquin County, which had in 1850 a population of 3,647, in 1860, 9,435, had increased in 1870 to 21,050. I have given these figures to show principally the vast amount of supplies that were sold in, or that passed through Stockton to the interior counties. There were no railroads, and all kinds of merchandise came into the city by steamer or sailing vessel. It was in fact often called the depot of the Southern mines.

The Magic City

Stockton was built up in a period of four months, and Bayard Taylor, the correspondent of the New York Tribune, traveling through Stockton in 1849, said he found a canvas city of 1,000 inhabitants and twenty-five ships at anchor in the harbor. James H. Carson, passing through the town in the same year on his return from the mines, wrote, "When I arrived May 1, 1849, a change had come over the scene since I had left it. Stockton that I had last seen graced by Joe (Willard) Buzzell's log cabin with a tule roof was now a vast linen city. The tall masts of the brigs, barques and schooners, high pointed, were seen in the blue vault above, while the merry 'yo-ho' of the sailor could be heard as box, bale and barrel were landed on the banks of the slough. A rush and whirl of human being was constantly before the eye; the magic wand of gold had been shaken over the desolate place and a city had arisen at the bidding of Minerva full-fledged."

STOCKTON HARBOR—1851

Necessity is the mother of invention, said the author, and it is oftentimes the mother of location, because it was necessary for the merchants, especially during the winter months, to be located as near as possible to the steamers and sailing vessels. In 1850 we find almost the entire business section within a radius of 200 yards, with Center Street as the axis. Within the circle we find Buffington & Lum, house carpenters, opposite the steamboat wharf; Davis & Smith, wholesale dealers in provisions, dry goods, mining tools, etc., Center Street; MacPherson & Nichols, general merchandise, Main near Center; Von Detten-Waldrow & Company, merchants, on the Peninsula; Coma & Washburn, Levee Street, dealers in provisions, hardware, mining tools, crockery, tinware and clothing; Marshal & Nichols, auctioneers, Levee; Morton & Ward, butchers, El Dorado; McSpeden & Company, merchants, corner Main and El Dorado; Dr. Simpson, drugs, medicines, books, stationery, Main and El Dorado; George Belt, merchant, Levee; Todd & Bryan, express company with Adams & Company, Center; Starbuck & Spencer, merchants, corner Levee and Commerce; Slocum & Company, Peninsula, two doors from the Stockton House and opposite the postoffice; William Dutch, watchmaker and jeweler, Center, next door to the Central Exchange; Sparrow & Navarro, Hunter Street, bricks on sale; Guibal & Dharboure, wholesale merchants, Center and Washington; Drs. Clements & Reins, drugs, corner Center and Weber avenue; R. J. Stevens & Company, Peninsula; J. R. Foster & Company, merchants, Peninsula, Corinthian Building, next door to postoffice; Peninsular Livery Stable, Channel Street; Henry Jones, boots and shoes, Center, five doors from Main; Ware's Daguerrean saloon in the Gault House, Center and Market; bath house, B. W. Owens, between Main and Weber Avenue; Emil Junge, general merchandise, store ship Susannah, Mormon Slough; Stockton Hospital, corner Center and Market, Drs. Radcliffe and Lasvignes, of Paris. Center Street was so named because it was the center of business, but in less than four years the business places had extended along El Dorado and Hunter streets and east on Main Street and Weber Avenue to Sutter Street, and even beyond that street. In 1853 my father had a meat market, corner of Main and Sutter, together with a boarding house, this indicating that quite a large number of persons worked and lived in that vicinity. The livery stables were the first cause of the extension of business. They required a large space of land for their stables and yard room for the use of the teamsters. There were two stables on the south side of Main Street between Sutter and California. Andrew Wolf was the proprietor of one and "Stuttering" Smith, the other. A. J. Colburn had a stable on Main near Grant Street. Simon Weterau, a stable and the Avenue hotel, on Weber Avenue opposite the San Joaquin engine house. Charles Dallas conducted a livery on Weber Avenue near San Joaquin Street. These stables caused the erection nearby of blacksmith and wagon shops, and then boarding and lodging houses. Four of them were on Main Street in 1856 within a space of three blocks, the American house, kept by Mrs. Cadien, the Western hotel, Mrs. Pope, Sutter and Main, Cottage Home, one block west, Charles Mead, proprietor, and the Main Street Hotel, opposite the court house, George Allesworth, landlord. And then the Crescent City Hotel, where now stands the Hippodrome Theater.

Among the prominent merchants at that time was B. F. Cheatham and Thomas E. Ketcham, a lieutenant in the famous Stevenson Regiment, and a captain in the Third Regiment, California Volunteers during the Civil War. The two men were partners in a merchandise store on the Levee, the firm name reading Ketcham & Cheatham. One night a wag changed the sign, and the following morning the whole town was laughing, for the sign said, I. Ketcham & U. Cheatham. The story was frequently told thirty years later. Cheatham later kept the Hotel de Mexico. He was a man of southern birth, a gambler and sport, but nevertheless one of the prominent men of the town. He was also a leading Democrat, and returning to the South in December '52 the Democratic paper said in fulsome praise, "This gentleman who has long been amongst us and who by the courtesy of his manner and his noble character has won the esteem of his fellow-citizens, leaves next week for his home in Tennessee. The gallant colonel served in the Mexican war, as colonel of the Third Regiment, Tennessee Volunteers." He never again returned to Stockton. In the Civil War he took up arms in defense of the Southern Confederacy and became a general. One day during the war he noticed a burly Irishman cruelly abusing his team. Cheatham, cursing the army teamster, commanded him to stop whipping the mules. The language of the officer quickly aroused the anger of "Pat" and turning to Cheatham, he exclaimed: "General, you are a coward. You know your shoulder straps protect you or you would not use such vile language to me."

Hastily dismounting, and throwing to one side his coat, Cheatham said, "A coward am I, you miserable devil. Look, McCue," pointing to his coat, "There is General Cheatham and his shoulder straps. Here is Frank Cheatham. Come and take satisfaction." The Irishman waltzed in and whipped Frank Cheatham in about two minutes. As the General mounted his horse, McCue, throwing him his coat, said in parting, "There is the whipped Frank Cheatham of the Cumberland Army; and Major-General of the division. General, you can repeat as often as you wish, you will always find Pat at home."

California for over twenty years exported a very small amount and imported an immense amount of supplies of every description. They were imported principally by the wholesale merchants of San Francisco, they in turn selling to the retail merchants of the cities and the retailers in part supplying the mountain camps. These goods all came into San Francisco by steamer across the isthmus tri-monthly or by slow sailing vessel or clipper ships around Cape Horn. By the slow sailers it was a six months' voyage, but by the clipper ships built especially for speed the voyage from New York to San Francisco was sometimes made in three months or less. All heavy or bulky merchandise was shipped around Cape Horn, because the cost of freight was much less than by steamer or the "ocean grey hounds" as the clipper ships were known. The first Stockton steam fire engine came around the Horn, the parts packed in boxes, so did the Episcopal Church organ. Then it often took from six months to a year to receive goods from the Eastern States. Now one may telegraph, and the goods are here in ten days or less.

Stockton had at least three merchants who imported goods, P. M. Bowen & Company, Avery & Hewlett and C. T. Meador & Company. We read in his advertisement in February 1850, that he has just received by the ships Sierra Nevada and Indiana, direct from Boston, 200 cases of candles in cartons, 150 cases of lard in ten-pound tins, 116 half-barrels clear pork, 40 cases of eggs, 50 barrels Carolina rice, 14 drums St. John codfish, 15 cases of ginger one-half pound bottles, 25 cases pineapple, 150 kits mackerel, 25 cases handle axes, 200 dozen three-hoop pails, 100 cases spirits of turpentine. Although for a time this state was the largest wheat producer in the Union, and San Joaquin County the largest grower of wheat, for several years wheat was imported from Chile. It was so full of weevils, however, that the legislature in 1854 passed a law prohibiting its importation. Brown sugar in 200-pound barrels, and molasses in 5-gallon kegs and 63-gallon barrels, was imported from

New Orleans. Later rice and coarse brown sugar in 100-pound mats was imported from China. Black and green tea came from Canton, packed in large chests. H. O. Mathews was the largest importer and an expert on tea. Bottled pie fruits of the finest quality put up for the California trade were imported from England and from the same isle came the anthracite coal used by the blacksmiths. Raisins were imported from Italy and the finest quality of wines, "liqueurs" and champagne from France. At a Thanksgiving dinner in 1850 there were twenty varieties of wine on the list, including the famous Chateau Laffitte and Haute Sauterne Margaux of the vintage of 1825. Tobacco was imported from Virginia and the finest "segars" from Havana. As to fruits and vegetables they were imported for several years from various places outside of the county. Large fine limes, lemons and oranges came from Mexico; bananas from the Sandwich Islands; grapes, large, sweet and juicy, the Mission variety from Los Angeles; and peaches, apricots, plums, nectarines and watermelons from the Sacramento River country. Apples then, as now, were imported from Oregon; and especially large apples weighing a pound and a half were grown for the holiday trade. They were packed in cotton in small square cartons and retailed at four and five dollars each.

Food Prices

The prices, especially that of food supplies, were far below the present day prices, but there was no stability, as they were continually going up and down according to the supply and demand. Perhaps one day the cost of an article would soar sky high, then a ship would enter the harbor loaded with the article in demand, and overstocking the market, it would be impossible to sell the article at any price. On one occasion there was no tobacco to be had, then in came a clipper-ship loaded with tobacco; the price went down to less than cost. One merchant to whom a consignment of tobacco was made, rather than pay heavy storage rates, threw the boxes into the street for stepping stones over the mud. In an old ledger of a grocery merchant of 1856, I find a few prices for that year and they were the prices for many years. At that time saleratus was sold to the customer at 12 cents a pound, potatoes, 9 cents, dried apples, 22 cents, ten-pound sack salt, 38 cents, candles, 27 cents per pound, soda, 25 cents, cream tartar, 50 cents, Java coffee, 25 cents, Rio coffee, $1.00 fifty-pound sack, flour $5.50 per fifty-pound sack, sugar, 20 pounds $1.00, syrup, 90 cents per gallon, yeast powder, 38 cents per pound, starch, 21 cents, pickles, 38 cents a bottle, pie fruit, $3.00 per dozen, sweet oil, 38 cents per bottle, white beans, 4 cents, oysters, 87 cents a can, cod fish, 10 cents a pound, sardines, 37½ cents a can, vinegar, 38 cents a gallon, fence nails, 28 cents, tacks 13 cents a paper, garden seeds, 25 cents a package.

The worries of the merchant of today are nothing as compared with the troubles of the retailer in the days of old. Today a merchant knows his business standing in the community, he knows where he can obtain goods at short notice if he make a contract, he knows the good and the bad debtors and he knows he is reasonably safe from loss by fire or bad weather conditions. The pioneer merchant had all of these conditions with no assurance of the coming day. The buildings were all constructed of wood, flimsy in character with but little or no fire insurance, and no adequate fire department, and he knew not the day nor the hour when a fire would break out through the carelessness of some person, or the match of the arsonist, and in a big conflagration destroy the entire block. Well do I remember that at the cry of fire or the alarm of the fire bell, the entire town would be startled and run to the fire. Now we sometimes count the fire whistle number and pay no more attention to the matter.

The majority of the merchants were poor business men. They had had no experience whatever and they went into business in a haphazard sort of way trusting to luck, as the saying goes. Some found their place and were successful, others were complete failures. And you will find the record showing where men were engaged in a half dozen different kinds of business in as many different years. Austin Sperry took up the barley and flour mill business, and when past seventy years died a part owner of the Sperry Flour Co.; Andrew Wolf crossed the plains overland, founded a livery stable and between the stable and farming he left a fortune; Andrew W. Simpson bought into the lumber business with his brother Asa. He died in 1921 worth over $800,000. These men also were good bookkeepers but the majority were failures. There was in vogue for many years a shiftless credit system, and the merchants would credit "Tom, Dick and Harry" without regard to their community standing or ability to pay their debts. Strangers in a strange land, they had no standing either business or social, and perhaps with plenty of money today, they would go "broke" tomorrow, as was the case with thousands of men. It was the custom to collect bills monthly, and families would run up big bills, and then depart for some other town, for families like the individuals, were ever on the move. It was the condition of the times—no permanency in anything. Farmers would run up bills as high as $1,000, expecting to pay after harvest.

If the harvest was good the merchant got his money, if very poor or only fair, just enough for seed, then the merchant was compelled to carry him over another year. Sometimes farmers were dishonest and they would beg off from year to year until the bill was outlawed—five years—then the merchant could whistle for his money. Said a merchant to me one day, pointing to a stack of ledgers piled two feet high, "There's $100,000 in those books."

Another great drawback to business were the weather conditions. Today the condition of poor crops is balanced or nearly balanced by manufacturers and the assistance of horticulture and irrigation. Now in winter you may travel anywhere, then nowhere. We were subject to the whims, if I may so express it, of a kind Providence and upon several occasions when the people were fearful of a drouth, the pastors, like Elijah of old, prayed for rain; and there came rain. We have never had a failure of wheat crops but once, the year following the flood of 1862, and a partial failure in 1872. But if there was no rain in November then the people began to cry "hard times" and tighten their purse strings. The pessimistic cry was contagious, the housewives spent less money, the shops would lay off men, and building improvements would cease. This of course greatly affected business. Then if in early December there came a heavy rain the faces of the people would brighten up, they would congratulate each other. "Fine rain we had, worth a million dollars." Their purses would open up and the merchants with their Christmas goods would do a rushing business. A jeweler told me just after a heavy late November rain, "That rain, George, was worth $10,000 to my business during this holiday season." Strange to say the same heavy rains, if continued through December, killed completely all the merchants' trade. The farmers could not get into town because of the mud, and from the same cause the women of the town would not go out in the slush and mire to do their Christmas shopping. There were no telephones, no street cars, there were but few sidewalks, made of rickety boards, and the merchants who were stocked with Christmas goods, not salable in any other season, lost heavily.

Foreign Miners' Tax

The Southern mines contained two-thirds of the population of the interior, during the first ten or fifteen years, and the mountain camps were the heaviest purchasers of the Stockton merchants. An event which threatened to almost bankrupt the city merchants was the so-called Foreign Miners' Law. The agitation of the Californians against the foreigners, the Japanese, is nothing new. The same agitation was made against the Chinese in 1880, and against the Mexicans and Chileans in 1850. The American miners asserted that the foreigners were digging all the gold and shipping it from the country. It was estimated that there were about 200,000 foreigners in the mines, this number including the Chinese. To offset this drain of gold to some extent the legislature of that year passed a law taxing all foreigners twenty dollars a month. This tax, it was believed, would bring in a big revenue to the depleted state treasury. Collectors were appointed in each mining district with authority to take possession of any of the foreigners' personal property, tools, blankets or other property. The result was a very unexpected surprise. Some of the foreigners resisted paying such an exorbitant tax, but the majority, packing up their household goods, began leaving the mines by the thousands. Because of the exodus the mountain merchants closed their doors for want of customers. The Stockton trade fell off fifty per cent, and the mountaineers had no money to purchase more goods or pay their indebtedness to their creditors. Then the Stockton retailer became a delinquent to the San Francisco wholesaler and there was a financial worry "from the mountains to the sea." This is state history, but the citizens of Stockton were deeply interested and said a citizen, "We do not recollect to have ever before seen in California so large, so respectable and so extensive a gathering as the one at the El Placer House on Thursday evening to take into consideration the subject of the tax on the foreigners. The proceedings were harmonious, spirited and of the right stamp." The mayor of the city, Samuel Purdy, was chairman of the meeting, and a committee comprising John S. Robb, David S. Terry, Dr. George A. Shurtleff, Samuel Knight and William Root were appointed to draft a set of resolutions "expressive of the feelings of the citizens of the southern district of California." It was a good committee of young men, a newspaper man, an attorney, a physician, a merchant, and a judge, all prominent citizens in later years, but they were impetuous and hot headed, and way off on their first resolution. The resolutions, evidently written by Terry, declared that "We look upon the infliction of this tax . . . as but part of a scheme to depress the enterprise of our citizens, and make them tributary to the northern part of the state. It is but one of many measures upon the part of the state to cripple our commerce and destroy our local trade. Resolved, that the infliction of this tax is unconstitutional, unlawful, an outrage upon the practical miner, and of vast injury to the whole people of the district and as a public measure its . . . continuance is a public robbery." A committee was appointed to visit San Jose and urge the repeal of "the odious" law. Remonstrances were sent to the legislature from all parts of the mines and the law was modified and later repealed. Then happened a strange action, for all of the newspapers published the repeal of the law in the Spanish and French languages, and circulars were sent out urging not the exclusion, but the return of the foreigners to the mines.

The foreign tax law was not the merchants' only trouble, for in 1851 they strongly opposed the local tax of two dollars per ton levied upon all merchandise landed upon the wharf. The council were considerably worried over the subject of revenue, a subject of vital importance today. They passed an ordinance, which was signed by Mayor J. C. Edwards, increasing the wharf tax of the steamers from twenty-five to fifty cents. At a subsequent meeting they reduced the tax to the former figure. They must have money to pay their high-salaried officers and September 6, Alderman B. W. Bours presented an ordinance which was adopted, levying the two dollars tax. Then the merchants became unduly excited and at the meeting held two weeks later they petitioned the council to repeal the tax. The record says, "On motion (probably of Dr. J. M. Hill a dentist) the petition was filed." The cause we know not, but immediately six of the aldermen, Dr. George A. Shurtleff, B. W. Bours, E. W. Colt, B. W. Owens, H. C. Gillingham and M. T. Robertson resigned. The councilmen would not accept the resignation of the alderman last named and he remained in office.

The resignation of more than half of the city councilmen created quite a breeze and the Times declared, "It has been a subject of much discussion during the past few days," and which resulted in a call for a meeting in the Main Street Hotel opposite the court house. The feeling in the meeting seems to have been directed, for some reason not apparent, particularly against Dr. J. M. Hill, and a resolution was passed signed by thirty-two of the most prominent firms of the town, among them Dudley & Sanderson; Biven & Branco; M. Ainsa; Calvin Paige & Company; C. A. Gillingham; Avery & Hewlett; B. W. Bours & Company; Lamden-Compton & Trembley, and Hestres & Company, calling upon Councilman Hill to resign. The resolution which was unanimously approved declared that "The undersigned views with surprise your conduct in relation to the disposal of the petitions signed by the merchants, remonstrating against the law . . . as by such conduct you deny the right of petition and give place to a misrepresentation of the views of your constituents, to the great injury of the public at large and detrimental to the future welfare of the city. . . . We respectfully ask you to resign."

The merchants' request was published in the Times September 17, and the same day Alderman Hill received a letter from forty of his friends. The letter said: "We beg to offer you our thanks for the effort and conscientiousness in which you have discharged your duty in the council, and beg that you will continue to be a member notwithstanding the unjust and ungenerous attack upon you by certain citizens." Hill in replying to the merchants said, "In your discourteous card of September 16 you have called upon me to resign. . . . My answer is that having been elected by 600 of the voters of this city, I shall not desert my post to gratify the caprice of a few disaffected individuals styling themselves 'The merchants of Stockton.' Finally, dear sirs, thus do I dispose of your card. Pledged not to resign."

In their assembly of the 16th the merchants appointed a committee to report September 18, in the El Placer House the names of citizens to fill the vacancies in the council. The committee in their report declared the tax "unjust and unequal in its operation because it is exclusively imposed upon the merchants and it is not required to meet any just expense incurred by the city government. Resolved, that while we are willing to submit to all such taxation as an honest and judicious administration of the city government may require, we also declare our intention neither to sanction or submit to the enforcement of such laws as are in direct violation of the Republican principle of equality of burdens. Resolved, That we the undersigned penetrated by the profound conviction of the injustice of the ordinance do hereby pledge ourselves to sustain each other by every means which we command in all legal resistance to the enforcement of the ordinance." They nominated as councilmen to be voted for September 26, B. W. Owens, J. G. Candee, Wm. H. Fairchilds, J. A. Donaldson, Enoch Gove and Isaac Zacariah. The opposition also put up a ticket. The merchants succeeded in electing three only of their nominees, B. W. Owens, W. H. Fairchilds and J. A. Donaldson, but succeeded in their object, as the "odious" tax was repealed.

Ships Block the Harbor

When compiling my History of Stockton—1880—I asked Captain Weber the name of the first vessel that anchored in the channel during the summer and fall of 1849. He threw up his hands as if in despair, thus indicating that they came in so fast he could scarcely count them. In a short time there were a hundred and more ships in the harbor flying at their mast top the flags of every nation—England, France, Germany, Holland, Spain, Sweden, Norway, Mexico and Chile. Even China was represented, for John Grattan said that when he and his brother Dr. Grattan anchored in McLeod's Lake in the 500-ton bark Canton, there was a Chinese junk and an United States ship at anchor. The ships continued coming so many in number they soon blocked the channel. They were such an obstruction to navigation that the steamers and sailers from San Francisco could not land their freight. Something must be done. And the merchants in February, 1850, five months before the organization of the city, sent the following petition to Captain Weber, "The undersigned citizens of Stockton do most respectfully request that you cause to be removed from Stockton slough any vessel or vessels which you may own, lying at anchor in said waters. You will also use your most strenuous influence to have all of the vessels similarly situated taken away from their present position. Such a course is deemed absolutely necessary, particularly to the mercantile interest and those who have invested in real estate. As these vessels are now placed, proper navigation is obstructed and the prosperity and growth of the town very much retarded. That you will cause to be carried into effect at the earliest moment the foregoing expression of public feeling is the prayer of your petitioners." The petition was signed by 107 persons this including thirty-six merchants, nine saloon keepers, three blacksmiths, six carpenters, two real estate dealers, a physician, two butchers, two express agents, a lumberman, seven teamsters, four hotel keepers, lawyers and gamblers. A large number of the vessels were towed to Mormon Channel and destroyed by fire; others were used as store ships for goods, and one for a time for a prison brig. After the organization of the city, the harbor master was given full control of the channel, and all vessels at permanent anchor were ordered to leave on a penalty of ten dollars per day license.

The Brig Adelaide

One of these vessels over which the city had no control was the U. S. Government brig Adelaide. She lay at anchor in McLeod's Lake for over fifteen years, the historic vessel of the city. She also aided materially in causing the Government Board of Waterway Commissioners to act favorably in regard to Stockton's fifteen feet of water to the sea. The ship is seen in the background of a picture of Stockton taken in 1850, this proving that in early days, ocean-sailing vessels anchored in Stockton. This bark sailing into San Francisco harbor in 1849, was purchased by the United States Government for use as a supply ship for the troops located at Fort Miller. She was loaded with supplies and sailed up to Stockton and anchored in the lake. At the close of the Civil War Fort Miller was abandoned. The Government having no use for the brig, she was put up at auction, and sold for $180 to a Norwegian captain, Henry Ramsey. Refitting the brig with new masts he intended to use her as an ocean freighter, but for some reason the port collector at Stockton refused to give him clearance papers. Ramsey was now in a quandry, with an elephant on his hands. Finally he purchased two water lots on the east side of El Dorado Street and at high tide built a bulkhead around the hulk, covered over the deck and opened a saloon. Ramsey lived there until his death, in September 1883. Kullman, Wagner & Company then bought the lots for the extension of the Pacific Tannery, and the old bark was used for firewood.

Disastrous Fires

The greatest fear of the early-day merchant was that of fire and rightly too, for the greatest number and the most disastrous fires in the history of the city occurred in the blocks bounded by Main, Hunter, Weber Avenue or Levee and Commerce streets. Block No. 1, as designated on the official city map, is the birthplace of Stockton. There Willard (Joe) Buzzell built his log cabin and his friends, the hunters and trappers, their tule and brushwood tents. When the merchants intending to go into business arrived at the Weberville embarcadero, they naturally gravitated to block 1 and set up their tents. Flimsy affairs they were, of board frames covered with cloth, with perhaps a tule roof. Business was rushing, for daily men were arriving bound for the mines, expecting to get such supplies as were necessary in Tuleburg. The merchants however were soon put out of business, for on the morning of December 28, 1849, the cry of fire was heard and in less than one hour the town was in ashes. Everything was destroyed with a loss estimated at $200,000. The morning was very cold and there was considerable suffering. That night and for several evenings the homeless pioneers took shelter in the shipping in the harbor. In less than a week business was again resumed.

In the meantime hundreds of immigrants were locating in the new town and the population had increased to over 2,000. The business firms were more than three times the number of 1849 and many of the buildings were constructed of Oregon or Chile pine. This made a much hotter and longer fire than the cloth tents, and on the night of May 6, 1851, the cry of fire was again heard. In a short time the town was a mass of flames. There were no fire engines and the citizens tried to check the devouring element by buckets of water taken from the channel. The loss was nearly $1,500,- 000, with not a dollar of insurance. The heaviest losers were Lamdin & Compton, $6,000; Underhill & Company, $15,000; Heath & Emory, $20,000; E. S. Holden, $10,000; C. A. Gillingham & Company, $45,000; Biven & Branco, $10,000; Weber & Hammond, $45,000; John S. Robb, $30,000; and John S. Owens, $50,000. The two last named were the heaviest losers for Robb, the owner of the Stockton Journal, lost his entire plant, while the finely furnished saloon and beautiful El Placer Theater were the property of John S. Owens. One of the merchants at that time was R. B. Parker. A few days previous to the fire he ordered by letter several thousand dollars worth of goods from the San Francisco firm of McCondry & Company. Mr. Parker concluded on May 5 to go to the city. The next morning he was met by Mr. McCondry with the remark, "Well, Parker, all of your goods were destroyed by fire last night. They were all marked with your name and were on the sidewalk ready for shipment." This was the great San Francisco fire of May 4, and the goods being invoiced to Parker he was compelled to stand the loss. Returning to Stockton he found his grocery store destroyed. They, however, saved the money drawer, containing several hundred dollars.

From 1851 to 1856 the town grew rapidly along business lines, and there was a solid row of business firms carrying stocks of valuable goods in wooden shanties, that burning like tinder, could be destroyed in an hour's time. These shacks extended along Main Street, from Hunter to Center, both sides; along Hunter to Levee to Center Street, to Main on either side, along El Dorado to Main, both sides and a few buildings along El Dorado to Market. These buildings were, in the main, one-story wooden frames with here and there story-and-a-half structures, such as the Harbeson and Hickman building, corner Hunter and Levee, the Massachusetts bakery and lodging house on El Dorado, the Fisher stage office, corner Levee and Center, and the Phoenix Hotel, corner Market and El Dorado. There were a few brick buildings also in these blocks.

One of these brick buildings, that of Adams Express Company, proved to be a very practical object lesson in the way of insurance against fire. It was in the pathway of the hottest flames in the fire of July 30, 1855, and although at one time there was fire on three sides of the building, it stood intact. The flames started in the lodging house and coffee stand of Peter Manivich, located on the levee a few doors below Center Street. The alarm was given by the watchman of the steamer Cornelia, by ringing continuously the steamer bell. Owing to the fact that a heavy breeze was blowing the flames spread rapidly and all efforts to stay the devouring element were abortive until it reached the fireproof building of C. P. Greeley & Company's hardware store. At the time the stage office of Reynolds & Company and the Lodge saloon were burning, great fear was expressed for the El Dorado saloon and Fisher's stage office on the opposite side corner of Weber Avenue and Center Street. The loss was about $25,000, not a large amount of money today but quite a fortune then when the wealthiest man in the county was assessed for only $6,000. The losers included T. Robinson Bours, banker, B. Howard Brown, and Richard S. Baters, produce dealers, who formerly had tent stores on the wharf, J. Russell, the hatter, J. F. Rosenbaum, the pioneer book seller, and Nichola Milco, the fruit dealer. For the first time we read about the necessity of a fire alarm and, "we hope the council will take immediate steps to procure a bell. If a proper alarm had been given much of the property could have been saved. What we require is a bell of sufficient tone and size on some elevated position to be heard distinctly in all parts of the town." This suggestion was adopted in 1861, when the historic bell was lifted to the court house dome.

For the third time the cry of fire startled the citizens about 11 o'clock on the morning of February 21, 1855. It started in a restaurant a few doors from Levee Street, and so rapidly flew the flames in a few minutes the buildings adjoining were on fire. For a time it was feared a clean sweep would be made of the entire business portion of the city, for buildings equally destructible, stood not eighty feet distant to the east. The flames were checked at the Shades saloon on the Levee by tearing down several buildings in their pathway. The greater part of the buildings destroyed had been erected after the fire of 1851. The loss was $50,000. The firms made homeless included Emile Sutro, cigar dealer, a brother of the famous Adolph Sutro of San Francisco; the New York bakery and restaurant of John Henderson, later for years keeper of the Grand hotel, corner California and Channel streets; Jack Keeler saloon, Stephen Starbuck's daggerrean saloon and J. & C. Ling, jewelers. During the fire Mersfelder's bakery on Hunter Street caught fire but was quickly extinguished.

The citizens seemed to be very much alarmed over the destruction of their property by fire and yet it took them four years to purchase a fire bell, and ten years before they had even a fairly good fire equipment. However the quickest move for betterment the citizens ever made in the history of the city was on the evening of the fire. Over three hundred citizens, a large crowd for that date, met in the city hall together with the common council. The meeting was called to order by Mayor Buffington, and George H. Sanderson, whose son is now asylum physician, was elected secretary, a resolution was offered and quickly adopted, "that in the opinion of those present the council should pass an ordinance prohibiting the erection of wooden buildings within proscribed fire limits." The meeting was adjourned and a special meeting of the council was then held and they passed an ordinance which declared: "From and after this date it shall be unlawful for any person to erect any wooden building within the limits of Levee, Hunter and Main streets (100 feet south of the said Main Street) and west by Commerce Street. The penalty for disobeying the ordinance was a fine of from $1,000 to $2,000 and not less than thirty days in jail. It was a good law then, but very bad for today, for brick buildings were erected that are today an eyesore and a detriment to the progress of the city. They are paying big rents and their owners, having no civic pride, will not tear them down and rebuild creditable buildings. Here is an illustration; soon after the fire of 1851, Avery & Hewlett built on the corner of Hunter and Main Street, a two-story brick building. Time passed, and forty-two years later a sharp Hebrew bought the property and opened a clothing store. In the meantime the San Joaquin Valley Bank erected a magnificent four-story brick building adjoining this old structure. Wishing to enlarge their business and erect a splendid building on the corner, the bank directors asked the price of the corner lot, about 30x50 feet. The Hebrew would not even give them a price. It was practically a magnificent hold-up. The bank did not get possession of the property at a fair valuation until after the death of the owner. Now under the name of the Bank of Italy, they will in time construct on the corner an imposing ten-story building.

Like a shuttle cock on the weaving machine I am jumping back and forth through a period of seventy years, but this is unavoidable. Once again for the fourth and last time block No. 1 was a scene of desolation. The alarm was given early on the morning of September 27, 1864, by the watchman on the steamer Helen Hensley. The fire, set by an incendiary, started in the City Hotel on the east side of Center Street, the half block which had been burned in 1849 and 1851. Sixteen firms were homeless, the aggregate loss amounting to $30,000. In the number was the City restaurant, owned by Charles Mersfelder, Fisher & Company, stage office, corner of Center and Levee, the well known Angelo House, and the "Jim" Darcey & Lewis Henry saloon. In the track of the hottest flames stood the first home of the Stockton Independent which, like its predecessor, the Stockton Journal, seemed doomed for destruction. Located in the two-story brick structure, known as the Shirley Building, the two powerful streams of water thrown on the building by the Weber steam fire engine saved it. So hot was the flames "the zinc roof melted and ran off like rain."

A Block of Fire Traps

The block east of block No. 1, was, as you may have noted, as well filled with fire-traps as the pioneer tract. No fire of importance occurred in this block until 11:30 on the evening of the National holiday 1858. At that time "Uncle" John Andrews, a very popular landlord, conducted a lodging house in the second-story of what was known as the Massachusetts Bakery. The fire started in one of the sleeping rooms and as usual spread rapidly north and south of the bakery. It soon enveloped in flames the William Ward butcher shop, a Chinese wash-house and ice cream saloon, and Jonas Stockwell's grain-sack factory. It then spread eastward through the block, destroying the warehouse of Charles M. and P. M. Bowen, who saved a part of their stock in their brick building. The brick building of Henry Hodgkins stopped its progress towards the Levee and the J. W. Ferris brick building, occupied by Nash & Beamis, stayed its progress towards the south.

A Horrible Death

Another fire, spectacular in its appearance was that of October 4, 1864, when the only tragedy of all these fires occurred. A man drunk with liquor was burned to death in the lodging house over the Eureka saloon. The fire, supposed to have been set by an incendiary, started in the rear of Charles Whitkoph's saloon on the Levee, a few doors from El Dorado Street. The fire bell rang out its startling alarm and the fire engines were soon rattling over the streets. The Eureka hand engine was set at the fire cistern, corner of Main and El Dorado; the San Joaquin at Main and Hunter, and the Weber steamer, stationed on the El Dorado Street bridge, attempted to take water from the channel. It was low tide. The engine immediately began sucking mud, and thus made helpless there were but two engines to fight the flames. The fire licked up the buildings like oil, but it was checked on the south by the Hodgkins brick building. Rushing east, the Eureka was soon in flames and just beyond the flames were extinguished. The losers were Waldman's cigar factory, the Eureka Hotel, Lee's barber shop; Rosenthal & Isaacs; Charley Whitkoph's whiskey shop, W. H. Mills, barber; Henry Langmack, jeweler; Thomas Ecstrom, barber. Most of the buildings destroyed belonged to Henry Hodgkins, Stockton's most progressive citizen.

On the corner where stood the former I. O. O. F. building, reaching south to the Eureka engine house and on Main Street to what was known as the Main Street Hotel, the city owned a number of shacks rented to business men. On the early morn of Spetember 4, 1865, the city suddenly went out of business as property renters. A fire broke out in the Antelope restaurant on Main Street, destroying everything in its pathway on both sides of the block. The loss included the restaurant, Judge Brush's office, the daguerrean car on wheels of I. S. Locke, Delano's barber shop, the National saloon, where Squire Hart killed a Mexican, C. R. Gillingham's hide house, and the Patrick Edward Connor city waterworks.

Building Progress

Three of man's best gifts are air, water and fire, but uncontrolled, they are his most destructive enemies. The flames that devour the old wooden shacks are usually the cause of erection of a much better class of buildings. This was the case in Stockton. Following the fire of 1851 the citizens declared, "Our city improvements are going on very favorably. Numerous brick buildings are going up and still more are to be erected. The property at the corner of Levee and Commerce Streets will be built over with brick. The west side of Center Street (between Levee and Main) will be one solid wall of brick buildings. Numerous frame buildings are going up in the outskirts of Stockton. This speaks well for the stability." On the east side of the block about midway, John Shirley erected a small two-story brick building, and in the second story Stockton Odd Fellowship and Masonry were instituted. To the south Biven & Branco erected a two-story brick, about 20 by 50 feet at a cost of $9,000, and a few months later Biven, buying the property at $12,000, fitted the upper story for the two fraternal societies. Another big improvement was the Schofield & Company building. The Republican says, "They have removed to their new fireproof building opposite the old stand on Main Street (between Hunter and El Dorado). Another handsome building is being erected adjoining Schofield's. The fronts are built of a superior quality of brick from the yard of Mr. Rude, which are laid in white mortar and the joints finished after the Baltimore style of front work." The destruction of the frame building of Hestres & Company, in the 1851 fire, was a cause of rejoicing later of the public in general. We see "that Hestres & Company have removed to Main, corner of El Dorado." While erecting a one-story brick on the southeast corner, the citizens persuaded them to add a second story for dramatic use, and for twenty years it was Stockton's only theater. Two other business houses erected that year, 1852, were the I. W. Lyons eating house, a brick building next to Holden's drug store on the north and the Hewlett & Collins two-story brick, 20x30, corner of Hunter and Main Streets. The Lyons building now brings in its owner a high rent.

The finest buildings of that period were the Stockton Theater, the county court house, the Holden drug store, the Newell & Company Express building, and the Weber House; the three last-named are today standing, useful business houses and old landmarks of the days of long ago. In reference to the Newell and Company building, on Center Street near Levee, the press recorded in August, 1852, "During the summer quite a change has taken place in the appearance of our city for the better. The old wooden shacks have been torn down and brick buildings have been erected in their stead. Two have just been completed which have elicited the general admiration of the public." The Newell Express Company building was 25x50 in size, the first story being fourteen feet in the clear and the second story twelve feet. "The front is pressed brick of Stockton manufacture and all the walls twenty-two inches thick. The roof is laid in brick and cement after which is a cover of tin, making the building perfectly water tight and fireproof. The inside will be finished with plaster of paris, and in the lower story there will be a heavy cornice of the same material. The counters and desks are of solid mahogany and the floor is of marble. In the second story there will be four offices, one will be occupied by the attorney, Samuel A. Booker and another office by the dentist, John M. Hill. The foot walk in front will be completed of granite." It was fifty years later before a sidewalk as lasting as this one came into general use.

The Holden drug store, which was the same ground size as the present store, was two stories in height and cost $13,000. It was noticeable for its "ornamental iron piazza in front. It has a cellar floor laid in cement and perfectly waterproof. The exterior will be covered with mastic which will represent freestone. The building is thirty-five feet in height and the offices on the second floor will be occupied by Dr. Wm. M. Ryer, the dentist, George Warren and Mr. Babbitt." Two years later Dr. Holden and his partner, Havens, erected a second two-story building adjoining, on the Main street side, of pressed brick. The first story was occupied as a dry goods store by Henry B. Underhill and E. R. Stockwell. About 1880 the building was remodelled as it appears today.

The Weber House, still in use, corner Main and Center, was the most costly building of its day, and was a complete failure as far as concerned its builder and owner, James M. Warner. Nevertheless it was a great benefit to the city because of its spaciousness, for it could accommodate any number of visitors to the city in a first class manner. It was for many years the stopping place of all theatrical and other amusement companies, and as the editor stated: "We have not done Mr. Warner justly credit. He has brought to a successful completion a splendid new brick hotel. Through evil and good report he has steadily pushed his way while some said it would be a failure, others a success." Pioneers told me that the building was erected by Reid & Warner and that their friends tried to persuade them not to put their money into the building as it was too big a project for a small city of less than 5,000 people, but they had great faith in the city and borrowed money to build it. The hotel with its 120 rooms was opened Dec. 3 with a banquet, Captain Weber, after whom it was named, presiding. The building cost $40,000 but the owners were unable to lift the mortgage. March 28, 1855, it was sold at sheriff's sale and bid in by the mortgagee, John Dillon, for 17,000. He and John Gross, later the baker and confectioner, refurbished the hotel and leased it to Colonel Robert Manning. "We learn that Colonel Manning has leased the Weber House and will open it without delay. He is one of the best veteran hotel caterers and will make the house popular," said the reporter in March, 1855. The Colonel continued in charge of the hotel, with a slight interruption when he went to Copperopolis, until his death. His daughter, Mrs. Elizabeth M. Tureman, for many years a kindergarten teacher, is still living in this city.

The flames of February, 1855, cleaned out the shacks on the west side of El Dorado Street, north of Main Street. As the fire ordinance passed by the city council prohibited the erection of any frame buildings, a block of one-story brick buildings were erected, and much to the detriment of the city's progress they are still there, although some of the buildings have grown to two stories. In the number of frame buildings destroyed was the jewelry store of two Germans, J. & C. Ling. They were succeeded by Charles Haas. The two men were Odd Fellows, and putting up a two-story brick in July, 1855, the Odd Fellows dedicated their new hall. The Lings knew that the order was a good advertisement and they advertised June 27 "Ling Bros. store under the Odd Fellows hall." Note the speedy work: the fire occurred February 21 and three months later they were in their new store. It was a first class building, a monument today to their enterprise, which was duly appreciated by the Odd Fellows. In that upper story was founded the first children's temperance lodge, "The Band of Hope." A writer in recording these improvements said, "Mr. Forsman, V. M. Peyton, J. and C. Ling, Louis Martin and J. M. Ferris have each commenced the erection of fine brick buildings. Those belonging to the two-first named gentlemen are to have 'cast iron fronts' the first ever used in this city. These improvements give employment to many mechanics and laborers."

In July 1855, we have recorded how the Newell & Company, two-story brick, like a salamander stood against the fire fiend and it was a very instructive lesson to future store builders. A fire, very peculiar as to date, was the El Dorado block fire on the eve of July 4, 1858. The flames broke out in the Massachusetts bakery owned by Alexander Gall, with a second-story lodging house kept by "Uncle" John Andrews. Mr. Gall, an enterprising Scotchman, erected a building with a handsome ornamental front, and fitted up the second story as a social hall, the first public hall in Stockton. And we read January 18, 1859: "Mr. Gall's new dance hall was dedicated last evening by a pleasant private party gotten up by several young gentlemen. Thirty or forty couple enjoyed the dance." His building was completed long before the adjoining bricks, for June 4, the paper states: "The block of brick buildings on El Dorado Street nearly completed will be occupied by Nash & Beamis, Gray & Hickman, Wm. Ward, the butcher, and Gall, the confectioner." Then came the era of church fireproof building. In 1858 the Episcopal church, in 1859 the Presbyterian, in 1861 the Baptist and Catholic churches were erected. The first brick church, the German Methodist, was built in 1855, and the first brick public school in 1859. The first merchants in Stockton to erect a building of any size was the firm of B. W. Owens, Edward Moore and W. F. McKee. Purchasing the lot southeast corner of Main and Center streets, where stood the Central Exchange, and the lot to the south, they erected a handsome two-story building 50 feet on Main and 100 feet on Center at a cost of $10,000. "It is of the Corinthian style," said the account, "with two fronts, surrounded by a wide piazza. In the second story there will be twelve windows, six on Main Street. The store will be a great ornament to the city, and work will be commenced next week"—April, 1861. The second-story became the home of the Stockton Argus and the building stands today, the second story without a single change in its structure.

A few persons at that time began erecting brick buildings for residences, and a few of them are today occupied as dwellings, among them the Joseph Scott and the Dr. Oscar M. Brown homes on East Flora Street; Nathaniel Wormell erected a brick home on East Magnolia; the Chittenden family, on North El Dorado, Dr. Ireland on North Madison, and S. M. Reid, on North Hunter. About the same time Dr. Collins erected a home and seminary in the center of the block where now stands the Congregational Church; Dr. Hunt also built a brick seminary on El Dorado Street, now the Belding property. It was stated a few pages back that Henry Hodgkins was the city's most progressive citizens. He built a brick story-and-a-half home on Miner Avenue near Sutter as early as 1858 and having great faith in the future of Stockton he bought nearly 200 front feet of land on the southeast corner of Levee and El Dorado Street, shacks and all. When the fire of October, 1864, swept them out of existence he at once began the erection of a large two-story building covering the entire ground. When completed the Stockton Independent occupied the corner building; fitting up a public dance hall on El Dorado Street, the Pioneer Society was there organized, and Laura de Force Gordon delivered one of her first lectures for woman suffrage. Hodgkins' crowning work, however, was the erection by him and H. E. Hall of the Yosemite Hotel. It had a frontage of 102 feet and cost $30,000. It was opened July 5, 1869, by Alexander McBean from Chicago. Over 300 citizens sat down to the dinner. The erection of the hotel was followed by the erection of the Yosemite Theatre and the Hook and Wilhoit Building, this making a solid three-story front on San Joaquin and Main Streets to the Hilke Building.

Merchants of 1864

Who were the merchants occupying these buildings? We find a list of ninety-two firms signing an agreement "to close our stores and places of business on Tuesday, November 8, 1864, the same being the day set for the election of presidential electors," and among the many we remember today, Owens, Moore & Cogshell, corner of Main and Center; E. L. Houche, grocer, on the corner opposite; William J. Belding, dry goods; Charles Haas, jeweler, and George Vincent, sewing machine agent on El Dorado Street; Sperry & Company flour mill, Howard Brown and Hale & Newell, produce dealers, and Simpson & Gray, lumber dealers, Levee below El Dorado; Jones & Hewlett, agricultural implements; Richard Condy, tailor; John L. Woodman, bag factory; Mills & Doll, tinsmiths; Louis M. Hickman, hardware; Gray & Hickman, dry goods, B. & A. Frankheimer, clothiers; M. T. Stampfer, clothing dealer, Main Street below Hunter; Hedges & Howland, groceries; H. O. Matthews, grocer; Frank Dake, blacksmith; N. C. Hilke, harness maker; L. L. Creech, grocer; H. T. Fanning, grocer; W. O. Tripp, harness maker; John T. Hickinbotham, wagon maker; L. Howard, tinsmith, Main Street east of Hunter; Sidney Newell, bookstore; Dohrmann & Smallfield, grocers, El Dorado north of Main; R. B. Parker, Hunter near Market; Louis Hansel, Hunter and Channel, grocers; William Bush, real estate dealer; Lippincott & Belding, soda works; George Natt, grocer; R. B. Lane, flour mill; Weber Avenue east of Hunter, and William P. Miller, wagonmaker, Channel and California.

CHAPTER VII

COMMERCIAL EVENTS UP TO 1869

NO PERSON can forecast the trend of trade. And as we have observed as early as 1852, it began moving eastward, as all teaming traveled out Main Street and Weber Avenue. Two years previous, many business men, believing that French Camp would become an important trading point during the winter months, made an effort to boost South Stockton, on Mormon Channel. Emile Junge, an enterprising Frenchman, advertised in June, 1950, "Store-ship Susanna, Mormon Channel, general merchandise and produce dealer. Lots for sale in the most improving location of the town." Several other promoters removed their vessels loaded with goods to Mormon Channel and attempted to establish a run of trade. Spending good money, they asserted through the newspaper that "the channel was the place to carry on business as the land was high and dry and vessels drawing ten feet of water could anchor at Center Street, and it was the nearest point to French Camp." The levee on Weber Avenue was a sea of mud in winter, as the banks sloped to the water's edge, and all goods from the steamers were landed in the mud. The city, however, built a wharf in 1852. In order to attract purchasers of lots and goods, Captain Young, one of the promoters, refused an offer of $6,500 for his brig, as he intended "to give it to the town gratis, on condition that it be used as a court house." The city at the time were paying $300 per month for a small room in the McNish Building. The scheme of these speculators caused quite an excitement for a time, and lots along Center Street were quickly bought up. In a few days over 700 lots were sold at prices running from $4,000 to $6,000 each. Regarding business locations, Captain Weber's idea was neither Mormon Channel nor block No. 1, but the Peninsula, where ships could land goods within 100 feet of the front of the store, or at their rear door, sailing up Miner Channel. Today a fish market is doing that very thing. Block No. 1 became the business center through an accident or a misunderstanding. Weber, in erecting his general merchandising store in 1848, directed the captain to land the lumber on the north side of the channel, but misunderstanding the command he unloaded the lumber on the south side. Some pioneers said that the captain ran aground on the south side, and, being unable to float his vessel, was compelled to unload. As there was no immediate way of transporting the material to the opposite side of the channel, the building was erected on the bank. There the settlers located so as to be near their source of supplies. Naturally, the incoming gold seekers, seeing the settlers' tents, landed on the south side.

The Pioneer Steamer

For seventy years and more, steamers have been landing freight and passengers at the Stockton wharf. The first vessel in the freight-carrying business was the little sloop Maria, which was purchased in Portland, Ore., by Captain Weber. This was in June, 1848. The little pioneer sailer was 38 feet in length, 9 feet 11 inches breadth of beam, and 3 feet 2 inches in depth; she carried 13 tons and cost $4,000. The first passengers from the east arrived in whale boats and engaged San Francisco sailors to row them up to Tuleburg. This was followed in September, 1849, by the arrival of the "Captain Sutter," a small side-wheel steamer, under the command of Captain Warren, who at different times was in command of seven different steamers running on the San Joaquin route. The arrival of the steamer created great excitement in the settlement, as she unexpectedly sailed up the channel with flags and streamers flying; the crowd rushed to the water's edge, and, throwing their hats in the air, cheer after cheer greeted the Sutter. It was a great day for the town and it is not surprising that the citizens went "wild," for they were no longer cut off from the outside world. The steamer was run daily on the Stockton route until June, 1850, when she was withdrawn and run on the Sacramento, her owners, it is stated, having made $300,000.

These steamers might aptly be called speculative death-traps, for they were all run on a speculation to either make or break their owners. They were all hastily and cheaply constructed and any kind of an engine was installed, for at that time there were no boiler or hull inspectors in the state. The steamers were usually a partnership affair between several persons, each person taking some part of the work. Racing on the river was almost of daily occurrence, and boiler explosions, with a terrible loss of life, were frequent. The Captain Sutter was succeeded on the Stockton route by the El Dorado, Captain Warren in command. As steamboating was a big paying proposition, Warren, in partnership with others, concluded to build the finest steamer on the river. Visiting the Eastern States he purchased steam engines and fixtures, and shipping them to San Francisco, the steamer Santa Clara was constructed. Arriving at Stockton on the evening of February 3, 1851, Captain Warren invited the merchants and citizens on board, and in bumpers of champagne they drank "long life to the Santa Clara." Her life was short, for a month later she caught fire on San Francisco Bay and was a total loss. In March, 1852, Warren came into port in the neat little craft Jenny Lind, named after the Swedish nightingale. The steamer made the trip of about 140 miles at that time, in seven hours, a record not surpassed. Six months later, while lying at the wharf in San Francisco, ready to start for Stockton, her drum-head blew out and some ten or fifteen passengers were killed and many more badly scalded by the escaping steam that filled the cabin. One of the worst of explosions was that of the steamer Sagamore, November 1, 1851. She had just left the San Francisco wharf heavily loaded with merchandise and crowded with passengers, bound for Stockton and the way port, Benicia, when her boiler exploded. Fifty persons were killed and many badly scalded.

Explosion of Steamer Stockton

In October, 1853, two accidents took place unparalleled in the history of the state, two steamers, the American Eagle and the Stockton, exploding their boilers on the same river not over fifteen miles apart and within eighteen hours' time. The Stockton left her berth at San Francisco at the usual time, October 19, 1853, and at about 5 o'clock, when approaching the mouth of the San Joaquin River, the entire top of her firebox blew off. The hot water and steam escaped through the furnace doors and through the flues in the rear of the boiler, "shivering the cabin to atoms." The force of the steam tore her deck into a thousand pieces, but a few persons standing in front of the boiler were the only ones scalded. Standing above the boiler were several men, women and children, and although badly frightened none were injured. Two persons were thrown into the water by the force of the explosion, but they saved themselves by means of floating planks. One of these persons, V. M. Peyton, a merchant, was standing by the side of the captain, and although badly scalded by the escaping steam his sudden bath in the cold water saved his life. Fortunate it was for Stockton that his life was saved, for we shall hear much of him in the earlier years of our history. The steamer, H. T. Clay, soon arrived, and, taking on board the seven badly scalded passengers and those not injured, brought them to their destination.

American Eagle on Fire

The American Eagle, noticeable because of a gilded eagle perched on top of her pilot house, was speeding her way over the tortuous San Joaquin and when about twenty-five miles from this city her starboard boiler blew out, tearing away completely all of the boat forward of the wheelhouse. There were fifty-three passengers on board, but only two of the passengers were scalded. Eight of the crew of the steamer were scalded and five of them died. Joshua P. Havens, druggist, in partnership with E. S. Holden, was returning from San Francisco with a large quantity of drugs and oil, and freely he gave of the oil to bind upon the blistered bodies of the scalded. In his recital of the accident he says it occurred at exactly 3:15 o'clock p. m. and that at the dreadful moment he thought creation had broken loose for such a noise of the crashing of timbers, smashing of glass and crockery and of the explosion itself he had never heard before. There was on board a large quantity of exposed gunpowder and several large barrels of brandy. The concussion broke open the barrels, the liquor caught fire and quickly the steamer was in flames. Colonel "Jack" Hayes, the famous Texas Ranger, was on board, and immediately rushed to extinguish the flames. As he did so a very excited individual shouted, "Look out for the gunpowder." "Gunpowder be damned!" Hayes replied, "We might as well be blown up as burned up!" and continuing the work of throwing overboard the powder probably saved the lives of the passengers. The first news received of the accident was by Thomas Moseley, Wells Fargo express agent, who probably arrived from the accident in a rowboat. Immediately steam was raised in the boilers of the steamer Sophie and with Drs. William Norcom, Samuel Langdon, William R. Ryer and Richard P. Ashe on board she speedily went to the scene, and passengers and wounded were brought to Stockton.

The Mosquito Fleet

These little steamers were about seventy-five feet in length, round bottom, sidewheelers, with a carrying capacity of between forty and fifty tons. The steamers were run independent of each other and there was at times considerable competition and cutting of rates. A combination of steamers would decrease the cost and larger steamers would greatly improve the service, so a company of San Francisco men concluded to combine and learn if the San Joaquin River was navigable for large steamers as far as Stockton. They knew that large steamer navigation was possible, for the steamer Senator had been sailing up the Sacramento River to Sacramento since 1850. To learn the possibilities of the San Joaquin River, the large ocean-sailing steamer Thomas Hunt was selected to pioneer the way up to the tortuous San Joaquin Channel to Stockton. She was of 413 tons carrying capacity and in command of Captain Van Pelt, who had formerly run on the Sacramento, landed at the Stockton wharf March 13, 1853. The citizens were not only astonished but delighted to see such a large, nicely-fitted-up steamer at the wharf, and they predicted great things for Stockton. The steamer made the run in eight hours, much faster than they now travel, although the bends of the river are now all eliminated, and the captain stated that he had no difficulty in making the run, and at a very small expense the river could be so improved as to accommodate such ocean-going boats as the Senator and Confidence, then running on the Sacramento route.

First Class Steamers

In the meantime Charles Minturn, a San Francisco steamboat man who had a ferry line running to Oakland, concluded to send to New York and purchase or build the finest and fastest steamer on the inland waters. He delegated Captain Enoch Conklin, who had been running the steamer H. T. Clay on the Stockton route, to go east and make the purchase. He left California in June, 1853, and returned in November with one of the handsomest and fastest boats ever seen on San Francisco Bay. The steamer was 134 feet in length, breadth of beam 28 feet, and 9 feet in depth. She had compound condensing engines and was fitted up in first class style, with a ladies' cabin and berths astern and a ladies' maid to wait upon the women passengers. The steamer was named Cornelia, in honor of the captain's daughter. She made the run to Stockton in seven and a half hours, and with a crew, captain, pilots, engineers and mates, that for fifteen years were very popular with the merchants and citizens. The following year, January 9, another big steamer, the Helen Hensley, Captain James Whitney, appeared at the wharf. The Hensley and the John Bragdon, which came on later, were an exact type of the Mississippi steamers in the days of Mark Twain. They had two long smokestacks and two steampipes, and to see the smoke in heavy volume rolling from the stack and a big cloud of steam puffing from the pipes at every stroke of the engine, was indeed a majestic sight. The Hensley for a time had a half crew of colored men, and they would assemble on the upper deck, just before the time of sailing and sing old-fashioned plantation songs for the entertainment of the crowd that lined the wharf. The Hensley was unfortunate, for after running only three months her boiler exploded as she was leaving the San Francisco Jackson Street wharf, demolishing the entire front of the cabin. Several passengers were several scalded by hot water and steam. A negro, blown thirty feet into the air, fell into the bay and was rescued unhurt. A passenger lying in his berth on the steamer was thrown to the wharf, mattress and all. Arising, he exclaimed, "I believe I will not go to Benicia," and going on board the boat he got his baggage and tramped it up the street.

The John Bragdon was one of the largest steamers ever put upon the Stockton route, being 240 feet in length, 33 feet breadth of beam and 9 feet in depth, with two sidewheels, each 33 feet in diameter, with buckets 11 feet in length. Although larger than the J. D. Peters, the largest boat at present on the river, the Bragdon could not carry near the amount of freight as the Peters, because a stern-wheeler has a much larger deck surface. The Peters is 204 feet in length, 38 feet wide and 9 feet deep with a 780-ton capacity. A few months after the arrival of the Bragdon, the California Steam Navigation Company was incorporated March 1, 1854, and until the building of the Central Pacific railroad, they held the inland freighting and passenger traffic in the hollow of their hand. The company was capitalized for $2,000,000, and buying up or buying off every steamer in the state, none could dispute their right to rule.

Steamboat Combination

We will now write of an event that has been a continual source of contention for the past half-century, namely, monopolies and freight and fares. Although the citizens were pleased in some measure because of the combination of steamers, as they said, "We will have no more racing on the river and loss of life," they were greatly displeased because the California Steam Navigation Company raised the rate of passengers and freight, this although the combination gave them a much better service than ever before, new, clean fast boats, quick daily reliable transportation, and a polite and gentlemanly crew. In their complaints they declared, "We have too long submitted to the onerous yoke of the soulless combination," and "ever since the combination was entered into we have been crippled and circumscribed." They complained that passengers were carried much cheaper from San Francisco to the Northern mines than they were transported to Stockton. This was true, but the merchants of Sacramento themselves were conducting passenger cheap-fare steamers. They realized the fact that immigration to the Northern mines meant progress and growth to Sacramento. And the Times, in an editorial, said, "All that Stockton requires to give prosperity to every branch of business is a population in the interior," and then asks, "How are we to gain it while there is such a marked difference afforded to immigrants in pursuing their journey to the mines."

Merchants' Steamboat Company

The merchants and citizens were up in arms against the combination and their fancied injustice to Stockton and, proclaiming war, their slogan was, "Down with the combination." The American method of showing their indignation at any supposed injustice is by listening to considerable hot air talk and passing resolutions. And a mass meeting signed by sixty-five merchants was called to meet in the city hall December 30, 1854, for the purpose of consultation in regard to the purchase of a steamer. "As the objects to be obtained include the welfare and prosperity of the entire San Joaquin district and every branch of industry therein we trust there will be a general attendance." It was a wildly enthusiastic meeting. The meeting was called to order by Enoch Gove; B. W. Owens was elected president, and Fletcher C. Andrews, secretary. David S. Terry, throughout his life an anti-monopolist, was called upon for a few remarks and on motion of A. C. Baine, a committee of five was appointed to canvass for subscriptions for stock at fifty dollars per share. They were given full power to open subscription books in Stockton and the mountain camps. At this or a subsequent meeting directors were elected as follows: E. S. Holden, druggist; J. M. Buffington, V. M. Peyton, Emile Hestres and H. T. Compton, grocers; Austin Sperry, founder of the flour mill; D. S. Terry, attorney; William Montgomery, farmer, and B. W. Bours, banker. At the directors' meeting, January 16, 1855, they selected as the name of the company, "The Southern Miners' Steamboat Association. In the meantime the subscription committee reported that $40,000 worth of stock had been signed up, and the directors levied an assessment of ten per cent on each share payable at the banking house of T. Robinson Bours on Center Street. Dr. E. S. Holden, David S. Terry and William Montgomery were then appointed to go to San Francisco and purchase, charter or have built a steamer for the Stockton trade.

The directors, considering the amount of subscriptions and knowing from the statement of a practical steamboat man that a steamer the size of the Cornelia would cost at least $80,000 in New York, concluded that the safest plan would be to arrange with some steamboat proprietor to put his steamer on the Stockton route with a guarantee that those sixty-five anti-monopoly merchants would give him their fullest support. Arrangements were made with the owner of the steamer Willamette, who had been running on the Oregon River of that name. And then the editor rejoiced for "At an early hour yesterday morning, January 24, 1851, the ringing of bells and the booming of cannon announced the arrival of our opposition steamer. The peal of bells and cannon found an echo in every citizen's heart." As the time approached for the sailing of the two steamers there assembled "the largest crowd on the levee for many a day." There was considerable excitement and expressed indignation for the merchants had had arrested a runner who came up on the combination line to drum up customers. He was charged with a violation of the city ordinance, which required a runner to take out a city license. Here was seen for the first time the shrewd work of corporations. As soon as they found that the merchants meant business they advertised in the newspaper January 1, 1855, "that on and after this date the passage by the steamers Urilda and Cornelia will be reduced to cabin fare six dollars, deck passengers three dollars. On the day of their departure with the opposition, the combination lowered their cabin fare to two dollars, deck fifty cents. The Willamette's price was three dollars cabin; deck, one dollar. It is almost a waste of space to record the result, for human nature is ever the same in every age. The general public, indifferent to the desires of the merchants, patronized the steamer having the cheapest passage. The merchants themselves began shipping large quantities of goods from San Francisco over the combination line under the cheap freight schedule. The combination boats sailed, crowded with passengers, while the Willamette had only a few staunch supporters. In three months the opposition was withdrawn, and never again did the merchants, in a body, attempt to lower freights and fares.

It was the custom of many of the merchants, in order to create good fellowship, make new friends and advertise their new store, to have what they called a "house warming." Southworth & Greeley, in 1852, had one of these house warmings on the occasion of their removal to their new brick store on Center Street. "All the citizens were there and the wines and liquors flowed like rain. Punches and ices of every description were spread and a most generous dessert." We can readily believe the reporter's statement that the liquor flowed like rain. Candidly admitting that he became intoxicated, he said, "We take this opportunity of thanking them for the brick brought home in our hat from their brick building."

Hewlett & Collins in November, 1854, completed their two-story brick building on the corner of Main and Hunter Street, now an annex of the Bank of Italy. "At the opening of the store an old-fashioned house-warming took place and the table was loaded with every variety of choice viands. This firm was one of the most progressive in the town, and their schooner, the "Far West," in November, 1855, direct from New York to Stockton, brought in her cargo the first lot of Cumberland coal ever imported to California. H. Hewlett later became one of California's financiers, president of the First National Bank.

The custom of house-warming was not alone confined to the merchants, and in 1853 J. P. D. Wilkins and his brother, James W. leased and on June 22, reopened the Crescent City Hotel on Sutter Street, now the site of the Hippodrome Theatre, and they announced that "the lessees would be happy to see their friends and the public generally at lunch from 10 to 1 o'clock p. m." The previous evening a cotillion party was given in the dining room of the hotel under the direction of twenty-two of the leading citizens. The tickets were five dollars for gentleman and lady, if he could find one, for women were at a premium. The hotel was a tragedy, for within a year John P. D. Wilkins' wife died, and also his brother James, and in July, 1854, by order of the Probate Court he advertised everything for sale. James W. Wilkins' widow and daughter are still living in this city.

J. P. D. Wilkins had, previous to this time, purchased a restaurant on the Levee from John Andrews. "Uncle John," as he was familiarly called, had, in 1850, an eating place in a tent at the corner of Main and San Joaquin streets, now the site of the Native Sons' hall. Later keeping a restaurant on the Levee, he was burned out in the fire of 1855, and again on El Dorado Street in 1858, when the Massachusetts bakery was destroyed. A very popular man, he was again keeping a hotel in 1861, and his friends declared, "Uncle John knows how to keep a hotel; in fact, two hotels, for he now conducts his old stand on Center Street and the Magnolia, a Southern style of building adjoining on the west the McNish Building on Channel, corner of Hunter. Yesterday evening his Center Street boarders formed a procession and, led by a band of music, marched the streets to the Magnolia where they paid their respects to the landlord, who, taken by surprise, apologized for not having made any arrangements to receive them. There were about 100 men in the procession and they were served with refreshments."

Today the merchant visits the Eastern states or even Europe and it is an incident of little note, for it would be something unusual if he did not safely return, such is the progress of travel in 1922. But in the earlier days it was a hazardous adventure, for an Eastern trip was full of danger from shipwreck, fire and disease, and the traveler might never return. The steamer Independence, in 1853, struck a sunken rock off the Lower California coast and over 200 were lost; some years later the Golden Gate caught fire off the Mexican coast and although the steamer was beached over fifty were drowned. The Atlantic steamer, George Law, foundered off the coast of South Carolina, and only a few were saved. Jacob Bonsall, one of the builders of Stockton's first hotel, went East and died in New York of cholera, having contracted the disease on his journey. Joshua W. Carlisle, 28 years old, city councilman and of the firm of Dudley, Sanderson & Carlisle, visited the East in 1854, and, returning, died in San Francisco of Panama fever, which was epidemic on the Isthmus when he crossed over it. And so when B. M. Sexitas, a popular merchant of Stockton, announced his purpose to return East, his friends, thinking perhaps that they would never again see him, tendered him a complimentary supper. In their letter we find something of the character of the man for, "A few of your friends and those who have marked your enterprising course in Stockton, and whom oft-times have been under obligations to you for the many fine vegetables and other delicacies furnished by you, thus giving us some of the comforts and luxuries of home, desire to invite you to partake of a supper before your departure." He accepted the invitation, and in his speech refuted the insinuation that Stockton was a one-horse town. "Where is the two-horse town," he inquired, "that has a more benevolent, go-ahead population than Stockton? Look back three years and we only find tents, and now we defy the world against brick walls. I wish you all happiness and prosperity and I now propose the following toast:

'The dear ones of Stockton,
The loved ones at home,
Short may the time be—
That from them we roam.'

State Telegraph Established

The telegraph, which was of great assistance to the business man before the introduction of the telephone some twenty years ago, was established early in the history of the state. The legislature of 1852, passed a bill giving to Allen & Burnam the exclusive right to construct a telegraph line from San Francisco to Marysville by the way of San Jose, Stockton and Sacramento. Subscription books for the sale of stock were opened at the T. Robinson Bours' Bank at $100 per share, 1,500 shares only being on sale in Stockton. Here was the opportunity for citizens to get in on the ground floor, for as the reporter said, "This will prove one of the most profitable enterprises ever undertaken in California." The company rushed the work along and in December, their agent, H. B. Platt, advertised for 1,000 telegraph poles. The line was ready for business October 24, 1853, and on the evening of that day the Stockton Republican editor was greatly pleased, as he declared he could receive news from the three connecting cities twenty-four hours ahead of their newspapers. "Traders from the mines will now stay in this city and transact their business through their San Francisco agents." A telegraph office was opened January 1, 1854, on the corner of Main and El Dorado streets, and the telegraphic rates from Stockton to San Francisco, first ten words two dollars, every additional word seventy-five cents; to Marysville, first ten words $1.50, each additional five words fifty cents, and to Sacramento and San Jose, first ten words one dollar, and each additional word forty cents.

The first Stockton boy to learn to manipulate the keys was Charles Blake. When the Central Pacific erected their depot in Stockton he took a position with them as telegraph operator and ticket seller. He remained with them for seven years and suddenly taken sick and died two days later of the Asiatic smallpox. Because of the malignant character of the disease, it proving fatal in every case, he was quickly placed in a coffin and buried at midnight, August 2, 1876, in Rural Cemetery without a prayer, hymn or funeral service. There is no similar case on record. How he caught the disease is a mystery, as there was no case similar to it and the only way they could account for it was handling the money of some Chinese or foreign ticket buyers. P. B. Fraser, who later became a bank president, was in the Western Pacific office during Blake's time and in October, 1868, he married Nettie Parker, the oldest daughter of R. B. Parker. Two other Stockton boys learned telegraphy in that office, James H. Sharon, who now has been sending messages over the wires for forty-eight years, and his brother John P. Sharon, who has been employed for the past thirty-seven years. When young Blake learned the business, the telegraph office was in the Weber House. Subsequently it was removed to the south side of Main Street between Main and Hunter, then to Van Vlear's store on El Dorado, near the Levee, then back to Main Street, adjoining the Stockton Savings & Loan Bank, a few doors east of its former Main Street location. On the evening of May 8, 1903, the telegraph office was completely demolished by an explosion of gas beneath the cement sidewalk in front of the Gerlach & Morach shoe store. It was the evening of the Eagles' carnival.

A great telegraphic enterprise was the extension overland of the telegraph lines from Sacramento to Chicago and on to New York. The line was completed October 21, 1861, and the first news that came over the wire was the death of Edward D. Baker, a California general, at Ball's Bluff, and the peaceful death of Thomas Wildey, the founder on April 26, 1819, of American Odd Fellowship. The newspapers of the state were more than delighted because they could get daily news from the seat of the Civil War. The editor of the San Joaquin Republican, who was a Southern-born man and at heart a strong secessionist, was also glad because of the completion of the overland telegraph. He secretly rejoiced because of the death of General Baker and the defeat of the Union arms at Ball's Bluff, and in a camouflaged article he penned these lines, "Glory Hallelujah! The telegraph line is now completed to our old home. We can telegraph to our mothers, sisters, brothers, aunts, cousins, anywhere, even in Dixieland after the Confederate row is stopped. A little over three years ago we celebrated the completion of a line that was a fizzle. But this is no fizzle. Why not have a celebration in honor of the event?" There was no celebration for the government, city and county, was in the hands of the Union men, and they were sorely depressed because of the news of the Union defeat.

Atlantic Cable Celebration

We read in the daily press the news of yesterday from all parts of the world. Time and space have been annihilated and yet we give not a moment's thought to the two men who made this event possible, Samuel F. B. Morse, who in 1844 invented the telegraph, and Cyrus

W. Field, who in 1854 made the bold attempt to lay an Atlantic cable from Newfoundland to Ireland. He succeeded, and in September, 1858, the first message was sent over the cable. It was a wonderful event and celebrated throughout the United States; it was also celebrated in San Francisco September 26 of that year. The citizens of Stockton at first had no idea of celebrating the event, but it has ever been famous for its impromptu last-minute celebrations, and at a late hour on Sunday it was determined by the firemen to celebrate the laying of the cable. In the meantime the Stockton Blues, the band, and many firemen had gone to San Francisco to take part in the celebration in that city. When the roar of the cannon was heard the lower part of the city suddenly became a blaze of light. The illumination was effected then and for many years later, by means of rows of tallow candles set the one above the other in the glass windows. All of the hotel engine house and many private residences were illuminated, and the tall flagpole of the Weber engine company was strung with lanterns from the ground to the pole top. At 7:30 a procession was formed, composed principally of firemen, and with torches and many transparencies they marched over the principal streets. Returning to Hunter Street they halted and calls were made for a speech from Henry B. Underhill. He responded in a glowing account of the possibilities of the Atlantic cable. There were defects in the Atlantic cable which were remedied in course of time and since 1866 the cable has been in constant service.

Advertisements and Boycotting

Wonderful advancement has been made at the present time along the advertising line, and experts are engaged by the leading business houses to present their advertisements in an attractive and selling manner. Thousands of dollars are annually expended by the merchants for printer's ink and in 1921 one firm alone made a contract with the Record for $25,000 worth of space. This was a larger amount than was spent in one year by all of the merchants in Stockton during the '50s and early '60s. Now it is nothing unusual to see an entire newspaper page, sometimes two pages, devoted to the advertisement of a single firm. Ads, as a rule, were then single column, not over six inches in length, and some of them would seem quite peculiar today. A hatter advertising his business in doggerel said:

"Lives there a man with soul so dead,
Who never to himself hath said,
This hat of mine is shocking bad,
Another one must soon be had;
If such there be,
Ah; let him come

To Everett's Emporium
No hat of theirs is four years old,
Which in New York could not be sold,
Adorn my shelves; but in this stock,
Are new ones fit for Royal heads."

The boycotting of a merchant or firm is nothing new as it was put into practice long before we knew of Labor Leagues or Federated Trades by the Stockton merchants. It was a time of great excitement; the Vigilance Committee of San Francisco had arrested James P. Casey for the shooting of James King of William, proprietor and editor of the San Francisco Bulletin. An indignation meeting was held May 20, 1856, in the city hall "to give an expression of their opinion in regard to the recent attempted assassination of James King of William." B. W. Bourç was elected president; John M. Buffington, vice-president, and Enoch Gove, secretary. The meeting passed a series of resolutions and denounced the shooting as "one of the most unwarranted outrages ever committed in the annals of crime; the work of an unprincipled assassin who is unworthy longer to pollute the face of the earth." Casey was a friend of the editor of the Republican, but that paper did not say a word regarding the affair. The Stockton Argus boldly denounced the crime. The unpopular policy of the Republican angered many of the merchants, and over thirty of them withdrew their patronage from that paper, which, considering the small number of advertisements it received, caused a heavy loss.

While the resolutions were being read, news was received by wire that James King of William was dead. Immediately all business houses closed their doors, the bells were tolled, flags hung at halfmast and the grand jury adjourned. The following day all of the business houses were draped in mourning, and May 22 a memorial service was held. In the line were the city and county officers, the two secret organizations, the firemen and the Sons of Temperance, and led by the cornet band playing a dirge they marched up Main Street to Grant, then to the theatre, where a funeral oration was delivered by the Reverend Orlando Fisher, pastor of the Methodist Church, South.

Early Auctioneers

Among the leading merchants of the early day were the auctioneers, and although easily counted, they made up in noise what they lacked in number. They had on sale at auction, at different times, everything on earth—consignments of books, furniture, crockery, clothing, groceries, etc. At one time M. J. Burnard & Co., Levee Street next door to the El Dorado, advertised that he would sell January 4, 1851, 20 barrels of crushed sugar, 40 bags of coffee, 25 boxes of champagne, 50 boxes cider, 20 barrels of English ale, 4 barrels dried peaches and apples, 10 chests of green tea, 100 boxes of sperm candles, 20 boxes assorted pickles, 20 barrels corn meal, 75 kegs of lard, 100 kegs of nails, 50 sacks of sweet, and 100 sacks Irish potatoes, also an invoice of clothing, blankets, boots, shoes, etc."

M. Marks, was one of the popular auctioneers of the day. His place of business at one time was in a sheet-iron-walled building on the southwest corner of the Court House Square and was rented to him by the city. It was the custom in my boyhood days for Marks and other auctioneers to advertise an auction sale on the city streets. An old negro would go along the streets ringing a bell, and at every street corner he would stop and cry out, "Oyez, Oyez, I am pleased to inform you that M. Marks will sell at auction this day." Sometimes the boys would throw stones at him, some times mimic him, but for several years he was the auctioneer bell-ringer of the town. On one or more occasions he traveled slowly over the streets at night announcing and giving a description of a lost child who had wandered from home. The negro just previous to the commencement of the sale would walk up and down in front of the place of auction continuously ringing his bell. This so got on the nerves of an editor whose sanctum was near the auction house, that in 1859 he penned the following item, "We hope that our citizens will turn out en masse and buy every book that Sargent & Adams have on sale, from John Rodger's poems to the Bible, at their auction on Main Street below El Dorado, if it will stop the infernal racket of the zealous and frenzied bell ringer." And we all remember the bell ringing of the Hunter Street auction house of George S. Melone as late as 1900, the pioneer auction days ending at his death.

M. Marks was the favored seller of the wild horses that were annually brought to Stockton every summer and sold at auction. These horses were driven here from Monterey and other points, in bands of perhaps fifty or sixty to a band, and sold to individuals and farmers. They made splendid saddle horses when properly broke, for, tough and wiry, they could travel all day and required but little care. They were small in size, not weighing much over 700 pounds, but were not good as work animals. Hundreds of blooded horses were brought in overland by immigrant parties, but they were few in number in comparison with the animals in service, for every means of transportation was by horse, mule or ox power. The place of sale was in a corral adjoining the Charles Dallas livery stable, southeast corner of Weber Avenue and San Joaquin Street. The mustangs, not even halter-broke, usually sold at prices varying from fifteen dollars to sixty dollars, according to size, form and color. Many a time has the writer sat on the fence and watched the proceedings which, although barbarous, were unavoidable. After the sale each buyer was given possession of his wild snorting, plunging "broncho." The Mexican vaqueros would lasso the animal amidst a cloud of thick dust, throw him to the earth, and place a strong leather halter over his head. The halter, with about seventy-five feet of strong rope, was provided by the purchaser. The animal, permitted to regain his feet, would stand for a moment trembling with fear. Then he would try to escape, but he would be held by the rope in the hands of several men. Then with fear at being thus held, he would plunge and strike out with his front feet and sometimes fall heavily to the earth. When the gate was opened he would make a run for freedom, only to be again caught up by the rope. One day an animal ran through the gate, but set back too quickly, fell end over end and broke his neck. Sometimes as many as half a dozen men could be seen upon the streets, endeavoring to lead or drive home their future work horses. Sometimes a man would desire to have his mustang ridden. Then would come more fun, for the boys and "idle men, dogs and greasers," as the reporter styled them. The owner would pay a Mexican ten dollars to ride his horse. They would catch him and throw him, put on a hackamore, a halter with reins, and a blinder and kicking the animal would cause him to spring to his feet. Then they would saddle the animal and the Mexican would mount his fiery steed. The blinders would be lifted and the frightened animal would run, plunge and buck in trying to get rid of his rider. Then completely tired out by his fright and exertions he would be conquered for that day. When thoroughly broken to the saddle and not abused, he became as gentle as a kitten. But when abused his eyes would flash and he would kick, strike with his front feet or even bit the man at the first opportunity. These were common street scenes in the days before the railroad.

The Drayman on Duty

An occupation peculiar to itself was that of the draymen and upon him was the merchant dependent for the delivery of his goods. Between fifty or sixty in number, they were a self-reliant body of men, full of life and activity and ever ready for a fight or a fire. They used a one-horse high-framed dray with two long skids behind, almost touching the ground, for they were compelled for a time to handle their freight from the ground and roll the heavy barrels and hogsheads weighing a half ton each up the skids on to the dray. The frame and wheels of the dray were high, because in winter they sometimes were compelled to transport their goods through two feet of mud. In time wharves were built and streets improved, and the skids were removed. Then more street improvements and in 1859 the first four-wheeled dray appeared on the streets, built in San Francisco.

The draymen, as a rule, were a good-natured body of fellows, but it sorely tried their patience when the city council and enterprising citizens began laying street cross-walks for the benefit of footmen in muddy winter. The cross-walks were made of three-inch Oregon pine with no incline approaches on either side. The draymen would often stall their drays in attempting to cross, or the bump on the opposite side would throw their boxes into the mud. A cross-walk on El Dorado Street, midway between Main and Levee was particularly exasperating and one day a drayman took an ax and chopped the cross-walk into pieces and threw it to one side. It was a lawless act, but nothing was done to punish the offender, for the draymen were a big pull in politics. They were overflowing with fun and ready at any time for a lark. The town, in June, 1854, was overrun with loose stock, and especially with hogs and dogs, and the common council passed an ordinance prohibiting the running of stock at large. There was a large number of swine running loose near the steamboat landing, and one day when the steamer was belated the draymen concluded they would have some fun. Getting a number of ropes they lassoed the hogs, tied and threw them on their drays, one hog to each dray, and to the music of the squealing of the hogs they marched single file to the city pound. Each man received twenty-five cents for his capture.

CHAPTER VIII

EARLY DAY TRANSPORTATION

SHAKESPEARE, in his play of Henry VI, causes King Edward to exclaim:

“What fates impose, that man must needs abide;

It boots not to resist both wind and tide.”

Was it fate that impelled the pioneers to rush to California, and undertake the various occupations of life, some to become gold-diggers, others merchants and a few ferrymen over the San Joaquin, Stanislaus and Mokelumne rivers? Fate or no fate, many of them engaged in that business, an occupation as necessary in building up the county as any other line of work. So essential were the ferries that they were doing business before the organization of the county, and twelve licensed ferries were in operation in 1850. Without the ferry, business could not have been transacted nor the traveler journey from county to county, for in the spring there were swift-running rivers to cross and not a bridge in the territory.

First Ferry Boat

The oldest and one of the best patronized ferries was one on the San Joaquin River later known as the Moss Ferry, near the present crossing of the Southern Pacific railroad bridge. It was established in 1849, by John Doak and Jacob Bonsell; these two men in 1848, returning from the gold mines, concluded to establish a ferry, at the point named, and they began operations by running a small yawl across the river carrying passengers. Later in the year John Doak, going to Corte de Madera, in Marin County, there built a ferry boat of the timber then growing upon the point. He sailed the boat up stream as far possible and then towing it the balance of the distance, made the trip from point to point in two weeks. The boat or barge was placed in position, and a long heavy rope stretched from shore to shore. By this means the boat was pulled to and fro across the river. The charges to cross were one dollar for a footman, three dollars for a man on horseback, and $8.00 for a wagon and horses. The ferry did an immense business, for it was on the direct road from Sacramento through Stockton to San Jose and Oakland. There was no other way to reach the coast overland. John Doak, the enterprising but restless pioneer, soon tired of the ferry business and in 1852 sold his interest to Hiram Scott. John Bonsell dying that year in New York, his widow took over the ferry. Shortly afterward, Mrs. Bonsell married James A. Shepherd, who for a season took charge of the ferry. In 1856 it was purchased by William T. Moss, who soon afterward established the San Francisco Examiner.

Heath & Emory Ferry

The Heath & Emory Ferry, a short distance below the present town of Ripon, on the Stanislaus River, was established in January, 1850. A few months later the ferry was purchased by the two partners, who were enterprising men and believed in printer's ink. In the first issue of the Stockton Times they advertised their ferry, saying that it was twenty-seven miles from Stockton. Their boat "was thirty feet long and nine feet wide and enclosed with side railings for horses, cattle and mules." They also had every "accommodation for travelers in the tent adjoining the ferry." They also made a good road to the ferry, built at a cost of $3,000, thus avoiding the cut-off. The great event of that ferry was the arrival in March, 1850, of a Mrs. Jenkins and her husband on their way to Crescent City. The ferryman was so pleased at the sight of a woman that he gave her party, at supper time, a private table, a bottle of wine and an oyster stew in addition to the regular fare of coffee, bread, pork and beans. In a short time there were over a dozen ferries crossing the Stanislaus River. Each ferry had a house where they could accommodate travelers over night, and some of the ferrymen carried a small stock of groceries, liquors, tobacco and mining implements.

Benson Ferry Tragedy

We must now travel north to the Mokelumne River and give a record of the three principal ferries across that river. They did more business than all of the Stanislaus ferries combined, because of the fact that they were the only routes of travel to Sacramento and the Northern mines. The first or the farthest west of these ferries crossed the Mokelumne River a short distance below the present town of New Hope. It was opened for business in 1849 by Edward Stokes and A. M. Woods; the following year the ferry was purchased by John A. Benson, who erected a house on the south side of the river and employed Green C. Palmer to attend the ferry. Benson was the leading spirit in seeking a division of the county in 1859, but before he succeeded he was killed by his employee, Palmer. The cause of the murder was the charge by Palmer that Benson, since 1854, had been intimate with his wife. It was said, however, that like a great many would-be heroes Benson was "more loose in his conversation than in his actions." On the day of the murder February 14, 1859, Palmer was at work plowing on the Benson place, but stopped work at noon-time. During the afternoon Palmer was in Parker's store, Benson came in accompanied by Dr. Hogaboom, and all three men took a drink at the bar. During this time Palmer's four children entered the store, and Benson as was his usual custom, gave them some nuts and candies. Leaving the store, all three men went to Palmer's home. In a short time Benson and the physician left the house and when a short distance away, Benson heard Palmer call out to Benson. Turning Benson saw Palmer running towards him with a revolver in his hand; surmising Palmer's intentions Benson cried out, "Don't, Green," but the murderer exclaimed, "There, you —— scoundrel you disgraced my children and now you must die," Palmer fired twice in rapid succession each shot hit Benson in a vital spot and he died while being conveyed to the house in a wagon.

Palmer returned to the house, reloaded his revolver and started on a run for the tules. He was not pursued and the following day Andrew Benson, the brother of the victim, offered a reward of $300 through the newspaper for his arrest. The fugitive was discovered about sunrise by a vaquero who was looking for some lost horses. Palmer was shaking and shivering with cold and hunger, having had nothing to eat since the murder. He gave himself up and taken to Stockton, was brought before Justice McCausland and remanded to jail. He there remained until the meeting of the grand jury in May. He was then indicted on the charge of murder and the trial took place August 4, 1859. There was considerable excitement and the court room was crowded, for each man had many friends. Money was freely spent by Benson's friends and they employed E. D. Baker, the most brilliant orator and attorney in California, to assist the prosecuting attorney, Judge Campbell. Samuel A. Booker defended Palmer. The trial looked crooked from beginning to end. The prosecution put on one witness only, Dr. Hogaboom; the defense five witnesses to prove Palmer's charge. It was one of the shortest murder trials on record. At five o'clock Attorney Booker began his closing speech, ending at eight o'clock. Baker closed at 9:30, and Judge Creanor, delivering his charge, the jury were locked up for the night. Twenty-four hours later they were discharged unable to agree, the jury standing five for murder in the first degree, which meant death by hanging; five for murder in the second degree, and two for acquittal. The second trial took place December 12, with J. G. Jenkins and Judge Campbell for the prosecution and S. A. Booker for the defense. The case was given to the jury at 7:30 and at 1 o'clock the following day they were discharged, nine for acquittal and three for manslaughter. In the third trial, January 3, 1860, the defense found some new witnesses. They proved to be good ones, for the jury brought in a verdict not guilty. After the acquittal Palmer's conscience must have greatly worried him, for on January 26, while in Moke-lumne City, he committed suicide by taking strychnine. His friend, J. H. Veach, running into the house at Mrs. Palmer's call, exclaimed, "Why have you done this?" And like old Adam in the Garden of Eden he replied, "This woman is the cause of all my trouble. I wish to die and get out of my misery."

Woods Ferry

It is a little strange perhaps that the ferry just east of Benson's should also have its tragedy. The Woods Ferry, as it was called, was located in 1850 by the two brothers, J. P. and Ross C. Sargent. In 1852 Jeremiah H. Woods and Alexander McQueen purchased a tract of land, now Woodbridge, and Mr. Woods established a ferry across the Mokelumne River where now stands the Woodbridge dam. Several years later Mr. Woods built a bridge across the river; it was there in 1864, for it had become a well-traveled stage route to Sacramento. After J. H. Woods' death some four years later, his widow, Mrs. P. H. Woods, petitioned the supervisors to permit her to charge the following tolls, footman ten cents, man on horseback twenty-five cents, two-horse team fifty cents, four-horse team one dollar, loose horses or cattle six cents each, hogs and sheep two and one-half cents. The Woodbridge Messenger reported March 2, 1868, that certain parties had requested the supervisors to postpone action on Mrs. Woods' petition as $2,000 had been subscribed for the purpose of buying and making it a public free bridge.

The death of Woods was caused by a stab in the abdomen brought about by his own unwarranted actions. A young farmer named William Wilkinson, who lived about a mile north of Woodbridge was walking by Woods' home accompanied by Charles Ashley, Jr., when a dog, running out of the yard, bit the young man on the thigh. Having no weapon he could not defend himself, but concluded that the next time he passed the house he would be ready for the savage brute. A few days later, June 4, 1864, he again passed Woods' house carrying a shotgun. The dog came bounding out but immediately ran back in the yard. A little later in the day Wilkinson saw the dog on the street with other dogs and shot him. Then going to the Union Hotel he left his gun behind the bar and went over to John Ruter's saloon. A short time after Woods hastily entered the saloon exceedingly angry over the killing of his dog, and in threatening manner he went up to Wilkinson and shouted, "Look here, sir, did you kill my dog?" "Yes, I did," Wilkinson replied. Woods then struck the young man twice, then grasping him by the hair of his head pulled Wilkinson to his knees. The young man was unarmed, but thinking of his pocket knife he managed to draw it from his pocket, and opening it made a blind stab at Woods' body. The blade entered a vital spot and Woods in ten minutes was dead. Woods letting go the boy, exclaimed, "Boys, he has stabbed me." Young Wilkinson, then only twenty-two years of age, immediately gave himself up and was brought to Stockton and confined in jail. The next morning he was taken before Justice Baldwin, and after hearing the evidence of five eyewitnesses to the affair, discharged the prisoner on the ground of self-defense.

It is not to be assumed that it was a lawless community along the Mokelumne River in the days long past, but in general they were a long ways from a peace-loving people. A case somewhat similar to that of the Benson Ferry affair took place in 1856. The principal in the case, C. L. Benedict, the owner of the ferry, had more good sense than Palmer and merely horse-whipped his traducer. The ferry, about six miles west of Staples Ferry, was established in 1852 by C. L. Benedict. He was married and living with him was his sister. For some reason a neighbor named George S. Wilson circulated scandalous stories regarding Miss Benedict and her brother. Benedict one day called Wilson to account and at the point of a revolver and in the presence of two witnesses, John P. Coats and Mathew Wills, he made Wilson sign the following retraction, "the story I have reported about C. S. Benedict and his sister is a willful lie done on purpose to both injure him and her." The following day August 21, 1856, Wilson inserted a card in the newspaper saying "my name to that document was forced from me under threats of my life and when I was prevented from using arms to protect myself. The statement was totally warranted and the sentiment expressed not mine." Benedict then laid for his detractor with a heavy rawhide whip. Two days later he met Wilson on the streets of Stockton and thrashed him unmercifully, inflicting a number of blows on his face and head. Benedict then went to the office of Justice of the Peace Bours, entered a complaint against himself of a breach of peace, and paid his fine. That ended the affair. He died in Central America in 1871.

Staples Ferry

The ferry a few miles west of Lockeford was established in 1849 by John W. Laird, in order to accommodate the large number of settlers in that vicinity. It was a very popular ferry and on the direct trail from Sutter's Fort to San Jose. It became famous as Capt. John C. Fremont in 1844, crossed the Mokelumne River at that point. Laird sold the ferry in 1850, to Staples, Nichol & Company, and it took the name of Staples Ferry. Soon after Staples took over the ferry he was appointed postmaster of that district and the ferry was selected as a voting precinct. David J. Staples was a man too big for that place and the county too limited for a man of his ability. Joining the Republican party, he was chosen from his state as one of the Abraham Lincoln electors and visited the East to see him inaugurated. Returning to California in 1862, he assisted in the election of Leland Stanford and was appointed port warden. He became a member of the various secret and financial organizations of San Francisco, and president of the Underwriters Association. He was born in Medway, Mass., May 3, 1824, came to California around Cape Horn in 1849, and died in San Francisco April 3, 1900.

County Bridges

Traveling by a crude rough-built ferry boat operated by man power is neither safe, reliable nor speedy, and in a few years the ferry boat was put out of commission by the building of bridges. They first were built by private enterprise, the owners being permitted to charge toll, and then by the county. The first bridge in the county was erected in 1854 over the Calaveras River at what was then known as the Leach & Frost ranch. The river was not wide but during the spring months the water ran deep and swift, the banks were steep and during these months of spring floods it was impossible to cross the stream. Leach & Frost had built a toll bridge across the river. In December the farmers of that vicinity made liberal donations, money was liberally subscribed by Stockton merchants, the bridge was purchased and opened free to the public. In giving an account of this enterprise the press declared, "All we want now is a bridge over the Mokelumne River to have a fine road to Sacramento." In 1858 Jeremiah H. Woods built a toll bridge across the Mokelumne River at Woodbridge, at a cost of $1,000. His toll charges were one dollar for two horses and wagon and fifty cents for each additional pair of animals. He is said to have taken in $9,000 the first year. The bridge was swept away in the flood of 1862. Soon after a better and more substantial bridge was built by Leonard, the San Francisco bridge builder, and soon after Woods' tragic death it was purchased by the farmers and opened free to the public.

Bridges were also built at Staples' ferry and at Lockeford before 1860. We have no definite knowledge regarding these bridges; David J. Locke probably built the bridge at Lockeford, for he was a shrewd, enterprising man, and not only endeavored to build up the town but also bid for all of the travel to the Northern mines. Staples Ferry was the upper and better winter route to Sacramento, as Woodbridge was the lower route to the Capital, hence there was a rivalry between the two points. The first bridge of any heavy cost or length was built in 1861 over the Mormon Channel at Pilgrim Street. It was then outside of the city limits and built to accommodate the San Joaquin district fair that year established. The San Joaquin County supervisors, jointly with the supervisors of Stanislaus County, in 1885 erected a bridge across the Stanislaus River at a point then known as Murphy's Ferry. It was a short distance from the present town of Ripon. The cost was $13,880, San Joaquin County paying $8,895 of the amount. The same county officials some twenty years later tore out the old wooden structure and erected a bridge with concrete piers. The bridge is now a part of the State Highway. Tens of thousands of dollars have been spent in this county for the erection of bridges and culverts that in a few years would be worn out and have to be replaced. It was an unavoidable waste because, until a few years ago, concrete for bridges was not a matter of economy because of its scarcity and high cost. Now the supervisors are replacing the old wooden structures with concrete bridges and piers that will last for ages.

Stockton the Mining Depot

Stockton was known as the depot of the Southern mines and it was rightly named, for all of the freight and passengers for Calaveras, Tuolumne, Fresno and Mariposa counties were compelled to pass through Stockton. There was also considerable freight and travel over this route for Sutter and Amador counties. It was not only necessary to feed and clothe the population of these counties, including San Joaquin County, but to also supply them with working tools, machinery, household furniture, building material and a thousand and one articles used in the many occupations and professions. The population in the mining camps to be supplied through the Stockton depot numbered something like 52,000 persons, with 10,000 in San Joaquin County. Of the mountain population there were 16,299 in Calaveras County, 16,250 in Tuolumne County, 4,628 in Tulare, 4,280 in Mariposa and 12,000 in Amador County. This was the mountain census of 1860, from that period the mines began a decrease in population, the people going into the valley and coast towns. It took an immense amount of freight to supply this population and as early as 1856 the two steamers of the California Steam Navigation Company, the Cornelia and Urilda, in the month of March landed 2,598 tons of freight. During the same time sailing vessels landed 1,019 tons, making 3,617 tons of freight for just one average month. In addition to this there was landed building material, including 235,000 feet of lumber, 50,000 shingles, 4,000 brick and 1,100 fencing posts. In the month of May the same steamers brought up freight aggregating 2,290 tons, the sailing vessels bringing up miscellaneous cargoes of 937 tons. Lumber was landed to the amount of 381,000 feet, laths 28,000, shingles 100,000. The exports during the month were 1,050 barrels of flour, 2,000 hides and 25,000 tons of hay, the hay being shipped on sailing vessels. Arthur Cornwall, for many years a steamboat man, said as a rule that all the freight came up and none went down except passengers and gold dust. The gold was in the care of the Adams Express Company.

The Mule of Commerce

One of the most useful of animals, especially to the teamster of early days, was the solemn-faced long-eared mule. Stubborn and oftentimes devilish, especially when abused, he was sure-footed along dangerous mountains and he possessed that stubborn perseverance which was of great value to the teamster, pulling with might and main as long as he could move over the ground or through the mud. A horse in pulling a load through the mud will sometimes get discouraged and balk. Another peculiarity was that when used as pack animals, if the Mexican loaded the mule too heavily, he would lie down and the muleteer would be compelled to take off the load. Sometimes they made excellent saddle animals. In price mules averaged about the same as horses. When first brought into the county in 1849, they sold at $100 each, but as soon as teaming became a paying business the price went up. The city of Stockton found that the price was high. In 1857, as one of the teams of D. J. Oullahan was being driven along Main Street, a mule pushed the wooden cover off the fire cistern, fell in and was drowned in eight feet of water. It cost the city $300, the value of the mule. Sometime after that Henry Huffman paid Oullahan $1,300 for a choice pair of mules, weighing together 2,800 pounds; they were said to be the two largest mules in the state.

A Pack Mule Train

About the first mules brought into the county were driven here in 1849 by Samuel Catts, a former member of the famous Stevenson's regiment. Shortly after Catts arrival, Capt. Patrick E. Conner came in with a band of mules from Texas. They were then used as pack mules and for a few months Mexicans carried on the principal transportation business. The pack mules, however, were in evidence for several years as there were places in the mountains, inaccessible to wagons or teams. One of these places was the famous Yosemite Valley. As late as 1877 the writer with a party of seven visited the Valley. We were compelled to leave our wagon at the foot of the hill, and travel twenty miles on horseback. On the backs of these mules, fastened with ropes to pack saddles, were all kinds of goods, from barrels of flour to baby buggies and furniture. All kinds of ammunition, even gunpowder was carried in this manner. One day a mule loaded with gunpowder was traveling along the mountain trail. He stumbled and fell to the bottom of the ravine. They found one hoof. The best description I have ever read of a pack train was in the newspaper of February, 1861, it said, "A mule train was packed yesterday from the store of Hestres & Magendie for a point high up in the mountains some forty miles above Hornitas. There were forty mules in the train and they were loaded according to their strength from 200 to 300 pounds. Among the goods packed were casks of liquor, boxes of tea, bags of potatoes, chests of tea, and bales of dry goods. It looked like old times." The trains usually comprised from forty to fifty mules. They were in charge of Mexicans mounted on saddle horses. The mules followed what was known as the bell-mule, a trained animal driven ahead of the train with a bell around his neck. The mules were driven across the plains, for there were but few fences, and halted at night near a stream of water. The load was taken from the pack saddles, and the mules, with hobbles around their front feet, were turned loose to browse on the luxuriant growth of grass until the morn. One Mexican stood guard each night to protect the mules from prowling wild animals and see that they did not go astray. The following morning at daylight the packs were reloaded and the train started for its destination.

The pack-mule trains were soon superseded by ox-teams; the drivers were immigrants, who crossing the plains with oxen began the freighting business, but it was not a very profitable occupation, although for some length of time oxen were used, and in order not to wear out their feet they were shod with iron plates. The shoeing of an ox was interesting; he was led into a strong frame made for the purpose and lifted bodily from the ground by a strong leather harness. There were several blacksmiths who made a specialty of ox-shoeing; one I remember was Rudolph Gnekow, who had a blacksmith shop at Main and Stanislaus streets. The ox teams were slow and the amount of freight they could haul was limited and therefore much time lost in making a trip to the mines. Then followed the four-horse and mule teams and the business became well established. As a means of finding out those persons who had freight for shipment to the mines, and for the benefit of the teamsters themselves, the "Miner's Exchange," a saloon, opened a "Teamster's Register" and advertised that, "In addition to the Miner's Register the subscriber has opened a register for freight. All persons having freight for the mines, will please enter the quantity, and which mines they are bound for." These teamsters were for a year or two the spotlight men of the town, and the merchants gave them the glad hand. Why? Taking a load of goods to the mining camps for other parties, or perhaps on speculation the merchants would give him an order to purchase goods for them. Then the teamster, returning to Stockton with his pockets filled with orders, would patronize his friends or the retailer that gave him the best terms. There was big money in it and this manner of business continued until the stage lines were well established, the telegraph located throughout the "camps" and the commission business was inaugurated.

We have been hearing the cry of late years, especially from the farmer, the fruit and vegetable grower, "Cut out the middlemen." This may be possible in the course of time, but in the time of which we are now writing, the middle or commission-man was just as necessary in the transaction of business between mountain and valley as the buyer or seller. The mountain merchant could not leave his business three or four times a year to purchase goods either in Stockton or San Francisco, for several reasons. First the cost of travel, the loss of time, and perhaps lack of capital. And, as the reader remembers in certain months of the year traveling was well-nigh impossible. The San Francisco merchant could not ship goods to the mines, as a rule, because of steamer and unreliable land transportation. Hence a place was created for the commission merchant, who for a certain commission received the freight of the mountain dealer and shipped it to its proper destination. He was in one sense like the town postmaster who receives the letters and packages and through a third party sends them to the proper address. Freight would come to Stockton by steamer addressed to the Sierra merchant in care of the commission merchant; each commissioner employed certain draymen who would take the goods to his warehouse. The middleman would then send on the goods by his regular teamster as soon as possible. Sometimes a merchant would have his own teams, but in general the merchandise was given to reliable teamsters for transportation. Frequently it would happen in the winter months that goods could not be quickly shipped out, and the steamers would overload the middle man. To store such goods as arrived the commissioner, or better still, the teamster, would erect a small brick storage house. Henry Huffman had a storage house where now stands the Clark Hotel; Andrew Blossom had such a storage place on California Street, now used as an ice cream factory; and a large two-story brick building on the Levee was used for that purpose. Before the erection of brick buildings there were many storage ships in the harbor.

China John

There were a few foreigners engaged in the commission business, but the majority were Americans, except China John, a fat, sleek-appearing Chinaman, could speak good English, something very unusual in that day, sported a gold watch and a heavy gold chain, was well dressed in American clothing, and was an inveterate gambler. He became wealthy acting as a middleman between the Chinese merchants in San Francisco and the Chinese miners in the mountain camps. He carried on an immense business, for the Chinese dealt as far as possible with their own people, rather than with the white man. Frequently China John would receive a consignment of Chinamen for the mines from some Chinese company in the Bay City. Chartering a mule team, he would fill the wagon-bed with their boxes of rice and tea, rice bowls and chop sticks, then their blankets and bags of clothing, and the Chinamen on top. Time and again have I seen from twenty to thirty Chinamen, wearing their wide bamboo hats, perched high on a wagon and chattering like monkeys, bound for the Chinese mining camps.

Prairie Schooners

The quickest and most profitable way of transporting freight was in a large wagon holding from five to eight tons of freight, with two trailers. In that way, using sixteen mules, a teamster could haul from twelve to sixteen tons of freight. These wagons were so large that they could carry as much as a small water craft, hence they were usually known as "prairie schooners." The largest wagon ever manufactured in California was made by Wm. F. Miller of Stockton at a cost of $1,000. It was exhibited that year, 1857, at the Stockton fair. Named the Stocktonian, the bed of this wagon was twenty-five feet in length, five feet in width and eight feet in height, and the rear wheels were seven feet in diameter. The wagon alone weighed 5,000 pounds and it would carry ten tons. It was practically of no value as it was too large for mountain roads and required twenty mules to haul it; sixteen mules were about all one man could conveniently handle, besides driving throughout the day was no easy job in the hot sun, and an awful task through the mud; each man was obliged to water, feed, harness and unharness the animals twice a day.

It was remarkable the amount of freight a mule could haul. It was found that a mule in team work pulling together could pull twice his weight. Team work was necessary, especially when traveling over heavy winter roads. This team work was accomplished by the driver with a six-foot flexible whip called a "black snake." He would touch up the laziest mules with the whip, and giving it a crack that resounded like the report of a pistol, every mule would commence pulling. It was by this means such remarkable loads were daily transported from Stockton to the mines. In the climbing of the mountains it was necessary to give the animals frequent resting spells, and large wooden blocks were dragged behind each hind wheel to block the wagon when it ceased moving. Of the thousands of large loads carried we will note two or three. James Fillmore, in 1853, with a team of six mules hauled 9,000 pounds from Stockton to Agua Fria; Kelty & Reynolds, with eight mules delivered 16,000 pounds of freight to the Sonora merchants; John Schricke, "Dutch John" they called him, the same year landed 18,000 pounds of freight in Sonora from his ten-mule team. Here's another one giving both time and weight. On August 14, 1855, "Sullivan & Company of Mariposa received on August 8 the largest load of goods ever taken to that town. It was hauled by a twelve-mule team owned by J. C. Warren, who left Stockton July 30 with 22,500 pounds of freight and arrived at the store August 8 at 8:30 P. M. Beat this who can." Michael Caracoff, later a very successful Sonora Road farmer, on one occasion with fourteen mules, hauled in three wagons 31,000 pounds of wheat to the Stanislaus flour mills at Knights Ferry. And in August, 1856, "The largest load ever drawn by eight mules in a wagon was brought from the ranch of Reynolds & Kelly, about seven miles from Stockton, into town. The load consisted of 280 sacks of barley, 80 pounds to the sack, amounting to 22,400 pounds.

As the mule team is almost a thing of the past and thousands of citizens have never seen one it may be well to describe the handling of such a team. No matter whether the number of animals were four or more they were all guided by a single line or rein called a jerk-line. The line fastened to the bit of the leading mule ran back to the saddle or right-wheel mule which the driver rode, and he could guide the team by the line or stop it by the strong heavy brake the rope from which was fastened to the saddle. If the driver wished to turn to the right he would yell "gee gee," and pull the line; all the team understood that word, if going to the left he would yell "haw haw," and jerk the line three or four times. The four most valuable mules in the team were the leaders, because of their intelligence, and quickness to obey the driver, and the wheelers, so called because nearest to the wheels. They were the largest and strongest mules in the team, as it was their work to steady the tongue of the wagon, and sometimes assist in stopping the wagon down grade. An outfit of sixteen mules and a wagon would extend at least 175 feet and to see a teamster turn a corner of a sixty-foot street and the wheels not touch the corner of either street was a marvel of expert driving. Handling an automobile is no comparison.

The Bell Mule Team

In October, 1853, the newspaper stated that the "teamsters and teams of Stockton are the subject of general remark by all those who visit the city. The teamsters are industrious and take great pride in hauling big loads and embellishing their harness and wagons in fine style." Many of the teamsters would have sets of small bells which they riveted to an iron band in the form of an arch and fastened on either side of the hames, which were buckled around the collar. They were known as bell teams. The principal use of the bells was to warn persons or teams about to start down hill in the mountains that a heavily loaded team was moving up the grade. It was said that the mules traveled steadier and more spirited to the jingle of the bells. To see one of these teams of big evenly-matched mules with their clean, polished harness, bells jingling and glistening in the sunlight on a Fourth of July parade, with little flags in the bridle of each mule, was a beautiful sight.

The busiest season of the teamsters was in the fall of the year, for at that time the mountain merchants were compelled to get in their winter supply of goods. Then the steamers would arrive daily loaded to capacity with freight and the draymen would be busy throughout the day checking up freight and hauling it to the commission houses. The teamsters were very busy, so much so, I have known of blacksmiths working late at night shoeing mules and mending wagons so that the teamsters could start the following morning with a load of freight for the camps. At this time the principal roads leading to the mines were crowded with teams and on one occasion seventy teams, each team hauling from five to eight tons, were counted upon the Sonora road within a distance of fifteen miles.

Miners Short of Food

Although the mountain merchants would guard, as much as possible, against any chance of a shortage of goods in his store, especially if he was a dealer in foodstuffs, a famine sometimes took place. The winter of 1853 was particularly severe on the mountain camps, as it was very wet and almost impossible to reach the mines. The consequence was several towns ran out of food. In January fifty Chileans left the camp on foot and coming to Stockton through a sea of mud, each man took back to Mokelumne Hill 100 pounds of food packed on his back. An American who came into town from the "hill" said food was so scarce that he was compelled to give $1.50 for a plate of beans. At Murphy's camp the food conditions were as bad or even worse than that of Mokelumne Hill. Two men reaching Stockton in a light boat made of a wagon bed stated that flour was worth $1.50 a pound at Murphy's and the miners were grinding acorns and barley, Indian fashion, for food.

The Road Stations

When the freighting business was first established the teamsters "cut across lots" and camped wherever night found them or at some ferry. When the farmers began purchasing land and enclosing it with a brushwood or cordwood fence, the teamsters were compelled to follow along the road. Then public houses and stopping places were established and they were so numerous that they averaged not over three miles apart. On the Linden Road, at one time, there were over seventeen public houses within a distance of twenty miles. On the Sonora Road there were nineteen stopping places; and on the Knights Ferry Road thirteen houses. These men naturally had their favorite stopping places, which in summer time they could easily reach during the afternoon, and there at times, from ten to fifteen teamsters would assemble at night around the fireplace and tell their jokes or stories and give the latest news. Here was planned the joke which won a wife for Joseph D. Peters, one of their number.

The teamsters returning to Stockton would stop at some convenient spot on the street and unharnessing their mules, would tie them on each side of the wagon and feed them. A favorite camping place, said G. C. Claiborne, was the Court House Square, the teamsters and muleteers made it a common place to camp. When the authorities would no longer permit them to camp on the square or streets then the stablemen came in and gave them free use of their big stable yards, provided they purchased of them their hay and barley. The feeding of barley to the mules meant a feast to the hundreds of blackbirds in the tree tops. The mules would waste considerable barley and the following day the birds would alight in swarms and feed on the waste. The birds made a good pot pie, and the Republican referring to them in 1856 said, "Blackbirds are thick in the suburbs (now the corner Sutter and Main) and almost as gentle as barn fowl, but they are fast being reduced as the Kanakas (Sandwich Islanders) and Frenchmen are shooting them for food." After the passage of the firearms ordinance they no longer feared the sportsmen within the city limits.

Highwaymen Hold Up Stages

There were others upon the road as well as the teamsters and they were the highwaymen, who not only held up the stages, but the teamsters as well, robbing them sometimes of several hundred dollars. That these drivers were no cowards was evident from the bravery of George Eberhardt and Ira Ladd. Eberhardt, in 1859, was driving one of the teams of Fred Yost. While on his way to Mokelumne Hill a footman stepped from behind a rock with revolver leveled and ordered the driver to dismount from his mule and hand over his cash. Eberhardt did as directed, cautioning the robber to handle the pistol more carefully or it might go off. The knight of the road then mounted his horse, tied near by, and headed towards the Tuolumne River. Eberhardt was unarmed, but quickly unhitching his mule he hastily rode to the wagon of a teamster some four hundred yards up the road, borrowed a shotgun and the two men started in pursuit of the bandit. The fellow seeing them, plunged into the river, expecting to swim his horse to the other side. The current was too strong and being obliged to return he was made a prisoner, taken to French Bar and placed in jail.

The three Ladd brothers, George, John and Ira were in the commission and freighting business, George conducting the store, and the two last-named driving teams on the road. In September, 1864, while Ira and an employee, each man driving a team, were approaching Knights Ferry about sundown, two Mexican horsemen came out of the bushes and approaching the drivers told them to dismount and hand over their money. The teamsters were armed but helpless and made no resistance. The Mexicans obtained $215 from Ira Ladd and $185 from the hired man and rode away, foolishly forgetting to disarm their victims, believing that they would not pursue. Ladd and his man quickly stripped the harness from their mules and started on the trail of the Mexicans, soon overtook them and both parties began firing. The "mustangs" of the Mexicans were more speedy than the mules and they escaped. Ira Ladd was wounded in the leg by a pistol ball, and throughout his life was slightly lame.

The decreasing population of the gold mines commencing in 1864, rapidly reduced the number of teams hauling freight to the camps. The population of Amador, Calaveras, Tuolumne and Mariposa counties in 1860 was 45,058; ten years later it was only 30,199. Mariposa in 1850, had a population of 4,379, with an increase to 6,243 in 1860. Calaveras County in 1850 had a population of 16,134, reduced to 12,546 in 1860. Tuolumne County's inhabitants was in 1850, 8,351, increased in 1860 to 16,239, decreased in 1870 to 8,150. Where did the mountain miners, their wives and children go? San Joaquin County received hundreds of them as shown by the statistics. It is true that hundreds settled in the county who came by steamer from the Eastern States, some came across the plains, but the great majority came from the mines. In 1850 the county had a population of 3,647, in 1860 9,435, and in 1870, 21,500, more than double the inhabitants of 1860.

Copper Excitement

The decline of freighting was somewhat revived by the accidental discovery, in 1860, of copper in the foothills. Two miners prospecting for gold found strong indications of copper. In a short time a town was founded upon the spot named Copperpolis and in less than two years it had a population of 10,000 souls. Deep shafts were dug, millions of dollars expended and an abundance of pure copper ore found. It was loaded into heavy canvas sacks, 100 pounds to a sack, and by teams shipped to Stockton. Hundreds of teams were engaged in this work and at times the Levee was crowded with wagons unloading copper. So many were the wagons bringing copper into the city the steamers could not keep down the supply. And as early as 1862, 3,000 tons of copper had been shipped by steamer. The output of copper rapidly increased and in 1865, from February to September, 64,000 tons of copper ore had been landed upon the wharf by freight teams. This work gave employment to hundreds of teamsters and laborers, and thousands of dollars were expended with the Stockton merchants. Then came a slump in the price of copper. It fell so low in price that it could not be dug from the mines and shipped by team to Stockton except at a heavy loss. A railroad line to Copperopolis had been incorporated but too late to get results. Charles T. Meader, a Stockton merchant, became a millionaire dealing in copper stock, but failed on the decline of copper. The mines were shut down, teaming discontinued, the population decreased and the mines and many buildings are today rotting with age.

In the heyday of teaming the prices for hauling freight were very high. At one time the teamsters received seventy-five cents per pound for carrying freight sixty miles to Sonora, and one dollar per pound to Mariposa, 120 miles. After a time the prices for transporting freight fluctuated, as the new comers in the business with two or more oxen or horses would carry freight at any price. This caused the teamsters, who had thousands of dollars invested in mules, wagons, harness and several other overhead expenses, to try and protect themselves by forming an association. Another expense that sometimes cut down the profits was team losses. The teamsters in traveling to the mines were obliged during the winter and spring months to cross many small creeks of running water. One of those losses the newspaper of April, 1861, records in this way. "The remainder of the splendid team of Bostwick & Wilhoit, in which eleven mules perished in Custer Creek above Sonora, recently arrived in town. It had been up with a load of goods and was returning to Stockton. The driver upon reaching the creek put a man upon the lead mule to ride him across the creek. The water was not belly deep, although there was a swift current. The man fell off and then seizing the mule by the bridle turned him downstream. He was greatly frightened and so were the mules. The leader fell and they were soon all of a tangle. The mules made no effort to save themselves but laid down in the creek and were drowned. Three of the mules only were saved and it was a heavy loss for those days, nearly $3,000."

Teamsters Association

The press in writing of the proposed Teamsters Association said in 1854, "We speak of this class of our population with no small degree of pride. They are industrious, honest, intelligent. They are as accomplished and expert as any that ever cracked a whip or owned a bullock. But considering the dullness of the times and brisk competition they have not received much profit for their labor and for the capital invested. We are therefore glad to hear that they are trying to effect some arrangement or combination to ameliorate it." The teamsters' union was the first labor organization in San Joaquin County, the Typographical Union excepted. And their first efforts for organization were made in October, 1855, when a meeting was called in the city hall by "many teamsters," "as matters of great importance will be brought up." At that meeting, D. J. Oullahan was appointed chairman and Samuel Crosswait secretary. A committee was appointed to draft a resolution "regulating the prices of freight to the mines on a fair and reasonable basis." A week later the committee reported a schedule for over thirty mountain camps, which was adopted by the meeting. An average of their prices ran as follows: Angel's Camp, 65 miles, 2½ cts. per lb. light freight; 1¾ cts. heavy freight; to Mokelumne Hill, 50 miles, 2 cts. light and 1½ cts. heavy freight; to Mariposa, 120 miles, 3 cts. light and 2½ cts. heavy. Light freight was not profitable as baby buggies, sewing machines, furniture, etc., took up too much room.

Many of the teamsters broke their agreement. The association reorganized in the spring of 1856 and they signed an agreement to forfeit $100 if any of them took freight below the schedule price. Not only that, but a committee of twenty teamsters were appointed to watch the other fellow. A few of this committee well known in later years, comprise D. J. Oullahan, Jeremiah Sarles, John D. Pierson, Frederick Yost, J. M. Schofield, Isaac S. Bostwick, Henry Huffman and O. H. Perry. The Ladd brothers would not enter the combine, George Ladd, saying later that the teamsters were doing well enough. In April, 1859, he seems to have changed his mind, for in a meeting of the teamsters for a permanent organization he was chairman of the meetings. The association as organized elected as officers: George S. Ladd, president, Dr. F. W. Todd, secretary, Roley E. Wilhoit, treasurer, and Frederick Yost, Isaac V. Lefler, Joseph M. Capurro, Andrew Snyder and Enoch Peyton, directors.

The industry, honesty and intelligence of the teamsters as portrayed by the Republican was fully maintained in their future lives. They married, became men of families and quite prominent in civic and political life. Fred Yost built a pretty two-story brick home on California Street and his children are now honored citizens. George S. Ladd, for twenty years was city superintendent of schools. R. E. Wilhoit was county treasurer, councilman, school trustee and bank director and lived to reach ninety-one years of age, attending to his business. D. J. Oullahan was appointed state treasurer, and one of his sons was mayor of the city and is now secretary of the Chamber of Commerce. Some of these men found their wives in the mountain camps. Smith Whiting, a teamster and later a drayman found his wife at Mokelumne Hill; he was married December 1, 1859, to Miss Jeannette Morrison. His daughter is now a public school teacher. At the Spring Garden ranch, Calaveras County, February 8, 1863, Andrew Blossom was married to Miss Laura H. Saunders. Mr. Blossom built a handsome residence on California years later and engaged in farming. The oldest son now carries on the business, and the second son is a musician of note. The most notable of all of these marriages was that of Joseph D. Peters, a young, energetic Italian who came to Stockton in 1849 and engaged in teaming. We will let Ernest J. Hopkins of San Francisco tell the story, as his imagination is more of the romantic order than mine and in the Romance of San Joaquin he wrote the following story: "First of the teamsters' tales is the story of how J. D. Peters won his bride. Be it remembered that the problem of getting a wife in those days was a costly one. It costs $2,000 for a man to leave his business, go east and return with the lady of his heart. One of the hotels in Columbia, a favorite hotel of the teamsters was kept by a Mrs. Taylor, a refined and charming woman, who had two pretty daughters, Emmaline and Zuba Taylor. One day in the '50s a new team drew up at the watering trough, and the young man who swung the blacksnake was merry and likeable. He had left his native Genoa and landed in America under a vow that he would never work for any man. He had struck a little gold and this team was his first step towards fortune. This young man, J. D. Peters, tied up and went inside for his meal. He was served by the charming Emmaline herself. Peters' fate was sealed. But soon his eyes took on a weary look. He was a poor man and this young lady had said, 'I'll never be a poor man's bride.'

"Now the teamsters were a jolly lot, with more than usual brotherhood. They sized up the situation and laid their plans to help. Two fancy teams with bright steel trappings and gaudily painted wagons met one noon at the eating house, the drivers entered together to be greeted by Miss Emmaline. And one driver said to the other, 'Who are you driving for now, Bill?' 'Oh, I'm driving for Peters.' 'Why, I'm driving for Peters, too,' replied the other. 'He's a fine fellow to work for.' Emmaline listened with interest. Every day after that new names were added to the army of men who were working for Peters. Then signs began to appear hung on the sides of the wagons where all might read, J. D. P., J. D. Peters, J. D. Peters & Co. The legend grew and grew—a colossal joke spreading over the whole Stockton-Sonora district. Wherever the young lady walked or rode on horseback she would come across that sign J. D. Peters, or be greeted by pleasant-faced fellows who straightway praised their boss. 'When I came to America, I swore I would never work for another man,' he told her at evening as they sat on the porch of the hostelry. 'And I'm keeping my promise.' What girl could resist?" History proves that Emmaline could not for she and J. D. Peters were married at Columbia in 1858, and a jovial crowd of teamsters attended the wedding and made Rome howl far into the night. Later she learned the joke, but Peters was then making big money and she had no cause for complaint." Mrs. Peters died in April, 1874, and to her memory her husband erected an ornamental marble block, surmounted by a life-sized figure, the features resembling the deceased. Imported from Italy it was of pure marble, personifying Hope, a work of art costing one thousand dollars.

Staging to the Mines

Teaming was but one phase of the transportation business; another phase of equal importance was the passenger and mail service. In 1850 a Mr. Holden, while freighting to Sonora with a small team noticed many travelers walking to and from the mines, and he concluded to carry light freight and passengers. By so doing making quicker trips he could make more money. The following year he sold out his pioneer line to Kelley, Reynolds & Company. In the same year "the traveling public were glad to learn that Todd & Company have also established stages to Sonora and other points. We have never seen a handsomer turnout or a more useful team of mules." These two firms primarily were in the express business and they began carrying gold dust, letters, and passengers. The fast time made by these two companies "was astonishing. They left Sonora, seventy-five miles distant, at seven o'clock in the morning and arrived at Stockton at two P. M. Thirty miles of the road was of the roughest description, along hillsides, over channels formed by the winter rains, and up steep elevations that would demoralize the city driver."

In February of 1851 two Frenchmen, Guibal & Dhorboure, established a tri-weekly stage line to run between Stockton and Mokelumne Hill. The express was of great advantage to all of the mercantile men who have long felt the want of such a communication. "The animals," said the writer, "are not excelled by any in the county and the cars are new and well adapted for such a purpose." Before the firm had been a month in the staging business they were compelled to meet with competition, for two other Frenchmen, Provide & Paxon, established a line to Mokelumne Hill and Double Springs. They left Stockton on Tuesday and Thursday at 7:30 A. M. and left the "Hill" on Wednesday and Sunday at 3 o'clock P. M. The fare clear through was twelve dollars.

Fisher Brothers' Stage Line

In 1854 two solid and reliable business men, Alvin N. and Samuel Fisher, purchased the opposition line of Alonzo McCloud at a cost of $10,000. They put on a daily line of stages, carried the United States mail to all the mountain camps and equipped their lines with fine horses and coaches. They occupied as their stage office, the old El Dorado gambling house, a famous resort on the northwest corner of Levee and Center streets, now the Grand Hotel. On New Year's Day, as was the usual custom with the hustling business men, they gave a housewarming. And we are told that "The baskets of champagne opened on the occasion were fully appreciated by the friends of the enterprising firm. Fisher says he is ready for the race," meaning that he was ready to battle with all competitors, which at that time was the California Stage Co. They were carrying passengers to Mokelumne Hill or Campo Seco for one dollar or to Sonora or Columbia, two dollars, Murphy's Camp, seven dollars. Alvin Fisher died in 1863, and a third brother, Zenus Fisher, purchased the business. He died in May, 1872, and soon afterward Samuel Fisher sold out the staging business to his competitor, Maurice Dooley, who had for several years been running an opposition line with an office in the brick building at the northeast corner of Levee and Center streets. It is now a grain office. The stage business at the time was declining because of the advent of the Central Pacific Railroad. When Dooley died the business was taken over by Charles Sissions, who had formerly been one of Dooley's drivers.

Alonzo McCloud, a tall, enterprising Yankee, in 1852 started an opposition line to Sonora with fare at sixteen dollars one way. It was his line that made the record time from Sonora, August 18, 1853, at the time of the destruction of the town by fire. The stage came "bounding into town at 8 o'clock A. M.," much to the surprise of the citizens. It left Sonora about 2 o'clock that morning, coming through in six hours. A few minutes later the regular stage arrived. In July, 1854, McCloud endeavored to establish a daily line of stages between Stockton and Oakland in opposition to the steamers. There was much complaint about the high prices on the steamers and McCloud believed the travelers would patronize his line, especially as it was a saving of time and a daylight trip. The line left the Weber House at 1 o'clock and running by the way of French Camp, Banta's, Livermore rancho, San Antonio and Clinton the passengers took the ferry for San Francisco, arriving at 4 o'clock. The steamers reduced their fare to a point below the stage line, and in a few months it was discontinued.

In August, 1859, another attempt was made to establish a line of stages between Oakland and Stockton. They left Fisher's stage office at 6 o'clock and their passengers landed in San Francisco between 4 and 5 o'clock. It was another contest with the California Navigation Company and said the editor, "We congratulate the citizens of Stockton upon the consummation of this long deferred project. It will be a heavy blow against our ancient foe, the California Navigation Company, as it will deplete the coffers of that monster monopoly at least $75,000 a year if the stages are well patronized. Since the spring of 1854 the public of Stockton and the surrounding country have been bled by this soulless corporation." Fares again went down on the steamers, good-bye stage line. Today automobiles are making several trips a day and there is business for all the companies, stages, steamers and railroads.

The fun and the opposition of stages was not alone confined to the Oakland and the Sonora routes, but there was the Sacramento route, Sacramento since 1858 having been the State Capital. There were two routes to the Capital, one known as the Upper Sacramento Road, running about half way between the Cherokee Lane and Waterloo Road and the Lower Sacramento Road, skirting the tule lands passed Woodbridge. The upper road, crossing at Staples Ferry, the lower road then took all the travel. It was a horrible winter road, especially the first ten miles out of Stockton, and not until 1863 was any part of the road improved. Along the lowlands of the Mokelumne River there were miles of swamps and none but an expert driver could travel the road during the winter months. Said a writer in March, 1861, "It is perfectly wonderful how the stage drivers continue to pilot their vehicles through the immense lake without a mishap, while the slightest deviation from the road, which is invisible, would in many places overturn them in from eight to ten feet of water." The leading driver and stage proprietor on this line was "Peg-leg" Johnny Smith, so called because of a wooden right leg from the knee down. He was a very expert four-horse driver and, strange to say, could handle the lines drunk or sober. If too drunk, then his friends would prevent his getting on the coach, but there was a tussle, for he would fight like a wildcat and insist on making his regular trip. "Johnny" also had opposition and on one occasion he advertised, "fare reduced and speed increased on John Smith's line of stages from Stockton to Sacramento; the fare will be reduced to five dollars or as low as the lowest."

The Coaches and Routes

The coaches in use by the two larger companies were all first class and built in Concord, N. H., costing from $1,200 to $1,500 each. The bottom of the coach was built rounding like a bowl, so that it had a rocking movement like a chair when fastened to the thick leather spring on each side of the running gear. On the rear of the coach was a large leather boot, covered with a leather curtain. It held the baggage and trunks of the passengers. In front, beneath the driver's seat, was a smaller boot, which held the United States mail and Wells Fargo express box, oftentimes containing from $5,000 to $20,000 in gold dust. The highwaymen, hundreds of times, held up the drivers with a shotgun, and demanded, "Throw out that box." "Now drive on." After a time the thing got monotonous and the express company had the boxes fastened to the stage with strong iron bands. Then the knights of the road began holding up the passengers. All of the coaches were handsomely painted with fine landscape scenes on the outside of each door. Dennis & Tinkham, with their shop on Channel Street, now the location of the Simons building, did all the painting for the Fisher brothers, with their large stable on the opposite side of the street. These stages would seat nine inside the coach and from ten to fifteen on top, their legs dangling over the side. In the hot summer sun it was a very disagreeable, painful ride, but there was no other choice. In the winter months travel was very light and the company ran what was dubbed as "mud" wagons, with passenger service only in the body of the wagon. Sometimes these wagons would stall in the mud and the passengers were compelled to alight and walk or wade to higher ground.

The stages left the office promptly at six o'clock, the steamer with its passengers arriving before that hour. If the steamer was delayed by heavy fogs or mud bars, the stages moved on time unless there happened to be a special group of steamer passengers. Each stage line engaged a runner at $100 per month who called out in stentorian tones the names of the various mountain camps, some thirty in number, through which the stages passed. They were all one day journeys except to Mariposa; that was a two days trip, 120 miles, fare $20.00. There was at one time nine coaches leaving the stage office every morning except Sunday for various points in the mines and the coast. They left for Sacramento by the way of Woodbridge and Elk Grove for Sutter Creek through Lockeford and Jackson; for Mokelumne Hill through Linden, Bellota and Angel's Camp; during the summer a stage for Angel's Camp, Murphy's Camp and the Big Trees; along the present Sonora road for Knights Ferry, Chinese Camp, Big Oak Flat, Jamestown, Sonora and Columbia; over the Mariposa road for Mariposa, stopping the first night at Snelling, and last to Oakland.

Overland Mail Line

The pony express and the Overland stage line preceded the coming of the Central Pacific Railroad only a few years. Stockton saw nothing of the pony express for its terminus was Sacramento, but they caught a glimpse of the Overland stage line as it started from or passed through Stockton. It was announced October 31, 1858, that the first mail stage from Stockton to Missouri, over the Central Overland route would start the following morning from the Weber House, and the stage would go by the way of Independence, Kansas City, Santa Fe and Albuquerque. The announcement was made by the postmaster, Wm. Lanius, so that all citizens who desired could send their eastern letters by that route. Letters before this time had been going by steamer twice a month, it taking the steamer twenty days or more to make the trip from San Francisco to New York. There was a large crowd present to witness the starting of the first mail line. No attempt was made to take any passengers and the stage was loaded with blankets, provisions and the United States mail. Four employees of the company boarded the stage and a mounted guard rode on either side. At precisely ten o'clock the horn was blown, the mail was put on board, the crowd hurraed and the stage was on its way. It was this line over which Horace Greeley came to California in 1858. It was sanctioned by Congress which appropriated a large sum of money, but the expense was so heavy and the results so small the line was discontinued in 1859.

CHAPTER IX

JUSTICE COURTS—SQUATTERS—MOB LAW

IT is a surprising fact that so few persons in any community realize the value, the necessity and the strict observance of law. As a rule they believe, or profess to believe, that they should respect and obey no law that does not meet their approval, forgetting perhaps that laws are passed for the good of the public in general and therefore should be obeyed by all honorable men regardless of their individual opinion. To illustrate, note the thousands of honorable citizens who are daily violating the prohibition and the automobile laws, forsooth they do not believe them just laws. In the early days of San Joaquin County there were hundreds of men who were of the same opinion as the "wets" and the "speeders". They had no respect for the laws, no regard for the rights, the property or the lives of others in that community. The consequence was the laws were trampled under foot and all manner of crimes were committed.

A Riot of Crime

The cry of gold in California brought to the territory not only thousands of honest industrious young men, but it also brought hundreds of criminals from every land and nation, many of them steeped in crime. It became a place of refuge for men escaping punishment, and a place where criminals could continue in crime and reap greater rewards than in their own country, with less danger of being caught and punished. Among the worst of criminals who came into the state were those from Sydney, Australia, who were known as "Sydney ducks". You remember that many years ago Australia was the penal colony of England, where all criminals were banished. They were a terror to the law-abiding citizen. The Stockton press in June, 1851, gave the following warning, "Look out, Citizens, we have been informed that eight 'Sydney Ducks' arrived on the steamer this morning. The dread of the Vigilance Committee in San Francisco has induced them to seek more healthy quarters." Then there were the Mexican criminals, for California in the early '40s was the penal territory of Mexico. Because of the Mexican war there was no love lost between the Mexicans and the Americans. Then there came another class from the south and west, a bullying braggadocio class that despised a man who believed a negro was a human being and should be so treated. They declared that they had won the Mexican war and California belonged exclusively to them. These men brooked no laws or restraint and always armed with a bowie knife or revolver, sometimes both weapons, defied any man or set of men to arrest or punish thme for any misdeeds. They would fill up on "old Kentucky Rye" and then mounting their mustangs ride rapidly up and down the streets whooping and yelling and firing their pistols in every direction. I have seen them cruelly spur their horses across the sidewalk into a saloon, drink from the bar when mounted, and then tell the barkeeper to charge it. If they didn't sweep his tumblers to the floor and ruin his fine looking glass with bullets, he was lucky. Sometimes a crowd of them in a saloon would draw their pistols and "shoot up the place". On one occasion the bullet went through the ceiling with the following result as quoted in the newspaper, "Died, February 22, 1851, Edwin Moss, twenty-six years of age. His death was caused by the accidental discharge of a pistol. He was asleep in an upper room and the pistol was discharged in a room beneath the ball passing through the floor and several blankets, then through the body, causing instant death." Nearly all of this class of men "died with their boots on" as was the expression. They were shot and killed in shooting scrapes during the first ten or fifteen years.

Courts and Law

In order to suppress and punish outlawry such as this, laws and their enforcement were necessary. But for several months the county was without any laws except the good old moral law, Do unto others as you would they should do unto you. The state government was not organized until November, 1849; the county government in April, 1850; and the city government in August, 1850. The crimes which were daily taking place compelled the law-abiding citizens to adopt some form of government, and in want of something better they adopted the Mexican form of government. The Mexican form comprised what was known as the Courts of the First, the Second and Third Instance, all three of these courts corresponding to our county, state and National courts. Mexico organized her government after the United States model. Their officer, which was similar to our justice of the peace, was known as an alcalde, and his badge of office was a heavy cane with a large round silver knob at the head. After the organization of our government the legislature declared that the judicial officers should comprise a justice of the peace, a court of sessions and a district court, the last named including two or more counties. The court of sessions was composed of a county and two associate judges. When the new constitution of the state was adopted in 1880 it abolished the district court and the court of sessions, substituting for the last named a superior court and a county judge.

The justice courts of the early days were a joke and an instigator of crime and seldom legal or just in their decisions, because ignorant and oftentimes unprincipled men were elected to the office. They would sometimes be intimidated by the counsel for the defense and dare not give a decision adverse to his client. Juries also were threatened. At one trial David S. Terry, laying his revolver upon the table, demanded that the jury acquit his client. These justices also favored and discharged all friends brought into court for trial and often accepted bribes. Knives and pistols were often drawn in the court room to enforce certain demands, and bedlam then broke loose. The judges were ignorant of law, often ignorant of the use of correct language. Some of the decisions of one of these judges have come down to us. His name was John J. Jenkins: he was a short, thick-set, round-faced man of southern birth, honest, easy-going and friendly with everybody, but he was ignorant of the first principles of law, yet being popular he was elected a justice and later district attorney. In September, 1854, Officer Connolley, one of the city police, arrested a man named J. R. Butler on the charge of grand larceny and took him before Judge Jenkins. The judge in recording this case in his docket said, "On examination of the complaint it found it to be petty larceny and twelve men were summoned to make a jury to try the case." After hearing the testimony they brought in a verdict of guilty. "I ordered him to have twenty lashes on the bare back and remanded him to jail." At another time, said the judge, "Officer Barnes brought into court Wm. Hill, a drunken worthless-looking fellow, who had formerly been an inmate of the asylum. He had no money and on his promise to leave the city I let him depart." Another vagrant was brought before the judge, "Defendant James Wilson was brought before me as a vagrant; had no money nor did he look as if he ever would; discharged on condition that he go to work or leave." At another time Pedro Antonio got off easily, "The defendant was charged with being drunk in the streets of Stockton. He said he had been sick, came to Stockton for medicine and his friends got him drunk, and as he was quiet and it was a holiday he was discharged." John Roberts was punished. He was arrested on the charge of furious riding through the streets. "I saw the offense committed myself; as it was an aggravated affair I ordered that he pay a fine of twenty dollars and stand committed until the same is paid." In February, 1855, a man was brought before the Justice "charged with assault and drawing a pistol, a six-shooter pepper-box pistol on one John Brown." The defendant was fined fifty dollars and the pistol forfeited to the city.

Terry's First Duel

David S. Terry, whose name will appear many times in this work during the first thirty years, was a young, hot-headed, blustering southerner from Texas. He was a firm friend, and a good hater of an enemy. His first duel was of the Damon and Pythian order, being willing to sacrifice his life on the altar of friendship. In the spring of 1850, Dr. W. D. Aylett, E. L. B. Brooks, Dr. Richard P. Ashe, Samuel A. Booker, William D. Fair and George G. Belt were all close friends in Stockton, together with a Dr. Roberts of Mexico, who professed to be a physician and surgeon. George G. Belt, who at the time was the proprietor of the Hotel de Mexico, learned by some means that Dr. Roberts was masquerading under a false name and was in fact a noted bandit and horse thief. Belt, believing he was doing his friend Terry a kind act, told him of the character of the so-called Dr. Roberts alias Yeomans. Terry immediately denied the charge. This was equivalent to telling Judge Belt that he was a liar, a traducer of Terry's friend, and immediately Belt challenged Terry to a duel. The time, the place and the weapons were named, the duel to take place at daylight in the southwestern part of the town. Unfortunately the only definite account of this affair, so important in the history of the state because of the future prominence of Terry, is from the writings of James A. Woods, the pastor and founder of the First Presbyterian Church. He had just arrived in town the day previous with his family and was residing at the Dickenson House on Center Street. As early as "four o'clock in the morning the people of the Dickenson house, where we were lodging, were excitedly moving about getting ready to attend the "Field of Honor." Through the cloth partition he could hear them talking about the anticipated duel, and he came to the quick conclusion that there was a great necessity for a Presbyterian Church organization. The large crowd gathered on the spot expected to see blood shed for both were brave men, and good marksmen. The bystanders however were disappointed as the seconds of Terry succeeded in showing him that Roberts was an impostor, and that he has been too hasty in calling Belt a liar. The duel was called off, and the two men shaking hands, resumed their former friendship. Terry became a Supreme Judge of the state, was imprisoned by the Vigilantes of San Francisco, for stabbing Hopkins. The slayer of Broderick, then the leader of the Democratic party, Terry was shot and killed in 1889 in the Lathrop Hotel by Naglee, the bodyguard of the United States Supreme Court Justice, Stephen J. Field.

The Stockton Alcaldes

Gallant D. Dickenson, a pioneer of 1847, was Stockton's first alcalde, under Mexican administration. He was an honorable man, a Christian layman, and his eldest daughter was the first of Stockton's brides. George G. Belt, the second alcalde, was the first official under American rule. James R. Reynolds, the third in office, was a very corrupt and dishonest alcalde. Ben E. Williams was of the same stripe, and later elected county judge, was indicted for malfeasance in office. He was never brought to trial as the district attorney refused to prosecute him. George G. Belt, a large, portly Marylander, born in Baltimore, came to Stockton in 1848, at the age of twenty-six years. He began merchandising, his store or tent having been erected on two lots given him by Captain Weber at the corner of Levee and Center streets. He married a Mexican woman by whom he had a large family. He later engaged in stockraising and farming and finally located in Merced County.

Tragic Death of Alcalde Belt

Belt was killed June 3, 1869, by William Dennis, a pioneer and former city councilman in a shoot-at-sight duel. The two men had had some difficulty over money matters, and Dennis said that Belt had cheated several men out of their money. The two men parted, each threatening to kill the other at sight. On the day mentioned Belt came to Stockton on business from his Merced home. He was doubly "heeled" for his enemy with a derringer pistol and a bowie knife. A derringer was a single-barreled firearm, a very deadly weapon, carrying a large ball and was known as a duelling pistol. On arrival in Stockton, his friends warned him of the threat made by Dennis. "I don't think there is any danger," he said, referring to his weapons. Passing a gun store, he exclaimed, "I think I had better reload," and the weapon was reloaded. While standing on Center Street about 12 o'clock, talking with some friends a loud report rang out and Judge Belt fell dead upon the sidewalk, a bullet crashing into his brain just under the left ear. Wm. Woods, running up to the body exclaimed, "Who did this?" "I did," said Dennis. "I gave him just what I promised him." The homicide was arrested by the chief of police, Wm. F. Fletcher, (later a member of the Oakland police force for many years), and taken to jail.

Dennis had been one of Stockton's most quiet and peaceful citizens. He was a widower, a man of considerable property, and evidently considered himself justified in the act, especially after the coroner, Morris H. Bond found a bowie knife on Belt, nearly new, and his right hand in his coat pocket firmly grasping a derringer. The public had no sympathy for the deceased as he was always known as an overbearing, bullying fighter, but they did not approve of the manner in which Dennis killed him. It appeared cowardly, Dennis probably hiding behind some grain sacks, as he was only four feet away when he fired. Then came the trial before Judge Joseph W. Cavis in the district court. The grand jury had indicted Dennis for manslaughter, and the contest was to save the old man from state's prison. The district attorney, E. S. Pillsbury, was assisted in the prosecution by N. Greene Curtis of Sacramento, acknowledged the best criminal lawyer in the state. The defendant was represented by local attorneys, Joseph H.

Budd, Samuel A. Booker, Wm. L. Dudley, L. T. Carr and Peter S. Wilkes. The trial commenced October 25, 1869, and continued two weeks, other business being brought up and postponed from day to day. November 9 at 12:30 Pillsbury began the closing argument, followed by Budd at 4:15, he closing at 9:10 that evening. Dudley occupied the morning session and a part of the afternoon. Booker speaking from 2:30 until 4:30. Court then adjourned until 7:30 and Curtis closing at 11 o'clock p. m. The judge then delivered his charge and the jury, locked up for the night, returned a verdict the following morning of "guilty of murder in the second degree." The verdict was not much of a surprise for at that time two other murder cases were on trial and a third murderer had just been captured. The judge sentenced Dennis to the state's prison for ten years. He there died in less than twenty months.

Punishments for Crime

The punishments for crime were many in number and included hanging, whipping, imprisonment, ducking, branding and for lesser crimes, railriding and blanket-tossing. The punishment of whipping was inflicted at the public whipping post. At the time of the justice court was located on a brig in the channel a whipping post was erected on the bank, and the culprit, bare to the waist, was fastened to the post and the number of lashes, imposed by the court, laid on with a heavy whip. After the renting of a building for a jail, the prisoner was privately whipped. Thongs were fastened around his wrists thrown over the cell door and fastened on the other side. The punishment of ducking was executed by fastening the prisoner to the yard arm of the brig and then lowering him into the water several times, until justice was satisfied. These punishments were illegally inflicted hundreds of times upon criminals or presumed criminals by mobs of men, and a case in point of both whipping and branding was that of January 4, 1851. A few miles out of town on the Calaveras River a man was caught stealing a horse. He said he was a Kentuckian and gave a fictitious name. A jury was impaneled and after trial was sentenced to be hung. A gentleman present begged for and saved his life, but the fellow was given fifty lashes and branded horse thief.

In the following month, February 23, the sympathetic editor said under the caption "Served Him Right," "On Sunday last a man formerly employed in the American navy, was detected in the act of stealing a mule near the bridge. The crowd speedily procured a rope, tied it around his neck and forced him into the water. He swam across to the opposite side and was then pulled back again by means of the rope. The crowd was then tying him up to a tree to give him a lashing when the marshal appeared and took him to jail."

Imprisonment was the most common form of punishment and for those jailed only a few days for minor offenses the question was asked, "Why should these fellows lie in jail with board and lodging at the expense of the public?" This question was asked in 1861 by the editor of the Stockton Independent when the authorities decided to put the prisoners at work improving the court house grounds. The Independent said, "Hereafter when an individual gets drunk, and breaks windows and abuses policemen, and everyone else, instead of nice board and lodging at the public expense for a few days, he will be expected to do some work. This is an excellent idea and will prevent crime instead of increasing it." Said the Times, "Every week we have the proof of the necessity of a town council and the punishment of criminal outcasts. Why should we not have a chain gang to perform such labor as cleaning the streets? San Francisco derives much benefit from their services." The chain gang was at work on the streets at different periods of time and as late as 1888 five Chinamen were at work and two policemen, Nap Edwards and Thomas Towle, guarding them. About this time some vagrants were put to work on Main street, and one of them was in a disgraceful condition. It was a cold day and the man had on no clothing but a faded coat and pants all rags. It excited the sympathies of the passersby and James H. Budd declared that if the man was not taken back to jail and given some decent clothing he would prosecute the whole crowd, meaning the officials. On another occasion sometime later the men were worked on the streets, and Frank D. Nichol took up their case. One of the vagrants demanded a jury trial, and the attorney by a very shrewd fallacious argument proved that it was no crime for a poor man to walk along the sidewalk. The man was acquitted and the entire bunch turned loose to again beg from door to door and continue their petty crimes. Later regular employees were engaged by the street superintendent to clean the streets and a political machine formed of city employees.

In the earlier days the "boys" had an excellent method of getting rid of deadbeats and fakers by what was known as railriding and blanket-tossing. It was fun for the fellows but tough on the victim. A lawyer defending these fellows would have been given the same medicine, neither his profession nor dignity would have saved him. The riding of a man on a rail was a very severe punishment even torture, especially if the man's hands were tied. Blanket-tossing was a very novel and ludicrous proceeding; strong blankets were used with leather handholds on each side. The offender was tossed up in the blanket, and the severity or lightness of his punishment depended upon the tension of the blanket whether held taut or loose. In August, 1856, a man blew into town and proceeded to do everybody with a hard luck story. He obtained considerable money from the merchants, hotelkeepers and others and then disappeared. In a few days he returned with the same gladsome smile and the "dead broke" appeal. The boys this time "spotted" him and concluded to have some fun. As he approached a man in a saloon and asked the loan of a dollar, the blanket men rushed in and the deadbeat was soon trying to bump the ceiling of the room. Then one of the handles tore out, and the man was allowed to depart. Unwisely entering another saloon, he asked the barkeeper for a drink; in the meantime the sports had obtained a second blanket and now grabbing the poor fellow they tossed him up to the "queen's taste." The following morning he was seen about six miles out, hiking for Sacramento.

A Fake Shakespearean Actor

The pioneers had no respect for self-conceited persons impostors or dudes. A funny incident happened to a would-be actor; his name was McDonald and he claimed to be a Shakespearean actor. He came to Stockton in 1857 and advertised that he would give readings from Shakespeare in the Stockton Theater. The price of tickets was one dollar. The citizens had heard of him in other places but they concluded to pay their dollar, and get their money's worth in fun. The house was crowded, for it had been whispered around town that there would be a barrel of fun. The man had neither dramatic or elocutionary ability and appearing on the stage amidst prolonged applause he poorly recited "The Fate of Genius." He then began a selection from Hamlet.

"To be or not to be, that is the question"

Just about that time a potato, thrown from the gallery, hit the back of the stage. He gave no heed to the coming storm but continued his reading. Several potatoes were thrown in quick succession. Believing that was Stockton's way of honoring a genius, he held his ground. Then cabbages began to fill the air and McDonald thinking it was about time to get under cover turned to leave the stage. The reception committee were there to receive, bearing with them a strong blanket. Grabbing the actor they began tossing him up at a lively gait, every bounce sending him higher toward the top of the proscenium. The audience was in an uproar, laughing and yelling. As soon as McDonald was given his freedom he made quick tracks from the theater and left town as soon as possible.

Judge Reynolds Holds Court in Saloon

John Nye, who owned and managed the Gault House, now the location of the United States Hotel on Center Street, a man of property and later for many years snare drummer in the cornet band, told me this story of Alcalde James R. Reynolds. He and Samuel Geddes, in 1849, erected a small one-story brick building on the corner of Center and Main streets at a cost of $14,000. The building was occupied as a saloon, the proprietor giving it the name of the Central Exchange. A noted gambler named "Bob" Collins rented a portion of the room for gambling tables, paying $1,000 a month rent; business was not as lively as he anticipated. At this time Judge Reynolds was holding his court on board a store ship in Stockton channel. Collins conceived the plan of having the Judge move his court to the saloon. "If we can get him to do that," said Collins to the proprietor, "it will draw a crowd to court and we can do a way-up business." It was agreed between them that the Judge was to have plenty of free whisky and a bedroom in the attic. Bob that day saw the Judge and walking down to the Exchange, they took a social drink. Bob brought up the subject of the removal of the court to the saloon; he showed the advantage of the location, the fine room, free lodging, and then they took a drink. The Judge immediately fell for the scheme, and moved his extensive office holdings and library consisting of a table, pen and ink, old Spanish law book and his bed to the Central Exchange. Everything was harmonious in the new quarters, the bartender sold his liquors, the gamblers dealt out monte and the Judge held court in one corner of the room. One day a young fellow came into the saloon and deposited some money in Collins' bank. He called for his coin the following day and Collins laughed at him, saying, "You are dreaming, you left no money here." The fellow insisted that he had left some money and commenced suit against Collins for its recovery. While the case was in progress the judge, stern appearing and dignified, sat in an arm chair elevated upon a large dry goods box. The money had been brought from the safe and was lying upon the table. The parties could not come to any decision in the matter and finally some one suggested that Collins and the young fellow divide the money. The lawyers for the parties now began to hedge. "I want my fee out of this," said D. S. Terry. "And I shall have my fee," exclaimed Lawyer Perley, putting his hand behind him as if to draw a weapon. In an instant fifty hands went to their pockets for bowie knives and pistols. The Judge, quickly observing the state of affairs, quietly stepped down from the dry goods box and raked all of the money into his hat, remarking "that the court must take care of itself." He then dismissed the suit. Bob was very much displeased at the way the Judge had put it over him and he concluded to get even. He declared, "this court is ruining my business; everybody rushes over to that corner and leaves me all alone." Then he schemed to get rid of the Judge. One day he got the Judge into a game of poker, and by putting up aces on the Judge, won all of his money. The court was "dead broke" and helpless and Collins then called upon Alcalde Dickenson to eject him from the room for nonpayment of rent. Judge Reynolds then left for Mexico and never returned to California.

The Brig Susanna

The least desirable place to an honorable, industrious citizen is the county jail, but it is the desired refuge for the lazy, shiftless and vicious class, especially during the winter months when they can get free board and lodging and a turkey dinner on Thanksgiving day as became the custom in Sheriff Cunningham's time and since. In the earlier days criminals were lucky to get sufficient coffee, bread and meat, for then a criminal was regarded as a social outcast, a vampire of society. In those days the first place of confinement of prisoners was on the French brig Susanna, which had been run aground in the Mormon channel. The brig was owned by Emile Junge, and the county paid him $500 a month rent. Even at this high figure he swore most emphatically that he could keep the prisoners no longer on such terms and he declared that he would turn them loose if not taken off his hands, said Judge Williams in his report. The cause of his anger was the low price of county script. He was compelled to take script for his pay and then discount it twenty-five per cent to get the coin. Louis Basilio, on one occasion in speaking of this brig said, "In 1849 I was working as a blacksmith at eight dollars a day in a shop at the corner of Hunter and Market streets. One of my duties was to rivet shackles on the legs of prisoners. The prisoners were kept on the lower floor of the brig, and the man in charge of the prison generally laid on the floor just above the deck. A cleated plank descended from the upper floor. Every night I went down that plank with my tools and shackles (to iron the prisoners) and the jailer stood guard at the hole with pistols and guns ready to kill the entire lot if they made any resistance. After being shackled they were chained to beams which supported the upper floor."

When the brig was no longer used as a prison the criminals were confined in some room of a house or in the basement. This was very expensive and unsafe and the grand jury in 1851, reporting said, "In pursuance of their duty they visited the county jail and found it entirely inadequate for the safe keeping of prisoners. The revolting spectacle of an American citizen in chains and that before a trial has become a necessity from this cause." The shackling again of prisoners arose from the fact that a short time previous "two prisoners who were confined in gaol escaped from confinement about 8 o'clock in the evening. Rushing from their cell to an outer apartment where two turnkeys were sitting at the time, they reached the balcony in front and jumped to the ground. The one sprained his ankle and was easily caught, but the other escaped in the darkness." The guards were not overly vigilant although they were each paid $120 a month. Three hundred dollars a month was paid for rent of the court house, $120 a month for rent of jail and this, together with the two guards' salary, totalled a yearly expense for the keeping of prisoners of $7900 a year, to say nothing of their board. Thus it went on until 1853, when Judge Root recommended that the jail be removed to the John McNish building, northwest corner of Hunter and Channel streets; the court house was then in that building. Two years later the court room was a school room, and today one of the pupils in that room is writing this paragraph.

Market Street Jail

In a former chapter we wrote of the building of the court house and at the same time bids were let for a county jail. The talk was to erect a joint court house and jail on the public square, but the grand jury of that year, 1853, opposed that plan, reporting, "Jails are sometimes erected on a public square of a city, but this is deemed to be in bad taste and it should be located outside of the well settled parts of the city, as crime and the wretchedness which flows from it are unpleasant subjects for the contemplation of good people." There were men of refined sensibilities in that day as well as this. Where did the supervisors place the present jail to save cost and time? On the corner of Channel and San Joaquin Streets, within 400 feet of the largest church and where hundreds of children pass each day on their way to school. I am thirty years ahead of my subject and we will return to the grand jury of 1853, that considered decency and refinement of far greater value than money. "We have examined the jail and find it insecure and unfit for the keeping of prisoners. A constant watch is kept at considerable expense to the county, several extra guards being necessary at all times of the day and night, an expense that could be avoided only by the erection of a suitable building for a jail." The idea of erecting a combination jail and court house was given up, and a jail was erected on Market Street, about 300 feet south of the court house, and convenient to the court. It was a two story brick building, in size 30x40 feet, the entire building being less than twenty-five feet in height. The walls were two feet in thickness and from the second floor to the top of the fire wall a one-eighth inch sheet iron plate was set in the center of the wall. In the second story there were six small windows with iron gratings. The building was inclosed with a brick wall about fifteen feet in height, the top of the wall covered with broken glass bottles. These bottles in time became firmly embedded in earth blown from the street. The building cost about $15,000 and was in use as a jail for nearly forty years. Within its wall have been confined some of the deepest-dyed criminals in the history of crime and here for a short time, Naglee, the bodyguard of Justice Stephen J. Field, was confined, he who shot and killed Davis S. Terry. From the rear of the jail were hung six murderers. Time and again attention was called to the old building by the grand juries and the press, the press as early as 1868 saying, "It is a misnomer to designate the miserable dilapidated stack of bricks as a building at all." So unsafe was the building in Sheriff Cunningham's time, when he had desperate prisoners in confinement he placed upon one leg what was known as the Oregon boot, a heavy piece of iron band with chain and iron ball.

No movement was made towards the erection of a new "calaboose" until 1886. At that time the supervisors had given up the plan of building a jail in connection with the court house and they purchased two lots at the corner of San Joaquin and Channel streets, for $6,000. The lots were formerly the location of Wm. Derrick's blacksmith shop and windmill manufactory and at the time of sale belonged to Wm. M. Hickman. In July, 1891, the architect, David Salfield, under the direction of Sheriff Cunningham, drew plans for a jail, safe against jail breaks, and convenient and comfortable for the prisoners. The supervisors issued bonds to the amount of $50,000 for its erection, bearing interest at four per cent. There were no bidders and they were compelled to issue a new series of bonds at five per cent. Then unwisely and unfortunately the supervisors, to save money, began cutting out all of the necessary conveniences, including closets in the cells. As a result the prison is today a foul-smelling nuisance on one of the principal streets of the city. The contract for the building was let to the brickmason, Sol Confer. It was completed and ready for the transfer of the prisoners from the Market Street jail in May, 1893. On the 15th of May it was open for the inspection of the public and over 5,000 citizens visited the place during the day and evening.

Imperfect Land Titles

In a former chapter we wrote of the Mexican grants El Campo de los Franceses, El Pescadero, Chabolla and Moquelemos, which had been given to Mexican citizens in this section of the territory. After Mexico ceded California to the United States some of these grants were recognized by the Government as valid, but hundreds of the state grants were declared to be imperfect and were in dispute for many years and not until 1862 the first named San Joaquin County granted perfected. Because of the imperfect titles a great many lawsuits have taken place, together with bloodshed, riotous acts and several murders. Many persons would preempt land and then, carrying their claims over a larger amount of land than they were entitled to, would try to hold it either by force or by law. The doubtful ownership of lands led to the creation of a body of men known as "squatters." They would "squat" upon a piece of land, already claimed by another party and by force or intimidation attempt to hold it.

The First Squatters

In the spring of 1850 this kind of trouble began and parties "jumped" several lots on the Levee in Stockton claimed by Captain C. M. Weber under his Mexican title. They set up their tents on the lots and defied any person to eject them. The following day they were arrested and suit of ejectment was commenced in the Court of Sessions. There was a formidable array of attorneys on each side. Captain Weber retained as his counsel Samuel A. Booker, Wm. D. Fair, Dr. R. Roberts and Thomas B. Van Buren; the squatters, to plead their claims, engaged D. W. Perley, E. L. B. Brooks, David S. Terry, Hairston Amyx and Slocum and Spafford. It was a gathering of attorneys, with two or three exceptions, the equal of any attorneys in the state. Judgment was given to the plaintiff, Captain Weber. During the week of June 1, 1850, some persons took a foolish notion into their heads that they might squat with impunity upon the property of other persons. "One man, thinking that he might as well, in common parlance, go the whole hog, squatted upon a lot on the Levee valued at $10,000. Crowds of people gathered to witness the spectacle, and the valiant hero bore his blushing honors for several hours, then the thought of unpleasant consequences took possession of him and both the squatter and his tent suddenly vanished in the night. During the night several other tents were pitched in various parts of the town and there shortly existed a mania for squatting on the property of the old settlers. These efforts seemed to have been principally leveled against Mr. Weber's claim, as to the mere legality of which we are quite satisfied." In 1854 the tall, high-cheek-boned attorney, Hairston Amyx, who always carried a six cylinder revolver, concluded that he would take a hand at squatting and he laid claim to a part of the Hunter Street side of the Court House Square. He alleged for his action, that Captain Weber's Mexican title was invalid. He dug post holes along the block line and putting in posts, erected a fence. He had not made any calculations on the actions of a gritty Yankee mayor, J. M. Buffington, who ordered the fence torn down and the lumber sent to the city jail. It was sold and the money turned into the city treasury.

Hundreds of property lawsuits might be written up but we must confine our writing to three or four of the most important cases. One of the most daring and insolent was the Day-Light affair. In November, 1850, A. B. Light located on a tract of land on the Calaveras River which he found vacant. Not making any inquiries as to ownership he built a house and began improving the land. Later he learned that James Daly had a previous claim but nevertheless he intended to hold it. May, 1851, Daly came on to the ranch and Light, well-armed, ordered him off the place. Daly left, but later returned with eight friends well-armed and they called on Light to come out and settle the question. He very sensibly refused to tackle a crowd of eight to one. The Daly men left, and Light took his wife to a place of safety. While Light was absent Daly sent men on to the land to cut grass for hay. Later the Light crowd got possession of Daly and compelled him to sign the following quit-claim deed. "In accordance with the request of several American citizens, I, James Daly, hereby obligate myself to leave this place, relinquishing any claim heretofore made on the opposite side of the river now occupied by A. B. Light, and also agree not to come within 100 miles of this place after July 25 in default of which I am to receive thirty-six lashes on the bare back, or such other punishment as the above-named citizens shall inflict. (signed) James Daly." This high-handed proceeding took place on Sunday, June 22. Daly then came to town and took refuge in the Murphy & Durgeson bakery on the Levec. The rioters, learning that Daly had not left Stockton the following Tuesday, eighteen of them mounted and armed with rifles, rode into town and demanded that Daly be given up to them. Their demand was refused, and they expressed belligerent intentions. It looked like war and the San Joaquin Guard, organized a few days previous with Maj. R. P. Hammond as captain was ordered under arms. "The Missourians," as the press styled them, after considerable blustering rode away without accomplishing their object.

The Battle of Waterloo

The next interesting land excitement took place just ten years later, November 9, 1861. It was known as the "Battle of Waterloo," so-called because fought near the farming village of that name. Among the pioneers of that section it was one of the standing jokes of their life time—the thought of a lone squatter standing off a cannon and a party of settlers and then giving them the laugh. Along in the '50s, a young man named Almer Drulliard purchased a tract of land eight miles to the northeast of Waterloo of Kely & Reynolds paying them, with the improvements, $6,000. He was presumed to have purchased 160 acres, but land was cheap, and the former owners had been claiming twice that amount. A Canadian wagonmaker, about thirty years of age, named John Balkwell, who had formerly been located at French Camp, concluded that Waterloo with its hotel, blacksmith shop and four saloons was a better business place than the camp, so with his family he removed to Waterloo, never dreaming that he would make the place a historic spot for future generations. Drulliard permitted Balkwell to occupy twenty-five acres of his rancho for a home and garden. After living there about eleven months he learned that Drulliard had more land than he actually bought and he immediately filed a claim for the extra 160 acres. This meant war, and as Hopkins said, "to jump an idle piece of land was no particular crime, titles being so doubtful, (this was within the Pico grant) but when any one tried it the farmers generally banded together to protect each other."

Balkwell was no coward and anticipating trouble, he built a fort impregnable against rifle bullets or buckshot charges. The fort, 10 x 12 feet in size, was built of a double wall of one-inch Oregon pine, the hollow space between the walls being filled in solidly with earth. There were port holes about three inches square in the front and ends. The structure was covered with a shed roof. Balkwell provided himself with plenty of food, water, ammunition and four double-barrelled shotguns, two rifles, a revolver and an ax and awaited events. The settlers were aroused, their rights of ownership had been challenged and they resolved to drive out their enemy. Seeing at once that Balkwell could not be driven out by any shotgun barrage or rifle tactics, a number of the farmers came to Stockton in a four-horse wagon in the stillness of the night and taking the old nine-pound cannon, that had fired many a patriotic and political salute, transported it to the field of battle. During the day, Deputy Sheriff George R. Choate had visited the parties but failed to avert the fearful slaughter of the morrow. He concluded to remain in Waterloo and await results. The battle was timed for 9 o'clock, but the besiegers, learning that the deputy sheriff was in that vicinity, resolved to open fire at daybreak. Balkwell had no fear of that cannon if they did not come too near. Loading it with powder, scraps of iron, nuts, bolts, pieces of chain, and other refuse from the blacksmith shop, they began moving the wagon towards the fort. When within about 250 yards, Balkwell fired a shot from a rifle at them. It was a warning—"thus far shalt thou come and no farther." The cannon was then fired, and the charge, scattering badly, fell short. Then came the second rifle shot, and a second cannon discharge. Elevating the piece a third charge went over the fort; the fourth time it again fell short. The besieged was not idle and he fired five rifle shots, none took effect, except one shot which broke J. H. Tone's index finger. At this time the deputy sheriff, hearing the bombardment, hastened to the scene, and all hostilities were declared off. Ten of the farmers were arrested and charged with riotous acts. Some were found guilty after a jury trial and some acquitted. They were all honorable citizens and became well-to-do farmers. Balkwell, through the courts, retained a part of the laid. Not one of them is now alive.

The Comstock Affair

Another exciting event the following year was the Comstock fight, which threatened to develop into a very serious affair because of the hatred then growing intense between the Northern and Southern men of the county, and the reported defiance of the Southerners for law and order. Along in 1852 or 1853 a man named Eli H. Comstock located some land about two miles east of Waterloo, and in 1856 he reclaimed it under the state school warrant law. It was within the disputed Pico Grant and Comstock paid out a large sum of money to Francis Pico, who claimed that part of the grant. In November, 1860, Comstock cancelled his claim to the land under the school warrant law, and located a new tract, presumed to be outside of Pico's claim. Soon after this Comstock died and a party of squatters jumped the Comstock land. Emile Hestres, the Stockton commission merchant, was appointed by the court, administrator of the Comstock estate, and he commenced a suit of ejectment together with damages against the squatters, Thomas Brown, Andrew Harris, C. L. Clements and D. L. Hopkins. Hestres won the suit and was given $2,500 damages.

Sheriff Thomas K. Hook was ordered by the court to go out and place the administrator, Hestres, in possession of the land in dispute. The sheriff found several men on the place and they refused to vacate. The second time he went out and tried to show them that they must obey the law even if force was used to eject them. They replied that they would resist all force and defied the sheriff to eject them, even threatening his life. Then all kinds of wild reports floated around. It was said that there were from fifty to sixty men on the place, that they were all well-armed and that David S. Terry was one of the number, Terry himself having land in that vicinity. It was reported that they were all secessionists, and fortified behind a brick wall some thirty feet long and five feet high, which Comstock had commenced for a granary, they would fire even upon the state militia. Sheriff Hook, June 1, 1862, called upon the Union Guard to enforce the law and put the administrator in possession of the land. The following morning the Guards under the command of Captain Pearsall assembled in the Agricultural Hall and fell into line. No braver body of men ever assembled upon the field of battle, for these men, although of the state militia, had volunteered to go to any part of the Union where duty called. It was a trying situation, for many of the men were married with families, and they knew not the result of the coming day. It was a study to see them, some were pale with excitement, others joking and laughing to conceal their real feelings. As each man was handed three rounds of cartridges, Robert Hanks, holding up one cartridge said, "Here's one for Dave Terry if ever he shows his head over that fort." There was a bitter feeling against Terry for the killing of Broderick, for having him now within their power, defying the United States authorities, they would have tried to kill him. But Terry was not there, he was too well posted in law to oppose the Government. The Guards in wagons and carriages started for the scene at 10 o'clock and when near Waterloo were met by a messenger who stated that the settlers had all vacated the place. The militia went on to Waterloo, stacked arms, had dinner and remained until two o'clock, then returned home. The sheriff put Thomas Marshall in charge of the place, he appointed two men to remain on the land and came to town. As soon as the militia had gone from sight, the squatters returned and informed the two men in charge "that they had better leave, as it would be unhealthy for them to remain." The men then accompanied some of the squatters to Waterloo, had a social drink, and coming to town reported the event. Once again, twenty-one years later, the militia was called out to compel squatters to obey the law in the Moquelemos affair.

A Mob Law Court

We cannot criticize the actions of the mob in pioneer days too severely when we read of the actions of the Ku Klux Klan in Kern County a few months ago. The pioneers lived in an unsettled country with scarcely any law and desperadoes on every hand, while the presumed law-abiding K. K. K. lived in a civilized, peaceful community. One of the most numerous crimes of the early day was stealing. "The country is infested with horse thieves," said the Times. The evil has become one of great magnitude and the victims are taking the law in their own hands." One of these victims was Billy Owens, one of the well-known gamblers of the town. He had a little white pony which he highly prized and May 24, 1851, the pony was stolen. A short time afterward he received information from some source that there was a suspected band of horse thieves in town, and finding them he might find his pony. Without a warrant or any authority Owens commenced to hunt for those horse thieves. As a matter of fact, Owens ran the town and when on a drunken carousal he ran that pony up and down the streets everybody ran to cover as they do today for the auto speeders. Owens believed that he might get track of the horse stealers by going to a saloon on the Peninsula kept by a Sydney Duck named Russell. There he found a suspicious character named Wilson. Owens and his friends took Wilson to a gallows near by, hoping to intimidate him into making a confession of guilt or informing them regarding his companions. The sight of the gallows failed to have any effect on the prisoner. Then they tried another police "third degree method. They stripped him to the waist and whipped him severely, but the man, sullen of nature and deep in crime, spoke not a word. Then a rope was fastened around his neck, and he was quickly hauled off his feet two or three times, and then begging to be released he promised to show the men the rendezvous of his companions. He led the party to a heavy growth of bushes near the present corner of Park and San Joaquin streets where their camp, hidden from view, was located. There was no one there, but waiting around a short time four men named Frederick Salkman, James Nell, Jasper Cochran and James Boland came into camp. The party was questioned, but giving no satisfactory answers, one of them was seized and whipped. He then made a confession and said they were all horse thieves.

The men were taken to jail, and with them James Wilson. On the following day they were taken before Justice W. F. Nye for a preliminary examination. There was a large crowd in the court room, the sympathizing friends of Bill Owens who had lost his pony. Evidence was introduced which pointed strongly to the guilt of the men as horse thieves. Owens then addressed the crowd, declared them guilty, and moved "that we hang them." The motion was seconded by Dr. Samuel McLean, one of the most honorable men in the county. He was no friend of Owens, but very excitable and erratic, he was for law and order, at any cost. No sooner had McLean made his motion than bedlam broke loose. At least fifty knives and pistols flashed in air and the city marshal, the recorder and the deputies were seized and held by the crowd. Overturning chairs and tables the mob tried to seize the prisoners. Boland, who was a large and strongly built man, fought his way to the door and, escaping, ran towards the Levee. He was followed by the crowd whooping and yelling, and Owens, swifter of foot than Boland, rapidly decreasing the distance between them, fired five shots at him. Boland then surrendered. The men were all taken to jail, followed by the crowd. So eager were the mob for blood that they shouted, "Hany them! hang them!" and the officers had great difficulty in rescuing the men, for the mob tore the clothes from their backs, exposing the skin which had been lacerated by the lashing which two of them received. The sheriff, Dr. R. P. Ashe, addressed the mob, begging them to disperse and let the law take its course.

Russell, the Sydney Duck

Soon after this event, the Bill Owens gang concluded to give Russell, the low dive saloon-keeper, the experience of mob law. They proceeded to do this by the usual mob law manner. They organized what they called a "mustang court," selected a sheriff, Captain Chapman, and a prosecuting attorney, Captain Bell. The sheriff was sent out to bring in Russell, who had been accused of keeping a low resort and boarding house with his wife, and harboring thieves. Russell when brought into court was informed by his Honor, Judge Owens, that what he had to say in his defense should be said quickly and to the point. Russell stated that he had been in Stockton a few weeks and he did not know that his boarders were thieves. He came to this country to make money honestly. At this moment of the court the judge inquired, "Has the jury been polled?" A bystander answered by saying, "I think there is timber enough in me and this crowd without any polls. I move that Russell be ducked in the slough." The mob did not wait for any second to the motion, but seizing the victim they hastened to the channel and threw him in. He swam back to land, and grabbing him again, threw him in a second time. After he got out he was taken back to the court and sentenced to be given thirty lashes on the back. The sentence was carried out and Russell was given sixteen hours in which to leave town.

Vigilance Committee

Rough punishment this was for a suspected criminal, but harsh and cruel punishment were necessary to check the high tide of crime. The execution of one Jenkins at this time, by the San Francisco Vigilance Committee for the stealing of a safe, caused an exodus of criminals from that town. Some of them floated to Stockton, and to meet the occasion the citizens formed a Vigilance Committee. A meeting was held on the evening of June 9, 1851, "to take into consideration measures to insure the better security of the lives and property of the citizens." A committee was appointed to recommend a course of action. This committee reported June 11, advising the formation of a vigilance city police, that the city be divided into wards, each ward to have its guards at night and that a committee be appointed to enroll the names of citizens. The following evening a meeting was held in the Corinthian Building and elected Major R. P. Hammond president; in his address he opposed the actions of the committee and declared the matter should be left to the action of the council; that they be requested to divide the city into wards, as they were elected by the citizens and represented their interests. J. M. Warner declared they should not wait for the council's action; the "Sydney Ducks" might destroy the town before they woke up. Dr. George Shurtleff also called for action, and suggested that twenty gentlemen be appointed to divide the city into wards and to petition the council to clothe the police with the necessary authority. A ward division was made as follows: First Ward, west of El Dorado Street, extending from Stockton to Mormon Channel; Second Ward, east of El Dorado Street to American between the two named channels; Third Ward, the south side of the Stockton Channel and Weber Avenue to American; and the Fourth Ward included the Peninsula and the blocks on the east side of Channel to American. The First Ward, led by Dr. Samuel McLean, was the only ward that acquired any speed or was reported. On the 18th they met at the Gault House, organized a citizens' police and elected Samuel McLean chief of police, with full power to detail citizens for a nightly patrol of the ward.

CHAPTER X

THE MAYOR AND THE COMMON COUNCIL

GOVERNMENT is an essential quality in every community, and it is especially necessary where there are assembled a band of criminals and those who have no respect for law, order and the rights of others. The press, knowing this, said in one of its earliest numbers, "We are the advocates of public organization because we know that the most respectable part of our merchants experience its necessity. For instance, the town and harbor are infested with peddlers who pay no taxes or rent, and who sell merchandise at ruinously low prices. This is a great injustice and should immediately be put down. The citizens should organize a local body which should have jurisdiction in this and other matters and a great good would be effected and peddlers would disappear." The editor then severely condemns the San Francisco common council, who were a set of grafters and a disgrace to any city, when he wrote, "Let it be decidedly understood, however, that we do not mean such a municipal government as that of San Francisco. We would not have our council men vote for themselves enormous salaries. We would not see an honorable member move that each merchant shall supply six buckets (for fire purposes) and then buying up all of the buckets in the town sell them at an immense profit. No, we would have such a public body as would be men of probity and standing, guarding carefully the pockets of the public and imposing taxes with a light hand." The newspaper editor who wrote this article was independent of parties. They had not been organized. His splendid admonition was not practiced until 1906, when a commission form of government was adopted. The councils were elected by parties, and partisan politics were the rule.

The Unfortunate Town Council

The condition of things in the town in 1849 were very unsanitary and unhealthy; the food was bad and poorly cooked, the tents cold and cheerless, and the citizens, many of them not more than half clothed; ill smelling pools of water were everywhere and medicine scarce and high in price. It is not surprising therefore that there was much sickness from colds, fevers and dysentery, and much illness from drunkenness and other dissipations. Conditions were very bad, in some cases pitiful, and kind-hearted citizens requested Alcalde Belt to call an election for a town council, so that they could make some provision for the unfortunates. An election was held November 13, 1849, and the following men consented to run for the office and were elected, namely; Richard W. Heath, David Douglas, John J. Stephens, Wm. A. Streeter, Thomas Van Buren, Monroe T. Robertson and George Glidden. They adopted ordinances, erected a cloth tent hospital and employed Dr. J. F. Clements to take charge of the hospital. After spending about $1,200 out of their own pockets they learned that their election was illegal and that there was no way for them to obtain any return for their heavy expenses. They then dissolved. After the courts were organized, Dr. Clements, before Judge Creanor, sued R. W. Heath for $4,300, his three months' salary. The judge decided it was a legal claim and the council were compelled to pay it. Subsequently a relief bill was introduced into the legislature to reimburse the town council for their loss, but it failed to pass.

Movement for City Government

After the dissolution of the town council no movement was made towards a town government for several months; as a consequence crime was unchecked, business unsettled and all manner of nuisances created. The streets and sloughs were reeking with garbage and filth, firearms were recklessly discharged without any regard for safety or life, all because of a want of authority and government. The first movement for the purpose of forming a government was made in March, 1850. A public meeting was held in the tent store of George Belt, the alcalde of Tuleburg. Then, as now, the boosting of business seems to have been their leading thought. The meeting was called "for the purpose of taking into consideration the propriety of establishing a newspaper to lay before the public and the world at large the advantages of the San Joaquin Valley." J. R. Meloney called the attention of the meeting to the nuisances of the levee, and Dr. J. W. Reins spoke in regard to the incorporation of the town. Mr. Mix, who seems to have been a man of high morality, called the attention of the citizens to the proceedings of Hodskiss & Company and their associates since their arrival in town. They must have been a bad lot, for several talks were made upon that subject and Dr. J. B. Clements, M. F. Sparrow, Thomas Ketchum and Richard Younge were appointed a committee "to wait on the parties and give them notice to leave town at the first opportunity." A splendid committee, comprising Samuel Booker, John Doak and Dr. J. W. Reins, was appointed in regard to the organization of a town government. Nothing further is known of this meeting.

The movement towards the organization of a city government was progressing quite rapidly for there was plenty of action in those days. June 15, 1850, a second meeting was held in the Owens saloon. It was called to order by Thomas B. Van Buren, one of the rising young men of the state, and he was appointed president of the assembly; J. F. Stephens, R. W. Heath and Charles A. Leake, vice-presidents, and Dr. E. B. Bateman, secretary. On motion of Captain Wm. D. Farr, Ben S. Lippincott, Thomas McSpeddon, George D. Dickerson, M. F. Sparrow, Wm. N. Robertson, Geo. R. Buffum, B. F. Whittier, Geo. G. Belt and L. G. Chapman were appointed a committee to draft articles of incorporation for the city of Stockton.

The committee on town incorporation reported June 21, the meeting again being held in Owens' saloon, for at that time the saloons were the only places convenient for the assembling of men. "Your committee find that when the inhabitants of a town or village containing 1,000 inhabitants shall deem it to the advantage of such town that it shall be incorporated, a majority of the legal voters residing therein may petition the Court of Sessions to declare such town incorporated as a city, by the name and within the boundaries as stated in the petition. Your committee have also taken into consideration whether or not it is best for the town of Stockton to seek a speedy incorporation, and they find the strongest reasons to recommend to their fellow-citizens immediate action upon the subject. Your committee find for example, that a vessel loaded with lumber or other goods may arrive at Stockton and appropriate to their own use as much of the public levee as the owners may desire, land their cargo, and without any charge or rent, establish a retail lumber or grocery store. Your town is at all times liable to be destroyed by fire; it has felt the shock of disaster (December, 1849), and has seen its sister city of San Francisco three times reduced to ashes. With a careless population such as we must acknowledge ourselves to be, and living in houses of such inflammable material as ours, the danger from fire is always great and much to be dreaded." The report was adopted unanimously, and a committee appointed to circulate a petition among the citizens to permit the incorporation of the city of Stockton.

Judge Williams Orders an Election

On July 25 the citizens assembled, this time in a circus tent, as Foley's circus was then giving performances. The meeting being called to order, the following officers were chosen to preside: Samuel Purdy, president, Asa C. Bradford, vice-president, and F. C. Andrews, secretary. Notice the nativity of these officers; Purdy was a New Yorker, Andrews from Pennsylvania and Bradford from Virginia. President Purdy stated the object of the meeting and he then read the order of the Court of Sessions which had been issued July 23. "A petition from the citizens of Stockton, praying that the town might be incorporated under the name of the City of Stockton, according to the provisions of an act to provide for the incorporation of cities, was this day presented to the Court, and it appearing to the satisfaction of the Court that said town had a population exceeding two thousand, that a majority of the qualified electors thereof have signed the above petition, and that legal notice has been given of the aforesaid application, it is therefore ordered by the Court, after hearing said application that in accordance with prayer of said petition, said town is incorporated by the name of the City of Stockton, with the following boundaries to wit: On the north by Flora Street; on the east by Aurora Street; on the south by Twiggs Street; on the west by Bragg or Tule Street as shown by Hammond's survey of said town, a map of which is deposited with this court. It is further ordered that the common council to be chosen under this act of incorporation shall consist of seven members. It is further ordered that notice be given of an election under the above act of the incorporation, to be held at the Central Exchange in Stockton, on Thursday the 1st day of August A. D. 1850, Benjamin Williams, Judge."

After the reading of the order a committee of seven were appointed to recommend to the meeting suitable candidates for mayor and common council. They left the room, and returning in a few minutes reported the following: for mayor, Samuel Purdy; for councilmen, Dr. George A. Shurtleff, Dr. J. W. Reins, John Hyde, Wm. H. Robertson, Captain Charles M. Weber, B. G. Whittier and Hyram Green.

Then and there party lines were drawn between the slavery and the anti-slavery men and the hatred which existed until after the Civil War was very noticeable. The nominees of the Owens House meeting were all anti-slavery men. The same evening a meeting was held in the Hotel de Mexico, kept by B. F. Cheatham, later as we noted a General in the Confederate army. A committee comprising Dr. R. P. Ashe, Ben F. Cheatham and J. R. Meloney were appointed to recommend names for mayor and councilmen. The following evening they reported David S. Terry for mayor.

The election was held in the Central Exchange, then a canvas tent on the southeast corner of Main and Center streets. The party slogan was New York against Texas, Purdy being a New Yorker and Terry a Texan. About 4 o'clock the Terry advocates suddenly grabbed the ballot box and started with it on a run for the George Belt tent on the Levee. What their object was is not known, although ballot box stuffing was a well known practice in those days. The little scheme, whatever it was, did not work, for the Purdy men captured the box, and returning it to the Exchange it was thereafter well guarded until the closing of the polls. The result proved quite a disappointment to the Southern men for the entire ticket headed by Purdy was elected. As an illustration of the voting population on that occasion I give the result of the officers elected. The first named were of the Purdy party, Samuel Purdy 481, David S. Terry 288; recorder, C. M. Leake 486, J. M. Sloan 189; city attorney, Henry A. Crabb 650; assessor, Charles Edmondson, 378, R. W. Wilson 205; treasurer, George D. Brush 345, Edwin D. Colt 198; S. G. Phillips 131; marshal, J. S. Lubbock 361, W. M. Willoby 384. In this first election of city officers note the following names, for they in part became the builders of Stockton; in the council, Capt. Charles M. Weber and Dr. George Shurtleff, then D. S. Terry, Henry A. Crabb, Edwin D. Colt and George D. Brush.

Samuel Purdy and David S. Terry

Stockton's first mayor was the most notable officer ever elected to that position, because of his characteristics and general attainments. He was the exact antithesis to his opponent, David S. Terry. Born in New York of Knickerbocker stock in 1819, he was well educated and graduated as an architect. He came to California in 1849 and locating in Stockton, engaged in business with Captain Sparrow. Terry was born in Kentucky in 1827 of fighting stock, his mother being a sister of the notorious Shelby and Jackson Smith. Orphaned at thirteen years of age, Terry went to Mississippi to reside with an uncle, then governor of that state. He was captain of the Texas Rangers in the fight of that state for her independence, and in command of a company of immigrants that came to California in 1849. Purdy was well educated, not only along architectural lines, but in science, music, painting, sculpture and other avenues of art. Terry had no education except in the law and took no interest in things of beauty. Purdy was handsome in feature, with full side whiskers (the fashion of that day), physically well-formed, neat and fashionable in dress, a good dancer and an Adonis with the female sex. Terry was slouchy in dress, always wore the broad-brimmed Southern style of hat, physically a giant in build, heavy and clumsy in action, always avoided the female sex, although married. Following his wife's death, however, he met and married the notorious Sarah Althea Hill, who later was the cause of his death. Purdy was a leader in society, a patron of fine arts, the opera and the drama, a high liver and a jolly fellow among men. Terry kept aloof from society and had but few friends. His duel with Broderick may have been the cause of his lack of sociability, for men as a rule shunned him after that event. He was pointed out to strangers as the man who killed Senator Broderick. Purdy was polished and gentlemanly in manner, soft in speech and slow and deliberate in his actions. Terry was abrupt and boorish and oftentimes insulting in speech. Purdy loved children and they admired him. Terry apparently never noticed children, and they avoided him, although he was the father of seven children.

Purdy, cool and dispassionate, never carried any weapons. Terry was very sensitive and fiery tempered and in early days carried a revolver and bowie knife, and the last weapon at all times. In this connection a story is told by Theodore Steiney when he was a boy. One evening the boys were having fun lowering a straw-stuffed dummy from a tree limb every time a person passed along the sidewalk. "Along came Judge Terry, huge shoulders swinging as he walked along. The boys lowered the dummy; Judge Terry's hand flashed into his hip pocket and before you could wink he drew a revolver and shot two bullets into the dummy. The two shots were close together and by the time the second shot was fired there wasn't a kid in sight." Purdy was a politician, smooth and diplomatic, and educated in schools of Tammany Hall, New York, and elected lieutenant governor, he honored the state and himself as an honorable man. While presiding in the senate the infamous San Francisco bulkhead bill came up before that body. It had passed the Assembly, was favored by Governor Bigler and was a tie vote in the senate. Purdy voted no, although he had been offered $50,000 for his vote. "By this vote," says the Historian Hittell, "he saved the water front of San Francisco, and the state from disgrace." On the other hand Terry dishonored the state by stabbing Hopkins, a Vigilante police, and fighting a duel, while Chief Justice of California. Purdy, after his retirement was lieutenant governor, lived in Stockton until 1860. Later he was appointed superintendent of construction of the city hall, San Francisco, and there died in February, 1884. Terry "died with his boots on," shot and killed in August, 1889, in the Lathrop Hotel, then the Southern Pacific dining station at Lathrop. Between these two extremes in character, lies the gamut of life in San Joaquin County.

Major Hammond Surveys Stockton

Stockton is named after Commodore Richard F. Stockton, a naval officer famous in national history and commander-in-chief and military governor of California in 1846. Captain Weber made his acquaintance, and admiring the naval hero, named the embryo city in his honor. In the planning of Stockton by its founder, Captain C. M. Weber, we see the remarkable foresight of a man who looked far into the future. Had the city councils regarded his advice and wishes the city would be far in advance of its present progress in everything that goes to build up a city. His first act proves it, for as early as 1848 he engaged Major Richard P. Hammond, a competent engineer, to survey the town. Hammond was a civil engineer by profession, an officer in the Mexican war, and the father of John Hays Hammond, the engineer of world-wide fame. Hammond made a map of this survey and it was produced in court by Joseph H. Budd in 1885, during the Court House Square contest. This survey proved to be of little value, for in a few months came the rush of immigration to the mines; then Captain Weber saw immediately that a town of much larger scope than was a first project, must be planned. His dream since 1842 was about to be realized and Stockton was to become an important city, the depot of the great valley.

Major Hammond was then engaged to resurvey the city on a much larger scale, one mile square. This survey was completed in November, 1849. A second map was plotted and it so pleased the Captain that he informed the Major that he would keep the original map, and a third map was drawn. This third map was sent on to New York and lithographed and the copies returned in eighteen months. The plan of a city a mile square was a big proposition in that day, but could the Captain have foreseen a century ahead, instead of fifty years, the extension of the city two miles square, then the annexation of the Homestead, the Fair Oaks, McCloud's addition, Tuxedo Park and Stockton Acres, he would have planned the city four instead of one mile square. Even so, he did in one particular plan the city centuries ahead, when he declared that the Stockton and Mormon channels must be open waterways to the general public forever. Pioneers offered him thousands of dollars for water front lots, but he refused all offers. Some of our councils have unwisely permitted corporations to close a part of the water front to the public use under the plea of commercial necessity. But the time is not far distant within the life of youth of today when every foot of the water front from the head of navigation, El Dorado Street, to the San Joaquin River, will be required by the shipping of interior and ocean steamers and vessels. Standing on the south bank of the Stockton Channel, Captain Weber extended his arm east and west as he told me, thus indicating to the engineer his desire to have all the streets along the water channels. This plan prevented all encroachment of the channels by private parties. As the streets were surveyed east and west naturally they were surveyed north and south, this forming square blocks. The blocks are 303 feet square and the streets running east and west 60 feet wide, and north and south 80 feet in width. The only exception is Weber Avenue, which is 120 feet wide east of Hunter Street. These dimensions do not apply to the recent additions for there the blocks and streets are all shapes and sizes, surveyed according to the whims and fancies of the original owners, when outside of the jurisdiction of the city.

Naming the Streets

Nearly all the streets of Stockton within the two-mile city limits were named by Captain Weber, or approved by him. He admired plants and flowers, and seldom was seen without a buttonhole bouquet. North of Fremont Street we read the names, Oak, Park, Flora, Poplar, Acacia, Magnolia, Rose, Vine, Willow. He was also a great admirer of American statesmen, presidents and patriots, and south of Market Street the student of history quickly recognizes the name of Washington, La Fayette, Jefferson and Clay. West of Center Street on the north side of the channel, Weber for some reason named the streets after animals, Beaver, Elk, Bear, Otter, Raccoon and Tule. These names years later were changed to Commerce, Madison, Van Buren, Lincoln and Harrison. Tule Street is now known as Edison Street. Major Hammond was a very enthusiastic Mexican War veteran and when the surveyors arrived south at Mormon Channel, Weber approved of the engineer's suggestion that the streets be named after famous United States generals in the Mexican War, and the victorious battles won, Scott Avenue, Taylor, Worth, Twigg and Jackson. Then came a host of Mexican names commencing at Aurora which was called Mexico, and going west, Victory, Smith, Contreras, Harney, Cerro Gordo, Huger, Vera Cruz, Palo Alto, Ringgold, Resaca, Ridgely, Monterey, Bliss, Buena Vista, Bragg. These names were soon abrogated and the names on the north side of Mormon Channel continued through to South Street.

In the present name of two streets the Civil War is brought to mind. Twigg became a general in the Confederate army and the union loving city council blotted his name from the official record and substituted that of General Anderson, he who so heroically defended Fort Sumter in Charleston harbor. When U. S. Grant won his famous battles, at Weber's request the council changed the name of the street called Jose Jesus, to Grant. The Indian was a faithful friend of Weber's, but his love of country was greater than his friendship. Main Street was so named because it was and is now the main traveled thoroughfare of the city. Center Street, when the city was organized was the center of business; it is now the house number division line east and west, and Main Street is the corresponding street north and south. Lindsay Street was so named after Weber's overseer, Lindsay, who was killed on the Point by Indians. Fremont Square and Street were named in honor of Captain John C. Fremont, explorer and prominent in California affairs in 1846. Weber Avenue and Weber Levee and Park were named by the citizens in honor of the founder of Stockton. Miner Avenue was so called as the miners from the mountain camps made that street their principal place of travel. Hazelton Avenue, paralleling Mormon Channel, was named in honor of Dr. Wm. P. Hazelton, who gave the city $75,000 for the building of a free public library. West Street is now known as Pershing Avenue, named after General Pershing, commander of the American troops in France during the World War. The public plazas set apart by Captain Weber as "resting places for the people" have no names of any special significance. These squares were reserved from sale, together with a block bounded by Church, American, California and Hazelton Avenue, which was reserved for a church. The block directly opposite on the east was reserved for a hospital. Where now stands the Franklin school was reserved for a town hall, the greater portion of the city population living in that vicinity. A block fronting on Mormon Channel between Church and Sonora was reserved for a public market. In 1870 the city limits were extended one-half mile on each of the four compass points making the city two miles square. Within the past ten years additions have been made of Fair Oaks, Homestead, McCloud's addition, The Oaks, Sunnyside, Stockton Acres and Tuxedo Park, these additions making the city very irregular in shape.

The Flood of 1852

The city elections were held annually until 1884. The mayor elected in May, 1851, was a distinguished person—John C. Edwards. Born in Kentucky in 1806, governor of Wisconsin in 1844-48, he came to California in 1849 and located in Stockton. The year of his election as mayor he married Miss Emma J. Richards, who is now living in this city, her husband dying September 16, 1888. Mr. Edwards took his seat as mayor under very discouraging conditions. The principal part of the town had been destroyed in the fire of May 5, and in the spring of 1851 came the first of those floods that since that time have caused hundreds of thousands of dollars damage because the citizens made no movement to prevent damage by floods until some ten or fifteen years ago. In the winter of 1851-52 a very peculiar condition of weather existed for it was the heaviest rainfall—17.98 inches in 1851; 27.40 inches in 1852—in the history of the county, save that of 1862. The freshet was sudden and unexpected for there had been scarcely any rain in December, January or February. The storm commenced March 5 and continued with but little interruption for three days. "Then it swept through the city with the most astonishing rapidity, boiling and roaring in its fury." The greatest force of the current was along Main Street, carrying away a part of the bridge and the engine house; private parties also lost considerable property, and although there were no sidewalks or improved streets, the loss was over $25,000. One of the losses was that of the mayor who had a $1,700 interest in the Main Street bridge.

A special meeting of the council was held and they selected a permanent place for the engine house and instructed the city marshal to employ men to take charge of the city's lumber and to erect and repair all of the bridges and those cross walks that had been washed away. The county surveyor was instructed to take a level of the water courses approaching Stockton. He declared there was no danger from the back water of the San Joaquin River and the only danger was from the overflow of the banks of the Calaveras River, which finds a channel across the plains through the city. He advised that all bridges be placed above the high-water mark about three inches and that all buildings be erected on stone or brick foundations, the walls in low places to run with the current of water.

Reception to Peter Rothenbush

One of the council elected in 1852 was Peter Rothenbush, a very popular young German, who polled the highest vote on the ticket. In October Peter concluded that he would go home and get a wife and the city fathers gave a supper in his honor. The press received an invitation to be present and said the reporter, "We sat down to the most recherche supper ever spread in Stockton. It was an occasion of more than ordinary interest as one of their number, Alderman Peter Rothenbush, was about to start on his travels in search of a wife. When we say that wine flowed freely, and that Captain Jordan was in 'tip top spirits' our readers will conclude that the affair went 'merry as a marriage bell.' Mayor Baker presided. We must not forget to notice that the proprietor of the New York Hotel placed every luxury of the season on the table, fowl, game, an excellent dessert and a generous welcome." Peter returned with a "Frau" and for a time kept the Stockton Bakery Hotel, corner of Channel and California streets. In 1857 he purchased an interest in the El Dorado Brewery and continued in that business for many years. He died in Vallejo in August, 1892, sixty-eight years of age. He was an uncle of Jacob Simon, at one time a police and fire commissioner, and a brother of Daniel and Jacob Rothenbush; the latter died in March, 1922, at the age of eighty-four years.

The Bridgers and Diggers

When the city election of May, 1853, was at hand, there were two questions at issue; the improvement of the streets and numerous bridges across the shallow and main water courses. "The question is," said the editor, "will we have public improvements or shall we remain behind the times, 'a one-horse town.'" The leading issue was the building of a bridge across the Stockton Channel, either at Hunter Street or El Dorado Street. The narrow foot-bridge across the channel, midway between Hunter and El Dorado streets, had been washed away by the flood, and those living north of the Avenue together with the merchants of the Peninsula were practically isolated; the only way they could cross the water was by ferry boat. The two factions were known as the Bridgers and Diggers. The Diggers demanded that the slough be deepened to Hunter Street, "the head of navigation." As a proof of that assertion they pointed to an ocean brig lying at anchor where now stands the Turnverein hall. The brig later was turned into a bowling alley, said James Kidd. The Bridgers comprised the merchants doing business on the Peninsula; they wanted the bridge built at El Dorado Street. And their friends declared, "To refuse to build a bridge at El Dorado Street would be a gross outrage to the residents and property holders on the Peninsula." The Bridgers planned and carried through a neat scheme by having the legislature, in April, declare El Dorado Street the head of navigation. Captain Weber strongly favored the El Dorado project, and he backed it up by offering to release to the city the block in dispute providing they built a bridge at El Dorado at least eighty feet in width. The head of the Bridgers' ticket was M. B. Kenney, a crockery merchant, who was one of the first settlers in the city. With him were two men for councilmen, B. W. Owens and Captain P. E. Jordan, two of the most popular men in Stockton and councilmen in 1852. The Diggers after considerable sparring for a candidate finally succeeded in getting Dr. Christopher Grattan to accept the nomination for mayor. On his ticket were several men for councilmen who were on the Kenney ticket, among them Austin Sperry, B. W. Owens and Andrew Wolf. The result was an overwhelming majority for the Bridgers, 610 to 351. The mayor-elect and the councilmen comprised M. B. Kenney, B. W. Owens, Andrew Lester, Austin Sperry, Wm. Vance, J. W. Carlisle, J. C. Cleghorn, P. E. Jordan, Andrew Wolf, Joel Clayton and V. M. Peyton. This was the council which in connection with the county judge, W. D. Root, erected the first court house.

Mayor Kenney's Administration

Mayor Kenney took his seat as Stockton's third chief official and the first one to deliver an inaugural address. In the address he said, "The city income for the past year ending in March was $51,129.31. The expense exceeded the income because of a heavy drain for hospital expenses and bridges, but the excess is so small that it can be kept down by being economical. There is much to be done, building bridges and improving streets, which should have a regular grade and be planked or graveled in a substantial manner. At the second meeting of the council, Owens' resolution was unanimously adopted that the property holders be notified that Center, Levee, Main and Hunter streets would be immediately planked with three-inch Oregon or Humboldt pine. There was an immediate remonstrance against planking the Levee, the protestants saying that "probably we would not have any rain this year." Center Street, which was the principal street of the city, because it led to French Camp, in December the previous year "was in a woeful condition. The council at considerable expense, carted soil from another part of the city to fill up the low places, but the rains came, the soil turned into mud, and now it is almost impossible to get across it." "Our partner, Dr. Radcliffe," said the editor, "attempted to cross it, and soon he was in the water up to his armpits. The following day a man on horseback floundered in the mud and nearly drowned." This press report is no stretch of imagination, for the author has seen these things time and again. In the heaviest winter storms, automobiles speed over Market Street today at twenty miles an hour. What was it in '53? The editor praising Councilman Owens for his planking resolution "as a move in the right direction," said, "We regret that he did not include Market Street. In no part of the year can a dray travel this thoroughfare without being in danger of submergence in the slough, which passes along it nearly from beginning to end." The streets were planked and it cost $80,000 to plank Main Street from Center to Hunter and El Dorado to Levee, over $25,000 a block, and it was not only dangerous because of the holes in the planking, but almost useless, as the mud would fly up through the ends whenever a team passed over it thus covering the street with mud and slime. One day it is said that a team heavily loaded started up Main Street from Center and broke every plank along the street. The days of planking soon ended and then they tried gravel.

I have wandered a long way from the subject which I had in mind—bridges—but as the subject of bridges or planking will not again be noted, a few lines on bridges, for these two items were among the heaviest city expenses. One of the first wagon bridges, if not the first, was the bridge across Mormon Channel. It was built by the merchants as a business proposition in their trade with the mountain camps by the way of French Camp. They came before the council of 1853 and petitioned them to reimburse them for the money paid out. The council refused, as the city had paid half of the cost. In March, '53, a contract was given for the building of the El Dorado Street bridge at a cost of $27,000. It was 200 feet in length and 80 feet in width. The bridge was built on piles and for many years was an open waterway, the Chinamen passing through and tying their boats near the Hunter Street China houses. There were dozens of wagon and footbridges throughout the city, but now there are but few left, such is the city's progress.

Assassination of Wm. A. Brown

Considering the scarcity of funds in the city treasury it is peculiar the way in which they spent some of it. In April, '53, the council, through the mayor, offered $1,000 reward for the arrest of one William Bowlin, who shot and killed W. A. Brown, the Adams Express messenger between Stockton and San Andreas. The citizens, the county judge, the Masonic lodge, of which Brown was a member, and Governor Bigler also offered large rewards for the arrest of Bowlin. He was also in the employ of the express company and embezzling funds, was tried and acquitted. Brown was a witness against him and this so angered Bowlin that he determined to kill him. At this time Brown was boarding at the City Hotel, located on the east side of the present Masonic Hotel site and kept by I. V. Leffler. Bowlin planned well his escape from the scene of murder by placing a relay of fast horses from Stockton to Mariposa. There was no telegraph or telephone lines, no railroads and a long stretch of country sparsely settled between the two points. Bowlin knew Brown's habits and, riding to Stockton on a fast horse late on the afternoon of April 1, 1853, lay in wait for his victim at the end of the small footbridge across the present Hotel Stockton site. At dusk Brown came from the hotel and as he approached the middle of the bridge, Bowlin fired at him with a shotgun, so seriously wounding Brown that he died the following day. Bowlin then quickly jumped on his horse, which had been held in waiting by Glover O'Neil, a son of the sheriff, and sped away in the darkness. There was great excitement over the cowardly assassination, for the murdered man was very highly respected, and as soon as possible a company of mounted men started after the fugitive. Everything, however, was in his favor, the darkness, fast horses and several hours start. Brown was buried in the City cemetery, over 2,000 persons, Odd Fellows, Masons, officials and citizens attended the funeral. In the meantime it was learned that Bowlin was secreted in the mountains near Mariposa and, stimulated by the large reward, parties of men mounted and well-armed started forth to hunt for the murderer. In a few days a party of four found Bowlin afoot and alone in a ravine near Mariposa. As the men came within hailing distance Bowlin cried out, "I suppose I am the person you are looking for." On receiving an affirmative reply, he laid his bowie knife and revolver upon the ground and said, "Come and take me," and immediately swallowed a quick poison. One of the party then shouted, "He has taken poison." "I have," was his reply, "keep your distance, I am desperate," and reaching for his revolver he kept it in his hand until his death.

Disposal of the Dead

In the evolving of civilization in Stockton there is no progress more noticeable than the humane burial of the dead. Today in Rural Cemetery they peacefully sleep, in soil artistically laid off and surrounded by beautiful trees, shrubs and flowers, and some of them beneath handsome monuments and inclosed in costly mausoleums. Yesterday it was not so. Then the dead were disposed of as quickly and cheaply as possible in the most convenient spot, no prayer, nor funeral dirge. One grave was found while workmen were digging the foundation of a building on Main Street; another was found, late in the '60s on Hunter Street, corner of Market while workmen were cutting out an oak tree for the improvement of the street. It was the grave of a little girl. While the Chicard family were crossing the plains the little girl died, but the mother positively refused to leave the body buried on the plains, so the body was brought to Stockton. The family had had bad luck and on arrival were extremely poor. Captain Weber, hearing of the sad case, permitted them to live on a lot on the southeast corner of the streets named and the child was buried beneath an oak tree standing near by.

For this neglect of the dead there were good and sufficient reasons; namely the conditions and the times. It's an old and a true saying, "What's everybody's business, is nobody's business," and as there was no government, no one to take charge of this work, the men were all strangers to each other, here today and gone tomorrow never to return. Each man was dependent upon himself for his food, shelter, and even life, none of them were wealthy, and they had neither the time, inclination nor the money to give to strangers. Then another reason, deaths were very many in number for such a small population, due from various causes. Many immigrants landed in Stockton with just money sufficient to pay their passage, lured to California with the absurd report that gold could be picked up off the earth. They took sick and died. Others came with some coin, they were also taken sick and going to the hospital, were turned out into the streets to die as soon as their money was exhausted. The physician was one of the most humane of men, but medicines, labor, material and food were high in price, and he could not act otherwise than as he did. Then there were many cases of men drunk with liquor who would mire down in the mud of winter, lie down and die. These were some of the conditions in the "days of '49."

After the organization of the city government, quite a number of the dead were buried in the lot where now stands the county jail. Then by common consent the city authorities selected a piece of ground just east of the Western Pacific depot. An engine house is now located on the block. Soon after this selection of a burial place had been made a wail went up from the press, "For mercy's sake and for the love of God, good Christian gentleman, let us bury our dead." Then the reported declared, "The hogs are rooting up the dead bodies on the unfenced burial ground. Now we earnestly suggest," said he, "that the city council take this matter under serious consideration, as they could do no more popular act than enclose with a good fence the Stockton burial ground." In the previous year, July, 1851, the committee on public grounds had been authorized to advertise for "proposals, to build a fence around the graveyard belonging to the city." They had taken the squatters possession, and Councilman Howison, in January, 1852, offered a resolution which was adopted, that the committee on public grounds "be instructed to confer with Captain Weber and solicit from him a donation of the burial grounds." At the same time $1,000 was appropriated by the council towards inclosing the grounds. The citizens had previously obtained $500 by subscription for the same purpose, and they had requested the council to create the office of city sexton, "to take charge of the graveyard, superintend funerals and make monthly reports of burials to the council." Their request was approved and the council appointed Morris H. Bond as city sexton and Jacob Sutherland as grave digger. M. H. Bond was a curious figure in Stockton's society. He was less than five feet in height, heavy-set, near-sighted, and slow of comprehension; because of this he was the goat of many jokes. He was a Mason, an Odd Fellow and at one time a member of the Stockton Cornet Band. For over thirty years he was a funeral director and several times coroner, his office and home being just east of the engine house on Weber Avenue. He was the first undertaker to purchase a hearse, in 1856, and it was a crude vehicle in comparison with the handsome automobile hearses of today. The donation of the grounds was cheerfully made by Captain Weber and soon after blocks of land were deeded to the Catholic and Jewish churches, and the Odd Fellows for the burial of their dead. In March, '61, a meeting of citizens was held in the city hall for the purpose of purchasing a new burial ground as "the city cemetery," they declared, "is being rapidly filled and will soon be unfitted for the purposes for which it is now used." The following year the old burial place was abandoned and the undertaker began the removal of the bodies, of those who had the money to pay for the work, to Rural Cemetery. Hundreds of bodies were left in the earth and the block, overgrown with dry grass, littered with broken tombstones and open graves was a disgrace to the city. The fence was broken in many places, cows fed and trampled over the graves and in '67 Captain Weber, at his own expense, engaged a carpenter to repair the fence, "for he is determined to keep the swine, horses and cattle from encroaching upon the graves." The legislature in 1893 authorized the removal of cemeteries from the city limits and Mayor W. R. Clark, recommending their removal, the city cemetery was obliterated, the Catholics selling their block to the Holt Manufacturing Plant, removing their dead to a new plot just north of North Street; the Odd Fellows, laying off a plot in the Rural grounds, sold their lot to the Western Pacific Railroad, and the Jewish cemetery still remains in the city limits.

J. M. Buffington's Administration

City elections every year, state and county elections every two years, kept the politicians busy. The proposal of the Democrats to carry the election of 1854 as they had carried the three previous elections, went glimmering. The Democrats assembled in the city hall April 20 and elected Captain P. E. Jordan president, and Abram Schell and Dr. Christopher Grattan secretaries. Dr. E. B. Bateman offered a resolution, which was adopted, that all candidates for office be pledged to support the convention nominees or withdraw their names. Apparently up to this time there had been no party lines drawn in city elections. The Whigs, assembled the day following the Democrats, declared "Whereas, the necessity has been forced upon us by the late Democratic convention of effecting an organization; Resolved, that we recommend competency and integrity as constituting the only real claim to public support for municipal honors." They appointed a committee of thirteen from the four wards to recommend a city municipal ticket, they to report April 25. Reporting they said, "We have endeavored to select men whose interests are permanently identified with the city; men of sound practical judgment and unquestionable character, ability and integrity." They recommended for mayor, John M. Buffington, at the time was engaged in the grocery business, who was already a councilman, superintendent of the Methodist Episcopal Sunday school and of the public schools. The unusual thing happened in 1854, when the mayor of Stockton read to the council his report of the public schools as superintendent. All of the nominees were elected viva voce, a very unusual custom in elections, but the Whigs declared "Let every man show his hand." The Democratic press commenting on this method of voting asserted that B. W. Owens, the chairman, "is constituted the king of the crowd and the ballot box is repudiated and almost scoffed at." In 1854 the Democrats voted by the same method in their convention. Commenting on the Whig nominee for mayor, the editor declared, "We have one objection to Mr. Buffington, of a most serious character; he was the head and front of the movement for the issue of city bonds to the amount of thousands of dollars for the purpose of building costly school houses."

The Democrats had placed at the head of their ticket William Vance for mayor, but he was defeated by the Whig nominee 518 to 410 votes. Mayor Buffington made a very able inaugural address before the council, in which he stated that the city revenue from taxation was $48,000, licenses $6,000, harbor dues $10,000, and rent of city property $5,000. The expense was, fire department $2,000, hospital, streets and wharves $16,000, schools $7,000, interest $20,000, and contingent $10,000. There was a balance of $25,000 which he hoped would be used in the liquidation of the debt. John M. Buffington was a very active business man and unfortunately for the city, he removed to San Francisco with his wife and four children in 1857 and there died in June, 1891. Born in Massachusetts in 1828, he attended the public schools of Boston, and coming to Stockton in 1849, he did his first work as a carpenter on the Presbyterian Church at sixteen dollars a day. He then opened a cracker bakery, where now stands the business college on Weber Avenue. He was a prominent Mason, and possessing considerable self-esteem, he had painted a life-sized oil painting of himself in the handsome Knights Templar uniform. It hung for many years on the wall of the Pioneer hall. One evening a woman lecturing on woman suffrage stated in her remarks, "They say the men are not self-conceited," and pointing to the painting, she quietly said, "Look at that." The applause was deafening, the men as well as the women enjoying the speaker's sarcasm.

The City Rents Property

An income of $5,000 a year from the rent of city property would not come amiss even in this day. The idea of leasing property was conceived in the first council, that of 1850, for the purpose of replenishing the exchequer, and it was thought more advisable than the ordinance which they had passed taxing the auctioneers $100 a month. Captain Weber had deeded to the city the west half of block 12, fronting on Hunter and Main Streets, and Phelps & Company had made the council an offer of $600 per month, payable in advance, for lots on Main Street, which they accepted. Reserving lot seven for the use of the Hook and Ladder company, they leased the balance of the property, the lessors to erect their own buildings. Much of the property was a de slough in winter, but the buildings were erected on piles. On the corner was a saloon and to the east I. S. Locke's daguerrean car, which sat on wheels. The low one-story shacks remained until 1865 when the fire of May 5 wiped them out of existence, and the city out of considerable profit. Soon after the fire the Odd Fellows' Hall Association offered the council $5,000 for the corner lot 90x100 feet. The council accepted the offer, but Mayor Gray vetoed the ordinance, saying "the price was too cheap." The council passed it over his head and the Association erected the finest building, a three-story, in the San Joaquin Valley.

In 1854 the council leased the southwest corner of the Court House Square to Webster & Barstow, a mercantile firm. They paid $250 a month for the rent of the ground, 50 feet on Main and 100 feet on Hunter street, and on piles of heavy timbers erected a one-story sheet-iron building. Some two years later they removed and Marks, the auctioneer, occupied the building until 1860. It was then voted by the council to fill in and improve the square and the building was torn down.

The council moved into the city hall in April, 1854, as they owned the south half of the court house. "It was admirably arranged and brilliantly illuminated with three elegant hanging lamps reflecting an illumination sufficient to read or write in any part of the room. The lamps were filled with whale oil (you can imagine the brilliant illumination). It has a rostrum and desk, with a handsome mahogany railing around it. The room is complete and well arranged." This hall was used for all public assemblies, church festivals, conventions, Sunday and public school entertainments, until the building of Agricultural hall, where now stands the Yosemite Building. The city rented the hall to various parties, through the hall-keeper, Thomas Barnes. He opened the hall for the council meetings, receiving $1.00 per night. He also received a perquisite from each party to whom he rented the hall, each time giving the council five dollars. Although during the year the hall was occupied over thirty times the council received only seventy-five dollars from rents. There were too many "dead head" entertainments, and free rents given by councilmen through politics and favoritism.

The largest and steadiest income of the council was the rent of wharf space. In 1855 they passed an ordinance "leasing out the new wharf in parts and parcels suitable for the vending of vegetables. The tents, six by eight or over, to pay $100 a month rent." The space was quickly occupied, as it was a fine business location for those who received their vegetables by water. These cloth tents gave the city quite an income, although in later days the rent was reduced to twenty dollars per month. In my day I remember along tent row Louie Vilhac, the fish market, L. L. Rowland & Co., Richard S. Bates, B. Howard Brown, Joseph Hale and Heeney & Lochhead. The town was rapidly growing and the demand for wharf room was so great that in 1864 the council notified the tent occupants to vacate. At this time Louie Wagerman, a butcher, had a wooden shack at the corner of the bridge where now stands the Lodi and Sacramento electric car office. He erected his own building and paid the city twenty dollars a month rent. After several years the place became an eyesore and a nuisance, but as it was one of the best business locations in the city Wagerman refused to vacate. The council then raised his rent to $100 per month "payable in gold or silver coin." That clause was inserted because it was war times and Uncle Sam's paper money was at times below par.

Victory of American Party

In the following year, 1855, there was a city, county and state election, and a new party known as the American or Know Nothing party was organized. The party was composed of Whigs and Democrats, and in their city ticket they nominated Royal B. Parker, a leading grocer, for mayor. The Democrats nominated Alvin N. Fisher, a stage proprietor. Two men more honorable could not have been placed on either ticket. The Know Nothings swept the state in the September election and they elected every city officer, except their mayor and one alderman in the Second Ward. The party held no convention, but selected their candidates in a secret meeting and, said the Republican, "Citizens not invested with the password were not allowed to enter the circle that formed it. It is headed Citizens' Ticket, to which it is about as much entitled as old Nick to righteousness."

As the Fourth of July drew near (the two previous councils had appropriated $500 towards the expenses of a celebration), the American council refused to appropriate a dollar and there was no celebration on that day. They also ordered the committee on public grounds to remove outside the town the old cannon which lay at the north end of the El Dorado Street bridge. This was simply spite work, and as the press truly stated, "We presume the old gun has chronicled too many Democratic victories to be tolerated by the Know Nothings." On the morning of the Fourth, a company of patriotic young men, procuring a wagon fastened ropes to the tongue and getting the cannon, loaded it on the wagon, drew it to the bridge and fired a salute. Then preceded by a fife and drum they marched around town, firing a salute at every corner. The gun was in charge of its owner, William Walls, who had not been consulted as to its removal. In the evening there were fireworks at the Zachariah gardens on Park Street, now a part of the State Asylum grounds.

B. Walker Bours Elected Mayor

The Democratic press were never so happy as when berating the opposition party and in 1857 they called the Democrat's attention to the fact in April that "the day of our annual election is approaching and it is time for the Democratic party to make their selection of public men to fill the various offices. It is perfectly certain that the combined forces of Know Nothingism and Black Republicanism will enter the field under the guise of a People's Party. Like a celestial army of Chinese they will come into the field with a clash of gongs and shouts of reform and what not, but then they are more disagreeable than dangerous, as it is known they are all foam and no cider." On the 29th the Democrats met in convention with H. T. Huggins as chairman and Allen Lee Bours and Edward M. Howison, secretaries. They resolved that no delegate should have the right to vote for any candidate unless he was a legal voter and would support the nominees. The election was again by viva voce. There were three nominations for mayor, Charles S. Stevens, Henry T. Compton and B. Walker Bours. The three named were vestrymen of the Episcopal Church, thus showing that in the early days men of religion were shaping the city government. In the city election Bours had no opposition and he was elected by a vote of 647. The entire Democratic ticket was elected except V. M. Peyton, J. P. D. Wilkins and A. J. Colburn, who were elected councilmen from the Third Ward on the People's ticket.

The mayor elected was not new in politics, having been elected an alderman in 1854 from the First Ward, this only a few weeks previous to his marriage, May 18, to Miss Louise Faulkenberg. He was born in New York in 1823, and came early to California in the early days. In 1850 he came to Stockton and he and his brother, T. R. Bours, established the first banking house here, now the Bank of Italy. The mayor in delivering his message to the council said, "The financial affairs of the city are in a sound and healthy condition. Our taxes have already been reduced and our citizens look to you for still further reductions. The city charter allows you to expend only $16,000 a year. A fair estimate of the city's resources are as follows: Ground and office rents, $3,000; wharf stands, $3,400; liquor licenses, $3,500; wharfage, $9,000; dray licenses, $1,000; billiard licenses, amusements, etc., $1,000; totaling in all $21,000. The expenses are: Salaries—marshal, $2,400; city drayman, $1,000; clerk, $800; assessor, $400; wharves, streets and city property, $6,400; fire department, $2,000; printing, stationery, $1,000; incidentals, $1,000; total $16,000.

Dr. Grattan Deserts Democrats

The city election of 1858 was another Democratic victory, the seventh victory since the organization of the city government. The entire Democratic ticket was renominated in the convention and reelected. Two who were defeated on the Independent ticket were the printer, E. D. Eldridge, later a prominent capitalist, and Jacob Sutherland, whom we recognize as the city burial ground gravedigger. In 1859 the political agitation in the East was felt in Stockton and the anti-slavery or Union men were beginning to marshal their forces for the great presidential election of 1860. We will hear more of this in a succeeding chapter. The Democrats met in the court house April 25 and Lot Day was elected chairman, the motion being put by William Lanius, the Stockton postmaster appointed by President James Buchanan. The secretary, Oscar M. Brown, two years later was a captain of cavalry in the California Volunteers. Bours was again nominated without any opponent, the delegates voting viva voce. In the evening the Citizens' Democratic party met in the court house and Dr. Christopher Grattan, who now had deserted his old-time Democratic friends, was elected chairman of the meeting. B. W. Owens nominated Dr. E. S. Holden for mayor and he was elected by acclamation. Owens was an anomaly in that day, an anti-slavery and a Union man, a native of South Carolina. The election was May 2 and Bours was beaten by Holden 409 to 350. H. W. Gillingham, elected collector on the Citizens' ticket, was elected mayor in 1856 on the Democratic ticket.

Mayor Bours' Farewell Message

Mayor Bours, in bidding good bye to the council, never again to take part in politics, said, "Our official connection ends this evening, and I beg to review the present condition of the city which is financially in a strong and healthy condition. The income from ground rents and licenses has proven to be amply sufficient for all general expenses, including salaries of officers and fire department. The city has no floating debt and for the past two years has paid cash for every demand against her as soon as audited. It is gratifying to be able to state that the credit of our city stands as high, if not higher, than that of any other city in the state. The receipts for the year have been $23,838.95 and the expenses $18,486.78. Among the disbursements of the fire department was that of repairing and constructing fire wells and cisterns, also the cost of the fire alarm bell, $1,636. A large outlay has been made for grading and graveling streets in front of city property, which was absolutely necessary because of the dilapidated condition of the old planking. During the present year a beautiful and commodious school house has been erected for the boys' school. The ordinance requiring the retailers of liquor to present a petition to the councilmen signed by three respectable citizens residing in the immediate neighborhood has had the desired effect of closing nearly all of the low dram and tipping places and a corresponding decrease in crime." Mayor Bours then retired, closing the first decade of Stockton's history, and vacating the mayor's seat in favor of Dr. E. S. Holden, who when elected mayor four times refused to longer serve as the city's servant.

CHAPTER XI

THE VOLUNTEER FIRE DEPARTMENT

YESTERDAY the big five-ton auto pumps and chemical engines went thundering along the streets at a thirty-mile clip, bells ringing and sirens blowing in response to an alarm of fire. It was the sole business of those firemen to extinguish the flames. Since 1887 we have had a paid fire department. Previous to that time the fire department was composed of volunteers, men who were willing to give their time and money and risk their life in the saving of property from fire. All honor to these men in their heroic work in many a hard-fought battle with the fire fiend; they are as much entitled to honors as the hero on the battlefield. The soldier is fed, clothed and given shelter and a small wage by the Government and goes forth to battle for his country and save the people and their property from destruction; the firemen leaped from his bed at the midnight hour or left his work during a hot summer day, at the alarm of fire, to battle with the flames and save property and perhaps life. He was only given a small sum of money to take care of the fire apparatus and by some common councils he was even begrudged that amount. As for clothing, many was the time when the firemen ruined their clothes and pocketed the loss. A particularly disastrous fire in that respect was that of the Sperry Flour Mill, Sunday afternoon, April 2, 1882. The firemen were all in their "Sunday best;" no time to make any change of clothing, and many a fireman was out of pocket from ten dollars to fifty dollars. So much for the glory of being a volunteer fireman.

The volunteers were not only the property savers of the city, but they were the social, intellectual and political leaders as well as firemen: the department was composed of laborers, mechanics, merchants, clerks, attorneys, bankers and judges. They were in some instances officers in secret societies, and on one occasion, Charity lodge of Odd Fellows quickly adjourned at the cry of fire; four of the officers were members of the fire department. In the courts all firemen were exempt from jury duty; this was a state law. As leaders in social life they gave all of the balls, parties, picnics and excursions of that day and they were the events of the season. We will not devote much space to the practical work of the volunteer fire department; the extinguishing a fire as quickly as possible, all-important as it is today such work is commonplace and of no interest to the general public. We will therefore write principally of the social life of the department, its patriotic, competitive and stirring events, some of them not creditable to those engaged; and its benevolent and charitable features.

Preliminary Organization of Department

Before the city was born the volunteer fire department was organized. At the citizens' mass meeting in the Owens House June 15, 1850, for the preliminary organization of a city government, a committee was appointed comprising George W. Mason, W. T. Shannan, J. W. McKenney and James E. Nuttman, all of them former eastern firemen, to report at an adjourned meeting, a plan of organization of a temporary fire police. At the assemblage June 18, the committee reported, "Having taken into consideration the important subject committed to them, and fully examining every particular connected therewith, find there is not at present in town a single fire engine or any means of arresting the ravages of fire, save by the common water bucket, nor have they been able to procure the requisite amount of money to purchase even the buckets so necessary at present to save the property of the citizens of Stockton, when the awful element is raging in our midst. The committee further "recommend that the City of Stockton proceed at once to elect a chief engineer and other officers, subject to the chief engineer, and forthwith organize a company of 100 men who, under the command of said chief engineer, shall have the entire control of the fire department during the continuance of a fire. The committee would also recommend that a committee be appointed for the purpose of soliciting subscriptions from the citizens of the town to purchase at once, hooks and ladders, with the necessary apparatus to be placed in charge of the fire department, convenient for their invaluable services in case of fire. The committee believe and are of the opinion that by their early fulfillment and execution much good will result to the citizens of this place and the evils consequent upon the calamitous ravages of fire, will be in part, if not entirely curtailed and zealous action is most earnestly invoked in this matter." Eight days later the citizens met in the same place as at the previous meeting, and the requisite number of persons having been obtained they proceeded to start the organization of a fire department by electing a set of officers, J. E. Nuttman, chief engineer, Asa C. Bradford, first assistant engineer, and Emil Judge, secretary.

First Hook and Ladder Truck

Following out the recommendation of the committee there seems to have been formed what was called a Hook & Ladder company, for in August, 1850, great praise was given "to the patriotic enthusiasm of the management of the Hook & Ladder company for their zeal and activity in forwarding the preliminary arrangements to obtain the subscriptions. They are all paid and the apparatus is present." What that apparatus was we are left to conjecture. Probably a two-wheeled truck made to carry the implements quickly to a fire. In October, 1850, George Buffum notified the council that the hooks and ladders were ready for use, and given in charge of the street commissioner they were housed on the Court House Square. When the engine house was built on Weber Avenue, near El Dorado Street, for the Weber engine company, the Hooks were there placed. Two months later the Webers complained to the council that there was not enough room, and the Hooks were removed to Center Street, where they were placed in the rear of a coffee stand near Center and Levee, and in the fire of May 5, 1851, they were burned up.

That was Stockton's most disastrous fire in more ways than one, as catching fire from the shavings made in the erection of a hotel, it burned over more ground, destroyed more valuable property than any succeeding fire, and badly crippled the fire department, what there was of it, by burning most of the fire hose and badly injuring the fire engine, because improperly handled. Chief Engineer Nuttman and many of the firemen had gone to San Francisco to see the ruins of the big fire at that place a few days previous and amateurs, taking out the Weber engine to play water on the flames, the fire caught them between two buildings and nearly destroyed the machine.

The Weber Bucket Company

The Weber Engine No. 1 was at that time an organized company, claiming an organization since July 4, 1850; so reads the granite stone set in the front wall of their old engine house on the Peninsula. The date of their organization was always a disputed point between them and the Hook and Ladder company, because of the fact that the oldest company always had the place of honor the lead of every parade. The Webers claimed that date because of the fact, that at the great fire of December, 1849, a large number of citizens running to the fire with buckets formed two long lines from the channel to the fire. One side passed along full pails of water, the opposite side returned the buckets to the water to be refilled. Then they called this the Weber Bucket Brigade and organized their company. They made this bluff work as the Hook and Ladder company was the meekest and mildest body of men in the department.

Organization of Weber Engine Company

The common council were informed in January, 1851, by many of the citizens, that if they would purchase an engine a fire company would immediately be organized. Captain Weber, then a member of the council, stated that anticipating the necessity of a fire engine he had obtained one in good order for immediate use. He offered to let the council have the machine at cost price, $3,799, payments to be made in three, five and six month installments. The council immediately accepted his proposition and January 29, 1851, Major Hammond, as Weber's agent, was instructed to deliver the engine to the chief of the fire department, James E. Nuttman. In the meantime some thirty citizens, men who formerly were firemen in the Eastern States, organized a company, in honor of Stockton's founder they adopted the name of Weber Engine Company No. 1 and elected the following officers, James E. Nuttman, chief engineer, W. H. Brown, first assistant engineer, William Adee, foreman, P. Q. Brown, first assistant foreman, E. B. Veeland, secretary, John W. Lewis, treasurer, and William H. Ward, steward. Young and full of energy, they celebrated the event March 1 with a festival, and a representative of the press was on hand for he wrote three days later, "We have seldom been more pleased than we were on Saturday last at the festival of the Weber company which took place in commemoration of the beginning of the company. It was a brilliant affair in every way worthy of the occasion. The meeting took place at 5 o'clock at the engine house and they marched to the New York Hotel, where the best dinner we ever sat down to was spread. Every delicacy of the season was upon the table, and a bottle of champagne by the side of each plate. The dinner was given at the expense of the company. Patriotic speeches, toasts and songs were the order of the day and 'all went merry as a marriage bell.'" Their first fire occurred March 6, in a tent on the peninsula, "and the company played on the flames with their beautiful engine and saved the office of Major Hammond. The necessity of another engine was obvious to every person who witnessed the conflagration."

The organization of a second fire engine company was brought about in a curious manner. As stated, in the fire of May 5, 1851, all of the hose of the Weber engine was destroyed and the machine badly damaged. The engine was repaired, but without hose the engine was worthless. The company petitioned the council for fire hose. Their request was not heeded until they threatened to disband. Then the council sent the chief engineer to San Francisco to purchase 500 feet of fire hose. The hose was scarcer than gold, and hose could not be purchased unless you bought with it the fire engine. Then the council bought of the firm of Davis & Smith, a fire engine, the "piano" make, fire hose and hooks and ladders for $6,000. They had to take the entire outfit to get that hose, and as the hooks were a little short, the firm threw in 500 extra feet of fire hose. The engine was delivered to the city in August, 1851, and given to the Webers for their use.

Protection No. 1 Organized

After the May, 1851, fire the citizens were cautioned to be more guarded in their domestic use of the destructive element and to subscribe the necessary funds for a hook and ladder company. Several meetings were held with that object in view and November 15, 1859, C. O. Burton, at one time foreman of the company, told of its organization on that date. The meeting was held in Brown & Carlisle store on the spot where stood Scott's saddlery, (Main Street, north side, just below El Dorado). At the meeting James W. Underhill was chairman and George H. Sanderson secretary. In those days the company met at the stores of the different members, as there was no accommodations for warmth in the truck house, which was nearly opposite the Republican office (same block further west). "The truck was bought by the city from Davis & Smith, together with a little 'one-horse' red engine at a cost of $4,000. The truck of course has been greatly improved. The company was organized with twenty-eight members."

Reorganization of Weber Company

Things worked smoothly and harmoniously in the Weber Engine Company until the latter part of May, 1853. At that time there seems to have been an election of officers. The company was composed of Boston, New York and Baltimore firemen, young men who had "run mit de machine" in those cities. The chief engineer had been a New York fireman, Ned Colt was a Baltimorian, and Henry Chanfrau was a Bostonian. They had assembled at the Angelo House for the purpose of reorganizing the company. The New Yorkers wanted James Lynch as foreman of the reorganized company, but the Bostonians had selected Henry Chanfrau as their leader. They had the majority of votes and the following officers were elected, Henry Chanfrau, foreman; F. E. Pacey, first assistant, James Goodman, second assistant; John Utter, secretary and Edwin W. Colt, treasurer. The company then adopted a uniform of blue shirts trimmed with white, black trousers, black belts and blue tarpaulin hats. This uniform was not changed during their existence, except the hat for which the regular stiff leather fire hat was later substituted.

Eureka Company

The New Yorkers were much discomfited because of their defeat and nineteen of the Webers seceded, and assembling in the Angelo House two days later, June 2, organized the Eureka Company. They found as members the liveliest men in the city and before many years elapsed they found themselves one of the most popular engine companies in the state. After selecting their name they completed their organization by electing the following officers, James Lynch, foreman, Wm. B. Clark, fire assistant, Elbert Weeks, secretary and D. S. Clark, treasurer. Having completed their organization, they asked the council for the new engine that was in use by the Weber Company. This was refused them and they consented to use the pioneer machine on condition that they should have the next new engine bought by the city. In the latter part of 1853 the council set aside $4,000 for a new fine engine, and a few weeks later the council heard of an engine on sale in San Francisco. It was what was known as a Hanneman end-stroke tub engine. It was brought to the coast for Los Angeles, but the little pueblo was unable to pay for it. Chief Engineer Colt was sent to San Francisco and purchased the engine at a cost of $4,500, city script. On arrival of the machine the entire fire department turned out, and preceded by the Coggeshall brass band, they marched to the wharf. The firemen manned the ropes, and hauling the new engine to the corner of Main and Center streets, tested her water-throwing power. The new machine was turned over to the Weber Company and the Eureka took the piano engine.

The Hanneman machine was housed in a two-story brick building on Channel Street near Hunter, the lot being donated by Captain Weber. Their former engine house had been a wooden structure on the Levee where now stands the Hotel Stockton. The Hook and Ladder Company occupied the same house, but the Hooks were later located on Market Street. Where the Eureka was housed we do not know, but in 1854, a neat two-story building, costing $11,450, was erected on Hunter Street for the use of the Eureka and the Protection Hook and Ladder. The second story was handsomely fitted up by the companies, and on the eve of Washington's birthday the Eurekas gave a house-warming to all of their brother firemen and friends. It was said to be "the greatest event of the city, tables were spread with every luxury upstairs and down, and champagne flowed freely. The members spared no expense and the invited guests comprised our best citizens."

In the last month of the year the Eureka were again made happy because of the arrival of their splendid second-class Smith engine, a machine that proved to be, in their hands, the best second-class machine on the Pacific Coast. The machine had been ordered by the council of the Button & Smith Fire Engine Company, of New York, at a cost of $1,500. Shipped around Cape Horn, it arrived at San Francisco on the clipper ship Phantom late in December, '54. The engine arrived in Stockton December 28, on the steamer Cornelia, and that evening "the ceremony of receiving the new engine was the occasion of a gallant demonstration on the part of our firemen." A procession was formed and preceded by a band they again marched to the Levee and manning the engine ropes, they paraded through the principal streets, then back to the cistern, corner of Main and Center, where the throwing power of the machine was tested. Although new and working stiff, the company were well pleased with her first performance as she threw a solid stream of water seventy-five feet through the open "butt" hose and a seven-eighth inch nozzle "pipe," thirty feet higher than the flagstaff.

San Joaquin Company

Soon after the Eureka was well settled a new fire company, the San Joaquin, was organized March 12, 1855, with George Schultz as foreman. The company numbered twenty-eight men, mostly Germans, and they adopted as their uniform gray shirts, black trousers, glazed caps and black belts with the name of the company inscribed thereon. Later they adopted red shirts and in time all of the companies had fire hats. The old piano machine formerly used by No. 2 was turned over to them and it was housed in a shack of a building where now stands the Chamber of Commerce rooms on Weber Avenue. During the following year the city fathers, for $300, secured a lot two blocks east where now the present chemical engine is located and a two-story brick building was erected. This was the only company that had the proud distinction of having an alarm bell. It was purchased by subscription at a cost of $250, the German ladies donating fifty dollars of that amount from the proceeds of a ball. A bell tower was erected on the engine house and the bell installed. Alas, in loud clear tones it ne'er rang out for the bell was cracked. The company used it for several years, when it was supplanted in 1865 by a new bell weighing 480 pounds. When the new engine house, the present structure, was built, 1869, the bell was sold to a Linden church denomination.

A warm friendship existed between the firemen and the traveling theatrical companies that played in Stockton and this friendship was expressed in gifts and theatre benefits. One of the first companies to play in Stockton was the Chapman family, including their daughter Caroline, a young girl of ten or twelve years of age. In August, 1852, they tendered the firemen a benefit, the proceeds to form a fund for disabled firemen. Two days later, memorial services were held, August 14, in memory of the death of the great statesman Henry Clay. Caroline Chapman on this occasion was the guest of the firemen, riding on the Hook and Ladder truck. This so pleased the young fire fighters that they tendered the Chapmans a benefit in the Corinthian Theater on the Peninsula.

Two years later in December, 1854, the Stockton Theater was opened under the management of George Ryer, and in January, 1855, he tendered the firemen a benefit, in which Caroline Chapman volunteered her services. It was "one of the most brilliant entertainments they had ever witnessed. The firemen in their uniforms made a splendid appearance as they entered, preceded by the band playing 'Hail Columbia.'" At the conclusion of the performance Ryer responded to a certain call; as he turned to leave the stage he was met by the chief engineer, Edwin Colt, who presented Ryer with a beautiful diamond pin, in the form of a cross, and studded with eleven large diamonds and valued at $600. It was a gift from the firemen and other citizens.

At the close of the dramatic season, the firemen were again favored with a benefit, and Caroline Chapman again volunteered her services. Mrs. Chapman was called on for a speech, and leaving the stage, she returned immediately bearing in her hands three magnificent silk banners, bearing the inscription of three fire companies Weber, Eureka, and Protection Hook and Ladder, together with the date of their organization and their motto. Chief Engineer Colt received the banners and then called for three cheers for the Chapmans.

Howard Engine Company Visits Stockton

Another close friendship was that of the Stockton firemen for the firemen of other cities. The Howard Engine Company No. 3 of San Francisco visited Stockton June 19, 1855. It was one of the most notable events of that day, as the Howards were the high-toned engine company of the metropolis, and their foreman, Frank E. R. Whitney, was one of the founders of the Dashaways, a temperance society, and a temperance man, something very unusual firemen. The Howards brought with them their beautiful double-deck engine presented to them by W. D. M. Howard at a cost of $5,000, and the American Brass Band. They were given a cannon salute of fourteen guns at daylight, ten guns when the reception committee received the visitors, and minute guns were fired during the moving of the parade. About 7 o'clock the Howards were welcomed to the city by the reception committee and escorted to the Protection engine house; from there they marched to breakfast at the Weber House. At 8 o'clock there was a firemen's parade, with two bands. At 6 o'clock the entire department marched to I. Zachariah's garden on Park Street, now the asylum grounds, "where they were served with a sumptuous repast by the proprietor. The following day by invitation of Dr. R. K. Reed, the resident physician, the visitors visited the Insane Asylum. The Howards then visited the home of Dr. E. S. Holden where they were entertained and partook of a collation gotten up in the doctor's best style." The third day they returned to San Francisco on the steamer Bragdon, the Stockton department escorted them to the boat, and the Howards from the hurricane deck gave cheer after cheer for Stockton and the ladies. Arriving home late that night they were received by the First California Guard and the entire fire department of 700 firemen and escorted to their engine house. Chief Engineer Colt spared neither time nor money in entertaining the San Francisco firemen. Remembering this, a short time afterward, the company sent Chief Colt a fine fire hat valued at forty-five dollars, appropriately inscribed on the visor. On every parade Colt wore this hat, and of handsome features, commanding appearance, wearing his heavy white coat and carrying his silver speaking trumpet, he was the observed of all observers.

Eurekas Make Return Visit

Early in June, 1856, the Howards invited the Eurekas to be their guests. The Stockton firemen accepted the invitation for July 4th, as the common council had refused to appropriate any money towards a celebration here. Early in the afternoon of July 3rd the company, fifty-five in number, led by Condy's Cornet Band and escorted to the steamer by their brother firemen, were cheered all along the streets, "and their machine was as bright as a new dollar and beautifully decorated with flags, ribbons and flowers." Arriving at San Francisco, as the steamer neared the Pacific Street wharf, they were welcomed by a cannon salute fired by the French artillery company of the Vigilance Committee. They were received by the entire San Francisco fire department, numbering over 700 men, in full uniform. On landing their machine, four men were detailed from each San Francisco company to man the Eureka's engine, and the firemen paraded the streets for nearly one hour, passing each engine house during the parade. Then entertained by the Howards until 4 o'clock they were permitted to go to bed. Aroused early the following morning, for a fireman is supposed to never grow weary, they were kept going throughout the day, and that evening attended the American Theater. On Saturday the Howards and the Eureka's took the Stockton machine out for a wash, and the company at the brakes played 185 feet through an inch nozzle and 100 feet of hose; the San Francisco firemen then trying their muscle played 181 feet. That afternoon the Eureka's visited the Monumentals, the "big 6," as she was called, on Clay Street hill, the company for which the song, "The Engine House on the Hill" was composed. There a collation was given the visitors, and toasts given and songs sung. That evening the Eureka's were tendered a complimentary banquet at the American Exchange. It was one of the finest banquets ever given in San Francisco, the feast alone costing over $5,000. The bill of fare was printed on the richest of dark blue silk, in ink of pure gold. The following day, Sunday, they attended the service of the eloquent divine, Rev. Dr. Scott. On the afternoon of June 7 they returned to Stockton, escorted to the steamer Urilda by the fourteen engines and three hook and ladder companies of the metropolis. The firemen declared that they had been treated like royalty. They couldn't spend a dollar, everything was paid for in advance by the Howards.

The motto of the Stockton firemen was "Where duty calls there we obey," and they believed it their duty not only to extinguish the destructive material fires, but to inspire and encourage the fire of patriotism in every American heart. During their existence they celebrated every natal day by a parade, and every member not in line was heavily fined unless he sent a qualified substitute. The citizens were not so patriotic, and in 1852 there would have been no celebration except for the action of Protection No. 1. Appointing a committee, they solicited subscriptions for a celebration, and finally aroused the do-nothings to action. The day was ushered in by the thunder of cannon from 2 o'clock in the morning until 10 o'clock. A procession was then formed upon the plaza, comprising the Hook & Ladder Company of forty men, with their truck handsomely trimmed; the Masonic order and citizens. Marching to the Methodist Church on Washington Street, they listened to an oration by A. C. Bradford, the reading of the Declaration of Independence by J. A. Donaldson, and patriotic music by the church choir. Dinners were then provided by the different hotels and the day ended with a grand ball in the dining room of the Crescent City Hotel.

On another occasion in 1859, Minard S. Thresher, foreman of the Weber Engine Company, made a motion at the monthly meeting that they celebrate Washington's birthday with a grand ball. In support of his motion he declared that "It is one of the many duties of a representative body of citizens like the Weber Engine Company to keep alive in the community the patriotic spirit with which the fathers of our magnificent country were imbued."

Patriotic Firemen

The patriotism of the Weber Engine Company was never more emphatically expressed than in June, 1861, when the news came, April 26, by pony express, that the secessionists had fired on Fort Sumter in Charleston harbor. It was a crucial moment; the question was, are you for or against the Union? The Webers quickly answered the question by flinging to the breeze the Stars and Stripes on their magnificent flagpole, 130 feet in height, which was brought from Oregon in the rough and hewn into shape by the carpenter members of the company. It was planted in front of the engine house, a small brick building then on Channel Street near Hunter and July 2 "a reunion was held and a celebration over the raising of a beautiful flag with streamers over their pole and the clinking of glasses was continually heard." The pole was topped by a tin fireman's hat four feet across. The flag was 16x30 feet with streamers 60 feet.

The Channel Street engine house was altogether too small for the housing of the steam engine purchased in 1863, and the common council erected for them a new and much larger engine house one block west. In lowering the flagpole to remove it to the new location, it got away from the workmen and falling with a crash, the smaller half was splintered into a thousand pieces. The company then sent to Oregon for another pole and splicing it with iron bands, the pole 120 feet in length, was replanted in the center of the street, and surmounted with a galvanized weather vane representing a steam engine. Some four years later a boy of twelve years climbed the pole and reefed the halyards. It was a dangerous feat and for his work he was well rewarded by the company. This was the tallest, and the only ground-planted flagpole south of Sacramento, save that on Banner Island. It could be seen many miles distant from any direction and with the flag and streamers flying, on a clear day, it was a beautiful and inspiring sight. The pole had a tragic ending. On February 9, 1870, a strong sou'wester was blowing with increasing violence; "during the gale windmills were upset, shingles blown from houses, and the Weber flagstaff fell to the earth with a crash, the pole crushing through the roof of the Corinthian Building into the room occupied by Charles Walner, the musician."

First Steam Fire Engine

The invention of the steam fire engine caused a complete change in the method of extinguishing fires, especially in big cities, where they had proven themselves to be far superior to the hand-power fire engines. San Francisco had purchased a steam engine and found it first class in every respect. This was in 1860 and the Webers had sold their Hanne-man engine for $1,200 to parties in Pacheco, Contra Costa County, and were undecided for a time whether to purchase a double hand engine or a steam fire engine. In the company there were several first-class machinists and steam engineers and they recommended that the company purchase a steam fire engine, as it could do a greater amount of work, throw a heavier stream of water a greater distance and work all day or night without tiring. They had not figured, however, on getting the heavy steamer to the fire by hand power nor the muddy condition of the streets in winter. The city appropriated some $2,000 and the company sent on an order to Levy & Neaffie of Philadelphia for a second class steam fire engine at a cost of $4,000. The engine was shipped around Cape Horn in a flying clipper and it arrived in Stockton late in December, 1862, and during the month the engine was set up by William Keep, proprietor of the Globe Foundry.

The trial of the machine that was to work wonders in putting out a fire was to be tested New Year's day, 1863. The trial was the talk of the town, for it was quite a novelty to have an engine playing upon a fire. On that day the Webers in full uniform proudly marched to the Levee pulling the steamer, soon to be deeply humiliated by a long delay in getting up steam. The fire in the boiler furnace was lighted and the crowd expected to see something wonderful. The smoke rolled out of the stack in volumes, but the engine would not make steam sufficient to start the flywheel. Then the hand engine firemen began to laugh and joke the Webers about their wonderful steam engine. Finally the engineers found out the trouble; the firemen had used pine burrs in lighting the fire and they had choked up the smoke stack with soot and the steamer had no draft. Taking off the smoke stack and cleaning it out they again lit the fire using less smoky material, and the engine was soon playing two heavy streams of water. The engine had been tested at the factory and threw a stream of water 245 feet.

The trials and tribulations of the Webers had just commenced, for the little brick engine house on Channel Street was too small to accommodate the engine and the company was compelled to house her in the wooden coach house of Fisher & Company's stage stable, a block to the east. The company petitioned the council for a new and larger engine house, but the city fathers replied that they had no money for that purpose. The Webers threatened to disband and then the council got busy and passed an ordinance for an election, the citizens to vote upon the question of the council issuing bonds to the amount of $5,300 for the erection of an engine house. The citizens voted the bonds by a heavy majority. Captain Weber deeded the city a lot on Channel Street just north of the water front and the building was erected and dedicated May 19, 1864. The company with great ceremony hauled the steamer and their four-wheeled hose carriage to its new headquarters. That evening they had a collation and a dance in the new hall of the second-story of the building. The hall was handsomely fitted up at the company's expense.

The steam fire engine was a complete failure as a fire extinguisher and an elephant on their hands for several years, because they had no means of quickly reaching the fire during the summer and in winter it was useless because of the condition of the streets. At an alarm of fire the members would run several blocks to the engine house and, already "winded," they would undertake to hasten to the fire with their heavy engine, perhaps a run of a half mile or more. Many a time have we seen the Webers "running" to a fire on a walk, the men being completely exhausted. Ofttimes the Eureka and San Joaquin would reach a small fire and extinguish it before the Webers arrived. The members could not afford to use horse power to haul their steamer; the city could not provide it as the other three companies could demand horses and so they were the laughing stock of the community until March, 1870. Then they employed Charles Ashley, a farmer, at $100 per month to furnish two horses, live in the engine house and drive the team to every fire. Then the tables were turned and the Webers had the laugh on the hand engines.

Another handicap of the steamer was the scarcity of water, for at that time there were no fire hydrants. Few fires burned any length of time, most of them wooden one-story buildings, when the Webers with their two powerful streams began playing upon the flames. The only water source was the fire well or cisterns dug at the intersection of four streets or the Stockton or Mormon channels. The steamer exhausted a fire well in about ten minutes, while it would supply a hand engine from two to three hours, flowing in almost as fast as it was pumped out. These cisterns were from fifteen to twenty feet in depth and about fifteen feet square. They were walled up first with three-inch plank and later with brick at a cost of from $200 to $400. They were placed along the principal streets of the city, and the outlying residences had no protection whatever from fire. In a far distant fire the first engine to arrive would set at the cistern, run off their hose and play into the second engine and she into the third engine, which played upon the fire. In this manner the companies would play upon a fire a half mile distant from the nearest fire well.

Although the Weber was at all times speedy in reaching a fire during the dry season, in the winter season they were no better off than in the hand hauling days, for galloping the horses over the good streets, the minute they hit the mud the animals were winded, and the driver was compelled to stop and let them rest.

After a time the Weber steamer, which was the second steam fire engine on the Pacific Coast, became antiquated and out of date and in 1874, at a cost of $4,200 the company purchased a second class Amoskeag steamer. The "Old Betsey," as she was called, was then used for all kinds of purposes, pumping out cellars, sprinkling streets, and taken to the islands at one time to extinguish a peat fire. The engine, although forty years old, did fine work at the pavilion fire in 1902 and is now in the city corporation yard, ready at any time to fight her old enemy, the fire fiend.

Members of Weber Engine Company

The names of these who gave their time and money freely for the protection of the city should be remembered and I here submit the names of the Weber Engine Company, together with their occupations as I remember them: H. F. Horn, saddletree maker; John A. Balthis, Joshua Barstow, John W. Hart, Robert W. Howes, William H. Derrick, blacksmiths; M. J. Jerry, John Sirey, Henry Robinson and Thomas K. Hook, carpenters; I. V. Leffler, hotel keeper; John W. Root, wagon-maker; J. H. Hogan, Frank T. Baldwin, attorneys; George M. Doll, George S. Ladd, merchants; L. E. Yates, stable keeper; Charles G. Earnest, tinsmith; Sol Salsman, harnessmaker; Charles E. Pinkham, J. H. Barney, Dan Meader and George A. Brown, bookkeepers; R. W. Keltie, stage proprietor; John Gross, hotel-keeper; John Crofton, constable; Amos Durant, laundryman; John Goode, painter; John Barker, cattle dealer; Charles Brutchy, saloon-keeper; William Jackson, R. J. Patterson, Ben

F. Sanborn, Charles Schneider, W. H. Briggs, A. Enders, A. Levy, George Devoll, D. K. Hienbonch, Tom. Donecliff, E. Jeffers, F. A. Taylor, C. E. Taylor, William Applegate, W. O. Cutler, L. Weingath, H. B. Babcock, Ed Stockel, Fred Valentine, R. M. Jersey, T. H. Bridge, John Brown, Andrew Hansen, M. S. and Thomas Thresher and John Ziegler.

The Weber Hose Company

In the earlier days of the fire department, each hand engine was accompanied by a two-wheeled hose cart carrying, on a reel, about 600 feet of leather hose. After the purchase of steam fire engines by the Weber and the Eureka they used the same style of hose cart, drawn by a horse, each cart carrying about 1,000 feet of heavy duck lined rubber hose. Early on the morning of September 10, 1877 an alarm of fire was turned in and Charles Ashley, the Weber engine driver, rapidly drove to the fire. He was followed by Frank Kinsley, a young man of some twenty years of age, driving "old Bob," the hose horse. In the darkness he was thrown from the cart by some obstruction and falling under the wheel his leg and thigh were so badly crushed that he died the following day. This was the first tragedy in the Stockton Fire Department. His funeral was attended by the entire department together with an escort from the Stockton Guards, of which he was a member.

At this time both companies had auxiliary hose carriages which were manned by young volunteers from fifteen to twenty years of age. They were four-wheeled carriages, beautiful in design and costing each company from $1,200 to $1,500 each. The Weber Hose Company was organized in January, 1875, and disbanded in February, 1879. The company elected as its first officers, E. F. Foran, president; Charles M. Weber, Jr., foreman; Henry Eshbach, assistant foreman; E. J. Walker, secretary; Henry Wolf, treasurer, and Eli Confer, Mathew Crane and Frank Eck, committee on investigation. The company included such young fellows as Otto Grunsky, Wm. W. Westbay, Charles Starkey, John Boice, Lincoln Ruggles, Robert Furry, Frank Adams, Otto Vogelsang and William Sanders. So enthusiastic a fireman was the last named member, he would ride his little white pony to the engine house and assist, with the pony, in starting the hose carriage.

Eureka Hose Company

The Eureka Hose Company, organized December 4, 1868, comprised young men of about the same age as those of No. 1. Both hose companies were assisted by their proteges, and and on the occasion of the Eureka's visit to San Jose, June 2, 1873, in celebration of their anniversary, they were accompanied by the Eureka Hose Company. The Eureka took with them their fine steamer and two beautiful iron gray horses and were much admired in the Garden City. The foreman of the hose company, John P. Kafitz, a young man about twenty years of age, acted as drum major for the brass band that had accompanied the Eureka; the son of a boot and shoe maker, he was very popular with all classes of citizens, and so successful was he in his new position the Eureka presented him with a complete drum major's uniform at a cost of $150. The presentation was made in Mozart hall on the evening of July 3, about fifty of his friends being present. The presentation was made by A. B. Bennett, and the following day, leading the parade, in his gorgeous uniform, he was admired by thousands of people. Five years later, November 21, 1878, his death from tuberculosis was mourned by thousands of people. He was a member of the military, a major on the staff of General Canavan, Third Brigade, N. G. C., a member of several secret societies, and second assistant engineer of Eureka No. 2. The funeral services at the Presbyterian Church were conducted by the Rev. Martin Post of the Congregational, and Rector Elias Birdsall of the Episcopal Church, with Mrs. Gertrude Starbird, Flora Phelps, J. Le Rose Phelps and Charles E. Pinkham in the choir and Ivan Carmichael at the organ.

The Gallant Young Firemen

Some ten years previous to the organization of the hose companies, there were two youngster fire companies between the ages of eight and twelve years, the Young Americas and the Vansyckles. George Kroh, a carpenter and a genius, then residing with his parents next to the Birdsall Foundry, on San Joaquin Street, in 1859 made a small box engine and placed therein a double cylinder pump, which he had manufactured in the foundry. It was what was known as a garden pump. George Kroh was a member of Weber Engine Company No. 1 and organized a company of boys, took charge of the little engine and named it Young America. The Young Americas were the principal attraction in the 4th of July procession that year.

The Eureka not to be outclassed by their rivals, the following year formed a similar company. Some two years previous, J. M. Vansyckle, agent of Wells Fargo & Co. and a member of No. 2, had presented them with a small fire engine about three feet high and five feet long, which had been imported from New York by the express company to protect their building in case of fire. It would throw a stream of water similar to our garden hose of today. The Eureka accepted the gift, repainted it, and named it Vansyckle. The two little fire companies were in the 4th of July parades and in that of 1863, there was no more prouder boy than the author, in his glazed cap, black trousers, red shirt, and patent leather belt with the word Vansyckle on it. The Young Americas wore the same uniform except their shirts were white. The Independent, in writing of the celebration said, "A number of young lads in this city have organized an engine company and they will appear in the 4th of July parade, the Eureka Engine Company having given them control of the little engine Vansyckle. The boys have elected George R. Sanderson, foreman, Edgar Whitney, assistant foreman, Charles Williams, secretary, Calvin Baldwin, treasurer. The other members are George Warfield, Frank Wilkins, Harry Housman, Gilbert Don, John Clowes, John Housman, Charles Weber, Frank King, George H. Tinkham, Edgar Sanderson, Andrew Chase and George Rappel."

The highest ambition of a fireman was to arrive first at the fire, "get on first water" and play a greater distance than their brother companies. In this the Eureka were ever ready and they elected so far as possible active, vigilant men. They obtained as members nearly all of the draymen in the city; these men, with their two-wheel drays, would put their horses on a gallop for the engine house at an alarm of fire and jumping from their drays would man the ropes. Sometimes they would throw the rope over a dray stake and up the street the engine would roll, the two men on the engine tongue trying to keep their feet to say nothing of guiding the engine. So eager were the men to have their engine in working order, they had monthly drills or "washes" as they were called, and on Saturday evening at 4 o'clock they would go to the channel and for a half hour or more work their engine.

In order to encourage these engine playing contests the state fair directors gave premiums for the best playing. In 1857 the State Fair was held at Stockton and engine playing contests took place between the three Stockton companies and the Monumental No. 6 of San Francisco and the Young America of Sacramento. The Fair directors gave silver trumpets for the best first, second and third class engine playing, the engines to play through 100 feet of hose open butt without any pipe, one stream with a 1¼ inch nozzle and two streams with a 7⁄8 inch nozzle. The only second-class engines in the contest were the Stockton machines, and the Webers played open butt 23 feet, one stream, 155 feet, and two streams, 158 feet. The Eureka played 34 feet open butt, 157 feet, one stream, and 156 feet, two streams. The San Joaquins played 19-15-160 feet. The judges declared the playing a tie. The San Joaquins and Webers refused to make another trial and five days later, the Eureka's playing alone threw a stream of water 157.5 inches and the judges awarded them the silver trumpet.

The following year visiting the State Fair at Marysville, the Eureka's had a hard experience. They left Stockton August 24 in the steamer Gazelle accompanied by Condy's band and a number of citizens. The steamer arrived at Sacramento about 7 o'clock that evening and they were entertained by the firemen of that city. Embarking the following morning, about forty miles above Sacramento the Gazelle struck a snag in the river, and leaking badly, to keep her from sinking, the Eureka's were compelled to work their engine throughout the day and a part of the night. Fortunately another steamer came along and the company transferred to her and late that night landed at Marysville. The contest was over before the arrival of the Eureka's. The Marysville firemen insisted on the Eureka's giving an exhibition of her playing powers, and after the gravel which she sucked up from the river had been cleaned from the engine the machine threw a powerful stream 197 feet. It was a greater distance than two of the first-class machines had played. Returning again to Sacramento on the Gazelle, which had been repaired, they were again entertained by their brother firemen in Sacramento, then leaving about 4:30, after a slow trip, they arrived at Stockton after a twelve hours' run, and found that the firemen here had been waiting all night to receive the home comers. They were welcomed home by a cannon salute, skyrockets and a big bonfire. Marching to the Eureka's house the band playing and the men cheering, they housed the engine and then proceeded to Webers where a collation was spread, then visiting the San Joaquins there was another eat, the affair ending with another feast in the Protection Hook and Ladder house.

The members of the Eureka engine company at this time were Solomon Pearsall, foreman; Wm. R. Jefferson, first assistant foreman; Edward Hickinbotham, second assistant foreman; B. P. Baird, B. F. Boutell, Henry Blum, Geo. W. Aylesworth, D. W. Blackleach, Louis E. Chicard, Thomas Cunningham, Mark Dugan, C. H. Huffman, C. D. Bryan, W. M. Coombs, E. A. Everett, John T. Hickinbotham, John T. Boice, Samuel Elliott, Wm. Graham, A. M. Gray, John Flynn, John Kerr, Henry Hodgkins, C. S. Cook, Elbert Weeks, R. B. Lane, T. W. Newell, A. S. Rider, James Ruddick, Thomas McWha, Mark Sellig, Jerome Myers, Geo. L. Sanderson, R. E. Wilhoit, James Middleton, Geo. Taber, Fred Schaffer, E. T. Spafford, Dennis Mehan, Joseph T. Scott, Robert Kerr, C. McCausland, H. Stewart, Henry Trembley, J. M. Swain, Fred Moebus, Nicholas McKensie, T. J. Smith, Delos Manning, J. C. Oben, Thomas Eckstrom, F. H. Lewissen, Joseph Long, Dan Lucas, Thomas Greneir, Christopher Lyons, Thomas J. Keyes, Frank Morse and John Shea.

The coming and the parting of friends is today but a momentary event, for we have almost annihilated time and distance, but in the other days the departure of friends meant perhaps a return no more. Such perhaps was the thought of the Eureka's when it was announced by W. B. Clark in January, 1853, that he was going to Portland, Ore., to reside. He was one of Stockton's oldest citizens and he had been the foreman of the company for several years. Assembling at the engine house the company tendered him a bountiful collation, which ended with the presentation to him of a beautiful California gold ring. Then manning the engine ropes, he was escorted to the steamer by his friends and cheer after cheer greeted his departure.

Two of the most popular firemen in the department, regardless of their Eureka membership, were Henry Hodgkins and Samuel Baldwin, and when it was announced that they would depart for the east November 17, 1858, there was quite a stir in the city. The press stated that "Our city was thrown into considerable confusion yesterday by the announcement that two of our oldest citizens, Henry Hodgkins and Sam Baldwin, would depart for the East. They go to New York and from thence Mr. Hodgkins will go to England. Champagne and various drinks were the order of the day and at the Eureka engine house, which was thrown open for the reception of friends, Mr. Hodgkins was presented with a beautiful gold ring. At two o'clock Mr. Baldwin's friends at the 'Shade' made him a present of a gold watch chain. At the appointed hour the friends of both gentlemen, both prominent Eureka's, assembled at the engine house and marched from there to the steamer. As the Helen Hensley left the wharf cheer after cheer greeted the two travelers and the wish for a pleasant voyage and a speedy return." This journey was taken by steamer, then the only way. After several months Mr. Hodgkins returned to Stockton, and again went East in July, 1869, by railroad. He was accompanied by Henry Robinson, who went to Massachusetts, and George Weller, to Dayton, Ohio. Mr. Hodgkins before his departure for England "gave a farewell dinner to his friends and bumpers of champagne were drank to the long life and future happiness of the host."

Marshall Hook and Ladder

The necessity of a hook and ladder company is much like that of an extra tire on an automobile, you may have no use for it for several years and you may need it badly most any time. The use of ladders and truck is twofold, to save life from high buildings and to carry aloft the hose lines. Here in Stockton we had no building over two stories in height until twenty-five years ago, hence no need of ladders for that kind of work. The only use made of the truck and apparatus was to rake over the burned hay from incendiary fires, of which there were many. The city fathers refused to purchase a new and up to date truck for Protection No. 1, so they were compelled to be contented with the old antiquated affair until 1883. At that time Oscar Marshall, who was reared in Stockton, invented an extension ladder-truck. "It is a valuable invention, doing its work in the most satisfactory manner," said the inventor's friends. It was manufactured at the wagon-shop of F. Miller, and was 34 feet in length and 9 feet in height from the street to the top of the ladders. The ladders could be extended 60 feet by ropes and pulleys, more in number than on a river schooner. Marshall had a pull in politics and had a special friend in James H. Budd, so the council bought the truck at a cost of $2,800. It was the joke of the town because in making use of the truck it was necessary to stop and back it up to the sidewalk. As time-saving at a fire is just as necessary in raising ladders as in hose work, the truck was of no practical value. The only incident worth recording is that it caused the death of a young fireman, David Ferrill, September 2, 1890. The young man, in running to a fire, attempted to jump upon the running board of the truck, then drawn by horses, his foot slipped and falling to the street the rear wheel passed over him, badly crushing his body and he died a few minutes later. The city kept this apparatus until 1895, at which time they purchased an up-to-date Babcock truck. With this truck it is possible to run alongside of a burning building and raise the ladder 60 feet within a minute and a half, and supporting two firemen on the top round of the ladder, swing round in a three-quarter circle.

Protection Hook and Ladder

Ever ready, ever willing to do all within their power to save life and property these were the members of Protection Hook and Ladder No. 1 in 1858: S. T. Nye, foreman; David Porter, assistant foreman; Benjamin R. Lippincott, H. M. Fanning, Charles P. Greeley, John P. Nash, Harry Hubbard, M. L. Bird, Henry B. Underhill, E. E. Kenney, E. B. Whitman, Charles A. Potter, C. O. Burton, Charles A. Hutchinson, Wm. B. Losee, Wm. H. Nowell, Wm. Harper, Geo. Kroh, David G. Oullahan, John H. Tucker, Wallace Tinkham, Edward Hickman, Thomas R. Moseley, Royal

B. Parker, Charles A. Mead, Louis M. Hickman, J. M. Conley, Henry H. Hewlett, J. P. Stockwell, Samuel Geddes, Geo. H. Sanderson, Elisha Lyons, John Fox, John L. Woodman, Hart Littebrant, Charles Jones, Robert W. Miller, A. L. Bours, Henry Grimbel, F. L. Sargent, Wm. Sanders, Elbert J. Smith, L. Howard and Wm. Chiten.

Eureka Serenaders

The pioneers had no methods of congratulating their newly married friends except the instrumental and vocal serenade and the barbaric charivari. The Eureka serenaders employed both in congratulating their brother firemen in their matrimonial ventures. In 1856 they presented their secretary, Rufus B. Lane, with a handsome and costly pin which he proudly wore during his life. Deserting his bachelor friends in October, 1859, he married Miss Jennie Hodgkins, the sister of Henry Hodgkins. About ten o'clock that night the Eurekas silently marched to the home, accompanied by a cornet band and tendered their secretary and his bride a serenade. Some two hours later they again appeared "and the firing of the cannon, which they had hauled to the house on a dray, shook all the glass in the neighborhood for blocks around; awoke all the babies in town and set the dogs howling. Then followed the usual uproar of trumpets, bells, tin cans, the old fiddle and other hideous instruments, until the bride and groom appeared at the door and invited the crowd in to take something."

In 1860 there was another seceder from the bachelor ranks, Alfred S. Rider, the biggest fireman in the company, who weighed over 200 pounds and later reached nearly 300. He was one of the eight "Pioneers" who, uniformed in their dark blue coats, black trousers, fire hats and white leather belts, marched abreast ahead of the Eurekas in every parade, carrying on their shoulder genuine heavy broad-axes. They "blazed the trail" and looked very ferocious to the youngsters. He was married October 11, to Miss Sarah McLellan and early in the evening he was given a fine serenade by the band. Assembling at the engine house about eleven o'clock, "they had with them all kinds of ingenious ear torturing instruments, including three bass drums, two snare drums, a fife and a good performer, a church bell, fish bells, cow bells and the cannon which they had loaded upon a dray. Proceeding to the Crescent City Hotel they began their unearthly racket, firing the cannon several times during the 'serenade' and after the boys had pounded and blown until nearly exhausted, the bridegroom appeared and introduced his bride. A procession was then formed and corralling the bridegroom all hands marched to Sol Pearsal's saloon, where the champagne flowed freely."

Another serenade, quite discomfoting to the recipient was that to Louis M. Hickman, who had just married Mary Dallas, the oldest daughter of Charles Dallas. On the night of their marriage the firemen and other friends appeared before their residence on West Oak Street to give the married couple a serenade. The house was dark, the bridegroom endeavoring to make the serenaders believe no one was at home. But they had kept track of his movements and began their unearthly noise, beat their tin cans, fired pistols, set off fire-crackers, whirled their wooden rackets and yelled for the bridegroom until they were exhausted. The bridegroom was a haughty young man and opposed to serenades when he was the object of them. It was a clear case of stubbornness on the bridegroom's part and victory or death on the part of the Eureka's. On each side of their engine was the motto "We aim to conquer." Going to the engine house, they hauled the machine to the cistern near the home and began playing a stream of water through the window. Did the happy couple appear? They did in short order and the bridegroom treated the crowd, but he never forgave them.

Double-Deck Engines

When in 1859, the Webers were planning to purchase a second-class steam fire engine, weighing three and a half tons, and draw it by man power, the Eureka's voted to order a first-class hand engine with a weight less than one-third that of the Weber steamer. We have already noted the wisdom of their choice. Subscriptions were obtained from the members to the amount of $2,000, an English opera company gave them a benefit netting $150, and in November they ordered a first class end-stroke machine from Jeffries & Co., Pawtucket, R. I. At the same time an engine of similar make was ordered for the San Joaquin Engine Company. The engines arrived early in December, 1860, having been shipped around Cape Horn, and were set up and ready for a trial wash on Christmas day. The cost of the two machines was $7,500, the Eureka's engine costing $500 extra because of finer woodwork and finish. The box of the San Joaquin engine was mahogany and the trimmings brass. The Eureka engine was a beauty, as handsome an engine as was ever seen in the state. The box was rosewood so highly polished that it reflected like a mirror. The trimmings were of German silver and inlaid with pearl. The machine would play four streams of water, two from each side with sixty men at the brakes. It was known as a double-decker because twenty men, ten on each side, worked the brakes standing on decks or platforms on top of the box. As a powerful water-playing machine the new engine was not a success for several reasons; the older members, exempt after five years' service, according to state law, had retired; the draying business was now confined to a few four-wheeled drays; the teamsters had gone out of business because of the coming of the railroad. Many of these men belonged to the company. Quite a number had joined the army, among them Sol Pearsall, the foreman of the Eureka's. Monthly washes had been discontinued and a sufficient number of men could not be assembled at one time to bring out the full power of the new machine. The competition between the two companies was somewhat enlivened when the Webers attached horses to their engine steamer, as they would oftentimes arrive first at the fire. To offset this the Eureka's purchased a horse and harness, kept the animal near the engine house and employed a young man to ride him to the fire, hauling the machine. It was amusing to see the engine rolling up the street, the horse on the jump, and the engine-tongue men having all they could do to keep their feet, to say nothing of guiding the engine.

Hand power versus horse power is a losing game, and the leading Eureka's soon learned that unless they bestirred themselves the company would go to pieces. The men would run to a fire and work hard at the engine brakes perhaps an hour or more, with their rivals, the Webers, standing around and looking at their steamer doing the work of extinguishing the flames and this, of course, was very discouraging for No. 2. The Eureka's had at this time a member named A. B. Bennett, a man of good education, quite an executive, and he, with others, in 1871, organized the Eureka Association. The circular sent out by them read as follows: "The prime object of this association is the creation of a fund to be devoted to the purchase of a steam fire engine for the use of Eureka No. 2, to be employed in the service of the fire department of Stockton. The capital stock of the association is fixed at $6,000, divided into 1,200 shares of $5.00 each, to be aided by such voluntary contributions, in the form of donations from insurance companies and other sources as may offer in aid of the enterprise. For eighteen years our motto has been, 'We aim to conquer,' and so long as vigilance and unaided muscle were opposed to us, the contest was equal, and the Eureka's were considered no common foe. There is not a man who has served in the company's ranks that is not proud of his record; but it will soon become a thing of the past and be forgotten unless, as in other days, we prove ourselves equal to any emergency."

This stirring appeal had its effect and in a short time stock sufficient was sold to warrant the company in ordering an engine. The design of the machine, one that would be superior in every respect to any second class steam engine on the coast, was planned and blue-prints made by A. B. Bennett. These plans were sent on to Jeffries & Co., Pawtucket, R. I., with instructions to build the best engine that could be made. The engine was landed in Stockton December 6, 1872, at a cost of \$6,000, nearly \$2,000 more than the regular brass-trimmed engine. The machine was worth it, as steam could be raised in her boilers from cold water in less than five minutes, and in an exhibition play July 4, 1874, through 100 feet of hose and $1\frac{1}{4}$ nozzle-pipe and drawing water through 7 feet of suction hose she played a stream of water 295 feet. This is a distance scarcely exceeded by the present day auto pumps.

The company purchased three large, handsome iron-gray horses through their foreman, Thomas Cunningham, and as soon as the engine went into service, two horses were attached to the engine, and one animal to the hose cart. The engine driver was Charles Thompson, the horse cart driver, Fernando Lastreto. Then the old rivalry between No. 1 and No. 2 was renewed, but it was not the man to man contest of the old days and hence the charm and the interest was gone. It was simply a race of horse against horse in answer to the fire alarm and not always honestly driven. On one occasion, in a collision, a horse's leg was broken and he was later killed. Then the chief engineer was compelled to make certain rules regarding their speed to a fire, and under no conditions must the head engine cut out the rear machine.

For many years all three companies celebrated their anniversary days by picnics, balls and excursions, but particularly attractive was the celebration of the anniversary day of the Eureka No. 2 under the slogan "The Day We Celebrate." It was in fact a small 4th of July celebration and was anticipated with pleasure by many citizens. The company made every effort to make each picnic a success and they were assisted in their work by all classes of citizens. Sometimes the picnic was held jointly with the other companies, but in the main they were celebrated by the Eureka alone.

On June 2, 1869, a salute of seventeen guns awoke the town at 6 o'clock, and ushered in the "day we celebrate." Flags were flying from all of the engine houses and many private buildings; the Eureka engine house was decorated from top to bottom. At 9 o'clock the members in full uniform and the exempt members in citizens' dress assembled at the engine house on Hunter Street. Forming in line, the stalwart Pioneers, marching eight abreast, with their broad-axes, led the parade, followed by Schmidt's Cornet Band, the Eureka Exempts and fifty-six firemen hauling their "new engine, beautifully ornamented, glistening like silver in the sun." Then came the Eureka hose boys with the handsomely decorated four-wheel hose carriage. After parading the streets the company halted at Park and California streets and there took conveyances for Good Water Grove. As the twilight hour drew near the company and their friends returned to the city. The Eureka were met at Park Street by the entire fire department in full uniform, with their engines and escorted into town. Then took place a magnificent scene, one that in this day cannot be reproduced. Each fireman had been provided with a flambeau and plenty of Roman candles, "and as each company turned from California into Main Street, the real carnival of fire began. The street was ablaze with Roman candles shooting red, white and blue fires all along the line and these but increased the beauty of the glistening machine and the varied colors of the firemen's uniforms and fire hats. But it was on the plaza that pandemonium broke loose. The lurid glare of the torches, the shrill scream of the engine whistles, the shooting stars of the Roman candles, the deafening detonation of the bombs and the whole scene was made weird by two immense bonfires vying with the moon for the supremacy of light."

In 1883 the company held their picnic at Agricultural Park, and it was a picnic long remembered by those present, because of its novel feature, a clambake. We have had several meat barbecues before and since that date but a clambake, never before and once only since that time. The picnic was the talk of the town for several days. To superintend the affair an expert clam baker, Dexter from Sausalito was engaged, and three tons of clams, ten sacks of potatoes, thirty dozen crabs, 180 pounds of fish were shipped here from San Francisco, together with three tons of seaweed, rocks and many other things necessary for a successful clambake. At five o'clock the fire bell rang out to awaken the citizens, and at 9 o'clock the members of the Eureka Engine Company began assembling at the engine house. Forming a procession and led by the band, the company marched the streets and then took carriages for the park. Four tables were set, each table seating 400 persons, and over 2,000 persons were present.

Decoration of Graves

The annual decoration of the graves of the county in 1869 by the members of the Grand Army of the Republic, and other organizations soon adopted the custom. It was no surprise to see secret organizations observe Memorial Day, but to see a fire company observe the day was indeed a surprise, for in their rough, exciting life of a fireman, the dead were forgotten, but many of the firemen were big-hearted and were as sympathetic and tender-hearted in their natures as any child. We had an illustration of this in the Eureka's soon after their organization. A charter member of the company went to Merced in 1855, and there took sick, died and was buried. In the spring of 1856, as soon as traveling would permit, a delegation of three members went to Merced, brought the body to Stockton, as they presumed, and he was buried with all of the honors of a fireman. Unfortunately they learned later that the wrong body had been brought to this city and that Williams' body was interred with only a pile of stones as a headstone.

The custom of decorating the graves of deceased firemen was first observed by the Eureka's in 1880. It was probably brought about by the death March 18, 1878, of Thomas Ecstrom, an ex-foreman, and a citizen admired by all classes for his beautiful character of always striving to make others happy. Greatly respected by the company, in 1871, they presented him with a beautiful gold watch. Assembling at their engine house on June 13, 1880, the members marched to Rural Cemetery preceded by a band and followed by a large wagon loaded with flowers. Arriving at the cemetery they halted at the grave of John A. McDougall, an ex-foreman, who had been accidentally killed by a shotgun wound January 13, 1879. Thomas Cunningham addressed those present, stating that the Eureka's intended to decorate the graves of the deceased members annually on the second Sunday in June. A short address was then delivered by Attorney Joseph C. Campbell and the firemen then decorated the graves of twenty-six members, among them the graves of Elbert Weeks, died in 1868; John Schrieck, died in 1870; W. W. Hatch, 1872; Geo. Fox, 1872; Thomas Ecstrom, 1878; Julius Steiney, 1878; John P. Kafitz, 1878; and John McDougal; six of the number were in the Catholic cemetery. In 1881, at the grave of Thomas Ecstrom exercises were more extended, they were begun by Otis Perrine as master of ceremonies, prayer by Dr. J. M. McKaig, oration James A. Louttit, remarks by A. B. Bennett and singing by the quartette, J. Le Rose Phelps, Albert Ecstrom, S. D. Waterman and Charles E. Pinkham. Later the Eureka's united with the Grand Army in a general Memorial day, in which they were joined by the entire fire department. The Eureka's then purchased from the cemetery trustees a plot of land 30x50 feet for the burial of their dead, and paid in advance for its perpetual care. In this plot are buried sixteen of their members, among them that of A. B. Bennett, with a marble tombstone surmounted by a carved fireman's hat. The most notable grave of these past protectors of the city property is that of Wm. W. Lee, a West Indian negro, who died September 9, 1877. Lee kept a barber shop on the Levee, was not a regular member of the company, but he was so faithful in attending all fires and making himself useful in many ways that they elected him an honorary member and buried him with all the honors of a fireman, the company paying all of the funeral expenses.

In the cemeteries nearly all of the firemen now lie asleep and no fire bell can awaken them from their slumbers; but there was a time when its first sound would find them hurrying to their engine houses to roll out their machine. The old historic bell which tolled out the death of Presidents Lincoln, Garfield, McKinley, and the death of every fireman; that ushered in at sunrise many a Fourth of July; that rang out the opening of the Agricultural Fair; that rejoiced with the people in every Union victory, and that has told the passing of time since 1868 is now in the tower over the Hunter Street engine house. The bell weighs 1881 pounds and was made by Wm. Hooper & Company of Boston, Mass., at a cost of $850. The fire department had long been demanding that the city council purchase a bell, and they asserted that in the fire of July, 1855, half of the property could have been saved if they had had a bell to awaken the fireman. Another fire occurred in October, 1859, with a loss of $15,000 in hay, horses and stage coaches, and it was suggested that persons be hired to ring the four church bells in case of fire. In the following year the council presented a proposition to the citizens to permit them to appropriate $3,000 for the purchase of a fire bell, the erection of a tower on the court house and placing an iron post chain fence around the city half of the court house block. It carried by a vote of 261 to 23. Two weeks later J. P. D. Wilkins and Moses Thresher, representing the city and the fire department, went to San Francisco to buy a bell. On the suggestion of the chief engineer of San Francisco they purchased a large bell. It was fortunate that they did for the bell could be heard in any part of the city, and during a strong wind has been heard fifteen miles distant. The contract for erecting the tower and installing the bell was awarded to James Brown on his contract of $1,125. The tower was seventy-nine feet to top of dome and built with four clock faces, the bell being fifty feet from the ground. In 1886 the clock and bell were removed to the Eureka engine house and a tower erected. The tower was not strongly built and it was declared by experts that the walls were too weak to stand the strain of the swinging bell, so its usefulness as a fire alarm bell was at an end. They began erecting high buildings which cut off the sound, and then a sliding steam fire whistle was installed November 25, 1892. It made such an unearthly screeching that the present whistle was installed.

Babcock Chemical Engine

The San Joaquin Engine Company was the goat of the department and was always in the third place until they received their Babcock engine, with two horses attached. Then they gave the entire department the laugh, for with their light running machine they frequently would arrive and extinguish a small fire before the big, heavy steamers were in sight. At the time the Eureka received their steam fire engine, the San Joaquins planned to purchase a steamer. To obtain the money they started a lottery scheme with over 300 valuable gifts. The citizens bought hundreds of tickets, but when the company called for an accounting, their secretary, Eugene Lehe, could show no money. They had no evidence whatever as to the disappearance of the coin and the company was compelled to pay out hundreds of dollars to the ticket holders. Some two years later the value of chemicals as a fire extinguisher was discovered and the Babcock chemical engine invented. The San Joaquins had a special engine made and it arrived in August, 1873. The machine had a carrying capacity of 180 gallons, and carrying 250 feet of hose, would throw a stream of carbolic gas and water 125 feet. The engine weighed 2,500 pounds and cost $5,000. They later had a larger chemical of the improved pattern, which they used until the organization of the paid department. The first members of the company were Frank Selnacht, Charles F. Wurstler, Rudolph Gnekow, A. Kolberg, Anton Seibert, Jacob Schrack, J. G. Gilgert, John Siler, John Minges, Herman Haupt, Joseph Kahn, Stephen Bergin, Henry Nelson, Max Magner, Jacob Meyer, Simon Wetreau, Michael Schuler, Phillip Umlauf, John Brandt, Henry Mayer, Wm. Kahn, August Williams, John Gunther, Ludwick Gerlach, John Learson, Emil Cross, Frank Pattie, Lawson Smith, Wm. Huffman, Charles Whitkrofft, John Digger, Charles Hubner, Chris Herbert, Henry Eshbach, John Frederick, John Mayer, Peter Mengel, John D. Stern, Samuel Steiner, Jacob Rothenbush, Henry Frederick, Jacob Werner, George Dahl, Jacob Mersfelder, Fred Nuss, Michael Stholl, Ernest Northine, August Smallfield, Daniel Rothenbush, George Natt, Joseph Esses, Jacob Kreker, Louis Goldee, W. H. Speckman, Peter Heckler, Wm. Sessor, Conrad Roesch and John Speckler.

San Francisco Exempts Visit Stockton

In September, 1892, the Exempts of San Francisco, eighty in number, paid the Stockton fire department a visit. They brought with them a light double-deck engine and the First Cavalry Band. The entire Stockton department marched to the steamer to receive the visitors and escort them to the Protection house where their engine was housed, then to the engine house for breakfast. Then followed a parade through the streets, the Stockton firemen 100 strong, manning the ropes of the old Weber steam fire engine. During the afternoon the Exempts were shown around the city. That evening they were tendered a banquet at the Yosemite House, John T. Doyle, the chairman, introduced James H. Budd, president of the Stockton board of delegates, who in a few words introduced the mayor of Stockton, W. R. Clark, who extended the greeting of the city to the Exempts. Old fire songs were sung by several of the San Francisco firemen, including the old timers, "The Engine House on the Hill" and "When We Ran With the Old Machine," the banquet ending with "He's a Jolly Good Fellow."

There was no exempt firemen's organization in Stockton until 1895. Long before this time there were hundreds of exempts in Stockton, the law declaring every fireman an exempt after five years' continuous service. Many of the exempts remained as members of their company, but the most of them retired. The Webers honored their exempts July 4, 1870, by presenting them with a beautiful silk banner. The exempts assembled November 2, 1895, and incorporated by electing John T. Doyle, president, and Nicholas Vizelech, James Ford, John T. Field and Henry Rohrbacker, directors. The following signed the roll as charter members, Ben F. Kolberg, Joseph Klack, John T. Doyle, Henry L. Culkin, R. S. Ellsworth, R. E. Murray, W. B. Wollam, Michael Brisco, Henry Robinson, Charles E. Venilli, Henry Rohrbacker, James M. Brown, Henry Ford, Eli Confer, Charles M. Aaron, C. P. Wolf, J. C. Zignego, E. F. Weber, Wm. Dorcey, J. F. Field, L. J. Gerlach, Gus Gianelli, Jack Hampton, Charles Hamilton, and Michael Gough. The members obtained from San Francisco an old hand engine, at a cost of $150. Upon each side of the box was the name Broderick No. 1. It was so named after the death of D. C. Broderick, who was the foreman of the company at that time. The Exempts endeavored to preserve all of the historic associations of the department, such as fire hats, belts, hat fronts, badges, banners and pictures presented to them by the firemen of other cities, but they received no encouragement from the city council or private citizens. One set of four pictures given to them in February, 1867, by Chief Engineer David Scannell of San Francisco, are very valuable at the present time, as they show four different fire scenes in the days of the hand fire engines. Even the Exempts are passing and today a few only are left.

Bad Morale in Department

The splendid paid two-platoon fire department of today is the outgrowth of the political machine department of 1888. Twelve years previous Wm. (Pony) Denig, an enthusiastic fireman of the old days and proprietor of the Weekly Record, advocated the organization of a paid department, as an unruly element were fast getting control and young fellows were "running the machine" not for the sole object of saving property but for the excitement and fun there was in it, "getting on first water." After a time there were many incendiary fires, and certain engines received the news before the alarm was sent in. A local paper commenting on this fact said in October, 1881, "The public is becoming aroused by so many fires here, and the frightful theory is advanced that they are due to the rivalry among our fire companies to "get first water," not that our firemen are guilty of attempting to fire property, but that hoodlums, knowing of the spirit of rivalry that exists have been prompted to start the numerous fires that have been in the city during the past six weeks." Making hoodlums the goat is easy, but on one occasion a barn opposite our house was fired, and going out we saw a fire engine setting on the cistern, a block distant, before the alarm had been turned in. "Our citizens are beginning to feel that the contest that has so long animated our firemen for first water must stop, as its effect, although well intended, has been pernicious." At some of these fires liquor was freely passed around and some of the firemen became staggering drunk. Hosemen, in a spirit of fun would play on each other instead of on the flames and this at the Inglis fire resulted in a free fight. The Herald commenting on this, they wanted to mob the editor for telling the truth.

The old-time firemen regretted this condition of affairs, for they took great pride in the department and especially their company and its work. They were at this time old and staid citizens, married and with families to support, and they thought it neither fair nor just, paying out money to run their steam fire engines for the benefit of the city. In 1885 the Eureka petitioned the city council to submit to the citizens the question of a paid fire department. The council ignored their request. The company then appointed a committee to sell the steamer that had cost them $6,000 and voted to disband within three months. They were then paying the engine driver, hose cart driver and engineer $185 per month; they were receiving from the city $25 per month, which was not sufficient even to pay for horse shoeing, feed and veterinary and other minor expenses. They were jollied along until 1887, when the entire department petitioned the council to organize a paid department with that petition as their ultimatum. The council, seeing that the firemen meant business, passed a resolution purchasing the Weber engine, hose cart and three horses at $3,250, the Eureka engine at $3,220 and the Babcock chemical at $2,235. The city owned the hook and ladder truck. In the sale of the apparatus each member of the Weber Engine Company received $75, the San Joaquins $70, and the Eureka, who had expended $750 in the purchase of their burial plot, put their money on interest to pay for a perpetual care of their plot.

Paid Fire Department

The paid fire department became an established fact August 1, 1888, but unfortunately for the Republican party, the Democrats took possession of the city government in January, 1888. Making almost a complete sweep of the firemen appointed by the former council, they appointed Democrats to three-fourths of the positions. To start the good work, Councilman R. R. Reibenstein, an old-time politician and carpenter, was appointed foreman of the Eureka at a salary of twenty-five dollars per month; John T. Doyle, a grain dealer, and like Reibenstein one of the keenest politicians in the party, was appointed foreman of the Hook and Ladder truck, at twenty-five dollars per month. As these two men would do nothing but draw their salaries it was so cheeky that they resigned. The following are the first firemen of the paid department: Weber No. 1, Chris J. Wolf, foreman, Henry Nash, engineer, Henry Wolf, engineer, and John McLaughlin, hose cart driver, H. Neistrath, Charles Aaron, J. G. Robbins, Louis Oser and J. W. Brown, extra men; Eureka No. 2, R. R. Reibenstein, foreman, Charles Vinelli, engineer, Fernando Lastreto, hose cart driver, Phil T. Brown, engineer, and Jake Fisher, Con Collins, Thomas Towell, Gus Gianelli and Hugh M. Tye, extra men; Babcock chemical, Will H. Humphrey, driver, S. C. Brown and J. S. Simpson, extra men; Protection No. 1, John T. Doyle, foreman, Mike Brisco, driver, and George Lieginger, Frank Kendall, J. K. Dempsey and John Ferrill, extra men. At the time of the pavilion fire, September 28, 1902, Thomas J. Walsh, then the driver of the Weber hose wagon, was so severely burned that he died the following day. He was the only fireman in the history of the department to lose his life in fighting the fire.

A word about the present department. The original volunteer fire department, at its best, comprised about 230 men, the law permitting only sixty-five men to a company. The present department comprises only sixty-five men, including the chief engineer and his assistant, and yet, with their present apparatus, they can do more and better work than could 500 men with their hand engines. The apparatus today comprises six auto pump engines run by motor power; three of these pumps will each deliver 1,000 gallons of water per minute through four lines of hose, and three of the pumps will throw 750 gallons of water through three lines of hose. If necessary the two steamers can be used each throwing 500 gallons of water through two lines of hose. In a big fire, the department, through twenty-five lines of hose, can pour a flood of water, over 6,000 gallons a minute, upon the flames. The fire department, through the present alarm system, which is obsolete and should be replaced by an up-to-date system, arrives at a fire inside of a mile in less than two minutes, hence no fire gets a headway, unless it is an explosion, before the arrival of the engines. This is a wonderful progress in fire fighting, made possible only within the past twenty years by the invention of the gasoline engine.

CHAPTER XII

TEN YEARS OF DEMOCRACY

California, in the sisterhood of states stands preeminent in many ways—naturally, physically, geographically and politically. The Constitutional Convention that assembled at Monterey in September, 1849, voted to seek admission into the Union as a free state, although the leaders in that organic body were advocates of slavery. Wm. M. Gwin, the foremost man in the convention, was a slave owner, but he was afraid that if California sought admission as a slave state, Congress would turn them down. The South brought on the Mexican War and practically fought it out, the army being in the greater part southern men. It was their plan to make California a slave state but the discovery of gold blocked completely that scheme for which they had been working for twenty years.

Then came the Congressional contest. The South fought California's admission as a free state, as it would give the North the balance of power, which up to this time was upon the slavery question dominated by the South. Then came that great March 7, 1850, speech of Daniel Webster upon the Union, one and inseparable, and the reply of Robert Y. Hayne of South Carolina. The South had threatened to secede if California came into the Union as a free state. The great question was settled for ten years only by Henry Clay's compromise bill, and September 9, 1850, California became the thirty-first in the sisterhood of states.

The Slavery Question

The rush of population to California brought to its shores men from the North and from the South. The immigration from the Southern and Western states included many politicians who anticipated making California a strong Democratic state, filling its principal offices and thus materially assisting their brethren in the South if such an occasion should arise. The men came from the North to dig gold and open up business. California thus became the neutral ground of the nation and there were more men favoring and opposing slavery than any other state in the Union. As it was in California so was it in San Joaquin County. The two great parties at that time, the Whigs and Democrats, were divided upon the question of slavery, and we find northern Democrats and northern Whigs opposed to slavery and Whigs and Democrats in favor of it. The Democratic party was the dominant party and the Southern wing of the party were in control. The first Governor, Peter H. Burnett, a Democrat and pro-slavery man, was elected on his personality, regardless of party lines.

Democratic County Convention

Although Democratic conventions had been organized in other parts of the state, notably Sacramento and San Francisco, in the summer of 1850, no movement was made by the party in San Joaquin County until the time drew near for the election of delegates to the Benicia state convention, for the nomination of state officers. In the meantime the Stockton Times had been sold to Democratic politicians with George Kerr as editor. The name of the paper was changed to the Stockton Republican, a rather peculiar name for a strong partisan organ. The Republican, in February, 1851, said, "The old fires of party warfare are rekindling. Let the Democratic party in San Joaquin be brought forth full-grown and strong and let it be baptized in the old Democratic faith." A call was made through the press for the assembling of the party, and February 23, 1851, nearly 300 Democrats from all parts of the county met in the Corinthian Building, Maj. R. P. Hammond, a strong Democrat, having tendered them the use of the rooms free of cost. They organized by electing Ex-Mayor Samuel Purdy, chairman, Nelson Taylor and Maj. B. G. Weir, vice-presidents, and Maj. Richard P. Hammond, secretary. A committee of three was appointed "to prepare a place for the election of nine delegates" to the Benicia convention. The committee, leaving the room, returned in a few minutes and reported that the polls would be opened immediately in the room occupied by the convention. The election was immediately held and the following delegates elected: Nelson Taylor, Maj. R. J. Hammond, George Kerr, Wm. Root, John E. Nuttman, Samuel A. Booker, Dr. J. W. Reins, A. C. Bradford and Dr. R. P. Ashe. In their resolutions they declared, "We are attached to the principles of the Democratic party, and will at all times adhere to its usages. Resolved, that the Honorable Mayor Purdy is our first choice for the office of governor and we will use all proper means to secure his election before the convention."

Benjamin F. Moore

Following the custom of the states across the Rockies to send out speakers in every political campaign to advocate their party's cause and abuse the other fellow, the Whigs and Democrats sent out their speakers. They were as brilliant a class of speakers as could be found in any state in the Union. Among them was Edward C. Marshall, closely related to John Marshall, the great jurist, and Benjamin F. Moore, of Southern fame. Both of these men were candidates for Congress, Marshall being a Democrat and Moore a Whig. We will hear more of the former through many campaigns. Regarding Moore, Bancroft bluntly said that he had "migrated from Florida through Texas, carried a hug bowie knife and was usually half drunk." Liquor paralyzed his intellect and at the age of forty-six he died in an insane asylum in January, 1866. He was a delegate to the Constitutional Convention from the San Joaquin district, and appearing at Stockton June 20 appealed to the voters to send him to Congress. Moore was a very quarrelsome character and it was early in the year that he had his first encounter with David C. Broderick. Moore at the time was state senator and he was very much displeased because Broderick had been made lieutenant-governor after the resignation of Governor Burnett, and in his speech in the senate, he insulted Broderick. That evening the two men met near the Benicia treasurer's office, and Moore advanced toward Broderick with a drawn revolver. Broderick, who was a scientific boxer, struck at Moore but missed him. Friends interfered and disarmed Moore. Somehow he again got possession of the weapon and approaching Broderick exclaimed, "I'll shoot you, you scoundrel." Broderick, who was unarmed, looking Moore straight in the eye, exclaimed, "Why don't you fire, you cowardly assassin?" Moore, finding that Broderick was unarmed, refused to shoot.

On another occasion in the same year Moore had a set-to with Judge Stephen J. Field. The incident is related in "Bench and Bar." Field, in the legislature, moved the impeachment of Judge Turner for illegal practices. Field's motion called forth a "savage and abusive reply" from Moore. Rising to speak, he "opened his drawer, took out two revolvers, cocked them, and laid them in the open drawer before him." He was abusive in his speech regarding Field's motion, and later Field demanded an apology or satisfaction on the duelling field. Moore refused to either apologize or fight a duel, his friend Drury P. Baldwin, declared. Then said Broderick, who was acting for Field, "As soon as the House meets Judge Field will arise in his seat and pronounce Moore a liar and a coward." "Then Judge Field will get shot in his seat," said Baldwin. "In that case, others will get shot too," Broderick replied. The next morning Moore arose in the house and read an apology, which a friend had written and advised him to read. It settled the business.

Purdy Whips an Editor

The ex-mayor of Stockton, Samuel Purdy, was a very popular man, especially in the Southern mines, and long before the assembling of the Benicia Democratic convention, one of the mining camps held a picnic, and planting a tall flagpole, they threw to the breeze a large flag bearing the following words, "Samuel Purdy, the people's choice for governor." His leading political friends did not think it wise to place him in nomination for governor against John Bigler, who was elected as the party leader on the sixth ballot. Purdy was nominated for lieutenant-governor on the second ballot. Returning to Stockton, Purdy met one of his bitterest opponents in John S. Robb, the editor of the Whig organ, the Stockton Journal. Robb, as was customary for party papers in that day, began attacking Purdy. He paid no attention to the Journal's invectives until Robb began his abuse in such a manner "as to reflect upon him as a gentleman and injure him before the people of the state." Purdy then concluded to stop such work "by administering to the editor a sound flogging with a whip." Robb at all times carried a revolver, and Purdy, obtaining a good cowhide and a revolver to use in case of necessity, began looking for Robb. His search continued throughout the day without success. That evening he met Robb and proceeded to use his whip. Robb immediately drew his pistol, and Purdy in defense struck the editor over the head with his pistol, cutting a deep gash. Thus ended the scurrilous articles.

Party Hatred

War at all times causes intense party feeling and at this time it merged into party hatred between the Whigs and Democrats living north or south of the Mason and Dixon line. This you remember was the compromise line established between the slave and free states. We will have occasion to refer to this line in the election campaign of 1857. The northern Whigs and Democrats opposed the Mexican war, and from this fact grew the hatred between the Northerners and Southerners. The victory was won, principally, as was stated, by Southern soldiers. California became a part of the Union, and the southern wing of the Democratic party had the audacity to claim that they should have control of the government, because of their part in the war. In their convention they resolved to permit no Democrat to vote who opposed the war. This hatred is best expressed in a poem by F. A. Durivage in "A Soldier's Reply to a Whig," who asked Durivage to vote for him.

"Give you my vote? No, not to save
This shattered body from the grave;
Your perjured party I disclaim—
Treason in doctrine, Whig in name.
To those who would my reason know
This it is—I fought in Mexico;
While through our ranks swept grape and shell,
And yielded none while hundreds fell,
You gave the murderous foeman aid,
Whetted every treacherous blade;
Yes, to the cowards courage gave,
Heaped curses on your country's brave,
And now you change at once your note
And ask a soldier for his vote."

Succeeding legislatures are continuously changing laws as to manner of voting time, etc. Under the election law of 1850, the county judge appointed the inspector and judges of election. If he failed to appoint any or all of the election board, bystanders could so appoint on the morning of the election. The polls throughout the state opened at 8 o'clock and closed at sunset. The board could take a one-hour recess any time before 3 o'clock. The precincts in San Joaquin County were eleven in number, namely, Stockton, French Camp, Cotton's Ferry on the Stanislaus River, Chalmers' ranch, now Eight-Mile Corners. Oregon Tent, now Farmington, O'Neal's ranch, Staples' Ferry, Benedict's Ferry on the Mokelumne River, Elkhorn ranch, Guard's ranch and Dent & Vantine's on Knights Ferry. The sheriff's office was the plum desired by most nominees, there being seven candidates: Dr. R. P. Ashe, Richard W. Heath, John D. Taber, Dr. Samuel McLean, John E. Nuttman, Mc-Kee Rainey and George Condon. All of the candidates for county offices ran independent of party. John Bigler was elected governor, Purdy's vote, however, running ahead of the ticket. Bigler's vote in the city was 602, in the county 801. His opponent's vote, P. B. Reading, in the city 588, in the county 802. In the vote for sheriff none of the candidates cut any figure except Dr. R. P. Ashe, 333 in the city, 458 in the county, and George Condon 332 in the city and 451 in the county; doctors and undertakers were then quite popular.

Convention of 1853

In the next election, 1853, politics began to warm up, notwithstanding the fact that the Whigs were making their last fight in state and nation. The death of their great leader, Henry Clay, the previous year was a serious blow. The Democrats assembled in the Methodist Church South, August 6 and passed a resolution thanking "Parson Kelley for his kindness in opening the church to the convention," taxed every candidate five dollars and taking up a subscription of forty-five dollars, and gave it to the pastor. The chairman of the convention was Capt. P. E. Jordan, a lumber merchant, and the secretaries, Maj. John Stemmons, a rancher, and Dr. R. K. Reid, state asylum physician. The convention, in their platform, favored the granting of lands by the government to actual settlers; a complete system of public schools; a railroad from the Atlantic to the Pacific; opposed any change in the state constitution; special corporations; a land monopoly; and reaffirmed the resolutions adopted by the state convention of 1852.

John Bigler was again nominated for governor by the Democratic convention and Samuel Purdy was again his running mate. The campaign opened at Stockton August 25, the principal speaker being Governor Bigler. Cannon salutes were fired at intervals during the day. "The people left their harvest fields by the hundreds and came to Stockton to greet John Bigler. At seven o'clock there must have been 2,000 people upon the ground." The Governor delivered a three-hour address, advocating the principles of the Democratic party and his reelection to office. He was followed by David S. Terry, who bluntly insulted the Governor during his speech by denouncing him for signing the so-called San Francisco water lot steal. The two leading Whigs of their party, Henry A. Crabb and Edmond Randolph, then addressed the meeting, which closed at two o'clock in the morning. Edmond Randolph was one of the brightest young Southerners in the state or nation but very erratic and passionate. One of his Democratic friends said, "Mr. Randolph is a man of character, great natural ability, and a well read scholar; at the same time he is possessed of a peculiar temperament, bitter in his personal hostilities, and very apt to be carried away by ungovernable feelings." Another scribe said of him, "If Mr. Randolph could only subdue his bitter personal animosities, and his violent prejudices, and ever employ his eloquent tongue in favor of the Democratic party, he would become the idol of the people."

The election was held September 8 and the entire state and county went Democratic. Bigler polled in the county 1,187 votes and Waldo 775, and Bigler in Stockton carried it by 1,295 to Waldo's 697. Nelson Taylor, the Democratic nominee for sheriff, received 963 votes in the county and 595 in the city; A. F. Rudler, 694 in the county and 308 in the city, and George Condon, Independent, 822 in the county and 598 in the city.

George Kerr, State Printer

It was the custom for the first few years of state legislation for the legislators to elect the state printer, and it became a fat graft for the printer elected and his friends.

George Kerr, one of the proprietors of the San Joaquin Republican, was elected state printer by the legislature of 1852 and during the following two years all of the state printing was done in Stockton. George Kerr was a man of fine character, but like many others, he was his own worst enemy. He died at Stockton March 5, 1854, crazed from liquor. A member of Charity Lodge No. 6, I. O. O. F., he was buried by that order. Five times only have state officers been residents of San Joaquin County, David Douglas was elected treasurer in 1850, Purdy, lieutenant-governor, George Kerr, state printer, D. J. Oullahan, state treasurer, and Governor James H. Budd.

American or Know Nothing Party

In 1855 the great Whig party, which had been in existence since 1840, and elected two Presidents, Harrison and Taylor, in California, was dead. It was superseded for a day by what was known as the American or Know Nothing party. Its meetings were held in secret, its members sworn to reveal none of its business transactions or the names of its members, to any outside party and to vote for no foreigner or Catholic for any government position.

When any person inquired about the order the reply was invariably, "I don't know," hence the slur name given them by the Democrats, Know Nothings. Their slogan was, "Americans must rule America," and, says the historian Channing, "its opposition to the foreign element became the basis of a political organization extending over many states." The party had shown unexpected strength in 1854, carrying several town elections, and many Whigs and Democrats joined the new party. It was a party particularly attractive to Californians, for we have already noted their hatred of foreigners, a hatred which later was extended to the Chinese, and now to the Japanese. The Know-Nothing party passed out of political life as quickly as it came into it because of their policy regarding the great impending question of slavery.

Campaign of 1855

This great and momentous question was sounded in the Democratic convention which assembled August 11, 1855, to elect delegates to the Democratic State convention and nominate county officers. The meeting was called to order by Samuel A. Booker, chairman of the county committee, and Maj. Thomas Lane was elected chairman, A. C. Baine and Thomas A. Bours, vice-chairman, and John M. Schofield and C. N. Powell, secretaries. After the committee on credentials had reported, Booker made a motion which was carried, that every member of the convention be pledged on his word of honor as to whether he be a member of "the party commonly called Know Nothing or any political party except the Democratic party." They feared traitors in their ranks as well they might, for many of their leading members had seceded.

In the afternoon they passed several resolutions, the most important of which was their resolution on the Kansas and Nebraska bill, a bill which did much to bring on the Civil War. It indicated the action of the South to rule or ruin. The bill in this day needs a brief explanation as the World War has overshadowed all previous National history. Soon after the admission of California as a state, emigrants from the North and from the South began flocking into the territories of Kansas and Nebraska. Southern men took their slaves with them for the purpose of forming slave governments. The Northern men bitterly opposed their plan, for under an agreement between the North and the South in 1820, under what was known as the Missouri Compromise, all territory north of the Mason and Dixon line—36-30 north latitude—should be free soil. The slave owners refused to abide by this decision, and set up a slave-holding government. The Northern men organized a free government. Then there was a clash of arms and bloodshed. Now coming back to the San Joaquin County Democratic convention, they coincided with the South in the matter of state rights and resolved that "we will sustain the constitutional compromises made to secure and perpetuate the Union, including Kansas and Nebraska's construction of State's rights, which recognize and declare the exclusive power of each sovereign state to settle and determine for itself its own local institutions and government, without restraint or control, by any state or power, beyond the limits of her territorial jurisdiction. This resolution had no bearing on the state or county election but it foretold their position on the question of slavery.

"Resolved, That in our opinion the gallant Whigs who fought under the banner of the immortal Webster and Clay, can find no home or sympathy among the so-called American party alias Know Nothing party, and we cordially invite them into the ranks of a party who pledge themselves to the Constitution, guaranteeing religious freedom and the integrity of all those principles which have to this time secured all of the blessings of our Government."

Terry Deserts His Party

So many in number were the Democrats that joined the new party the Democratic press saw party defeat in sight and they tauntingly declared, "While the Americans excluded from their councils the native and naturalized Catholic, yet they allowed the buck niggers of the Empire State to organize Know Nothing lodges and to aspire to the equality of white members of the great American party." The editors were particularly severe on David S. Terry, who had deserted the standard of Democracy to get office. They gave him several columns of space at different times, and the Republican said of him: "D. S. Terry, Esq., certainly deserves a nomination from his coworkers for his indefatigable efforts to save the country by throwing off and discarding what little democracy he ever possessed and giving his body and soul to the new order. We will not say that a desire for office has actuated him in the least, but if he can get it he will receive his reward."

The election day, September 5, was the most exciting of any election up to that time. For the first time in the history of the town the day was enlivened by a brass band engaged by the American party, playing patriotic airs at the election polls. Wagons were engaged in drumming up voters and taking them to the polling place, each carriage or wagon having big posters with the words, "Genuine Democratic Party. Americans shall rule America." The entire state and county Know Nothing ticket was elected and the Democratic press consoled itself by saying: "It is reported and generally believed that there was an election on Wednesday. It is true there were a great many people and a great deal of noise and confusion. But after all, what does it amount to?"

It was a novel election; men who had been strong Democrats and who later were violent Secessionists were elected to office, together with Northern men, enthusiastic Whigs and later strong union men. J. Neeley Johnson carried the county 1,447 and the city 722. Bigler receiving only 1,026 in the county, and 433 in the city. George Webster, K. N., was elected sheriff over the Democrat, Andrew Lester, 1,253 to 1,091, while his brother, John Webster, Democrat, was defeated for treasurer by Dr. George A. Shurtleff, 1,362 to 1,002. Otis Bridges, a seceding Democrat, was elected prosecuting attorney over A. C. Baine, 1,220 to 1,100. David S. Terry, going into the American convention, was nominated for judge of the Supreme Court, and elected over his opponent, Charles H. Bryan, and although Terry was in the political spotlight for nearly thirty years, and a resident of Stockton during all that time, never again was he elected to office, although in 1878 he joined the Workmen's party with that object in view. For the first time the prohibition question came up in this state, and upon the ballot there was the proposition, "For a Prohibition law the county vote was 442 yes, 1,041 no. In the city the vote stood 181 yes and 484 no. As it is today a live question let us look at the ward vote; First Ward, 75 yes, 106 no; Second Ward, 117 yes, 243 no; Third Ward, 124 yes, 117 no.

Henry A. Crabb

With the passing of the Whig party, there passed out of life a few months later by a tragic death, Henry A. Crabb. A Mississippian by birth, he came to Stockton in 1849 and was Stockton's first city attorney. He was a law partner of D. S. Terry, the editor of the Whig newspaper, the Stockton Argus, and the leader of the Whig party. A man of high honor, he was so universally respected that even his political enemies said of him, "Crabb is a man of his word. What he says may be relied upon whether it be for or against you." He was not only a man of honor but he would fight in defense of that honor. This fact was shown in his difficulty with Senator Whitney, in the legislature of 1853 at Benicia. A bill was under consideration relating to school lands, and Whitney, doubting Crabb's opinion in the matter, made the remark, "I have always regarded the Senator from San Joaquin as a gentleman and I am sorry to see him pursuing such a course." Crabb immediately jumped to his feet and exclaimed, "Do you mean to say I am not a gentleman?" Whitney replied, "I mean to say that your conduct today belies your general character." Crabb, greatly angered rushed to Whitney's side and struck him several blows, forcing him across the desk. Senators quickly grasped the infuriated Southerner and prevented any more fighting. Bitter language followed between the two men, and a motion to adjourn was quickly carried. Crabb then made a proposition to settle the difficulty at once. "But I have no weapons," said Whitney. "I have two and you may take your choice" was the quick reply. In the meantime the Assembly had adjourned and the legislative hall was crowded with excited legislators. Friends finally succeeded in quieting Crabb and the matter ended without further trouble.

Crabb aspired to a seat in the United States Senate and he believed he had good prospects of winning the fight after the defeat of the Democratic party. But Broderick, the greatest manipulator of politics in State history, blocked Crabb's chance by having the election postponed another year. This, said his friends, broke Crabb's heart, and ready for any rash proposal he listened to his wife's proposition to raise an army, and march to Mexico and assist her father in overthrowing the tyrannical Governor Gandara. Crabb in 1853, then a young man of twenty six years of age, had married Filomena, one of the pretty daughters of the Spaniard, M. Ainsa, then a merchant of Stockton. Ainsa at this time, 1857, was an officer in the revolutionary army, and Crabb raising an army of 100 men marched overland from Los Angeles to assist his father-in-law. In the fight at Caborca Crabb and his men were trapped and compelled to surrender. The company marched out expecting fair treatment as prisoners of war. Instead their hands were tied behind their backs and they were marched to a corral, and there guarded like a band of cattle. The following morning the brave little army were taken out in groups of five and ten and shot to death. For Crabb a worse fate was reserved. Permitted to write a letter to his wife, he was then fastened to a post with his hands stretched above his head. A company of riflemen was then placed in front of him and at the word a hundred bullets pierced his body. A Mexican then stepped forth and with a long knife severed the head from the body "the warm blood spurting half way across the street." The head was then placed upon a table and after being subjected to the insults of the mob, it was preserved in mescal as a warning to all future filibusters.

Judge Wier, the Filibuster

Another Southerner who went on a filibustering expedition was Judge B. G. Wier, assemblyman from San Joaquin County in 1852. Wm. Walker, the so-called "grey-eyed man of destiny," got the idea into his head that he could organize an army, march to Nicaragua, take possession of the country and set up a Pacific Republic. He organized his army and invaded Nicaragua by land and by sea. The expedition was a complete failure and his army was scattered in every direction. One of his followers was Judge Wier. The Judge, as I remember him, was one of those easy-going Missourians who was contented with a mere living and the easiest way of obtaining it. He was a politician and social with all classes, floated into office, having been elected justice of the peace several times, and twice a court judge. By what hypnotic influence Walker aroused the latent energies of the Judge I know not, but he joined the expedition. One morning my father, who kept a meat market, was surprised to see a strange man, to all appearances, walk into the shop. His clothing was in rags, his boots were worn out, his stockingless toes showing through the leather, he was without a hat and his hair and whiskers looked as if he had not seen a hair cut or shave for many months. Making himself known to my father he exclaimed, "For God's sake, Tinkham, lend me fifty dollars, I can't go home looking this way." Recounting the terrible experience through which he had passed, he said, "No more Nicaragua for me." The Judge was a strong proslavery and State's right man, and during the Civil War he drifted into Stanislaus County to grow up with the country, and holding several minor offices, in 1875 was elected county recorder and auditor.

Fugitive Slave Law

In the days of the gold rush many Southern men brought slaves to California, intending to work them in the mines digging gold. The anti-slave men, however, were continually informing the negroes that they were free men, and urged them to run away from their masters. There was no law permitting the slaveowners to hold or capture their slaves. To remedy this matter, Henry A. Crabb, introduced his famous slave law which was passed by the legislature and signed by Governor Bigler. This law authorized any owner of a slave who had escaped to procure a warrant for his arrest, and any city or county officer was compelled to arrest the party. When brought before the justice court, if the slaveowner proved his claim, he could take the negro or negress from the state, in chains if necessary. It was easy for the slaveowner to prove his claim when the judges were all proslavery men. And to make it still easier Crabb introduced a bill, which became a law, that prohibited a negro or an Indian from testifying against a white man in any case whatsoever. In proof of the statement at the beginning of the chapter that the slavery men ruled the state, although California was supposed to be free, we cite two or three cases. In May, 1852, a case of this kind came before Justice of the Peace Fry of Sacramento. A negro was arrested and a Mr. Lathrop claimed that he brought the negro to California in 1849, and that he and three other negroes ran away a few months previous to his arrest. The case was carried to the Supreme Court and they decreed that the slaves be given immediately to their owner.

In another case, the San Francisco Herald of September 25, 1852, said, "Justice Shepherd yesterday issued a warrant for the arrest of a mulatto woman who was claimed as a fugitive from labor by T. T. Smith, of Jackson County, Mo., her owner having learned that she was secreted on the clipper ship Flying Cloud. She was brought to the country, together with other slaves, in 1850 and remained with the family until a few months ago, since when she married a free negro and escaped. Her owner heard of her arrival here and came down in search. She was arrested and brought before Justice Shepherd by whom, on satisfactory proof of title, she was remanded to the custody of Mr. Smith to be conveyed to the state of Missouri." The same newspaper in referring to this law said in June, 1852, "We regret any attention to disturb this law as very senseless and mischievous. The question to be ascertained is, whether the negro belongs to the claimant; if he does he should be remanded to his custody without the tedious and unnecessary delay of nearly three weeks." And the San Joaquin Republican declared "we endorse every word."

Crabb's Fugitive Slave law and and Negro Evidence law remained in force and on the statute books until 1861. They were then repealed by a Republican legislature. Regarding the Evidence law, said the newspaper correspondent in March, 1852, "The Assembly was lashed into a state of frenzied excitement on Saturday by the presentation of a petition from the free negroes of San Francisco asking that they might be permitted to give testimony in courts of justice upon the same footing as white men." One assemblyman said, "Burn the petition," and another excited member shouted, "Throw it out of the window." The Whig members advocated the granting of the request. "An angry and exciting debate followed and the memorial was finally rejected."

The slavery advocates considered the negro an inferior person and subservient to the white man. This fact was clearly brought out by the decision of the Stockton judge, A. C. Baine, in a case where a white person was arrested for assaulting a negro. The defense of the man was that the negro had insulted him. This was the judge's opinion, "The negro's position I hold to be this; he is in a sort of a state of wardship or pupilage, relatively towards the white man, and neither his social nor legal position is on an equal with the white race. His duties hence are inviolable deference and marked and perfect respect and constant politeness towards the other race. And if he shall become insolent or impertinent I will leave him in the position he has so falsely placed himself . . . and he will . . . not expect me to inquire into the exact judiciousness of any chastisement he may receive, unless that chastisement were wholly unreasonable and outrageous and not a manly determination to vindicate the name and morals of society."

Another attorney of Baine's opinion regarding the constant respect and marked politeness of the colored man, was Samuel A. Booker. One day a darkey approached the judge while on the street, and neglected to take off his hat, Booker threateningly raising the heavy cane which he always carried exclaimed angrily, "Take off your hat, sir, take off your hat. Don't you know you are in the presence of a Southern gentleman?" The negro quickly doffed his hat, and from that time on until after the Civil War the colored gentlemen always took off their hats when Judge Booker drew near.

There are many events in Stockton's history that read like fiction to the generation of today, but here is an event, the sale of a slave, that was told to me by James Kidd, alive today at the age of eighty-four years. Mr. Kidd was a native of South Carolina, opposed to slavery and lived on the opposite side of the river to the Bates plantation in Georgia. Bates came to California in 1850, bringing with him a negro slave called Charley. He promised that if Charley would remain and work two years for him, he would give him his liberty. The foxy slaveholder said to his faithful slave just before the two years had expired, "Charley, wouldn't you like to go back to old South Carolina and see your wife? We will go home and then you can come back." The negro was delighted and willingly accompanied his master on board the steamer for Panama. Once more in South Carolina, a slave state, never again would Charley have seen California. On arrival at Panama, Charley fortunately met several free negroes, who told him that he was not a slave and persuaded him to run away and hide from his master. Charley not showing up, Bates went on without him, for the town was very unhealthy and not a very desirable place for travelers.

Charley went to work and made considerable money. One day he was greatly surprised to meet James Kidd, who was then on his way to Stockton. "Why, hello, Charley, what are you doing here?" Charley told him the story, and Mr. Kidd invited him to come to Stockton with him. In the town Charley went to work, was saving and laid up about $200 in gold. One day he was walking the street and met a Mr. Clay, a friend of Bates. Charley was glad to see a man from his old home, little realizing the trap that was to be sprung. Clay was very glad to meet the slave for Bates owed him $700, and he had told Clay that if he found his "nigger Charley" he could have him for the debt. Here's where the Crabb Fugitive Slave law came in. Clay went before Judge Baine and swore out a warrant for the arrest of Charley as a fugitive slave. The arrest was made and Charley's friends were very angry, for the man had been industrious and a good citizen. Clay agreed to release Charley if given $1,000. Charley had $200 and to raise the balance of the money it was planned by his friends to put Charley up at auction and sell him to the highest bidder. He was sold to Angelo Oliver for $800. The negro was given his freedom, and in a few years paid off the men who had advanced the money. Charley Bates, as he was afterward called, at one time lived on and owned a block of land cornering on Commerce and Flora streets and died in Sacramento about 1890.

David S. Terry Stabs Hopkins

Justice of the Supreme Court, David S. Terry, in office less than a year, in June, 1856, was confined in "Fort Gunny Bags," the Vigilantes' prison on Battery Street, San Francisco, for a deadly assault on a police officer of the organization. The Vigilance Committee, comprising some 6,000 men, secretly banded together for the purpose of restoring law and order and punishing and driving from the city the criminals who had been harbored and protected by the officers and judges of the courts. One of these lawless characters was Rube Maloney, wanted by the Vigilantes for smuggling arms into San Francisco. Police officer Sterling Hopkins with a squad of men started out to locate him and he was found on the street in company with Judge Terry, Dr. R. P. Ashe, ex-sheriff of San Joaquin County, and others. The party carried guns, for those were exciting times in the Bay City, and as Hopkins attempted to arrest Maloney, Terry resisted the officer by placing his musket in front of Hopkins' body. "Leaving his duties at the capital," says Bancroft, "Terry had come to drag his already soiled ermine in the demagogical slums of San Francisco." Just at the moment of Terry's resistance a pistol shot was heard and Terry, believing that Hopkins had fired the shot at him, drew his bowie knife and stabbed the officer in the back of the neck, severely wounding him. Terry was then arrested and hastened to the Vigilante jail, where he was confined several weeks, awaiting Hopkins' recovery or death. The police officer recovered and Terry was placed on trial by the committee for the assault on Hopkins. The trial was in progress for twenty-one days and the case was then given to the Vigilance Committee, but they could not agree upon a verdict. They could not hang him as they did Cora and Casey, for the victim of the assault was not dead, and they could not banish him as they did several criminals for he "was too strong politically to be treated like an ordinary criminal" and was an officer of the state. He was a white elephant on their hands and they finally decided to give him his freedom.

As soon as free Terry sailed up the river to Sacramento in the United States sloop John Adams. Bancroft says he "sailed up the river, the captain being very friendly with the Terry party." On arrival at the capital Terry received a great ovation, and there the ladies of San Francisco presented him a magnificent service of silver plate; the water pitcher bore this inscription: "Honorable David S. Terry, from the ladies of San Francisco who admire his courage, honor, his patriotism, and take the highest pride in his heroic resistance to tyranny." Four years later their hero and these same ladies were doing everything possible to insult the flag and disrupt the Union. Remaining in Sacramento a few days, there lionized by his immediate friends, he returned to Stockton, where he was met by a large delegation of citizens, accompanied by a brass band and escorted into Stockton. The procession was so timed that his arrival in the outskirts of the city would be announced by the firing of the old cannon on the El Dorado Street bridge. As the cannon was fired the Court House, St. Charles hotel, Weber house and several private buildings were a blaze of light, illuminated by candles. As the hero of the evening rode through the streets in a hack accompanied by Judge Creanor, many people lined the sidewalks to catch a glimpse of the Supreme Court judge who had defied the Vigilance Committee. The procession halted at the Weber House and Terry retired to the parlor where he was welcomed by the Democratic ladies of Stockton. Then moving to the front porch, the crowd waiting on the street, he was again welcomed in a speech by Judge Baine. Skyrockets illumined the heavens, the crowd gave three cheers for Terry and the band played "Home Again."

The Democratic party, forgiving Terry for his secession from the ranks in 1855, again welcomed him with open arms, and again he was in the campaign of 1857, glorifying the "grand old party which he so much admired." The Democrats also rejoiced because they were again united and in their "Democratic Rally Song" they shouted—

"Fling out the banner and swear not to yield,
John Weller and Joe Walkup haste to the field,
The fearless Democracy is banded once more,
Have sworn that the day of disruption is o'er,
Let the signal go forth o'er mountain and dell,
There is union of hearts, a union of shells.
Fling out the banner beloved by the free,
Let it float feared by tyrants on every sea.
Black traitors and foes must soon beat a retreat
For banded once more the Democracy meet."

United Whigs and Democrats

The Democratic county convention assembled in the city hall July 11, 1857, to nominate county officers and state legislators. John B. Hall was elected president of the meeting, A. C. Baine and John Oliver, vice-presidents, and H. P. Corcoran and Wm. Rodgers, secretaries. It was not a simon-pure Democratic convention, for many of the old stalwarts had left the party and many Whigs had united with it. The chairman of the convention, John B. Hall, had been a Whig up to 1856, and in his speech accepting the position as chairman he said the old party was now "the broken and dismembered fragments of a once-glorious party and they were following strange gods to worship and to lead them." There were 88 delegates in the convention, and each candidate was pledged to abide by the decision of the convention and work for and support the nominees. Thomas H. Lane, a strong Southern-rights man, was nominated unanimously for sheriff. In their resolutions they resolved "that we again ratify the principles of the Cincinnati platform as the true principles of the Union. We approve of Mr. Buchanan's inaugural address, and the conduct of his administration. We affirm the constitutional enactment of laws that will protect the rights of bona fide settlers and it is the duty of the Federal Government to donate free of charge to actual settlers at least 160 acres of land of the public domain."

Shakespeare asks, "What's in a name? A rose by any other name would smell as sweet," but the politicians at this time were very sensitive about names, as the time was fast approaching for a "show down," for or against the Union. The Republicans were standing for the Union against slavery and the Democrats stigmatized them as Black Republicans. D. C. Broderick, although the leader of the Democratic party, was fast sailing into Union waters. He had already denounced the southern outrages in Kansas and the Southern Democrats hated him with a bitter hatred. Thomas Jenkins became very angry if called a Broderick Democrat, and in a card July 14, he said, "Having heard through a responsible party that James Garnett (a Southern Democrat) publicly asserted that I received $1,000 and a promise of office for my vote for Broderick (for United States senator) I here pronounce the said Garnett to be a liar, a poltroon, and villain and slanderer of character so base as to be spurned by honorable men." There was no duel nor bloodshed, for it seems Jenkins merely repeated a rumor heard by him. Three days later George C. Holman, of Lockeford, then an assemblyman from San Joaquin, published a card in the newspaper saying, "I deny in toto that I ever voted a Black Republican ticket or affiliated with them. I pronounce the assertion without foundation, and furthermore I voted for James Buchanan for President." John C. Fremont was the Republican nominee. But there were many kaleidoscopic changes in that day, and four years later Mr. Holman was not only hand in hand with the Republicans, but he was captain of the Lockeford Cavalry company sworn to fight for the Union:

Republican State Organization

We have been reading of the "Black Republicans" and we will turn back one year to their state organization. The few adherents of Republicanism then in Sacramento assembled in a mass meeting April 19, 1856. "In the general disturbance of the meeting," says Winfred Davis in his "Political Conventions," "the Republican speakers attempted to talk, when suddenly a rush was made for the stand by the crowd, and it was overturned and the meeting broke up." They assembled in state convention on the 30th of the same month in the Congregational Church, Sacramento. In their nine resolutions they in part declared, "That the Republican party is organized to preserve the liberties of the people, the sovereignty of states and the perpetuity of the Union." They adopted the principle of the prohibition of slavery in all the national territories and they were in favor of "preventing the increase of the political power of slavery." Slavery, they declared, is "a sectional institution in which only about 350,000 slaveholders are directly interested, while freedom is a national principle by which 26,000,000 of American freemen are secured in their rights." On May 10 a public discussion was held in the same city by George C. Bates, Republican, and J. C. Zabriskie, a Democrat. "Rotten eggs were thrown and firecrackers burned to create a disturbance but the police made several arrests and order was restored," says Davis. You observe that we are approaching lively times.

Some three months after this event, five Republicans assembled in Stockton to consider the feasibility of organizing a Republican party in San Joaquin County. The five men were B. P. Baird, Dr. George R. Warren, John Tucker, C. C. Firely and John M. Buffington.

who was the leader of the movement. He was an ex-mayor of the city, the school superintendent in 1854, and now the Republican nominee for state superintendent of schools. They issued a call to all Republicans to attend a meeting August 2, 1856, in the little wooden building then located at the southeast corner of Weber Avenue and San Joaquin Street. Republicans must have been few in number for it seems only the five were present at the meeting. A subsequent meeting was held in the Baptist Church then on Center Street, a few doors south of the present Occidental Hotel. There the Republican party of this county was born, the first permanent officers being Dr. W. R. Kerr, president, J. M. Buffington, secretary, and Dr. George R. Warren, corresponding secretary. The first county Republican convention met October 10, 1856, and organized by the election of David J. Staples as chairman, and C. O. Burton, afterward Republican postmaster, and Madison Walthall, secretaries. At that time the Republicans had no paper to plead their cause and they were compelled to publish their call in the Democratic Republican. But the same day of the convention the first number of the Stockton Daily Gazette was issued and it published at the head of the column the names of John C. Fremont for President and Wm. Dayton for Vice-President of the United States. Its editor was John F. Damon, who preached the first sermon in Stockton in 1849.

Returning now to the state election of 1857, the Republican stated that the Republican county convention would meet August 8, to place in nomination a full county ticket. "The Republicans make up in pluck what they lack in numbers. If their principles were as commendable as their zeal and nerve in fighting for them, they would deserve to become a strong party." They nominated a full county ticket, but they styled themselves as Know Nothings. As this was the first Republican ticket we give it as follows: for the Assembly, J. M. Kelsey and Wm. A. Fisher; sheriff, John W. O'Neal; clerk, Norval Douglas; judge, Dr. George A. Shurtleff; district attorney, Otis Bridges; treasurer, Thomas K. Hook; surveyor, George E. Drew; assessor, Thomas S. Stout; coroner, M. H. Bond.

For the first time in California politics there were three candidates in the field for governor, a strong indication of the breaking up of the old parties and the forming of new parties on broader lines. The Democrats again carried the state and county, Weller, in the county receiving 1,549 votes; in Stockton, 706; Geo. W. Bowie, K. N., received in the county 604, city 327; Edward Stanley, Republican, county 394, city 137 votes. John O'Neal, elected county clerk in 1855, now received for sheriff only 316 votes, the Democrat, Thomas Lane, receiving 1,552 votes. Dr. George A. Shurtleff, elected county recorder on the Know Nothing ticket, received for judge 877 votes, his opponent, Judge Shafer, receiving 1,552 votes. The most popular man on the Democratic ticket was E. W. Hager, rector of St. John's Episcopal Church, nominated for county superintendent of schools; he received 1,457 votes, his opponent, Myers, 260 votes.

An Exciting Campaign

The campaign of 1859, which terminated in the death of United States Senator, David C. Broderick, was one of the most bitter and personal in the history of the state. There were three parties in the state: the Republicans, with Leland Stanford as their nominee for Governor; the Democratic or Lecompton party as it was called, with Ex-Congressman Milton S. Latham, a young man of twenty-six years born in Ohio, as their nominee; and the anti-Lecompton or Broderick party, with John Curry, a Republican, as their standard bearer. The Democrats were now split asunder over the slavery question in Kansas. President Buchanan, in his message to Congress urged them to ratify the Lecompton constitution, which meant to make Kansas a slave state. Stephen A. Douglas strongly opposed any such action, and the anti-Lecomptonites were called Douglas Democrats or Broderickites, because he joined with Douglas in opposing slavery. This account of national politics is necessary that we may understand why the contest was so bitter and the reason of the complete overthrow of the Democratic party in the campaign of 1861. Mass meetings and conventions of all of the state parties were held early in the year, something very unusual, and the Republicans holding no county convention, by appointment, sent I. S. Locke, a photographer and portrait painter, C. C. Rynerson, George R. Choate, Dr. David Locke, of Lockeford, and D. J. Staples to represent them in the convention at Sacramento. Bancroft in writing of D. J. Staples says, "He was a man who had much to do with forming loyal sentiment in San Joaquin County. He used his influence to soften the hostility of his southern neighbors as well as his courageous will to repel the tyranny of their leaders. The first Republican speech in the county was delivered on his premises."

A United Democracy

The Democratic county convention assembled June 18, 1859, in the city hall and they were called to order by Judge A. C. Baine, chairman of the Democratic county committee. The former Whig, John B. Hall, was again elected chairman, and Dr. L. R. Chalmers, secretary. John W. O'Neal, who bolted the party and was elected to office on the Know Nothing ticket and was defeated for sheriff on the same ticket in 1857, was now unanimously nominated for the same office. In an editorial the Republican declared, "The Democracy of California is firmly united. It is a union of the friends of Union, firmly banded together to resist the attack of faction and disunion. The Democrats are determined not to meddle with the affairs of their neighbors. The forces of our neighbors are this year divided. The Republicans are bound to do business on their own account, and all the persuasions to the contrary will not move them. In this county the Republicans will display their grit if their leaders have not become faint hearted and sought protection as they did last year under the Broderick flag."

Terry's Abusive Speech

In the Democratic state convention at Sacramento, David S. Terry sought the nomination of judge of the Supreme Court, as his term was about to expire, but he was turned down, and C. C. Pope nominated. Terry in his speech before the convention said some remarkable things, considering his bolting his party in 1855, and some insulting remarks regarding the Douglas Democrats. "I claim the honor of being a Democrat. I can be nothing else. In my opinion there is no other party in which one who loves his country can rest. I have no doubt that in the coming election we will show to our sister states that California—for the acquisition of which we are indebted to the Democratic party and no other—are true to the principles which have carried our glorious Confederacy to its present proud position. If our enemies were ever united in one solid bond the forces of the unterrified and invincible Democracy are fully capable of sweeping them from the face of the earth. Who have we opposed to us? A party based on no principle. They belong heart and soul, body and breeches to David C. Broderick. They are yet ashamed to acknowledge their master and are calling themselves forsooth Douglas Democrats."

The Republican county convention met in the city hall August 2 and elected as president Dr. W. R. Kerr, a strong temperance advocate, vice-presidents, B. P. Baird and Charles Ford, and secretaries, H. B. Post and J. W. Whitney. They resolved "That the slavery agitation of the Democratic party; its endeavor to crush out freedom in Kansas—meets our unqualified condemnation. Resolved, that we entertain an abiding confidence in the Republican party. That a division of our country would be unwise and while it would benefit a few it would be decidedly prejudicial to the many."

Reception to Latham

It was always customary for each party nominee for governor to appear at Stockton, and to him was usually tendered a big ovation. Stanford and Curry received but little attention, but Milton S. Latham received the biggest ovation of that day. The Democrats assembled at three o'clock at the St. Charles Hotel and marching out met Latham on the outskirts of the town. A procession was then formed with Capt. Patrick E. Conner as marshal. In the lead of the triumphal entry was a fourteen-mule team handsomely harnessed and decorated with flags. They hauled an immense prairie schooner called the Stocktonian, and perched on top of the wagon was the Stockton Band playing, "See, the conquering hero comes." This was followed by Ex-Congressman Latham riding in a barouche, accompanied by Judge Charles M. Creanor. Then followed carriages, lager beer wagons, about 100 in number, and a calvacade of horsemen. As the procession entered the town the old cannon on the bridge began firing and so continued until the procession arrived at the Weber House. Along the street were hundreds of people anxious to see the next governor, who was a distinguished and quite handsome man.

That evening came the first and the greatest torchlight procession of the day. At the appointed hour the Democrats began assembling at the St. Charles Hotel. Forming in line and led by the band they marched the streets. First came the standard bearer carrying a large flag, and behind him four men transporting a huge transparency on which was the motto, on one side, "Union for the sake of the Union," and on the reverse side a drawing of two clasped hands and the motto, "In Union there is strength." There were some twenty transparencies in line each one bearing some strong Union sentiment and about 1,000 men carrying the old-fashioned torches and Chinese lanterns. The procession returned to the St. Charles and Latham then addressed the assembled crowd. He addressed them very successfully for on election day, September 7, he polled in the county 1,816 votes, Curry 878, and Stanford, the Republican, only 209 votes. In Stockton it was in the same proportion, respectively, 578-378-67.

Death of Broderick

Turn back the page to Terry's speech and you will find the remark that led to the Broderick-Terry duel, the effect of which did much to keep California in the Union during the Civil War. Briefly will I review the great duel, which is not only of county but state and national history, involving as it did a United States senator and an ex-judge of the Supreme Court of California. Terry resigned from office a few days before the duel took place. The exact cause of the duel, and the exact details of it have never yet been fully explained, although the writer has read everything relating to it that came his way during the past thirty years. Broderick was a Northern man, opposed strongly to slavery. He had become the leader of his party, overriding the leadership of Terry and Gwin, and he was fast destroying the plans of the Southern leaders. This angered the party and they were determined to get rid of Broderick. But how? There was but one way, the way that many Southern men disposed of their enemy, "on the field of honor." Who was to be the gentleman to do the honor? Why, Terry, the blustering leader of the southern wing of the party and the hero of the Vigilance Committee.

Broderick was sitting in the International Hotel, San Francisco, June 26, 1859, eating breakfast. On the opposite side of the table sat D. W. Perley, a former Stockton lawyer and a friend of Terry. Broderick said to Perley, "I see your friend has been abusing me. I have hitherto spoken of him as the only honest man on the bench of a corrupt Supreme Court. He is just as bad as the others." Perley then and there challenged Broderick, willing to die if needs be for this insult to his friend Terry. Broderick refused to accept the challenge on the ground that various attempts had been made to keep him out of the campaign. Not having this excuse after the election, the following day Terry sent him a challenge. Broderick accepted it. Some of Broderick's friends attempted to stop the duel, knowing that he was tired out from the strenuous campaign. Other friends knowing that Broderick was a dead shot said, "The duel has got to come some time; it might as well come now." Terry, who was an expert with the bowie knife, now began derringer practice. The pistols belonged to Dr. Aylett, then physician of Stockton State Asylum, who lived on the north side of Park Street between California and American. Terry practiced in the back part of his yard shooting at a mark on an oak tree until he was able to hit the bull's eye every shot. The duel was to take place September 12, near Lake Merced, San Mateo County. About sixty persons were present, but the chief of police of San Francisco appeared and stopped the duel. Secret arrangements were made and the parties met about two and a half miles southeast of the lake. "As the duelists took their places about ten paces apart," says James O'Meara, an eyewitness, "Broderick appeared nervous, and, straining his nerves to the utmost tension stood stiff and unnatural. His opponent, cool and calculating, stood erect, and firm, and in an easy position awaiting the command to fire." The pistols used were Aylett's pistols, with which Terry had been practicing. Broderick had never seen them until the fatal day. They were made especially for dueling, and the trigger was such that it could be made to pull hard or be fired at the touch of the finger by turning or loosening a little screw. Some witnesses stated that Terry was seen to place the pistol behind him just before the word to fire was given. According to the arrangements the second was to repeat the words, "Fire—One, two." Neither duelist was to raise his pistol before the word fire nor discharge it after the speaking of the word "two." The second repeated the words "Fire—one, and Broderick's pistol was discharged, the ball striking the earth about nine feet in front of Terry. Just before "two" was spoken Terry fired, his ball penetrating Broderick's right breast, piercing the lung. He slowly sank to the earth and died September 17. Was this a deliberate murder? Terry, turning to his second, said, "The shot is not mortal. I have struck two inches to the right." Broderick is reported to have said, "They have killed me because I was opposed to the extension of slavery and a corrupt administration."

Farcical Trial of Terry

Dueling in California was prohibited by law and so they went through the farcical performance of trying Judge Terry for murder. The friends of Broderick wanted Terry tried in San Francisco, but Terry's friends wanted it tried in another county. The place of trial was finally presented before the Supreme Court, and they declaring that to kill another person in a duel was not murder, and the case might be tried in any county. It was then transferred to Marin County and nicely jobbed. The county court was held at San Rafael. The judges very considerably stepped aside and Judge J. H. Hardy of Mokelumne Hill, a close friend of Terry, was appointed to try the case. The trial was set for July 6, 1860, and the witnesses were summoned to appear at 10 o'clock promptly on that day. As 10 o'clock drew near, some person, accidentally of course, set the clock one hour ahead. At 10 o'clock clock time, and 9 o'clock sun time, the jury were in their seats and the judge upon the bench. The judge then asked the prosecuting attorney, "Are you ready?" "All ready, your honor," he replied. The names of the prosecuting witness were then called. Not one answered. They were then in a sailboat crossing San Francisco Bay, to arrive shortly before the true opening hour of court. No witnesses appearing the counsel for Terry moved that the case be given to the jury. The judge gave his charge to the jury. And without so much as leaving their seats they rendered a verdict of "not guilty." Judge Terry walked from that court room a free man; throughout his life, however, he was branded as the murderer of Broderick.

CHAPTER XIII

THE FOREIGN POPULATION

Israel Zangwill, the great Jewish writer, calls America the "melting pot of nations." In relation to San Joaquin County this is true only in part. Many immigrants from other nations, notably those from Germany, Ireland, England, Scotland, France, and smaller nations have blended with the Americans in customs, habits and thoughts, but the Jews, the Chinese and the Japanese are as distinctive a race today as they were fifty years ago. The Chinese are apart and they have no desire to enter the melting pot, but their American-born children are fast adopting American ways. The Japanese are doing their level best to get into that pot, but the Americans tolerate them only in a financial sense. The Jews are apart because they consider themselves "God's chosen people" and through their distinctive racial solidarity.

The foreign population of Stockton, as given in the United States census of 1870, was 4,102, not including the Chinese. Japanese there were none. This population was classified as follows: From England 532, Scotland 123, Sweden 153, France 189, Germany 1,084, and Ireland 1,581. The Chinese in 1860, according to the census, numbered 139, and in 1870 1,692. It was impossible to make a count during the mining days as they were coming and going by the hundreds, and suspicious of the Americans, they would not correctly report their numbers. Besides the nations named there were immigrants from Italy, Spain, Wales, Denmark, Norway, South America, Mexico, the Sandwich Islands and German and Polish Jews. What a fusion of metal they would have made had they all blended, but they did not blend; had they done so this chapter could not have been written. Their customs, manners and religion were different, hence I have assembled these first-named, together with the Mexicans, in one chapter.

The Mexican People

The Mexican people of Stockton came originally from Mexico, the sons and daughters of Spanish soldiers and Indian mothers. They were almost unanimously of the ignorant peon class. The American hatred of these people was the after-effects of the Mexican War, their efforts to dig the gold and take it from the country and their admiration of a good horse regardless of its owner.

They were very poor and lived in shacks or hovels with scarcely any furniture, no carpets upon the floor and in many cases not even a wooden floor, the bare earth serving them. They had no improvements around their houses, not even a fence or sidewalk, and often adjoining the house was the corral where they stabled one or two horses. Every family had one or more dogs and it seemed the poorer the family the greater number of canines. Nearly all of the families lived within sight and sound of the Catholic Church, and the bell was rung at 6 o'clock a. m. and 6 p. m., thus giving them the time of day. The families were located principally east of San Joaquin and south of Washington Street.

The men were engaged in the various occupations of sheep herding and sheep shearing, as pack-mule drivers, and vaqueros, for there were thousands of cattle, horses and sheep in the surrounding country that required herding and handling for market. In the town a few Mexicans were engaged in manufacturing bridles, Spanish bits, spurs, hair rope, hair cinches, and stampers of leather for saddles. The men when not employed would lie around smoking cigarettes and gambling. The women would do all the housework, such as it was, even to the marketing, and day after day the women were seen with a shawl thrown over their heads, carrying their basket on their way to the grocer or butcher. They would always purchase the cheapest of meats, and then beg a piece of meat for the dog. Their principal food was flour, corn, beans and beef. They never used mutton or pork and cooked their foods in beef suet; everything they used was steeped in red pepper and garlic.

The Mexicans were expert horsemen and much of their work was done on horseback. They were also expert with the riata in catching and throwing animals, although in neither their rope work or their horsemanship were they equal to the cowboys of today. They were great admirers of the horse and began riding horseback in early childhood. Their admiration for the animal was so strong that frequently they took possession of other people's property. Horse stealing became so common, not only among the Mexicans, but the Americans, that a law was passed in 1852 making horse stealing a capital crime. It was repealed the following year and horse stealing went right on. The crime was so common that severe measures were necessary to stop it, if possible, and the owner of the stolen animal was justified in killing the thief on the spot. A case of this kind was reported. A man named Weber lost a valuable horse and saddle in March, 1855. Having some idea of the direction the thief traveled, he obtained another animal and started in pursuit. The following morning he found his horse tied to a tree and nearby a Mexican cooking his breakfast by a campfire. Shooting and killing the thief he threw the body across the saddle horse he had stolen and brought him to town. Another case was that of Thomas Marshall. Early one morning in 1856, he heard a noise in his stable near the home in the south part of Stockton. Going to the door with his cocked revolver, he saw in the moonlight a tall Mexican leading one of his horses from the stable; Marshall fired two shots at him, and the man dropping the rope, ran like a deer for the street. That morning a tall, straight-as-an-arrow Mexican was found dead upon the sidewalk near the South Methodist Church. He lay there in the morning sun for over two hours before the coroner took charge of the body. Upon inquiry as to his death, Marshall informed the coroner of his actions early that morning. The Mexican had a wonderful vitality, as he had run over half a mile with two shots in his body, either one of them fatal.

One of the strongest characteristics of the Mexican was his revengeful nature, especially concerning womanhood, and among themselves they would fight to the death. Their favorite weapon was the bowie knife, and many of their women carried concealed daggers. Until the erection of the Clark Hotel a few years ago, there stood on the corner of Market and Sutter Streets a large oak tree, and around this tree, in 1858, was fought one of the most tragic duels of the state. Two Mexicans had some difficulty over a woman and going to this tree about three o'clock in the morning the two men fought round and round the tree until both were so badly cut that they fell exhausted and both died later. Several Americans saw the duel and said, "Let them fight, they are nothing but greasers." The men had fought so long that they wore a pathway around the tree, and it was covered with blood. Two Mexicans in July, '54, began disputing in the El Dorado Saloon over some trivial matter "and as the subject waxed warm they concluded to fight it out with bowie knives. They proceeded down to the wharf near the store of Paige & Webster and went to work with the precision of Mexican soldiers. One, a boy seventeen years of age, was stabbed twice in the arm and the other duelist landed in jail." July seems to have been a warm month for Mexican duels, for the newspaper reports one in July, 1853, between two senoritas. The two women had some trouble over a dog, and they challenged each other to fight. They accordingly met between their respective adobes armed with bowie knives. The contest lasted several minutes, each cutting the other severely.

Joaquin Murietta

The chief of the Mexican revengers was Joaquin Murietta, who terrorized the central part of the state from 1849 to 1853. Joaquin, but nineteen years of age when he began his criminal career, was beyond all doubt the most daring, cool-headed and quick-witted of any of California's desperadoes. In his appearance he is said to have been a handsome light-complexioned Mexican with black curly hair and deep blue eyes. He was of splendid physique, an unerring shot with a revolver and ready for any kind of daring adventure. Hailing from Mexico, he came to California in 1849 with a Mexican circus and located in Los Angeles. While there he fell in love with Rosita Felix, whose parents were Spanish and proud Castilians and objected to their daughter's marriage with a Mexican, so they eloped. Going to Shaw's Flat, Murietta discovered some rich "diggin's" and began mining. One day a company of American bullies came along and finding that Murietta had a good thing attempted to drive him away, saying that greasers were not allowed to dig gold from the American soil. The young fellow held his ground. He said that he had obeyed the mining laws and had a perfect right to dig for gold. Then the cowards insulted Murietta's wife and when he resented it they knocked him down and severely beat him, and ravished his wife in his presence. The ruffians then fled, and Joaquin, stifling his revenge, went further back in the mountains, where he hoped the Americans would not come. Not long after this he visited Murphy's Camp, riding a horse belonging to his half-brother. Again a party of scoundrels greeted him with the remark, "You d—d greaser, where did you steal that horse?" Without waiting for him to give an explanation, they seized Joaquin, bound him to a tree and whipped him severely upon his bare back, turned him loose with the remark, "Now vamoose and never come back to these diggins unless you want to be hung." Burning with hatred against the Americans, he took an oath that he would have revenge for his three wrongs, for the Americans had not only outraged his wife and severely whipped him without any cause, but they had shot and killed his half-brother.

Organizing a band of some twenty of the worst desperadoes in the state, including Roger Felix, Pedro Gonzales and Manuel Garcia, better known as three-fingered Jack, for over three years he terrorized the great San Joaquin Valley with murders, robberies and daring exploits. His criminal record is unsurpassed by any other bandit on the Coast. Here is the record of Joaquin and his band for ten days in February, 1852: On February 12, at Mokelumne Hill they robbed an American and four Chinamen. A party started in pursuit of the gang and easily tracing them found that at Big Bar on the 16th they murdered six Chinamen and got away with $10,000. On the following day a German traveler reported that the band had relieved him of $600. At Rich Gulch they killed three Chinamen and wounded five more, getting $10,000 in gold dust. The sheriff of the county and his posse now followed in pursuit and suddenly coming upon the band February 20, while robbing a bank, a fight took place in which the Mexicans came out second best. They all escaped, however, as the sheriff's horses were too tired to follow the bandit.

Joaquin Murietta was the Claude Duval of California as that famous highwayman was the terror of England. Joaquin in his escape from justice was assisted by all of the Mexican people, who would act as spies and inform him of every movement of the officers. His band had the fastest horses in the country and committing a robbery or murder in one locality, the following day he would be a hundred miles distant. His escapes from an early death seemed almost miraculous, considering his daring exploits. It is said on one occasion he attended a fandango in Monterey. While on the floor dancing, the sheriff of the county came up to him and speaking in Spanish said, "Senor, have you seen anything of Murietta in your travels?" "No; but I should like to get hold of the gentleman." Quietly Murietta left the dance and in a few minutes was miles away. On another occasion he visited a saloon in Marysville and began playing monte. During the conversation Murietta was discussed, and a card player remarked, "I would give a thousand dollars for a shot at Murietta." The desperado, jumping upon the table, exclaimed, "You cowardly gringo, look, I am Murietta," and before the astonished party could gather their thoughts he ran to the door, jumped on his horse and sped away. One of his most daring escapes was at Stockton. A reward of $5,000 had been offered for Murietta's capture dead or alive and posters were sent out to that effect. One day several persons were reading one of the posters fastened on the side of a house when one of them exclaimed, "I would like to get that greaser in range of my gun, I'd pay my score. Murietta's gang caught me on the road below Angels Camp, they took my horse and all my gold dust, and tying me to a tree two of his men gave me a whipping, while Murietta looked on and laughed." About that time a horseman rode quietly along on a small, well-built mustang. He stopped and listened to the conversation for a few minutes, then dismounting he went to the poster and quickly wrote the words, "I will give $10,000 myself. Joaquin Murietta." Then with a quick spring into the saddle he swiftly rode away. Parties pursued him, but he had the fastest animal, a lead of many miles and pursuit was useless.

The authorities were determined to somehow break up and capture the outlaws, and in 1853 the legislature commissioned Harry Love, a well-known gun-fighter and ranger, to organize a company of horsemen and capture the bandit. Love organized a company of twenty men, among them Captain P. E. Connor. They rode over the country for several months but could find no trace of Joaquin, for his Mexican spies, both men and women, whom he paid with much gold, kept him posted as to every movement of the Love party. Meeting with failure at every turn, Love finally resorted to strategy. During the day time he would ride in one direction and at night he would travel in another. In that way he deceived Joaquin's sentinels and they could not warn him as to Love's locality. On July 25, while Love and his party were traveling in Fresno County near Tulare Lake they noticed a rather suspicious smoke arising from the broad plain, the Mexicans were sitting around, some smoking cigarettes and others playing cards. As soon as the Americans recognized the party they made a dash for the camp; the Mexicans, taken by surprise, made no effort to fight but fled in every direction. Joaquin was recognized by William Byrnes, one of the Love rangers, and he shouted, "This is Joaquin, boys; we've got them at last!" Murietta, springing from the ground, ran to his unsaddled horse, which was staked out to feed, and jumping on his back dexterously threw a loop around his nose to guide him. Hoping to escape his pursuers, he ran his horse to a bluff and forced him to jump to the earth below. Some of the party riding around both sides of the bluff attempted to cut him off. Shooting at Joaquin as he ran, one of the shots struck the animal and it fell. The desperado then attempted to run, but a well-directed bullet ended his career and, throwing up his hands, he exclaimed, "No tira mas yo soy muerto," (Don't shoot any more for I am dead.) They severed the head from the body and preserved it in alcohol to prove that the famous bandit was no more. Later it was sold to some traveling showman and exhibited throughout the state.

The Fandango

One of the pleasures of the Mexican people was the "fandango," a lively Spanish dance. The fandango as danced by the Mexicans themselves was right and proper, for woe to the Mexican who insulted a wife or maiden, but later fandango houses became the vilest of vile resorts. There were several fandango houses in Stockton, and singularly enough one of them became the Baptist house of worship. The authorities long tried to suppress these places and in 1854 succeeded. "The better element of society rejoiced today, March, 1854, because of the closing of the fandango houses. One year previous there were a dozen or more such houses, but from that time on they were gradually closed until they were reduced to a single fandango." A little later the famous gambling house, the "El Dorado," corner of Center and Weber Avenue, was closed. It was first run by John Owens, and later by John W. O'Neal, who figured considerably in politics. The press commenting on the closing of the El Dorado, said: "We are pleased to record the closing of the only gambling house in the city. John O'Neal, the owner, has concluded to convert the building into stores. Public gambling and fandangoes have yielded to the mandates of the moral sentiment of the community. The great accession of women and children to our population has done much to influence these results. Schoolhouses have taken the place of gambling saloons and, in one instance, the gospel is preached."

The Cascarone Ball

A very pretty dance engaged in by the better class of Mexicans was what was known as the Cascarone ball. It was a dance by which favors were shown by the women to those men they most admired. This admiration was shown by means of egg shells filled with finely cut colored papers or perfume. The dance was celebrated in the spring of the year, when eggs were plentiful. The yolks of the eggs were drawn, the shell filled with the papers or perfume and the opening covered over. During the dance, or at any time, the woman would slip up, unseen by the favored one, and throw one of the egg shells at his head, and the shell breaking would fill his hair with the colored papers. Reserving the egg shells filled with perfume until the last of the dance, she would break them upon the heads of the men she most admired. It was considered an honor to be thus pelted, and a high honor to those who were thus perfumed. It served another purpose, for maidens could thus designate those whose attentions they desired, and the wives, those whose friendship they respected. These Cascarone balls were given at intervals for many years, the last one being given along in 1880 in the old Pioneer hall, the Mexican population of the city and county being few in number.

Hanging of Judas

The principal sports of the Mexicans were the amusing sport of hanging Judas Iscariot, flour-throwing day and the barbarous sport of rooster-pulling. The last-named sport was saintly in comparison to the cruel cowboy exhibitions of today. The first took place just before the crucifixion day of Jesus Christ. It was a religious performance and typified their hatred of Christ's betrayer. The Mexicans made up a dummy with a false mask and all kinds of horrible clothing and placed a quantity of gunpowder in the body; then seating him in a chair in an old tumble-down wagon, the older the better, drawn by two sorry-looking mustangs, they hauled Judas about the streets to the sound of discordant music and the jeers of the Mexicans. A short time before ten o'clock mass in the Catholic Church, the procession halted on Washington Square, they hung Judas by the neck on a gallows already prepared for the arch traitor, then set fire to his legs, the fire crept upward, there was an explosion and Judas was blown into smithereens. A few minutes later the church bell rang and all of the Mexicans attended mass.

The Flour Battle

Amusing to all but the victims was the flour-day battle, and to engage in the sport of that battle the participants would spend every dollar they possessed, if necessary, to buy flour. The description of a victim of an event is sometimes better than a description by an observer on neutral ground and I will let the reporter describe what he saw and received good and plenty:

"The celebration of the last day of the carnival took place yesterday—March 8, 1859—and at an early hour the Mexicans began their sports. The center of the fun seemed to be at the corner of El Dorado and Market streets, in front of the Phoenix Hotel. A band of music was in attendance and the partakers in the sport were arrayed in all manner of accoutrements, with cocked hats, soldier hats, stovepipes. There were big Mexicans and little Mexicans and Mexicans of high and low degree. Mexican flags were flying from the adjacent buildings, and the fair sex were upon the balconies. The flour throwing was commenced at an early hour, several victims having been fastened to a chair, overwhelmed with flour, and afterwards taken behind a sort of castle as prisoners of war. Later in the day the Mexicans formed into opposing forces, and at the sound of the bugle, charged upon each other, making the flour which they carried in bags, fly in a bewildering cloud. After pelting each other liberally they began throwing flour at the two or three hundred bystanders, who made excellent time from the spot. One of us got spotted and as a special compliment he received a pound or so of the staff of life, but his excellent traveling qualities soon removed him from danger. At a late hour "fatal curiosity," the same propensity which betrayed Mrs. Bluebeard into a very awkward scrape, tempted another of us to gaze upon the motley crowd in Center Street. The leader, Colonel Lopez, unfortunately happening to be our Spanish interpreter, and wishing to pay the compliments of the season, the unlucky newspaper man, who was gazing, was seized by several stout hombres, and before he could say his soul was his own, he was deluged with flour, enough to sustain a good-sized family a week. When he escaped the scribe could not tell himself from "Death on a pale horse." The rogues soaked it to him good. Though he appreciated the compliment and the three cheers, a little less flour would have been more acceptable. The sport was carried out in good humor and we hope to see another specimen, but far from the immediate danger of participation."

Rooster Pulling

The sport of rooster pulling was fun for the Mexicans but death to chanticleer. Its origin is unknown, but in its performance the Mexican riders displayed great nerve and expert horsemanship. The entire performance centered around a rooster, his body planted in the earth, leaving his neck and head free. The feat was for a Mexican on horseback, riding rapidly past the rooster's head to quickly bend over and pull him from the earth. It was a difficult and dangerous feat, as the stumbling of the animal or the turning of the saddle would crush the rider's head against the ground. It was also difficult because the rooster would always dodge as the man's hand came near him. In this sport the riders were very cruel to their bronchos, as they would prick their long spurs into their quivering flanks and stop them short, after passing the rooster, with their Spanish bits. It was no unusual sight to see the poor mustangs bleeding at the mouth, and their flanks gnashed and bleeding as if cut with a knife. When a rider succeeded in pulling a rooster from the earth it was his hour of victory and he was privileged to pelt his defeated companions over the head and shoulders with the body of the victim. Then would come the race to get out of his way. If they had faster horses they were lucky; if not they would go racing through the streets, the victor pelting them until there was nothing left of the rooster but the head and neck. The sport usually took place on St. John's day, on Washington Square. In the '60s the authorities prohibited the performance on the square and riding at a breakneck speed through the principal streets. They then transferred their rooster pulling to the banks of Mormon Channel near American Street.

Early Jewish Settlers

In the rush of '49 between two and three hundred Jews came to Stockton. They came like the multitude, to get gold, not like the goldseekers, to dig it from the earth, but to get it by trade rather than by manual labor. It was a very unusual thing to find among them a gold digger or a mechanic in Stockton. They were shopkeepers, merchants, peddlers and auctioneers. The first book store in town was owned by J. Rosenbaum on Center Street and near him was the clothing store of Bernard Frankheimer, who later moved to Main Street near Hunter and employed as a clerk David S. Rosenbaum, in after years one of Stockton's most progressive citizens. Another progressive citizen of the fifties was Isaac Zachariah, first a clothier and then an auctioneer. He planted a beautiful garden of fruits and flowers, and the public was at all times welcome. At one time the public school picnic was held there and he provided all the refreshments. Time and again the citizens and the fire companies were indebted to him for flowers for decorations. Another set of men were peddlers, and taking their packs upon their backs they would tramp over the county, selling their goods. Today their children are reaping the harvest of their hard-earned toil.

Among the well known Jewish families of Stockton were the Bernard Frankheimers, M. L. Abramsky, the Harts, David Safferhill, the Rosenbaum, Kullman and Saltz families, and later the Friedbergers from San Andreas, and the Levinskys from Woodbridge. Some of these men were prominent in secret societies. Isaac Zacariah was the first noble grand of Charity Lodge, I. O. O. F., and Hiram Mitchell, who now sleeps in the Jewish cemetery, was a charter member of Stockton Lodge of Odd Fellows and the first Odd Fellow in Stockton to attend a sick and needy brother until his death. Looking further we find the names of S. Friedman, Louis Rosenthal, R. G. Jacobs, Samuel Marks, E. Gumperts, A. Kolberg and M. Stamper, Odd Fellows of many years ago. Among the Masons there were many and we find Michael Arndt, L. H. Frankheimer, Dr. William and A. V. Friedberger, Henry Glick, Emil Gumpert, Alfred Haslach-er and Irvin Zeimer, 32nd degree Masons.

The Jewish religious organization is known as the Congregation Ryhim Ahoovim—Be-loved brethren—and, said Moses Marks in 1905, "A half century has gone by since this congregation was organized. This was in 1852, and three years later the congrgation, like King Solomon of old, said, 'And behold I purpose to build an house unto the name of the Lord my God.'" They obtained a lot on the north bank of the channel on Miner Avenue near Hunter Street, the rear of the lot being under water much of the time. Sub-scriptions of money were obtained from Hebrews and Gentiles, and a small building was erected, seating probably 200 at a cost of $3,500. "The synagogue is a commodious structure and the whole reflects a high credit upon the congregation. It was lighted by a six-lamp chandelier with whale oil as a fuel. At the altar candles were used as in this day. The elegant and beautiful curtains which hid the Ark of the Covenant were presented to the congregation by Mr. and Mrs. M. Marks. An eloquent and impressive dedication discourse in English and Hebrew was delivered by Julius Eckmann of San Francisco." During the flood of 1861-62 there was two feet of water on the floor of the synagogue and a rushing river on the front and rear of the building, and as soon as possible the building was removed to a lot on Hunter Street opposite the home of Wm. Kierski. It was set three feet above the ground and provided with a portico and fence. The congregation worshiped in this house until 1905.

A Hebrew Marriage

An event in the synagogue which created considerable interest in the community because of its novelty was the marriage in January, 1859, of Samuel Faulk, of San Francisco, to Miss Lenken Swartz, of Stockton. Long before the hour set for the ceremony the building was crowded with Jews and Gentiles, anxious to witness the Jewish marriage ceremony, as it was the first marriage of the kind in Stockton. At the appointed hour the bridal party, fourteen in number, arrived at the synagogue, marched up the aisle to the platform in the following order, first, four young lady bridesmaids accompanied by four grooms-men, then came the bride accompanied by two married ladies, and behind them the bridegroom and the husbands of the two matrons, the latter witnesses to the marriage contract. The wedding party standing front of the Ark of the Covenant, Rabbi Julius Eckmann addressed the audience in "a happy style, and alluded to the fact that the national prejudice against the Jews was passing, as evinced by the large number of Gentiles present." He then addressed the bride and groom upon their duties. This short address was followed by a prayer. The platform was then covered by a white satin canopy or "chuppa" and beneath it stood the bride and groom, the rabbi, the two male witnesses and their wives. The bridesmaids and grooms-men stood at the corners of the platform, two at each corner, the men supporting the canopy by long staffs. The obligation of the synagogue, which was very solemn and impressive, was then administered to the bridal couple. The rabbi then read aloud the marriage contract stating that the bride and bridegroom did "on the 24th of Shevatt in the year 1519 enter into a certain contract." The year corresponded to the 30th of January, 1859. The blessing was then chanted in Hebrew. During this time one of the witnesses held in his hand a silver tankard and a glass tumbler, and as the marriage vows were pronounced the husband and wife each took a sip of liquid from the tankard. The glass was then dropped to the floor and the husband crushed it with his foot. This ended the ceremony. The bridal party and their friends then wended their way to Turnverein hall and sat down to a magnificent dinner and those present then enjoyed the dance to the music of a fine orchestra until near midnight.

As early as 1851 the Jews of Stockton set apart a sacred place of burial for their dead. In that year the Hebrew ladies requested Captain Weber to give them a burial plot. He complied with their request and gave them the block bounded by Union, Acacia, Pilgrim and Poplar streets, then outside of the city limits. They enclosed a small part of the block with a high rough-board fence, and a burial was there made as early as 1852. This was Stockton's first permanently established cemetery. The Hebrew ladies were anxious to erect a suitable fence around the block, but the conditions were such that nothing could be accomplished until 1859. In that year the Hebrew Ladies' Benevolent Society gave a ball in the city hall January 20 "for the purpose of raising funds to be appropriated to the building of a fence around the Hebrew burial ground." They secured one of the best citizens to act as manager and the ball was a financial success. The ladies cleared $375.75, and in February at a meeting of the Congregation Ryhim Ahoovim, of which Joseph Marks was president and Bernard Frankheimer, secretary, the money was presented to them by Miss Rebecca Marks, together with $100 from the society, as a donation to the fund. "The fence around the Jewish cemetery has been quite completed," said the reporter in December, 1859, "and the place is now an almost exact counterpart in appearance to the Odd Fellows burial ground." What became of that fence I don't know, but for many years the block has been enclosed by a fence of Osage orange trees. It is an evergreen memorial to the pride and perseverance of the first Hebrew Ladies' Benevolent Society.

The Oppenheimer Duel

The Hebrews were a highly moral people for from early childhood they were taught the religion of their fathers and the Mosaic law. Even their personal difficulties were settled out of court. There was one case, however, where the Jew, like Shakespeare's Shylock, wanted blood. The difficulty occurred in April, 1860. Samuel Frankenthall and M. P. Oppenheimer, a wholesale cigar dealer, engaged in a fight over some trivial matter. Later Frankenthall, in telling of the fight to a friend, remarked that he would rather believe a Chinaman or a negro than Oppenheimer. When Oppenheimer heard of his opponent's remark he demanded that the Jew retract the insulting words. Frankenthall was stubborn and refused to change his opinion of Oppenheimer. Then the latter challenged his enemy to mortal combat on the "field of honor." The seconds were selected and by the terms of the agreement the two men were to meet west of the asylum at six o'clock in the morning. The weapons used were navy revolvers and the duelists were to stand twelve paces apart back to back, and at the word, wheel and fire. After one round, in which no one was in danger but the seconds, an attempt was made to adjust the difficulty, but Frankenthall would not go back of his opinion regarding adversary. After firing two more rounds, each man, shooting holes in the air, the seconds succeeded in ending the deadly affair, Frankenthall saying that he would believe Oppenheimer as quickly as he would a Chinaman or a negro. This assertion satisfied Oppenheimer and the parties again became friends.

The Jewish Reform Movement

In the last few years of the 19th century a wonderful reform was made in the Jewish religion. The reform movement in Stockton was led by M. S. Jaffee, and it resulted in a separation of the Congregation Ryhim Ahoovim, the departure of Rabbi Davidson, who had been their rabbi for over twenty years, and the establishing of a new synagogue on Fremont Street between California and Sutter.

Dedication of the Temple

In the year 1900 the old synagogue was fast decaying from the stress of winter storm, summer heat and over half a century of service, and the congregation planned to build a handsome Temple Israel, but when the bids were opened for the construction of an edifice of wood it was found that the bids for material, especially that of lumber, was so high that the lowest bid was $2,000 higher than the architect's estimate, and they were compelled to defer for a time the building of a new temple. In 1905 it was erected at a cost of approximately $14,000, and seating about 400 persons, was dedicated Friday evening, September 12. Early in the evening it was crowded with Jews and Gentiles, the last named forming more than one-half of the audience. The ceremonial service was preceded by an organ prelude by Karl Brueck. A prayer was then offered in Hebrew by Rabbi Montague of San Francisco. While the choir was singing the rabbi retired to a rear room and immediately returned accompanied by two gentlemen carrying the sacred scrolls. These they delivered into the keeping of Rabbi Voorsanger. After reading a passage of scripture appropriate to the occasion, he deposited the scrolls "within the sanctuary over which stands the tablet of the law." The next ceremonial was the lighting of the "perpetual light" and H. Marks, the president of the Congregation, arose from his seat with a lighted taper in his hand and repeated first in Hebrew and then in English the sacred words, "Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God the Eternal is one God." He then read in Hebrew from the new English version of Genesis 1:1-2 translated for use in the Jewish service. Up to this time the temple was dimly lighted but as the president repeated the last line, "And God said Let there be Light; and there was Light" he lit the perpetual light and the full flow of gas was turned on in the candlebras. Following the address of Lucius L. Solomon of San Francisco, M. P. Stein stepped upon the platform, accompanied by little Hattie Glick—now Mrs. Carl Steinhart—bearing the key of the temple on a cushion. The key he presented to the president, who in receiving it said in part, "The unlocking of this door is an invitation to the people of all denomination to enter and be welcomed." The Hebraic prayer by Rabbi Cohen was preceded by the choir singing the one hundredth Psalm, the choir singing during the Rabbi's absence the hymn, "Sh'ma Yisroel." Just previous to the remarks of President Marks the song of "Etz Chay-him," Tree of Life, was sung.

Concluding his address Miss Bessie S. Rosenbaum sang the hymn, "Lead, kindly light," and the anthem "I will magnify Thee, Oh Lord," following the address of President Marks. H. Weinstock's address on "Why We Build Beautiful Houses of Worship" was followed by the dedicatory address by Dr. Voorsanger, the choir then singing the Jewish hymn, "Ador Olam." The benediction was then pronounced by Rabbi Cohen.

Arrival of Chinese

The Chinese are a paradox. They are more troublesome to the authorities than any other class of foreign population, because of their gambling, opium smoking, prostitution and tong wars. They are the most desirable of servants and employes because of their docility; never go on a strike and are willing to work for a fair living wage. They began coming to Stockton as early as January, 1852, the little steamer Kate Kearny bringing quite a number to the city in that month. They continued arriving and in June, 1858, the reporter paid his respects to them as follows: "On Monday night the Helen Hensley brought up over 200 Chinamen and they were later quartered in the Chinese hovel, corner Hunter and Channel streets. The crowd started yesterday for the mines and seated on their luggage on the mule teams they chattered like a lot of apes, which they resemble somewhat." As to their number living in Stockton, the first census report we have is in 1870. In that year they numbered 1,629, in 1880 1,997, in 1890 1,676, and in 1910 1,873.

Seven-eighths of these Mongolian residents were men and their occupations were principally of the menial class; some were servants in private families; some hotel and restaurant cooks, and in 1854 quite a number were engaged in catching and curing fish. These fish they caught in the Stockton Channel, fishing sometimes where now stands the Hotel Stockton. In curing the fish "they operated on a large schooner and were experts in cleaning them and salting them down in pork barrels, where they found a ready sale in the mines." Hundreds of them were miners and they would camp in Stockton for the winter. It is stated that millions of dollars worth of gold was saved by them, as they were willing to work at a small profit, diggings deserted by the white miners. In later day as the population increased they became laundrymen, vegetable gardeners and hucksters, blackberry pickers, merchants, island renters and potato raisers.

Their foods in the earlier days was of the simplest kind, principally rice, pork, sugar and the finest quality of tea imported from China. They were very fond of ducks and chickens when they had the money to purchase them, ate neither beef nor mutton. The cooked food was set on the floor in large bowls and the Chinamen, squatting around in a circle, would help themselves directly from the bowl to their mouth. The Chinese of today patronize the baker for bread and pastry. Many of them have been family cooks and they appreciate good living.

The Chinese in early times were located on Bridge Street between Hunter and El Dorado, facing Stockton Channel. Their habitats were an old story-and-a-half house, formerly a French hotel, and several one-story shacks that in the early day had been places of business. Crowded into these places with no means of ventilation or sanitation, these houses soon became the foulest ill-smelling spots in the city and a menace to health and the morals of the community, especially the children, for there was a public school only a block away. "They were quiet and peaceful during the day, but at night they made the hours hideous with their infernal bawling and wrangling. "They have become an unbearable nuisance," said the scribe, "but the cold water remedy has been very successful in stopping it in other cities, notably San Francisco, Sacramento and Marysville." Taking the hint as suggested by the Republican, some parties in May, 1854, quietly took one of the fire engines from the engine house late in the evening, set the engine and drawing water from the Channel literally drowned out the shacks. The next morning it created a sensation and considerable feeling because of the disgraceful and unwarranted act, but no arrests were made.

Burning of Chinatown

The water cure was not a success, for the Mongolians went back to their water-soaked hovels as soon as permitted and remained there for several years. In July, 1862, the destruction of these hovels was "regarded as a public benefit." The fire broke out about eleven o'clock at night caused by the explosion of a lamp and in one hour the buildings were a bed of coals. They were owned by George Deitz, a gunsmith, Emile Hestres and M. Poursille, of Philadelphia. Upon the ruins was built the two-story brick now standing. Another disgrace to the city was the house at the corner of Channel and Hunter. Time and again efforts were made to set fire to the place, but the Chinamen were foxy. They guarded the house every night during the summer and threw pails of water upon the shingled roof. Nightly there would be from twenty to fifty Chinamen bunked in a room 20x40 feet, the bunks placed steamboat style, and sometimes they would lay so thick upon the floor it was impossible to walk across the room. The house was finally torn down and the present brick structure erected.

There was good money in renting buildings to Chinese tenants and parties with capital erected one-story buildings for them on Washington Street, between Hunter and El Dorado. They were soon filled with Mongolians and in a short time the same filthy and outrageous conditions existed as in their former location.

They were in a measure isolated for several years as there was but little travel along the street and but few families in that vicinity. At this time many Chinese women had arrived and many of them undesirables.

As the years rolled on more Chinese crowded into that locality and houses for them were erected on both sides of the street. Their presence depreciated the value of property round about, and poor persons began to settle there. Things were getting pretty bad and in September, 1867, Charles Hubner, an honest plain-spoken Hollander, capitalist, and member of the common council, published the following: "To the citizens and taxpayers living in the vicinity of the new Hong Kong, which is permanently settled and located in the heart and midst of the great and flourishing city of Stockton: You hoped that some day you would be relieved of the great evil, but your hopes have been dashed to pieces. The idea that you could pass along the street corner of El Dorado and Washington, without taking a perfume bottle along and smelling frequently of its contents you had beter give up. Don't dream that the time will come when you can sleep without being disturbed by a band of hell-escaped wolves. Don't imagine that you can walk along Washington Street without blushing, for the city fathers will take no measure to suppress this evil. Don't imagine that your sons and daughters will be able to go to school along that street without blushing. You have tried in vain to remove the Chinese from your midst. It would seem as if every officer has taken a special oath to cherish and protect them in their crimes. To the Chinese I would say, go on with your ungodly crimes. Call the youths of your city into your dens, and show them all that is worth seeing, for you are protected by the strong arm of the law." This was no exaggerated statement made by Mr. Hubner, and up to a few years ago it was a common report that the higher-ups were paid "hush money."

Hubner was anxious to abate this evil, and he jointly with others, purchased some lots on Mormon Channel just west of Center Street and erected some cheap houses anticipating that the Washington Street denizens could be prevailed upon to remove to the new locality. Before the shacks were completed they were set on fire and burned down. The people in the neighborhood said they didn't want the Chinese out there. New buildings were erected and without lessening the number in the old Chinatown the new buildings were soon occupied. There took place the only double murder in San Joaquin County. It appears that two Chinamen, a Sam Yup Co and a Hong Wo Co man, were gambling. The Hong man lost and refused to pay the debt, whereupon eight of the Sam Yups surrounded him and attempted to force him to "pungle up." He was a fighter, however, and drawing a knife from his blouse, he stabbed a Sam Yup named Hong Pang who dropped dead. In the excitement Mr. Hong broke away and fled towards the tules, accompanied by another Hong man. Pursued by Sam Yups they began shooting and Sam Yup fell mortally wounded. A Sam Yup then ran to the police office and Officer Jerome Myers was sent out to hunt for the murderers hiding in the tules. As it was near dark he could do nothing and started back to town. Before he had gone far he heard a shot. He and his companion hurried to the spot and found a Hong Wo man had been killed. Myers questioned the Chinese but it was of no use. These "tong wars" are still going on, and many Chinamen have been killed by the "hatchet men" of the other company, because of some crime or insult. There is no possible way for the authorities to punish the murderer as his company will perjure themselves in his favor, employ the best attorneys to defend him, and the other company dare not testify against the murderer, fearing that they will be killed.

The Joss House

The religion of the Chinese is Buddhism, a religion as old as the pyramids of Egypt. In Stockton they had their Buddha, and sometimes they had two of them. Their principal god was in the second story of a Chinese temple or "Joss house" on Hunter Street adjoining Turnverein hall, and there during their religious festivals the Chinese would come from far and near by the hundred and bow down before, and worship the "big Joss." In 1881 the old wooden structure was torn down and in its place they erected "one of the most substantial brick buildings in the city" at a cost of $7,500. The second story was fitted up as a Chinese temple and over $5,000 was expended in fitting up the interior. On one side of the room on an elevated seat sat the new Joss, dressed in all of the color of the rainbow. When sitting he was over eight feet in height, with arms four feet in length. He was a hideous looking monster, scowling upon his worshippers as they bowed and burned incense before his shrine. The temple was dedicated by a three-days ceremonial of priestly prayers, incense and food offerings, and open to the public, thousands of persons visited the place and admired the many excellent specimens of Chinese skill and handiwork. A few years ago the building was sold and converted into a rooming house and meat market.

A Chinese Funeral

One of the oddest events of the Chinese was a funeral. They are a very superstitious people and when a Chinaman died every effort was made to keep the devil from getting him. As the funeral procession wended its way to the cemetery a Chinaman sat upon the hearse with the driver and threw out small slips of red colored papers with Chinese characters upon them, to keep the devil from getting the spirit of the deceased. If the deceased was poor no music, no mourners nor hacks, if wealthy or a man of influence, he had music, a Chinese or American band, paid women mourners who, dressed in white, their mourning color, marched behind the hearse; then came the friends in carriages. Bringing up the rear was an express wagon carrying food for the dead on his celestial journey. This food comprised rice, tea with china tea cups, and other delicacies and a whole hog nicely roasted. On arrival at the cemetery the body was interred in a place set apart especially for Chinese, the food was placed upon the grave and around it burning tapers of incense. The food was usually left there for three or four days, but when the tramps began appropriating the food after the Chinamen left the place, they fooled the weary willies by returning to town with the food. Every Chinaman believes that his spirit could not rest in eternal peace unless his bones be buried in his native soil. So after a time when the body has decayed, the director of his company disinters the remains, and scraping clean the bones, packs them in a small air-tight box and ships them to China. Every few years hundreds of these boxes are exported, containing the bones of deceased Chinese from all parts of the state.

Chinese New Year

The great Chinese day is the Chinese New Year. The celebration, which continues for three days does not come on the same date each year, because in Chinese chronology they calculate time by the phases of the moon and in cycles of sixty years. In preparation for that event the Chinamen of the poorer class save up their money so that they may be enabled to pay all of their debts before New Year's day. So honest were the Mongolians that it was considered a disgrace to be unable to pay his debts, and on one occasion a Chinaman unable to pay up, committed suicide. Just before New Year's you will find in every Chinese hovel, shack and store a little bulb called a Chinese lily. It is a peculiar plant as it does not grow in soil, but in the open air supported by small pebbles in a dish of water. They give this bulb as presents to their friends, together with Chinese nuts and candies, and if the bulb flower before New Year's it is considered as a good omen for that house. The celebration continues for three days and during that time they feast in their own homes, visit their friends, worship in the Joss house and explode hundreds of dollars worth of firecrackers. It was a time of great rejoicing for the small boy and, said an eyewitness, February 1, 1859, "Tuesday was the first of the Chinese New Year and the moon-eyed Johns spread themselves in the way of firecrackers. They were ably assisted in the discharge of this sort of artillery by the Young America of this city, who mustered in great strength around their habitations and volunteered their services." Then, as I have stated, there were few homes in that vicinity and but little travel along Washington Street. In time their noisy celebration became a nuisance as the families in that vicinity were awakened at midnight by the incessant noise of the crackers, and during the day there were several accidents by frightened runaway horses. People made complaint and Edward Colnon, editor of the Mail, demanded in his paper that the chief of police, Ben F. Rodgers, suppress the nuisance. Police regulations were established and the Chinese permitted to fire explosives during certain early and late daylight hours.

THE PROGRESS OF CHRISTIANITY

CHAPTER XIV

AMIDST the scenes of crime and dissipation that were everywhere prevalent in California in the early days, it is a pleasure to recall the first sermon ever delivered in Stockton. To the Presbyterian Church belonged this honor. The Reverend James C. Damon, then a seaman's chaplain at Honolulu, in July, 1849, visited San Francisco. Coming to Stockton, on Sunday, July 12, he delivered a sermon from on board a store ship moored along the channel. It had been previously announced through the camp that a "preacher" was coming to the town and a large crowd of sinners and a few Christians assembled to hear him. His text was from Galatians, "Be ye not deceived, God is not mocked; for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." No more appropriate text could have been selected, and it had its effect. In ten months from that day the Sabbath bell pealing over the city invited all to worship and praise.

Arrival of Protestant Pastors

The evangelizing of the world is the mission of Christianity and as early as 1642 the Catholic Church sent her priests to the Western Coast. When the discovery of gold in California was heralded around the world the Protestant denomination sent seven of their young ministers, the Reverend Albert Williams and James Woods, Presbyterians; T. Dwight Hunt, a Congregationalist; O. C. Wheeler, a Baptist, and the Reverend Flavel S. Mines and the Reverend J. I. Vermehr, Episcopalians, to the Pacific Coast. Mr. Woods arrived with his wife and two sons late in December, 1849, and was surprised to find that the other pastors had preceded him. Remaining in San Francisco some two weeks, he came to Stockton in January, 1850, with letters of introduction to Capt. Charles M. Weber and A. J. Grayson, after whom Grayson on the San Joaquin River is named. On arrival in Stockton on the little steamer, Captain Sutter, he found the mud knee deep. Removing his family and household goods on a two-wheeled dray to the Dickenson House on Center Street near Levee, the dray mired several times and men were compelled to get out and boost it along. The following day was the Sabbath and the pastor held service in the Dickenson Hotel, the proprietor, G. D. Dickenson, being a good Methodist.

Mr. Woods at once made the acquaintance of Captain Weber and declared his purpose to organize a church. Mr. Weber quickly agreed to the plan and to support the pastor a subscription list was started. Mr. Weber agreed to get twenty-five dollars a month. Mr. Woods, without any delay, immediately commenced his ministerial work and began looking around to find some suitable place to hold religious services. He found an excellent place, as he believed, in the locality where now stands the County Jail. It was a large tent with a sign over the door, "A Temperance Store." The proprietor, Thomas Atwood, was a retired sea captain, an ordained minister and later the pastor of the Baptist Church. He gave Mr. Woods permission to preach his first sermon in the tent, but he found it a very noisy place of worship. Mr. Atwood had rented the back part of his tent to a blacksmith, and while Pastor Woods was preaching the blacksmith was shoeing horses at thirty-two dollars per horse.

The ring of the anvil so disturbed the services that Mr. Woods was compelled to look up another place and for the following Sunday he secured a large warehouse. It was a much better place than the store and in it he found many innocent looking barrels. Boards were placed on top of the barrels for seats. The audience was large and the pastor delivered a very forceful sermon on "The Sin of Intemperance." He was very much annoyed the following day to learn that his congregation had been sitting on barrels filled with good old Kentucky rye.

Organization of Presbyterian Church

After the reverend gentleman had been preaching some two months in the home of Nicholas Den on the Peninsula, and in a tent on Main Street, where later stood the church, the First Presbyterian Church was organized March 17, 1850, in the Vernon house on the peninsula, a knock-down building brought around Cape Horn by the Dr. George A. Shurtleff party. The church was organized with the following nine members: Peter Nodine, Samuel L. Yerkes, Ezra E. Washburn, S. W. Foster, Martin Potter, J. S. Anger, Levi Merriam, Ralph Wittesey and Mrs. Eliza Ann Woods, the wife of the pastor.

Captain Weber Donates a Lot

The pastor's experience in the blacksmith shop and among whisky barrels convinced him that the quicker Stockton had an exclusive place of worship the better for the community. Calling on Captain Weber he solicited a donation of a lot for the erection of a church edifice. Mr. Weber quickly replied, "Get together some of the prominent citizens of the town to select a lot and then come to me." Conferring with a number of the leading people of the place, they selected the corner of San Joaquin and Main streets, where the old church stood for so many years. It was a spot well shaded with two handsome oaks, and later the spot was dubbed "The little brown church under the trees." When informed, Captain Weber very generously gave not only the selected lot but the entire quarter of the block. Years later the lot was mortgaged and then sold. It is now the location of the Native Sons of the Golden West.

Having secured the lot, Mr. Woods called together the citizens in regard to immediately erecting a church. With one accord they cried, "Go ahead; we'll give you all the money you want." But not a man could be induced to take charge of the work. "We are too busy," they said. Mr. Woods then took full charge and liberally the money rolled in, the gamblers contributing as freely as the churchmen. The energetic pastor soon had a bag of gold dust, and in March, 1850, he visited San Francisco for the purpose of purchasing lumber for the church. On arrival he found on sale, very cheap, a large number of knock-down warehouses, the market having been overstocked. Purchasing one of these houses, together with other lumber, the material was shipped to Stockton. Mr. Woods then engaged carpenters at twelve dollars per day, and the superintendent, John M. Buffington, mayor of the city in 1854, was paid sixteen dollars a day. In just ten weeks from the date of contract the building was completed at a cost of $4,000. The church, although a neat and tasteful structure at that time, would be a curiosity today, with its white plastered walls, green painted curtains of Chinese manufacture at the windows, and a rough hardwood floor without any carpet. The pulpit consisted of two upright pieces of undressed boards three feet apart, and a board laid across the top and the whole covered with scarlet colored domestic, making a very neat appearance for a pulpit in California in 1850. The choir seats were in the front of the church, raised a foot above the floor; an entrance on either side, and the only means of warming the room was a little wood stove in a corner of the building.

The winter had been very severe and at the time that Mr. Woods was preaching in the tent a stream of water flowed past the door. Persons could not get to the church and Mr. Woods later declared "his hearers were ferried across the Stockton Slough in small boats free to those who attended service."

When the day of dedication arrived, May 5, 1850, the following notice appeared in The Times: "The new Presbyterian church will be opened for worship tomorrow. Services to commence at 11 o'clock. Ferrage free for those attending service." The pastor took as his text, John xviii:38, "What Is Truth?" This sermon was published later in 1862 in pamphlet form by the San Joaquin Republican. Five years after this event Mr. Woods, in speaking of the dedication, said: "Of those present at the dedication not more than five remain in Stockton at the present time. They have returned to the East, gone to the Pacific Islands, and many are dead." Such was the unsettled condition of Stockton's first residents.

Money was plentiful, "no trick at all for a minister to have $20 gold pieces in his pocket," said Mr. Woods, and at a donation party tendered the pastor in May, 1851, the members not only sent provisions by the wholesale—sugar, flour, beans, etc.—but at the evening entertainment a collection of $700 was taken for the pastor's use. After a service of a little over four years Mr. Woods resigned because of the long continued ill health of his wife, leaving behind a church membership of sixty-eight. He preached two sermons each Sabbath, taught school five days of the week—the Stockton Female Seminary—and did the housework during his wife's most severe illness. Then he made pastoral calls, visited the sick, and married the "laddies and lassies." His first marriage was that of Samuel C. Clerk to Rachel Hitchcock, August 7, 1850. His second marriage, August 17, 1852, was Andrew Wolf to Amanda Dwelley.

The pioneer church building was moved over from the San Joaquin Street to the Main Street side of the lot in 1857 and two years later it was sold to the Colored Baptists and moved to West Washington Street. The building is now in use as a Buddhist Temple. In the meantime a new pastor, the Rev. John A. Anderson, had come to fill the pulpit, and immediately he began planning for a new handsome brick structure. He succeeded in obtaining sufficient money, and on June 10, 1859, the cornerstone was laid by the Masons with imposing ceremony. The Order, in full regalia, forming in line at their hall on Center Street, led by the band, marched to the church, and, passing beneath a floral arch, ascended the platform. For more than an hour, in the hot sun, the large crowd had been waiting, and immediately the exercises were begun, by the singing of an anthem by the Presbyterian Church choir. The cornerstone was laid by Edward M. Howison, worshipful master; a list of the articles placed in the box was read by William Graham; the stone was lowered into place by R. B. Parker, and the stone was squared and leveled by Gilbert G. Claiborne, senior warden, and William R. Jefferson, junior warden. The oration was delivered by Rev. William MacDonald of the Episcopal Church. The building was soon finished, and Christmas day, 1859, it was dedicated by the Rev. William A. Anderson of San Francisco, the father of John A. Anderson, assisted by the Rev. Mr. Warren. The handsome little building had been erected at a cost of $17,000, and on the Monday evening following the dedication, the pew sittings were sold with a premium for choice. The premiums ranged in value from $600 down to $75, H. B. Underhill being the highest bidder for first choice, he paying $600. The amount realized from this sale was $7,170. During the pastorate of James Sprecher, in 1885, the church front was extended twenty feet to the sidewalk, the organ placed behind the pulpit and the rooms formerly occupied as a pastor's study were converted into Sunday school rooms. The cost was about $10,000. In 1919 the property was sold and the building demolished; a new and much handsomer church and associate buildings were constructed at a cost of $200,000, where formerly stood the El Dorado public school, corner of Vine and El Dorado streets. The building was completed and dedicated March 25, 1923. This church has the finest pipe organ in the city, installed at a cost of $12,000.

The first concert in the town was given in the old church May 5, 1850, by four male amateur singers. In 1852, the Rev. Mr. Kroh moved to Stockton, and his two eldest daughters, Mary and Maggie Kroh, excellent singers, were induced to sing in the Presbyterian choir. Maggie, later known as Maggie Blake Alverson, after her removal to San Francisco, became one of the most famous contralto singers in California. Their only instrument was a little melodeon, but in 1865, at a cost of $2,500, an organ was purchased. The organist was Judge H. B. Underhill, who gave his services free. The organ was dedicated on the evening of January 12, 1865, with a grand concert, the leading singers being Mrs. Marriner Campbell, the best soprano church singer of her day, and William Eliot, both of San Francisco. Gustave Scott, from Dr. Wadsworth's church, was the organist. Selections were sung from the works of Rossini, Mozart, Mendelssohn and Donizetti, and Mrs. Marriner sang the Schubert Stabat Mater. On the following evening a second concert was given from a platform in the front of the church, and Ada Fisher, Amos Durant and William Cobb of the church choir also took part. During the past twenty-five years the Misses Maggie Hubbard, Mary Parks, S. D. Waterman, Mrs. Preble and Mrs. Frank Burton have presided at the organ. The vocalists have been many in number. Among them, Mesdames Eves, Fyfe, J. P. D. Wilkins, Gertie Noble, Eliza Lang, Louise Carr and Frank Hatch, sopranos; Ret, Kroh, Lewis, Wallace, Hatch, Groves, Gifford and Gertie Hatch, altos, and George Ladd, Amos Durant and William Belding.

The church during the past seventy years had had the following pastors: James Woods, 1850; W. C. Moshier, 1854; William Davis, 1856; John A. Anderson, 1858; Robert Happersett, 1862; J. S. Skinner, 1866; Ben E. S. Ely, 1869; James Roberson, 1872; L. Y. Hayes, 1876; Robert McKensie, 1878; L. M. Schofield, 1880; H. S. Snodgrass, 1882; James Sprecher, 1883; D. L. Munro and J. B. Campbell, 1892; Philo Phelps, 1895; J. W. Lundy, 1897, and J. M. Skinner, 1914.

East Side Presbyterian Church

This church, formerly called the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, was organized in 1858. Previous to this time Dr. S. P. Crawford had been holding services in the Henderson schoolhouse district. In that year the state Presbytery was held in Stockton in the South Methodist Church and the question was asked, "Why has not a church been established in Stockton? In a short time several hundred dollars were collected and a lot purchased on Lindsay Street between Hunter and San Joaquin. A little chapel, 30 by 40, was erected at a cost of $1200 and the building dedicated October 24, 1858, by the Rev. John Yager of Contra Costa County. The pastor of the church in 1860 was dissatisfied with the location of the building and it was sold to the Christian denomination. The Cumberland Presbyterians then purchased the Crescent City Hotel property on Sutter Street, between Main Street and Weber Avenue, paying an equal sum for the building and lot, $2,000. It was fitted up for church purposes at a cost of $4300. The services were discontinued in 1864 until 1868. Then the building was refitted and refurbished at a cost of $2,300, and May 10, 1869, rededicated as a house of worship. Their congregation was so small that they could not meet their expenses and the building was sold to the Christian brethren. Fourteen years later a young pastor, Thomas A. Cowan, came to Stockton from Lebanon, Tenn. Gathering together the little flock of Cumberland Presbyterians, they held service July 25, 1886, in Brainbridge Hall, then on the corner of Miner Avenue and Hunter Street. Soon afterwards a lot was purchased on San Joaquin Street, opposite the high school, at a cost of $900 and a small chapel erected and dedicated December 18, 1887. The young pastor was very popular and soon filled the church on Sunday and had a membership of one hundred. E. L. B. McClelland was the pastor of the church in 1898 and the trustees, deciding that the church was in a poor locality, a lot was purchased, corner of Main and Pilgrim streets. The building was removed to that point and rededicated in September, 1899. Some of the pastors of this church have been Reverends Sweeney, Thomas M. Johnson, Mr. Cunningham, J. M. Small, J. H. Cornwall, T. A. Cowan, J. M. Gaiser, W. D. Farr, C. D. Lane, E. L. B. McClelland, H. P. Ingram, W. D. Rushing, Squires and Matteson.

Grace Methodist Episcopal Church

The first notice that we have of Grace Methodist Episcopal Church is an announcement in 1852, "Divine service if not providentially prevented every Sunday at 11 o'clock and in the evening at the ringing of the bell." The building was located on the southwest corner of Weber Avenue and California Street. Captain Weber deeded them a lot, a small building was erected at a cost of $6,000, and it was dedicated November 2, 1851, by Dr. Boring of San Francisco. In 1853 Bishop Soulé, the first California bishop of that denomination, delivered a sermon in the church. For several years they called it "Soulé Chapel." The building was badly damaged by fire in June, 1876, the church having caught fire from the adjoining burning residence. The belfry was badly damaged and the bell, falling to the ground, was ruined. It cost $1,876 to repair the damage and buy a new bell.

The Rev. O. P. Fitzgerald, then the editor of the "Pacific Methodist," a religious journal, was pastor of the church in 1871. He found the same old dilapidated building as during his former charge in 1868, and he resolved to erect a more creditable building. Subscriptions for a new brick edifice were obtained and plans were drawn for an auditorium to seat about 200 persons. A lot was purchased on the north side of the street where had formerly stood the parsonage and March 24, 1873, a cornerstone was laid by the Masonic order. The pastor of the church at this time, W. H. Mason, acted as grand chaplain, and the Rev. C. V. Anthony, grand orator. The building complete, said Judge J. V. Buckley, cost $9,156, and the edifice was solemnly set apart to God's service June 29, 1873. The Methodist conference sent to this charge in 1886 a young pastor, A. C. Bane, who had been recently ordained. Although without either name or fame, in a short time he was preaching to crowded churches. The trustees raised his salary from $600 to $800 a year, and he was returned to the same charge in 1887, and although the seating capacity was enlarged, many were turned away.

Very prominent and leading members of this church were Mr. and Mrs. John N. Woods. This Christian woman died April 7, 1900, and her husband resolved to erect a beautiful new church edifice as a memorial to her. The building was to be erected on certain conditions which the trustees quickly accepted and plans were drawn for the handsome edifice now standing on the corner of Stanislaus and Channel streets, which at that time was opposite the Woods' residence. Before the work of building was begun, December 6, 1906, Mr. Woods passed away. His daughters, Mrs. Jessie Lee Wilhoit and Mrs. Mary L. Douglass, resolved to carry on the work as planned by their father. It took some time to straighten out the probate court proceedings, but on their father's birthday, June 7, 1909, the work was commenced. It was pushed forward rapidly, but in some unaccountable manner the uncompleted structure caught fire September 17 and the entire woodwork was destroyed at a loss of $2,000. The contractor, Claude Long, also a member of the church, with determined grit, said, "I will have that building done when I said I would." And it was dedicated, free from debt, March 20, 1910, by the Rev. J. A. Wailes. The beautiful edifice, with its fire-proof concrete walls, stained glass windows, furniture and fine organ, was completed at a cost of $35,000. During the dedicatory service the choir sang Mrs. Woods' favorite hymn:

I know that my Redeemer lives,
 What comfort this sweet message gives;
 He lives my mansion to prepare,
 He lives to bring me safely there,
 All glory to His name.

The following are some of the pastors of Grace Methodist Episcopal Church: Reverends Cyprian Gridley, 1851; Green Woods, 1852; A. M. Bailey, 1853; J. H. Kelley, 1854; J. C. Simmons, 1856; Orlando Fisher, 1857; L. D. Hargis, 1861; J. R. Tanzy, 1867; J. M. Lowell, 1868; R. T. Lattimer, 1869; O. P. Fitzgerald, 1871; W. H. Mason, 1873; A. C. Bane, 1886-87; C. E. W. Smith, 1907; J. A. Wailes, 1910, and L. S. Jones and J. A. B. Fry, 1919.

The Christian Church

Strange as it may appear there was no love lost between the Christian denominations previous to the Civil War. The Presbyterians, Baptists, North Methodist, Episcopalians and German Methodists were opposed to slavery; the Catholic Church stood upon neutral ground, and the Cumberland Presbyterian, South Methodist and the Christian Church believed that slavery was a divine institution.

The Christian Church or Disciples of Christ were among the first of the religious denominations. The arrival of Elder Thomas Thompson was the incentive for the organization and a church was organized August 21, 1851, he preaching a sermon on that day. Two months later they observed Thanksgiving Day, November 27, Rev. W. W. Stevenson preaching in the court house, then in the McNish Building. They at once began discussing the building of a church. When James Woods, the Presbyterian pastor, asked Captain Weber for a church lot he believed the pastor was representing the Christians. Weber knew that they were talking of a house of worship and as Thomas Maxwell and Silas Hitchcock, two of their members, were under his command the San Jose Rangers during the Mexican War, he readily granted the 100 foot square. By this misunderstanding they were euchered out of the Presbyterian lot. They soon had a church home, however, as purchasing a story and a half attic house, formerly used as a store, they moved it on to a lot where now stands the Union Bank on San Joaquin Street and fitted it up as a church. The lot was deeded to them by John D. Green and Silas Hitchcock. The pastor was the Rev. W. G. Canders, then a teacher in the public schools. Two quaint notices thus appeared at that time: "Religious services will be held at the Christian meeting house, opposite the court house at early candle light. Rev. Mr. Thompson will preside." Then again, April 14, 1855, "There will be preaching in the frame building, east side of the court house at eleven and three o'clock. Elder McCorkle will preach on church government." The congregation was widely scattered. Many of them were engaged in stock raising and it was difficult for them to assemble at the church. Abandoning the edifice, they met for several years in the home of John D. Green, about six miles out in the country.

Church service was again resumed in Stockton in April, 1858. Again they reorganized in April, 1860, and selling the lot on San Joaquin Street for $600, they obtained liberal subscriptions and for $2,000 purchased the Cumberland Presbyterian property on Lindsay Street. At this time William C. Miller and J. H. Tharp were the elders, C. P. Crow and Robert Hitchcock, deacons, and Samuel, William and Robert Miller and William P. Shaw, trustees. The Bible class leader was Peter S. Wilkes. They sold the property to the German School Association for $2,000 in March, 1872, and immediately purchased for $2,500 the Cumberland Church property on Sutter Street. The congregation had so increased in number in 1890 that they discontinued services in the old church and began holding services in Masonic hall. They had no permanent pastor until 1897. At that time the Rev. Thomas A. Boyer held Bible services in the hall and the trustees and congregation were so pleased with his work that they called him as their pastor. Soon after this a lot, corner of California and Lindsay streets, was purchased and a building of wood erected at a cost all told of $10,000. It was formally dedicated on the evening of April 30, 1899. The trustees, marching in a body up to the altar, presented to the pastor, Rev. Thomas Boyer, the church completed. During the entire day services were held; in the forenoon the Rev. R. L. Hatton of Santa Cruz delivered the sermon; in the afternoon the Rev. Mr. Martin of Fresno preached a discourse and the pastor preached in the evening.

During the services in this church up to 1890 they had only congregational singing, without any instrument. The members were poor and they could not engage a paid choir and many of them were opposed to paid singers, or having any instrument in the church. But as time passed the old members who so strenuously opposed the choir passed to their reward. A new generation appeared with the Rev. T. A. Boyer and in the dedication services there was a choir with Genevieve Peters of the Catholic Faith, Eva Brooks and Bessie Rosenbaum, a Jewess, as the solo vocalists. Today they have an excellent choir with the pastor's wife, the best soprano in the city, as soloist, and have an organ and an orchestra of violins, cornets and clarinets. The following pastors have been in charge: Rev. Thomas A. Boyer, 1890; Thomas A. Lawson, C. W. Jopson, W. F. Daniels, 1899; E. B. Stivers, 1918; Shirley R. Shaw, 1920. The two last-named pastors are the livest wires ever in Stockton, and they increased their membership with wonderful rapidity.

The Congregational Church

The Congregational Church, which at first was composed of members from the other churches, principally from the Presbyterian and North Methodist, was organized by the Rev. P. G. Buchanan, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Their first service was held August 22, 1865, in the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, the Rev. J. R. Warren, of San Francisco, delivering the morning, and the Rev. P. G. Buchanan the evening sermon. The church organization was effected September 16, 1865, with the following members: P. G. and Mary Buchanan, James T. and Lucy Mills, Mrs. Christina Prentice, Mrs. Cutting, Helen Burton, J. F. Woods and C. F. Baldwin. They continued their services in the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, with P. G. Buchanan as pastor, until July, 1867, when the pastor resigned his charge and left with his family for the East. Two days later the members assembled and extended a call to a young theologian, James A. Daly of New York, who at the time was traveling in Europe. He accepted the call and arriving in Stockton delivered his first sermon on Sunday, May 3, 1868. The services were held in the court room with about fifty persons present. The pastor sat in the judge's chair, the judge's desk his pulpit, with a choir sitting in the jury box, consisting of Mrs. Edward Delano, Mrs. Lewis (Bert Lewis' mother) and J. T. Mills. The members and congregation were very much pleased with their new pastor. He was disappointed and greatly dissatisfied, for he did not anticipate finding a young congregation struggling for existence without a church home, but he consented to remain if they would erect a church. With this end in view the trustees purchased a lot, 30x100, on Miner Avenue, adjoining the Methodist Church, and erected a neat little building at a cost, church and lot, of $8,500. The building was dedicated on Friday evening, April 11, 1869; the night was stormy, but the house was crowded, as the eloquent Rev. A. L. Stone of San Francisco was to preach the dedication sermon. The membership and congregation increased rapidly, since this is the church established by the Pilgrim Fathers and many of those in attendance were New Englanders.

While visiting in New York in 1870, Rev. Daly suddenly resigned. He recommended as his successor the Rev. John C. Holbrook of New York, a pastor of many years' experience; he accepted the charge and arriving in September of that year immediately he began his duties as pastor of the church. He was installed on the evening of December 15, 1870; that night the council again assembled, Rev. J. H. Dwinelle acting as moderator and Rev. A. L. Stone as scribe. After choir singing the moderator stated the reason of their assembling, and Dr. Stone read the minutes of the council meeting that afternoon. The Scripture lesson was read by the Rev. Mr. Brier and a sermon was delivered by Rev. Dwinelle. Rev. Samuel B. Morse (Baptist) then delivered the charge to the new pastor, and to him Rev. Ben E. S. Ely (Presbyterian) extended the right hand of fellowship of the Stockton churches, and Rev. A. L. Stone then addressed the members. Mr. Holbrook was pastor less than two years, returning to New York with his family; he left behind a daughter, Mrs. E. B. Noble.

During the pastorate of the Rev. Martin Post the building was raised some ten feet and basement rooms fitted up, the church refitted and renovated and the chancel extended back ten feet, with the idea of placing a pipe organ. To partly meet the expense the young ladies, on May 9, 1878, gave an entertainment in the theater, producing the plays of "Caste" and "Box and Cox." The work was finished and the parlors opened with a social August 28, 1878, one of the features of the evening being the solo of Prof. G. F. Jackson, who had then located in Stockton.

One of the distinctive features of this denomination is the annual celebration of Forefathers' Day. The event was introduced here by Rev. R. H. Sink in 1893, and has been continued since that date. On the evening of December 21, 1893, the members and congregation, at the hour of 6:30, assembled in the church parlors. A bountiful repast had there been spread and standing around the table, Rev. Sink at the head, a prayer was offered. The Pilgrim descendants then sang a hymn beginning thus:

"Oh God, beneath Thy guiding hand,
Our exiled fathers crossed the sea,
And when they sailed the wintry strand,
With praise and psalm they worshipped thee."

After the speeches were in order, and, Rev. Sink leading, spoke of the Pilgrim influence in government; Charles M. Keniston spoke of Pilgrim fidelity; E. W. Drury of Pilgrim mothers, and John T. Oldham, Alice Mills, M. S. Thresher, J. T. Mills and Margaret Beebe then gave short talks.

The Rev. Reuben H. Sink became the pastor of the little church June 9, 1889. He saw overshadowing the church the tall spire and the brick walls of the Methodist Episcopal Church and with civic and Christian pride he resolved to have an edifice worthy of the denomination of which he was a member. His hair was silvered with gray before he accomplished this object, but May 1, 1910, the beautiful temple was open for worship.

One of the features of the auditorium is the organ, which was purchased at a cost of $3,300. It is twenty feet in width and twenty-eight feet in height, and contains 475 pipes. This splendid instrument supersedes the vocalion that was purchased in 1892 at a cost of $900, this taking the place of a cabinet organ played for many years by Miss Alice Mills and Mary Parks. One of the attractions of this church has been the music, and the trustees, ever endeavoring to procure the best, in August, 1878, secured the services of George F. Jackson, a fine tenor singer, as the choir leader.

He reorganized the choir and in March of the following year they gave a concert in the theater for the benefit of the organ fund. They were assisted by Eliza Lang, S. D. Waterman and Professor Jackson's son. In August the choir was again reorganized with Mrs. Mary Lathrop and Mrs. Alexander Chalmers, sopranos; Flora and Nettie Baker, altos; Professor Jackson and Orlando H. Close, tenors; and Amos Durant and J. T. Mills, basses. It was an excellent choir and good results might have been expected, but late in the year the professor had trouble with one of the school trustees regarding the marking of the pupils in music, and, resigning as teacher of music in the public schools, he soon after left the city. The trustees, in January, 1888, secured the services of Norman Baker, a baseball pitcher, and a fine baritone singer. The choir at that time was composed of a male quartet and each evening Baker sang one or two solos to an audience crowded to the doors. Baker sang in the choir Sunday morning and evening and played baseball during the afternoon. The following are the pastors of the church: Reverends P. G. Buchanan, September, 1865; James A. Daly, May, 1868; John C. Holbrook, September, 1870; Martin Post, June, 1873; D. T. Packard, December, 1879; John Hooper, 1881; John Kirby, 1882; W. F. Furman, 1885; E. J. Riggs, 1888; Reuben H. Sink, June 9, 1889, with Harley H. Gill as the present pastor, and Rev. R. H. Sink as pastor emeritus.

First Baptist Church

The Rev. J. B. Saxton was sent to California in November, 1852, by the American Baptist Home Mission to establish Baptist churches in the new territory. Arriving in San Francisco in December he selected Stockton as his first field of labor. Coming to this place about Christmas time he later declared: "I entered the city a stranger in a strange land, but myself and family were cordially received." He found a residence where now stands the Mail Building on Sutter Street, and in his home, March 6, 1853, the first Baptist Church was organized with the following twelve members: B. W. Owens and R. Black, deacons; W. W. Webster, clerk, and Madison Walthall, B. W. Owens and R. Black, trustees. The Stockton church was received into the fellowship of churches April 20, the service taking place in the Presbyterian Church. Religious services were held in the schoolhouse where later stood the Lafayette school and the congregation so increased in number that the trustees were compelled to find larger quarters. Finding a small building on sale on Center Street, adjoining the Weber House, which had formerly been used as a Spanish fandango, the trustees purchased it and the room was fitted up at a cost of $2,300. It was dedicated May 22, 1853, with appropriate ceremonies.

Captain Weber deeded the trustees in 1855 a lot on Lindsay Street near Hunter for the building of a church, and the trustees and B. W. Owens, Madison Walthall, J. S. Woods, William Moore and W. W. Webster, publicly acknowledged the donation of a valuable lot for their use and expressed their best wishes for the temporal and spiritual welfare of the donor. Preferring to erect the church on a corner they retained the Weber lot for a parsonage and in January, 1860, purchased two lots, corner of Lindsay and Hunter Streets, for church purposes. Plans were drawn for a brick building 45x87 feet with a fifteen foot basement and a spire 130 feet in height, surmounted by a large hand with the index finger pointing upward. The auditorium was planned to contain sixty-eight pews with a seating capacity of 486 people and a balcony seating fifty more persons. The work was commenced in August and September 23 the cornerstone was laid by the Rev. V. B. Cheney of the First Baptist Church, San Francisco. The work was completed in June 1861, and dedicated June 21, the Rev. V. B. Cheney preaching the dedication sermon. The building complete cost $15,300. The trustees at this time were B. W. Owens, who had been a member of the Methodist Church South; E. R. Stockwell, Jeremiah Sarles, D. K. Woodbridge and James Woods.

The trustees made a great mistake in lifting the audience room fifteen feet above the sidewalk, but it was not remedied until nearly forty years later. At that time, Mrs. Amelia Darra, a leading member of the church, died August, 1899, leaving $2,000 for the building of a new church. The trustees then sold the Baptist Mission property on East Market Street and with that amount and other money given them they had a building fund of $5,100. Subscriptions to the fund were obtained, bringing the amount up to about $12,000. The front half of the old church was torn down and a new concrete and brick building erected of a modern style of architecture, facing the north. The old building faced the east. It was completed in 1906 with a cost of pews, furniture, and repairs to the organ, of $15,000.

The Baptist Church, unfortunately for them, perhaps, has in some ways been the sensational church of the city. The first sensation came soon after the arrival of Elder Knapp in December 1867. He was a revivalist of national fame and since 1854 he had been engaged in this work. He was a man then sixty-six years of age, short in stature, but very muscular, with long grey hair and whiskers and sharp, piercing black eyes. Throughout the Eastern States he was known as the "Lord's Blacksmith," hammering the gospel into sinners and saving them, according to his belief, from hell and damnation, while his co-worker, Henry Miller, was called the "Lord's Silversmith," preaching in a quiet, easy manner God's love and forgiveness to those who repented of their sins. The trustees invited Elder Knapp to hold a series of revival services in the Baptist Church. He began his revival services December 8, and for fifty-four days he held three prayer meetings each day, the first one at 6:30 a. m., with a sermon each evening. His first break was December 28. William Bunker, a popular young Odd Fellow, went hunting the previous Saturday afternoon. He was found Monday morning in the tules standing by the side of his boat, his long gum boots filled with water, frozen to death. Elder Knapp, hearing of the accident, presumed he had gone hunting on Sunday and referring to his death in his sermon said: "That young man has gone straight to hell." Bunker's friends resented the remark and there was talk of a blanket tossing. The following evening he apologized and stated that he had been misinformed. On New Year's evening the Eureka boys, for fun, declared that they would send Elder Knapp a complimentary ticket. He responded: "If they do, I will attend and, kneeling on the floor, will turn the ballroom into a prayer meeting." "If Brother Knapp shows up," the Eureka boys came back, "We'll toss him in a blanket." "No, you won't," replied Thomas Cunningham, a foreman of the company, "you'll treat him like a gentleman." One evening while he was preaching, Jonas Stockwell, the oldest son of Deacon Stockwell, arose and left the church. "There's a young man on his way to hell," said Elder Knapp, and quick as thought Stockwell replied: "Yes, and I'll meet you there." The Elder made many converts, among them Thomas K. Hook, ex-sheriff; Joseph J. Budd, county judge, and Mrs. J. P. D. Wilkins, a notable church choir singer. They were all baptized. Immediately after her baptism, slowly ascending the steps to the platform, the black robe tightly clinging to her form, she began singing,

"Just as I am, without one plea
But that Thy blood was shed for me,
Oh, Lamb of God, I come, I come."

Dramatic, intensely so, there was a thrill passed over that crowded room, and then the audience joined in the chorus with her, "Oh, Lamb of God, I come."

Elder Knapp's was the second sensation at this time, the first having taken place a few months previous to the revival. The Rev. J. A. Giles, who had formerly preached in Sonora, was called to the Stockton church and preached his first sermon January 5, 1867. He was not as eloquent a man as the former pastor, Rev. Charles R. Hendrickson, who was one of the best speakers in the state. Giles was a handsome man, with a pretty wife, she a singer in the choir. According to some, both were flirtatious in their tendencies and this caused a commotion among the members and February 11, 1869, seventy-nine members withdrew from the church. A church trial was held and the pastor was tried upon a charge of "unchristian conduct." Finally a resolution was offered for a "Continuance of the pastorate of the present pastor." The resolution was defeated. Giles immediately presented his resignation and the church refused to accept it; then his advocates withdrew. The seceding members, assembling February 12 in the city hall, formed an organization calling themselves "The Central Baptist Church." They elected trustees and by vote the Rev. J. H. Giles was selected as their pastor. The free use of the theater was tendered them, but they later returned to the city hall, where they had formerly been, and held services until August 17, 1872, Giles then preaching his last sermon. The following are the Baptist pastors: J. B. Saxton, 1853; Thomas Atwood, 1856; Clark King, 1858; C. R. Hendrickson, 1862; J. H. Giles, 1867; Samuel B. Morse, 1869; W. B. Fleenor, 1881; F. S. Lawrence, 1889; L. Palmer, 1890; George W. Swift, 1896; Samuel J. Nunan, 1899; William Thomas, 1901; E. S. Van Ness, 1906; J. Lewis Smith, the present pastor.

The Episcopal Church

To the Rev. Orlando Harriman, father of the railroad magnate, E. H. Harriman, belongs the honor of founding the Episcopal Church in Stockton. He held services in the city hall, then on the corner of Hunter and Channel streets, on Sunday, August 25, 1850. During the evening service the parish was organized and wardens and vestrymen elected. The Rev. Mr. Harriman named the parish St. John, and held services until September, 1850. There was no further service until 1851; then J. M. Bissell, the junior warden, acted as lay reader until 1853, the services being held for a time in the Corinthian Building. In March, 1853, the following officers were elected, B. Walker Bours, Judge A. G. Stakes, John B.

Hall, the attorney, H. J. Huggins, Dr. George A. Shurtleff, F. Pinot, Edward Howison, vestrymen; Robert K. Eastman, senior warden, and Dr. H. S. Norcom, junior warden. The Right Rev. William Ingraham Kip, California's first Episcopal bishop, came to the state in 1854 and held services June 18 in the city hall where now stands the present court house. His coming created a new interest in the parish, and they requested that a rector be sent to this church. The Rev. Joseph A. Large was sent to St. John's parish from Indiana.

Captain Weber in 1856 deeded the Episcopalians two lots on the corner of El Dorado Street and Miner Avenue, and a third lot they purchased. Their rector at this time was the Rev. E. W. Hager. He was an energetic and popular man, elected county superintendent on the Democratic ticket and as the membership was composed of many wealthy men, he saw no reason why they should not have a church home. The membership included B. W. and Allen Lee Bours, Willard and Austin Sperry, Harbeson and Louis M. Hickman, Henry T. Compton, Wm. Biven, George H. Sanderson, P. M. Bowen, H. T. Huggins, Andrew Wolf, R. E. Wilhoit, Henry Austin, Henry H. Hewlett, A. W. Simpson, G. W. Trahern, J. M. Kelsey, William West, C. F. Whale, Judge C. M. Creanor, H. C. Taylor, H. T. Dorrance, Gilbert Claiborne and Harry Hubbard. A subscription list was opened and over $5,000 was collected in a few weeks. The cornerstone was laid September 9, 1857, and May 2, 1858, the first service was held, Bishop Kip consecrating the building June 20 of the same year. The edifice cost about $10,000, this amount including the beautiful stained glass chancel window, "Christ Sowing the Seed." This same window, enlarged on either side, is in the chancel of the present church. In 1862, at a cost of nearly $2,000, the lot was enclosed by a handsome iron grill fence set upon a brick base.

A discussion regarding the building of a new and larger place of worship was begun in 1874, and for the benefit of the building fund the ladies gave various entertainments until they had succeeded in raising several thousand dollars. They at first contemplated building a church only, but finally the building committee concluded also to build a Guild hall for the use of the Sunday school, and social purposes. The Guild hall was erected in 1891 and services therein held in April, 1892, the work of demolishing the pioneer church commencing at that time. The cornerstone of the new building was informally laid April 4, 1892, by Bishop William F. Nichols. The dedication service was read by the bishop, the rector, W. J. Lemon, then read the list of articles deposited in the stone, the bishop closing the cavity. The church was not consecrated because of the heavy mortgage, although they held service in the auditorium since 1893. The debt was finally paid and the building consecrated Easter Sunday, April 10, 1898. A procession of the members and congregation was formed outside of the building, and led by Bishop Nichols and the choir singing "Onward Christian Soldiers" they marched into the church. During the service the bishop read the prayer of consecration, delivered the sermon and confirmed sixteen.

The organ in this church is the first pipe organ in the city. It was purchased in Boston, Mass., and shipped around Cape Horn in 1858 at a cost of $1,700. The same organ with additional pipes is now in use in the present church. The first organist was a German named John Kelher, a violin and piano teacher. He was followed by Nellie Gardner, S. D. Waterman, Lewis Thwaites, Charles Owens and Professor Nutting. In 1862 an Italian opera company was singing in Stockton, and they volunteered their services in giving a Sunday sacred concert from the Messiah, the Creation, Moses in Egypt and other sacred music. The offer was accepted and the concert given Sunday afternoon, September 21. The church was crowded, the money going to the church fund. In the Episcopal as in the Catholic Church the music is a part of the service, and for many years they had a choir of four voices only, Mary Chittenden later Mrs. Robert S. Johnson, Mrs. Charles Pinkham, Horace Vincent and Charles Pinkham. About 1880 Hugo Talbo, an English opera singer of considerable fame, came to Stockton to reside, and the church authorities engaged him to organize a chorus choir. He organized a mixed choir with Horace Vincent, Jr., Louis Hewlett, Edward Bellis and other male singers, with Belle Rodgers, Bessie Stewart and Stella Ayers as solo singers. Many of the choir were Talbo's pupils and the music was fine, selections being given from the best sacred music composers. After Talbo's death a boy choir was organized in 1892, some of the straight-laced vestrymen objecting to women singing in an Episcopal choir. In 1896 Robert Loud, a brilliant baritone vocalist, took charge of the boy choir. Some years ago Robert Ziegler, a young baritone, took charge of the church music and organized a mixed choir of male, female and boy voices. He brought the choir up to a high standard, and at the Friday evening Crucifixion service each year the church was crowded. The Crucifixion, by Stainer, has now been given by this choir seventeen successive years.

The following have been the rectors of St. John's parish during the past seventy years: Joseph A. Large, 1854; E. S. Hager, 1856; David McDonald, 1859; John G. Gasman,

ST. JOSEPH'S HOME—FOUNDED BY REV. W. B. O'CONNOR

1862; Elias Birdsall, 1866; Wm. P. Tucker, 1869; Elias Birdsall, 1870; E. H. Ward, 1882; W. C. Mills, 1886; W. J. Lemmon, 1888; J. T. MacKinnon, 1895; J. T. Bryan, 1901; Alfred Clark, 1904; Reginald H. Starr, 1908; Wm. Renison, 1909.

St. Mary's Catholic Church

The first masses in the San Joaquin Valley were celebrated in the home of Captain Weber in 1849 and in the residence of Nicholas Den in December, 1850. Both of these homes were on the Peninsula. Den was a devout Catholic and he prevailed upon Fr. Francis S. Vilirassa to organize a church. We have no further information regarding the organization, but in 1851 a party of French immigrants passed through Stockton. One of them was Father Blave, and learning that there was a Catholic Church he consented to remain and serve as the parish priest. Captain Weber then gave the church two lots where stands the present edifice. A building of wood was constructed with a belfry, and with a seating capacity of 300; the building, including the bell, cost about $10,500. The inside walls were covered with plain white cloth. The same material was behind the altar, which was made of plain boards painted a cream color, and upon the walls on plain pedestals were roughly carved figures, the stations of the cross. Whale oil lamps gave the evening light until 1861, when the church was first lit with gas.

This present beautiful edifice of the Gothic style of architecture was built as you might say, in sections, each section conforming to the completed plan being erected as soon as the money was at hand. The women of the church worked for more than thirty years in obtaining money by means of festivals, fairs and dances to complete the building. As far back as 1857 they began their work and that year they held a fair in the rear of the San Joaquin Republican office on El Dorado Street. During the priestship of Father Joseph A. Gallagher the plans were completed and June 17, 1861, work was commenced on the front half of the building. The wooden building was moved over to the east and mass therein celebrated. The work was rapidly pushed along, and July 21 of the same year the cornerstone was laid by Archbishop Joseph Alemany and Father Hugh P. Gallagher, of San Francisco, a brother of the resident priest, delivered the sermon from the text: "And this stone which I have set for an altar shall be called the house of God." Mass was celebrated Christmas eve and the building was crowded although the night was stormy and many of the worshippers came in carriages. Father Gallagher was the celebrant, the choir comprising the Cahill sisters, sopranos, Mrs. H. W. Schmidt, alto, H. W. Schmidt, tenor, and Louis Beyser, bass, assisted by Miss Redeuill at the melodeon. The uncompleted structure was consecrated May 11, 1862, by Archbishop Alemany, assisted by four priests from abroad, the local priest, Joseph Gallagher, and the Spanish Father, Raphael Z. Vargas. The walls were decorated with evergreens and flowers from the garden of Captain Weber and the main aisle was carpeted with rose leaves. During the summer of 1868 work was commenced on the ground plan as it stands today and December 18, 1870, the completed building was dedicated by Archbishop Alemany. The edifice was rededicated May 23, 1880, by Archbishop Alemany, assisted by Father Wm. B. O'Connor as celebrant, Father Walsh as deacon, and Father Kenenny as subdeacon, Father Gleason delivering the sermon. The present building was completed in 1893 at a cost of $50,000, the Gothic spire, transept, sacristy and side chapels being erected at that time.

At that time 1893 the beautiful painting of Christ that now adorns the altar superseded a similar painting that hung over the altar for over fifty years. The old altar was replaced by an altar at a cost of $5,000, a gift from Mrs. Thomas Weber, a daughter-in-law of Captain Weber. The stations of the cross were presented by John Gall, who imported them from Europe during his travels there. The silver candlesticks and the candelabra were the gift of Miss Annie Tierney. A number of the beautiful stained glass windows were gifts of Mrs. Margaret Gall and the various Catholic societies of the church.

Mrs. Margaret Blake Alverson says in her History of Music that the Ainsa sisters, two Spanish women, highly cultivated vocalists and instrumentalists, were the first two choir singers in the Catholic church. These two women, you remember, married Henry A. Crabb, the attorney, and Rasey Biven, the newspaper man. At the time of the rededication of the church, 1880, the choir comprised Fred W. Schmidt, leader of the Stockton brass band as director and organist, Miss Collicott Boshen and Weber, sopranos, Gertrude Elliott and Miss Wilson, altos; Le Rose Phelps, tenor, and Charles Pinkham, bass. On this extra occasion they also had a number of instrumentalists. On October 9, 1881, a sacred concert was given with J. H. Dohrman of St. Patrick's Church, San Francisco, at the new organ. The principal singers were Mrs. Gertie Noble from the Presbyterian choir, Mrs. J. L. Phelps, Nettie Baker and Professor Jackson from the Congregational choir, S. D. Waterman from the Methodist and Lottie Crawford, Helen Golinsky (Mrs. Edward Oullahan), Ada Boschen, Jennie Winters, Nan McCarty, Le Rose Phelps and Charles Pinkham of the regular choir. The two last-named sung in that choir for more than thirty years. Pinkham dying in December, 1899. As to the organists, Wm. Carmichael, an English pianist and teacher came to Stockton to reside in 1869 and was engaged to play the reed organ, continuing until his death in March, 1876; in the meantime he married Jennie Hammett a communicant of the church. He was succeeded by Fred Schmidt, who came to Stockton from Honolulu some years previous. In September, 1881, the pipe organ was installed at a cost of $4,000. It was built in San Francisco with flaring metal pipes, as suggested by Father O'Connor. Karl Bruck succeeded Fred Schmidt, who died in September, 1887, as organist and choir director until a few years ago, he refusing longer to serve as organist. The priests of St. Mary's church were Father Blaive, 1851; Father Maurice, 1856; A. Gallagher, 1860; Father Motter, an Italian, 1866; William Bernard O'Connor, June, 1872, died in his priestly office December 26, 1911. He was succeeded in February, 1912, by Father W. E. McGough.

In the priests' plot in the San Joaquin Cemetery beneath a large stone lies the body of Father O'Connor. Upon the stone is a large raised cross and beneath it the inscription, "Rev. Father William B. O'Connor, 1841-1911." The spot where he lies is holy ground consecrated May 23, 1880, by Archbishop Alemany. Some time previous to this, Captain Weber, learning that Father O'Connor was looking for a new burial ground, deeded to the Archbishop, for burial purposes, twenty acres of land on North Street, then just outside of the city limits. In 1852 he deeded the church a block of land where now stands the Holt Manufacturing Company. Now overcrowded, the bodies of over 1,000 in number were transferred to the new cemetery and erected "To the unknown dead," pioneers in the upbuilding of Stockton. At the time mentioned a platform had been erected in the center of the plot and in front of it a large cross was planted, typical of Jesus Christ who vanquished death and brought about the resurrection of the body. Four other crosses of smaller size were placed at the four corners of the cemetery symbolic of the life blood of Christ that flows to the four corners of the globe. Three candles were placed at each of the crosses. At the appointed hour, Archbishop Alemany arrived, together with Father O'Connor, who acted as master of ceremonies, Father Kenenny as cross bearer, and Fathers Walsh and Gleason, readers of the litany, psalms and prayers. Forming a procession and led by the cross bearer they began their march around the ground, the fathers repeating the liturgy and prayers. In his left hand the Archbishop carried his crozier and with his right hand he sprinkled holy water, standing at the foot of the Christ cross, which the archbishop had blessed. As the procession approached each cross of the four corners the candles were lighted, thus indicating the anticipation of resurrection. It was a beautiful and impressive ceremony, never seen before in this county and probably not again for many years.

The memory of Father O'Connor still lives in the hearts of the people and even before his death they determined to erect a monument suitable to his memory. For this purpose a death mask was taken of his features by a sculptor and subscriptions were obtained for a handsome lifelike statue. On a beautiful Sunday afternoon, June 7, 1914, a large crowd of persons assembled in the grounds of St. Joseph's Home, to pay honors to the memory of him whom they had known in the religious and social walks of life for nearly a half century. A platform covered with the Stars and Stripes had been erected by the side of the statue and upon it sat several priests, the orator of the occasion, John J. Barrett, Mrs. Joseph D. Peters, Miss Julia Weber, Richard Lauxen and Arthur Ashley, close friends of Father O'Connor. After a few remarks by Father McGough, the present pastor of St. Mary's Church, and the singing of hymns by the children of St. Agnes' choir, the bell of the chapel rang out. Miss Julia Weber then pulled the silken cord, the drapery fell away and with uncovered heads, and with an impressive silence, the friends again beheld the features of him "who lives forever more." John J. Barrett, of San Francisco, then delivered a beautiful tribute of honor to him who was his spiritual adviser and friend since early childhood. The bronze statue, six feet in height, rests upon a solid granite pedestal. The pedestal stands upon a three-step granite foundation, and upon the pedestal is the following inscription:

"Rev. Wm. B. O'Connor
Pastor St. Mary's Church
1872-1911"

A good citizen, a kind friend, a wise counsellor and faithful guide. He was in all things a true priest of God."

St. Gertrude Church, Fair Oaks

The extension of Fair Oaks to the city a few years ago made it a more desirable place to reside and the population rapidly increased. Many of those who located there were Catholics and Father Laurence Murphy of St. Mary's Church believed that a church in that locality was an actual necessity. With this object in view a call was made and December 13, 1913, the first mass was celebrated in Fair Oaks hall. Subscriptions were obtained for the building of a handsome two-tower edifice of Gothic design, and in less than two years the building was completed at a cost of $30,000. After the erection of the building, the cornerstone was laid on July 18, 1915, by the Rev. John Cantwell, representing Archbishop E. J. Hanna. Mass was celebrated in the building with Fathers Murphy, McGough, Anderson and Sorasio of St. Mary's Church and Father Drollard of Lodi in the sanctuary. The address was given by Father Cantwell and the mass music was arranged by Mrs. Leonard of St. Gertrude parish. The cornerstone contains among other things a portrait of Father Wm. O'Connor, the program of the event and the names of those taking part in the ceremony and copies of the Record, Independent and Mail of that date. Numerous gifts were presented by the parishioners and other Catholics. The large handsome stained glass window representing St. Gertrude was presented by Miss Julia Weber, and the long tower windows on the front of the building were presented by the Knights of Columbus. The oil painting of the Virgin Mary was painted and presented to the church by Miss Theresa Monatti.

The Central Methodist Church

In the west end of the present edifice of the Central Methodist Church there is a beautiful glass stained window representing "The Sower Sowing the Seed." It was placed there by the Westbay family as a memorial of their father, James C. Westbay, the founder of Methodism in Stockton. Arriving here September 5, 1849, he pitched his tent near the southeast corner of San Joaquin Street and Weber Avenue and being an enthusiastic Methodist he dedicated the tent to God. Some four days later he became acquainted with George W. Pierce and Upton Reamer, two other Methodists, and they concluded to hold services in the Westbay tent. The first service was held September 15, 1849, and this was the first service of praise and prayer in Stockton. Mr. Westbay in telling of the incident said, "There were some seventy or eighty persons in attendance, many being unable to get into the tent." While the meeting was in progress a man named Hopkins pushed his way into the tent, and saying that he was a Methodist preacher and thanked God that he had found even two or three persons who had met in the name of Jesus for worship. He had just arrived that night from Tennessee and walked into town, leading a mule on which was packed his outfit. Passing the tent he at first believed it a gambling establishment, but when he heard the singing and prayer, he concluded it was a prayer meeting. Rev. Hopkins delivered a short sermon that evening, and services were conducted later in the homes of "Johnny" Green and Gallant D. Dickenson on Market Street between Center and Commerce.

In the spring of 1850 James Corwin arrived here from San Jose. He was known as "Uncle Jimmy Corwin," and was a carpenter as well as a preacher, earning twelve dollars a day at his trade. Corwin formed a Methodist class which comprised James C. Westbay, Joseph Landen, Upton Reamer, Dr. R. H. Radcliffe and "Uncle John" Andrews. It was Corwin's custom to hold a religious meeting on the Levee every Sunday afternoon, taking with him Upton Reamer, J. C. Westbay and Phillip Groves, and they would sing, preach and pray. Although Sunday was the busiest day of the week, several of the boat captains suspended their work during the service and the meeting attracted large crowds. Phillip Groves, who was a very enthusiastic Methodist, was also a very eccentric person. On one occasion a very inquisitive person asked Groves who he was. He replied, "I'm a Methodist, a Whig and a blacksmith—Glory to God."

In the spring of 1850 James Corwin arrived here from San Jose and organized a church with the following trustees: Joseph Lamden, Upton Reamer, James C. Westbay, "Uncle John" Andrews and Dr. H. H. Radcliffe. In the following year Captain Weber deeded two lots to the church on the southeast corner of Washington and Commerce streets, then the most populated part of the city. Subscriptions were obtained for the erection of a church and James Corwin not only put in all of his time in working on the building but donated the salary given him as pastor. The building is said to have cost $12,000. It was dedicated July 28, 1851, by Rev. Isaac Owens who was sent here from San Jose by the Methodist Conference after they learned of the "faithful little band of Methodists in Stockton. In less than five years the church members began moving from that locality, and the trustee purchasing a lot 50x100 on the northwest corner of Weber Avenue and San Joaquin Street, moved the church to the more central location. The building was remodeled and enlarged at a cost of $4,368, and it was dedicated June 3, 1860, by Bishop John T. Peck. The evening sermon was delivered by Rev. John A. Anderson of the Presbyterian Church. The increase of population, the popularity of the pastors and the patriotic services in the building served greatly to increase the church attendance, and the trustees began looking for a more commodious place of worship. At this time the Agricultural Hall where now stands the Yosemite Building was on sale. The society had there built a large brick building in 1861, and mortgaging the building was unable to lift it. The Methodists bought the building at a cost of $23,000 and converted it into a church seating about 400 persons and containing in the rear a Sunday school and a social room and a pastor's study. It was dedicated the first Sunday in January, 1870, by the Rev. M. C. Briggs, assisted by the Revs. J. H. Maddux and Dr. Thomas. It was in this church that debating society was organized by the young people regardless of creed, and their proceedings were frequently published in the Mail. Dr. J. H. Coyle, then the pastor, took great interest in the young folks and was reprimanded by some of the "old fogies," saying he was too old to take part with them. He replied, "A man is just as old as he feels," and the writer here records the splendid assistance given us in that society by Dr. Coyle.

The People's Temple

This was the name given to the Methodist Church during the pastorate of the Rev. William Copeland Evans. Previous to that time it had been known as the Methodist Episcopal Church, North, in distinction from the Methodist Episcopal, South, now known as Grace Episcopal Church. In Dr. Stephens' time it was called the Central Methodist Church. It is located on the corner of Miner Avenue and San Joaquin Street and its spire, 172 feet in height, looms above the tallest ten-story building in the city. It is today one of Stockton's finest buildings, an ornament to the city and for many years the only auditorium suitable for large assemblies. Time and again the old church was overcrowded, there were no accommodations for the children attending the Sunday school, and the noise and confusion on the street became so annoying that in 1888 the board of trustees began looking for another church location. Purchasing three lots on the corner mentioned the trustees proposed plans for a small building, but the pastor, Rev. S. J. Carroll, insisted in a large, fine, up-to-date structure. The old church property was sold for $30,000 and the cornerstone of the new building was laid December 21, 1889. The church was dedicated April 5, 1891, by Bishop Fowler. A splendid organ was installed, the building complete costing $87,275. It was heavily mortgaged for several years, but in 1902 the entire debt was paid. The pastors of the church are as follows: 1851, Wm. M. Morrow; '52, H. C. Benson; '53, George S. Phillips; '55, S. B. Rooney; '56, P. G. Buchanan; '58, John P. Hill; '60, David S. Dryden; '62, John W. Ross; '65, David Deal; '67, J. H. Maddux; '70, C. V. Anthony; '73, H. B. Heacock; '76, Thomas S. Dunn; '79, John Coyle; '82, J. F. Trefren; '83, A. T. Needham; '87, Westley Dennett; '88, S. J. Carroll; '93, E. D. McCreary; '97, W. C. Evans; '02, Irving Lovejoy; '10, John Stephens; '14, E. P. Dennett; '15, H. E. Beeks; '17, M. H. Alexander; A. C. Bane is the present pastor.

The Two German Churches

One of the oldest religious denominations in the city is the German Methodist Episcopal. A mere handful in number, they organized in 1855, and, obtaining money sufficient, built a neat little brick church where now stands the Mail Building. It was the first brick house of worship in Stockton, and the first German church in California. The little edifice was dedicated September 2, 1855, the Rev. M. C. Briggs of Sacramento conducting the service. The building, erected only a few inches above the earth, was damp and unhealthy, and below street grade, and too small for the rapidly growing congregation. In 1869 a large wooden church was erected at a cost of $7,000. It was furnished with a fine toned 660-pound bell costing $550, and it was first rang July 5, 1869. The building was dedicated August 1st, the Rev. Dr. Cox of San Francisco preaching the dedicatory sermon, the presiding elder, C. H. Afferbach, and the pastor, G. H. Bollinger, taking part in the services. The congregation worshiped in this church until 1896. At that time, however, the membership was small, as the old pioneers had nearly all of them "gone home," or left the city, and as the taxes were exceedingly burdensome because of the increased value of the property, the trustees concluded to sell. The lot, 84x150 feet, had been offered on sale in 1892 for $18,000 and it was purchased four years later by the proprietors of the Stockton Mail. The trustees then purchased two lots including two dwellings, corner of American and Lindsay streets. One of the houses was fitted up as a parsonage, and the other rented and on the corner a handsome building was erected. It was dedicated November 1, 1896, free from debt, the entire cost being less than $18,000, including the street work. In 1872 Captain Weber deeded a lot to the German Reformed denomination on the corner of American Street and Miner Avenue. The little structure that now stands there today was erected at a cost of $2,200, and it was dedicated February 2, 1873, services during the day being conducted in the German and the English language. The denomination was organized in the Christian Church on Lindsay Street March 26, 1869, by the Rev. F. Fox, a traveling missionary, and services had been held at various times since 1852, Rev. Kroh holding the first services in his residence, corner Market and Center streets. Some years after the building of the church the members began quarreling and many resigned. The members remaining then mortgaged the property, the mortgage was foreclosed and the German Reformed Church ceased to exist. The building is now in use by the Seventh Day Adventists.

The Colored Congregations

Since 1854 the colored population of the city have sustained two church organizations, the one Methodist, the other Baptist. The Methodist building, a little church of wood, was dedicated May 20, 1855, the Rev. Mr. Phillips of the Methodist Episcopal Church delivering the sermon. Four years later, at a cost of $1,800, they erected a little brick meeting house, and May 11, 1859, the cornerstone was laid. It was dedicated July 11 of the same year, several clergymen from abroad being present. The building was raised above grade, remodeled and rededicated May 2, 1880, the Rev. John Coyle conducting the services. The Colored Baptist, although organized in 1854, had no house of worship until 1859, they at that time purchasing for $800 the old Presbyterian Church, moving it to a lot on Washington Street near Commerce. The building was dedicated in 1860 and used as a house of worship until 1909. The colored brethren then sold the property to the Japanese residents, and purchasing the old Baptist Mission on East Market Street, fitted it up at a cost of $2,000. The old Presbyterian Church, the first church building in California, is now in use as a Japanese Buddhist temple, and across the street there is a Japanese Presbyterian chapel.

The Unitarian Society

In 1868, August 22, the Rev. Mr. Brown of Sacramento came to Stockton for the purpose of organizing an Universalist Church. He preached that evening in Hickman's Hall, but there were not enough persons of that belief in the city to support an Universalist society. Between the Universalists and the Unitarians there is but little difference in religious creed, and, in February, 1892, the Rev. W. E. Copeland visited Stockton with the object of establishing a Unitarian society. His efforts were successful, and February 23, in Pioneer Hall, a society was organized comprising some of the best and most cultured citizens. The installation of Rev. W. E. Copeland as pastor took place May 2, the services being conducted by Rev. Thomas Van Ness of San Francisco. Rev. E. B. Payne of Berkeley and N. S. Haskell of San Jose. Immediately the Protestant churches trained their big guns upon the new society, but the Rev. Copeland, who in intellectual ability was far above any pastor who had served here up to that period, paid no attention to their attacks. He remained three years and then resigned for a larger field of work. He was succeeded January 26, 1895, by the Rev. George Rice, who resigned his pastorate July 26, 1896, and returned to Boston. Since that time up to the present the few Unitarians have been assembling in the homes of members, hoping some day to establish a church.

The Christian Science Church

In 1896 reports were circulated of the wonderful physical and mental cures being performed in other cities by means of the rediscovery of Christian healing as proclaimed by Mrs. Mary Baker Eddy of Boston. A certain lady, deeply interested, began readings in the new faith as early as 1896, and joined by friends they began holding weekly readings in their homes. The number of those interested increased and in March, 1898, a Church of Christ, Scientist, was organized. Regular church services were now carried on, the Scientists meeting in Austin's Hall. They removed to Jory's Hall and in January, 1901, Dr. T. D. Felt became the first reader. In June, 1901, they removed to Miller Memorial Hall where they held services until 1910. The First Church of Christ, Scientist, formed a corporation July 3, 1902, their object to spread the teachings of Christian Science. The directors were T. D. Felt, P. H. Burgess, Laura Klench, Margaret G. Meehan and Jesse M. Stringham. Purchasing a lot at the corner of Flora and Center streets, the home for many years of W. H. Van Valear, they erected in 1910 a neat little bungalow church. This organization is visited once or twice a year by lecturers from the Christian Science Board of Lectureship who deliver free lectures on Christian Science, which are published the following day in a newspaper of wide circulation at a heavy cost. In the last lecture given in this city September 8, 1922, Miss Jerita V. Blair said in introducing the lecturer, "How grateful we are that Christian Science is again demonstrating to the world the healing power of the Christ, Truth! The human thought is being awakened from its long dream in materiality—belief in sin and suffering—to the grand reality of scientific, true being, and proclaiming in the words of a very familiar hymn:

"Theories, which thousands cherish,
Pass like clouds that sweep the sky;
Creeds and dogmas, all may perish;
Truth Herself can never die."

The Sikh or Hindu Temple

Some ten years ago Hindu's from India began immigrating to California. They had money, and purchasing land, began farming. Several hundred of them located in San Joaquin County and began farming the Delta lands. Stockton was their headquarters, and on South Grant Street they purchased a lot and erected of wood a Hindu temple of worship. The building, the most noticeable of any in the city because of its peculiar style of construction, was dedicated November 21, 1915. Many invited citizens were present, but as it is supposed to be holy ground, every guest was requested to remove his shoes before entering the temple. There were no chairs nor pews and Hindus and sinners sat on the floor facing the altar on handsome and costly rugs. There were about 400 Hindus present and a white man who spoke their native tongue gave an explanation of the very unusual religious ceremony.

CHAPTER XV

SAVED TO THE UNION

IN a former chapter we observed that the Democratic party carried every state and San Joaquin County election from 1850 to 1860, save the election of 1855, and that the southern wing of the party controlled by David S. Terry and William M. Gwin dominated the politics of the state. We further observed that David C. Broderick, the northern party leader who was opposed to slavery, was fast advancing toward the principles of Republicanism and taking his followers with him. The Southerners believed that something must be done to block his progress and that something was to kill him, not by any brutal method but by the "honorable code of dueling." The South believed that slavery was a divine institution and the freedom of the slave spelled ruin to the principal industries, sugar and cotton. They also believed in state's rights and that a state could secede from the Union if it so desired. They also believed and arrogantly declared that they had the right to take their slaves into any free state in the Union. The North on the other hand opposed slavery in any part of the Union. They declared that there should be no slavery north of Mason and Dixon's line, as provided in the Missouri Compromise, and they denied the right of any state to secede from the Union. The political condition is thus explained that we may know the causes which led up to the Civil War, as recorded in this and the following chapters.

Secession Threats

The South believed or professed to believe that the Republican party had been organized to destroy slavery, and they surmised that Abraham Lincoln was to become the future leader of that party. At a meeting in Savannah January 23, 1860, says McMasters in his History of the United States, it was "resolved that if Seward or any other Republican were elected President it would be a just cause for dissolution." Iverson of Georgia, said in the senate he was sure the irrepressible conflict must go on until it ended with the extinction of slavery in the Union, and he intended to urge the Southern States to dissolve the Union on the election of a Black Republican President by a sectional Northern party opposed to and hostile to Southern slavery. Clingman of North Carolina stated that there were hundreds of disunionists in the South, and he believed the election of a Black Republican President would give them sufficient cause to dissolve it. William M. Gwin of California said the South must prepare for resistance if a Republican President be elected and he showed that by seizing Federal property within her limits before the President was inaugurated she could make it impossible for him to administer government in the South.

Birth of the Republican Party

Some persons may wonder what the South had to do with politics in Stockton and San Joaquin County—everything. California is a part of the Union, San Joaquin County is an important part of the state, and if the state was again ruled by the Southern Democracy, then it would play into the hands of the Southern Confederacy. To defeat this purpose was the object of the Northern men, and they proposed to save the state to the Union through the Republican party. This party which is today the ruling national power was born in Michigan in February, 1854. The people in the town of Jackson, irrespective of party, assembled and resolved that they would throw old organizations to the wind, form a new party and make non-extension of slavery the issue. At a second meeting the name Republican was proposed for the new party. The idea of a new party to be called Republican spread from state to state and it was organized in California in time to vote for John C. Fremont for President. In San Joaquin County a few men assembled in a room on the southwest corner of Weber Avenue and San Joaquin Street in July, 1856, and these men, John M. Buffington, C. C. Firely, Dr. George R. Warren, John Tucker, Madison Walthall, Jr., B. P. Baird and Dr. W. R. Kerr, held a consultation regarding the organization of a Republican party. At a subsequent meeting on August 2 they organized by electing J. M.

Buffington, president, and C. C. Firely, secretary. They nominated Samuel Myers and Dr. W. R. Kerr for the assembly and I. S. Locke for state superintendent of schools. On the same day the first number of the Stockton Gazette was issued as a Fremont and Dayton paper with John W. Damon, a Congregationalist minister, as editor. The paper soon died for want of support, but the party kept its grip and in 1860 swept the state.

Although the war clouds were hanging over the states beyond the Rockies, in Stockton they did not even cast a shadow, and when on New Year's day the sun arose above the Sierras there was not the least indication of the war soon to engage the entire nation. It was the Sabbath day. Friends greeted friends as of old, and many a "Happy New Year" was drunk before the bar of the New York, St. Charles, Magnolia, The Shades and the Weber House. On Monday many of the society ladies kept open house, announcing the fact in the papers, and throughout the day hacks were seen bearing fashionably dressed young men from house to house on their New Year calls. Refreshments were plentifully provided, and all were welcome. The day passed pleasantly and ended with the Eureka Engine Company's third annual ball.

The City Election of 1860

Although there was no outward signs of trouble, there was an inward fire in the breasts of the Republicans to keep this state in the Union regardless of the cost and they were determined that no disloyal man should have any part in the management of the government, county or state. The first test came in the May election. The Democrats assembled at City Hall and nominated Henry T. Compton, father of former City Surveyor Compton, for mayor and V. M. Peyton for street superintendent. The Republicans, formerly Whigs, were without an organization, a party or a press advocate. All of their utterances were published in the Daily Argus, owned and edited by William Biven, a presumed Douglas Democrat. A few days before the election they put forth an independent ticket, with E. S. Holden as candidate for mayor. He was a very enterprising citizen, then the leading druggist in the city, and very active in the formation of the District Agricultural Association. Notwithstanding the handicap of the Republicans, the Democrats were badly defeated, electing only three candidates for minor offices. In the election, politics cut no figure. Dr. Holden was elected by a vote of 493, his opponent receiving 228 votes. V. M. Peyton, then a member of the Democratic city committee, had no opposition for superintendent of streets and polled 651 votes. For future reference and to note the political growth today, let us read by wards the vote for mayor. E. S. Holden ran as follows: First Ward, 208; Second Ward, 158; Third Ward, 127. The ward boundaries were similar to those of the present day. Mr. Compton's vote was 97 in the First Ward, 95 in the Second and 36 in the Third.

The Fourth of July

Time rolled us on to the Fourth of July, 1860. It was a beautiful day, and Billy Wall's old iron cannon, afterwards thrown into the channel, welcomed the sunrise. At sunset again rang out thirty-three guns for the "Union of State and the Flag of Our Union Forever." A. C. Bradford was grand marshal of the procession, assisted by Thomas K. Hook. In the line, led by the Stockton Cornet Band, Richard Condy, leader, marched the Stockton Blues, Captain P. Edward Conner in command, they being followed by the Stockton Turnverein, led by August Weihe, after them coming the fire department, and citizens on horseback. Marching to the grove on Park Street, between Sutter and San Joaquin, Rev. David W. McDonald, the Episcopal rector, offered a prayer to the God of all, that peace might continue throughout the land. Thomas Colwell read the Declaration of Independence and Newton Booth delivered "a masterly production—a speech which spoke to the reason and the feelings." The council had appropriated $350 for fireworks, and these were set off on Fremont Square, but being old, having been shipped around Cape Horn, they were a failure.

State and National Democratic Conventions

We must now pass from local to national events. The national Democratic convention was called to meet at Charleston, S. C., April 28, 1860, and in preparation for this event, J. P. Hoge, the chairman of the Democratic state committee, called a convention to assemble at Sacramento January 29, to elect delegates to the Presidential convention. San Joaquin was entitled to ten delegates to the Sacramento convention, and the Democrats met in the City Hall February 24. John McMullen was elected permanent chairman and William Harper, secretary. The delegates elected were Thomas W. Lane, John McMullen, farmer and cattle dealer; David F. Douglas, San Joaquin's first Senator; John C. White, a wealthy farmer; H. C. Patrick, part owner of the Republican; P. E. Conner, founder of the Stockton waterworks; William H. DeVries, father of our ex-Congressman; J. H. Lathrop and Edward Cavanaugh. The convention assembled in Sacramento at the time appointed. It met in the First Baptist Church, but so deep was the interest and so large the crowd that it was compelled to adjourn to the Forest Theater. The Democratic press of the state had declared in favor of Daniel S. Dickerson of New York as Presidential nominee, and he was indorsed by the convention by a vote of 282 to 65. Vincent E. Greiger offered a resolution that Stephen A. Douglas be the last choice of the convention. This resolution was laid on the table. Two Democrats from San Joaquin, Major L. R. Bradley, afterwards Governor of Nevada, and C. M. Creanor, the district judge, were anxious to take the long, dangerous and weary ocean journey to Charleston, and Major Bradley was one of the elect. Upon arrival in the city since so famous, the California delegation learned that their nominee was not in the fight, for the contest lay between Stephen A. Douglas, the "Little Giant" of Northern Democracy, and John C. Breckinridge, the champion of the South. The delegates from the cotton land, failing in their effort to force the convention to adopt a pro-slavery platform, withdrew from that body, followed later by the California delegation. The convention nominated Douglas for President and William Johnson for Vice-President. Those who withdrew met at Richmond, June 11, adopted the platform which was rejected by the Douglas convention and nominated John C. Breckinridge for President and Joseph C. Lane of Oregon for Vice-President. The Republican convention on May 16 had nominated Abraham Lincoln for President, and May 19 the Constitutional Union (peace) party had placed John Bell before the people.

The National Republican convention was the first to assemble and June 13 the news was received in Stockton that Abraham Lincoln had been nominated for President. On receiving the news the Stockton Republicans fired one hundred guns in honor of the event. The split in the Democratic party and the nomination of John C. Breckinridge for President was received here July 18. The news created considerable excitement, for Breckinridge was the well-known champion of slavery and state's rights. There was much speculating regarding the election of the Douglas Democratic nominee, Stephen A. Douglas, or the Southern nominee, John C. Breckinridge, but it was finally conceded that the contest lay between Breckinridge, the slavery advocate, and Abraham Lincoln, who had declared in his famous speech in the Douglas-Lincoln debate, "A house divided against itself cannot stand. I believe this government cannot endure permanently half slave, half free. I do not expect the Union to be dissolved. I do not expect the house to fall; but I do expect it will cease to be divided. It will become all one thing or all the other."

The campaign opened in August and William M. Gwin said in his Stockton speech, August 29, "I am for Breckinridge and Lane, first, last and all the time. I am willing to sink or swim, survive or perish with them and the party they represent. Our standard bearer, John C. Breckinridge, is one of the greatest men of the earth. He will administer and advance the glory of the country." The Stockton Republicans in order to successfully carry on the contest organized a Lincoln and Hamlin club, and they published an advertisement in the Stockton Independent calling on all persons who wish to secure the election of Abraham Lincoln for President to assemble in the court house for the organization of a Lincoln club. A large number of Republicans assembled and S. T. Nye was elected president of the meeting, I. S. Locke vice-president and Charles Belding, secretary. The meetings of the club were held in the Baptist Church on Center Street, and planting a flagstaff they raised aloft a large banner bearing the inscription "Lincoln and Hamlin Club." Their first campaign meeting was held August 28 from a small flag decorated platform in front of the Weber House. The officers of the meeting were: President, I. S. Locke; vice-president, Samuel Myers, the French Camp rancher; B. S. Rowe, H. B. Post, the Cherokee Lane farmer; Alexander Burkett, the flour mill owner; S. T. Nye, then a commission merchant; Perry Yaple, a barley mill man, later of Ripon; Dr. Moses Hammond, Willard Sperry, flour mill man; George Gray, lumber dealer, later mayor of city; Charles Grunsky, later county clerk; James Littlehale, banker; and Charles Belding, soda manufacturer and farmer. The speaker of the evening was Thomas Fitch of Wisconsin, later known as the silver-tongued orator of Nevada. The campaign was hotly contested, Governor Weller, Senator Latham, Senator Gwin, Frank Tilford, Joseph Budd and A. C. Bradford speaking for Breckinridge and Thomas Fitch, Charles Tuttle, Henry Edgerton, A. A. Sargent, George W. Tyler and Henry B. Underhill espousing the cause of Lincoln.

The Election of 1860

On election day, November 6, the Democratic organ said, "Today the great struggle is to come off throughout the United States which is to settle the destiny of the United States of North America. It is the turning point in the world's history." In San Joaquin County the vote was close between Lincoln and Breckinridge, although the Republicans had no newspaper to advocate their cause. The Breckinridge party, although weakened by the secession of the Douglasites, carried both city and county by a small majority, the Republican party, then but four years old, being a good second. I can show the political situation of that day in no better way than by recording the vote. The city vote was: Breckinridge—First Ward, 239; Second Ward, 161; Third Ward, 137; County, 1,374. Douglas—First Ward, 105; Second Ward, 134; Third Ward, 190; County, 733. Lincoln—First Ward, 195; Second Ward, 93; Third Ward, 190; County, 1,131. Bell—First Ward, 32; Second Ward, 22; Third Ward, 28; County, 199. The vote for senator was as follows: F. M. Warmcastle (Breckinridge, Dem.), 1,300; D. J. Staples (Rep.), 1,034; D. A. Inman (Bell), 876. For assemblymen: L. R. Bradley (Breckinridge, Dem.), 1,337; Thomas Laspeyre (Breckinridge, Dem.), 1,125; William Garrard (Douglas, Dem.), 1,047; William H. Lyons (Douglas, Dem.), 1,032. George Gray, Samuel Myers, J. L. Downing and B. P. Baird were other candidates. The strongest Republican precinct was Woodbridge, and it gave Lincoln 128 votes, Breckinridge 90, Douglas 54, and Bell 13. The strongest Breckinridge precinct was Orr's Store, which gave Breckinridge 78, Lincoln 27, Douglas 14, Bell 11. Kerrick's, another Breckinridge stronghold, gave him 55, Lincoln 13, Douglas 6. Lincoln carried the state, receiving 38,744 votes, Douglas 38,023, Breckinridge 33,975, and Bell 9,136.

The die was cast, Lincoln was elected President and the states of the South began seceding from the Union. Here upon the Pacific Coast it was rumored that the Southern sympathizers intended to form a Pacific Republic of the states of Oregon, Nevada and California, and the Stockton Republican gave color to that report when it said, on January 1, 1861: "What may be the future of events no man can tell. The most profound statesmen cannot say today whether the present confederacy will be in existence on the first day of January, or whether there will be at that time a Northern, a Southern, and a Pacific Republic." Everything was favorable for such a republic, for the Buchanan administration had placed as officers in the Mint, the Customhouse, the Postoffice and other Federal positions men known to be in sympathy with the Southern cause. The commander-in-chief of the Pacific Coast forces, Brevet Brigadier-General Albert Sidney Johnson, was of Southern birth, and John B. Floyd had secretly sent to the Benicia arsenal 18,000 stands of arms. The condition of governmental affairs in the state was equally favorable for the formation of a new republic, and sixty-five merchants of San Francisco telegraphed as follows to the Secretary of War, August 28: "A majority of our present state officers are undisguised and avowed secessionists, and the balance, being hostile to the administration, are advocates of a peace policy at any price."

Bear and Secession Flags

While the citizens of Stockton were excitedly discussing the future outlook, Duncan Beaumont, an old resident, and at that time the county surveyor, increased the excitement by floating at the masthead of his yacht, then anchored at the foot of Miner Avenue, a very peculiar flag. It was four-by-six feet in size, and upon the blue cloth was painted a single white star, a grizzly bear and a pine tree. Neither he nor anybody else dreamed of the effect. As soon as the citizens learned of this flag the Stars and Stripes were unfurled from all the engine houses and many other buildings of the city, and Mr. Beaumont in short order pulled down his strange flag. What was the object in raising it? The Stockton Republic said: "It was to be used as a California flag should the Union slide." Mr. Beaumont, in great anger, declared he would raise a British, French or Russian flag if he saw fit. Upon the day following, January 17, some unknown party stretched a banner across Main Street, fastening it to the roofs of the Holden drug store and the theater building. In one corner of this banner were the stars and stripes, in the center a large eagle and beneath the bird a grizzly bear. The flag attracted a large crowd throughout the day and that night someone cut it down. But it was again raised, and hung in place for several days. These two events greatly inflamed the public mind, and the hope was publicly expressed that "this flag-raising folly would not be repeated."

It was repeated, however, in February, by Madison Walthall, one of the charter members of the Baptist Church, and at that time a farmer in Douglas township. He, on his farm, hoisted a bear flag, and the Argus called him a "disunionist." This epithet offended Mr. Walthall and in a newspaper card he declared: "I can say we are not disunionists. Everybody knows what the bear flag means. It means that when the Union is dissolved we intend to be independent—not before."

These incidents, strongly indicating the truth of the rumors of the Pacific Republic, awakened the sleeping patriotism of the lovers of their country. The result was seen February 22, when, as if by one impulse, every Union man declared his principles. Everybody who owned a flag flung it to the breeze, and those without a flag bought one. Flags were everywhere seen upon staffs, fences, trees and buildings and the boys upon the streets carried them by the dozen. Wells Fargo's flag-staff was loaded with them. The procession of that day, partly due to the Stockton Cornet Band, which voluntarily gave its service, had never before been equaled. Shortly after midnight the guns began saluting the coming day, and at sunrise "there was a perfect roar of cannon." At the same hour the band was stationed upon the roof of the Corinthian Building, and, as the flag was flung to the wind, the "Star Spangled Banner," followed by "Yankee Doodle," was borne out over the little town. The procession comprised the Stockton Blues, the Turnverein, carrying a German revolutionary flag, the Fire Department and citizens.

The enthusiastic celebration of February 22, 1861, was due, no doubt, to the stirring news received the previous day. This intelligence, then twelve days old, had been wired from St. Louis to Fort Kearney, thence, by pony express traveling at top speed over mountain, desert and river, it reached Fort Churchill, and from that point the principal events were telegraphed ahead, while the pony speeding on brought the full particulars. These are the headlines that appeared in the California press February 21 over matter dated St. Louis, February 9: "The Union Men Have Carried the Virginia Convention—The Secessionists Elected only About Thirty Members. Secession Movements Go on in the South. Texas Has Passed Her Secession Ordinance. Charleston Is Quiet—Fort Sumter Has Not Been Reinforced. The Ultimatum of South Carolina Has Been Presented and Responded To—The President Says He Has No Power to Negotiate for the Surrender of Government Property, which He Is Bound to Protect. The President-elect Will Leave Springfield for Washington on Monday Next, February 11." We all know from history the events that rapidly followed this report. President Lincoln secretly journeyed to the White House, his friends believing that a plot had been formed to assassinate him. The seceding states, February 4, formed a Southern Confederacy and on the 18th elected Jefferson Davis president. The attack on Fort Sumter came April 12, and two days later the fort was evacuated by Major Anderson. Then came the call of President Lincoln, April 15, for 75,000 men, followed April 19 by the attack on the Massachusetts troops in the streets of Baltimore, and the death of Colonel Ellsworth of the New York Fire Zouaves, who was instantly killed because he pulled down the secession flag from the top of the Arlington Hotel in Alexandria. Ellsworth, then about twenty-five years of age, the pride of Chicago and New York, was the first victim of the war. This created great indignation in Stockton and the first war song heard in this city was the composition, "Ellsworth, the True and the Brave." The music, a solo and chorus, was first heard, I believe, at a Sunday evening service in the Presbyterian Church, Mrs. Wilkins singing the solo.

Semi-monthly came the war dispatches, the excitement constantly increasing. Many persons declared the news was nothing but fakes and sensations got up for the purpose of intensifying the feeling between the North and the South. April 17 the Democratic paper on El Dorado Street said: "The news by pony express is fearfully sensational, extremely alarming and tremendously warlike, but unfortunately for its reliability savors of gammon and enterprising newspapers." Southern men and Northern men were of this opinion, until the guns of Fort Pickens were fired upon the old flag. Then there was a change of sentiment among those of the North, and when the news of the surrender of Fort Sumter was learned, so intense was the excitement that the citizens seemed to have forgotten all about the city election. "We have never seen before such supreme indifference manifested in this matter as at the present time," says a writer of the time, "for neither party held any primaries or conventions, nor was any public notice given of the election until a few days before it took place. Then a list of nominees was sent to the Republican with the name of E. S. Holden for mayor. Later another list was published with J. P. D. Wilkins, a Douglas Democrat, for mayor. The election was very quietly conducted and results as follows: Mayor, E. S. Holden, 462, J. P. D. Wilkins, 234; city collector, V. M. Peyton, 356, H. W. Gillingham, 187; marshal, B. F. Sanborn, 444, J. E. McKensie, 258; assessor, Charles Belding, 273, T. S. Strout, 413.

The Famous Woodbridge Meeting

A few days after the city election an event took place at Woodbridge that finally united the Lincoln and Douglas men, and opened the eyes of many Northern men to a realizing sense of the situation of political affairs in California. The Southern men were active, vigilant, watchful, waiting only for an opportune time to carry out their plans. The state officials were their friends and so were the officers of the army. No United States troops could possibly reach California inside of sixty days, while troops from the South, marching through Texas, New Mexico and Arizona could enter the state in less than three weeks. The Northern men were asleep. To arouse them to action here in San Joaquin, George T. Tyler took the lead. A young man, then thirty years of age, having just arrived from the East, he had located in Stockton. Unswerving in loyalty to party, educated in law, strong in body and fearless in action, he believed that if he could by some means cause the Southern sympathizers to show their hand the Lincoln and Douglas partisans would act. How could this be accomplished? The breaking up of a Republican meeting, Tyler believed, would have the desired effect. Thus it was planned and Woodbridge was the place selected. Although it had given Lincoln the largest precinct vote, yet it was said "the woods are full of secessionists." Quietly it was given out that May 11, 1861, a Union club would be formed in Woodbridge. At the time appointed Tyler and a few friends, all well armed, drove in an open wagon to the town. Over 300 persons were there assembled. The meeting was held in a carpenter shop, and Tyler was elected chairman. Written by him, a series of resolutions were introduced, and by some twenty speakers for nearly four hours, they were heatedly discussed pro and con. Finally the first resolution was put by the Chair, "Resolved, that we will support the Union cause, peacefully if we can, forcibly if we must." There was much confusion, Mark A. Evans, then county treasurer, jumping upon a bench, revolver in hand and shouting to Tyler: "You'll never live to see those resolutions enforced." Immediately there was an uproar. Pistols and knives were drawn, and the chairman, after several unsuccessful efforts to obtain a vote on the resolution, adjourned the meeting to the street. They took opposite sides and then it was seen that three to one the advocates of the "peace policy" outnumbered the "coercionists." The meeting was broken up, and the news was telegraphed to all parts of the state.

The Republican County Convention

Tyler thus scored his first point. His next move was in the Republican convention. It assembled in the City Hall June 15, and in the convention there were many Douglas Democrats. The day previous the news was received that Douglas had died June 3, and a few days before his death he again said to his party men, "Stand by the Union; the insurrection must be crushed." The convention was composed of seventy-seven delegates, among them being the following-named: Charles Belding, C. O. Burton, H. S. Sargent, Jerome Myers, George Gray, Samuel Elliott, George M. Doll, Dr. Charles Grattan, H. B. Underhill, M. S. Thresher, R. S. Johnson, William P. Miller, Andrew Wolf, Joseph M. Long, George E. Childs, Alfred Starkweather, Peter Jahant, J. M. Perley, Shubel Dunham and John Sharp. The convention was called to order by Thomas J. Keys, the Stockton blacksmith.

As permanent officers, Charles Chamberlain was elected president, E. S. Holden and John Thompson, vice-presidents, R. S. Johnson and C. O. Burton, secretaries. In its platform, the convention candidly proclaimed these principles: "Whereas, the Government of the United States is now defending itself against a war waged upon it without justification or decent excuse by certain seceded states, a war manifestly, for the overthrow of our Government—therefore be it unanimously resolved, 'First, that at this time indifference is impossible to the patriot and neutrality is cowardice, if not premeditated disloyalty. Second, that the people of California will hail with joy an honorable adjustment (for peace); at the same time they are, above all things, for the Union and its flag, and against all assailants, no matter who they are, from whence they come or with what power armed.'" The nominees for officers were many, but the convention was very cautious regarding the nominees, for they had agreed in a previous mass convention to place none upon the ticket but men of undoubted loyalty to the party and for county judge, D. J. Staples, afterwards president of the Fireman's Insurance Company of San Francisco; J. M. Kelsey, then a farmer; John B. Hall, the well-known attorney; C. C. Rynerson, farmer, and George W. Tyler were placed in nomination. Tyler was nominated on the first ballot, his vote, seventy-three, exceeding by ten the combined votes of his opponents. The nomination for sheriff resulted in a most exciting and bitter contest, because of the placing in nomination of William Biven, editor and proprietor of the Stockton Argus. He was a popular citizen, highly regarded and respected as a gentleman, but some were suspicious as to his loyalty. On the first ballot the result as announced was William Biven 47, Thomas H. Hook 29, Andrew Wolf 14, C. C. Rynerson 33, Samuel Fisher, stage owner, 27. The names of Mr. Wolf and Mr. Fisher were then withdrawn. The result of the second ballot was: Biven 59, Hook 48, Rynerson 35. It was evident that Biven was the choice of the majority, but the leaders were resolved to down him. To accomplish this result, it was necessary to know the delegates who were voting for Biven. To learn this, a motion was made and carried that the next ballot for sheriff be viva voce. The result called was: Biven 62, Hook 51, Rynerson 30. The lowest nominee was then withdrawn. Then some of the leaders, approaching Biven's friends, succeeded in convincing a few of them that Biven was an unreliable nominee, and on the fourth ballot Hook was nominated by a vote of 76 to 54 for Biven. Biven, exceedingly angry, immediately left the hall and from that date he advocated the Southern cause. The loyalty of many in the convention was doubted, and because of this another very unusual proceeding was carried out. The convention was not permitted to vote for the delegates to the state Republican convention. Austin Sperry, George R. Warren, Eli Amsbaugh, George W. Tyler, Joseph M. Long, S. H. Benedict, D. J. Staples and Thomas M. Mosely were secretly selected by somebody as delegates.

As my readers will have noticed by the account of the proceedings of the Republican convention, before the coming of July 4, 1861, the lines had been clearly drawn, and all citizens had been called upon to take their stand either for or against the Union. In the celebration of that day not a Southern man took part. The old flag was everywhere seen. It floated from flagpoles, windows, fences and windmills. The boys wore badges bearing the motto, "The Union forever," and the girls wore dresses and sashes made of the national colors. Thousands of strangers crowded the sidewalks, as the procession passed along Brigadier-General Connor, in full-dress uniform riding a white horse, was the center of all eyes, for hundreds had never before seen an army officer. He was the grand marshal, his aides being H. T. Huggins and T. K. Hook. After marching along the principal streets, the procession halted in the Park Street grove, there to listen to a prayer by Rev. B. F. McDonald, the national song by thirty-four children, reading of the Declaration of Independence by Allen Lee Bours, an oration by Rev. David D. Dryden, the singing of "Flag of Our Union" by the children and the benediction by Rev. Clarence King. Refreshments were then provided for the military and the Fire Department by the ladies. The procession then reformed and marched back to Weber Avenue, where it was dismissed. The collation and the reforming of the procession were events not customary, and the object was to keep the men in a body so that they could act immediately, for trouble was anticipated. Trouble was foreshadowed at sunrise by the pastor of the Methodist Church, South, who attempted to prevent the ringing of the bell, and later by a rumor that, as the procession would pass the Eagle Hotel, a young lady of the South would wave a Confederate flag from the balcony. Horses had been attached to the engine and hose carriages, the firemen marching behind their machines. As they marched past the hotel they looked for the new flag. No flag was seen, however, as the lady's friends has persuaded her not to carry out her threat. Each soldier had three rounds of ammunition ready for any emergency, and the firemen declared if that flag was seen they would capture it or tear down the building in the attempt.

The Secessionist Pastor

The excitement of that day was at a fever heat, intensified by the unwise action of the Rev. L. D. Hargis, pastor of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. It had been the custom to ring all of the church bells at sunrise and sunset, but the pastor instructed the janitor not to ring the bell, as he was opposed to mixing religion with politics. The janitor, however, as was his custom, began ringing the bell. As its peal fell upon the ears of the pastor he sprang from his bed, and, running across the street to the church, half dressed, he ordered the janitor to stop ringing the bell. He then took the keys, locked the door and returned to the parsonage. Mr. Schultz, the janitor, then crossing the street, informed Stephen Davis, the contractor and shipbuilder, what had taken place, and the latter quietly said: "Wait a few minutes, and I guess we will ring the bell." Davis was a strong Union man—a Massachusetts Yankee—and going over to the church, the two men crawled through the window and began ringing the bell. Again the minister came rushing over, and, unlocking the door, ordered Davis to stop; but Davis simply smiled. Then the reverend gentleman attempted to stop the ringing by hanging to the rope. Immediately Mr. Davis took a half hitch of the rope around the pastor's wrist, tightening it as in a vice, and the pastor yelled and quickly loosened his hold. He then retired and the bell was rung some length of time. The news of the attempt to stop ringing the bell soon spread throughout the town, and as I stated, it intensified the excitement, for many Union men had subscribed to the purchase of the bell, as well as toward the church. Then the Union men declared, "We'll ring the bell at sunset, or know the reason why." The disunionists replied, "The bell shall not be rung," and one secessionist, Tom Coldwell, a lawyer, boastfully remarked, "If the bell is rung, it will be over my dead body." As the shades of evening began falling across the valley, men began assembling in front of the church. At this time Captain Weber's small cannon was at the wagon shop being repaired, and under command of Israel Rolf the men wheeled the cannon to the front of the church and loaded it with scraps of iron, bolts, etc., declaring that if the bell were not rung they would blow down the building. At sunset several hundred men had assembled, among them many "fire eaters," the name given to the loud, boasting disunionists. As the fire bell began ringing, the door of the church was forced open and immediately men began ringing the Methodist bell. Coldwell, with his revolver in his hand, stepped inside and put his hand on the rope. Immediately Nathan Coombs (the uncle of Orrin Henderson) struck him a John Sullivan blow in the face and he landed on the sidewalk. This ended the affair. The Union men cheered and yelled, and for over an hour's time the old bell rang out "Un-ion, Un-ion forever!"

The Democratic State Convention

The San Joaquin political campaign of 1861 was the most exciting, important and intense of any in the state's history. The Republican state convention had assembled at Sacramento June 18th, and one member of the committee on resolutions was George W. Tyler of Stockton; Leland Stanford, the choice of the convention for governor, was nominated on the first ballot. On July 11 the Breckinridge Democrats also assembled at Sacramento. To this convention the San Joaquin Democracy sent twelve delegates. The proxies were numerous, but the following were in attendance: William Lanus, W. D. Aylett, A. R. Campbell, J. H. Woods, Peter Megerle, C. L. Benedict, F. A. Martin, John Canevan (D. F. Douglas, proxy), B. F. Langford (H. C. Patrick, proxy), D. J. Oullahan (D. S. Terry, proxy) and Thomas Laspeyre. This was the famous convention in which that brilliant and gifted young Virginian, Edmond Randolph, made the speech of his life. He died two months later, September 8, of consumption. As he ascended the platform to speak, the stillness of death possessed that memorable body, for the young man came from a long line of eloquent orators, and the convention knew that he was intensely aroused over the events then taking place in the South. It is said that Randolph's eyes were fairly aflame as he spoke and he said in his peroration: "For God's sake, gentlemen, tell me of battles fought and won. Tell me of usurers overthrown; that Missouri is again a free state, no longer crushed under the armed heel of a reckless and odious despot. Tell me that the State of Maryland lives again; and, oh, gentlemen, let us read, let us hear at the first moment that not one hostile foot treads the soil of Virginia. If this be rebellion, then I am a rebel. Do you want a traitor, then I am a traitor. For God's sake, speed the ball; may the lead go quick to his heart, and may our country be free from this despot usurper that now claims the name of President of the United States." Under the inspiration of a speech such as this, perhaps it is not surprising that the convention should resolve: "That we are opposed to the employment of force by the general Government against the seceded states for the purpose of compelling obedience and submission to Federal authority." The third resolution declared: "in favor of the recognition of the independence of the Confederate States, and a treaty of amity and peace between them and the United States Government as the alternative which will terminate the horrors of civil war and bring back peace and happiness to our distracted country."

The San Joaquin delegates returned from the Sacramento convention, and July 20th the party assembled in the City Hall and "heartily indorsed and reaffirmed the principles and policy, adopted by the convention presided over by the Honorable Todd Robinson in June last." Among them the 113 delegates assembled to nominate county officers were J. D. Peters, Gilbert B. Claiborne, Frank Moss, George W. Trahern, Daniel Rothenbush, Jesse Mitchell, Moses Marks and J. R. W. Hitchcock. They were called to order by the chairman of the County Committee, Postmaster William Lanus. Thomas Laspeyre was chosen as president, Dr. J. A. Aull and James Shephard, vice-presidents, and George Tilgham, secretary. In the platform was the following: "The Democratic party has a mission to accomplish to defeat Black Republicanism under whatever name it rears its head. It must not fear the pressure from without, the clamor and the cry of treason, but its members should stand firm, resist the advocates of civil war, and strike for peace and the Constitution."

The Budd-Underhill Debate

The campaign opened early. On August 5 George W. Tyler and Henry B. Underhill, candidates for county judge and district attorney, respectively, addressed the citizens in front of the Weber House. They also challenged Joseph H. Budd and A. C. Bradford to discuss the question of the day during the campaign. The conditions were that each speaker should occupy three-quarters of an hour, the last speaker of each side to have the privilege of occupying all of the time not taken up by his colleague; that there should be no hissing or interference with any speaker; that the discussion should be opened by the Democrats the first night, by the Republicans the second night, and so on alternately throughout the campaign. Immediately the challenged party accepted the conditions. Budd was Underhill's opponent for district attorney, and August 10 Budd began the argument for the Democracy, followed by Underhill. In twenty precincts they discussed the issues, ending at the Sixteen-Mile house, September 2, two days before the election, and to the voters was left the decision whether or not Tyler and Underhill had "polished their opponents cleaner than a shotgun," as was prophesied by the Republican editor.

Exciting Meeting at Woodbridge

The assemblages were quiet and orderly until the meeting of August 24 in Woodbridge. Two chairmen were selected: Dr. C. H. Ober, who on December 17 of the same year, died by poison, taken by mistake, represented the Breckinridge Democrats, and W. H. Bellville presided for the Republicans. Budd made the opening speech. There was no disturbance until Tyler, the last speaker, began his reply to Budd. Then some in the meeting began to converse loudly, and at times hissing was heard. Tyler, who was very quick-tempered, controlled his temper for a time, but as the insults continued he finally declared that any person who would disturb that meeting or any other was no gentleman but a scoundrel and he (Tyler) would step off the stage and settle the disturbance in one minute. The remark created still greater confusion, but order was finally restored and Tyler finished his argument. After the meeting there were loud cheers for Jeff Davis and Beauregard.

On the list of speaking places stood Liberty, a Democratic stronghold. A fight there was anticipated, and Tyler and his friends journeyed thither well armed. The meeting was scheduled for Saturday night, August 31. There was good order until Tyler began. In vigorous language he scored the Southern Democracy, and his auditors, not in sympathy with the speaker, began to hiss and talk loudly. The chairman of the meeting tried to quiet them, but failed. Then Bradford and Budd tried to pacify the disturbance. Tyler continued speaking, but finally his patience was exhausted, and drawing his revolver and laying it upon the table, he exclaimed, "I'll kill the first man who makes any more disturbance!" The crowd cheered and Tyler was given a quiet hearing.

Tyler's Assault on Budd

Two days after this disturbance the only quarrel between men of high standing in this community occurred, and it certainly speaks well for Stockton's law-abiding citizens that so exciting a campaign could be conducted with such good temper. The trouble referred to was caused by a letter published by George W. Tyler, in which he declared that Budd had made no effort to stop the noise at Liberty. The two men met in the Court House the next morning, and Tyler in answer to Budd's question, admitted that he was the author of the letter. Budd then exclaimed, "It is false." "You lie," answered Tyler, and, catching his opponent by his long beard, he struck Budd a severe blow. Bystanders then separated the combatants. Ill feeling had existed between the two speakers since their debate, August 23, at the Boston House. After that meeting Budd reported that Tyler had said, "If we cannot carry this election by ballot, we will by bayonets." Tyler, in a statement published August 25, denied making that statement. He admitted saying, "If that party (the Democratic) is not beaten this fall by ballots it will have to be beaten ere long by bayonets." Continuing he said, "Should any attempt be made by them to place California in a position to aid treason and rebellion in the shape of a Pacific republic, I would resist such an attempt to the bitter end and shed the last drop of my heart's blood if necessary to prevent so dire a calamity.

Those were indeed the "times that tried men's souls" and to carry both state and county election the Republicans had planned well the campaign. Adopting Tyler's idea, the committee sent blank lists to some "hard shelled" Republican in each voting precinct. He was requested to fill out the blank, writing therein the name of every voter and his political faith and then mail it to the committee. This was faithfully obeyed, and then strong leading Republicans were sent forth under the command to go forth into the county and preach the gospel (of Republicanism), not to every creature, but to every Douglas Democrat, convincing him of the error of his ways, and bidding him repent and join the Republican ranks. Many merchants of Stockton, following the example of San Francisco merchants, in a published address said: "We, the undersigned, believing the coming election to be the most important of any that has been held in our county, and believing it to be the duty of every true patriot to make any reasonable sacrifice for the public good, will close our respective places on election day." This card was signed by forty-three business firms. At the same time twenty-nine Douglas Democrats declared over their signature: "We, who have heretofore acted in opposition to the Republican party, fully endorse the actions of the San Francisco merchants, and recommend our friends and fellow-citizens to go and do likewise." The San Francisco merchants said: "The dreadful consequences that must arise from the division of the Union men of this state, and the possible election of the secession McConnell ticket, render it an imperative duty to forget all party preferences and look only to the salvation of our state from ruin and devastation that will follow any success of the secessionists here.

At that time there were no processions but the night before the election, meetings were held in front of the St. Charles Hotel. A. C. Bradford and David S. Terry, interrupted by tumultuous cheering, told their auditors why they should cast their ballot on the morrow for McConnell. The Weber House echoed to moderate hurrahs as George W. Tyler, Elbert Weeks and Enoch Gove declared that before the setting of another sun Leland Stanford would be the next Governor of California. On the election morn Democrats and Republicans each opened his party newspaper and anxiously read the editorial of the day. Said A. C. Russell in the Democratic organ: "We ask voters today to consider the awful responsibility which rests upon them, and dismiss all feeling of hatred, revenge, pride and passion, and vote calmly and with judgment. You are today to decide whether you wish every house, North and South, to be a house of mourning. You are to vote whether ruin, poverty and despair shall pervade the land, and all for no practical good. We have given you our solemn warning." From Samuel Seabough, of the Stockton Independent, came these assertions: "You are to cast today the most important vote of your lives. You are to declare whether this country is for or against maintaining the Federal Constitution; for or against civil war in California. If you sustain the entire Union county ticket—you fix the character of this town and county as loyal, peace loving, and opposed to civil war. If you suffer defeat you permit it to go abroad that the people of San Joaquin are not to be trusted in their loyalty, and the great county will lend her moral, if not her physical, aid to revolutionize the state." As trouble was anticipated, twenty citizens were sworn in as special policemen. There was nothing for them to do, for all the citizens were too busy obtaining votes either to quarrel or get drunk. No disturbance took place, although all the saloons were running full blast. The two bands of music that had the previous evening enlivened the audiences were again at work, and, drawn in wagons through the streets, the Republican band played patriotic airs. The band engaged by the Democrats played marches, waltzes and polkas only. A gentleman from Kerrick's precinct told us in the Mail some time since how a dozen teamsters' votes were cast in that precinct by proxy, long after the teamsters were driving their mules toward their mountain destinations. The votes were accepted, for the watchword was, "Lose not a vote; get them honestly if you can, fraudulently if you must." Both parties worked every trick and scheme known to the politicians, but the race was too hot for the Democracy. San Joaquin County, which had given the Democratic nominee, Milton S. Latham, a majority of 1,597 over Stanford in 1859, now rolled up 1,837 for Stanford, 1576 for McConnell and only 414 for Conness. The city gave Stanford 827, McConnell 488. I here record the full county vote for the Republican and Breckinridge Democratic ticket, that we may see who were the first officeholders of the party that for nearly twenty years elected a full county ticket: Senator, C. H. Chamberlain, 2079, W. D. Aylette, 1617; assemblyman, John Thompson, 2110, Samuel Myers, 2160, John H. Woods, 1591; county judge, George W. Tyler, 1996, J. K. Shafer, 1720; sheriff, Thomas K. Hook, 2010, John W. O'Neal, 1709; county clerk, H. E. Hall, 1984, S. R. Chalmers, 1616; recorder, Roley E. Wilhoit, 2115, J. M. Neal, 1576; treasurer, J. M. Kelsey, 2075, Mark A. Evans, 1633; district attorney, Henry B. Underhill, 2145, Joseph H. Budd, 1570, Cyrus Collins, 2107; surveyor, George E. Drew, 2107, Duncan Beaumont, 1684; assessor, Joseph M. Long, 2070, J. F. Neeley, 1604; administrator, L. C. Van Allen, 2085, N.E. Noel, 1593; superintendent of schools, Cyrus Collins, 2019, Alfred N. Blake, 1659.

Union Men Rejoice

In 1863 President Lincoln proclaimed a day to be given to prayer and fasting. Services were held in the Presbyterian Church, the Rev. Robert Happersett preaching the sermon. On a former occasion, when Lincoln appointed September 26, 1861, as a day of fasting and prayer it was almost universally observed for the future of the nation look dark and gloomy but now the day was scarcely noticed. The citizens took it for enjoyment, and the storekeepers were on the lookout for the silver dollars and the greenback. Kipling's admonition to the English people—Lord God of Hosts, be with us yet, Let us forget, lest we forget—would have been applicable to Stockton's citizens, for Grant and Sherman were sweeping the land and Farragut and Porter were cleaning the sea, and the people seemed to forget Garfield's sublime cry, "God reigneth." The Union men were now in no mood for prayer. They wanted to yell, and yell they did with all the lung power within them when the news came September 8 of the second Bull Run battle, this time the bull running south instead of north. Saturday evening the news was received and the Union men went wild. All the bells of the city were rung, the cannon was fired, the Fire Department turned out with its engines and a band of music marched the streets, rockets and Roman candles were burned, and in every possible manner men gave vent to their feelings. As a finish, the speakers' stand was carried to the front of the Weber House, men immediately began speaking, and the people cheered until they were hoarse.

The state election was soon to be held. The Union County Committee at this time comprised seventeen members, C. O. Burton being chairman and Charles Grunsky, secretary. committee assembling May 16, called a convention to be held in the City Hall June 13 to nominate a county ticket and elect delegates to the state convention at Sacramento June 17. At the appointed date the convention met, every delegate being a well-known Union man. The delegates were called to order by C. O. Burton, then just appointed as postmaster. M. S. Thresher was elected temporary chairman and I. R. Wilbur and G. C. Holman of Lockeford, secretaries. Preliminary business being completed, the convention adjourned until one o'clock. Again assembling, M. G. Cobb, a prominent lawyer, was chosen chairman, and Holman, secretary. On motion of Thomas R. Mosely all the county officers were nominated viva voce. The resolutions passed by the by the convention had in them a defiant tone, for the news from the East was very encouraging to the Union cause. Among the most prominent were the following: "Resolved, that the old flag must wave triumphantly over every inch of soil owned by the Government, Resolved, that when the last traitor in the land shall have laid down his arms and submitted unconditionally to the lawful authority of the Government of the United States, then we shall be in favor of peace, but not until then. Resolved, that this county can and will give 600 majority for the Union ticket in September next."

Hook's Sensational Speech

When nominations for sheriff were called for, Thomas K. Hook's name was presented. This was a surprise, for many in the convention questioned his loyalty. When called upon to appear before the convention, Hook, knowing that his loyalty was doubted, made the most sensational speech ever heard in a San Joaquin convention. Trembling with emotion, he said in part: "Let me be accused of everything that is offensive in the eyes of God and man, place me in the lowest grade of criminals if you will, but in Heaven's name don't charge me with being disloyal to my Government. When this convention shall have adjourned, let each delegate go home assured that if a drop of disloyal blood shall flow in my veins, if I can find out its location, it shall see the light." He was nominated unanimously. The nominations were in nearly every case repetitions of the nomination of 1861. R. E. Wilhoit was named for recorder, J. M. Kelsey for treasurer, George E. Drew for surveyor and Morris H. Bond for coroner. The entire ticket was elected.

The success of the ticket was due to the formation of Union clubs throughout the county. I have no positive data regarding the formation of the first club, but French Camp seems to have the honor. A club was formed there May 18, 1861, with Samuel Myers as president and F. J. Woodward as secretary. July 2, 1863, a Union club was formed and met in the Davis schoolhouse on Cherokee Lane. John Grattan, then one of the hardest of party workers, was president and William D. Ashley, secretary. Other clubs were formed throughout the county, but the principal club was in Stockton. Two years previous there had been a Republican club, but as a Union organization, a club composed of both Democrats and Republicans, its formation dates from July 29, 1863. A few days before that date this call was published: "Union men, attention. There will be a meeting in the City Hall Monday evening for the purpose of forming a Union club. Let all those who are in favor of laying aside all party names and associations and are opposed to copperhead and secession Democracy, and their peace propositions attend and enroll themselves upon the side of our country and Government."

Hundreds signed the roll. At that time General Grant was hammering at Vicksburg and General Meade was gathering his forces at Gettysburg. Then came the most terrible battle of the war on the first three days of July, and General Robert E. Lee, that grand man and heroic leader, fled towards Richmond in defeat. The following day Vicksburg surrendered. The news was received at Stockton Saturday evening, July 9, and at the club meeting that night, Rev. Hendrickson, pastor of the Baptist Church, was called upon for a speech and he declared that the rebellion was "on its last legs." Hendrickson, who soon after the close of the war took charge of the First Baptist Church, San Francisco, was the most eloquent pulpit orator in Stockton. Let me quote the closing remarks of his sermon, August 6, 1863: "My fellow citizens, stand by your country, obey her laws and defend her constitution against all enemies, and, by the blessings of God she will stand firm amidst the wildest storm of human passion. Her glories will shine forth with even increasing brilliancy, and the rectitude and grandeur of her sway will be enjoyed until the end of time. When from the pine forests of Maine to the rock-ribbed mountains of California and to the evergreen glades of Florida will be heard the magic shout, Alleluia, the Lord God omnipotent reigneth; for He has caused our country to triumph gloriously." The victories of Grant, Meade and Halleck could not be passed silently by, and on July 11 there was a jollification previously unsurpassed. All the business houses and residences of Union men were brightly illuminated. The bells were rung and the cannon's boom and the rockets' red glare gave proof through the night that something was doing in Stockton. The Union Guard, Stockton Light Dragoons, the First Cavalry, California Volunteers, companies G, I, K, and M, together with the Union clubs of the county, paraded the streets led by the Stockton Cornet Band playing continuously the tunes, "John Brown," "The Union Forever," and "The Red, White and Blue." The speakers' stand had been placed in the street, and Charles H. Chamberlain, afterwards senator and author of the famous bill giving the negro equal rights in a court of law, addressed the audience. He was followed by Samuel Myers, Rev. Hendrickson, Thomas B. Shannon, Cornelius Cole and M. G. Cobb. Frank Pixley was expected, but he sent a telegram saying: "Illness in my family prevents me being with you tonight. When Lee is annihilated, Richmond captured and Charleston burned, I will visit Stockton and preach the funeral oration of the rebellion." Till midnight the people lingered, then, moving to the wharf, witnessed a beautiful sight as the steamer Cornelia, brilliantly illuminated, came slowly up the channel.

The Democrats assembled in county convention July 20, under very discouraging circumstances. They had no chance whatever of electing their state or county ticket, and their party organs, the San Joaquin Republican and the Stockton Argus, had been suppressed by the order of Brigadier-General Wright. The delegates, among whom were John B. Hall, N. C. Hilke, Frank Moss, John Quinn and Samuel Eldridge, elected William H. Lyons, chairman and L. R. Chalmers of Colledgeville and William Biven, secretaries. The convention protested against the many arbitrary acts and usurpations of President Lincoln, and condemned as tyrannical the arrest of C. L. Vallandigham of Ohio, who had denounced the draft. They also declared the Stockton Beacon their official advocate, Biven having started this paper after the suppression of the Argus.

The Campaign of 1863

The campaign of 1863 was very lively, Joseph H. Budd, John B. Hall, Samuel A. Booker, Charles Weller and Joe Hamilton speaking for the so-called Democrats and Moses G. Cobb, George Tyler, Charles H. Chamberlain, Henry B. Underhill, Joseph W. Cavis and Wm. L. Dudley defending the Union cause. One of the largest meetings of the campaign was that held in Agricultural Hall August 27 and "an immense audience filled every spot in the spacious building." It was in part a military meeting as the speaker of the evening was Colonel Van Arman of the 127th Illinois Regiment, and in his honor many of the vice-presidents were military men. The meeting was called to order by C. O. Burton, chairman of the Union County Committee. Colonel Oscar M. Brown was elected as president and Captains T. A. Storms, L. E. Lyons, T. K. Hook, C. J. Jennings, J. L. Merriam and L.

M. Gardner, vice-presidents and Lieutenant P. S. Rowe and George Vaugh, secretaries. During the speaking an "Independent" extra was read telling of the bombardment of Fort Sumter by the Federal army. "The audience were perfectly wild with excitement and cheer upon cheer rent the air as the reading progressed." At its conclusion the people arose to their feet and gave three cheers for Colonel Gilmore, the commander of the Federal forces and the band at the same time struck up "Yankee Doodle." At intervals the Euterpean club sang patriotic songs, and a quartette comprising Mrs. J. P. D. Wilkins, Mrs. Edward Delano, Wm. Cobb and Amos Durant sang the "Flag of Our Union," which was loudly encored. Cheers were then given for the army and navy and the success of the Union ticket.

The Union party, October 14, over twenty days previous to the election, had their big celebration. The city workers, assembling in the afternoon, marched to the Mormon Slough bridge over Center Street and after greeting the county delegation escorted them into the city. That night the streets were lively. There were salutes by the Stockton Light Artillery, two bands of music (one from San Francisco), a procession with some 1500 torches and transparencies in line, fireworks and speaking. For the first time Hunter Square was occupied as the political assembly room, with the arch of God overhead and the stars of the Union shining. As the procession was led into the square, rockets, stars and blue lights filled the air. The space was crowded, over 5000 persons being present; some had come over twenty miles to listen to those eloquent speakers—Frank Pixley, William Higby and Henry Edgerton—and until the midnight hour the speakers proclaimed the party principles. It seemed as if the very air was then saturated with Unionism, for even the boys caught the fever. About 150, with Frank Wilkins as grand marshal and George R. Sanderson and George Warfield as aids, October 19 formed a torchlight procession and marched the streets. They were led by fife and drum, Herbert Condy playing the fife and Willie Browning the snare drum. After an hour's parade they returned to the hall and listened to addresses from H. B. Underhill and Rev. Mr. Buel of San Francisco.

In the meantime General W. T. Sherman had been making his famous march through Georgia and in the twilight hour of September 3, 1864, the telegraph flashed across the continent the splendid news, "Atlanta has fallen," and that night around the Democratic headquarters all was darkness and silence, but around the Union stand noise was King. The Union men had a good laugh on the Democrats over the old iron cannon that had for so many years belched forth fire and smoke.

Some spiteful persons had toppled the old gun into the slough. The Democrats had fished it out and they had fired salutes for McClellan that afternoon. At night it rattled the windows livelier than ever before because Atlanta, the capital of Georgia, had been destroyed by Sherman's army. The occupation of Atlanta by the Federal troops, many of them negroes, gave rise to a negro melody, which was sung in church by Mrs. Wilkins: Look out dar now, we's agoin' to shoot, Look out dar, don't you understand Babylon is fallen, We's agoin' to occupy this land." Sherman marched quickly from Atlanta to the sea, and George F. Root then composed the war song, "Marching through Georgia."

The State Campaign of 1864

The state campaign opened in September, and on the 17th the Union party's first meeting was addressed by Judge S. H. Brockway of Calaveras and A. A. Sargent of Nevada. The same evening the Democracy held a meeting in front of the St. Charles Hotel and Samuel H. Beeker introduced the first speaker, Charles L. Weller, as "just out of Alcatraz, put in by General McDowell's orders." Weller, one of the shining lights of the party, was at that time chairman of the State Central Committee. Because of remarks made at a political meeting he was arrested and confined on the island.

In three weeks, however, he was released, after giving $25,000 bonds and taking the oath of allegiance. The Democrats, who had worked very hard all through the campaign to carry the county for McClellan and Pendleton, held their biggest meeting Saturday evening before the election. Early in the afternoon the farmers from many miles distant began to assemble in the city, and at 7 o'clock the procession began forming. In the line were hundreds of torches and banners, and the novel feature was a company of horsemen, each rider carrying a new broom with the inscription, "The Democrats Will Sweep the State." The showing they made was a surprise to their opponents, and their paper declared: "The procession was well arranged and had a very fine appearance." About 9 o'clock the voters gathered at their old stamping ground, and their local speakers declared the war a failure and the government a despotism.

As the election day drew nigh a large number of business men published the following notice: "We, the undersigned merchants and traders in the city of Stockton, believe that the coming election to be the most important of any that has yet been held in our state; and we believe it to be the duty of every true patriot to make any reasonable sacrifice, for the public good, do hereby mutually agree with each other; that we will close our respective places of business on the coming election day to wit, Wednesday, the second day of September, 1863. Wm. P. Miller, J. Pierce Underhill Co., Webster Bros., Mills & Doll, Louis M. Hickman, C. J. Newcomb & Co., Alfred Blake, R. B. Parker & Co., V. Marratt, Thomas & Albert Ecstrom, H. C. Hilke, Timothy Paige, Kierski Bros., Henderson & Belding, Harry F. Fanning, Charles G. Ernest, Rufus B. Lane, George Natt, Louis Hansel, Wm. B. Young, John O. Keefe, H. S. Chase & Co., Baker & Hamilton, H. S. Sargent, Jones & Hewlett, M. L. Abramsky, Stockwell & Mosely, Adolphe Dolhaguy, Thomas Gallagher, Seifert & Fell, Nash & Fogg, Mrs. R. Johnson, Dohrmann & Smallfield, Thomas Cunningham, Peter Mengel, Wm. Christian, McShane & Oullahan, Owens & Moore, Geo. H. Sanderson, Richard Condy, H. M. Gage, H. Barly, Wm. Fogarty & Co., H. P. Bridges, M. L. Bird, J. P. D. Wilkins, H. O. Mathews, H. S. Matteson, Keep & Briggs, Woodman & Stockwell, L. Howard, John McLean, Roseman & Yates, Sidney Newell, and John T. Hickinbotham. The polls opened at 8 o'clock and closed at sunset, and at midnight the guns were roaring, the bands playing and the voters cheering for the city had gone Lincoln, 717; McClellan, 389. Neither did the Democrats get comfort from the county, for as soon as the votes of each precinct were counted, a rider upon the dead run brought the returns to the Union headquarters, and the result figured up: Lincoln, 1849; McClellan, 1429. Over the result of the contest the Union men rejoiced November 12, the telegraph having brought the news of Lincoln's reelection.

Close of the War

The army of the North was now pressing harder and closer the army of the South, and the people saw not far distant the time of which they sang: "When Johnny comes marching home again, Hurrah!" But to thousands of homes Johnny would never march back; 227,000 had fallen in Southern fields. This thought suggested George F. Root's pathetic ballad: "We shall meet, but we shall miss him; There will be one vacant chair; We shall linger to caress him, While we breathe our evening prayer." In rags and tatters, sometimes with scarcely enough to eat, the brave boys in gray manfully struggled for the cause they believed to be right, but against the powerful, well-fed army led by Sherman and Grant they were helpless. Robert E. Lee, one of the grandest men and bravest generals the nation has ever produced, finally gave way and on April 9, 1864, he surrendered to General U. S. Grant.

The news reached Stockton at 8 o'clock in the morning of April 10th, and never again will such a scene be witnessed as on that day. In their triumphant shouts of joy, it seemed as if men's hearts would leap from their breasts, so happy were they that the terrible strain was at an end. Immediately a detachment of the light artillery fired a national salute, under the command of Sergeant Charles F. Whale. At the same time all the bells of the city began their joyous peal, and heard above them all was the big fire bell. Continuously for over three hours the steamer Cornelia's bell sounded, "'Tis well, 'tis well," and the fireman of the Globe foundry shoveled in coal, while the shrill whistle blew for many hours. The musicians in those days, like the minute men of the Revolution, were always ready and were called out, a procession was formed, the firemen with their engine being on hand, and they marched the streets, cheering, cheering, cheering. For change they would halt, and some speaker, jumping upon a cannon would address the excited listeners. All the business houses were closed, and all the morning the people marched, sung war songs and hurrahed.

Grant's Picture Brought $600

Finally the marchers halted in front of the Guards' Armory on the avenue. Rev. Lyford, then here in the interest of the Chairman Commission, mounting a cannon, began to address the crowd. To him was handed for the benefit of the commission a large pen and ink sketch of General Grant, the work being done by an insane asylum patient. Quick as a flash he caught the temper of his audience, and extolling the victory of Grant, he finally exclaimed, "How much am I bid for the man on horseback?" The bidding started at $20 ran up to $100, and it was sold to Charles T. Meader, then the copper king. He handed the auctioneer $100 in gold for the portrait. It was then sold to Captain Cushing of the steamer Cornelia for $50, then to R. T. Moseley for $100, to Meader again for $30, to Cushing for $20, to Andrew W. Simpson for $50, to L. U. Shippee for $30, to Kelsey for $50, and finally to Meader for $25. The picture all told brought $600, and for many years Mr. Meader kept it as a precious memento of the war. The procession was then dismissed and at 4 o'clock the light artillery, parading the streets, fired a 200-gun salute. That night the city was ablaze with light. All the dwellings were illuminated, and more music and a torch-light procession enlivened the night. Men, women and children "felt just as happy as a big sunflower that nods and bends in the breeze," little dreaming that before the close of another week they would be in gloom and despair and the city hung in black.

The City in Gloom

Such was the fact, for on the morning of April 15th, at 8 o'clock, the news came: "President Lincoln is dead; shot last night by J. Wilkes Booth, while attending a play in Ford's Theater." The news for a time stunned the minds of the Unionists and they moved aimlessly. At once the stores were all closed, the bells began tolling, and half-hour guns were fired throughout the day. Men with blanched cheeks and quivering lips, stood in groups upon the street corners, talking over the terrible deed, some fearful of a most terrible ending of the war, others crying for revenge. Some believed a massacre or riot would be the result, and, as we know, a riot did take place in New York, and Garfield's clarion notes ringing out upon the air, "God reigns, and the Government at Washington still lives," calmed the rising storm. In California we had no Garfield, but we had men of equally good sense and poise, and by their counsel and advice all trouble was averted.

Last Tribute to Lincoln

April 19th the nation paid its last tribute to the dead hero. In this city from sunrise to 11 o'clock, the hour set for the funeral cortege to move, the artillery fired half-hour guns. Early in the day the people came upon the streets in mourning, over 1000 wearing badges with the inscription: "We loved him in life; we mourn him in death." The Masons, Odd Fellows, military and citizens formed the procession, the catafalque being drawn by four black horses, colored footmen walking at the head of each horse. The memorial exercises were held in Agricultural Hall. There was not a foot of standing room. First came the dirge by the band, a selection from the opera "Aida." "Rest, Spirit, Rest;" prayer J. D. Gassman of the Episcopal parish; hymn by the Presbyterian choir, "Sweet the Sleep When Christians Die;" oration by Rev. Dr. Hendrickson; benediction by Rev. J. W. Ross. In closing this chapter on San Joaquin County in the Civil War, I quote the closing lines of Dr. Hendrickson's splendid oration, for the thoughts spoken to that mourning assemblage nearly sixty years ago regarding our country's future, are as seen in the late Allied War, a part of history. Taking his text from the book of Samuel, "And the King said unto his servants, know ye not that there is a Prince and a great man fallen this day in Israel. The Lord shall reward the doer of evil according to his wickedness," the speaker said: "The beauty of Israel is slain upon the high places; how are the mighty fallen. Let the heavens be darkened; let the ocean play its mighty dirge upon the eastern and western shores; let the winds catch up the mournful strain and bear to Heaven the misere of the nation's grief. Our country has a high destiny. Her work is not yet finished. She has a high mission to fulfill. Standing in the front rank of nations, her flag—resplendent with beauty—high in the heavens, she will lead on the world to peace and liberty and the righteousness of the millennial age. Then among the names that were not born to die, will stand in eternal unity—Washington the father and Lincoln the saviour of his country."

HOTELS OF OTHER DAYS

CHAPTER XVI

IT is the desire on the part of every progressive citizen to have one or more first class up-to-date hotels in his city for the accommodation and comfort of invited city guests, tourists and those who best enjoy hotel life. A hotel such as this is a good investment for every city as it not only gives class to the town but it advertises the place abroad as a live, up-to-date city. It is not my purpose to treat of the Stockton's hotels of today

In the days of hustle
The days of bustle
The days of '22

but rather to treat in a general manner of the hotels during the first fifteen years of the city's history. Then, as now, there was an urgent desire for hotels, not of first-class build and service such as the Hotel Stockton, but any place that would provide food and shelter, no matter what the quality and price.

The cry was ringing over the earth "Gold in California!" Thousands in a few months landed in the settlement of Tuleburg as it was called, and daily the multitude increased. To feed and lodge these unexpected guests was a serious problem. Something must be done, and done quickly. Suddenly there arose a city of tent hotels, every man his own landlord, cook and dishwasher. The fire of December 24, 1849, swept the canvas town out of existence, and both guest and landlord were for a time homeless.

Baltimore House

At this time there stood a little shack upon the corner of Main and Commerce streets, later the Buell planing mill site, which survived the flames. It was known by the high-sounding title of Baltimore House, and for many months it was Stockton's principal hotel. Erected in November, 1849, of the branches of trees hewn and trimmed to suit the requirements, its rafters were of light scantling covered with canvas; alike were the side walls, while the floor was of three-inch plank. Having an attic story, it was first-class in every respect, but its life was short, and in September 1850, it was for rent its owners declaring, "it is improved by a canvas roof."

Eagle Hotel

Another tavern to bid for the patronage of that day was the Eagle Hotel, a two-story adobe building covered with mission tiles, situated "on Main Street on the second block from the intersection of Center." Surviving the great fire of May 4, 1851, encircled at one time by the flames, it was later converted into a store. Then it was used for an icehouse, and a few years ago the building was torn down to make way for an iron works.

Dickenson House

One of the hotels destroyed in the 1851 fire, at a loss of $30,000 was the Dickenson House, built by Gallant D. Dickenson, Stockton's first alcalde. It was a primitive affair, located on Center Street, between Main and Water (Levee) Streets, and it was the first lodging-house of the Rev. James Woods and his family. Mr. Woods, in describing the hotel, says: "It was a two-story wooden building made by setting boards on end to the height of fourteen or sixteen feet; the upper story was divided into small rooms on each side of a narrow hall; the partitions both of the halls and rooms were cotton domestic, hence the conversation of your neighbor could be heard as distinctly as if in your own room. We were the only family in the hotel, and had a corner room 10x12. The price of board was $5 a day." The building cost several thousands of dollars, and the contractor, Thomas K. Hook, later sheriff of the county, carried from the lumber yard, on his shoulder the top board of the bar. It cost $95. The hotel was leased by Roach & Mason at a rental of $1200 per month, and from the reading of the advertisement we might imagine a Hotel Stockton for it said: "The dining room is superintended by two experienced gentlemen from New York who are not excelled in their line. Our private bedrooms are furnished with all the comforts and conveniences of a New York hotel. The bunks and cots are furnished with good clean beds and servants are always in attendance to wait on gentlemen."

"The lower story was one entire room filled with gambling tables," wrote Woods and gambling, today a vice, was then a virtue. It was for several years licensed by the city officials for revenue purposes, and previous to 1855 the games were carried on in nearly all of the hotels. There was one exception, that of Captain Chapman, a professor of religion, who gave notice that after December 1, 1850, all games would be prohibited. Chapman, conducted what was known as the Temperance, afterwards called the Lexington House, now the jail site, and he stated "that the hotel would be run on temperance principles."

In nearly every hotel one of the principal features—and so advertised—was the bar. The Weber House having the "choicest of liquors," while in the New York Hotel "the bar was supplied with a great variety of the best liquors, juleps, cobbler and punches." The barroom was the most attractive part of the hotel. It contained all of the newspapers of the Coast and the Eastern weeklies, and was warmed in winter by a big stove. There congregated the lodgers of the house and their friends to discuss social affairs, business or politics, and socially pass away the evening hours. Sometimes the scenes in the barroom would be quite lively, pistols would be drawn and bowies flash in the air, those sitting around would pay no attention to the affair unless personally interested. "One night," said Mr. Cutting, "while playing billiards in Cammack's, 'Bang! Bang!' two shots were fired, the bullets passing through the partition just over our heads, but we continued playing, giving no attention to the fight."

The Stockton House

The Stockton House, on the site where now stands Masonic Temple, was, in its day, one of the finest buildings in California. It was a three-story building 50x100 feet, surmounted by a central octagon-shaped cupola protected by weather blinds. The house was built by John Doak, Jacob Bonsell, and William Scott, and completed in March, 1850, at a cost of $110,000. The head carpenter Will McK. Carson, later a supervisor of San Joaquin county, received for his work sixteen dollars and his assistants fourteen dollars per day. The lumber cost one dollar per foot, much of it being shipped around Cape Horn. The first story of the building contained a bar and reading-room and dining-room, washroom, toilet and kitchen. The second story contained a parlor and bedrooms, the third story being an open space containing bunks and cots, a narrow stairway leading from the street door direct to the second and third stories. The dining-room extended the entire length of the building, and there, was given the first dramatic performance and the first ball ever held in Stockton. All of the rooms were of cloth and paper, the bedrooms small in size and hot in summer and cold in winter, for none of the hotels were heated save the barroom and occasionally the ladies' parlor. In these bedrooms oftentimes it was impossible to sleep soundly because of the heat and the busy mosquitoes that merrily sung and pecked the sleeper's face (wire screens were an invention of 1870) and the sleeper's only protection was a mosquito bar with which he covered himself. The furniture of the sleeping-rooms consisted of a bedstead and mattress, two chairs, a small looking glass, with a washstand; in addition the ladies' rooms were supplied with a common washbowl and a pitcher. Lodgers and transients alike, were compelled to use a common toilet and wash-room at the rear of the house, washing from a tin washbasin in water pumped by hand from a well and lifted with a dipper from an open water barrel. Governors, Senators and even Representatives of Congress "cleaned up with the common people." The only light was the common candle or small whale oil lamp, with chandeliers in the parlor and barroom, but gas was not in use until 1859, and running water two years later. Even then the water would not flow above the first story. The common slat bedsteads supported a mattress filled with moss, a substance imported from the Southern States and there extensively used. The bolsters were sometimes filled with duck or geese feathers which were plentiful and cheap. In the second-class hotels the mattresses were filled with straw, moss gathered from oak trees or even willow leaves. Spring mattresses were an unknown luxury until 1881, when Gorham of The Weber House advertised that he "had renovated, refitted and refurnished with spring mattresses."

For these accommodations of a first-class hotel, Robinson & Smith, "recently of The Astor House, New York, and The Mansion House, Buffalo," leasing The Stockton House in 1853, charged for board and single room, per week, $16; board alone $12 to $14; breakfast or tea 75c; dinner, $1; cots in the hall-room 50c. The lessees of The Stockton House (the name changed in 1854 to St. Charles) had twelve different managers in five years. In July 1855, the building, together with all the furniture, was for rent by the agent, James A. Shepherd, who married Mrs. Bonsell. Later it was rented by parties who kept open a lodging department and a barroom only. November 22, 1871, the heavens were aglow and the air was filled with a shower of golden rain. In one short hour the old and famous landmark was but a mass of smoldering coals and ashes.

The Magnolia

A like fate befell The Magnolia, which was destroyed in the early morning of December 30, 1871. Charles Mersfelder and his family of nine children, and fifteen lodgers barely saving their lives. The hotel was named after the schooner Magnolia. Her captain, J. C. Morris, sailed the vessel up to Stockton, in April, 1850, anchoring her in Miner Channel, midway between Hunter and El Dorado Streets, and covering her deck with canvas, in June, 1850, he opened a restaurant. Later, over the hull, he built a hotel. The young deep-water captain was an easy landlord with too many friends and without any business qualifications, and in less than three years the hotel was in the sheriff's hands. Again reopening in 1854 with a grand ball, he announced: "Sebastopol is not taken: board and lodging, single rooms $12, double rooms $14; board per week $7, $2 per day, meals 75c. Terms, cash at the end of each week, and no distinction or exception of persons." He remained open until November, 1859, when he died. Highly respected by all classes, he was buried by the Weber Engine Company, of which he was a member, "and the bell of the San Joaquin Engine Company solemnly tolled as the procession passed up the avenue to the city burial ground."

Morris' widow undertook the management of the hotel, but, being unable to conduct it, the hotel closed within a year, and the boarders, who had stuck to it for several years, wandered around seeking new quarters. In 1861 "Uncle John" Andrews, a very popular restaurateur who was then running an eating house on Center Street, took charge also of The Magnolia. He had subsequently opened The Massachusetts Bakery Restaurant, and in different locations he had been burned out four times. On the day of opening, April 8, 1861, he was much surprised and gratified to receive a call of respect from his Center street boarders. Assembling at the restaurant, about 100 in number, preceded by music, they marched up the levee to the hotel, and, heartily welcoming "Uncle John," they were invited in and spent an hour drinking and in social intercourse. Among the guests of this hotel were the circus performers and many of the theatrical profession that frequently visited the city.

The New York Hotel

Among the notable hotels of that day was the New York Hotel on the corner of Channel and Center Streets. In its time it was famous as the assembling place of the Democratic politicians, and the place where Mansfield died. It was opened in August, 1850, by D. W. Lockwood who also managed The Eureka Hotel, San Francisco. The place had five different managers in six years. The last manager was Andrew Lester, who closed the hotel in December, 1855. It remained empty for six years was then converted into a steam saw and planing mill, then a laundry, and was destroyed by fire some years ago. The flood of February, 1852, washing away the only foot-bridge connecting the peninsula with the mainland, the proprietors of the New York were obliged to run a free ferry for several weeks to accommodate their patrons. Andrew Lester, a great joker and all 'round good fellow, set a choice lunch May 9, 1855. As the announcement indicated: "Mr. White, who flew from the St. Charles Hotel, yesterday, will be served up for lunch today, at The New York Hotel."

This strange notice referred to a Mr. White, who, the day previous, advertised that he would fly from the cupola of the St. Charles Hotel. About 4 o'clock he appeared, wrapped in a white sheet a large grey goose concealed beneath the sheet. Suddenly he threw the bird in the air, and, fluttering to the earth, it was caught by some of Lester's friends, and immediately they ran with the prize to the hotel. The "sold" crowd caught White and ducked him in the channel and one of the leaders in the frolic was Al Rider, who six years later married the daughter of D. R. McLellan, of the Crescent City Hotel.

The Crescent City Hotel

This hotel which took its name from New Orleans, La., the Crescent City, was erected and opened by Joseph Bromeslier and Joseph Hoerschner, in January, 1851. The proprietors that evening gave an entertainment to their friends, and the "festive board was surrounded by many of the leading citizens. Several songs and toasts were given, and among the rest long life and prosperity to the proprietors was drunk with honors." The proprietors were unsuccessful in the hotel business, and, after a trial by two other parties, it was opened on the evening of June 21, 1853, by John P. D. and James W. Wilkins, two young men from Boston, Mass., with a cotillon party, given under the direction of Mayor M. B. Kenny and twenty-two of the leading citizens. The following day the brothers gave a free lunch, stating that they would be happy to see their friends and the public generally at lunch between the hours of 10 a. m. and 1 p. m. Success would have attended them in their efforts, but early in the year their mother died, two months later one of the brothers died, and in January of the following year John P. D. Wilkins' wife also passed away. The surviving partner then closed the hotel and opened a restaurant on the Levee with meals and lodgings each fifty cents and liquor twelve and one-half cents a glass, the former price having been twenty-five cents. In November, 1854, the Crescent City Hotel was opened by D. R. McLellan "and his estimable lady." Mr. McLellan having conducted the Alabama House, Center Street, before the fire of 1851 and later the City Hotel. The business was carried on by Mrs. McLellan as a select boarding house until 1861. The building, 26x50 feet, was then sold to the Cumberland Presbyterian Church.

The Avenue Hotel

The proprietor of this hotel, Simon Wetterau, was a landlord, stable-keeper and teamster—three in one—and he built and opened the Avenue House, on Weber Avenue, opposite the Babcock engine house, as early as 1853. Wetterau also conducted a stable and owned several mule teams. On July 8, 1861, the stable was set on fire and hotel and stable were destroyed, together with twenty-four horses and mules. They were immediately rebuilt, and a few years later leased by Simon Byer.

The Golden Lion Hotel

One of the employes of the Avenue Hotel was Mrs. Weasson, and soon after her marriage with John Seiler they took charge of the Golden Lion on Channel Street, now the Y. M. C. A. building site. The building was noticeable because of a swinging sign bearing the representation of a lion. They paid John Minges $5000 for the place, and carried on the business for three years, when they sold it to A. Grasberger, the father of Mrs. Jacob Simon, who remained for a time, and in 1860, purchasing the old two-story building on the opposite side of the street, which had formerly been used as a paint shop by Dennis & Tinkham, he converted it into a hotel. The new hotel, the Columbia House, was opened September 7, 1861, Grasberger charging for board and lodging five dollars a week and for board alone four dollars a week. He sold in 1871 to Holman & Schneider, who kept the hotel for two years.

The Gault House

These two Germans then transferred their business interests to the hotel corner of Center and Market Streets, known as the Pacific Hotel. This, the oldest established hotel in the city, was opened in 1850 by John B. Nye and Samuel Geddes, under the name of the Gault House. The building, a story-and-a-half structure, cost $12,000, and in fitting it up the crockery alone cost $800, it being the cheapest grade of today. Mr. Nye also paid out $700 to have the street graded so as to make the house accessible in winter. For the accommodation of teamsters (most of the hotel patronage was of the teamster class) Mr. Nye conducted a stable adjoining the hotel. The Gault House or Pacific House was conducted and leased by different parties until 1881, when it was purchased by H. C. Holman for $10,000, he and Schneider having leased the hotel the seven previous years. The name was then changed to the United States Hotel. August 20, 1881, it was destroyed by fire. The present building, a three-story brick, was immediately erected.

The Stockton Bakery Hotel

Another hotel quite as ancient as the Gault House was the Stockton Bakery Hotel, northeast corner of Channel and California Streets. It was opened in 1850 by Peter Rothenbush and Charles Umlauff. Umlauff soon retired, and a few months later, in June, 1852, Rothenbush innocently came near getting into trouble with a local vigilance committee. They accused him of harboring and secreting "Sydney ducks" or Australian criminals, who had been committing many crimes around Stockton. Pete had no knowledge of the character of his boarders, and in a card he denied the accusation of harboring criminals, and as proof of his innocence he stated that he had called the attention of the sheriff to two persons in his house, whom he suspected. This hotel, like unto the history of all the hotels, changed hands many times in its first few years. Leased by Joseph Heinze in 1860, he reduced the price of board to five dollars a week. It finally came into the hands of John Henderson, was destroyed by fire, and he, changing the name to the Grand Central, erected a three-story wooden building and managed it until his death. While the Stockton Bakery was in existence they announced mealtime by the ringing of a bell at 6, 12 and 6 o'clock every day of the week, and, as it could be heard for many blocks around, it was for a time the town clock of half the population.

The Cottage Home

The Cottage Home, with its swinging sign, bearing the crude painting of a cottage, was established in July 1851, by Elam Dye, a rather eccentric individual, who declared that he was "prepared to accommodate the public, both man and beast, with a good stable, plenty of hay and roast beef, and $2 per day for dinner. He will thank Mr. Public to come and see." Two years later Thomas Wilson advertised the furniture and all of the movable fixtures for sale. Then Charles A. Mead leased the house, and later, under the name of the Eagle Hotel, it was managed by William Col-non, father of Edward Colnon, the newspaper man. In 1861 the owners, Sanders & Hook, intending to improve, sold the building to E. L. Houche. It was sawed into halves and removed to El Dorado Street, where it now stands. The Stockton Savings & Loan bank now stands on the former site of the Cottage Home.

The Weber House

Stockton's best and finest hotel for nearly twenty years was the Weber House, a three-story brick building with 150 rooms, erected in 1853 at a cost of $50,000 by Dr. R. K. Reid and J. M. Warner. Building it seemed a speculation, as none cared to take charge, but on December 1st it was opened by W. W. Warner. A banquet was given that evening with Captain Weber as toastmaster, and a large company enjoyed the feast. "The table will be supplied with every delicacy of the season, and all the substantials the market affords." We can well believe this, judging by the dinner set before their guests Christmas day, 1853. It cannot be duplicated today as a whole by any hotel in the state, and it is but a sample of the tables of that day, nearly all kinds of foods being cheaper in price than at the present time. The following was the bill of fare: Soup, Julien; fish, perch, etc; mutton, ham, roast veal, beef and pork; game, turkey, geese, duck, teal and canvasback, chicken, elk, venison, bear; entrees, cutlets a la Milanese, jambolaye New Orleans style, macaroni, giblet pie, chicken salad, stewed mushrooms; vegetables, potatoes boiled or mashed, boiled onions, cabbage, carrots, tomatoes, spinach, cauliflower, turnips, squash, beets, lettuce; pastry, plum pudding, sago and bread pudding; pies, mince, grape, plum, cherry, peach; dessert, blanc mange a la rose; blanc mange lemon, wine or brandy jelly; extras, eggs, oysters.

The building was heavily mortgaged to John Dillon, and was soon in the sheriff's hands. March 20, 1855, it was bid in by the mortgagee for $12,000. Colonel Manning leased the building in 1855, in 1858 Dillon & Gross conducted it, and in 1860 Gorham & Sperry took charge, Sperry dying in December of that year. At this time the hotel was doing a good business, and from April 20, 1860, to June 21, 1861, a total of 6815 persons were registered. In this hotel some of the greatest professionals celebrities and famous persons of both state and nation have been guests, among them Edwin Booth, Charles Keene, Matilda Herron, Mrs. Bowers, T. Starr King, Bayard Taylor, Horace Greeley and a host of others that might be named.

The Yosemite House

The Weber House was Stockton's only first-class hotel for nearly twenty years, but in 1869 it was superseded by the Yosemite—at the time it was erected one of the best in the state. The building, with a frontage of 102 feet on Main Street, with two wings having a depth of 60 feet and a central depth of 100 feet, was commenced in October, 1868, and completed in July, 1869, by Hodgkins & Hall, at a cost of $40,000. The first story contained a reading room and office, together with a barber shop and bathrooms, a saloon, kitchen and dining-room capable of seating at party tables 110 persons. The second floor comprised a public parlor and ten private parlors or suites of rooms with oak, rosewood and walnut furniture, marble washbowls and brussels carpets. The sleeping rooms were all well-ventilated and were equipped with gas, running water and call bells. Speaking tubes in each hallway communicated with the main office. The bedrooms at the time commanded an extensive view of the city and county. The hotel was formally opened July 5, 1869, by Alexander McBean, and the owner of the property that day gave a fine banquet to some 300 citizens and friends. The Eureka Engine Company, of which Henry Hodgkins was a member, had a dinner there the day previous, Sunday July 4th. The hotel was never a paying proposition and passing through many hands the hotel was closed when the Hotel Stockton was erected, and converted into a lodging house. Finally David S. Rosenbaum purchased the property and remodelled the entire front of the building in the modern style of architecture. The Hotel Stockton and the Hotel Clark, two fine up-to-date hotels erected during the past few years, are well known and scarcely within the range of history.

CHAPTER XVII

NEWSPAPERS OF YESTERDAY AND TODAY

THE Stockton Record with its daily issue of 15,000, 16 page, 8-column copies on the sextuple Hoe press that will turn 12,000, 48-page copies per hour is indeed a mastodon in comparison with the little Stockton Times of seventy years ago. The pioneer press quickly followed the population of California and March 16, 1850, the first number of the Stockton Times was issued by John H. White and Dr. H. H. Radcliffe. The typesetter and editor was J. H. White. Radcliffe was a physician, and doing no newspaper work, established an office for patients two doors from the printing establishment. The paper was printed upon an old wood press and turned out 200 copies per hour. In size the paper covered a space 12x16 inches; it was a four-page sheet with three columns of reading matter on each page. The price of the paper was twelve dollars a year with advertisements at four dollars per six lines. On the 6th of June the paper was enlarged to sixteen pages each 17x23 inches and called the Stockton Times and Tuolumne Intelligencer. As Tuolumne City on the Stanislaus was looming up about that time and the editors were bidding for the patronage of the town. The paper was published about fourteen months and then sold to a company to be published as a Democratic organ.

While White was editor he published an article regarding Judge Reynolds, who was a tough character and a scoundrel. After his term of office expired he defrauded his clients right and left, including John White, robbing him of $1600. He traveled to Sonora but he soon returned to Stockton, and White, writing a burlesque article on his return from Sonora, said that the climate had suddenly become too warm for his constitution. The Judge, who was a large muscular man, felt deeply insulted and meeting White said to him, "Have I ever injured you?" "You know you have," White declared, thinking of his $1600. "Are you the author of that article?" White replied, "I am." Then learning that White was not armed he struck him in the face. The editor was a much smaller man but he returned the blow and in the scuffle White fell and was badly beaten by the bully. White had his assailant arrested for assault. The case came up before Recorder W. F. Nye. Terry appeared for the ex-judge and he was bound over under $300 bail to appear before the higher court. Reynolds then suddenly left Stockton no more to return.

The Stockton Journal

The Stockton Journal was published by John Robb as proprietor and editor. As an editor Robb fired shots right and left regarding the tricksters in politics and never failed to express his opinion. His attack by Ex-Mayor Purdy, as already noted, was the result. The newspaper editor's next sensation was along matrimonial lines. There came to California in 1852 a company of concert singers touring the state by the name of the Mandeville Sisters. In the company was a handsome young lady vocalist, Marian G. Goodenow. She was a great favorite with the young bachelors and when the company appeared in Downieville August 25, her admirers gave her gold specimens to the value of $900. In the meantime Robb was wooing her for his wife. Whether he had known her in the East doesn't appear but succeeding in his courtship, they were secretly married in Sonora, November 27, 1852. The company were billed to sing that evening in the lively mountain camp, and the bachelors took $400 worth of tickets, but when they learned that the queen was married—well.

Robb was more of a lobbyist than editor and he spent most of his time at the legislature, which at that time assembled every year. While he was absent, the Journal was edited by John Tabor, and pursuing the same policy as Robb, he fired hot shot and shell into the rascals. This brought him into conflict with the young district attorney, C. C. Gaugh. Ben Williams succeeded Judge Reynolds as county judge and on the charge of bribery and corruption he was indicted by the grand jury, but through the connivance of the district attorney, Williams was acquitted. Tabor in a long article severely criticised Gaugh. When he read the article in the Journal the next morning he immediately put on his war paint and began looking for Tabor. Going to the office he found Tabor earnestly engaged in reading, and politely addressing him, inquired, "Who is the author of that article in the Stockton Journal reflecting on the district attorney?" "I am," replied Tabor. "Then, sir, I hold you personally responsible." "That suits me," said the editor, and Gaugh left the office. Tabor had been warned by his friends to look out for Gaugh, and as he said, "As is usual in these ruffianly times, we kept a pair of pistols sometimes loaded, and other times not." Thinking no more about the trouble with Gaugh he was surprised that evening about 4 o'clock to see that gentleman approaching. He evidently knew where Tabor kept his weapons, for stepping into the office between his enemy and the desk, he straightened himself up, says Tabor, threw back his coat, as if to address a jury, and drew a revolver from beneath his coat, at the same time exclaiming, "I intend to inflict personal chastisement, and your only recourse is to stand and take it." Transferring his revolver to his left hand, he drew from his breast a cowhide whip and raised it as if to strike Tabor. Tabor was in a rather delicate position. He must either submit to the insult or run. He was no coward for most of the editors were plucky men, and Tabor was no exception to the rule, but he scarcely knew how to act. However, at this opportune time, the foreman of the office, Byron Gallup, appeared. Hearing the conversation he got busy and quickly stepping into the room he placed two single-shot pistols within reach of Tabor. The editor grasped the weapons and remarked, "This puts us on a level," the article referring to you was gotten on good authority, and if it is true I will not retract it neither will I submit to a thrashing." Gaugh raised his left arm; if to strike and Tabor grabbed his left arm; the district attorney then fired and the ball went wild. Tabor then fired, striking Gaugh in the left breast. He was uninjured however, as a heavy pocketbook checked the force of the bullet. Gaugh again fired without result and the editor speedily hastened out of the back door. The district attorney did not follow. The following day he was arrested, put under bonds, and thus the matter ended.

The San Joaquin Republican

It was the general belief among the politicians of early days that an official organ was an essential factor for political success and, as Democracy had no advocate in San Joaquin County, George Kerr, coming to Stockton soon after, purchased the Stockton Times. Under the name of the San Joaquin Republican, the Times was to have been issued May 4, 1851, as a Democratic journal. There was some delay however, and it did not appear in its new form until May 14, the great fire of May nearly destroying the entire printing company. The new paper was a four-page twenty-column journal issued every Wednesday and Saturday, the price being twelve dollars per year, or twenty-five cents a copy. The proprietor was a young man who had learned the printer's trade in the New Orleans Delta office, and arriving in California in 1850, he purchased an interest in the Transcript and other Democratic papers and he wanted the Times to complete the chain. In 1852 he was elected state printer and until his death the state printing was done in Stockton. Kerr was an easy-going, big-hearted, generous, fellow, spent money freely, and died May 6, 1854, at the age of thirty years. A year previous to his death he was not able to carry on the business and he took in as partners H. C. Patrick, and John Mansfield, the firm being Kerr & Company. Mansfield was a printer, he had learned the business in his native city, Boston, and reaching San Francisco in 1849, he located in Stockton in 1851. After the death of Mansfield, Philip L. Shoaff purchased his interest in the Republican, and sold out in 1855 to James A. Hutchinson, the firm being H. C. Patrick & Company.

The office at this time and for several years previous was in the second story of a brick building on El Dorado Street, near Main, the lower story being occupied by Rayner and Patterson's livery stable. On the office walls were pasted hand bills in all colors, shapes, and sizes, announcing political meetings, torch-light processions, Fourth of July celebrations, Sunday School and Firemen's picnics, reward for robberies and murders, theatrical bills and other cuts of various orators, horses and bills the world over. The press, an old-fashioned affair worked by hand, stood near the stairway, and it took quite a while to print the limited edition of 1,000 copies, 240 per hour being the limit of the press. Frequently they had trouble with the ink rolls which were made of molasses and grew hot. In 1853 so hot was the day (104 in the shade) the rolls softened and did not work and said the editor, "We are actually obliged to give our rolls ice to cool them, a very expensive luxury," Ice was then five cents a pound. Paper was sometimes very scarce and on one occasion the newspaper was printed on fools-cap pages, the paper failing to show up. Again out of paper in August, 1852, the Republican issued several numbers on dark brown wrapping paper, that issue announcing the death of the great statesman, Henry Clay. In those early days the printers were always on good terms with the saloon men, and on New Year's day or Christmas, the saloonists would send to the office liquors, beer, champagne, cakes, and often cold meats and fowl. The leading citizens on the day of their marriage would remember the printer, and he in turn in a complimentary notice would acknowledge the wine and cake. The ladies holding church or family festivals would never forget the printers, and would send them ice cream, cake and coffee.

At the time of Mansfield's purchase of the Republican there was considerable enmity between that paper and the Stockton Journal regarding the city printing. After they had been writing harsh words for several days, Tabor, on the evening of June 22, 1854, published an article severely criticizing Mansfield.

The following morning as Mansfield stood on the corner of Levee and Center Streets talking with J. M. Schofield, the custom house collector, Tabor approached, and as he was about to pass Mansfield stepped in front of the editor with the remark, "Young man, I want to tell you what I think of you," at the same time raising his hand. Immediately Tabor drew a revolver and fired; the bullet passed through Mansfield's left breast and caused a mortal wound from which he died two hours later. Tabor was arrested and tried for the murder, was found guilty and sentenced to be hung, March 16, 1855. The murder caused great excitement throughout the state as both citizens were well known and petitions for pardon were sent to Governor Bigler from prominent citizens, judges, and legislature, even the legislature of Texas praying for his pardon. The pressure was very strong and finally the governor granted Tabor a full pardon.

In 1856 Hutchinson and Kennedy withdrew from the firm leaving Patrick and Conley as partners. Patrick was the pilot of the paper and in 1859 he so guided its course with the flag of disunion flying at the mast head that he finally destroyed it. That was the pivotal year to decide for or against the union. Broderick, the leader of the Democratic party, was leading his followers towards Republicanism, and the Democratic paper never spoke of him, except in harsh and abusive terms and when he was shot and killed, the proprietors secretly rejoiced. In 1861 the Democratic party was split asunder, the Douglas Democrats joining with the Republicans. The Republicans still clinging to the creed of the party proclaimed the doctrine of the State rights and the peaceful secession of the Southern States. As the Civil War progressed secession editorials were continually published and December 13, 1862, the Republican was suppressed by order of General Wright, the commanding officer of the Pacific Coast.

The Stockton Argus

Tabor in the meantime, had purchased the Stockton Journal and his subsequent killing of Joseph Mansfield closed his newspaper career. The Journal then passed into the possession of B. W. Owens, a grocery merchant and a rampant Whig leader who conducted it only a few months. In 1854 there came to Stockton with his wife and four children a young man named Wm. Biven. Soon after his arrival he began the publication of the Stockton Post in a small building on Center Street near Levee. He continued its publication until Mansfield's death and then he and Henry A. Crabb, the first city attorney, purchased the Journal material and moved it to that office, and June 7, 1854, they issued the Stockton Argus. It was a strong Whig newspaper and Crabb was editor. After his retirement William Biven continued the publication of the Argus and advocated the doctrine of the "Know Nothing" party and became the official organ. In the following year he upheld the Vigilance Committee and scored unmercifully the "law and order" party, David S. Terry coming under the lash for stabbing Hopkins. In 1857 the Argus took up the Broderick fight defending him against his assailants and when he was killed the Argus declared Terry a murderer that should be hung. Biven published a clean, lively paper that stood out boldly for truth, justice, and morality, but unfortunately in 1861 he got the political bee in his head and was desirous of being elected sheriff for San Jacinto County. Defeated for the nomination in the Union convention, he angrily left the hall and the following day published disloyal sentiments until September, 1862, when the Argus also was suppressed by the Government.

The Duelling Editor

In 1857 Rasey Biven, a brother of William, started the Weekly Democrat, which was published from the Argus office. A supporter of the Douglas wing of the Democratic party, the editor did not heed the advice of the great leader to stand by the Union when the Civil War broke out. The paper assailed the Government and was finally suppressed by the Secretary of War. Biven, although a short, spare-built man, was quick-tempered, erratic and of undaunted bravery. He was one of the Walker filibustering expedition. Returning from Nicaragua in September, 1854, he fought a duel with Dorsey. His leading second was Senator Henry A. Crabb, his brother-in-law, he and Crabb marrying the Ainsa sisters, while Dorsey's second was the brilliant attorney, Edmund Randolph. The two men fought at Oakland with duelling pistols, standing ten paces apart, and they shot for the purpose of severely wounding if not killing each other. At the first round Dorsey's bullet took effect in Biven's wrist, and he was shot in the stomach.

A. C. Russell, a Stockton editor for many years, fought two duels and yet lived to a serene old age, rearing an estimable family of children. His first duel, with Captain John F. Folsom, was bloodless. Russell, one of California's best editors, was then in charge of the Evening Picayune of San Francisco. He was a bold, outspoken writer, publishing his ideas of men and their public actions, and fearing not the results. Several times he criticised the actions of Folsom, then a quartermaster in Uncle Sam's service. The Captain, offended because of the article, challenged Russell. The editor was obliged to retract his words or fight. Russell never was known to acknowledge himself wrong, and so he accepted the challenge. The duel took place September 10, 1851, out among the bushes in the suburbs of the city, just at sundown. The two opponents fired and both missed. Again they fired with like results, and, as Folsom was now satisfied, they returned and had a good laugh over their poor marksmanship. Russell's second duel, January 16, 1852, was less fortunate for him, as he was shot in the knee and lamed for life. He had aroused the wrath of Governor McDougall by criticizing his acts, and a duel was the result. The parties with their seconds went to the appointed place in the evening, and fought the next morning at sunrise. At the first shot each missed his antagonist, but at the second fire McDougall's bullet hit Russell in the knee, and the Governor's honor was vindicated.

The Daily Evening Herald

After the suppression of the Argus, Biven shipped the plant to San Francisco and there issued the paper under the same name, sending copies to this city by boat. Unsuccessful in this, he returned to Stockton and issued the Stockton Beacon from the old Republican office on El Dorado Street. This scored another failure, but with the pluck which was characteristic of the man, July 3, 1865, he issued the daily and weekly Evening Herald. In the following year he purchased the material of the defunct Stockton Gazette, moved from El Dorado Street to the third story of the Hook Building, corner of Main and San Joaquin Streets, and, increasing the size of the paper to a twenty-eight-column, four-page paper, printed it on a new cylinder press. Biven was a good newspaper man, but a poor business manager, and the paper ran behind. He then mortgaged it to certain parties and in January, 1875, the Herald appeared under the firm name of the Daily Evening Herald Publishing Company, with the following as directors: Charles Haas, J. R. W. Hitchcock, John S. Davis, J. A. Morrissey, Joseph Cole, P. D. Wigginton, Thomas Ketcham and William Biven, the last-named being the manager. Three months later, in May, while Mr. Biven was taking his usual morning ride on horseback, he was thrown from the animal and killed, his neck being dislocated. After his death, his son, Frederick, who had been ten years in the office, took charge of the Herald, and reducing the size of the paper, he removed the plant to the new brick building, corner of Market and San Joaquin. Fred managed the Herald less than a year and then sold it to an experienced newspaper man, John V. Bell, a printer formerly of Nevada, and B. T. K. Preston, who had been editing the Truckee Republican.

Immediately taking possession, January, 1876, they removed the plant to the Parker Building, opposite the Eureka engine house, and raised the price from twelve and one-half cents to twenty-five cents per week. One of the employes on the paper at this time was Charles Lincoln Ruggles, a bright, active young man, who, at the age of twelve years, had come to Stockton from Martinez with his family. Attending the public schools, he began carrying the Herald after school hours, taking Joe Dorsey's place. When the new proprietors took possession they employed Lincoln to take charge of the carriers' route and do the collecting. Faithfully attending to business, three years later, in 1880, he became a local reporter, one of the best on any of the city papers. Mr. Bell withdrew from the Herald in 1883 to take a political office on the San Francisco waterfront, and Mr. Ruggles bought his half-interest in the Herald. At once the form of the paper was changed from an evening issue to a morning issue. The proprietors, in stating their reason for the change, said, "A morning journal can be made a much more interesting and useful paper than an evening journal. Stockton needs an enterprising morning paper. The field is practically unoccupied. We mean to make it ours and will still advocate the principles of the Democratic party." The change was not conducive to the health of the paper, and January 2, 1885, the Herald was again issued as an evening paper. The local Democratic party was split up into factions, and one of the factions was desirous of purchasing the Herald; Preston, however, persistently refused to buy or sell, and the matter was then passed up to the court. As a result Mr. Bell, who held the mortgage, bought up the entire plant, and April 2, 1885, the Herald suspended publication, and the entire outfit was shipped to Merced.

Minor Newspaper Publications

During the second decade of local journalism a whole swarm of newspapers came into life and as quickly died, six different papers being issued in 1873. The first of the number, the Stockton Gazette, a Democratic organ, was first issued August 9, 1867, by C. M. Harrison and C. G. Miller. Harrison formerly worked on the Republican and later on the Independent. For many years he was the publisher of the California Odd Fellow, at Sacramento. The Gazette suspended in September, 1869, even the well-known newspaper editor, D. W. Gelwicks, the last owner, being unable to keep it alive.

In this year the Pacific Observer, the official organ of the Christian denomination, was removed to Stockton by its editor and proprietor and published in the attic of the church, now the Garrick theater site. Financially, the paper was not a success, and in a year it was moved to greener pastures.

In that year there was much talk regarding a narrow-gauge railroad to Visalia. William Glenn, to be in the swim, in June, 1873, began the publication of the Narrow Gauge. He had formerly been editing the Herald, and, to increase the popularity of his paper, he employed Mrs. Laura De Force Gordon to edit a woman's page. In about six months it gave up the ghost.

D. H. Berdine, one of the most capable all-round printers ever in Stockton, in May, 1873, issued an eight-page, four-column monthly, the Temperance Champion. It was the official organ of the champions of the Red Cross, its editor being C. V. Anthony. The paper nine months later was removed to San Francisco. Mr. Berdine then began the publication, in August, 1873, of the Morning Courier, which lasted four months. Then he sent out the Sunday Morning News, which saw its finish in 1874, Leroy Atwood at this time being an apprentice in the office. In the meantime, Berdine retiring from the Evening Mail, December 24, 1885, issued an opposition paper, the Evening Democrat. It was a six-column, four-page, issued daily, Sundays excepted, the price being twelve and one-half cents per week. Although they claimed a daily issue of 1500 copies, the Democrat suspended within the year.

The Daily Leader

Laura De Force Gordon, a bright, handsome young woman, after the discontinuance of the Narrow Gauge, purchased the plant of the San Joaquin Republican and May 1, 1874, issued the first number of the Daily Leader. It advocated the cause of the Democracy and woman suffrage, and it enjoyed the reputation of being the only daily newspaper in the United States owned and edited by a woman. It was a bright, newsy paper and the Stockton Independent said of it, "It is the same size as the Herald with the same number of columns to the page. If the ability Mrs. Gordon invariably displays as a public speaker is infused into it, its success is assured." That year as an independent candidate for senator she campaigned the county, George S. Evans and George W. Trahern being her opponents, and she received 116 votes. Aside from the office of Senator she espoused the cause of the Democracy, and that party carrying the state, she changed the Leader from a weekly to a daily, and in 1874 removed to Sacramento.

Another political journal of but an hour was the Workingmen, which was issued in April, 1878, by an incorporated company of citizens, William H. Little, the saddler and street preacher, being president; Ben J. Rodger, who declared "the Chinese must go," vice-president; Eli Confer, secretary, and S. V. Treadway, treasurer. Lee Moreing was the business manager and James Beckwith editor. It advocated the election of a United States senator by the people, but it suspended soon after the May election, its party being hopelessly defeated throughout the state. In 1874 Fred Severy and Clement Detten published the San Joaquin Valley News, which appeared for a season of six months, and in 1878 Severy tried to revive the Workingmen. Failing in this, with E. Rawlins and H. W. B. Hewen, September 13, 1888, he issued the Stockton Express, an evening Democratic newspaper, in opposition to the Mail, many hidebound Democrats opposing the Mail's nonpartisanship. The Express was a seven-column, four-page daily, published in the old church attic, and survived only a few months.

J. E. Ruggles, since employed for many years in the state printing office, and John M. Dormer, on May 8, 1890, issued from 308 Main Street a seven-column, four-page paper which they called the Daily Republican. In their first number they stated that their employes nearly all were natives of Stockton, and the paper was printed on paper made in Stockton. In the policy of the paper they declared: "We will be found solidly Republican, firm upon the side of good government and uncompromisingly devoted to good morals." Ruggles, the editor, was very aggressive and plainly attacked vice in all classes, even in high society. In May, 1891, Dormer retired and J. E. Ruggles & Co., in September, 1891, removed to Parker's Alley, where four years later the Record came to life. The last number of which I have any knowledge is that of February 8, 1893.

The Stockton Independent

This paper has the distinction of being the oldest paper in San Joaquin County and one of the oldest papers in the state. Away back in 1856 it was born in San Andreas, Calaveras County, a paper established by miners to defend their water rights. It was published by Armor & Kooser, the latter a printer and editor and one of Stevenson's regiment. Several months later Kooser sold his interest to Orlando M. Claves. In 1861 the Republicans of Stockton were anxious to secure an official organ, and they made arrangements with Armor & Claves to remove their plant from San Andreas to this city and publish a daily and weekly newspaper. The little two-story brick building on Center Street, 20x40 feet, was rented, and, from this little cheese box August 1, 1861, the Stockton Independent was issued, with Samuel Scabough as the editorial and T. C. Osborne the local writer, the latter having been formerly employed on the Argus.

Seabough was given full political control of the paper, and he advocated the claims of the Douglas Democracy. In less than four months he saw that if the Union was to be saved against a united South, then the Douglas Democrats and the Republicans must unite. He then came out strongly for Lincoln and the Republican party and since that time the Independent has stood firmly for that party in city, county, state and national politics.

The Independent during its sixty historic years has seen many changes in ownership, it being published under the name of thirteen firms during the first twenty years, and the Herald spoke no lie when it said in November, 1883, "Buying and selling interests in the Independent is a kind of pastime or recreation. It does not cost much to buy an interest, and when one sells he has sold nothing except the right to work hard and draw a salary." In 1862 George Armor sold out because of ill health and O. M. Clayes, with D. S. Peters as a silent partner, carried on the paper until November, 1866. Clayes was then elected state printer, and as he purchased an interest in the San Francisco Alta, the Independent was sold to N. E. White & Company, the firm comprising Charles E. Clayes, N. E. White and A. C. Bertzhoff, who had formerly managed the Herald. White & Company ran the paper less than a year, and on July 6, 1867, it went into the hands of the Stockton Publishing Company, composed of a number of leading Republicans, among them L. U. Shippee, H. W. Weaver, Charles Haas, H. T. Dorrance and Charles Belding as directors. They controlled the Independent until April, 1869, when it was purchased by A. E. Milne and A. T. Worley, former employes of the Bulletin office in San Francisco. Unable to make it pay, they passed it back to the bank in January, 1881, and ten months later Nash & McKaig bought it. Nash retired and in August, 1882, C. O. Cummings became Mr. McKaig's partner. He retired and in January, 1883, the firm name was McKaig, Brunton & Phelps. McKaig sold out in May, 1883, leaving Brunton & Phelps. In November Charley Brunton drew out because of sickness, and then the firm name stood, "Phelps & Company," R. Mortimer Wood being the partner. Wood retired in a few months, and in March, 1884, the present firm was established, J. LaRose Phelps and Charles Lincoln Ruggles. J. LaRose Phelps, the senior partner of the firm, learned to set type in early life and then engaged in various employments. In 1881 he was engaged in the county clerk's office as deputy. At that time the Independent was heavily mortgaged to the Stockton Savings and Loan Bank, and L. U. Shippee, the president of the bank, and other friends advised him to buy an interest in the paper. He followed their advice and two years later C. L. Ruggles became his partner. They had undertaken an uphill proposition, but having pluck, determination and hopefulness in their favor, they knew no such word as fail.

Removing from the Center Street office to the Hodgkins Building, corner of El Dorado and Weber Avenue in the '70s the block was known as the Independent block. Sometime later they removed to the east corner of the same block, in the Hickman Building, and in 1890 they removed from that location to the Hansel Building, Channel and Hunter Streets. Throwing aside the old cylinder press which O. P. Kallenbach had run by hand for eighteen years, they purchased a double-cylinder Hoe, capable of running off some 1800 four-page papers an hour. The press was run by steam power and operated by W. H. Furry who was employed by the Independent for twenty years. About the year 1895, together with the Mail, they set up two linotype machines, thus dispensing with the typesetting of some ten or fifteen compositors. The circulation of the press increased rapidly and to supply the demand they purchased at a cost of $5,500 a double-cylinder Hoe press that would print 5,000 papers an hour. In the fall of 1917, when the Record absorbed the Mail, the Independent bought the Mail press and such equipment as was needed and moved from its inadequate quarters to the Mail Building, where it is now located. The paper has expanded considerably since that time and ranks as one of the best morning newspapers in the interior of the state.

As editors on the Independent which by the way has always boosted the Republican party, none of them have equalled their first writer, Samuel Seabough. He first began his editorial work in October, 1857, on the San Andreas Independent. He came to Stockton with the paper in 1861 and at first advocated the principles of the Douglas Democracy. But when he saw the trend of politics he came out boldly for the Republican party and the election of Abraham Lincoln for president. After the attack by the South on Fort Sumter and the secession of the Southern States he fired hot shot into the ranks of the so-called Breckinridge Democracy. In plain language he called them rebels and secessionists, and in bitter language denounced the Democrats in San Joaquin County as copperheads. When indisposed from his intemperate habits his editorials were written by George W. Tyler. The Independent was credited with being a helpful factor in saving California to the Union. In 1865 Seabough took editorial charge of the Sacramento Union, and a few years later became the editorial writer of the San Francisco Chronicle. He died in the prime of life, about fifty-three years of age.

Seabough was succeeded on the Independent by John Geddes, who had been the local editor. He remained on the paper until 1879. Of Scotch descent, he was a strong, forceful writer, witty and sarcastic at times, and he chafed under the collar because the owners would not allow him to show up the shams of society. He was a clear, concise writer, especially in local events. The writer of this history did his first work under his direction, and he would say, "Boil your stuff down and when you get through stop." When Dr. W. J. Kraig was a part owner of the paper he wrote his own editorials. He was an ordained Unitarian minister. N. M. Orr, also when owner of the paper, wrote his own editorials. Geddes filled his place when Orr was in the legislature. H. T. Dorrance frequently wrote for the Independent. Geddes was the principal writer until his death in March, 1887. After his death Frank J. Ryan, a writer of thirty years' experience on the Middle West papers, became the editorial writer, until 1900. On his retirement the proprietors presented him with a gold watch and chain for his faithful services. Something very unusual for newspaper men, who as a rule are skeptics, he took up the study of religion and became a strong Christian Scientist, writing several articles in defense of that belief. Ryan was followed at different periods by Hugh W. Taylor, J. M. Eddy, and A. L. Banks, one of the best of editorial writers on the Stockton press.

The Stockton Evening Mail

The Evening Mail was first issued February 10, 1880, by Colnon, Nunan and Berdine, two newspaper men and a book seller. It was a small, six-column, four-page sheet, issued as you might say in opposition to the Evening Herald. Colnon, whose father was a hotelkeeper, attended the State University for two years and then wandered over to Nevada, in 1872, kept a hotel, taught school, and then became the editor of the Eureka Sentinel. Next he went to Virginia City and worked on the Chronicle, then to the little town of Sutro, where he and John P. Cosgrove printed a little weekly sheet. The town died and so did the paper. He returned to Stockton and was engaged by the proprietors of the Herald to get out a special New Year's edition for 1880. While engaged in that work he saw that there was an opening for a progressive evening newspaper and he interviewed John J. Nunan regarding the project. Nunan at the time was keeping a little book store on Main street in connection with his father-in-law, M. J. Garvin. Nunan thought it a fine proposition but they had no money, nor credit to obtain printing material. At the time D. H. Berdine, one of the best printers in the town, was conducting a small print shop in the rear of the Eldridge Building on Main Street, opposite the court house. They induced him to go in as a third partner and the paper was issued with Colnon as editor, Nunan, business manager, Berdine as foreman of the paper, and John P. Cosgrove, who came down from Virginia City, at the local writer. In the following year, August, 1881, Cosgrove bought out Berdine's interest in the paper and David J. (Dad) Matthews, now city commissioner, who had worked with Colnon in Nevada, was installed as the foreman in the newspaper room. He held that position for nearly thirty-one years. Cosgrove sold his interest in the Mail to his partners in 1883 and took a position on a San Francisco daily, and Colnon and Nunan carried on the business until Colnon's death in 1902. Nunan and Mrs. Colnon then continued the newspaper work until Nunan's death in 1908, and nine years later, October 24, 1917, it was absorbed by the Daily Evening Record, the paper that was not even recognized by Colnon when it was founded.

The Mail pushed to the front, was liberally patronized by the merchants and citizens and soon became one of the leading newspapers of that day. It published interviews with citizens and celebrities, its locals were written up in a newsy, breezy manner and for the first time in Stockton's history the paper was illustrated with cartoons by the Mail's cartoonist, Richard De Treville. The Mail endeavored to obtain the best writers in the state and it had on its staff at different times such writers as Ambrose Bierce, Arthur McEwen, A. J. Waterhouse, John Craig and Phil Francis, now on one of Hearst's New York papers. On the local staff there was A. L. Cowell, a graduate of the Woodbridge seminary, M. J. Woodward, now assistant district attorney, who came here from Georgia, Ben Armington, a Stockton boy and a University graduate, Will Davis and Mrs. L. Clare Davis, the latter two, no relation, however. Mrs. Davis was the second woman writer on the Stockton press, one of the pioneers in the state. She was possessed of a well-balanced mind and so well versed in newspaper ethics that she is in newspaper parlance a "free lance," writing on such subjects as she desires, a privilege seldom accorded to newspaper writers.

For a day, April 14, 1895, Mrs. Davis had the entire control of the Evening Mail. It came about this way. At the time the citizens were endeavoring to obtain a large amount of money for the building of the Stockton and Visalia Railroad, now the Santa Fe, the Spreckels road as it was called. Everybody was deeply interested and some of the leading ladies of Stockton took a hand in the raising of money. It was proposed that the ladies publish a special edition of a paper, get advertisements and sell it at ten cents per copy. It was so agreed and Mrs. L. Clare Davis was appointed editor and manager and Mrs. W. D. Buckley assistant editor. Colonel Nunan of the Mail offered to publish the edition free of charge to the ladies, they to get the advertisements and write-ups. It was a twelve-page edition and Mrs. P. A. Buell designed the front page illustration. The committee of ladies appointed as literary writers Hannah Gray, Clara Shepherd, Louise Weber, Nellie White, Bessie Reid, Adra Shaw, Mrs. Herbert Williamson, Mrs. Mamie Huggins Miller, Mrs. Daniel Rothenbush, Mrs. David Winters, Mrs. Wm. C. Daggett and Mrs. Charles Haas were appointed. The paper created quite a twenty-four hour sensation, the ladies clearing $1,500, $800 from advertisements alone.

The Commercial Record

Charles I. Hamilton and Henry Eschbach were conducting a small job printing office on Eldorado Street in the Odd Fellows' Building, when, in 1875 Eschbach sold his interest to Hamilton and began publishing the Commercial Record, a small sheet which was distributed free every Saturday, the advertisements paying the cost of production. Hamilton, having no knowledge of newspaper work, in 1878 sold a half-interest in the Record to William (Pony) Denig, who was so nicknamed because in early days he rode as a messenger express through the mountain camps. Denig was an experienced newspaper man, having learned the business in his native state, Pennsylvania. Coming to California in 1850 he went to Mokelumne Hill and worked on the Chronicle and then on the San Andreas Register. Arriving in Stockton in March, 1869, he worked for a time on the Independent and in 1878 purchased the Commercial Record. Denig had no capital and in 1883 he took in as a partner Thomas W. Hummel. In the meantime Hummel purchased the job office of C. I. Hamilton and in 1886 sold his interest in the paper to C. O. Cummings, a newspaper editor. Denig was no writer and he was obliged to employ an editor or have an editor partner. At different times F. C. Lawrence, J. J. Nunan and I wrote for him. Two years later Cummings sold his half interest to W. L. Howell, the former editor of the Merced Express. Howell, who was a dyed-in-the-wool-Democrat, was now obliged to write Republican editorials as "Pony" had always been a strong Republican, running for office several times and twice elected constable. Denig was short in stature, not over five feet, but he was always on deck and one of the most popular men in the town. In 1888 Irving Martin, then a youth of some eighteen years, purchased Howell's interest in the paper and became the editor. He had been working as a local editor on the Independent, and was well versed in the newspaper business. Here endeth the history of the Commercial Record.

The Stockton Daily Record

In the first publication of the Stockton Daily Record an old second-hand plant was used and the paper was printed on an old Bagley & Seawell press which had been formerly used by the Stockton Republican. It had lain idle in Parker's Alley for some two years after the paper's demise. The bank owned the plant and L. U. Shippee let Martin & Denig have it for $2,500, the face of the mortgage. Mr. Martin in his history of the Record says, "My idea was to some day turn the weekly Commercial Record into a daily Record and this was done April 8, 1895." In the meantime he had purchased the half interest of Wm. Denig and taken in as a partner E. H. Fontecilla, who had been foreman of the composing room on the Independent. Martin assumed the editorial and business management and Fontecilla handled the mechanical end.

In its first number the Record said "Shake, Good Afternoon. There has for a long time, been a continuous clamor for a daily newspaper in Stockton that will print all the news. The Evening Record will stop the clamor. Good Evening." The Record's policy was to be impartial "in the giving of news and to cover all matters in which the people were interested to the extent of the value of the news; to treat all classes fairly, in its news columns, and to maintain its freedom of thought and expression. While striving, itself, to push onward, may it ever feel inclined to lend a helping hand to others, to aid any worthy cause, and to find time to drop a word of cheer and encouragement to others who may have stumbled, or who may have become foot-sore and weary on the journey."

In its efforts to maintain its policy it was boycotted in May, 1895, by the American Protective Association or Know-Nothing party, and its subscription list dropped from 800 to 300 in less than three days. The members of the party were mostly Republicans, and the A. P. A. tried to induce the Record to advocate their cause. On being refused they not only withdrew their subscription but they endeavored to have the merchants withdraw their advertisements. The Record not only claimed to be Republican in politics but it declared the doctrine of the American Protective Association was un-American in principle. In 1900 came the liquor dealers' boycott. The paper had always opposed the liquor traffic, and refused to accept any liquor advertisements. It also refused to publish get-rich-quick, or lottery schemes, manicure parlor, fortune teller, tobacco or patent medicine advertisements. The editor had been offered big money to publish some of these advertisements and his friends declared him foolish, but having adopted the principle of publishing a clean paper he held his ground. Coming back to the liquor boycott, he began waging a war to the finish against the traffic, when the common council, at the request of the Royal Arch repealed an ordinance prohibiting the sale of liquor formerly passed by them. The Royal Arch, an association of liquor men, failing to stop the Record fight against them, threatened to withdraw their business from all merchants that advertised in the Record and many weak-hearted merchants withdrew their ads. The threat aroused the Women's Christian Temperance Union, the members of churches, the temperance societies and others who loved a good fighter and the Record's circulation and subscription list rapidly increased. It was a fight to a finish and today Stockton is a dry town, not a saloon in existence. In this fight the Record stood alone, for the Mail and Independent were for the liquor traffic, first, last and all of the time. A third boycott was that of the industrial fight with the Merchants and Manufacturers' Association over wages and hours a few years ago. In this fight the Record stood, as the saying goes, between the devil and the deep sea. If the paper proclaimed the cause of the merchants, the printers were liable to go on a sympathetic strike with the carpenters, who started the trouble. If the Record took sides with the unions, then the merchants would have withdrawn their advertisements, which of course, spelled ruin. The Record wisely took a neutral position, and that it would print all news of the trouble impartially, and it gave notice that the communications by either party would be published, if properly signed.

The firm stand of the Record soon increased its circulation and a press that would turn out more papers become an actual necessity, and in 1905 a Cox Duplex press was installed. It threw out 6,000 eight-page papers per hour, printed and folded. Still more wonderful it used rolled paper, for the first time in Stockton. All the other presses were fed by hand. Colonel John J. Nunan of the Mail, seeing the press in operation, said, "I do not see why you put that press in. The Mail would not have any use for it, and the Record never would have." The Record got the same kind of encouragement from the Independent, as the proprietor said, "No, I am not interested. I think you have made a big mistake. You have not any use for it. It must have cost a great deal of money." "Yes," replied Martin, "it did cost quite a little, about $10,000." In 1910 the duplex press was superseded by a Goss press that turned out 15,000 sixteen-page papers per hour. Then another innovation was made and every day new type was used, made by a stereotyping machine. Today the Record is printed on a Hoe sextuple press that turns out 48,000 copies per hour.

The Mail's Graveyard

The Evening Mail played their cartoons for all they were worth and at the death of each rival paper had a few "appropriate remarks" and published a picture of a journalistic graveyard with tombstones bearing the names of each of the departed. At the time of the demise of the Republican, there were three tombstones in the Mail's graveyard bearing the names "Herald," "Express," "Democrat," and the fourth stone was added for the Republican. In the nature of a suggestive warning, the Mail had left an open grave in its journalistic graveyard bearing the ominous inscription, "next." This cartoon appeared when the Record was born and the plain suggestion was that the Record was to be "next." The open grave was tantalizingly ready for the Record's reception. At last destiny began the inexorable work of shifting the scenes. Gradually the Record grew stronger until in circulation it equalled the Mail, although not enjoying anywhere near the amount of advertising patronage. Then came the irony of fate. DeTreville became connected with the Record and one day there appeared in its columns a reproduction of the Mail's cartoon, depicting the four occupied mounds of earth, exactly as in the original cartoon and a faithful reproduction of the open grave supplemented with a representation of the Mail groping in its own graveyard with the likelihood of its falling into the grave it had dug.

There is an old saying that a wise man may change his opinion, a fool never. The Stockton Independent has stood pat for the Republican party through the sixty years of existence, regardless of who was nominated for office. The Mail, although Democratic, in politics sometimes flew the track and advocated the election of Republicans. The Record has ever been independent in politics, advocating only the men and measures that it considered best for the people's interest. It stood by the state convention nomination of Orrin S. Henderson for railroad commissioner but, said Mr. Martin, "I was not proud of the success achieved and later I entered with great earnestness into a movement to overthrow the old organization and to stamp out the system of politics of which I had been part and parcel." He then joined the Lincoln-Roosevelt league and the Record, of course gave the best that was in it in support of Johnson for governor and of the other men endorsed by the Lincoln-Roosevelt League. The paper was a warm advocate of the various progressive measures fathered and put through by the Johnson administration. In the presidential campaign of 1912 the Record stood behind La Follette for President, but when he was defeated in the national convention by Taft, the Record refused to support the Republican nominee and supported Wilson, and the funny part is that although the Independent supported Taft, San Joaquin, a Republican County, gave a plurality of 3,723 for Wilson. In the gubernatorial campaign Hiram Johnson was supported by the Record and he came out 3,119 votes ahead. Woodrow Wilson, again renominated by the Democrats, was seconded by the Record, and again the county went Democratic by 3,576 votes. Yet during all this time the Record did not change the political complexion of the paper but remained Republican. It was one of the first papers in the state to advocate woman suffrage, and named Mrs. Clare Davis, for school trustee and Mrs. Edith Dow Moulton for the state legislature. It advocated the issuing of bonds for good roads, the building of new school buildings, the auditorium and city hall and built itself a splendid home on Market Street, one of the first lot owners along that street to put up fine buildings.

CHAPTER XVIII

THE MILITIA AND THE PATRIOT

IN THE RUSH of immigration to California "in the days of '49" there were thousands of persons who had been officers and privates in the Mexican War. Generally speaking, in Stockton every other man, especially a Southerner, was either a colonel or a captain. It was regarded as a special mark of honor to address a man with one of his titles although he had never seen a day's service in the Mexican War. Many of these men enjoyed military social life and it is not surprising that a military company was organized in Stockton as early as 1851, and commanded by Major R. P. Hammond, and known as the San Joaquin Guard. The first lieutenant was George Kerr, the owner of the Democratic paper, the Republican. Hammond was proud of his command until a report came that the Indians in Arizona were murdering the settlers, and Governor Burnett called upon the citizens to volunteer. Captain Hammond immediately got out handbills calling upon his company to assemble at the Corinthian Building to discuss the question of volunteering. Only six of the guard answered the call, and this so disgusted the doughty little fighter that he resigned and the organization went to pieces. The guards were not looking for Indians. Like Cortez of old, they came to get gold and nothing more was said about military affairs until 1855, when a cavalry company known as the Anniversary Guard was organized. The captain was P. Edward Conner, than whom there was no better military man in California, as was later shown, and the first lieutenant was Stephen Burgen, later a prominent fireman. It was organized shortly before Washington's Birthday and anybody could enroll by paying three dollars. On February 22 the Guards made their first appearance. They were mounted on fine horses and marching through the streets preceded by a band of musicians, drawn by six noble grays, kindly loaned by Lee & Marshall's circus, they rode to Oak Grove cottage, now the Mrs. Moore home place. It was then a new house just erected by Andrew Kitchen on the Sacramento Road two miles from town. Mr. Kitchen had invited the company to be his guest and enjoy with him an old-fashioned Southern barbecue. After the feast an oration was pronounced on Washington by A. C. Bradford.

First July 4th Celebration

At the present time the celebration of the National holiday is a tame affair as the opinion is fast growing in the minds of the citizens that pomp and show and noise are no indication of patriotism or love of country, and like religion, patriotism must have its birth in the heart and be taught to the child in early youth. Hence the old time firecrackers, the boy's delight, have been prohibited in many cities, the national fire chiefs in convention recommend that fireworks be excluded from all celebrations, the roar of cannon is now almost a thing of the past. Our forefathers believed that the firing of cannon, the ringing of bells, processions, orations and a general good time was the way to show our patriotism and joy that we lived in a country where the people ruled, and every man was a king and every woman a queen, and so when Stockton was scarcely a year of age the citizens began celebrating the day. On the morning of July 4, 1850, the citizens assembled on Center Street and led by Foley's Band riding in their circus chariot, the procession marched to the Presbyterian Church, where the Fourth of July exercises were held under the trees. The program opened by the reading of the Declaration of Independence by W. D. Fair, and an oration which was published in full by the Stockton Times was delivered by Thomas Van Buren. In his remarks he expressed some pretty strong secession sentiments because of the action of Congress in refusing for a time to admit California into the Union. At the close of the oration the band played and the audience gave three cheers for the Union, three cheers for the oration, and three for California. At sunrise Captain Weber fired a national salute from the small cannon presented to him by Captain Sutter. This cannon had been used in frightening away the Indians. In the afternoon a dinner was given at the Stockton House and toasts were responded to by the citizens, including A. C. Bradford, Judge Dent and Judge Charles M. Creanor. In the evening the public buildings and homes were illuminated.

Death of Henry Clay

Henry Clay, the leader of the National Whig party, was honored alike by the San Joaquin Whigs and Democrats for his splendid work in having California admitted to the Union, and his death was deeply mourned. He died June 29, 1852, but the news was not known in Stockton until August 4. The New York Times was then received and the local papers published his obituary. That evening Mayor Baker called a special meeting of the common council to take action in regard to his memory. They resolved that the officers of the city, "as a mark of respect wear the usual badge of mourning for ninety days, and that a committee of three be appointed to confer with a like committee from the various associations for the purpose of making arrangements to commemorate the memory of the illustrious dead" and they appropriated $500 for that purpose. The memorial service was held August 12, and the procession which comprised the city, the county officials, the clergymen, Whig and Democratic county committees, the Masonic fraternity, in full regalia, the Odd Fellows, with their secret emblems, the Hebrew Benevolent Association, and the draymen on horseback, assembled at the Corinthian Building on the Peninsula. The funeral cortege then marched across the Stockton bridge to Levee Street, then to the enclosure of Mr. Woods' church beneath some large oaks. The procession "was five hundred yards in length." At the church there was singing by the choir, and Henry A. Crabb delivered the eulogy.

The Stockton Blues

This crack military company, composed of Stockton's best citizens, was so named because of their uniform, which consisted of dark blue frock coat and light blue trousers with white trimmings. The company was organized December 27, 1856, and elected the following officers: Captain, Samuel A. Booker; first lieutenant, P. E. Conner; second lieutenant, H. C. Patrick, a Democratic newspaper man; orderly sergeant, John H. Webster; drummer, John Taufer; fifer, J. C. Daniels. Its members comprised judges, lawyers, merchants, among them John B. Hall, Samuel A. Booker, Otis Bridges, Charles F. Whale, big Jack Keeler, Phillip S. Shoaff, Andrew Lester, William H. Lyons, Henry T. Compton, B. F. Sanborn, O. H. Perry, John Gross, George A. Shurtleff, Dr. Samuel A. Langdon, R. K. Reid, Thomas Marshall, R. B. Lane, Elisha Lyons, Andrew Simpson, Dave Safferhill, and other leading citizens of the town in every walk of life. The members were obliged to pay all their own expenses, receiving nothing from the state except muskets, equipment and ammunition for target practice. They paraded upon every possible occasion, such as Andrew Jackson's day, Washington's birthday, and the Fourth of July, frequently acting as escort to various societies and public school children and attending in full uniform with a brass band theatrical performances of favorite actors or actresses. Washington's birthday and the anniversary of the battle of New Orleans they always celebrated, the former day with a parade and ball. The parade closed by visiting the saloons owned by certain members of the company, where all had free drinks. One of their favorite resorts was "The Shades" on the Levee, kept by little Jack Keeler, and after visiting several of these saloons some of the soldiers would become very weary from long marching and scarcely be able to reach the armory in the rear of the San Joaquin Republican office. The most high-toned ball ever given by the Blues was that of September 26, 1860, in the pavillion of the Agricultural Society at the close of the first fair. The pavilion, a wooden structure, had been built on the west side of the Court House Square. For this occasion the Blues engaged the Third Artillery Band of San Francisco, sixteen pieces, and on the following evening the band gave a concert to help pay expenses. The company contained quite a number of crack shots, several of them being members of the Pigeon Shooting Club, and at the Sacramento State Fair of 1859 the Stockton Blues won the company a gold medal. The non-commissioned officers of the company offered a gold medal as a prize for the best yearly shot, and at their annual target excursion in 1861 Private E. M. Howison won the first prize, a silver goblet; Private Frank Stewart, the second prize, the state encampment gold medal, and James Sharrott, the company gold medal.

The Blues were a corps of gentlemen, many of them of Southern birth, sociable and generous, and always ready for a lark. In the company, also, were many of Northern birth, but all were Democrats, firm and trusted friends. But soon came rumors of war, and the friendship of pioneer days began to cool. Then the Pacific Republic plot began to ripen, and to assist the cause the members in sympathy with the South planned at a certain time to seize the arms of the Blues and use them against the Government. The members who stood by the Union learned of this plot and determined to block it. Peacefully to accomplish this, there was but one way—to disband the company. The company was then composed of forty-eight members, and a meeting was called July 25, at which by a vote of 13 to 10, it was decided to disband. About half of the members were not notified of this meeting, and when they learned the result they appealed to Governor Downey. The Governor decided the proceedings legal, and thus ended the organization that had been the pride of Stockton.

The disorganization of the Blues left the city without any military protection. The air was filled with rumors of war, the young men were enthusiastic and patriotic, and a call was immediately circulated for the organization of a new company. The following pledge was taken: "We, the undersigned, hereby agree to unite in forming a military company in Stockton—every member to take an oath to support the Union, the Constitution and the laws." County Judge J. K. Shafer appointed William H. Lyons, father of Bert Lyons, as the enrolling officer, and August 12, 1861, 140 persons signed the roll. Over seventy persons afterwards signed the army oath, for that was the number prescribed by the law. The members adopted as their name Stockton Union Guard, and the first elected officers were: Captain, P. E. Conner; first lieutenant, C. J. Newcomb; second lieutenant, Sol Pearsall; junior second lieutenant, William S. Coombs, uncle of Railroad Commissioner Henderson; secretary, Eugene Robinson; treasurer, W. P. Hazelton. Conner at this time was a state officer, Brigadier-General of this district, and he stated that he would accept the office only as an honorary position provided the men observed strictly their duties. He declared that he had served his country in both camp and field, having been a captain in the Mexican war, and under the old flag he felt perfectly willing again to enroll his name, and he would be the first if a call were made on California by the Federal Government. His speech was greeted with deafening applause. In the following month he resigned at captain, having accepted the appointment as colonel of the Third Regiment, California Volunteers. Henry O. Mathews was then elected captain. Mathews was well up in English tactics, for he had been a member of the Queen's Grenadiers, but of the Kibbie or Hardie tactics he had no knowledge. Consequently, the company was drilled in all kinds of tactics.

One evening at drill F. W. West, who had been in the army in the East, sat an interested spectator. Finally, one of the members approaching Mr. West, said: "West, won't you drill us?" "Well, yes," he answered, "I will drill you in Hardie, but I don't know anything else." "Well, that's what we want, but we haven't got our arms yet." "Oh, you don't want any arms for some time to come." "Oh, yes, we do," quickly replied the ambitious young soldier. Mr. West drilled the company in sharp work for an hour, and then gave the order to "break ranks, march." The awkward squad by that time was well satisfied that the muskets were unnecessary. The company eager to become proficient in the manual of arms, soon after this engaged Lieut. F. W. Todd to drill them, he having been one of the famous light infantry, the Boston Grays. Todd was afterwards a music teacher in the public schools. The member of the company paid him for his services from their private funds. Sergeant-Major Moegon of the regular army also drilled the company several months. Night after night the Guards drilled both in company and squad work until they had no equal among the state volunteers.

The Guards, like their predecessors, frequently gave parties and balls, and the ball most prominent was that of November 7, 1861, for at that time they were presented by the ladies of Stockton with a beautiful silk flag costing $150. The presentation speech was made by Mary Loring, and the flag was received by George W. Tyler, in a soul-stirring address. The ball was given in Agricultural Hall, the Guards' armory at that time, and there were over 200 couples present. At one time 130 couples were on the floor. The Guards wore for the first time their new uniforms, each member paying for his uniform, and conspicuous among the dancers were two officers, the one dressed in the New York Zouave uniform, the other in that of the New York Light Guards.

Two days after the presentation of the flag the Guards had their first and only experience in the "glory of war." A party of squatters had jumped a piece of land some two miles east of the Waterloo, and the courts had decided in favor of Comstock, the claimant. The squatters refused to vacate, and Sheriff Hook called on the Union Guards to place Comstock in possession of the land. The squatters were a body of brave men, all well-known secessionists. Having intrenched themselves within the foundation walls of a brick barn on the place, they made portholes in the walls and declared that they would shoot any body of men that attempted to drive them out. The Guards were assembled in their Armory November 9, 1861. Each man was given three rounds of ammunition, and was instructed to fire no blank charge, but if the order was given to fire they were to shoot to kill. The company all were exceedingly nervous for they expected a small sized war, and about 9 o'clock, in command of Captain Pearsall, they began their march for the field of carnage. In the meantime a squad of six rode forth in a carriage under the command of Lieutenant Elisha Lyons to reconnoiter. Near Waterloo the squad halted and loaded their muskets. Near the scene a messenger met them and reported that the enemy had "retreated in good order," but, not believing this, Lyons drove on. The report was correct, and the squad returned and so informed the marchers on the dusty road. The company was not pleased at the result, for the men were sullen, and upon the least provocation blood would have been shed.

Colonel E. D. Baker

The Guards at this time were in a fighting mood because of the Bull Run defeat of the Union army, August 21st, and the death of Col. E. D. Baker, October 21st, at the battle of Ball's Bluff. Baker was the idol of the Republicans, although they refused to gratify his heart's desire by making him California's United States senator. Taking up his residence in Oregon, Baker was sent to the Senate, and, stopping over in San Francisco, on his way to Washington, he made in Platt's Hall the most brilliant speech ever heard on the coast. Baker was a naturalized citizen of English birth, and on his arrival at New York he accepted the colonelcy of a New York regiment. Entering the Senate chamber in uniform one day he heard John C. Breckinridge severely scoring the Administration. When Breckinridge finished his speech, Baker arose to reply, and, on that occasion, says James B. Blaine, Baker made the most masterly and eloquent speech ever heard in Senate. It was the crowning glory of his forensic work in liberty's cause, for he went forth to die. His body was shipped to the state of his choice, and arrived at San Francisco December 5. The funeral was held December 11, Thomas Starr King pronouncing the eulogy, and over 100 citizens of Stockton were in attendance. The Union Guard unanimously resolved to attend his funeral, and, under the command of Lieutenant Todd and accompanied by citizens and firemen, they took the evening boat. On arriving at San Francisco about 2 o'clock in the morning, the guardsmen marched up to the National Guards' armory and aroused the inmates, for their arrival was unexpected. The visitors were made as comfortable as possible, and that morning the Stocktonians were given the place of honor in the procession. In the evening they were tendered a banquet at the Cafe de Rohne, and the following day were escorted to the steamer.

Grand Army men will remember that President Lincoln, believing that the war would close in three months, issued a call for 75,000 men for three months' service. At the expiration of that period the war had scarcely begun, and on July 1st President Lincoln called for 300,000 more troops. This call suggested the stirring melody first heard in Stockton in the fall of 1862. "We are coming, Father Abraham, Our Union to restore. From every hill and valley, Three hundred thousand more." Among the number who responded to this call were the Union Guards; the first military company in California to offer its service to the Federal government, July 2, 1862, by a unanimous vote, the Guards resolved to go wherever called. Elisha Lyons was then the captain of the company, holding that position continuously from April 1, 1862, until the company disbanded, 1886. The Union Guard was declared by competent judges to be the best drilled company in the National Guard of California, but in 1866 it disbanded because of an economical streak of the legislature. The lawmakers of that year cut down the military appropriation almost one-half for the sole purpose of reducing the militia, and the Stockton guardsmen, feeling deeply the insult, after they had spent time and money to bring the company up to the highest standard, resolved to quit the service of the state.

Captain Weber the Patriot

"Old Glory", thrown to the breeze in 1861 gave to Banner Island its present name, and behind it lies a bit of local history of considerable importance. Captain Weber was by nature a leader of men, not only in business and society, but in patriotism. Early in the Mexican war, although a naturalized citizen of German birth, he advised the Mexican citizens to submit quietly to the military officers of the United States and again in 1861 he took the lead in defense of the Union. He found that the Union men were wavering, and undecided, and some were even afraid to declare their principles. A leader was wanted, one who would definitely proclaim himself as "bound to go to the aid of the Union, right or wrong," Charles M. Weber was that man and, sending to Oregon, he there purchased a 120-foot pole, and upon Banner Island it was planted. On every patriot occasion it held to the wind a beautiful flag of immense size, together with a ninety-foot streamer. Many miles distant that flag could be seen. The place was then entirely surrounded by water, and to keep off intruders he placed there a large dog. On the 30th of September, the dog lay at the foot of the staff, poisoned, and overhead flew a small rebel flag. Early in the morning the captain arose, as was his custom, and observing that flag, his anger was uncontrollable. Hastily rowing to the island he pulled down the Confederate emblem, raised the old flag, and then ramming the new banner into the little cannon at the foot of the pole, he blew it into pieces. Then followed a salute of thirty-five guns for the Union. That morning at 6 o'clock, as the Sonora stage was leaving the office, one of the passengers, waving a secession flag out of the coach window, dared any person to take it from him at the same time shouting: "There are plenty of these flags flying this morning." As he was thought crazy no attention was paid to his words. The effect produced by the floating of the Banner island flag was surprising for soon afterwards flags were seen upon housetops, fences and mills. Stockton was even then a city of windmills, and over 300 might be counted from the courthouse, each bearing from one to five flags. Teamsters drove their mule teams from this city, each mule having a flag in his head-stall. Citizens erected flag poles, among them William P. Miller, who erected a seventy-five-foot pole in front of his shop, and for the first time, July 4, 1861, a flag flew from a public school building, that of Center Street.

Third Regiment Calls Volunteers

The history of the Third Regiment belongs to this county, as its first headquarters were here its colonel, P. Edward Conner was a citizen of Stockton, and the first company, Company A, Captain Thomas E. Ketcham, was here recruited and mustered into the United States service. Among other Stocktonians who joined the regiment was John Gilmore of the Union Guards, Sol Pearsall foreman of the Eureka, Richard Condy, leader of the regimental band, and Rev. John A. Anderson, regimental chaplain. At this time the war was on and August 18, 1861, this notice was pasted on the city billboards, "I. John Downey, Governor of California, do hereby call for volunteers, a regiment of infantry and five companies of cavalry to guard the overland mail route." In the meantime Captain Conner had been tendered, and accepted, the position of colonel of the Third Regiment, and October 2 this notice was posted: "Recruits Wanted—An office is now open for the enlistment of all men wishing to connect themselves with the Third Regiment of California Volunteers under the command of P. Edward Conner. A recruiting officer will be in attendance at Agricultural Hall."

Recruiting offices were opened in the mining camps, and the entire command of Captain Akey, the Tuolumne Rangers, 105 men enrolled their names. On their way to Benicia they entered Stockton in stages and wagons, their flags flying and the men cheering. The company were entertained at the Weber House, and then, under an escort of 100 citizens, they marched to Agricultural Hall to pay their respects to Colonel Conner. As the hour of 4 o'clock drew near, with flags flying and drums beating, they marched to the steamer Cornelia and sailed away, the crowd upon the wharf loudly cheering the first recruits of the war.

As fast as possible men were enrolled at the recruiting station, the Government furnishing them lodging, meals and clothing. An old cook stove was set up in the basement of the hall, and there the soldiers ate their rations of bread, meat, rice, pork and beans from tin plates and drank their coffee from tin cups. Each recruit selected the company in which he desired to serve his country, and in a short time Captains Ketcham, Moore, Potts and Urmy had a total of fifty-nine volunteers, nearly one-half of the number choosing Company A, Captain Ketcham. The men were becoming too numerous for their hall quarters, and a camp was selected. It was described as "in a beautiful grove some two miles from town, near the residence of Mr. Hamilton." It was the site of the present mineral baths, and at noon, October 2, in command of Major Pollock, the new recruits, 100 men, that day increased in number by fifty men from Moke-lumne Hill, took up their line of march for Camp McDougall. It was a thrilling scene, the march of those soldiers who had taken the oath of allegiance to fight and die if necessary in defense of the Union, and loudly the crowd cheered them, their fife playing continuously, "The Girl I Left Behind Me." Fourteen bell-shaped tents were set, and in the drilling of the men, the sweet-toned bugle calls, the sunrise and sunset guns, and the dress parades, Stockton had her first sight of war. Scarcely a day passed that new recruits could not be seen tramping over the dusty road to camp, and it was soon announced that Company A had its full quota, eighty-five men. The company had the privilege of electing their captain, and October 9, Major Pollock informed the men that Colonel Conner had designated the following day as the time for the election of captain, the same to be viva voce. The company voted unanimously for Capt. T. E. Ketcham; it was a high honor, and Company A and its captain brave won splendid victories in Humboldt County as Indian fighters.

Three days after this election the first Sunday camp service was held, and the chaplain, John A. Anderson, preached the sermon. Madame Grundy says a disappointment in a love affair made of him a soldier. True or untrue, he was a valiant soldier, and faithfully performed his duty. Sunday was a gala day for Stocktonians, and hundreds visited the camp. A large crowd was present October 27 to see the dress parade and listen to a sermon by Father Joseph P. Gallagher, the priest in charge at St. Mary's Church. At half past two the bugle rang out on the still air, and Companies A, B, C and D, falling into line, some 300 men, marched to the place of service. A male quartet, assisted by the band, furnished the music, and Father Gallagher, preaching an eloquent sermon, declared that "the loyal citizen will not hesitate even at the risk of his life to render unto Caesar that which is Caesar's. It is glorious to die for one's country, but it is more glorious to be prepared for death." Father Gallagher was a true and loyal priest, and upon a patriotic occasion he sat in the Presbyterian pulpit with Pastor Anderson.

Company A now went on its way, sailing up the coast, bound for Eel River. By telegraph it received orders for the men to march, and packing their tents in the camp wagons, through a mile of dust on the French Camp road they tramped to town. At the Center Street bridge, in waiting to escort them to the steamer, stood the Union Guard, Captain Matthews. They were in citizens' dress, for Charley Christian had not yet finished their twenty-six dollar suits. Company A was a sight to behold, for they were completely covered with dust, but nevertheless the people lustily cheered as along Center Street they marched, the Stockton band playing lively music, for they were soldiers bound for the war. November 5 Camp McDougall was deserted, Companies B, C, and D that day starting for the north in company of Colonel Conner. That day none were prouder than the Colonel, as in full uniform, he rode the celebrated running horse Sam Patch, horse, saddle, bridle and equipment being a present to Conner from the citizens, at a cost of $375.

Circumstances and conditions change the action of men. July Fourth last many young men would not turn out in the parade because of the heat. There was no incentive for action. Far different was the celebration February 22, 1862. Then the rain poured in torrents throughout the day yet the Union Guard with band, their patriotism not dampened the least by the rain, marched the streets, escorting the Third regiment's officers to Agricultural Hall, where patriotic exercises were held, Mayor Holden presiding. Prayer was offered by Rev. D. A. Dryden, pastor of the Methodist Church; national hymns were rendered by the band; Washington's farewell address was read, and an oration was delivered by Chaplain Anderson. The event of the day was the presentation of a beautiful silk flag to the officers of the Third Regiment, who came from Benicia especially to receive it. The flag was presented by H. B. Underhill, and received on behalf of the regiment by Adjutant Stillman, speaking for Colonel Conner who was a fighter, not a talker. While the flag was being presented a national salute was fired and the "Catholic bells rang out merrily." The flag was taken to Benicia, where the regiment was stationed, but again we saw it flying in the breeze May 25, as the regiment marched up Main Street on its way to Camp Halleck, within the race-track. The regiment, 600 men, arrived that morning on the steamer Helen Hensley, bound for Salt Lake. The steamer was crowded with men, and as she sailed near salutes were fired from Billy Wall's cannon near the El Dorado Street bridge, and from Banner Island. Captain Weber ordered a salute fired of thirty-four guns. The last discharge was premature, resulting disastrously, for two gunners were injured, one, John Nelson, losing his hand. Regretting deeply the accident, Captain Weber then sold the cannon, refusing to run any more risk of crippling men. For John Nelson, in some respects, it was a lucky accident. The citizens then had seen no cripples or wounded soldier, and Nelson was regarded as a hero, maimed in his country's cause. Large donations of money were given him, Weber heading the list. An entertainment was given for his benefit, and he obtained money sufficient to return to Sweden and start a bank.

The regiment remained in camp six weeks, and one day there was a sad event, the funeral of Michael Dolan. "Soldier rest, thy warfare o'er. Sleep the sleep that knows no waking." The body, placed in an ambulance drawn by four mules, was preceded by an escort of eight soldiers, the firing party, with arms reversed. Following them came the regimental band playing a dirge. Pall-bearers were upon either side of the ambulance, behind them 400 soldiers, without arms, then the regimental officers, the Colonel in the rear. To the Catholic church they marched, where services were held, then back over the same route to the Catholic consecrated grounds. There the body was buried with military honors.

Those were merry days in Stockton, yet they were days of terrible suspense, for what was in the future? Amidst the clashing arms of the East, none could tell. Fortunate were Stocktonians, for they saw none of the evils of war, and now they were about to lose sight of those enrolled for the war. July 12 the regiment started on its long march for Salt Lake, with the fifers playing "The Girl I Left Behind Me."

Today we are a city of over 60,000 people but in 1862, then we were less than 6000, and yet no celebration in its procession has ever been larger, nor will the people ever again be as enthusiastic as on July 4th of that year. Now in harmony and peace we sing, "The union of hearts, the union of hands, The union of States none can sever. And the flag of our Union forever." Then the song was a dream, not a reality. Hence it was necessary that all Union men should show their principles and their colors. None, however, showed their love for the Union at so much risk of life as he who, in the silent hours, climbed the court house dome and covered it with flags. The next morning the rising sun beheld a city of flags. Noticeable among the banners were the string of flags across Weber Avenue from Dr. Grattan's building to the South Methodist Church, where the previous year a fight took place because the bell was rung. At sunrise a salute was fired by a detachment of artillery from Benicia. The procession, consisting of the Fire Department, the Guards, the Turnverein and many citizens in carriages, was increased by the Third Regiment, California Volunteers. Colonel Conner was in command of 800 men, and there were fifty-four camp wagons, each drawn by six mules, two pieces of artillery, with caissons, and two mules each carrying strapped upon his back a mountain howitzer. As the regiment band moved up Main Street the soldiers took up the refrain. "John Brown's body lies a-moldering in the grave," and as each company marched past a given point they were singing that song. Agricultural Hall, where the exercises were held, was crowded to suffocation. The two bands discoursed patriotic airs, and Thomas Starr King delivered the oration. The regiment was tendered a dinner in the Washington gardens by the ladies, the regimental officers being the guests of the Guards at the Jenny Lind restaurant. There were no fireworks, but Starr King delivered a lecture in the Presbyterian Church in the evening on "The Confederacy, Old and New." In Agricultural Hall a patriotic entertainment was given by the women of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, some fifty children taking part under the direction of A. N. Blake. That night about 12 o'clock a beautiful scene took place upon the channel. The steamer Helen Hensley moved to a position near Weber Point, and suddenly she was in a blaze of light from the rockets, blue lights and Roman candles fired from her deck. Thus ended the Fourth of July, 1862, the most enthusiastic in Stockton's history.

Although tens of thousands of patriots volunteered to fight in defense of their country, the terrible slaughter of troops, in the battle of Bull Run, Antietam, Corinth, Vicksburg and Gettysburg greatly depleted the Union ranks, and Congress was compelled to pass a conscription or draft law. California was not exempt from the provisions of the law, and when the news was received it created considerable alarm among some weak-hearted men and some good wives. There was no intention on the part of the Government to draft any men from California, considering the condition of affairs here, yet the authorities wanted to know the fighting force of the state, and the county assessors were instructed to prepare war lists of all the able-bodied men in their respective counties between eighteen and sixty years of age. In San Joaquin the list was prepared by Joseph M. Long, for twenty years under-sheriff, and the county was divided into three districts. It was found that the county had 3430 men subject to military duty, 900 of them being in Stockton, and 1522 in the second district, this including Liberty and Woodbridge. The draft was enforced in the East September 6, 1863. In California the Federal officers were simply instructed to have all things ready for its enforcement.

The men in the Civil War numbered over a million. The money expended amounted to over a billion dollars. So the call was for more money than men and California responded bountifully with her gold and silver. Her gold mines alone were then yielding over $30,000,000 a year, and it has been said that without her gold the war could not have been so successfully waged. The first to pour ducats into the war fund was the Union Guard, which cleared $109 from a Thanksgiving ball, November 27, 1862. The news September 1, 1863, that 30,000 Confederates had surrendered seems to have loosened the purse-strings of the Union men, and mass-meetings were held to aid the soldiers. The president of the first meeting was B. W. Owens, a grocer, and he was introduced as a native of South Carolina. George W. Tyler, in a speech in which he declared the object of the assembly, said: "Let us show the world that Stockton is Union not only in name but reality. This rebellion must be crushed." At the meeting the asylum employees handed in $533, Andrew Wolf, $100; Simpson & Gray, $100; L. U. Shippee, $50, and so on. Some pledged themselves to give monthly a certain amount until the close of the war. Collectors were sent out in both city and county, and in Elkhorn township John Perrot, A. L. Levinsky (father of the well known attorney) and Dr. H. Bently gathered in $242. P. G. Sharp, of French Camp, making a personal canvass, collected $422, and then added $50 to it. Other money came in rapidly, and within a month $5,503 in gold coin had been collected, together with $656 in greenbacks. The money was sent to Henry W. Bellows, New York, by Wells Fargo & Company's express.

The Sanitary Commission Fair

The Fourth of July, 1863, was a thanksgiving day for the benefit of the sanitary fund, and the citizens and patriotic ladies had made every preparation for the event. The usual procession was seen and the exercises were held in Sanitary grove, a group of small oak trees near the corner of Park and Sutter Streets. The grove was enclosed and as a starter to make every cent in sight for the fund every person was obliged to pay $1 for admission. Even the orator of the day, Joseph M. Cavis, and Grand Marshall George H. Sanderson had to put up. In the grove hundreds of articles were for sale, having been given by patriotic people for the benefit of the fund. It was worse than a Donnybrook fair, for the list included cows, calves, pigs and sheep. One of the articles to be sold was a cake sent from Sacramento, it already having realized $400 in that city. Another cake was presented by the employees and the officers of the steamer Cornelia. It was of immense size and was surmounted with a model in silver of the beautiful steamer. Within the cake were three gold rings, and the cake, cut in slices, sold for twenty-five cents a slice. General Connor, by telegraph through P. L. Shoaff, presented two lots on the corner of Weber Avenue and American Street, and Mrs. F. A. M. Baldwin presented a Wheeler & Wilson sewing machine, valued at $130, it being inclosed in a black walnut case, inlaid with pearl. One patriotic citizen, H. P. Robbins, who had nothing else to give, made a beer keg, thinking that perchance it might sell for five dollars. It was sold again and again and realized $137.50. Mrs. E. F. Hutchinson, now Mrs. Fred West, sent in a beautiful quilt made of silk, the material alone costing over $100. Interwoven were the flags of all nations—in the center the Stars and Stripes. Mrs. West purposed having the quilt sold and resold until $1,000 had been realized for each of the funds—the Sanitary, Christian and Freedmen's fund—and then it was to be sent to President Lincoln as a present from the loyal people of California. Before the quilt reached Washington, Lincoln was dead. In the selling of the various articles, H. S. Sargent, father of Dr. Sargent, was the auctioneer, and a person scarcely dared to wink, as it would be taken as a bid. From the sale of articles, a lecture and the entire proceeds of a ball given that night by the Union Guard $9,903 was the result. Many citizens and over 100 patriotic ladies worked hard to make the fair a success. Among the number were Ada Parker, Maggie McClellan, Nellie Meader, Addie Fisher, Maria Debnam, Maggie Claves, Barbara Cadien, Tillie Brown, Mrs. H. Hewlett, Mrs. E. S. Holden, Mrs. Sidney Newell and Belle Tilden.

The Stockton Dragoons

The Stockton Dragoons, organized June 17, 1862, were famous more for the amusement they caused the bystanders than for proficiency in drill. Many of the members had never before ridden horseback, and to see them drilling their horses upon the trot or gallop and their swords dangling at their sides, was very funny. The leaders in the movement were Oscar M. Brown and R. S. Johnson. Johnson had been a member of the Guards, but he preferred riding to walking, and started out to form a cavalry company, and obtained forty-one signatures. The signers, assembling in the Eureka engine-house, were enrolled by John C. Byers, who was appointed as the enrolling officer by Judge Tyler. The following officers were elected: captain, O. M. Brown; first lieutenant, Phillip L. Shoaff; orderly sergeant, R. C. Johnson; second sergeant, I. V. Leffler; third sergeant, F. W. West; fourth sergeant, H. F. Horn; fifth sergeant, Edward Pennington; surgeon, Dr. Christopher Grat-tan; farrier, John Schreck. Their first appearance was July 12th, they on that occasion acting as escort to the Third Regiment of California volunteers on their way to Salt Lake. Again in October they acted as escort to Company A, Captain Ketcham, bound for Humboldt County. The Dragoons were then in full uniform, and rode in saddles designed by Thomas Cunningham. They were without a flag until October 8, at which time they were presented with a beautiful silk banner by the Stockton ladies. Mrs. Caroline E. Dunbar presented the flag, Captain O. M. Brown responding in a neat speech. He resigned in February, 1863, and so did, R. S. Johnson, the former being commissioned as colonel of a regiment of cavalry, the latter as captain of Company K in the same regiment. Captain Johnson immediately opened a recruiting office and called for 100 volunteers. Captain Johnson served through the war, doing good work in Arizona among the Apaches. Captain T. K. Hook was Brown's successor, and, being displeased with the military law signed by Governor Haight, July 13, 1866, the Dragoons disbanded.

One of the most imposing impromptu celebrations of the Civil War was that of July 11, 1863, in honor of the victories of General U. S. Grant at Vicksburg, July 4th, and that of General Meade at Gettysburg a few days later. "The firing of cannon, the illumination of the public streets and the public buildings and many private residences, the waving of flags in every part of the city, and the music of the band combined to make it a scene unparalleled in brilliancy and seldom ever equalled in the enthusiasm it created." A procession was formed in front of Agricultural Hall comprising the Stockton Light Dragoons and citizens and led by the band of thirteen pieces, and citizens whooped and yelled. Every man carried an oil-burning torch and many carried transparencies. The procession after marching through the streets halted in front of the Weber House where a speakers' stand had been erected. The streets and balconies were literally packed as the meeting was called to order, and Charles H. Chamberlain selected as president and B. W. Owens, Charles T. Meader, Austin Sperry, Charles Grunsky, William Kierski, and Dr. Asa Clark, vice-presidents. The speakers were Rev. Charles R. Hendrickson of the Baptist Church, Thomas B. Shannon and Cornelius Cole, the latter still living and now past 100 years of age. The glee club was on hand and amid cheers sung the "Red, White and Blue," "John Brown" and the "Star Spangled Banner." From the stand a dispatch was read stating that the steamer Cornelia would arrive at 1 o'clock, decorated in honor of the great victories, and with fireworks. Soon after midnight the meeting adjourned and many hundreds then marched to the wharf, singing "John Brown" and "Marching Through Georgia," preceded by the band, there to await the steamer's arrival. Occasionally the band played a patriotic air, as the tired crowd anxiously gazed down the river for the approaching steamer. At last from the throng there came a shout, as a streak of fire was seen to shoot from earth to sky. This was answered from the wharf with rocket and shell, and the old gun on the bridge. These signals were given and repeated at intervals of perhaps ten minutes, until the steamer's arrival at Rough and Ready. As she came up the channel, excepting the danger signals only, not a light was seen, and soon the dark shadows of the steamer's outline came in sight. In the still, quiet night, the crowd almost held their breath in excited anticipation, and upon the water, smooth as a mill pond, the paddle-wheels were distinctly heard as they struck the water. Opposite Banner Island the bell was heard to strike, the wheels stopped, and as if by magic touch all around us was as bright as day. The steamer was in a blaze of light from bow to stern. Rockets went whizzing into air; the stars from the Roman candles fell like rain upon deck and water; the blue, red, white and green lights filled the air with smoke, and a deck hand dressed in navy costume, standing upon the pilot-house of the steamer, grasping in his right hand our country's flag, the living, breathing, central figure which completed the tableau, the most beautiful of any ever seen in California. Upon the wharf the excitement was intense. Rockets were fast sent into the air, the band played loud and strong, the cannon was rapidly fired, and the people shouted until they could shout no more. The display has never been reproduced and many were the congratulations of citizens to Captain Conkling and his officers for their patriotic work.

Stockton's Light Artillery Company

The largest and most expensive military company was the Stockton Light Artillery. It numbered about 120 of Stockton's best men, and when on parade they attracted much admiration. Their parades were few and far between because of the heavy expense, for it took thirty-two horses to draw the eight six-pound cannon and caissons, and each time the company has to pay for horse hire. The company was organized through the efforts of M. G. Cobb, a lawyer, who had formerly been in command of the Boston Light Artillery. The company was enrolled September 10, 1864, with Moses G. Cobb, as captain; S. W. Sperry, first lieutenant; E. B. Bateman, second lieutenant; H. S. Sargent, third lieutenant, and George E. Weller, fourth lieutenant. The Adjutant General gave them the use of the four six-pound field guns and caissons then stored at Sacramento, and the cannon arrived October 6 of that year. They were placed in the George Natt Building, still standing on the north side of the court house. The second story was used as the Union Guards Armory. The company were on parade only occasionally, because of the heavy expense. They turned out every July 4th and held also an annual parade. During the four years of their existence they had target practice on May 8, 1866. The company assembled at their armory that day and accompanied by the band marched to the Castle ranch on the Lower Sacramento Road. A target was set up in the tules a mile distant and each detachment of the company tried to hit the bull's eye. Lunch was then in order, followed by a sham battle in which each detachment loaded and fired at an imaginary enemy. The scene was very exciting and the hundreds of visitors obtained a slight idea of the horrors of war. The artillery company was disbanded under very peculiar circumstances. Upon receiving the news in Stockton of the nomination of General U. S. Grant for President the company fired a salute of 100 guns. This honor to the General who had defeated the rebels angered greatly the secession sympathisers then in power at Sacramento, and the company received orders to have all state property ready for inspection June 16, 1868. At that time the company assembled in full uniform and on the arrival of General Allen he was received by a salute of eleven guns. He later reviewed the company and insulted them by appearing in an undress uniform. The cannon, caissons and equipments were then turned over to him according to military tactics, and immediately some one yelled out "Three cheers for Grant and Colfax." There were given with a vim that made the hall echo.

Organization of the Stockton Guards

In the fall of 1871, just after the election of Newton Booth as governor, there was a call published for all Stocktonians in favor of forming an infantry company to assemble in Hickman's Hall, sign the roll and then participate in the jollification of the Booth and Pacheco club over the victory of the preceding Wednesday. At that time Adjutant-General Tom Cazneau granted permission to form a company in Stockton, and Maj. E. S. Pillsbury was chosen to preside over the meeting called to organize and elect officers. It was held December 12, 1871, and the company organized was named the Stockton Zouaves. Why they adopted this name I know not, for their uniforms were of dark blue, cut in the usual military style, although several years later they adopted a uniform of gray trimmed with black and gold. However, they soon came to be called commonly the Stockton Guards. In January, 1872, the company had sixty-nine men enrolled, and the following officers were elected: Captain, J. E. Lyon; first lieutenant, E. Scott; second lieutenant, Jonas P. Stockwell; sergeants, Ed. Delano, W. F. Fletcher, H. J. Todd, and J. Murray; corporals, J. C. Sullivan, J. A. Muldowney, John D. McDougall and C. E. Eurie; drummer, Phil Biven.

Many of the members had formerly tramped with the Union and City Guards, while some had been members of the Old Columbia Guards. The membership included not only the leading business and professional men of the city, but also its leading society men. It was, in fact, a military social club, and all its excursions, picnics and balls were recherche affairs. The shadow of battle ne'er crossed its pathway save once. "On with the dance; let joy be unconfined!" was its motto, and its record was marked with many a merry time.

It was a common custom to have the high dignitaries of the state as guests of the company. At its first annual ball, December 12, 1872, Governor Booth and staff, Brigadier-General Davies and staff, and Adjutant-General L. H. Foote were present, all in full uniform. After the monthly inspection, the zouaves or guards were drawn up in two-column ranks and Kate Davies, stepping to the front, presented the company with a beautiful parade flag. In a short speech the Adjutant-General received the flag in behalf of the company. Six years later Governor Irwin and staff were the guests of the Stockton Guard. During the afternoon the Governor visited the race-track to see Rarus trot a mile in 2:14½, the fastest mile of the Pacific Coast up to that time. In the evening at the anniversary ball, in behalf of the Stockton ladies, the Governor presented the company with a beautiful standard. Private Joe C. Campbell, later senior counsel for Mayor Schmitz of San Francisco, received the flag in a ringing speech. At midnight the visitors were escorted to the Yosemite hotel, and, after being welcomed by Mayor Belding, enjoyed one of McBean's famous suppers.

In the military circles of San Joaquin County the men who stood prominently in the front rank were Col. P. Edward Conner, later made a brigadier-general, Capt. L. E. Lyons, and Col. John J. Nunan. It was the misfortune of the Stockton Guards in 1876 to lose Capt. Lyons as he went to San Francisco to reside. A man "born to command," he held the captaincy of the Union Guards from April 1, 1862, until disbanded. Just before he left the city the Stockton Guards, assembling in full uniform, presented him with a gold watch and chain and a Masonic emblem. Maj. William Gibson made the presentation speech, and

Maj. J. D. Peters answered for the ever-modest Captain. The officers in command at this time were: Captain, Eugene Lehe; first lieutenant and secretary, J. J. Nunan; second lieutenant, J. W. Payne; orderly sergeant, William Trivett, quartermaster sergeant, George C. Turner; sergeants, Tom E. Hersey, H. Baker, J. B. Douglass and W. B. Hanlon; corporals, John D. Gall, Charles Merrill, J. H. Condon, P. P. Garvey, S. C. Dorr, Ben. C. Kerr, W. R. Stone and G. Arrivev.

The Guards Honored by General Grant

The great event of 1879 was the visit of Ex-President Grant to California on his famous tour around the world. Extensive preparations has been made by the citizens of San Francisco to receive the military hero, and a big procession was planned. But the steamer Tokio, bringing the General from the Orient, arrived unexpectedly on the afternoon of September 20. The Stockton Guards had voted to attend the reception and unaware of the Tokio's arrival they took steamer passage for the Bay City the same afternoon, accompanied by the city officials and a large number of citizens, including D. J. Oullahan, a brother-in-law of Mrs. Grant. On reaching San Francisco they were much surprised and disappointed to find that the parade had hastily taken place. The metropolitans had a good laugh at the expense of the Stocktonians, but soon the laugh was on the other side. Mr. Oullahan, sending up his card to the General, was at once admitted, although strict orders had been given that no one would be seen. Mr. Oullahan explained the conditions of affairs, and Grant immediately gave orders to usher in Mayor G. C. Hyatt, the Councilmen, and Captain Lehe. The following morning at 9 o'clock he received the Stockton Guards in the Palace Hotel court, and the military of San Francisco felt like thirty cents, for the Guards were the only militiamen thus honored.

The Guards, numbering sixty-nine men, under the command of Captain Lehe and Lieutenant Nunan, left Stockton early on the morning of January 8, 1880, and on arriving at the Capital were received by the Sacramento Hussars, the City Guard, the Light Artillery, the Chico Guard, the Mexican Veterans, the Pioneers and the Rifle Cadets. Along the line of marching the Stockton company was the special feature of the parade. The Sacramento Bee said of Stockton's representatives: "The handsome gray uniforms faced with red and gilt braid made this company a conspicuous feature, and its excellent marching and the fine soldierly bearing of the members were the subject of much favorable comment." During the afternoon the officers of the visiting companies were tendered a reception at the Golden Eagle Hotel, and the rank and file were given a collation at the Western Hotel by Lieutenant-Colonel Creed Haymond. The company returned to Stockton on a special train at midnight.

The Stockton Rifle Cadets

It is difficult to realize the fact that many of Stockton's most active business men were but yesterday boy soldiers, the pride of the city, but such is the case. Forty-six years ago last February, as an auxiliary to the Stockton Guard, a company of boys known as the Stockton Rifle Cadets were organized under the direction of Capt. Eugene Lehe. The boys' parents entered heartily into the project and Captain Lehe sent for sixty navy muskets at a cost of $3.50 each, and a committee consisting of George Wilhoit, Louis Hickman and Fred Stockwell was appointed to secure funds for uniforms and the balance due on the muskets. The boys adopted as their uniform the handsome and dashing Zouave style—loose red trousers with white leggings, blue jackets trimmed with red, sky blue vests and caps of the same color with red tops. The mothers put many loving stitches in the uniforms of the boys. In May, 1877, the cadets elected the following officers: Captain, Louis Hickman; first lieutenant, Nat Moseley; senior second lieutenant, Everett Ruggles; junior second lieutenant, Will R. Thresher; orderly sergeant, George Wilhoit; quartermaster sergeant, Harry Lester; second sergeant, Harry Fanning; third sergeant, Ed Gnekow; fourth sergeant, Fred Stockwell; fifth sergeant, Eugene Grunsky; corporals, Fred Rowe, Edward Bond, Charles McKenzie, George Sellman, Bert Lyons, Louis Wagner, George Buck and Russell Melone. Among the privates were C. H. Ralph, George Rosech, Walter Henderson, Hy Barber, Henry Baker, George Lissenden, John Gross, Frank Witherley, George Goodell, Frank Cramblett, Jo Hale, Walter Haines, Al Tinkham, and several more. The cadets immediately settled down to business and, under their well-qualified instructor, Captain Lehe, who kept them constantly stimulated to action by comparing them with the Stockton Guards, they soon became well drilled and marched and handled their muskets like veterans. It was a proud day when they made their first appearance, in May, 1877. As guests of the Guards, the Rifle Cadets and the St. Aloysius Cadets attended the Guards' picnic. In June the cadets gave an exhibition drill in Mozart Hall in the presence of their delighted parents and friends. After the drill the company was drawn up in line in the north part of the hall, and "Pet" Peters, escorted by her father, the late Maj. J. D. Peters, stepped to the front and presented them with a beautiful silk flag, a gift from her father. The flag, which cost $100, was bordered with heavy gold fringe, and an eagle surmounted the staff, from which hung gold cord and tassels.

The Cadets had been drilling faithfully, expecting to march in Stockton behind their flag in their first Fourth of July parade, but on that day they were in Sacramento. The Fourth of July committee of that city invited the cadets to parade and, as in the last week of June there were no indications of a celebration in Stockton, Captain Lehe accepted the invitation. In the meantime, just five days before the Fourth, the foremen of the Fire Department met and resolved to have a celebration. The following evening there was a mass meeting of citizens, and they made a special request to the Stockton Guards, the Rifle Cadets, and the St. Aloysius Cadets to remain in this city July 4th. Now there was trouble. The procrastination of the citizens had caused the band to accept an engagement to Modesto, and Lehe had promised to visit Sacramento. Most of the cadets were anxious to go to the Capital, and their parents saw no reason why they should not go. Considerable feeling was aroused, and the committee tried to persuade Lehe to remain in Stockton, but he said: "No, siree. You fellows have been dangling along here for the last two weeks and now since you're going to have a celebration you want me to go back on my word. Not much." A few of the cadets, probably at the request of their parents, remained at home and were in the parade with Captain Hickman in command. On the morning of the Fourth in a special train, accompanied by a detachment of the Guards, the cadets, fifty-eight strong, in command of Lieutenant Mosely, went to Sacramento with their well drilled drum corps, consisting of Albert Parker, John Yardley, Robert Bond, George Cornwall, E. Lissenden, Ed. Brown, and Sam Elliott. On arrival they were received by the Sacramento military companies and Rifle Cadets and escorted to the Golden Eagle Hotel. The Stockton boys were the feature of the procession. During the afternoon they passed in review before Generals Heran and Walsh and Major Clunie and staff. That night in the hotel they raised the old Nick. Imagining themselves upon the field of battle, the pillows flew, and not satisfied with that, they cut slits in the pillow cases, and then the feathers flew. When the landlord came with an array of servants to quell the riot, oh, what a sight! The boys had a fine time, however, and on reaching home the following day they were escorted to their armory by the St. Aloysius Cadets.

The Emmet Guard

This company was organized in 1879 and was named after the Irish patriot. It was an independent company, receiving no money from the state. In order to purchase arms and uniforms it gave social parties, the first of these being given in the Turnverein hall. J. J. Nunan, first lieutenant of the Stockton Guards, was elected captain of the new company, which eventually become Company B of the National Guards. Captain Nunan found the Irish boys full of life and bubbling over at times with native wit and action, but he soon succeeded in disciplining the Emmets and perfecting them in the manual of arms. In token of their esteem in May, 1885, they presented him with a costly sword and belt, Congressman James H. Budd making the presentation speech. A few years later they gave him a beautiful watch. In September of that year the company held its first public dress parade on the grounds in front of the new asylum. Preceded by a band, the soldiers marched to the grounds and, pitching their tents, named it Camp Hadley after Brigadier-General Hadley. After inspection drill and parade, they returned to the armory, where Father O'Connor, in a nicely worded speech, presented them with free tickets to an entertainment held that evening in the hall by the Catholic ladies.

The St. Aloysius Cadets

These cadets were a company of boys from ten to fifteen years of age, organized under the direction of Father Riordan, of St. Mary's Church. The lads were provided with light blue uniforms trimmed with red and white, and musketoons (real guns that would shoot). They were drilled by Lieutenant Nunan, and on their first appearance in public, St. Patrick's Day, 1887, they were the most conspicuous feature of the procession. Between the St. Aloysius Cadets, who were mostly students of the Catholic school, and the Rifle Cadets there was much friendly rivalry, and in September, 1878, a feature of the San Joaquin Valley Fair was a drill contest between the two companies. The association offered two prizes, a gold and a silver medal for the best and second best drilled cadet company. The Rifle Cadets took position first and went through the Upton tactics with precision and handled their musketoons and marched like veterans. The St. Aloysius Cadets, who averaged younger than the others, then appeared and went through the same drill. Captain Nunan, drillmaster of the St. Aloysius Cadets, was especially proud of their proficiency in the bayonet drill, but it had been agreed before the contest that it should not count because the Rifle Cadets had not been trained in it. Merely as an exhibition, however, the younger boys were allowed to give the bayonet drill, and it captured the crowd which repeatedly cheered the performance of the various exercises which even adults find difficult to perform correctly. The judges then held a consultation and awarded the first prize to the St. Aloysius Cadets. A prize of $100 had been subscribed by the citizens, and this was divided between the two companies.

The Moquelemos Grant War

The affair between Sheriff Cunningham and the settlers on the Moquelemos grant was somewhat similar to the "squatter" affairs of early day. There was a dispute regarding a certain piece of land as to its ownership. It had been on trial in the court, and the decision had been against the settlers. There was a stand of wheat upon the land in dispute, and the settlers wanted to thresh the grain and also haul away some 250 sacks already threshed. The sheriff, so ordered by the Court, was anxious to perform the same job. Finally two men named Lynch and Hurlburt, who were the leaders of the settlers, informed the sheriff that on the morrow, June 9, 1884, 156 men would go to the Murray field and proceed to cut and thresh the grain. It was the most critical period in the history of San Joaquin County, for this band of well-armed men had defied the sheriff to carry out the Court's orders, and he alone was unable to cope with such a large body of men. Accordingly he called upon Brigadier-General Shepherd to assist him. The General held a consultation with Adjutant-Major William Gibson, and the result was that near the midnight hour Captains Lehe and Nunan were ordered to report to Sheriff Cunningham with their commands, the Stockton and Emmet Guards, supplied with the necessary camp equipage and each man with forty rounds of ammunition. Sergeants were sent hurrying over town to notify the men to appear at their armories at 8 o'clock. An hour later the companies in wagons started for the field of dispute. Sheriff Cunningham rode on in advance of the militia, and on his arrival Deputy Sheriff Crandell and Atwood reported that everything was quiet, though many settlers had assembled. The sheriff, approaching the men, read to them the Riot Act. A few minutes later the militia appeared, and one of the settlers, an old Grand Army man, exclaimed: "Boys, it won't do to fire upon the flag. We must give up." The settlers thereupon quietly dispersed. The two companies camped upon the ground and there remained until June 17 and during that time all of the grain was threshed and hauled away under the sheriff's direction.

The Centennial Celebration, 1876

Never again will the pioneers see such a magnificent Fourth of July celebration as that of 1876. It was the largest in numbers and the longest continued (three days). In early May the citizens began making arrangements, and J. D. Peters, the financial secretary of the previous year, reported $273 on hand. The council and the supervisors each appropriated $1,000, the citizens subscribed $2,000. Peters gave $500 and about the same amount was derived from entertainments given by the Choral Society and the Dramatic Club. On July 2, which was Sunday, there were patriotic services in all of the churches, those of the Methodists being the most interesting. The following day the merchants handsomely decorated their places of business, a triumphal arch, erected over Main Street at a cost of $280, was completed, and the band during the afternoon gave a concert upon the square. In the evening there was a torchlight procession, the Oakland brass band furnishing the music for it. The Stockton Guard and Grand Marshal Peters marched to the train to meet the band and escort the orator, Thomas Fitch, to the hotel. For the occasion Daniel O'Connell, the California Irish poet, wrote a poem, the last stanza being as follows: "Then rally, rally everyone; Be out at dawn to see the fun, And shame on any mother's son, That shirks the great Centennial!" On the morning of the Fourth every bell in the city shouted for joy, and early the cannon's roar awoke the populace. The crowds from the mountains and the country assembled early upon the streets, and at 9 o'clock the aides of the Grand Marshal, sixty in number, rode to his residence and surprised him by presenting him with a beautiful Philadelphia sash, bordered with gold lace and having upon it a handsomely designed shield worked in the silk with gold thread. The presentation speech was made by Van R. Paterson, and Grand Marshal Peters made a brief reply. The procession, which was three and one-half miles in length, was already forming, the first division being in command of John D. McDougall as Marshal, with S. S. Burge and J. A. McDougall as aides. In this division was the Stockton Cornet Band, followed by the Guards, Mexican Veterans bearing the American and Mexican flags, the Pioneers, and William Gelebert, a marine on the Savannah, carrying the flag of the old warship, and the judiciary in carriages. W. L. Overhiser, with Putnam Visher and George W. Bressler, led the second division. It was composed of Grangers and their wives and daughters. The third division was in charge of Fingal Hinds, John Kafitz and A.

F. Naher, with a drum corps in which two Continentals played the fife and drum. The Odd Fellows were with this division. Then came the San Joaquin Silver Band, Jabez Harris leader, playing the quickstep of the Fire Department, with Chief Thomas Cunningham as marshal and J. L. Boucher and Charles Whitkopf, aides. The German and the Jewish societies formed the fifth division, under the command of William Kierski, with Louis M. Barney and Fred Hahn, aides. In this division there was a wagon bearing plaster of Paris busts of the immortal patriots, Washington, Jefferson, Franklin and Paine, together with a Goddess of Liberty. These busts were later presented to the Turnverein Society by William Freeman in behalf of the Free Thought Society. The Oakland band in the sixth division was preceded by Marshal S. V. Tredway and Frank Davis and John Perrott. Following the band, a triumphal car was seen drawn by twelve white horses. Upon the car sat a large number of beautiful young ladies dressed in white and wearing sashes of red, white and blue, each lady representing a goddess or a State. The Goddess of Liberty in a beautiful costume of costly texture was impersonated by Abbie Gray, and around her sat as goddesses Lila Moore, Nettie Van Vlear, Ada Moore and Susie Benton. Emma Debnam represented agriculture, and Eva Van Vlear, art, while Will Hickman and William Westbay represented the army and navy. The states were represented in part by Estell Simpson, Ruth Clifford, Emma Hansel, Hannah Kierski, Nellie Debnam, Emma Sperry, Maud Southworth, Maggie Cunningham, Emma Wagner, Nellie Blossom and Maggie Claves. In a carriage following the car rode "Pet" Peters and Mary Hickman, the one representing a lady dressed in fashion of 1776 and the other in the fashionable dress of the time. The exercises of the day were held in a warehouse on Mormon Channel and the united bands furnished the instrumental music. The Choral Society was present, and 1,000 public school children under the direction of H. J. Todd and accompanied by five organs and the bands sang a hymn composed for the day by Dudley Buck, the great composer. Louis Noble read the Declaration, Mary Woodbridge recited a poem, and Thomas Fitch delivered the oration. During the afternoon there were boat and foot-races and Grand Marshal Peters tendered his aides a banquet in Mozart Hall. About $1,000 was spent for the fireworks of the evening, and complaint was made that they were not equal to the display of 1875, which cost only $750. On the third day there was a trapeze performance on the square. A balloon ascension had been advertised, but it was a failure because of the density in those days of the lighting gas. The balloon would not carry the weight of the man and his sandbags. Finally, not to disappoint the crowd, he took out the sandbags and cut loose the balloon, thus risking a loss of several hundred dollars. His only thanks were the jeers of the people, the most of whom had never seen a balloon ascension. There were also in the afternoon an exhibition drill of the Fire Department. The Weber engine ran into the side of a house before it was fairly started and snapped a singletree. The Babcock was on time, and the Eureka, running three and one-half blocks, set and was forcing water through the hose in one and one-half minutes. In the evening the "Invicibles" burlesqued every feature of the procession and exercises of the morning.

Ex-President Grant Visits Stockton.

Two years after the Centennial celebration the citizens had the honor of welcoming the nation's ex-president and its greatest General, U. S. Grant. He was then on his way to Washington, having arrived at San Francisco, from China, September 19, 1879, thus completing his tour of the world. His arrival in Stockton on the afternoon of September 30 was greeted by thousands of citizens, and cheer after cheer rent the air as he and his party stepped from the train. A committee of citizens had met him at Lathrop and escorted him to the city. The town had been beautifully decorated in his honor and said an eyewitness: "Looking from the Southern Pacific depot down Main Street the air seemed literally full of flags the entire length of the streets." After the ex-president had been introduced to Mayor G. C. Hyatt and other citizens by D. J. Oullahan, Grant and his party were escorted to carriages and the procession, led by the Grand Marshal Robert S. Johnson and his aides, Doctors A. T. Hudson, Asa Clark, Robert K. Reid and Otis Perrine, began moving down Main Street. In the line of march was the Stockton Cornet Band, the Stockton and Emmet Guards, St. Aloysius Cadets, Stockton Rifle Cadets, Mexican War and Civil War veterans, city and county officials, Harris Silver Band and Fire Department. On the Hunter Street plaza the public school children, 3,000 in number, had been lined up in three ranks, and the procession arriving at the plaza it halted and Grant stepping from the carriage walked slowly along the line of children, each child waving a small flag. The ex-president was then escorted to the Yosemite House where the proprietor, James Cole, had prepared a fine collation. At the head of the table on a raised platform sat Mayor Hyatt and on his right hand Ex-President Grant, Dr. George A. Shurtleff, Mrs. D. J. Oullahan, a sister-in-law of Mrs. Grant, General John F. Miller, California's Congressional Senator, Miss Julia Weber, and J. Russell Young, Grant's biographical writer. Toasts were numerous and Grant said in his few remarks, "I was never West of the Rocky Mountains, except as a soldier in the Mexican War until 1852. I was in Knights Ferry three times, once in '52, once in '53. I think I never remained there at one time longer than a week." Knights Ferry was the home of his brothers-in-law, George W. Lewis, and John Dent. It was the intention of the Stockton Guard to tender the city's guest a reception and ball in Mozart Hall but Grant was obliged to leave that evening for Sacramento. The ball was given, but hundreds of persons were disappointed as they anticipated seeing an Ex-President.

Off For the War

The members of the Stockton and Emmet Guard together with other companies in Central California had been anxious for a long time to form a battalion. At the encampment at Santa Cruz in July, 1885, this was effected and the companies were then officially known as Company A and Company B, Sixth Regiment, National Guard of California. Up to this time they had been independent companies paying their own expenses, but as a part of the National Guard the state paid all necessary expenses. In 1898 came the war with Spain, Congress declaring war on April 19, after the blowing up of the battleship Maine, January 5, in Havana harbor and drowning 250 seamen. The victory of George Dewey at Manila took place May 1, and shortly after this preparations were made to send troops to the Philippine Islands. The California militia was anxious to go to the seat of war, and Companies A and B began recruiting until the former had enlisted 100 and Company B, 103 men. The companies were later cut down by physical examination to 85 men. The two commands, Company A, Captain Charles Dasher, and Company B, Captain William Bruch, were ordered to report at their armory on Weber Avenue at 8 o'clock, Sunday, May 8, there to await the arrival by train from the south of Company C of Fresno, Capt. George O. Duncan; Company E, Visalia, Capt. George W. Stuart, and Company H from Merced, Capt. Art. S. Guthrie. While Companies A and B were in waiting, Frank Cutting, in behalf of his father, Louis M. Cutting, presented them a handsome regimental flag, manufactured from the first silk made into cloth in California. Between three and four o'clock thousands of citizens began assembling on the Hunter Street square to bid farewell to the militia. It was quite late when the train arrived from the south and began their march to the steamer landing. As the companies under the command of Col. Will R. Johnson boarded the steamer there were cheers and some tears, for many wives, mothers and sweethearts thought that perhaps never again would they see their loved ones. The men were sent to the barracks at the Presidio, San Francisco, expecting to be sent to the Philippine Islands. But the war was of such short duration—August, 1898—that Johnson's command did not ever smell war powder, and they returned to Stockton, in September, a very disappointed body of soldiers. In this war in which the United States Navy played so important a part, the flight of the battleship Oregon, from San Francisco to Santiago harbor was one of the most remarkable events of naval history. MacMasters, the historian, says it was "the swiftest, longest voyage ever made by a battleship." A pupil of the eighth grade of the public school, Lester Gnekow, several years later, reading of the wonderful event, wrote the following descriptive rhyme.

As she steamed on through the Golden Gate,
She courtesied to the swell,
And the Californians said "Good-by"
To the ship they loved so well.

Her prow to the southward she turned,
When she reached the ocean blue,
How fiercely her fires burned,
As on and on she flew.

She raced along o'er the ocean's breast,
A battleship sailing alone,
For her famous deed we love her best,
The brave old dauntless Oregon.

The waters parted as she flew through,
Often clouds obscured the sun,
But in sunshine or storm the brave ship
Stayed on the world's famous run.

A hostile fleet might heave into sight,
But did she falter? Nay!
On, on, she went both day and night,
Like a phantom ship in her coat of gray.

"On! On!" was the cry of the brave crew,
Northward now the ship sails.
"We must be there where shells fall like hail!"
"We must be there when the battle is fought!"

The story is now upon all lips,
Yet, since then many years have gone,
But undying fame our nation won,
By that matchless race of the Oregon.

President McKinley's Visit

We who live in California are greatly handicapped in one respect, namely, that of hearing the great vocalists, operas, lecturers and brainiest men of the nation, occasionally only, because of our great distance from the centers of population. In the East and Middle West it is no uncommon sight to see the President of the United States, but in Stockton we have seen but one President during his term of office, William McKinley. President McKinley came to California principally on account of his wife's health. They left Washington April 29, 1901, and arrived at Los Angeles over the southern route May 8. He arrived at San Francisco May 14 and was the guest of Henry Scott. Along his entire route he received a splendid but quiet ovation, for orders had been given that there be no noisy demonstration or firing of cannon. The life of his wife went up and down like the flickering of a candle and finally his physicians told him to hasten back home as soon as possible. He had then been in the state sixteen days and great preparations had been made in Stockton to receive him. The Presidential coaches were routed for Washington by the way of Stockton, and May 25 word was received that the train bearing the President and party would arrive at 1:35 p. m. and depart at 2:05. Excursion trains had been run by the Southern Pacific from all parts of the surrounding country and long before the hour named there were probably 10,000 people at the depot. A small platform had been erected by the side of the track, from which it was expected that the President would briefly address the people. By some mistake or mismanagement this plan failed. As the train slowly moved into the depot, the immense crowd were undecided what to do; whether to loudly cheer the President or remain silent because of the severe illness of Mrs. McKinley, and a suppressed cheer was given. Before the train had ceased to move the President and his secretary, George B. Cortelyou, appeared upon the rear platform. Immediately Rev. W. C. Evans, one of the reception committee, and who knew the President in his home town, Canton, Ohio, pushed his way through the press and ascending the platform welcomed McKinley. He asked the President to speak a few words to the multitude there to welcome him. He consented, then hesitated, and as the tears filled his eyes he replied, "I cannot do it," for perhaps his wife lay dying within the sound of his voice. Cortelyou then stepped forward and said in a commanding voice, "The President will not speak." In the meantime Mayor Harrison, Frank D. Nichol and Fred M. West, also of the reception committee, had succeeded in reaching the platform, and they were introduced to the President by the Rev. W. C. Evans. Before the introduction was concluded the train began slowly moving over the rails, much to the astonishment of the people, and before many of them realized it the train was speeding onward. There was a great disappointment for thousands had never seen the President. Many of them had come many miles and they failed to get even a glimpse of him because of the crowd. They were packed in solid for 300 feet around the rear platform.

Less than four months later the citizens of Stockton were startled on the morning of September 6, 1901, by the associated dispatch that the President was shot by a Polish anarchist and dangerously wounded while, holding a reception at the Pan-American Exposition at Buffalo. Thousands of citizens were in line shaking hands with the President and as he extended his hand to the assassin he drew a revolver from his left hand pocket and shot the President in the abdomen. The President died September 14 and his last words were, "Good-by. It is God's way. His will be done." Services were held the following Sunday in the Baptist and Christian Churches in memoriam, the auditoriums being draped in crepe. On the morning of the funeral a special mass celebration was held in the Catholic Church and memorial services in the Jewish Synagogue, and the German Lutheran Church. It was decided by the patriots of California to hold the memorial services at the same date as the funeral services in Canton, Ohio, September 16. On that day thirteen guns were fired at sunrise, a Presidential salute of thirty-one guns at noon, and a national salute of forty-five guns at sunset. Guns were also fired every half hour during the day. "With flags folded and wreathed in crepe, to the music of muffled drum, and the wailing of dirges and whilst the bells tolled a mournful requiem a procession such as Stockton never saw before moved in solemn mien, and measured steps through the streets of the city." The memorial exercises were held in the pavillion, which was decorated in the colors of mourning. A large chorus were present, under the direction of Miss Gertrude Elliott. The program opened with Chopin's funeral march by A. Clarke Blossom's orchestra; scripture reading, Rev. J. W. Lundy; prayer, Rev. R. H. Sink; chorus, America; address, E. I. Jones, McKinley, the Citizen and Lawyer; address, Frank D. Nichol, McKinley, the Soldier and Statesman; chorus, "Nearer My God to Thee," the President's favorite hymn. The words were chanted to him just previous to his death. Address, Rev. W. C. Evans, "McKinley, the Christian"; Rev. Thomas A. Boyer, benediction, bugle signal, Lights Out, by Sergeant Burk of Rawlins Post, G. A. R.

Torpedo Boats Visit Stockton

One of the most extraordinary events in the state occurred July 3, 1909, when four of "Uncle Sam's" fighting craft anchored in Stockton

Channel. It was the first time that vessels of that class had ever ran up the inland waters, and it proved conclusively that ocean-going craft—the Lawrence drew fourteen feet of water—could reach this city. The Chamber of Commerce got in touch with the commandant at Mare Island and succeeded in having the flotilla ordered to Stockton. A general committee was appointed to make arrangements for the events and Frank Guernsey and George S. Melone were appointed as a reception committee to go to Sausalito and escort the fleet to this city. The four boats under the command of Lieutenant H. E. Howe and Ben Jarvis as pilot left Antioch on the morning of July 3 and arrived at 4 o'clock P. M. The steamer McDonald, with a band of music on board and a large number of citizens, steamed down the river, and met the flotilla at Wakefield's landing. As she passed each boat the steamer dipped her flag, the band playing and the fleet responded by dipping their flags. At the mouth of Stockton Channel, the gateway to the city, as it was called, the McDonald blew a long blast on her whistle. All the whistles in the city began tooting and the bells ringing, and immediately an immense crowd began hurrying to the wharf. As the four boats moved up the channel, the flagship Lawrence leading, and the Farragut, Goldsborough and Davis trailing at a distance of 400 yards apart, it was a thrilling sight. The crowd cheered and cheered until they were hoarse, and even after the boats were tied to the wharf they continued cheering. The flotilla remained here until July 10 and visitors were permitted on board every day. Over 20,000 persons, men and women and children visited the boats, from the boiler room to the pilot house, and everything was explained to them by the jackies. During their visit 160 of the number were given shore leave at the same time and were tendered a banquet at Oak Park, free rides on the street cars and free swimming at the Mineral Baths, now just purchased by the city. A dance was also tendered them in Masonic Hall. The officers were entertained at the Yosemite House by the general committee. The entire command were in line in the parade of July 4 and in their line formation they moved as one man. On the morning of July 10 the order was given to cast off and in less than two minutes every boat was in the middle of the stream on the way to Antioch. The Davis, the smallest boat, in command of Lieutenant John W. Lewis, shot away like an arrow at a thirty mile an hour speed. The other boats were in charge of three pilots from the California Navigation and Improvement Company, as the Lawrence grounded on a sand bar in rounding one of the points, and lost one of her propeller blades. There was a delightful sequel to this visit of the torpedo boats for in the following year, on May 12, Lieutenant Lewis of the Davis was married to Lenora Musto, a daughter of the pioneer merchant, Peter Musto.

The Liberty Bell

One of the precious relics of the Revolutionary War, the old Liberty Bell, now resting in the state house at Philadelphia. This bell rang out the thrilling news on the afternoon of July 4, 1776, that Congress had signed the immortal document, the Declaration of Independence. On this bell are inscribed the words, "Proclaim liberty through all the land unto all the inhabitants thereof." The Philadelphians cherish this bell with an almost sacred devotion, and although tens of thousands of persons have visited it, they would not permit the bell to be taken from its first surroundings until the Panama Exposition at San Francisco in 1915. At that time a Pennsylvania building was erected upon the grounds, and the guardians of the bell permitted its transportation across the continent to San Francisco. The bell was badly cracked and to prevent any further injury, from the vibration of the train, a special gondola car was built for its transportation. The train of six coaches containing all of the officials of Philadelphia was routed to the Exposition over the Southern Pacific by the way of Stockton, but although arrangements had been made for the detention of the special train, all along the route no arrangements had been made for its detention here. Finally some citizens and the Chamber of Commerce got busy and the time schedule was changed for the stopping here of the train for one-half hour. The train arrived July 16 at 5:50 o'clock P. M., one hour late because of the immense crowd at Sacramento. Long before that hour the track at the depot was jammed with a crowd of at least 20,000 people, and the late comers could not get within a half a block of the car. The Stockton and Moose bands were on hand to salute the bell and a reception committee comprising Mayor Richard P. Reibenstein, Mrs. Herman C. Meyers from the Philomathean club, Charles K. Tower from the Rotary club, Mrs. J. D. Young from the Daughters of the American Revolution, and Raymond Miller from the Merchants' Association to receive and entertain the party but there was no time for receptions. As soon as the train stopped Miss Loraine Klack, the president of the Native Daughters, stepped aboard the open car and placed a wreath of laurel on the bell, she making a few appropriate remarks. There was no further ceremony, and at the expiration of the allotted time the special sped on to the Exposition grounds.

Readers, did you note the inscription on the Liberty Bell, "Proclaim liberty through all the land?" Two years later the "Sons of Liberty" were fighting on French soil that powerful nation, a Bismarkian United Germany, for the freedom of the world. In that terrible time San Joaquin County lost ninety-one of her loyal sons, two in airplane accidents, twelve from wounds, twenty-two from disease, twenty-five from various causes and twenty-five in action. Westley Allen Stone was the first San Joaquin boy to fall in action and his body was brought home to rest in his native soil, and he was buried with the honors of a loyal soldier. Where he fell thousands died and by the poem of Lieut.-Col. John McCrae we hear them say:

In Flanders' fields the poppies grow
Between the crosses, row on row,
That mark our place, and in the sky
The larks, still bravely singing, fly,
Scarce heard amid the guns below.

We are the dead. Short days ago
We lived, felt dawn, saw sunset glow,
Loved and were loved, and now we lie
In Flanders' fields.

Early in November, 1918, the Germans, to save their capital from destruction for the allied troops, with the Americans in the lead, were fast closing on Berlin, raised the white flag and armistice was declared. This indicated the end of the war and as soon as the news was received in Stockton, "Pandemonium broke forth, and the people went wild." The news spread like wildfire and in a few minutes all of the whistles of the factories and steamboats were blowing and the bells of the city ringing out the good news. The foremen of factories gave their men a half holiday and in their working clothes they came upon the streets to learn as quickly as possible the full particulars. At 11:30 the fire department was on the streets parading and until 1:30 the entire force of the Holt Manufacturing Company were marching the streets in their working outfits, the women carrying flags and the men setting off firecrackers and firing revolvers. An hour later there was a citizen impromptu procession, and led by the Sampson Factory band, the Home Guards, High School Cadets and hundreds of citizens passed through the streets cheering and dancing. It was a parade aimless in its character, but it served to relieve the high tension of the people's nerves during the previous two years.

The Home Welcoming

Weep as we may for the heroes slain, yet we rejoice that so many were spared to return to their loved ones and friends, and Governor Stephens proclaimed November 11, 1919, as an "Armistice Day," a time to welcome home the boys. To celebrate the day in a becoming manner $3,000 was raised by subscriptions, the money to be used in paying for parade expenses, a barbecue for the ex-soldiers and sailors, fireworks and dancing. The parade was formed on Hunter Street with Frank Boggs as grand marshal and Dr. S. W. Hopkins, E. W. Drury, J. P. Watkins and M. P. Shaughnessy as aids. It was very appropriate that these men, as members of the city and county exemption board, had sent the boys to war, and now they led the procession and welcome them home. The parade comprised the Home Guards, Rawlins Post, G. A. R., the Woman's Relief Corps, Veterans of Foreign Wars, Union Band, Spanish War Veterans, Marine Band, Boy Scouts, Red Cross service nurses, Gold Star float, soldiers of the Army and Navy. The exercises were held in the T. & D. theater, Col. Charles E. Stanton of General Pershing's staff making the principal address. Upon the stage with him were the members of Rawlins Post, the Women's Relief Corps, and Mayor Alexander Oullahan, who made the opening address. At twelve o'clock the soldiers and marines were given a barbecue picnic at Oak Park, and over 1,600 were fed. During the afternoon, in behalf of the Woman's Relief Corps, Mrs. Celia Klack, the president, presented a beautiful American flag to Karl Ross Post, American Legion. Warren Atherton received it for the Post.

CHAPTER XIX

HISTORY AND PROGRESS OF EDUCATION

ALTHOUGH Stockton, along civic lines had not progressed very rapidly, she has made splendid progress along educational lines in the erection of handsome and convenient buildings for school purposes, employing an efficient corps of teachers, and the encouragement of education in every possible way. From the earliest history of the city we find men giving their time and money for the education of the boys and girls not only in public but in religious schooling. The first attempt to establish a school was made by Charles M. Blake, who later became a geologist. To assist him in his laudable efforts, Capt. Charles M. Weber, at a cost of some $600, erected a small schoolroom on Main Street, where later was located Hale's Dry Goods Store. He was unable to establish a school, there being only a few children in the town, and went to San Jose, where he was more successful. The small school which Weber built was later used as a Presbyterian parsonage until the erection of the brick church. In the following spring, 1851, through the efforts of several liberal minded citizens, namely Edward Canavan, R. S. Ellsworth, Dr. Richard P. Ashe, and Dr. Christopher Grattan, a public school was established. Dr. William P. Hazelton, a dentist by profession, was induced to take charge of the school. The parents of children were given notice of the school by the following advertisement in August, 1851: "The public are informed that free public school is opened in the Academy building, where all orderly children, of suitable age, may receive instruction free of charge." The teacher in his report to the state superintendent said: "All children are admitted whether they pay or not, a small amount being subscribed by citizens towards defraying somewhat the expenses of the school." Dr. Hazelton, in his report to the state superintendent of instruction, John G. Marvin, said: "There are but two schools in the county and they are at Stockton." "The one under my charge was opened about a year ago. The whole number of children who have attended during that time is 116; average weekly attendance, 31; whole number of males, 76; whole number of females, 40. The other school has been open only two or three months. The teachers report eight scholars in attendance. In my school the scholars are admitted free. The result of this arrangement has been to nearly double the previous number of scholars in school; a large majority are from the Western states." Dr. Hazelton's school was of short duration as he was compelled to give it up on account of poor health.

In the meantime a Mrs. Newman an English lady, quaint but well educated, established a school in the South Methodist church and declared herself as "The Pioneer Educator of San Joaquin," and she stated "She was prepared to receive a few lady boarders." Soon after this Rev. W. G. Ganders opened a school in the Christian church on San Joaquin Street near Weber Avenue. Rev. John B. Saxton, who founded the Baptist church, married a former schoolteacher, and his wife brought with her from the East a number of school books, with the idea of opening a private school, and in March, 1853, she announced: "The subscriber wishes to inform her friends and the public that she will open a select school for young ladies in the Baptist church on Monday, the 4th of April next. From her long experience in teaching and the fact that only a limited number of pupils will be admitted she hopes to give entire satisfaction." Three months later Mrs. Clara F. Woods, the wife of Isaac Woods, a brother to the pastor of the Presbyterian church, announced "a select school of young ladies" in the new school room on the north side of the slough, in which the usual branches of the English language will be taught. In the meantime the public free school was established and Mrs. Woods was induced by the school trustees to give up her private school and take charge of the girls' public school. Her private school was then continued by Miss Mary Kroh, the eldest daughter of the Rev. Henry Kroh. After a time Mrs. Woods resigned and Miss Kroh was induced to fill her place. The pioneer schoolhouse, where now the Washington school is located, was vacant until 1855, when Miss Sarah Hutchinson announced, "A select school will open this morning, August 1, at 9 o'clock in the building formerly occupied by Miss Mary Kroh for a similar purpose."

In the earlier days there was a tendency among some of the Christian denominations to establish sectarian schools, and the Presbyterians opened a school in the church in August, 1852, and called it the "Stockton Female Seminary." The trustees, C. G. Rynerson, C. W. Phelps, Henry A. Crabb and Samuel C. Grove, were all Presbyterians. The Methodists then established a school for boys under the name of the "Stockton Academy." The school was located at the corner of Market and San Joaquin streets, where the Lafayette school was located. The Stockton Academy was soon moved to Sutter Street and girls were then admitted to the school. Many of the better class preferred to send their children to private schools because of the bad repute for several years of the public schools. The children of the public schools were composed of all classes, American, Irish, German, Jews and Mexicans. There were at the time no Japanese in the city. Many of these families were dirty and filthy, and the children were no better; they would lie, steal, use vile language, scribble on the walls and send obscene notes to the girls. It was not surprising that many parents sent their children, especially their girls, to private schools or seminaries. Another class, anxious to educate their children, permitted them to select their own schools, and the writer attended the public school, and Collins and Van Doren's seminary all within the space of two years. As there was a change of books, teachers and classes in each school a scholar did not make much headway. The first seminary in the county was established in the Henrietta House, the locality later being known first as Collegeville and now Eight Mile Corners. The announcement declared, "The first session of the San Joaquin Female Seminary will commence the first Wednesday in October, 1855, under the direction of Mr. D. A. Morris. It is located on the road leading from Stockton to Mokelumne Hill, in a retired and healthful location, and is a comfortable and pleasant home. As this is the only female seminary in this section of the State, it should be well patronized." This college was in existence as late as September, 1867. The proprietor stating that "The San Joaquin College, situated on the Mariposa road, eight miles from Stockton, is proverbial for the salubrity of its climate. The faculty consists of the following: Rev. John Wheeler, president; J. J. McConnell, H. Z. Morris, A. B.; L. R. Chalmers, M. D.; Mrs. N. J. Miller and Mrs. M. Neumiller, teachers. Thirty pupils are now enlisted and twenty more will arrive in a few days."

The Stockton Female Seminary

In September, 1858, Dr. Cyrus Collins, a Maine Yankee, conceived the project of founding a seminary where the scholars might have the advantage of an education higher than that taught in the public schools. He interested in the project as trustees such reputable citizens as Dr. E. S. Holden, B. W. Bours, P. Edward Connor, Jeremiah Sarles, Dr. Christopher Grattan and Andrew Wolf, Austin Sperry, John M. Buffington and Henry H.

Hewlett. Purchasing the block of land on which is now located the Congregational Church and erecting a two-story brick building, he stated, "The edifice is new and built especially for this purpose." During the high water there was a running stream through the southeast corner of the block into McLeod's Lake, and on the same ground there was a pretty grove of small oak trees. The first session of the school was opened in March, 1859, for a five-month term ending in July. For a term the fees were: "Board and room, tuition, English branches, $150; tuition in common English, $30; with natural science and higher mathematics, $40; piano or guitar, $50; ancient or modern language, $25; drawing and painting, $25; boarding pupils must provide their own bedroom furniture. At the end of the term a two days' examination was held and a visitor stated that "much proficiency was displayed by the young ladies in the higher branches as well as in the ordinary studies. The examination will continue today and it is hoped that Dr. Collins and his lady will be greeted by a large number of visitors." On that evening the young ladies gave a ball in the school room, for the purpose of obtaining money to purchase a school library. The officers of the seminary library association were Mary Buffington, president; Maggie McLellan, vice-president; Mattie Sanders, secretary, and Sarah Hammond, treasurer; Mary Patrick, librarian. The membership fee was one dollar or books equivalent to that amount. In time they "collected quite a goodly sized library." Dr. Collins and his wife conducted this seminary until 1861. At that time he was elected county superintendent of schools, in the Republican sweep of that year, and the seminary was leased to Dr. William Van Doren.

William Van Doren was a professor of mathematics in Wentworth College, Missouri, but was compelled to leave the state because of his Union proclivities. Coming to California he first located in Napa, but, hearing of Dr. Collins' seminary, he came to Stockton and leasing the building advertised, "The Stockton seminary lately occupied by Dr. Cyrus Collins would be opened on Monday, March 2, 1863, as a first class boarding and day school for young ladies and boys." Under his management this seminary became a historic building of national importance because of the fact that Thomas B. Reed, later speaker of the House of Representatives was for a few months one of the teachers. Reed, a graduate of Bowdoin College, Maine, came to California looking for work. How he came to visit Stockton and met Dr. Van Doren I know not, but he was engaged to teach mathematics and Latin.

He was a big awkward fellow about twenty-two years of age, big head, hands and feet and homely. The girl pupils began making fun of him the first day he entered the school room. It was his custom to open and read his letters during school hours and well do I remember St. Valentine's day, '64, I think it was. Reed began opening his letters, the girls watching him. Opening one letter, he turned red in the face and quickly tore it up and threw it into the waste basket, while throughout the room the girls snickered. It was a comic valentine of a teacher in school. Reed was very hot tempered and so bashful that he scarcely ever spoke to one of his girls outside of school hours, and, as I have stated, he was the butt of many jokes. He taught school a few months only and then, resigning, began the study of law in one of the Stockton law offices. He at that time had some kind of political pull, for, returning to the East, we learned that he had been appointed a clerk in the Washington Navy Yard Department. After that he was elected to Congress and finally became speaker of the House, ruling it for several years with a dictatorial hand. The Democrats tried in every manner possible to dethrone him, and Reed was known throughout the country as "Czar Reed." He never forgot Stockton and whenever a Stocktonian visited Washington he was treated with the greatest courtesy. When Marion De Vries was elected to Congress in 1896 Speaker Reed was very courteous to him, although a Democrat, because he was from Stockton, and materially assisted the Stocktonian in obtaining his first government position. Resigning at the end of the school term, June, 1864, Reed suggested that Professor Van Doren send East and engage as a teacher William E. Green. He arrived in Stockton before the opening of the fall term and Professor Van Doren announced that the fall term of the school would open September 4, 1864, with W. E. Green as teacher of mathematics, Mattie and Mary Van Doren as teachers of the English branches; Nellie Whitney, then the organist in the Episcopal Church, as teacher of piano, and Professor Wilson, teacher of vocal music. William Green was the exact antithesis of Reed. He was tall and slim, cool and calculating and a good disciplinarian. It took him several weeks to discipline his pupils, but he succeeded. I know, for he stood me up in the corner of the schoolroom one day, facing the wall. Greene taught school about a year and then began studying law with John C. Byers. He then was nominated for county judge in 1867 on the Republican ticket, and was elected. Marrying Isabelle Webster, one of his former pupils, he removed to Alameda County. He was elected a county judge and remained in office until his death about twenty years later.

Dr. Hunt's Seminary

Dr. Hunt, an ordained Methodist preacher, taught school for many years in the South. He was opposed to slavery, however, and in 1859 came to Stockton from Tennessee. He purchased the block of land cornering on the northwest intersection of El Dorado and Park streets, and erecting a two-story brick building opened "Hunt's Female Seminary." The school was in a prospering condition for several years, but improvement in the public schools, and the coming of the Central Pacific Railroad caused a loss of scholars and in 1873 the school was closed. At that parents began sending their girls to Mills Seminary in Alameda County, others going to the State University. Several of the Episcopalians sent their boys to a sectarian military school at Benicia. Dr. Hunt, beside teaching school, raised fruit, and he had a large number of fruit trees in the block. The trees were watered by a singular contrivance at the corner of El Dorado and Park Street. There was considerable water in the channel left over from the winter and spring freshets, and by small revolving buckets he would lift the water by turning a crank and it would flow into the water troughs and be conducted to any part of the garden. Soon after the closing of the school Mr. Hunt died and the block was sold and cut up into building lots. Charles Belding, the soda manufacturer, purchased the property, and building a handsome residence on El Dorado Street, used a part of the seminary building as a stable.

St. Agnes Academy and Catholic Schools

The first Catholic school was on the corner of Sutter and Lafayette streets, St. Clair Lever being the teacher, but it failed for want of patronage. In 1865 a second school was opened with Mary O'Donnell as teacher. In this school was Seraphine Bosche, formerly one of the brightest pupils in M. J. Ryan's class in the public. In later years she became very devout and in August, 1878, she entered St. Catherine's Convent at Benicia. In 1884 a boys' school was contemplated, and at Father O'Connor's solicitation four Brothers came from Dayton, Ohio, to take charge of the Brother's school. In the meantime, the old Catholic church was remodeled and fitted up as a school and Brothers' residence and in August, 1884, it was dedicated and consecrated by Bishop Riordan. In the morning he performed high mass, with Professor Dohrmann at the organ, Lottie Crawford of St. Patrick's Church, singing the Ave Maria. In the afternoon the school was dedicated at its close, the Bishop giving a scholarly address on the Catholic view of the school question. Some years ago the old Catholic Church was torn down to make room for a two-story brick building. It was erected on the church property facing San Joaquin Street and the building is used as a boys' school, with Weber hall in the north end of the second story. Eight years previous to the establishing of the Brother's school, Father O'Connor planned the establishing of a girls' academy, with Sisters of Charity in charge. Captain Weber was approached upon the subject and as he was then tearing down the old Corinthian building all the available lumber was hauled to the proposed site of the new academy building. A number of the Sisters were sent to Stockton, and they collected the necessary building fund, $20,000. The building was finished in due time and St. Agnes Academy was dedicated and consecrated March 17, 1876. In the morning there was high mass, the Stockton cornet band taking part in the musical service. Immediately after mass a procession was formed and the Ancient Order of Hibernians, led by the band, marched to the building near the Santa Fe depot. The building was consecrated by Bishop Alemany. The location of the school on the corner of San Joaquin and Taylor streets was quite satisfactory until 1896. Then came the Santa Fe Railroad, and the constant din of ringing bells and the blowing of whistles made it a very undesirable place either for a schoolroom or a place of residence for the Sisters. In 1913 a quarter of a block of land was purchased on the corner of San Joaquin and Park streets and a handsome school building was erected at a cost of $60,000. Some two or three years ago an adjoining building was erected, adjoining the school on the south as a residence for the Dominican Sisters, who have charge of the academy.

State Public School Law

The constitutional convention of 1849 provided for the establishment of a system of public schools by the legislature by which a school should be kept open at least three months in each year in each district. It also provided for a revenue from the sale of school lands. School lands at that time were of no value and none were sold, and John G. Marvin, state superintendent, said in his report, "The legislature of 1851 made no provisions for the support of schools. The following legislature, that of 1852, made a provision in the revenue law that five cents of the thirty cents tax imposed on each $100 of property should be set aside for the benefit of the public schools." The law also declared that in incorporated cities, the public schools should have a continuous session of at least three months before receiving state assistance. San Francisco and Sacramento at once took the benefit of the act and established public schools.

Organization of Public Schools

The movement for a system of public schools in Stockton was started in October, 1852, by V. M. Peyton, who may justly be hailed as the Father of the Stockton schools. The city charter provided that the city council should have charge of the public school affairs and they conducted the schools, through a board of education appointed by them for several years. The board of education now are elected by the votes of the people and they have full control over all school affairs. V. M. Peyton, who at that time was a member of the Council, was very enthusiastic over the question of schools, and he endeavored to persuade his fellow-councilmen to establish public schools. They were unfavorable to such actions because there was no money in the treasury for school purposes, and the school law required that a school must be maintained for three months before it could receive state assistance. Finally Mr. Peyton put his hand in his own pocket and drew forth a slug and throwing it upon the table he exclaimed, "There is $50 to start this thing." His fellow-councilmen, not to be outdone in generosity, each contributed a like amount and $500 was the result. They appointed a committee to obtain contributions from the citizens and another $500 was soon obtained. The next question was "Where will we get teachers?" After considerable persuasion, Rev. W. G. Canders agreed to take charge of the boys' school and Mrs. Isaac Woods, agreed to give up her private school and take charge of the girls. All arrangements were completed and February 26, 1853, the following notice appeared, "The Stockton City free schools will commence their first session Monday, February 28. The male department at the Stockton Academy in the Presbyterian Church under the charge of the Rev. W. G. Canders. The female department will be in charge of Mrs. Isaac (Clara F.) Woods in a room near the second Main Street bridge." This room was in the second story of a wooden building where now stands the Wilhoit building on Main Street. For some reason, probably for want of teachers, the schools were not opened until Tuesday, March 1, 1853. The schools were established under an ordinance drawn up by V. M. Peyton, which provided for the appointment of a census marshal to report November 1, and the appointment also of a board of school commissioners to have charge of the schools, selecting teachers, providing schoolrooms, and other matters. The council appointed the Rev. J. W. Kelly, pastor of the South Methodist Church; V. M. Peyton, a merchant, and Dr. George A. Shurtleff, as school commissioners, and Dr. E. B. Bateman as city school superintendent. In September the board of commissioners reported to the common council as follows: "The first quarter has expired under the most favorable auspices, the male department, under the direction of Dr. Candors, and the female department, during the first quarter under the direction of Mrs. Clara Woods and for the second under the direction of Miss Kerr. The average attendance in each school has been from thirty-five to forty, making in the aggregate about eighty scholars who are attending school." The teachers at that time taught school more from a philanthropic rather than a money standpoint. In the girls' school the principal received $150 and the second teacher $100 per month. Dr. Candors also received $100 per month, "but the teachers of both schools," said the superintendent, "have agreed with the board to wait until the expiration of the present year for their salaries. At that time they will be entitled to the pay of two quarters." There was at that time in the school treasury $37.90 in coin and $350 in scrip worth about 50 cents on the dollar. They owed $166.50 for salary and schoolroom rent. The council, meeting in the city hall for the first time January 3, 1854, received a report from the state superintendent that there was in the state treasury $1,677.99 to their credit from the school fund.

The individual who has no standard from which to judge the improved conditions in which he may be living cannot fully appreciate the comforts and conveniences he may enjoy. So with the school children of today, who are instructed in handsome architectural designed buildings in large well-lighted and well-ventilated schoolrooms, and with every modern convenience, they cannot have any conception of the school buildings in which their parents and friends were taught their A, B, C's. The Stockton Academy, noted in previous pages, stood on Market and San Joaquin streets, later the site of the Lafayette school. It was a one-story cloth and paper building, suffocating in summer and cold in winter. There was not a shrub tree or blade of grass about the place, not even a fence to keep out the dogs, cattle and hogs that then roamed over the city. The conditions were somewhat improved in July, 1854, by the council ordering that a board fence be constructed around the school grounds. At this time the school was occupied by the boys' department, the girls' school being in a little room on Main Street in the second story of a dwelling house. The city was rapidly growing and the number of children increased so fast that it became necessary to obtain more room for the girls' department.

The council committee on schools reported: "That they had visited the school and found the room now occupied by the female department entirely inadequate to the purpose and that the building being occupied by the male department being situated on the street is subject to many inconveniences, but think it may be removed to answer." As the result of this report the girl's school was removed to the academy building and a new schoolroom rented for the boys. The cheaply constructed building soon became unfit for use and Mrs. Jessie Ryan Hollenbeak, in describing it in her "History of the Public Schools of Stockton," said: "The building was of the '49 order of architecture, a flimsy structure containing two rooms separated by cloth partitions, through which noise of one classroom passed to the next, and which were the source of much amusement to the pupils because they could thrust pins through into the next room." Mayor Bours, in his farewell address, 1859, said: "During the past year a beautiful and commodious school house has been erected for the boys. It is to be hoped that a similar or better building will soon follow for the girls." The board of education in March, 1863, reported to the council that the building occupied by the intermediate schools, corner of Market and San Joaquin streets, was totally unfit for the accommodation of the children, "as the roof leaked in several places and the rooms are small, unhealthy and overcrowded, 140 children being taught in two rooms. The primary school, corner Weber Avenue and San Joaquin Street, is even worse crowded, as in a room 18 by 20 feet seventy-five pupils are huddled." The old building remained in use as a school until 1864, then some public-spirited individual set fire to the old rat trap and it was destroyed.

Stockton's First Public School Building

The girls occupying the Academy Building, two rooms were rented for the boys in the McNish Building, corner of Hunter and Channel streets. This building had previously been used as a courthouse, lawyers' office, a printing office and a jail. It was not a very suitable place for a school, as adjoining the building the forty or fifty hogs and pigs belonging to the Magnolia Hotel, fighting and squealing, constantly disturbed the recitations of the scholars. The location was so unpleasant and unsanitary that the matter was referred to a council committee who reported: "The present location of the schools is a disgrace to the city, an outrage on the community. We recommend that the council abolish the entire system or provide at once a suitable building for the comfort and health of both teachers and scholars." This severe criticism was unjust for as a matter of fact the city at that time had no money to build school buildings. The boys' school was then removed to a two-story building, corner of Market and Sutter streets, now the site of the Masonic Temple. The building had been used as a lodging house overhead and a blacksmith shop on the first floor. To reach the second story of the schoolroom the scholars were compelled to climb rickety stairs outside of the building. In cold weather it was almost impossible to keep warm, so many were the cracks and crevices. The boys' grades were taught in this building about a year, when they were removed to a building at the corner of Main and Sutter streets, which had formerly contained a butcher shop in the first story and a lodging house in the second story. This building also was condemned by the general public. "For a long time the board of education discussed the building of a schoolhouse and in August, 1858, they concluded that they had sufficient money and by a vote they selected a lot on Center and Washington streets as the location, and October 14 work was commenced. The building then constructed still stands on the Franklin school lot, having been in constant use up to 1900. It was a substantial building of brick, two stories high and containing two large rooms as well as cloak rooms, a model building for that time. With the completion of the building, the public schools were housed beneath a roof of their own. The joy of the event was considered worthy of a public demonstration. On February 25, 1859, the change to the new building was made, amid much rejoicing, the boys to whom the good fortune fell of occupying the new building, marched to their new home headed by the Stockton Cornet Band, which had volunteered their services for the occasion. At the school, the boys were received by the board of education and appropriate exercises followed, in which the president of the board and the mayor of the city made addresses.

The first boards of school commissioners were compelled to employ as teachers such persons as would accept the positions, regardless of their qualifications. Dr. W. G. Canders, a Christian minister, was a bachelor, and lived in the rear of the church, cooked his own meals, taught school five days in the week and preached on Sunday. He was a sick man and in August, 1856, he died of consumption. His associate, who taught the boys' primary school at the same time, was L. C. Van Allen. He resigned, bought out a book store, years later owned by Sidney Newell, and in 1859 was elected county superintendent of schools. In '54 the school commissioners called for proposals for teaching the public schools from February 1, evidently seeking any teachers at the lowest price. One of the best teachers of the boys' grammar school was Levi P. Felton, graduate of Massachusetts College. He taught school during the day and then remained up late at night posting up the books of the Baldwin & Sperry Flour Company. He finally resigned his position as teacher, and was succeeded by J. C. Carleton. In a newspaper article Carleton lampooned some of the higher ups of the town, calling them "stiff necks" and then he was called upon to resign. He was an excellent Spanish scholar and gave lessons in Spanish after school hours. In order to fill his place the board advertised for a teacher and the successful applicant was M. J. Ryan of Woodbridge, a graduate of Georgetown College, Washington, D. C. At that time there came an improved condition in the schools, caused by an election of a Republican council. They appointed as school commissioners men of ability, Charles Belding, George W. Tyler and Henry S. Sargent. They required all teachers applying for positions, in the schools to pass an examination, and M. J. Ryan passed a rigid examination in all of the branches. Ryan "queered" himself in less than a year by kissing one of his pupils in the schoolroom during recess. He immediately tendered his resignation. It was accepted and a Mr. Holden appointed in his place. One of the teachers before this time was W. T. A. Gibson. He was a shiftless person with no education, and frequently would go to sleep, but the boys who woke him up would get a good strapping.

Dr. Canders punished the disobedient scholars by tapping them over the knuckles with his cane. Van Allen used a strap, slapping the hand. Felton had a thick piece of leather about eighteen inches in length and two inches in width, and taking them into the side room—he was a young giant in strength—he would take the boy across his knee and use the strap good and plenty. One dose was usually enough for a pupil—I got two. How that boy would yell, and what a thrill it would send amongst the pupils in the room. For poor recitations, Mr. Felton compelled the pupils to remain after school and study the lesson or to recite it the following day. A very conscientious teacher, he would often punish himself by remaining from one to two hours after school to hear recitations. On the other hand the studious pupil with perfect lesson would be dismissed a half hour before the close of school. Dr. Kirkland, another pioneer teacher of the boys, was an eccentric Scotch clergyman. Short and heavy built, he would walk along the streets, wearing his tall beaver hat, with the swing and stride of a prize fighter. In school he would stride quietly along the aisles during study hours, and finding any boy in mischief he would slip up and snap his ear. As time rolled on, there was a large increase of children and teachers. The strap or ferrule was still in use as a means of punishment and some teachers used no judgment in punishing their pupils. The board of education passed a law that no pupil should be punished except in the presence of another teacher. Then the law was changed and the principal punished the disobedient scholar. Sometimes the parents very unwisely carried the case into court when they thought their child had been overly punished. One of such cases occurred at Linden. A teacher named Hammond was charged with having whipped Frank Wasley, one of his pupils so severely with a long leather strap as to bruise and blacken the flesh. The father, Thomas Wasley, complained to the trustees—A. A. Smith, Dr. Hall and Mr. Thomas—and requested that the teacher be discharged, but two of the trustees refused to act. Wasley then had Hammond arrested for assault and battery and tried before Justice Frank T. Baldwin. He was found guilty and fined $20 and costs, $100. He refused to pay the fine, and, his lawyer carrying the case to the county court on habeas corpus proceedings, he was discharged by Judge H. B. Underhill. On October 7, 1878, Charles M. Kenniston, principal of the Franklin school, was tried in the police court on the charge preferred by Mrs. Arrivey. The battery consisted in whipping her son, Frank, for striking another pupil with a glass bottle. Mr. Kenniston was immediately acquitted by the jury. In the '70s there was a pretty tough set of boys attending the Jefferson School on Weber Avenue and another set loafing around the building. They were not as tough as the Center Street school-boys in the '50s, for two of them carried revolvers and some of them carried bowie knives. The Board of Education held a special meeting one evening to adopt or reject a petition signed by fifteen parents, whose children attended the Jefferson School. They requested that J. P. Lillie, a former principal, be reinstated, "as he is the right man in the right place, being the only one for years past who has shown the ability to control the unruly element in that neighborhood." By a vote of 4 to 2 they refused the prayer of the petitioners (December 12, 1876). Later Hugh McNoble, the attorney, was placed in charge of the school and by a little judicious handling he soon quieted affairs.

Mr. Felton's hobby was Colburn's arithmetic and a thorough recital of the multiplication table to 13s. He required us to repeat the tables forward and backward by the watch and answer as quick as he could call the number. It was a splendid drill, and today the writer will repeat any table as fast as he can talk. He was also very thorough in the study of geography, and every pupil was expected to answer any question in the book as to states and capitals, principal towns, locations, productions, boundaries, etc. Kirkland, who was a fine Latin and Greek scholar, insisted above all things the proper use of verbs. A pupil, holding up his hand, would ask Mr. Kirkland, "Can I go out?" With the emphasis on "can" he would answer, "You can go out, but you may not." In a very few lessons the pupils got that auxiliary verb correct. A. H. Randall's hobby was the "reason why" in mathematics, and made the pupil demonstrate by proof regardless of the rule that his answer was correct. Mr. Randall's education, when he took charge of the grammar school, was quite limited and, says George Ladd, he studied the lessons ahead of his classes. Mr. Randall was elected to his position early in 1867. The board of education met in the grammar school, Lafayette Building, one evening, and the secretary, Sidney Newell, read the names of applicants for teachers' positions, among them that of A. H. Randall, who had been teaching at French Camp. Mr. Charles Belding moved that the board proceed to elect a teacher for grammar school, remarking: "We can throw him out if he doesn't fit the bill." He then placed in nomination Mr. A. H. Randall, and he received the unanimous vote of the board, taking his position March 11, 1867. Mr. M. J. Ryan's hobby was system, and he was the first teacher to systemize his class work. The following schedule shows the studies and the time of recitations in his schoolroom in 1862. The method was soon adopted in all of the schools. Fourth reader, 9 to 9:20; history to 9:40; mental arithmetic to 10; spelling to 10:15; writing to 10:30; recess to 10:45; English grammar, 10:45 to 11:05; Monday and Wednesday, algebra to 11:35; geography to 12. Afternoon, first arithmetic, 1 to 1:30; second arithmetic, 1:30 to 2; English grammar to 2:15; recess to 2:30; singing lessons Monday and Wednesday, 2:30 to 3:30. Natural philosophy, Tuesdays and Thursdays, 1:30 to 2:50; rhetoric, Tuesdays and Thursdays, 2:50 to 3:10; philosophy, Tuesdays and Thursdays, 3:10 to 3:30. Latin and geometry recitation after the close of school. That Stockton has ever had the best of teachers is evident from the fact that many resigned to accept higher positions at a higher salary in other county schools. S. G. S. Dunbar, who for eighteen years had been teaching in the public schools, resigned to accept a position in the Durant school, Oakland, and he is still teaching in the Oakland schools. Two other Stockton teachers followed him—S. D. Waterman and S. P. Crawford—and they also engaged in school work until pensioned from old age. "The board of school directors of the State Normal School offered Prof. A. H.

Randall $3,000 a year to become principal of the State Normal School. Mr. Randall was the first principal of the Stockton High School, and he always has been highly esteemed as a man and an educator" (June 2, 1892). The salary was high at that time and Mr. Randall accepted the position and was principal for several years. Now, waiving time, Mrs. Edna Orr James, a proficient teacher in the Stockton school, is now in the Fresno Normal. F. C. Meyers and W. S. Rise, teachers of drawing, both left the city schools to accept positions in the State University. John F. Cooper, from the high school, went to a prominent position in the Berkeley schools. Mrs. Rose V. Winterburn went from the city schools to the Los Angeles Normal, and others might be named who left the Stockton schools for higher positions in other cities.

At the end of each school term public examinations would be held and the parents and friends invited to attend. The teacher would examine the classes in arithmetic, geography and other studies and then invite those present to ask any questions of the pupils regarding their work during the term. In some of these examinations an evening entertainment was given at the close and at an entertainment given in the city hall by L. C. Van Allen's primary grade one youngster created the sensation of the evening. His lisping of the word Demosthenes in the lines beginning, "You'd scarce expect one of my age," so pleased the audience that the men stamped their cowhide boots upon the uncarpeted floor and yelled. Thunder was no comparison, and the orator, screaming with fright, was taken from the platform. It was his first and last appearance upon the stage. The hall was crowded with men, principally, many of them in red shirts with their trousers inside their boots and without coats or vests. On the front seats sat the parents of the little actors. I give the full program, for some of these children are still living in this country—grandfathers and grandmothers: Song by the children. Oration, "America," Sam Norton. Speech, "The Wide West," Samuel Zacariah. "What an Excellent Thing Is Knowledge," Thomas Dillon. "Storm Zephyrs," Charles Ford. "Contrast," John Minges. "California," Ed Curry. "Rolla's Address to Pizarro," Joe Scott. "Water As a Beverage," Alfred Parker. "Creation," Louis Miller. "What I Hate to See," George Wadsworth. Invitations were given to the press by the Board of Education and in November, 1857, the editor of the Republican said, "We attended the examination of the female school under Miss Thomas. They were examined in natural philosophy, arithmetic, music, etc., and she was presented by her pupils with a rug by Mary Blackman, an embroidered coat by Mary Bromeisler and a pair of china vases by Amelia Mersfelder. In 1859 the same editor reported that "there was a pleasant time among the scholars of the public schools yesterday. In the morning Messrs. Gibson and Thaxton gathered their flock together and providing a good supply of fruits they let the youngsters loose upon them to eat their fill." This was in July and fruits were not plentiful as now. The girls and boys were taught in separate schools at this time, and "the girls assembled in the afternoon and with their teacher entertained their parents and friends with an excellent program and a collation. Mr. Peyton, in behalf of the scholars, presented the teacher, Miss Lucy Groves, with a handsome ring."

In the grammar school, there hung upon the walls several axioms, one "Knowledge Is Power" and another "There Is No Excellence Without Great Labor," and some of the teachers gave prizes for the best work of their scholars. At the end of the November term one year in Dr. Gibson's school, prizes were given for the best scholarships. Richard Chadd received three prizes, being the best in arithmetic, spelling and writing. Charles Ray won the prize in reading, Charles Williams and Fred Pennington, arithmetic prizes. George Tinkham, Frank Peachy, Charles Ford won the prizes in spelling. At the close of the contest the scholars presented their teacher with an elegant bound copy of Tupper's works. It was customary to have spelling matches every Friday afternoon after recess. It was the time also for speeches, recitations, essays and dialogues. In 1867 the custom of giving prizes for the best scholarship was abolished, and the percentage system was adopted by the board of education. The innovation was introduced and tried out in the Lafayette Grammar school by A. H. Randall, who two years later organized the high school.

History is the record of the customs, manners and social life of a people as well as their political life, and I am writing of many events and customs of early day because life then was so different from the life of the present. It was the custom at the death of a pupil of the public schools for all of the scholars to attend the funeral. The father of the girl, Thomas Scott, was a whip and harness maker on Main Street near El Dorado, afterwards Cunningham's shop. As a sign Scott had a big whip hanging outside the door. It was twelve feet long and about three inches thick at the butt end, and when a boy, oh, how I longed to possess that whip. My topic, however, was the death of the daughter, Mary Jane, at the age of thirteen years, of consumption. She was a pupil of the grammar school and on the day of the funeral, all the school children assembled and marching to the home, still standing, then outside of the city, on Poplar between El Dorado and Hunter, they followed the hearse to the city cemetery, the block east of the Western Pacific depot, and standing around the grave they sang, "Sister, thou was kind and lovely, Gentle as the summer breeze, Pleasant as the air of evening, When it floats among the trees." In these days typhoid fever carried hundreds of persons throughout California, and one of its victims was Louis M. Hickman, the son of ex-Mayor Hickman, a wealthy landowner and wheat grower. A graduate of the high school in 1881, he later attended the University of the Pacific. He was an especial favorite among the young people and the Presbyterian Church was crowded long before the arriving of the funeral cortege. The altar of the church was literally banked with flowers, and a monogram, L. M. H., also in white flowers rested upon the front of the pulpit, and the coffin was covered with them. After scripture reading, a prayer and a hymn by the choir comprising Gertrude Noble, Mrs. F. C. Gifford, George Ladd, and William Belding, the pastor, J. M. Schofield, delivered an eloquent sermon from the readings from II Samuel, "Oh my son Absalom, would that I had died for thee." The funeral procession was one of the largest ever seen in the city, the hearse being preceded by the Stockton Rifle Cadets of which young Hickman was one of the organizers and the first captain. On either side of the hearse walked the pallbearers, Professor Flourney of the College of the Pacific, Eugene Grunsky, Charles Littlehale, Bert McKee, R. W. Henderson, and Frank West.

The First School Piano

In November, 1856, at the close of the school examinations a school exhibition was given in the Stockton theater for the purpose of purchasing a piano for the girls' grammar school. The exercises began with introductory remarks by Jerome Stockwell. Dialogue, "What I Love Best"—Maggie Buffington, Ada Parker, Lizzie Sargent, Mary Bromeisler, Amelia Mersfelder, Mary Newell. Declamation, Supposed Speech of John Adams"—Master Alonzo, Hatch Fisher. Song, "Moonlight Chorus"—Sung by the First Class of female grammar department. Dialogue, "Baron von Klingenberg"—Capt. Cheston," Master Robert Fisher, "Mrs. Albina Creston," Miss Lucy Lord; "Miss Mertilla Cheston," Miss Cecilia Henderson; "Aunt Quimby," Miss Mary Lording; "Mr. Smith," Frederick Fisher; "Miss Turretville," Miss Ellen Meader; "Miss Lybrand," Miss Mary Buffington; "Mr. Simington," Master Jerome Stockwell; "Baron von Klingenberg," Samuel Mitchell; "Mrs. Blake Bentley," Miss Emma Coates; "Miss Bentley," Miss Annette Parker; "Mr. Beverly," Alonzo Fisher. Declamation, subject, "Address to Lafayette"—Master Frederick Fisher. Song, "Chickadee-dee"—Maggie Buffington, Ada Parker, Emma Davis, Mary Davis, Esther Blackman, Mary Newell, Amelia Mersfelder, Mary Bromeisler, Hannah Levi. Dialogue, "The Broken String"—Esther Blackman, Amelia Mersfelder. Declamation, "Emmett's Defense"—Master Samuel Mitchell. Song, "Hazel Dell," Mary Davis, Ada Parker. Declamation, subject, "Our Country"—Master Jerome Stockwell. Dialogue, "Uncle True"—Robert Fisher; "Willie Sullivan," Benj. Barner; "Gerty," Esther Blackman; "Mrs. Sullivan," Anna Walls. Declamation, "The Mother's Anger"—Frederick Fisher. Dialogue, "The Hard Name"—"Mrs. Smith," Ellen Meader; "Mrs. Jones," Mary Vobe; "Mrs. Brown," Annette Parker; "Betty," Mary Buffington; "Miss Vinegar," Mary Loring; "Miss Willowbough," Cecilia Henderson. Declamation, subject, "Extract from Speech of Webster"—Master Robert Augustus Fisher. Dialogue, "The Lost Maiden"—Robert and Frederick Fisher. Parting Song—By the School. At the close of the performance Mr. Peyton stepped forward and stated the object of the exhibition. As soon as the object was announced a silver shower occasionally interspersed with a golden flake fell upon the stage and it was kept up for nearly ten minutes. The children had a good time gathering up the money and enjoyed the sport greatly. Nearly $700 was received and in this manner the first piano was purchased. The Amelia Mersfelder mentioned in the program is Mrs. Louis Gerlach of this city. Ada Parker became the wife of N. M. Orr of the Stockton Independent, the mother of Mrs. Edna Orr James. Annette Parker was the daughter of R. B. Parker and became the first wife of the late P. B. Fraser. Mary Davis was the late Mrs. E. R. Hedges, and her sister, Emma Davis, became the wife of George Melone and the mother of Captain Melone, Gilbert Melone and Otis Melone. Hannah Levi became the wife of the late Julius Cohn. Anna Walls became Mrs. Henry Barricklo, and Ellen Meader married James Littlehale, at that time first cashier and one of the organizers of the Stockton Savings and Loan Society. Cecilia Henderson was married to William Gray, of Gray & Hickman, early day merchants of this city, and was the mother of Frank Gray, a hotel man of Sacramento. Jerome Stockwell was the son of the late E. R. Stockwell and a cousin of Andrew Mosley of San Francisco. Esther Blackman was the daughter of a clothier and A. H. Fisher was the son of one of the owners of the Fisher stage lines running into the Southern mines.

The holidays of the public schools in the '50s were few in number and far between. The school had no holidays on Washington's birthday until 1859, but the spirit of 1776 was alive amongst the boys. On the afternoon of February 22 a National salute and procession were advertised, and the older boys of Mr. Ryan's school on Center Street rebelled at the idea of study on such a patriotic occasion. A school yard consultation was held among the leaders, the eldest not over fourteen, and they bravely agreed to sign a petition to the school commissioner, V. M. Peyton, asking for a half holiday. The committee of three was appointed and hurrying up town with their written Declaration of Independence, soon found the commissioner. Reading it he broadly smiled and informed the boys that they could have a half holiday. The girls learning of this movement also asked for the same privilege and for the first time the public schools were closed on that day. That document if today preserved would be a considerable historical value; we have the names of the young patriotic signers, namely, Richard V. Chadd, John Gillony, William Pearsall, Will Joiner, Ed Biven, Fred Mingers, Charles Bray, Fred Pennington, Charles Williams (ex-Mayor), John Dallas, Sidney Sutherland and Fred Leffler.

May Day Celebration

The happiest of school days was the May day celebrations from '54 to '62. It was the time of which Tennyson sung in his beautiful poem, "The May Queen." "You must wake and call me early, mother dear, Tomorrow It'll be the happiest time of all the glad New Year. Of all the glad New Year the maddest, merriest day, For I'm to be queen of May, mother, I'm to be queen of the May." The first celebration was held May 3, 1854. The 240 children, 100 of them girls, assembled at the Female Academy on San Joaquin Street and after marching along Main to Center to Weber Avenue to the court house, were there taken in carriages and wagons to Bowen's ranch where the celebration was held. The 66 conveyances comprising buggies, wagons and drays were furnished free by the citizens. Every vehicle in the town was put into use to carry the friends to the grounds on the Lower Sacramento Road, just across the Calaveras River. Then came the crowning of the queen, the children by vote the previous day having chosen as queen Mary Buffington, whose father was city superintendent of schools. There was an address by Thomas Moore, later city assessor, an oration by Jack Brady and a poem by Delia Dwelly.

A second celebration and crowning of a Queen was given May 1, 1855. Great interest was taken, and as the children, some 300 in number, marched the streets, the bells were rung and the cannon fired. It was a beautiful scene, the girls dressed in white, bearing bouquets of flowers, and the boys in black carrying flags. Each school was preceded by a beautiful banner, carried by a lad, with two attendants, and in the floral car, drawn by a pair of bays, sat the Queen. Delia Dwelly (afterwards the wife of R. E. Wilhoit), with Ellen Meader as Lady Hope, and Maggie McLeland as crowner. Marching behind the car was the maids of honor, Elizabeth Manning, (Mrs. Trueman, the kindergarten teacher), Julia Baine, Alice Davis, Anna Walls, Annette Parker, Mary M. Buffington, Cecelia Henderson (Mrs. Gray, deceased), Lucy Lord, Matilda Brown, Mary Coates and Mary Vobbe, and the Floras, Ada Parker, Marie Westbay, Kate Baine, Florence Leffler (Mrs. Lathrop, deceased), Esta Blackman, Ada Van Valkenburg, Caroline Owens, Clarinda Sarles, Emma Davis and Mary Burnett. The streets were filled with people hurrying to the grove near the asylum. Jesse Perkins delivered the salutatory address. After the coronation of the Queen, songs were sung, and games and dinner occupied the time till 4 o'clock, when the closing exercises took place, the following lines being spoken by Cecelia Henderson: Gentlemen, our kind directors, We, our gratitude would show, For this day of mirth and pleasure, And to those who made it so, 'Tis a kind and noble nature, That can throw aside all care—Every thought of mighty business, In our children's sports to share." The children then marched back to town, too tired to accept the offer of the theatrical manager to attend the performance that night.

The excitement over the acts of the Vigilance Committee seems to have absorbed all interest, and children's festivals were out of mind until 1858. In that year a picnic was held in the grove near the residence of Charles F. Whale, and the schools marched to the grove under the escort of the Stockton Blues. The company was then under the command of its newly elected captain, P. E. Conner, and his cool judgment at that time prevented a terrible disaster. Old-timers will remember that across the slough at El Dorado Street was a long, rickety foot bridge, extending from Grissim & Durant's laundry on the south to Wagner's tannery on the north. As the soldiers and the children were crossing the bridge, the company keeping measured steps, the old bridge began to swing to and fro. "Halt!" commanded the Captain, and he stopped the entire procession until the bridge was again motionless. Then giving the order, "Broken time, march!" they all passed over in safety. At the grounds speeches were delivered by Johnny Green, John Miller, Henry Daughtman and Walter Chittenden. One of the features was a dialogue, "The Paddy in France," by Charles Bray, Thomas Dillion and Richard Chadd. The refreshments must have been excellent, for the Blues got away with all the cake and pie, leaving the children the bread provided free by the bakers.

The first of May, 1859, was stormy and the crowning of the Queen took place in a theater. The children with their banners flying marched to the music of Condy's band, and took their seats upon the stage, which was handsomely decorated with garlands of flowers generously provided by Captain Weber from his garden, the stage center being occupied by the Queen's chair. Matilda Brown as Queen of May was crowned by Nannine Underhill, Maria Westbay presenting her the scepter in a pleasing address. Recitations and songs were given by several girls and boys, and the teachers. Miss Lucy Grove, Mrs. Paine and Messrs. Gibson and Thaxton, were highly complimented for the good work of the children. The next morning the children were escorted to the picnic grounds by the Turnverein and Stockton Blues, and Rev. William Anderson of San Francisco gave an address.

In May, 1861, the public schools held their last picnic in the grove on Park and Sutter streets. The boys, dressed in white trousers and dark jackets, assembled at their school rooms on Center Street, and led by the band and under the escort of the Stockton Blues, they marched to the San Joaquin Street schools, where the girls, all dressed in white were assembled.

On arrival at the picnic grounds, the cantata of "The Haymakers" was given under the direction of Professor Wilson, with Mary Ann Rowley, Nannie Underhill, Elizabeth Knowles and Artemesia Behan, in the solo parts. Following the cantata there were declamations by the boys. During the following four years there was little thought of picnics, for the terrible Civil War absorbed all attention. The children of the schools were occupied in giving concerts and entertainments for the benefit of the Sanitary Commission. One entertainment, "The Temple of Flame" in which Susie Crowell, who afterwards married Frank Wellington, was the Goddess of Liberty, netted over $400. After the close of the war, the public schools were too large to give picnics and the pleasant task was taken by the Sunday schools and fraternal societies.

The patriotic days at present, including Lincoln day, Armistice day, McKinley and other days are far more numerous than in the days of yore. Then we had but three patriotic days, February 22, July 4 and Jackson's day, celebrated principally by the Southern Democrats, who worshipped General Jackson. Washington's birthday was celebrated in the grammar public schools and the afternoon of the previous day was given over to patriotic exercises. Washington's farewell address was read by the teacher or the best scholars, each pupil reading a section. The reading was interspersed with the singing of patriotic songs such as "America," "Columbia the Gem of the Ocean," "The Red, White and Blue" and the "Stars Spangled Banner," and the speaking of patriotic pieces. One of the favorite pieces of the young orators was Drake's address to the American Flag,

"When Freedom from her mountain height
Unfurled her standard in the air,
She tore the azure robe of night
And set the stars of glory there."

Another young orator always selected Casabianca.

"The boy stood on the burning deck
When all but him had fled,
The flames that lit the battle wreck,
Shown round him o'er the dead."

During the Civil War, each morning two or more patriotic, war songs were sung, but after war the patriotic spirit seemed to die out just as today. It was revived by the organization of Rawlins Post of the Grand Army of the Republic and the Woman's Relief Corps. The last named organization requested that the public schools have a daily exercise of saluting the flag. Then came the observance of Memorial Day. The flags of the city floated at half mast, then it was discovered that not a schoolhouse in the city was provided with a flag. This neglect was now remedied. Flags were provided by the school board, and Memorial Day flag raising exercises were held in front of each building. At the Jefferson school the children marched from their room at the sidewalk and sang, "Flag of the Free." Then, at a given signal a boy and girl from each school room pulled the flag to his place, the children then singing, "Our Flag is There." Superintendent Barr then introduced F. J. Ryan, then truant officer, who delivered a short address. The grand marshal of the parade was Hays Nicewonger, assisted by Frank E. Dunlap. A portion of the route of the procession was along San Joaquin Street, and upon reaching the Washington building the Post halted. The children of the schools were assembled in front of the building, and James E. Eaton, in behalf of the Woman's Relief Corps, then presented a flag to the school. The flag was received by Emanuel Wolf. Occasionally the public school children would form a part of the 4th of July procession, and they were one of the most pleasing features of the parade of July 4, 1876; following behind a triumphal car on which sat a number of school pupils, dressed in white and wearing sashes of red, white and blue, represented the thirty eight states. The scholars, each one holding a shield, bearing the name of the state they represented, were grouped around a pyramid on which was seated the Goddess of Liberty, represented by Abbie Garwood, Lila Moore-Westbay represented the goddess of peace. Nettie Van Valear, the goddess of justice, and Ada Moore-Buell, Columbia. The states were represented by the following young ladies, now several of them grandmothers. California, Susie Benton; Maine, Estella Simpson; New Hampshire, Hannah Kierski; Vermont, Ella Stevens; Massachusetts, Ruth Clifford; Rhode Island, Emma Hansel-Cadle; Connecticut, Nellie Debnam-Stiffler; New Jersey, Ethel Sperry; New York, Linda Saltz; Pennsylvania, Maude Southworth; Delaware, Mary Hillman; Maryland, Margaret Cunningham; Virginia, Emma Wagner; West Virginia, Nette Saltz; North Carolina, Bettie Colnon; South Carolina, Mary Neumiller-Minta; Georgia, Mary Collins; Florida, Edith Wilson; Alabama, Nettie Allen; Mississippi, Maude Wiggin; Louisiana, Nellie Blossom-Moore; Texas, Florence Willey; Ohio, Ida Pierpont-Lehe; Indiana, Dora Wolf; Illinois, Rachael Arents; Kentucky, Ella Wiggin; Tennessee, Bessie Stewart; Arkansas, Birdie Hogan-Hale; Missouri, Anna Henceman; Minnesota, Lillie Cunningham-Confer; Wisconsin, Hattie Nicholas; Michigan, Laura Cross; Oregon, Maggie Clayes; Nebraska, Lois Clayes; Kansas, Ida Gallup; Nevada, Lizzie Perry; Emma Debnam represented agriculture. Eva Van Valear-Ladd, the arts and sciences, Will Hickman, the American Army; Wm. W. Westbay, the American Navy.

In the public schools today there is no distinction as to race or color. But for nearly twenty years there was a color line and the negro and the Chinese were barred from the public schools. Although the Declaration of Independence declared "That all men are created equal," the South refused to accept that doctrine and held the negroes as slaves. Then came President Lincoln's proclamation of January 1, 1863, giving all negroes their freedom. The Southern men in San Joaquin held the same opinion as their brethren of Dixie Land. They considered the negro a slave and inferior to the white man. The constitutional amendment No. XV gave the negroes the right of suffrage thus placing him on an equality with the whites. But neither the President's proclamation nor the amendment to the Constitution could lessen the repugnance not only of the southern but of many northern men for the negro as a social equal. Hence the colored children were not permitted to enter the public schools until 1879.

The colored citizens were anxious to give their children an education, and as early as 1861 opened a school in the African Methodist Episcopal church. The teacher probably was the pastor of the church. Sometime after this school was opened a great political change took place and the negro male became a citizen voter. The Republicans in power wanted their good will and votes. Captain Weber had deeded them a lot, a little schoolhouse was erected where now stands the Monroe school, and the board of education gave them $25 a month towards the teacher's salary. The balance of the amount necessary was made up by contributions from the negro taxpayers. It was a very difficult matter to obtain a white teacher, because of the prejudice against the race and the small salary, and for a time S. B. Serrington, a colored barber, taught the school. Then an old white lady named Turis was teacher, and she was almost ostracised by her friends because she taught the "nigger" school, but she was poor and needed the money. After a time the board of education appointed a Mrs. Wm. P. Shaw, a widow, to instruct the colored children. In less than six months there was trouble brewing, as the colored trustees did not like the teacher and they nailed fast the schoolhouse door.

Negro School Dedication

After a time matters were satisfactorily adjusted and in April, 1868, Rev. E. P. Tappan, then pastor of the church, informed the public that "the new schoolhouse for the colored children will open Monday, April 27, with appropriate dedication exercises." On the day of dedication the building was crowded with both white people and negroes, including the board of education, N. M. Orr, Charles Belding, and H. T. Dorrance, the Revs. J. H. Giles of the Baptist Church, J. H. Maddux of the Methodist Church, E. J. Tappan and S. E. Read, colored pastors. The assembly was called to order by S. B. Sanderson and after a brief talk he presented the program of exercises, which consisted of prayer by S. E. Reed, singing by the children and short addresses by the visitors. The colored folks passed a resolution, thanking the board and Captain Weber for the warm hearted liberality and deep interest manifested by them in the progress of the school. The negro ladies then served refreshments.

The appointed teacher was J. L. Sanderson. For some reason the colored parents wanted S. E. Reed as the teacher of the school, and they petitioned the board to that effect but they elected Sanderson, who was quite well educated.

One of the pupils in the negro school was Emanuel Quivers, and his persistent efforts to enter the high school finally led to the discontinuance of the color line in the public schools. He was the son of a former slave and the father brought to California from Virginia by his master, soon purchased his freedom. Quivers was quite an intelligent man who had learned the blacksmith trade. Realizing the advantage of an education, he sent young Quivers to the district school near Waterloo, and then to the colored school. Graduating in time from the negro school, his father then engaged a special white teacher to instruct the boy in the higher branches. In time he received an education sufficient to admit him to a course of study in the high school. He applied for admission to the board of education, W. M. Baggs, I. V. Leffler, Rev. S. B. Morse, P. B. Fraser, M. S. Thresher, and I. R. Wilbur, and he was refused. The failure of the board to admit "a ambitious youth," as the Independent styled him, called forth from that paper October 10, '76, the statement, "He has endeavored in vain for a long time to prevail on the board to admit him to the high school, notwithstanding the fact he is on a mental equality with the most intellectual student of that institution, and his character and general deportment is beyond reproach." He wrote a letter to the paper and they declared that "The grammatical construction of the letter, its correct orthography and excellent penmanship, are an unmistakable guarantee of his ability and qualifications." George Ladd, the city school superintendent, strongly favored his admission, and after the board's refusal to admit young Quivers, Ladd easily obtained his admission in the San Francisco high school.

The agitation caused by the Quivers' episode set the taxpayers to thinking, why they should pay out $1,200 a year for the special schooling of the colored children, and in the school board, August, 1877, M. S. Thresher, one of the directors, made a few pertinent remarks regarding its abolishment. The subject had been called up previously by the revolutionary movement of Wm. W. Baggs. In his resolution of May 30, "Believing it to be the duty of the board of education to economize as much as possible and thereby save to the city $920 a year which it cost for the schooling of about fifteen colored children as they could be schooled with the whites without inconvenience. Resolved, that the special school for colored children be closed at the end of the present term." The board laid the matter over for consideration at a later meeting, to learn what some of the parents of the children might say. A number opposed the drastic innovation, and they declared July 3, '77, "Your petitioners, D. L. Campbell, A. C. Paulsell, Joseph D. Peters, James W. Smith, Andrew Wolf, Wm. H. Hickman, Rudolph Gnekow, R.

E. Wilhoit, Louis N. Hickman, Henry O. Southworth, Arthur Cornwall, Frank Stewart, George W. Melone, B. Howard Brown, and Wm. L. Dudley earnestly pray that your honorable board will indefinitely postpone the consideration of the preamble and resolution heretofore presented by Wm. Baggs." The resolution was indefinitely postponed for a time. Later in the year the color question was again brought up and two colored girls succeeded in getting into the highest grammar grade, and in 1879 the special colored school was abolished. Since 1890 five colored pupils have graduated from the high school, and in 1893 the first Japanese graduated, and several have graduated during the past ten years.

Music in the Schools

"In compliance with the letter of the law," says Mrs. Hollenbeak in her chapter on music, "music has always had its nominal place in the schools of Stockton, although as a matter of fact, systematic and successful instruction in the subject has been introduced only within the past twelve years." From the foundation of the schools the children were taught school songs, provided the teacher could sing, but to my knowledge during the first fifteen years, not a teacher in the public schools, either male or female, could sing a note. They would get some of the oldest girls to lead the song. They sometimes sang the multiplication tables as set to music, ending each table with 5's to the chorus of Yankee Doodle. Another song was that of the names of the state capital, cities and their location to music. Among the old familiar school songs was "Hazel Dell," "Lily Dale," "The Huntsman's Song," "Pull Away, Brave Boys," and "Catch the Sunshine." In 1860 a fair tenor singer named Wm. Wilson came to Stockton from Knights Ferry, and opening a singing school was engaged by the trustees to instruct the children of the public schools in music. He taught what was known as the Lowell Mason do, ra, me, system, as against the old Italian system of teaching vocal music. The system, new then, was not a success, and years ago was rejected by first class teachers. Mr. Wilson visited the grammar school afternoons, twice a week, and gave instruction in "musical notation reading and class singing." He continued his work in the schools until 1863 when he returned to the eastern states. During this time he was a choir leader of the Baptist Church. After his departure there was no teacher of music in the schools until 1868. At that time a correspondent wrote, "Allow me to call the attention of our school directors to the necessity of having vocal music taught in our schools. The subject is of vital importance. Yes, gentlemen, let our children be taught to sing." Whether or not this was a boost for Professor George P. Newell I know not. He had located in Stockton, advertised for vocal pupils, and was engaged by the board to teach music in the schools at the munificent salary of thirty dollars a month. He was over seventy years of age, and not at all competent, so that lasted only about a month. In April, 1868, the board employed Louise Carr, a former pupil of M. J. Ryan, to instruct the pupils. She had a sweet soprano voice, was the soprano in the Presbyterian Church but had no experience whatever in teaching. However, she taught for some time before her death. At that time there was living in Stockton an ambitious young man named H. J. Todd. He came to Stockton about 1864 and joined the local militia company and the cornet band and was elected as choir leader of the Presbyterian Church choir. Elected as teacher in public schools, the Jefferson, I believe, and having a good baritone voice he brought the school up in vocal music. After the resignation of Miss Carr as music teacher Superintendent George Ladd induced Mr. Todd to take charge of the vocal music of the schools. In his instruction of the children in music, he accompanied them in all of their songs on the cornet. He also gave several entertainments with the children. The object was to purchase musical instruments, mostly pianos, for use in the schoolroom. The number of the pianos was gradually increased until they now have nineteen. Mr. Todd at this time was studying medicine, and after taking part with the children in the Centennial celebration, he removed to Oakland and entered a medical college.

Todd was superseded as music teacher in the schools by a violin player named Emile Dreyfous. He came to Stockton in August, 1869, from Maguire's opera house orchestra to give lessons on the violin. He had no singing voice, so was not a success, resigning before the close of the term in 1878. About this time there was considerable excitement over the question of engaging a special teacher of music, and it became an issue in the election of school trustees. In the city election of May, 1889, the opponents of music elected two or three trustees and those favoring its continuance lost their strongest advocate, Superintendent George S. Ladd, who had held office for twelve years. He was defeated by S. P. Crawford, the Democratic nominee, a physician and an ordained minister. The strongest opponent of the teaching of music by a special teacher was B. F. Bagley. He was a good citizen but he had so little an appreciation of music that he said to me, "George, I don't know one note from another. I would as leave hear a dog howl as a woman sing." Before this time the school trustees had rescinded their order of no special music teacher and had elected George F. Jackson, a tenor singer of note and an able teacher and musical director. Bagley, however, was still hammering at his pet hobby, no special teacher, and at the end of the school term '81 he charged Jackson with marking the pupils too low in music, and when I. R. Wilbur moved that the matter be postponed a month, his motion was lost but the trustees aired their views. Wm. Woolsey opposed the teaching of music by a special teacher and as the law required instruction in music, the regular teacher should be compelled to do the work. John Yardley said he saw no benefit to the pupil in studying music, and the vote stood 3 to 3. Ladd had a deciding vote but as he was going out of office he refused to decide the question and called another vote. The second vote was 4 to 3 and music received a set back in the public schools for nearly twenty years. Professor Jackson, when asked how many of the teachers could teach music, replied, that of the twenty-nine only ten could teach it, and in one building three of the teachers "cannot even pitch a note." Fortunately for the children and the public in general we have had trustees during the past years who appreciated the fine arts, we now have in the public schools not only one special teacher in music but four of them, two in vocal and two in orchestral and brass band music. They do good work and the public are proud of their accomplishments.

The Stockton Mail opposed not only the teaching of music but the teaching of writing by a special teacher. W. A. Houghton was engaged in the teaching of writing from 1873 until 1892, the time of his death. He was succeeded by Miss Letitia Summerville, a beautiful penman and a high school graduate of 1880. Some years later she married the drawing teacher, F. P. Meyers, and they moved to Oakland. The next teacher of writing was Frank A. Kent, elected in September, 1905. He had been a teacher in one of the county schools. The death of Wm. A. Houghton, April 15, 1892, caused a feeling of sorrow throughout the city, and especially among the school children, who greatly mourned his death. All of the flags on the school building were placed at half mast, and on the day of his funeral the board of education and over 700 children attended, accompanied by their teachers. The funeral took place from the Baptist Church, each child depositing a small bouquet upon the coffin. At the especial request of their beloved teacher each child at the cemetery dropped a steel pen into the grave. Mr. Houghton was fifty-six years of age, and the first and only teacher dying while a member of the public school department.

Today the largest, finest and most prominent structures in Stockton are its public school buildings. In every part of the city you will find them, north, south, east and west, eighteen primary and grammar schools in which are instructed 6,777 children, with a corps of 261 teachers, and the pioneer of all is the little two-room brick school, now deserted, on Center Street. From the earliest days of public schools the never ceasing cry has been for more room. The census of 1859 showed 260 boys and 225 girls of school age of whom 413 received instruction during the year, although the average attendance was only 214. Such irregular attendance was due in great parts to the crowded condition of the school. So much greater was the demand for places than the seating capacity could supply that it became necessary to register applicants and establish the rule that any pupil who was absent four days forfeited the right of his seat and place. There was a continual cry for more school room but the council paid no heed to the cry until 1864. At that time some kindly progressive citizen set fire to the old shack, the Academy building, and the council were compelled to take some action towards building a new schoolhouse. In the report of the secretary of the schools trustees he suggested that a large building be erected. The trustees petitioned the council for $15,000 for the erection of a school and other expenses. Among these expenses was a debt of $3,500 on the Franklin building, drawing interest at 1½ per cent a month, and the back salary of Dr. Thomas Kirkland, grammar school teacher, of $143. The citizens cheerfully voted a bond issue of $15,000 and the Lafayette, a four-room brick building was erected on the site of the Academy building at a cost of $11,679. The total cost was $17,300, this including the fence, sidewalk, grading the play grounds, etc. This building had a large bell, which could be heard all over the city. It rested on a tower in a corner of the school yard, was made of pure copper, the donation of C. T. Meader, then known as the "copper king." The school was opened January 10, 1865, with four teachers in charge. Along in the '90s four more rooms were added to the main building, increasing largely the amount of school room, decreasing at the same time the playground space, none too large at first. Before the dawn of the new century there was talk of removing the schools, as the noise of wagons, the blowing of whistles and the continuous smoke from the water works on Hunter Street made it a very disagreeable location for a school building. Some eight years ago it was sold to a building corporation for a commercial building.

In the meantime the babies grew into school age and there was the never ending cry "more school room." The school trustees rented three outside school rooms. One of these school rooms was the school where Mary Kroh had her private school, and this little room, twenty feet square, was packed with forty children. There was at this time 1,265 children entitled to school privileges, and only nine school rooms to accommodate them. There was another bond issue in 1867 of $15,000 and in December, 1869, the original Washington school building was erected. Occupying a quarter of a block two of the lots were donated by Captain Weber and two were purchased. The building cost $20,627 and the entire cost was $25,724. It was a four-room building, the high school occupying two of the second-story rooms. In 1891 a third story was erected to accommodate the increased attendance of the high school students, making it an eight-room building. The removal of the high school pupils to their own high school building gave increased room to the lower grades and a few years ago, the third story was torn off and the building remodeled as we see it today.

It was necessary to provide more school room in 1872 as at that time the suburbs on all four sides of the city were annexed to the municipality, this annexation bringing in the Vineyard, North and South school districts. To provide school rooms for the Vineyard district the board of education purchased four lots on Weber Avenue and Pilgrim Street at a cost of $1,600. They erected a four-room brick building at a cost of $17,144, the entire cost being $23,044. The trustees thought this a school location better than the site where stood the Vineyard school, but it soon proved to be a very poor location, for it faced the old city burial ground, and two years later the Copperopolis railroad became a continual nuisance with their bell ringing, whistle blowing, and switching cars up and down the track. The trustees named it the Jefferson in honor of the patriot who wrote the Declaration of Independence. The building is now known as the pre-vocational school. In one of these departments all of the school printing is done under a competent printer and they turn out good work. The new Jefferson building, located corner Lindsay and Sacramento streets, is a splendid large twenty-room building erected at a cost of $125,000. It is the largest school building in the city, accommodating 603 children in 1922. In 1873-'75 two four-room brick buildings were erected, both from the same plans, each building costing about $15,000. The first, named the new Franklin, was erected on the Center Street site. The Weber was built at the corner of Flora and Commerce streets and cost more than the first named, as the trustees purchased four lots of Dr. S. H.

Fickett at a cost of $1,200 each. The annexed addition on the south known as the Homestead, next claimed the attention of the school board, and they erected a frame two-room building at a cost of $7,999. In 1880 a four-room brick was erected and named Grant, and in '88 four additional rooms were built, the building at present seating 186 pupils. Another military hero's name, John C. Fremont, was given a school building. In 1889, on Aurora and Fremont streets the trustees bought the property, four lots, of the Weber heirs, the generous donator of school property having passed on in 1882. In 1891 the Lincoln school building was erected on the Vineyard district school site, corner Ophir and Market streets, the property having been given to the district trustees by Captain Weber way back in the early '70s. In 1895 the school board erected a big three-story structure on the corner of El Dorado and Vine, which had come to their possession by the annexation of the North district. The El Dorado was the first building to have a basement furnace, lavatories, cloak rooms and assembly room, a thing now considered necessary in every school building. Some fifteen years ago the building was torn down much to the delight of the neighbors, for it was a fire trap for which it was feared it would some day burn down, burning to death hundreds of children. The property was sold to the Presbyterian Church some years ago and they have erected a magnificent church edifice. The splendid new El Dorado building, corner of North and Lincoln streets, is one of the largest and handsomest school buildings in the city, and with its additional eight rooms erected this year at a cost of $70,000 will seat 567 pupils. The first up-to-date building in architectural beauty and present school essential was not built until 1902 at a cost of $15,000. It is of the Spanish Mission style and called the Monroe, was located where stood the colored school.

Could the school trustees of the pioneer days who erected the Franklin, Lafayette and Washington buildings believing them splendid schoolhouses now come to earth and see the present schools of education, their astonishment would be unbounded. They were progressive men those trustees, among them V. M. Peyton, Dr. George A. Shurtleff, Henry B. Underhill, H. S. Sargent, Charles Belding, L. M. Hickman, B. W. Owens, George S. Ladd and others, but the city was small, it was difficult to get money sufficient to pay the teacher's salaries so they were compelled to think in hundreds of dollars for school buildings, not thousands of dollars as today. As early as 1856 a school committee, all progressive men, was appointed to inquire into the subject of erecting a school building, but they reported adversely as the city was heavily in debt, the citizens were heavily taxed, there were streets to improve, bridges to build, and other expenses much more necessary than a school building. One of the school trustees of that day was Charles Grunsky, a well-educated German, and his son Ewald and daughter Lottie were two of the three first graduates of the high school; another son was a school trustee. Lottie Grunsky as soon as she graduated became an assistant teacher in the school, and later she developed as a splendid teacher in the primary grades. She was a patient, gentle, very lovable woman, and for over forty years she was a continuous teacher in the schools. Sad was her death; about to visit a school teacher friend in San Jose, she fell dead as she stepped from the train. In honor of her memory the trustees named the handsome school building erected in the spring of 1919 the Lottie Grunsky, at a building cost of $70,000.

Beside the buildings already named there has been erected during the past twelve years, the Fair Oaks building, the Hazelton, named after the pioneer who taught the first school, the Jackson, increased to an eight-room building, the North, the McKinley, the Victory and the Burkett Acres building, as yet unnamed.

Under the present splendid system of instruction in the public schools brought up to its present high standard by years of study and experience it is impossible to understand the difficulties under which the first teacher labored. First the general public and the majority of the parents gave no encouragement to any advanced education. They believed that instruction in reading, writing and arithmetic, was a sufficient education for any boy or girl. Spelling, geography and grammar might be taught, if the pupil desired and the teacher was willing to give instruction in those branches. Second, the assembling together of children of all nations, of various degrees of intelligence was another drawback, and children, twelve and fourteen years of age would be in the same class with children eight years old. Third, the indifference of the parents to education caused a like indifference in the children, and they attended school when they felt like it. The children were not always at fault for some teachers were very disagreeable. Irregular attendance was one of the evils of the day, and one superintendent reported of 474 children enrolled in the schools there was an average attendance of 240 only. Fourth, there was no uniform system of text books. All of the school books were imported from the east by steamer, and there were not two wholesale book stores in the state where books in quantities could be obtained, and often the teacher was compelled to teach one class in arithmetic from one author's work and a second class from another author's work. Each county had different text books and a Stockton book seller advertised that he had the school books taught in all of the counties. Then the teachers would change text books according to their own ideas or fancies, and I have known parents to purchase grammars by two different authors during a school year. Under such conditions advancement in education was an impossibility, and as Mrs. Hollenbeak says, "The education structure was reared in a somewhat haphazard manner, depending greatly upon the text books in the hands of the pupils and the teacher's ability."

In the political change of parties in 1861 the Republican party came into power both in the city and county, and although there was but little improvement in the county schools, the city schools began an upward movement. The common council appointed as the board of education, Charles Belding, later the mayor of the city, Henry S. Sargent, afterwards a bank president, and George W. Tyler, elected county judge. They were all educated Massachusetts men and they resolved to conduct the Stockton schools according to the Boston school model, at that time credited with having the best public schools in the United States. The trustees demanded that the scholars must attend school regularly or the teachers know why. The doors of some of the school rooms were locked at nine o'clock, the opening school hour, and all tardy pupils or those absent from school the previous day must bring an excuse from their parents. Sometimes the boys wrote their own excuses and signed their parents name. Next the board demanded a uniform set of text books in the primary, intermediate and grammar schools as they were classified. This was a heavy tax on the parents, for school books were high in price and controlled by Eastern book sellers, and the tax was especially heavy if the parents had several children, some of them in the grammar schools. Now the state furnishes all text books at cost, printing the books. Another complete innovation was the instruction of the boys and the girls in one schoolroom, and under the same teacher. Up to this time they had been taught in separate schools. It was believed and it proved true that the children could be instructed together in one room at less cost, there would be better deportment, and the sex would emulate each other in their studies. Still another demand was for a better grade of teachers, both physically and mentally. The board believed that the teacher should set a good example for the children in neatness and dress as well as in morality. The state law of 1866 gave the board of education full control over all school affairs and made them a board of examiners to pass upon the qualifications of all applicants as teachers and issue teacher's certificates. Algebra, rhetoric, geometry and Latin were now taught in the grammar grades, if any pupils wished to take up those studies.

A tall Yankee from Maine, named A. H. Randall, in 1867 was elected as teacher in the grammar school. He was nominated by school trustee George S. Ladd, and although having but a common school education, he was a natural school teacher and proved successful in every department from principal of the high school to the principal of the State Normal school. Mr. Randall introduced a new system of marking known as the percentage system. Before this time the teachers had been using various methods for inciting their pupils to study, such as book prizes at the end of the term, spelling matches and shorter hours for those pupils who had perfect lesson. Mr. Randall's method was to grade the pupils in their studies on a basis of 100% in their daily recitations, the estimate to be made at the close of each recitation. The new method of marking was adopted in all of the schools. It worked well for several years, but in 1874 dishonorable teachers began to cram their pupils so as to make a showing on the final examinations, and thus received credit for false teaching. The system was modernized to some extent but was entirely discarded in '09 and the A, B, C, D, E letter system introduced. A denoted a first class standing and E a complete failure. An incentive to the pupils to excel in their studies was given in 1893 by Dr. W. P. Hazelton, who at his death bequeathed $1,000 to the public schools to be placed at interest, the interest money to be used in the purchase of medals, for the most deserving scholars. In January 1916 the Jerome Levy scholarship was founded by his parents in memory of the son who died in September, 1915, while a member of the high school freshman class. It provided $100 annually for the needy boy or girl graduates of the high school who desired to attend the State University. The first one to receive the scholarship was Wm. B. Faulkner, who sold newspapers that he might obtain an education. He was a notable youth because of his hustle and energy. He entered the university and during vacation came right back, selling papers. He has now graduated as physician. In June, 1919, Mrs. Frank S. Boggs founded a scholarship in memory of her sister, Mrs. Lillian Cunningham Confer, a graduate of '86, the eldest daughter of Sheriff Cunningham; Bertil Holmsten was awarded the first medal.

A New School Era

The election of James A. Barr, a former public school teacher, as superintendent, in October, 1891, "marked a new era in the public schools of Stockton." Mr. Barr declared in his report that for years past the course of study in the schools had been what might be called a "regulation course" the "course that considers the welfare of only the comparatively small number graduating from the grammar and high schools." More attention should be paid to the lower grades as the majority of the pupils leave school before their completion of the grammar grades. Changes were made in accordance with this idea, one of which was to eliminate one year's work in the primary grades and another change was to reverse the names of the grades, making the first the lowest grade and the eighth the highest grade. This was the stepping stone into the high school. In pursuance of his plan to improve the school work Mr. Barr introduced many changes and the teachers were requested to give each change a trial and note its good or bad effect. At the end of the three years the schools had practically been made over. The next step was to balance up the grade work and for this work a committee of twenty teachers were appointed as follows: Mrs. Rosa V. Winterburn, compiler of "The Spanish in the Southwest," Walter J. Kenyon, U. E. Taylor, Alice Smallfield, married and a school trustee, Adelaide Pollock, D. A. Mobley, now a Presbyterian minister, J. H. Wilkinson, Willis Lynch, now a bee propagator, Edward D. Hughes and D. W. Braddock, real estate dealers, Letitia Summerville, Emma Snapp, Alma Patterson, Dena Lottman, Wm. H. Murray, Mrs. Cora N. Bayley, Jessie M. Stringham, Belle Mitchell and Maude A. Southworth, who are still teaching in the schools. The work was completed in 1900 and published in pamphlet form as the "Outline of Studies." The compilation of this work was a splendid achievement and it brought the schools into much favorable notice by the press and the leading educators of the state, and the Journal of Education said it "was a notable contribution to educational literature." In 1904 an exhibition of the Stockton school work was made at the St. Louis Exposition, and so many requests were sent in for literature based upon the exhibit that a new and larger work was compiled. It was put in the hands of an eastern publisher and issued as "The Book of Stockton Methods." Mr. Barr is very proud of this work, and well he may be proud for it is in use in many of the best schools in the United States. James A. Barr was city superintendent of schools from 1891 until 1912 and he left upon them an impression of which any man might well be proud.

Under the authorization of a law passed by the state legislature several years ago, there are now some two or three hundred district union schools in California, eight in San Joaquin County. At the time of the organization of the Stockton high school in 1869 there were less than a half dozen high schools in the state. Along about that time A. H. Randall conceived the plan of organizing a high school and with the encouragement of the board of education he planned a high school course of study. He asked many of his brightest, most ambitious pupils if they would take up such a course and they all agreed. In January, 1870, the Stockton high school began its forward progressive march with the following high school students, first class, Alice Mills, Lottie and Ewald Grunsky; second class, Elma Carter, John H. Wallace, James Littlehale, Stanton L. Carter, Wm. Terry, Wilbur T. Wenk, Sarah Randall; third class, Carrie Kalisher, Ben Ely, Leon Cohn, Joseph W. Cavis, Viola Strawbridge, Armenia, Oliver, Carrie Roesch, George Harkness, Samuel Terry, Lewis Noble, Charles Creanor, Martha Holdsworth, Emma Dyer, Etta Tinkham, Mary Keyes and Emma Curry. The public schools closed for the term, Friday afternoon, December 23, and the first class graduating exercises were held in the High school, Lafayette building, A. H. Randall, principal and S. D. Waterman, assistant. At the close the graduating class, Lottie Grunsky, Alice Mills and Ewald Grunsky, stepping upon the platform, were addressed by the Rev. B. E. S. Ely, and School Trustee H. T. Dorrance, the latter presenting the class with diplomas and a county teacher's certificate. Two years later Ewald Grunsky went to Germany to take a four year course in polytechnics and he returned to his native city in December, 1877, with the highest honors as a graduate from the University at Stuttgart, Germany. He is now classed with the best civil engineers in the state and has frequently been consulted by the Stockton city officials regarding engineering improvements.

The high school work was divided into three classes then known as the junior, middle and senior classes in a three-year course. The studies included, chemistry, physics, rhetoric, mental philosophy, algebra, geometry, geology, botany and Latin, if the students so desired. One scholar only took up Latin. During the first ten years only seventy scholars graduated as follows: Class of '71, J. Herbert Wallace, Stanton L. Carter, James M. Littlehale, Eveline H. Woodbridge, Elma J. Carter, Sarah A. Randall; '73, George Harkness, Wilbur Wenk, Harry T. Compton, Carrie Kalisher, Armenia Oliver, Mary Keyes, Emma Curry, Carrie Roesch, Martha Holdsworth; '74, Frank Clowes, Kitty Crofton; '75, Mary Garvin, Minnie Harkness, Mary Inglis, Frank Kelsey, Mary Langworthy and Henrietta Hart. During the closing exercises the class of '74 gave the following program: Chorus by class, "Heavy Billows"; declamation, "McCandliss Child," Frank Clowes; composition, "John Milton," Mary Inglis; select reading, "The Pipes of Lucknow," Carrie Cory; solo, "Silver Hair That Once Was Gold," Clara Stier; composition, "Life," Kitty Crofton; solo, "The Moon O'er the Mountain," Lou Elliot; declamation on "Blennerhassett," William Westbay; solo, "Sweet Sunshine," Lula Hogan; "Valedictory," Minnie Harkness; awarding diplomas, Superintendent George Ladd. Class of '76, Walter Boggs, Willam Bours, William Holden, Ada Boschen, Lulu Hogan, Nettie Hunt, Louis Elliot, Lincoln Ruggles, Will Smith, Clara Stier, Reel Terry, William W. Westbay, Hattie West, and Mary Woodbridge. The motto of the class was the mystic letters M. F. C.—Mysterious Fantastic Class, and at a reunion of the class in '78 at the residence of Dr. E. S. Holden the motto was wrought in red, white and blue colors and hung upon the wall. The beautiful garden was hung with Chinese lanterns, and the evening was enjoyed, concluding with a banquet. The graduating class of '77 comprised Andrew Hoisholt, who later became one of the best insanity experts in the state, Carrie Brandt, James Garvin, Alma Clapp, Ida Bennett, Kate Garvin, Amy Kelsey, and Georgie Kelsey, Josephine Jacobson, Helen Myers, Nellie Smith, Edward Sedwich, and Emma Wallace. Class of '79, Carrie Berdine, Walter Bidwell, George Catts, later Mayor, Mary Elliott, John Garwood, Carrie Hart, Kate and Anna Russell, Nellie Smith, Lillian Tinkham, Fannie and Hattie Marks, and Frank West. Class of '80, Gertrude Elliott, Eugene Grunsky, Mamie Huggins, Cora Ralph and Jennie Winter. The largest class up to this time was that of '77, thirteen in number. The class of '85 was seventeen in number as follows: Elbert Smith, Maude H. Wiggin, Nellie L. Campbell, Frank Viebrock, Celia Crawford, Francis Cutting, Julia Gallup, Rachel Arndt, Abbie Bigger, Lizzie Doan, Fred P. Clark, Fred Wolner, Nellie Smith, Harry Lane, Lena Hilke, Helen M. Boschen and Ida L. Weller.

Several of the teachers were high school graduates, for Superintendent Ladd insisted in giving them an opportunity. They taught in the schools for many years on their merits alone, and today, one of them, Lottie Grunsky, has been honored by having a school building named for her. They were as follows: Washington high school—A. H. Randall, S. D. Waterman, Mrs. E. J. Betts, Mary C. Russell, Lottie F. Grunsky, and Mrs. Sarah C. Harry. Lafayette—S. G. Dunbar, principal, Mrs. S. G. Hodgdon, assistant, Sarah Mills, Mrs. L. E. Benedict, Levenia M. Westbay, and Mrs.

Celia Gray. Franklin—R. E. Glidden, principal, Mary V. McPhee, Elmer Carter, Mae Hennion, Josie Jacobson and Amy Russell. Jefferson—V. P. Prichard, principal, Harriet McConnell, May Esterbrook, Letitia Summerville, and Clara Stier. Weber—George Goodell, principal, Minnie Harkness, Isabel M. Paine, Jennie Hogan and Lillian Tinkham.

The board of education of the high school, in using their best judgment in making the school more efficient and serviceable, have changed the course of study several times and added several special studies, which required the engagement of special teachers. This required a considerable outlay of money, and for the past twenty-five years there has been much complaint about the high school taxes. Today there are 75 teachers in the high school, expenses being in the neighborhood of $244,700 per year. This question of school tax was brought up in the city new charter committee in 1902 and one of the committee, and ex-mayor of the city, said: "There are too many isms' and I refer especially to the high school. If they received less money there would be less 'isms' and more good schooling." The difficulty was to adjust the school studies to fit those scholars who wished to go to the university and at the same time have a course of study that would lead to business or vocational pursuits. At the time of the ex-mayor's criticism, the school board had adopted what was known as a literary or scientific course, and industrial course. The course last named included commercial arithmetic, bookkeeping, stenography, typewriting, and manual training, all of which required special teachers. There was more complaint of the manual training and the pre-vocational work lately introduced, and yet the latter has been endorsed by the Chamber of Commerce, the Business Men's Club, the Advertising Club, the Merchants' Club, the Lions Club and Rotary Club, and they have appointed an advisory board to report the progress of this work. Another "fad," as many called it, was physical culture. It taught the pupils grace and motion and a love of the things beautiful. Is that a waste of money? The physical training class gave an exhibition of their work at the close of each school year, and it was a delight to hundreds of relatives and friends.

The increased attendance of high school scholars compelled the planning of additional rooms, and to meet this want in 1891 the board erected a third story to the Washington school building. It comprised five rooms, the entire story being occupied by the high school classes. Ten years later they were again cramped for room, with 337 pupils enrolled. Fortunately at this time the state legislature passed a law creating what was known as

"Union school districts" and providing annually a certain amount of money for each district. This enabled the Stockton High School board to see their way clear for the building of a high school. The first step towards the erection of a new building was a suitable high school site and the board of education, E. W. S. Woods, J. M. Kile, George Schuler, Ed. E. Tretheway and Mrs. L. Clare Davis, advertised for school sites. Then the real estate men got busy in looking for good fat commissions, and sixteen sites were offered. They varied in size from a half block to ten acres, and in price from $6,000 to $55,000. The board examined carefully all of these sites and their location for school purposes and it finally simmered down to two sites, the Collins seminary block, where now stands the Congregational Church and the ten acres belonging to Miss Julia Weber, where now stands the high school, which was then an orchard. The Collins block was offered for $30,000, although it was assessed for only $13,000, and the south quarter was low land flooded every winter. The Weber four blocks were offered by Miss Weber's agent, Robert Oullahan, for the same price as the Collins block and was four times the size and all high land. For some reason which is easily understood two of the board insisted on the purchase of the single block and the lady trustee entertained quite a number of "honorable" citizens one evening, they trying to induce her to vote for their friends' $30,000 graft. A poet says, "He is a fool who thinks by force or skill to turn the current of a woman's will." Fortunately for Stockton Mrs. Davis had carefully considered the future needs and growth of the high school, and friendship cutting no figure, she, E. E. Tretheway and George Schuler voted for the four-block site. It was a fine location only marred by a large residence on the southwest quarter of the block owned by the Rossi family, who refused to sell at any price.

The next move was for the coin to erect the building. It appeared to be a hard job to tackle, for many persons disapproved of the proposition to build a large and expensive high school, but Superintendent James A. Barr said in answer, "I have heard some little complaint because we propose to build for the future. In answer to that let me say we propose to build for the future." The board then requested permission of the citizens to issue bonds for $150,000 for the building of a high school and other expenses, the bonds to run for twenty years. A movement for victory was splendidly worked up. The Chamber of Commerce had endorsed the movement with a promise to get behind it and boost, and the high school alumni association were in high glee over their proposed victory. A meeting was held in the city hall on the evening of April 24, 1901, presided over by Fred W. West, president of the Chamber of Commerce. Speeches were made favoring the bonds by Harry T. Compton, high school graduate of '73, Mrs. P. B. Fraser, '74, Mrs. John J. Nunan, '75, William W. Westbay, '76, Dr. A. W. Hoisholt, '77, Louise Hilke, '73, J. M. Kile, '83, C. F. Hilman, '97, C. A. Farnsworth, '98, Joseph Binelli, '99, Byron Bearce, '01. The election was held April 29 at the Washington school with H. C. Holman as inspector and Fred Arnold and C. B. Wood as judges, and long before the polls closed victory was assured.

The architects quickly responded to the call of the board for building plans, and fourteen sets were sent in by California and eastern architects. After considerable examination of the best plans, the three prizes, five per cent of the construction price, $500 and $200, were awarded to George Rushford, Stone, and Wright of San Francisco and Charles Beasley & Sons. The first and last named were located in this city. In accepting Rushford's plans it was agreed that if no contractor bid $100,000 or less the architect would give a bond for the construction of the building. There was not a bid below the stated amount and Rushford constructed the building and lost money. Louis S. Stone's plans for the interior of the building were adopted, and during the past ten years he has been the architect for several of the new school buildings. Then came the proudest event in the history of the high school body, the laying of the cornerstone, April 18, 1903, in the northeast corner of the building. The board of education requested the Masons to lay the cornerstone and they cheerfully accepted the honor. The building was erected at a cost of $154,989 and completed in September, 1904; a fine reception was held on the evening of September 12, Dr. David Starr Jordan delivering an address in the fine large assembly hall. Only a few years ago a second school building was erected, and twice the school added during the past year. Now there is being erected at a cost of $80,000 a splendid large auditorium with a seating capacity of 2,400 persons.

CHAPTER XX

THE BUILDING OF RAILROADS

The invention of the steam locomotive revolutionized the transportation traffic of the civilized world. Many of Stockton's progressive citizens of early days believed this true, agreeing with the editor of the Independent, Samuel Seabough, that "railroads are the great civilizers of the age, and exert more influence than any other agency in developing the resources of the country through which they pass." There was another class, however, who declared that they were an injury to the country, as they displaced the pack mule and put teamsters out of business, thus hurting the farmer in his sale of hay; killed the stage and the steamboat business; cut up the country and frightened away all the game, deer, bear, elk, etc. In this class were the migratory pioneers, men who in all their lives had never seen a locomotive or a steamboat. They wanted their nearest neighbors to be at last ten miles distant, so they could have breathing room, and early in the '60's they removed from Stockton down the valley, for this town, with its 6,000 inhabitants, was too thickly settled for them.

As early as 1852 a railroad was projected from Stockton to Sonora, and in 1856 a company was organized to construct a road from Stockton to San Francisco. Stockton was then completely cut off from the outside world except by stage or steamboat. By stage it was a hot, dusty, all-day ride to Sacramento, the same to Sonora, and a long tiresome two days' trip to Mariposa. The fare to Mariposa was $20. In winter the journey was fearful; often the passengers were obliged to get out and walk, and at times were compelled to assist in starting the stage when it had stuck in the mud. The hauling of freight to the mountains, especially in winter, was very difficult. The freight rates then were very high, something like 3 or 4 cents a pound, and the mountain merchants were obliged to order their goods several months ahead of time. What has caused this great change; this saving of time and money, this ease and comfort of travel; this great expansion of commerce and trade, settling up the vast desert lands, to the south? The railroad, and behind it four railroad kings—Stanford, Huntington, Crocker and Hopkins. Stockton at first assisted and then fought the progress of the great work, and in later years, realizing the great value of railroads to any community, gave liberally to the Valley Road and later welcomed the Western Pacific.

First Railroad Convention

The great overland railroad, the Central Pacific, was conceived by that splendid engineer, Theodore Judah. With the foresight of but few men, he knew that some day a railroad would be built across the continent and from actual surveys he knew that such a road could be carried across the Sierras over what is now known as the Central route. With faith and courage scarcely equaled, he began his work of organization and induced the Legislature of 1859 to call a state railroad convention to assemble at San Francisco in September for the purpose of discussing the best plan for securing an overland railroad. No plan of procedure was adopted and Secretary of State Ferris Forman, afterwards the father-in-law of J. D. Peters of this city, requested all sheriffs to call an election for delegates to the convention. In accordance with this request Sheriff John W. O'Neal called a San Joaquin convention. They met in the city hall, and selected A. C. Bradford chairman, and A. G. Brown secretary of the meeting. This convention elected Mayor Holden, Maj. R. P. Hammond and William Garrard as delegates to the State convention. The latter body met September 20 and chose John Bidwell as president and E. S. Holden as vice-president. This convention passed resolutions recommending that the state issue $15,000,000 in bonds for the building of an overland railroad and favored the Central route.

Congress Takes Action

Congress had been discussing this question since 1854, when Senator Gwinn of California introduced his first bill, but there was a disagreement about a route. The northern men wanted a northern or central route, and the Southerners wanted the present southern route. The secession of the Southern members settled the question, and Congress passed a bill for a railroad over the central route, which became a law July 1, 1862. The news reached Stockton July 4th, just as the procession was about to march, and for over an hour the old fire bell proclaimed the joyful news. "The construction of this road is the only salvation of our State," was the general declaration. "We must have a market, a far better one than the inhabitants of the state can afford us, and a market to which access is easy."

The year before this Leland Stanford had been elected Governor of California. The railroad then was no party question. All three conventions favored it, and so universal was the demand for an overland highway, that Milton S. Latham in Congress declared: "There is but one thing that can alienate the affections of the people of the Pacific from the Union, and that is a failure to give them a Pacific railroad. Stanford, as governor of this state, supported as he was by a pro-railroad legislature, now found himself in a position to hasten the building of the proposed road, and in the presence of a large crowd, January 8, 1862, at the corner of Front and K Streets in Sacramento, he dug the first shovelful of earth. Speeches were made by the Governor, Charles Crocker, Senator J. R. Warwick, Walter Van Dyke, Newton Booth and Niles Searles. The work was pushed ahead and in November, 1867, cars were running to the summit of the Sierra Nevada Mountains. This was not the first railroad, for in 1856 a road was built from Sacramento to Folsom. The Stockton city council were invited to attend the celebration, but the mud was so deep they could not make the journey.

In November, 1867, Governor Stanford and Charles Crocker came over from Sacramento to Stockton to ask the right-of-way through the city, as they wished to connect their road with the Western Pacific purchased by them. This Western Pacific road is another story and because of it the council were very wary of railroad projects. The council comprised at this time, Wm. Dennis, Capt. Joseph Hammand and George C. Devoll from the first ward; Andrew Simpson, Joseph Adams, H. M. Fanning and John Nichols from the second ward; and Charles G. Hubner, Charles Ivory, and Thomas K. Hook from the third ward. It was planned that Dr. E. S. Holden, a very enthusiastic railroad man, should present the petition for the Central Pacific right-of-way "across and along Sutter Street, or any street lying east of said Sutter Street excepting California Street, with the privileges of erecting a depot and warehouse." Stanford, on his arrival in the council chamber, immediately noticed antagonistic feeling among the members and he advised Holden not to present the ordinance, but the latter believed he could talk it through. As soon as the ordinance was read, Dennis moved that it be laid on the table until the property owners could be heard from. As they had been talking of the road for three years, this motion made Holden angry and he attempted to withdraw the ordinance. Nichols moved to allow him to withdraw it and the matter was laid over until a December meeting. When the council met again, Dennis offered the following resolution, which was unanimously adopted: "We freely admit that a railroad is highly necessary and we desire to see one built speedily. We are not opposed to railroads, even through the city, but we are strongly opposed to being humbugged, as we have been in the past—not by the Central Pacific, it is true, but by the Western Pacific. As we have suffered to the tune of $250,000, or nearly so, and must pay taxes on the swindle for years to come, it ought not seem strange if we observe the proper care in dealing with others. The Central Pacific may carry out all they may promise in running their road through one of the principal streets of the city; still the council cannot grant what they request or permit many other things asked for. The ordinance is too general in its demands in one sense and too indefinite in another. We must not grant a franchise for an indefinite period, without some written guarantee stating what the city and railroad are willing to do as to grades, obstructions, crossings, etc. We want the road, but we also want all concerned to act in good faith."

The council approved of this remarkable statement and appointed a committee of three councilmen—Dennis, Hook and Nichols—to confer with the directors of the Central Pacific regarding the right-of-way. Six weeks passed and as they made no move in the matter it called forth the following stinger from the press: "The whole transaction is strictly in keeping with the slow-coach, muddled and befogged process which has left its brand on every matter of public enterprise." Two days later the council met and when the ordinance was called up there was a wrangle regarding the choice of street. Joseph Adams was opposed to a right-of-way on Sutter Street, as he had built a house on that street. "Put it on San Joaquin Street," he said. "No, that won't do," replied Hickman. "The school-house is on that street." "Put it on El Dorado near the water-front," said Keys. "That won't do," answered Hook, "The business is moving eastward." Finally by a vote of 7 to 1 they gave a right-of-way on El Dorado Street, and Captain Weber, Andrew Simpson and John Nichols were appointed a committee to wait upon the Central Pacific and inform them of the action of the Council. It was a waste of time only. The engineers laid their cross section stakes, and early in April they were grading along the county road, now Sacramento Street, then 200 yards outside of the city limit.

The Last Spike

The fight between Hiram Fisher and the railroad because the latter took earth from East Street canal for the filling, and the liberality of Captain Weber in permitting the contractors to take all the material required, free of cost, from the Mormon slough, are but side issues, and we come to May 8, 1869, when many of our citizens celebrated in Sacramento the laying of the last tie of the trans-continental line and the placing of the golden spike. A meeting of citizens was called to make arrangements for the celebration and about fifty responded. It was resolved to fire a national salute at noon of the day of the completion of the road, ring all of the bells of the city, display flags and banners, engage the Stockton Band and that as many as possible should visit Sacramento. The salute was fired from El Dorado Street bridge by Robert Hanks. The city hall bell was rung continuously for five hours, Al Rider being one of the well-known men who pulled the rope. Quite a large delegation, including many members of the Pioneer Society, with George Evans as marshal, left Stockton for Sacramento, an engine and flat cars being kindly provided by the company. The track from Sacramento southward had been laid only to Liberty and it was necessary to go thither in carriages.

Never will I forget the exhilaration of that trip—my first ride on a railroad train. The train frequently stopped at the stations along the way, and on our arrival at the capital there were several hundred people on board. The little town was overcrowded with people, all awaiting with suppressed excitement the time when the electric spark would flash the news all over the United States and to every California town that the last spike was driven. Eight minutes before 12 o'clock that news came, and immediately the twenty-one locomotives of the company, drawn up in two rows on Front Street, began an unearthly screeching, and they were assisted in this pandemonium by all city whistles and bells and by the brass bands in attendance. The effect was indescribable, the music of our playing sounded to us like another band half a mile distant. There was an immense procession, and an oration was delivered by Governor H. H. Haight, who now has a son residing in this city. For the occasion Charles Shultz, then a famous orchestra leader and composer of San Francisco, composed the "Railroad March," which was played by the crack band of the state, the Third Artillery. The piece represented the starting and stopping of a railroad train—first, the cry, "All aboard!" then the ringing of the bell, the whistle, the exhaust of the engine, and the noise of the wheels as they, with increasing speed, struck the joints of the rails. During the afternoon the Stockton band serenaded the citizens, and that night even cots were at a premium.

Stockton's First Passenger Train

The greatest event in Stockton's history was the arrival August 11, 1869, of the first passenger train from Sacramento. It was a great event, as it linked Stockton with the East in bands of steel. The excursion train was to have arrived at Stockton at 12 o'clock, but it was delayed at Mokelumne City nearly one hour and a half, hundreds of excursionists jumping off at the little village believing it was Stockton. This was not very complimentary to this city, but it indicated how ignorant the general public were of the size of California's towns before the coming of the railroad. "When the arrival of the train was announced by the whistle of the locomotive, the excitement and enthusiasm of the vast throng was unbounded." The train was literally packed with men and women and children, 2,500 in all. As soon as it reached North Street a salute of thirty guns was fired by Robert V. Hanks and all of the bells of the city began their clamor. The Pioneers and the firemen, accompanied by a band, were on hand to welcome their Sacramento brethren, and a procession was formed and marched into the city. It comprised the Sacramento City Guard in Zouave uniform, Sacramento band and Pioneers; Stockton band, San Joaquin pioneers, Sacramento fire department band, Confidence Engine Co. No. 1 with their machine Sacramento No. 3 with engine and delegates from the Sacramento firemen, Stockton firemen, mayors and county officials of Sacramento and Stockton in carriages, citizens on foot. The pioneers tendered their Sacramento brethren a banquet at the Yosemite House; the visiting officials were also banqueted there. The firemen were given a collation at the Eureka engine house. The general public dined wherever they could find a bite; they cleaned out all of the restaurants, foraged all of the grocery stores and bakeries for bread, crackers, cheese, oysters and sardines, and actually wiped out the town on the food proposition. Two days later Stockton's first railroad excursion took place, the Methodist Episcopal Sunday school going on a picnic to Mokelumne City.

Long before the road was built to Stockton citizens were visiting their Eastern homes, and June 26, 1869, Timothy Newell and Miss Lucy Grove started, the former going to Massachusetts and the latter to Virginia. Passenger trains began running between Stockton and Sacramento on August 11. On September 10, Stocktonians traveled to San Francisco over the San Jose train, connecting at Niles. Over the San Joaquin River they crossed in the ferryboat. November 10 the bridge was finished and the train ran into Oakland, thus completing the great overland railroad from ocean to ocean. As soon as the track was laid to Oakland a regular schedule time table was published, the overland train leaving San Francisco at 8 a. m. and Stockton at 12 a. m. and the west bound leaving Stockton at 1:48 and arriving at San Francisco at 5:40. The first-class rate of fare (not including sleepers) was $129 to St. Louis; Chicago, $130; New York, $150; New Orleans, $160. The second-class rate to the same points was $60; New York, $66.75. Stockton also had the benefit of a through train which left San Francisco at 4 p. m. and Stockton at 8:28, arriving at Sacramento at 10:50. Leaving the capital at 6:30 a. m., Stockton was reached at 8:19 and San Francisco at 12:30, the fare from Stockton being $5.00.

The Western Pacific Railroad

About a year previous to the commencement of the road at Sacramento, a company was organized to run a road from San Jose through Stockton to Sacramento. One of the organizers and vice-president of the road was Dr. E. S. Holden of Stockton. In 1863 the legislature passed bonded bills to the amount of $2,250,000. Among these bills was one authorizing the supervisors of San Joaquin county, if the citizens so voted, to issue $250,000 worth of bonds for the Western Pacific Railroad. Throughout the state, meetings were held to urge the people to vote for the bonds in the various counties and such a meeting was held April 5 in Stockton. Agricultural Hall was crowded, and the meeting was addressed by Judge Thomas Dame, president of the Western Pacific, Timothy G. Phelps and several local speakers.

The following month, May 12, a special election was held. The citizens voted on three propositions—$250,000 for the Western Pacific, $100,000 for the Stockton and Copperopolis Railroad and $50,000 for the Mono and Big Trees road. The citizens gave a good majority for the Western Pacific and the Mono roads bonds, but the bonds for the Stockton and Copperopolis road, a purely local affair, were defeated. The county vote for the Western Pacific bonds was 1505 for and 502 against. The city vote was 1041 for and 85 against. Four days after the election Supervisors Henry Thornlow and Moses Severy, and Thomas Dame, president of the Western Pacific railroad, and County Clerk Hall were instructed to prepare the bonds, and an order was made for engraving the plate "for the use benefit and advantage of San Joaquin county." All fine engraving was then done in New York, and, as it took some time to get the plate, no bonds were issued until May, 1864, at which time B. F. Mann came to Stockton and carried away in his pocket fifty $1,000 bonds, it being understood that the money was to be used in the construction of the road in San Joaquin County only. Soon there were reports of misrepresentation and fraud on the part of the company, and in December, 1864, John Tuohy was sent to San Francisco to vote the stock of the county at the railroad meeting and make an investigation regarding the rumors. On returning he gave a detailed history of the road and ended his report by saying, "I found it impossible to get the directors to commence work in San Joaquin County, although it was represented to citizens that the amount subscribed by San Joaquin should be expended in the county." The people were now up in arms against the railroad company because it had not lived up to its representation. No railroad could be built piece by piece in the manner contemplated. A similar promise had been made in Santa Clara County, and it was fulfilled, the contractors working from that point toward Stockton. Soon it began to be whispered that the supervisors and the railroad were very friendly, notwithstanding the people's protest, and in August, 1865, Judge Dame secured a further subscription for $50,000 worth of bonds. After this the talk became pretty warm, and when Charles Fox, the new president of the Western Pacific, appeared before the supervisors and requested that the balance of the bonds ($100,000 worth) be issued, not only was his request refused but the supervisors refused to give him the installments then due ($50,000) until the people were satisfied that everything was right. The air was now filled with wild rumors, and to know in part, at least, why Stockton was already so bitterly opposing the progress of the Western Pacific and the Central Pacific we must relate a little inside history. San Francisco, in 1863, voted bonds in the sum of $1,000,000 to the Western Pacific and the Central Pacific, but the board of supervisors refused to issue them. Frank McCoppin declared in unmeasured terms his antagonism to the railroad, and Fred MacCrellish of the Alta referred continuously to the so-called "Dutch Flat swindle." Leland Stanford, as president of the Central Pacific, invited the supervisors to inspect his work, and they appointed McCoppin and E. Torrey, with an expert bookkeeper, to go to Sacramento and examine the railroad's books. Stanford refused to show his books. Would any business man have done otherwise when an enemy was sent to look over the books when other railroad companies were doing all within their power to obstruct the progress of the Central Pacific? The contract was let to Charles McLaughlin to grade the road from San Jose to Stockton, seventy-five miles. Lewis was chief engineer of the road, and August 5, 1865, his men set stakes 100 feet apart along El Dorado Street, the line running through Woodbridge, crossing the Mokelumne at that point, and continuing one-half mile west of Liberty. From Sacramento to the summit of the mountains 105 miles of road were already in successful operation. An excursion of newspaper men had gone over the road and one writer, in a paper of December 7, said: "It is hoped to put the Legislature next Saturday through a bigger bore than they ever met in political life—a tunnel (one of eleven) 1,659 feet long." In the meantime the Western Pacific company were unable to finance the road and they turned it over to the contractor, McLaughlin. He also failed to carry out the project and in March, 1864, McLaughlin sold his franchise, shovels, scrapers and all road building material to Stanford & Company. Then came the report, fully confirmed, that the Central Pacific had taken the franchise of the Western Pacific. At this time the county had paid in interest to the Western Pacific $28,780 in gold coin and, said Editor Geddes: "What had the company done? Graded a few miles of road (in Santa Clara County). As a matter of fact the whole thing has been a swindle since the time when Judge Dame engineered the bill through the Legislature up to the present time."

Copperopolis Road

In 1860 several miners prospecting for gold in Calaveras County discovered rich croppings of copper ore. The valuable mineral was found in large quantities. Copperopolis was founded, the mines were developed and as early as 1862, 3,000 tons of copper ore had been taken out, the amount gradually increasing until 1865, when, from February to September, 16,400 tons of ore were taken from the mines. The transportation of this ore to Stockton at eight dollars per ton, gave employment to hundreds of men, including teamsters with their horses, mules and oxen, and annually they expended thousands of dollars in this city. Several enterprising citizens, led by Dr. E. S. Holden, believing that a railroad to the coppertown would be a paying investment and of great advantage to Stockton, organized the Stockton & Copperopolis Railroad Company. In March, 1862, Samuel Myers introduced a bill into the Legislature authorizing the construction and granting the right-of-way to Dr. Holden and others for such a road, and R. P. Handy, the county surveyor, was employed to make the survey. Three months later he reported a line forty-eight miles in length, which would cost, fully equipped with locomotives, cars, depots, etc., $1,181,400. The cost of the road simply staggered the directors and the enterprise seemed dead. It had one promoter who knew no such word as failure, and in December, 1865, Dr. Holden again came to the front as president of the company, with George Gray, Timothy Page, T. P. Anthony, George S. Sanderson, C. T. Meader, H. B. Underhill and W. K. Reed and Thomas Hardy of Copperopolis as directors. Things looked encouraging, and said the press, "There is little doubt but what the work will go on in good shape, for the directors and officers are all men of business competency and energetic minds. Subscription books were now opened but although many subscribed, only a few paid in their assessments, as the knockers were at work, and they declared a railroad would destroy business in the city.

The only people alive to the future interest of the county were those of Farmington. In a meeting held in the schoolhouse April 5, 1863, they declared: "This community is composed of solid firms and sturdy mechanics, who have lived where the steam whistle of the locomotive greeted the ears daily, and we have noticed that the railroad enhances the value of property and vitalizes all kinds of business. We, therefore, sanction and favor railroad enterprises in our vicinity." This report was signed by John Campbell, S. Dunham and David F. Hadley. A most important special election was about to take place May 12, 1863, the people to vote on bonds of $100,000 for the Stockton & Copperopolis railroad. George Gray, mayor-elect, in his inaugural address May 11, said: "We have allowed the golden movements to fly by unimproved in the past but the opportunity again presents itself to make Stockton what she might and ought to have been in years gone by. Our only salvation depends on our efforts this time to advance her interests."

On the day of election there was considerable excitement and much angry talk, and in some places, in the county and the city, notably the third ward, there was a strong and determined fight to defeat the bonds. They were defeated, the total vote in the county being 967 for, and 1048 against. Woodbridge voted yes, 36, no 105. They opposed it because the road would not benefit their part of the country, (the Governor at that time had signed a bill for a railroad from Woodbridge to Mokelumne City), and Lockeford for the same reason gave one vote for the road and 50 against it. Linden saw the doom of agriculture and voted 7 yes, and 79 no, and Farmington said 39, yes, 7 no. In the city 766 said aye, 288 nay. The third ward gave a majority of 88 against the bonds, they raising the same cry as that of 1856: "What will our blacksmiths and wagonmakers do for work if the railroad be constructed? It will put all of our teamsters out of business, our stage drivers and stablemen out of business, for there will be no work for the horses, mules and oxen and no sale of hay, barley or oats, as the work animals will all be driven out of the country."

To be sat down upon by those you are endeavoring to assist is a rather discouraging proposition, but Dr. Holden, an undying promoter, was again busy, and in November, 1865, the Stockton & Copperopolis road was again incorporated, and Surveyor John Wallace, accompanied by the doctor, found a much shorter and less costly route, and Ivers & Nagle took a contract to complete the work. They graded twelve miles and then stopped work, as there was no money in sight to pay them. Copper had depreciated in value from 17 to 12 shillings in England, something never before known, and C. T. Meader, one of the heaviest backers of the road, failed for nearly $2,000,000. In the meantime Dr. Holden went to Congress and assisted by the California congressmen, got a law passed granting to the Stockton & Copperopolis Railroad, 250,000 acres of land along the route, the road to be completed on or before July 4, 1872.

As the road now had a money value, under certain conditions, and copper had risen in value, railroad men and capitalists began to sit up and take notice, and in November, 1869, a new board of directors were elected, men identified with the California Pacific Railroad. Gen. John C. Sullivan was placed in charge of the work. Said a San Francisco paper April 25, 1870: "The construction of this long-mooted scheme is now assured. The contract has been let for the grading of twenty miles of road, twelve miles are already graded and General Sullivan will complete the road to the mines within eighteen months." Who was General Sullivan? Nobody knew. Who is building the road? Nobody knew except a few of the Stockton directors. From this time on everything to the public and the press was mysterious, and there was "a nigger in the wood pile" just as there had been in the Western Pacific and the Central Pacific.

Previous to the transfer of stock to San Francisco stockholders, Dr. Holden, in February, 1869, petitioned the supervisors for the $100,000 in bonds which it was reported had been returned to them from the Western Pacific, and in October the council received a petition signed by many taxpayers, requesting them to subscribe to the amount of $100,000 on the books of the railroad company, the bonds to be issued when ten miles of the road was completed and in running order, provided the road had its terminus on the waterfront. The council refused to take any action.

Nearly a year passed. As we have noted, the enterprise is in the hands of non-citizens, and the mystery grows interesting in the latter part of the year, for in November, 1870, the council granted the right-of-way to the Stockton & Copperopolis Railroad down Weber Avenue to the waterfront, the council reserving full control of the wharves. No liquor was to be sold in the depot or upon the street. After the council passed the ordinance the managers of the road invited the council to a social gathering at the Weber House, the first and last instance of Stockton officials banqueting with railroad magnates, as for over twenty years Stockton was fighting the railroad. Sparkling champagne flowed freely, and speeches were made by Mayor Evans, Councilman Ellesworth, Cunningham and Belding, and by McDonald and Moulton of the new road. A toast was proposed and drank to Dr. E. S. Holden, then sick abed, "the promoter and champion of the railroad."

In less than a week after the passing of the ordinance the citizens began to open their eyes, for there appeared at the wharf a new steamer, the W. H. L. Moulton, with a cargo of ties, spikes and iron for the new road, together with hand cars bearing the stamp of the California Pacific Railroad. Two days later, November 29, the engineers began laying the track up Weber Avenue, commencing at the corner of Center Street and the sidewalk was filled with an eager crowd, all discussing the railroad proposition, who was building it and where it was going.

The rails were laid up the avenue to Union Street, then outside of the city limits, a curved track was laid from the Central Pacific to the Stockton and Copperopolis track, and a California Pacific locomotive and eight platform cars coming over the Union Pacific from Sacramento were switched to the new track. In less than a year, September 1, 1871, all of the California Pacific railroads were absorbed by the Central Pacific and they for more than twenty years ran their locomotives to the waterfront. Then by an agreement of the merchants along the avenue and an ordinance by the council, granting them waterfront privileges below El Dorado Street, they removed their track.

The 14th of December, 1870, was hailed as the "dawn of a new era," for on that day the first locomotive was run to the waterfront. It was a great day in Stockton, and Weber Avenue was lined with people anxiously awaiting the appearance of "the people's railroad train." The locomotive Copperopolis had been steamed up and about 1 o'clock, hauling six platform cars, crowded with men and boys, she started down towards the levee. Her starting was announced by the firing of cannon and the pealing of the fire bell. As the train slowly moved down the avenue, it was greeted by the cheers of the crowd, and the waving of thousands of handkerchiefs. At El Dorado Street the engine was stopped and General Evans immediately shouted, three cheers for the first locomotive to come to the waterfront. The cheers were heartily given, followed by three cheers for Dr. Holden, the father of the Stockton & Copperopolis Railroad. Dr. Holden, called upon for a speech, spoke a few words, and then introduced Col. J. P. Jackson, president of the California Pacific Railroad and secretary of the Stockton & Copperopolis.

The road was completed to Milton May 1, 1871, and passenger trains began running. Ten days later the superintendent, W. H. L. Moulton, ran an excursion train to that point, the fare being seventy-five cents for the round trip.

Soon after the Civil War the air was filled with paper railroads, so to speak, and there were no less than seven railroad schemes projected. The Stockton & Copperopolis promoters were striving for recognition, and about the same time a company organized in San Francisco, July 1864, as the San Francisco & Atlantic road, proposed to build a line from San Francisco across to the Sierras by the way of Stockton. The directors asked for a right of way through the county, and the citizens "generously" guaranteed the company the right-of-way provided they would run their line through the corporate limits of the city.

In the public discussion which was held in the city hall one of the speakers, L. T. Carr, a local attorney, in no way then or later connected with the railroad, gave the citizens some advice, which had they followed it in 1869 Stockton would have been twenty-five years ahead of its present growth. Mr. Carr said: "Every inducement should be given to the railroad to your city even to your very doors. Corporations have no souls, and if you gentlemen will look at the matter in its proper light you will see that the company will construct its road for its own profit, rather than for the benefit of the city. It is the duty of the people of Stockton to bring the road to this city if they have not only to erect a depot and other buildings at the city expense, but also to guarantee them the right-of-way through the entire county." This is what the city later did for the Valley or Spreckels' road.

The San Joaquin Valley Railroad

The Central Pacific in 1868 announced their purpose to build a road down the San Joaquin Valley and a branch road to Oregon, but they were undecided from what point to commence their southern road—French Camp, Shepherd's Ferry on the San Joaquin river, or Stockton. Immediately an opposition line, known as the San Joaquin Valley road was incorporated, February 5, 1868, to run to a point on the Kern River, in Tulare County, 300 miles. It did not receive much encouragement in Stockton. In San Francisco the directors were turned down with the remark that another road had declared its purpose to build down the valley (Stanford's) within six months and two parallel roads would not pay. The company went on with its work and surveyed a line to the Stanislaus River, set stakes for a distance of twelve miles and several of the directors went East and purchased iron and spikes to be immediately shipped around Cape Horn. In February the council refused them a right-of-way through Sutter Street down Hazelton Avenue to the waterfront. The company asked the citizens to subscribe $100,000 to the project and October, 1868, a mass meeting was held to consider the proposition. The people would not take any stock and only $90,000 could be obtained. Another public meeting was held in March, 1869, and a committee was appointed with Edward Moore as chairman to strengthen the old organization, and they reported that $100,000 was insufficient. Even twenty miles of road could not be built for less than $300,000. At their recommendation the old company was dissolved and a new company was organized. The people having full faith in the new organization voted almost unanimously authorizing the council, if permitted by the Legislature to loan the credit of the city to the Stockton & Tulare Company in bonds of $300,000 and at a council meeting held September 28, 1869, the company declared it their intention to build a railroad, commencing at the waterfront, to Visalia, Stockton forever to remain the terminus of said road, provided the city issue its bonds for $300,000 to said road, $50,000 to be paid when five miles were completed and $50,000 for every additional five miles until the whole sum be paid. The document was signed by Timothy Page, president, and Frank Stewart, secretary.

Governor Stanford's Proposition

Governor Stanford, awake to all of the railroad schemes going on in the State, heard of this proposition and came to Stockton. He presented to the Council a proposition: "Understanding that the city of Stockton proposed to loan the sum of $300,000 in her bonds, I desire to submit the following proposition: The Central Pacific will build seventy-five miles of their road, from a point in the city to be designated by the mayor and common council, the right-of-way to be given, and when the seventy-five miles are completed so that locomotive and car shall pass over it, there shall be delivered to the company the full amount of the bonds. We guarantee the building of thirty-five miles of the road in one year from that date." Then another railroad proposition was read and signed by men who were stockholders in the Stockton & Tulare road, and they asked the council to delay action for thirty days. "It seems to me, Mr. Stanford's proposition is all that can be desired," said Councilman Humphrey. Evans' thought it would be well to appoint a committee to make a specified agreement in regard to the line of the road. "It is the desire of the Councilmen to have a statement made upon that point?" Mayor Hickman inquired. "Yes," was the reply. In the audience sitting near the door was Dr. Grattan. "Doctor," said Mayor Hickman, "will you be kind enough to go to the Yosemite Hotel and escort ex-Governor Stanford to the council chamber." The railroad magnate arriving, he was introduced to the council by Mayor Hickman and cordially received.

"Governor," inquired General Evans, "may I with propriety ask you at what point your road will cross the Tuolumne River?" "I cannot say without a map, but it will be somewhere near Empire City." Edward Moore then inquired: "At what point does your road intend to connect with the Western Pacific; any other point than Stockton?" Adroitly Stanford replied: "The company will exhaust their franchise in building one road up the valley. It will form a part of the great trunk line connecting the Southern Pacific with Oregon. It is not the object of the company to overlook and ignore the business of Stockton, but rather their aim to enlarge it." Then a conversation took place, the correctness of which is not positively known. It has been reported, true or untrue, the writer cannot say, that Mayor Hickman then inquired: "Governor, what do you intend to charge for freight and fares?" Stanford replied angrily: "None of your —— business," and immediately left the room. The council appointed a committee of three, George Evans, J. M. Kelsey and Edward Moore, to confer with Stanford regarding his proposal. They succeeded in having one interview. After that interview he was too busy to see them. What took place between him and the directors of the Stockton & Tulare Railroad is not publicly known, but they sold their franchise to the Central Pacific. During this time the Stanford road, passing outside of Stockton, reached the San Joaquin River. Surveyors had been locating a bridge across the Stanislaus River, and Turton, Know & Ryan with men, horses, carts and scrapers had been waiting orders to commence grading from Wilson's, now Lathrop, or from Stockton. Some mysterious event settled the question, and the southern road moved on from Lathrop, but they, as well as Stockton, lost in the deal. Said Charles Crocker to a friend many years after: "We made a great mistake that we did not put our road several miles nearer the foothills and commence at Stockton." The Santa Fe now covers that territory. The company built a large hotel at Lathrop and installed therein H. A. Bloss, who had run the restaurant and bar in their Stockton depot. The hotel was opened in May, 1870, with a grand ball and excursion from Stockton. The hotel was destroyed by fire May 10, 1871, and, being rebuilt, was again burned in 1888. The town was named after Charles Lathrop, the brother-in-law of Stanford, and the Central Pacific did everything possible to establish a town as a rival to Stockton. A discrimination was made and freight and passengers were carried to Lathrop cheaper than to Stockton. This was years before the organization of the Railroad Commission.

The Stockton & Visalia Railroad

Believing that if Stanford built his road down the southern valley it would greatly injure the trade of Stockton, several citizens formed a company, incorporating as the Stockton & Visalia Railroad, intending it to parallel the Central Pacific's road to Bakersfield. Bills were introduced into the Legislature by State Senator H. M. Orr and Assemblyman Hubner, authorizing the city council and the supervisors to call a bond election for the bonding of Stockton for $300,000 and the county for $200,000, said bonds to be issued to the Stockton & Visalia road. The bill passed the Legislature and was signed by the Governor, although it was strongly fought by the Central Pacific, Western and Southern Pacific directors.

Stanford was not the only individual that was up to "schemes that were dark and tricks that were vain," as Bret Harte said of the Heathen Chinee, for the Stockton schemers said, "The suburbs of Stockton will receive as much benefit from the new road as the city proper. Let us annex them to the city and make them pay their proportion of the proposed bond tax." The railroad citizens wanted the outside assistance and one newspaper went so far as to declare that the building of the road depended upon the annexation of the suburbs. The "outsiders" were strongly opposed to uniting with Stockton in her fortune or misfortune, and in a mass meeting held in the Vineyard school house, October 16, 1869, about forty persons present, Daniel Severy, chairman, only four voted for annexation. Another meeting was held January 3, 1870, in which, like most political conventions, everything was "jobbed" previous to the gathering. The pro-railroad promoters allowed a free discussion of the annexation question, for they had everything "packed" and the vote was then taken with thirty-six yes, twenty-two no, and the meeting adjourned with three cheers for the Stockton & Visalia Railroad. In the Legislature H. B. Underhill and T. R. Moseley appeared as the representatives of the Central Pacific, opposing the bill, and Stanford appeared personally before the committee on corporations and argued against it, maintaining that Stockton had no right to bring his property into the city and tax it to help support an opposition railroad. His argument was unsuccessful and General Evans telegraphed to his partner, John H. O'Brien, June 25, 1870, that Governor Haight had signed the annexation bill, the new territory being liable for no old city debts prior to February 1, 1870. Notice that the city council wrangled for some length of time regarding the street through which they would permit the Central Pacific to run, and now they go two blocks east of the old city and bring in the road, thus compelling Stanford to pay city taxes. The annexed city one half mile on each side with boundaries at North, South, East and West Streets (Pershing Avenue), was not subject to the city old debts. An enthusiastic mass meeting was held in Hickman's Hall April 6, called by 146 prominent citizens, and speeches strongly advocating the carrying of the bond election were made by Judge Cavis, W. S. Montgomery, Rev. J. H. Giles, James A. Daly, and Edward Moore, the later declaring that the directors of the Stockton & Visalia road would pledge themselves to commence work at once and carry it on until the Merced River was reached. The merchants all closed their stores on election day, deeming it of the greatest importance. The vote was for $500,000 bonds, city and county. The city voted for both municipal and county bonds, 1329 yes; 14 no; for the county bonds, 1357 yes; 17 no. The county vote was 1965 yes; 626 no. Woodbridge, Poland, Lockeford, Liberty, Tulare, and Union gave large majorities against the bonds. The result made happy the citizens and they believed the directors would faithfully carry on the work. The bill called for a railroad from tidewater in Stockton directly across the Stanislaus River to Visalia, and H. S. Sargent and Edward Moore were appointed as the trustees to receive the county bonds, and B. W. Bours, Geo. W. Kidd and J. M. Kelsey trustees of the city bonds. The council gave the right-of-way to the company down Hazelton Avenue, and in May Chief Engineer Bender began his survey to the Stanislaus River. Before he reached the river, he was recalled, for Governor Haight, as a constitutional lawyer, had given his decision in another case which might invalidate the Stockton bond issue. There was peculiar work going on somewhere in Sacramento for it was declared that the Stockton & Visalia road "will go on notwithstanding the combination of the Central Pacific, the Sacramento Union and Governor Haight."

A long-drawn-out lawsuit now began. On June 16, 1870, J. A. Jackson, of the Stockton & Visalia road, demanded of the common council that they levy a tax to meet the payment of the interest on the bonds due in July. The council refused the demand and June 28th they were served with a notice from John B. Hall and John McConnell, for the Stockton & Visalia, that they had applied to the Supreme Court for a peremptory writ of mandamus to compel the council to levy the tax. The council put their case in the hands of the city attorney, W. S. Montgomery, authorizing him to push the case to a final conclusion, but what was the surprise five months later to learn that four of the most eminent lawyers of the state were pleading Stockton's case, and filing briefs asking the Court for a continuance. "How is this?" the council asked of Montgomery. "I don't know," he replied, "the only city representative to my knowledge is the attorney-general, Joe Hamilton."

The directors of the Stockton & Visalia railroad held their annual meeting December 2, 1870, and elected as director for the year, Austin Sperry, Louis Haas, Edward Moore, A. W. Simpson, Geo. W. Kidd, J. M. Kelsey, James A. Crow, John Sedgwick and Frank Stewart. The road was turned over to the California Pacific in August, 1871, and by August 25 they had built a road from Peters to Farmington. Continuing on it reached Oakdale, October 1, and October 13 the Champions of the Red Cross gave an excursion to Oakdale over the so-called Stockton & Visalia railroad. Three days later, October 16, 1871, the council met, and Edward Moore, as president of the Stockton & Visalia road, presented a request accompanied by a statement sworn to before a notary public, that the Stockton & Visalia Railroad had been laid from tidewater in Stockton for a distance of fifteen miles, and that cars and engine were running on said road. The request asked the council by resolution to accept said road, but in committee of the whole November 6, 1871, the council declared: "We consider the same insufficient to warrant the council in passing said resolution." The councilmen were: T. B. Buck, C. S. Eickelberger, R. E. Wilhoit, R. B. Lane, J. S. Davis, J. W. Hammond, J. C. Gage, Wm. Inglis, John Robertson, and John Nicholas. Suit was then commenced against the company by City Attorney James A. Louttit for unlawful usury of franchise. In the following month, the Central Pacific Railroad Company appeared as the owners of the road. The suits regarding the bonds of this road and those of the Western Pacific road were carried on for twelve or fifteen years and finally terminated in a compromise.

Projected Road to Visalia

Foiled, but not disheartened, a third attempt was made to run a road from Stockton to Visalia, and February 3, 1873, the Stockton & Tulare, narrow guage, was incorporated, with B. W. Bours, president; Frank T. Baldwin, secretary; and T. K. Hook, treasurer, and the following directors: R. E. Hyde, E. Jacobs, Tulare; H. C. Daulton, Fresno; C. M. Blair, Merced; A. Leach, Stanislaus; and B. W. Bours, T. K. Hook, Dr. Charles Grattan, George F. Smith, and R. C. Sargent, San Joaquin. A mass meeting had been previously held, and $5,500 had been subscribed on the spot for the people's road. The people along the entire route were anxious for a railroad to the waterfront and they promised to give dollar for dollar with Stockton. The proposed line of road ran near Modesto through Merced and Snellings to Visalia, the road to run parallel with the Southern Pacific five miles nearer the foothills. Archibald Blair was selected as chief engineer, and with a surveying corps comprising James Thorburn, transitman; James Sharrott and George H. Tinkham, chainmen; Henry Smith, axeman; Lon McCloud, teamster, and Joe White, cook, the party began their tramp for Visalia, 160 miles. According to orders the chief surveyed a line not exceeding a one per cent grade, sixty feet to the mile, and completed the work in five months. The cost was found so great, especially in "fills and cuts," that the work was given up.

Twenty-five years passed and the greater part of the pioneers of state and county had lain down their burdens. The Central Pacific and its southern branch had brought thousands of immigrants into California, new homes were founded, new lands developed, and new cities builded. The population of San Joaquin had also largely increased—from 11,000 to 28,000—and lands that at one time sold for thirty-six dollars an acre had tripled in value. County and city had grown, not because of the railroad, but in spite of it, for in every manner possible discriminations were made against Stockton's trade and transportation facilities. The Central Pacific endeavored to injure the city "from pure cussedness" as a newspaper put it, compelling persons travelling East to go to San Francisco to purchase their tickets and Pullman berths; compelling all Westward travelers to buy tickets for Sacramento or San Francisco; compelling all west-bound freight to be carried to San Francisco and returned at extra cost; carrying wheat from the south to Port Costa, cheaper than to Stockton, although fifty miles greater in distance; prohibiting the sale of local newspapers on their trains, and their employes from residing or purchasing goods in Stockton; publishing railroad maps and distributing freely throughout the East, with Stockton's location a blank place on the map; working most persistently "to make the grass grow in the streets of Stockton." But beautiful may the flowers yearly bloom over the graves of Leland Stanford, Mark Hopkins, Charles Crocker and C. P. Huntington, for they accomplished a magnificent work for California, and although they are in peaceful rest, Stockton still lives.

The Tesla Coal Road

In the spring of 1861 coal was discovered in Corral Hollow, a point in the Mt. Diablo Range, about thirty miles from Stockton. Several expert coal miners pronounced it a very valuable discovery, as the surface croppings indicated a vast bed of fine coal.

A number of Stocktonians, including D. G. Humphrey, A. W. Simpson, Robert Miller, George Gray, J. M. Hogan, Benjamin Lippincott and H. Tinkham, incorporating under the name of the Commercial Coal Mining Company, purchased the property, and sinking a shaft 180 feet in depth, they expected to make their fortune. After spending several thousand dollars, they found it would take at least a half million to fully develop the mine and market the coal, and all work ceased. In 1894 Hyland E. Barber, a Stockton boy, began quietly to buy up all the shares of the company. He had no difficulty purchasing at his own price, paying as low in some cases as two dollars per share—clear gain, the sellers believed—and when he had purchased all the shares, it was learned that he was the agent for the Treadwell brothers, two miners who had made several millions in the Alaska gold fields. Learning of this undeveloped valuable coal mine in Corral Hollow, they sent their expert on coal to examine it, and they pronounced it a mine of great value and there was "millions in it." Tests of the coal were made in mill furnaces, steamboats and locomotives and they pronounced it excellent coal. After purchase, the Treadwells and others interested with them, expended nearly a million dollars in opening the mine and in improvements. To market the coal they incorporated the Alameda and San Joaquin Railroad, with E. B. Pond, a former mayor of San Francisco; B. M. Bradford, J. Dalzell Brown, a banker, R. D. Frye, and John Treadwell, directors. Plans and specifications were completed for a railroad from the mine to Mohr's Landing on Middle River, a distance to tidewater of eight-teen miles, but the Stockton Commercial Association, learning of the project, believed that under certain inducements, the road could be brought to Stockton, as they would have equal advantages of water transportation and a local market for their product. In May, 1895, John Treadwell and John Coleman visited this city and were shown the greater advantages of Stockton over their proposed terminus on Middle River. The company concluded to make the change at an additional expense of $150,000 and a ten-mile longer run. The company intimated that they would ask no money bonus, but would demand certain concessions. Stocktonians were anxious to learn if they were negotiating for a gold brick or an enterprise of advantage and benefit to the Gateway City, so a party, comprising P. A. Buell, Frank S. Boggs, Charles M. Weber, H. H. McWilliams of the Crown mill and a representative of the Record, Irving Martin, visited the mine May 25, 1895, and they were surprised at the amount of work that had been done. In June E. B. Bond, John Coleman and John Treadwell met the Commercial Association members and demanded the right of way through the city to the water front and county rights to the San Joaquin County boundary line, which it was estimated would cost about $10,000. Although the city "had been milked dry," as one member expressed it, the Association agreed to meet the demands. Orrin Henderson, then a supervisor, stating that the official body would give every assistance and the new council just sworn in and Mayor Boggs said they would give the right of way through the streets.

The City Fathers, riding over the route, concluded to give the coal road right of way over Hunter Street to Hazelton Avenue, to Edison, to the Levee. The route was satisfactory to the company, but when the ordinance came up for the second reading there was trouble. The Council chamber was crowded and protests were made by the milling companies and by Robert Watt of the San Francisco and San Joaquin Valley road, that the coal road was cutting out his company from the water front. Ross C. Sargent, who had given the coal road the right of way through his land, exclaimed, "I am friendly to both roads. Why should not the coal road be given a chance to get to the water front? They didn't ask anything of the town." The matter was finally adjusted, and August 29 the ordinance was passed, Councilmen Lang, Martin, Burton and Quinn voting yes, and Koch voting no, the latter contending that because of the narrow strip of land provisions should have been made over the Mormon Channel route, for other railroads to use the tracks. In September the company at a cost of $50,000, purchased a piece of property on the water front and immediately erected large and expensive coal bunkers. The rights of way through the county were obtained. Surveyor George Atherton staked out the road bed and in December the construction train was running to the San Joaquin River. Early in 1896 the company began hauling coal from the mine and depositing it in the coal bunkers. The subsequent history of this road spells disaster and ruin. Building a large briquette factory with splendid and costly machinery, twice was it destroyed by fire; the second time also destroying the coal bunkers. The coal was unsalable, and the heavy outlay, with no revenue, nearly bankrupted the heaviest incorporators. The experts had all pronounced the coal first class.

The Claus Spreckels Railroad

The Gateway City was not the only victim of the Central Pacific, for San Francisco was charged "all the traffic will bear." They were actually slaves to the railroad company, so far as concerned trade, and when efforts were made to obtain money for the building of the valley road, the merchants "were reluctant to subscribe, as the fear of the Southern Pacific was still a potent influence." However, they resolved to beard the lion in his den, and build a competing railroad down the valley to Bakersfield under the name of the San Francisco, Stockton & San Joaquin Valley Railroad. The project was started in 1893 but it hung fire for two years, the merchants fearing the wrath of the Southern Pacific, but it moved forward with a rush when Claus Spreckels in 1895 took the lead by subscribing $500,000, his sons subscribing $200,000. The terminus of the road was a most important question, and one of the heavy stockholders said it must be San Francisco, and he favored passing through San Jose, then into the San Joaquin Valley. This news so pleased the Garden City that February 21 they subscribed $14,000 for the road and held a jubilee illumination of the city, the cannons booming and the multitude repeatedly cheering. Stockton, Oakland, San Jose and even Antioch were bidding for the terminal point, and that, said the practical Claus Spreckels, depends entirely on circumstances. "We'll make diligent inquiry all along the different routes, and note the best advantages, and what the people will do for us; these things will have considerable bearing regarding the terminus," said Spreckels.

Early in the year, Stockton's people were up and doing, and January 29 they organized the Stockton Commercial Association, its principal object being to protect the commercial interests of Stockton. The association elected P. A. Buell, president; Charles J. Jackson, vice-president; Orrin Henderson, secretary; and William W. Westbay, treasurer, with an executive committee consisting of Sidney Newell, D. S. Rosenbaum, J. M. Welsh, H. J. Corcoran, P. A. Buell, William Inglis, Thomas Connelly, Orrin Henderson and George W. Tatterson. Assembling in their headquarters, February 5, they were discussing many "ifs and ands," how much money would be required, would the road pay, when and how should they commence canvassing for funds, and genial Louis Hansel quickly decided the question. "The business men of this town should raise $200,000. It takes money to build railroads; jawbone won't do it." They finally settled at $100,000 as the amount to be raised, deciding to begin canvassing at once, the subscriptions not to be binding upon the subscribers unless $100,000 were raised and Stockton the terminal point or on the main line. The committee began their canvass with $15,000 from the banks, $5,000 from the California Navigation Company, $100 from Louis Hansel and $5,000 from Ross C. Sargent, he to make it $10,000 if necessary. The citizens responded liberally, and in less than twenty days they had $92,000 in sight.

About the middle of February the citizens became anxious and Sidney Newell, J. M. Welsh, George Gray and D. S. Rosenbaum were appointed a committee to proceed to San Francisco and interview the directors of the Valley road. They were informed that as soon as the road was incorporated and the directors elected Stockton would have her day. That the directors might have something tangible on which to base their decision, the common council assembled in special session on March 16 and passed an ordinance granting the company the right of way along South or Clay Street and on Edison Street to the water front. From conversations held at different times, it was understood that the promoters considered $100,000 as nothing and they would demand at least twice that sum in yard sites, depots and rights-of-way. Provision had been made for these things should they demand them, and P. A. Buell had bonded several pieces of valuable property. Sending notice of their coming, six of the directors arrived on the evening train March 26, and they were met by members of the association, and escorted to the Yosemite Club rooms for lunch. The following day, accompanied by their chief engineer, W. F. Storey, who had previously been looking over the ground and necessary site, they drove around the city and then to the proposed route selected by their chief.

That evening the directors went into secret session with President F. A. Buell, to discuss the proposition made to them by the association, namely, $100,000 in stock, the right-of-way along Taylor Street to Edison, to the Levee, to El Dorado and four blocks of land for depots, free of cost. The directors accepted this liberal offer, provided the people also gave them, free of cost, 100 feet of right-of-way through the county to the boundary line, thirteen acres on the water front, then owned by Wilhoit & Devendorf, and twenty-five acres of Senator Boggs' land, which he valued at $10,000. It was a pretty steep demand, which would involve an extra expense of $75,000 at least, but the crucial period had arrived and the Stockton business men met it. While discussing the demand, William Inglis, speaking up, said: "Tell the gentlemen now that we accept the proposition." The motion to accept was immediately carried and the room rang with cheers for the San Joaquin Valley road.

Then came the question of raising the additional amount and as a starter a mass meeting was held April 5, with standing room only. The meeting was called to order by P. A. Buell, and speeches were made by Mayor McCall, Dr. Asa Clark, who said even his Chinese cook had donated $5; Dr. Grattan, who declared, "The people have been fooled by railroads in the past, but no doubt of this;" and by George Gray. As Mr. Gray arose John Milan shouted, "Three cheers for Mr. Gray," which were heartily given. The speaker asserted, "We have all seen railroads on paper in the past, and I have spent much money that way, but I think we shall have to support the directors." William C. Daggett also favored the road, the latter being one of the fourteen citizens who voted against the Stockton and Visalia deal.

There were speeches but no money in sight. A long silence intervened, the minutes between success and failure. John Milan turned the tide by shouting, "I can't raise any money but if it can't be raised, and you rich men won't subscribe, I will put up my little property at auction and let it go towards the fund." Honest, enterprising John Milan, had he been born a millionaire, Stockton would have been a paradise. Cheers and shouts of laughter greeted his Irish rally and immediately parties began subscribing, President Buell starting the list with an additional $1,000. In all, $12,000 was raised that night. Ten days later the subscriptions looked glorious, the total amount being $172,416, cash $81,596 and stock $90,900. This did not include receipts from entertainments, a concert at the theater, which netted $150, a picnic at the grove, $120, sale of 1,000 pounds of tea, nor a very unique paper, the first and only paper ever published in San Joaquin by lady editors and lady ad solicitors. The Stockton Mail was placed at the service of the ladies for Sunday, April 15, and they were to receive all the profits from advertisements and sale. The ladies selected Mrs. Clare Davis as editor, Mrs. W. D. Buckley, assistant editor, and advertising solicitors Mesdames Abbie Elsom, W. D. Rothenbush and D. Winters. The edition was a complete success and there was about $1,500 to turn over to the railroad fund.

Celebrating the Valley Road

Both citizens and directors fulfilled their promise to the letter and April 8, 1895, Chief Storey arrived with his engineering corps and began the preliminary surveys. By the middle of July the permanent line was staked, and July 20 grading commenced. That evening an impromptu celebration was held, in which all citizens took part. About 7:30 o'clock a procession was formed on the Court House Square, consisting of dirt carts, filled with men, three hacks, in which were seated Mayor Boggs, S. N. Griffith of Fresno, Street Superintendent Bidwell, Contractors Thornton, Doyle and McCarty, and P. A. Buell and S. N. Woods, followed on foot by boys and men. Led by the Sixth Regiment band playing "There'll Be a Hot Time in the Old Town Tonight," the procession marched up Weber Avenue to American Street, turning into Main. All along the street red fire glowed and Roman candles were plentiful. On arrival on the plaza speeches were made by Mayor Boggs and S. N. Griffith. In October, three new locomotives and six flat cars arrived over the Central Pacific. October 26 the Claus Spreckels was fired up by Engineer Henry Vogelsang, a Stockton boy, and with whistle tooting notes of joy, engine and flat cars were run down Taylor Street to the yard site. In less than a year the track was laid to Fresno, and October 5, 1896, the first train was run over the road from Stockton, filled with officers and invited guests. There was a celebration during the day, and that evening a banquet in the Hughes Hotel. Speeches were made by Governor Budd, Claus Spreckels, Attorney E. E. Preston and Arthur Levinsky.

The Santa Fe Overland Railroad

In less than three years the citizens learned much to their surprise and astonishment that Claus Spreckels, violating all honorable principles, wantonly deceived the too-confiding public and sold the San Joaquin Valley Railroad to the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railroad. To say that the citizens were angry, especially those who had worked so hard for the success of the Stockton road, does not express their indignation and humiliation. They had given Spreckels their time and right-of-way over Taylor Street to the water front and over $200,000 in money and land, believing that he would build a road down the valley to Fresno and make Stockton "the terminal point. It was the popular opinion that Spreckels was the agent of the Santa Fe, and that by camouflaging the public they could get a right-of-way into Stockton, a road to the water front and a nice little acreage of land, without any delay by law suits or whims of a council, without it costing them a cent. Experts wondered at the time why it was that a little 100-mile railroad was laying such an expensive road bed and such heavy iron rails, and when the Santa Fe took over the road publicly it was ready for the heaviest of locomotives. The Santa Fe immediately announced themselves ready for business carrying freight and passengers from San Francisco to Chicago. The freight and passengers were transported from the Bay City to Stockton by the California Steam Navigation Company and transferred their cars. A few months later the road was completed to Richmond Point. The first train from the East was a special, which passed through at 4:40 o'clock A. M., June 20, transporting 250 marines bound for China. This was followed by the first overland passenger train July 1 at 4:40 A. M. for San Francisco. The regular local passenger trains bound West left Stockton at 8:15 A. M. and 2:15 P. M. The overland East left San Francisco at 9 o'clock A. M. and the locals 4:10 and 8 P. M.

The Western Pacific

Stockton now had two overland competing railroads, the only city in the State with two roads except Oakland, and although it might have been beneficial to have had a short local terminal route down the valley it certainly was of greater benefit to have two overland competing roads. As I have stated the Central Pacific had been discriminating against Stockton in every manner possible, but now that discrimination ceased. The officials of each road very politely solicited the transportation business of the merchants until 1910. Then there came another competitor, the Western Pacific or Gould road, as it was then called. They came quietly into the city with no blowing of horns, or shouting, asked for no grants of land, no bond issues or money, and purchasing a right-of-way through the blocks on the west side of Union Street merely asked the common council for rights-of-way across the city streets. Again the people were astonished, and they asked, "Can this be a railroad, asking nothing from the public?" The third overland railroad was ready for business in December, 1909, with J. H. Mettler, who was formerly the traveling agent for the Denver and Rio Grande, as the Stockton passenger and freight agent. The passenger service was not opened until October, 1910, and at that time trains left Stockton for San Francisco at 7:10 A. M. and 3:10 and 4:10 P. M. Trains left San Francisco for Stockton 7:10 A. M., and 4:20 P. M. Now Stockton has three overland trains daily.

CHAPTER XXI

SECRET AND BENEVOLENT ORGANIZATIONS

STOCKTON is more than blessed with secret and kindred organizations, there being more than sixty societies and auxiliaries. The oldest and the greatest in number is the Free and Accepted Masons, with four blue lodges, three Eastern Star chapters and seven branch organizations. Masonry dates back to the days of King Solomon and the building of his temple, and Masonry in Stockton is as old as the city. Among the gold seekers who immigrated to California, there were hundreds of Masons and early in 1850 a number of Master Masons assembled one evening at the gate of Captain Weber's home on the peninsula and discussing the matter concluded to apply for a charter and institute a Masonic lodge. The first public announcement of any secret organization in the city was April 20, 1850. Hiram Green, a past worshipful master, inserted a notice in the Times inviting the brethren of the Masonic fraternity to attend a meeting in Dr. Hill's office over Nichols & McPherson's store. A number assembled and, having a dispensation issue, they instituted a lodge, calling it Yale lodge, after Gregory Yale, a San Francisco attorney with high rank in Masonry. The lodge existed only sixteen months and was disorganized September 10, 1851, as many disreputable persons had gained admittance.

San Joaquin Lodge No. 19, F. & A. M.

A second attempt to institute a lodge was successful and January 13, 1852, a notice appeared requesting all members in good standing belonging to the Masonic fraternity to send their names to H. Osborn Matthews, grain store, near the Main Street Hotel, the site now of the Farmers & Merchants Bank. San Joaquin lodge No. 19 was organized and February 11, 1852, we read "The members of San Joaquin lodge are requested to meet at their new hall on Center Street." May 11 the lodge was duly constituted and the following officers installed by the most worshipful grand master, B. D. Hyam; J. G. Candee, worshipful master; E. G. Andrews, senior warden; Rasey Biven, junior warden; E. W. Colt, secretary;

J. C. Morris, treasurer; William Hunter, senior deacon; R. F. May, junior deacon; M. Kierski, tyler, and Rev. James Woods, chaplain.

Morning Star Lodge No. 68, F. & A. M.

Politics was hot in those days over the slavery question and the members of San Joaquin lodge were not in harmony regarding slavery. When the American or Know Nothing party was organized in 1854, it created great dissension in the lodge, and many members withdrew from San Joaquin lodge December 28, 1854, and organized Morning Star lodge. The following were the first officers: Lemuel Lyon, worthy master; George S. Warren, senior warden; E. G. Vaughn, junior warden; J. M. Vansycle, treasurer; William H. Gray, secretary; V. M. Peyton, senior deacon; C. C. Gage, junior deacon; W. W. Stephenson, chaplain. Three of the fourteen charter members—W. W. Stevenson, H. C. Benson and J. C. Simmons—were ministers. The charter members were J. C. Jenkins, H. C. Benson, W. W. Stevenson, O. C. Gage, W. H. Gray, W. G. Canders, E. G. Vaughn, J. C. Simmons, W. F. McKee, E. G. Bateman, J. Burkhalter, J. M. Vansycle, Allen Lee Bours and Lemuel Lyon.

Delta Lodge No. 471, F. & A. M.

No more blue lodges were organized until 1918, when H. H. Grow, a very enthusiastic Mason and late arrival, thought it a good idea to organize another Masonic lodge. Without taking a member from the two pioneer lodges, the Delta lodge was organized January 12, 1918, and twenty-five members on the charter roll. The following were the first officers: Fred W. Moore, worthy master; P. E. Grady, senior warden; Samuel Gearhart, junior warden; R. M. Rosensteel, secretary; Will Davenport, treasurer; W. Thrayer, junior deacon; H. H. Grow, senior deacon; George M. Pease, senior steward; Harry M. Hudson, junior steward; Rabbi Emanuel Jack, chaplain.

Stockton Lodge No. 498, F. & A. M.

This lodge was instituted Feb. 2, 1921, with the following officers: Oliver Wisler, worshipful master; Joseph S. Cochran, senior warden;

Daniel A. Hathaway, junior warden; Arthur C. Potter, treasurer; Robert J. Le Clert, secretary; B. Randolph McGee, senior deacon; George Riceborough, junior deacon; John F. Blinn, senior steward; Samuel Lerner, junior steward; Irving M. Smith, chaplain. The institution was a very notable gathering of the brethren and the three lodges, San Joaquin, Morning Star and Delta, presented the new lodge with a set of fine jewels.

The York Rite Bodies

In the York rite bodies are the Royal Arch Chapter, the Royal and Select Council and the Knights Templar; on the opposite branch, the Scottish Rite comprises the Lodge of Perfection, the Chapter of Rose Croix, the Council of Kadosh and the Consistory; Stockton Chapter No. 28, R. A. M., was chartered May 10, 1861, with eighteen charter members as follows: Robert Porterfield, Fletcher C. Andrew, Royal B. Parket, James A. Jackson, D. E. McDonald, L. Kullmann, Alex Burkett, William H. Neal, Cornelius Carpenter, F. Bonacina, James Littlehale, C. L. Benedict, E. D. Eldridge, S. Eldridge, Charles Grunsky, I. D. Hamilton, E. B. Lockley and Lawrence C. Van Allen. The first officers were Robert Porterfield, high priest; Fletcher C. Andrew, king; Royal B. Parker, treasurer; James A. Jackson, captain of host; D. F. McDonald, principal sojourner; L. Kullman, royal arch captain; Alex Burkett, master third vail; W. H. Neal, master second vail; C. Carpenter, master first vail; James Littlehale, secretary; F. Bonicina, treasurer; C. L. Benedict, guard. Stockton Council No. 10, Royal and Select Masters was instituted March 31, 1869, with the following charter members: William A. Davies, G. B. Claiborne, Alex Burkett, Frank Stewart, R. W. Stevenson, D. W. Gelwicks, William T. Browne and S. H. Fickett. The first officers were: William A. Davies, thrice illustrious master; Gilbert C. Claiborne, deputy, I. M.; Alex Burkett, principal conductor of the works; Frank Stewart, treasurer; R. W. Stevenson, secretary. The Commandery No. 8, Knights Templar, the military branch of the order, was instituted April 3, 1867, with the following officers: S. H. Fickett, commander; R. C. Gridley, senior warden; James Littlehale, junior warden; William Black, standard bearer; David Deal, prelate; D. Brown, sword bearer. These officers and Rev. P. G. Buchanan, F. Bonicina and James Campbell constituted the charter membership.

The Scottish Rite bodies in Stockton are of a late date, Stockton Lodge of Perfection No. 12 having been instituted May 19, 1904, with the following officers: E. C. Stewart, venerable master; J. W. Rupert, senior warden; P. C. Krog, junior warden; Frank W. Goodrum, secretary; Fred W. West, treasurer. The charter members were: Michael Arndt, Peter C. Krog, E. Clement Stewart. Albert Pike Chapter No. 9, Knights of Rose Croix, was instituted January 31, 1906, with nine charter members: George F. Hudson, Fred L. Kincaid, John W. Moore, M. Arndt, Frank S. Boggs, John J. Cavanagh, Peter Krog, E. C. Stewart and Charles H. Wright. The officers were George F. Hudson, wise master; C. M. Kenniston, senior warden; Frank S. Boggs, junior warden; Frank Goodrum, secretary, and F. M. West, treasurer. W. Frank Pierce Council No. 9, Knights of Kadosh, was instituted April 1, 1911, with the principal officers: E. C. Stewart, preceptor; George F. Hudson, first sub-preceptor; J. E. Crump, second sub-preceptor; Fred L. Kincaid, chancellor; Frank S. Boggs, treasurer, and Frank W. Goodrum, recorder. These officers, including M. Arndt, George L. Brown, J. W. Moore; Francis A. McCan and E. C. Stewart are the charter members. Stockton Pyramid No. 5 of the Sciots was instituted June 16, 1917, with the following officers: Toparch, St. Elmo Trask; mohib, Dr. F. M. Caldwell; haruspice, Frank V. Mayo; pastophori, Dan P. Eicke; chancellor, C. T. Lyman; scribe, Henry Glick.

Home Chapter No. 50, O. E. S.

The order of Eastern Star dates from 1850, at which time the degrees were arranged by Robert Morris of Kentucky, and admits to membership the wives, daughters, sisters and mothers of Masons. Home Chapter No. 50 was instituted May 21, 1881. At that time the lodge was organized with the following officers: Worthy matron, Mrs. Hannah J. Thresher; worthy patron, Fred M. West; associate matron, Frank H. Kinsley; secretary, Eugene Lehe; treasurer, Benjamin F. Bagley; conductress, Hannah L. Henderson; associate conductress, Henrietta Lehe; Adah, Elmira West; Ruth, Louise M. Hatch; warden, Milton P. Henderson; sentinel, Morris H. Bond. The additional charter members were: M. S. Thresher, Frank S. Hatch, August McKinnon, Lucretia Campbell, D. L. Campbell, Charles D. Ruggles, Alexander A. Brooks, S. G. L. Dunbar.

Golden Poppy Chapter No. 355, O. E. S.

This lodge was instituted August 4, 1819, with the following officers: Worthy matron, Hettie L. Beaver; worthy patron, Herbert H. Grow; associate matron, Amelia W. Owen; secretary; Alta L. Lucas, treasurer; Mary Y. Merritt; conductress, Otilie D. Fink; associate conductress, Leora Ellis; chaplain, Clementine Grant; marshal, Carrie E. Burton; organist, Thora A. Booth; Adah, Bertha H. Kinney; Ruth, Mary Rosensteel; Esther, Queenie E.

Ray; Martha, Lulu L. Marnell; Electra, Marion C. Grow; warden, Effie C. Grimm; sentinel, Bertha L. Howard.

Stockton Chapter No. 373, O. E. S.

Stockton Chapter was instituted in May, 1921. The officers of the chapter are: Worthy matron, Stella Thornton; worthy patron, J. Sterling Cochran; conductress, Veda Hull Knowles; assistant conductress, Emma E. Tretheway; secretary, Laura Loudon Sherick; chaplain, Alice Henson; warden, Mary M. Knight; sentinel, Mabel Weaver; marshal, Alice Mary Potter; Adah, Jessie Leona Rose; Ruth, Frances Mary Dees; Esther, Ida May Bennett; Martha, Cyrene Mary Mallett; Electra, Nellie Lucy Cox.

Masonic Events

In 1852 Madame Biscacati, an Italian opera singer, gave a concert in Stockton, then offered to give a benefit concert. It was a kind offer, gratefully accepted, and the Odd Fellows and Masons marched to the church in a body; they realized about $200, each lodge taking one half. When their brother Mason, William Brown, was killed by an assassin the lodge offered a reward of $1,000 for his capture. It was the custom of both orders to parade in full regalia every Fourth of July, until 1860, but after that none but Union men celebrated the day. They celebrated St. John's day, June 24, sometimes with a parade and banquet, sometimes with a ball, and on one occasion, June 24, 1881, they chartered the steamer Herald and about 300 Masons and their families sailed to Mare Island; and after visiting the island they were the guests of the Vallejo Masons, returning home the following day.

Gilbert B. Claiborne, past master of San Joaquin lodge in 1860, was elected grand master October 16, 1865. As grand senior warden he took part in the laying of the cornerstone of the Agricultural Society building, where now stands the Yosemite building. Forty odd years passed, and Orrin S. Henderson, past master in 1890 of the Morning Star lodge, was elected grand master in 1902. Elected junior warden of the grand lodge in 1899 he was tendered a splendid reception by his Masonic brethren. One of the quaint members of the fraternity was Judge A. G. Brown, many years justice of the peace of Stockton, whose hobby was attending auction sales. Born in Maine in 1801, he came to California around Cape Horn in July, 1849, and located in Stockton. His first wife dying, at the age of seventy years he took a second bride. A past grand of Charity lodge No. 6, I. O. O. F., for nearly twenty years he was their financial secretary. For many years he was the chaplain of San Joaquin Lodge, F. & A. M. Over six feet in height, with his long gray hair and whiskers, in every Masonic parade, as he carried in front of him a large open Bible on a stand, and wearing a tall beaver hat, he was the most noticeable and venerable figure in the procession. At the time of his death, October 13, 1884, he was one of the oldest Masons in the United States. Mrs. Pauline W. Dohrmann, one of the noblest of Stockton's philanthropic women, elected worthy matron of Homo Chapter O. E. S., was elected grand matron in 1902.

The Masons, Odd Fellows and Sons of Temperance held their meeting in the same hall until 1855. Then the seceding members from San Joaquin Lodge rented and fitted up a hall in the north end of the Weber House. R. B. Parker, a Mason and a prominent merchant, concluded to move his grocery to the east, and purchasing a lot opposite the Hunter Street engine house he erected a two-story brick building 35x100 feet. This was in February, 1861, and fitting up the second story for the Masons, both lodges there remained for seven years. It was the first time that they had a suitable and convenient lodge room. It contained a lodge room 33x59 feet; a library, an ante room, wardrobe and reception room. In 1867 the Masons rented the south half of the third story of the Odd Fellows' building, fitted it up in splendid style and there remained some seventeen years.

The Masonic Temple

Some years previous to their removal to their own home the Masonic Hall Association was formed, April 29, 1874, with a capital of $40,000. The object of the association was to purchase real property, erect a building, improve, rent, and use the same. The Association was incorporated and articles filed May 8 with the following directors: E. R. Hedges, Frank Stewart, John K. Doak, George B. Claiborne, H. T. Dorrance, Joseph D. Peters, William Baggs and Dr. George A. Shurtleff. The destruction of the St. Charles Hotel by fire gave them a fine location, as they supposed, for a Masonic Temple and in February, 1875, they purchased the property. It was not considered large enough for their purpose and in 1883 they purchased additional property on the east where had stood the City Hotel, this giving them a lot 90x140 feet. At that time the Association had been reorganized with J. D. Peters, George A. McKensie, H. T. Dorrance, E. R. Hedges and John Caine directors, and the capital stock had been increased to $80,000. A three-story brick building was planned to cover the entire lot, with Masonic lodges in the third story, the second story a public hall, 60x86 feet and a stage, and stores in the first story. The cornerstone was laid June 9, 1883, with the members from the two Masonic lodges acting as grand officers. The cornerstone box of copper and iron was presented to the order by J. D. Peters, then president of the Association. The box contained his picture, a set of false teeth made by R. W. Henderson in 1858, the Masonic history of Judge A. G. Brown, a Mason since 1826, and many other articles.

The building was erected at a cost of nearly $100,000 and as it was heavily mortgaged it was a losing proposition from the beginning. Merchants considered it a poor business location, and the first story was vacant half of the time. The mistake was made not only in the location but in erecting the building some three feet above the street level, for it has been discovered that buyers are unwilling to walk up steps in entering a store. The interest on the mortgage was eating up the principal, and the Association began levying assessments. The members began selling their stock at any price and J. D. Peters bought it up. Suddenly, to the surprise of everybody, he renounced the Protestant religion, resigned from Masonry and becoming a Roman Catholic, sold all of his stock to Arthur Noble. The property was sold some two years ago to an Italian corporation. As heavy a loss as it was to the Masonic order, the hall was a great benefit to the citizens of Stockton, for it was and is today and will be until the erection of the splendid city auditorium, the only place in the city for large public gatherings. First we had the city hall, which would seat about 200; then Pioneer hall, on El Dorado Street, seating about the same number; Hickman hall seated probably 400; then the Masonic hall, with a crowding capacity of nearly 2,000 persons. This is the historic hall where assembled the state Democratic convention that fired from the party Stephen J. Field, judge of the Supreme Court, and Thomas Marshall, the attorney general. From that stage some of the finest orators and singers in the nation have entertained large audiences. State fraternal orders have there assembled, and many local entertainments have been held. Some years ago the hall was badly damaged by fire. At that time the entrance was on Bridge Street at the eastern corner of the building, and the stage in the west end. In refitting the building Mr. Noble at a cost of some $13,000 changed the entrance to El Dorado Street, and the stage to the east end of the hall, and laid a first-class maple wood dancing floor. Today the Masons, at a cost of nearly a half million dollars, have erected one of the most beautiful and convenient temples in California, on the site where I attended school in the late '50s.

In the early days, as we have already stated, there was much suffering and destitution among the pioneers, and to relieve that condition of affairs relief associations for the benefit of the Odd Fellows were formed in San Francisco, Sacramento and Stockton. In Stockton a relief association was formed November 13, 1850. They met in the law office of A. C. Bradford, an Odd Fellow and Mason; R. C. Chamberlain was elected chairman and they passed a resolution, "That an association of members of the I. O. O. F. be formed for the purpose of extending the benefits of the order to sick and indigent brothers and that members constitute a temporary committee to tender such aid to suffering brothers as may be necessary." They did not again assemble, for in the changing condition of those times, here today and there tomorrow, probably not one of those Odd Fellows were again in Stockton.

Charity Lodge No. 6, I. O. O. F.

No further attempt was made to form an association, nor were any Odd Fellow movements made until January, 1852. At that time the Odd Fellows started a lodge movement and in the San Joaquin Republican, January 10, 1852, this call appeared: "The members of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows residing in Stockton are requested to meet on Thursday evening next, January 13, at the common council rooms, McNish building, on business of importance to the order." It would seem by this notice as though they had had meetings previous to the 13th. Allowing no time to be lost, the day following their meeting, this notice was published:

"A meeting of the members of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows will be held at the city council chambers, McNish building (this stood on the northwest corner of Hunter and Channel streets), on Saturday evening next, the 17th, for the purpose of taking the preliminary step for the formation of a lodge. All members are invited to attend." There was no suitable room in town large enough for an assembly hall, but fortunately about this time a gambler named Shirley completed a small brick building on Center Street about 100 feet from Levee, rented the second story jointly to the Odd Fellows and Masons. On February 7 this notice was published: "An adjourned meeting of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows will be held at their new hall on Center Street, in Shirley's brick building, on this Saturday evening. It is to be hoped that every member of the order of Stockton will be present as all things are ready for the organization of a lodge." Again they were disappointed, for they had neglected to obtain a dispensation and without authority from the proper officer no lodge can be legally instituted. Post haste to San Francisco, E. G. Greenfield was sent to obtain a dispensation. In a few days he returned with a charter and on Saturday afternoon, February 14, instituted Charity Lodge No. 6 with six charter members: E. G. Greenfield, P. G. of New York; H. O. Mathews, P. G. of Pennsylvania; R. K. Chamberlain, P. G. of Alabama; Samuel McLean of Louisiana; William Garvin of Mississippi, and J. J. Bytler of New York. The following officers were elected and installed by E. G. Greenfield, deputy district grand master; Isaac Zacariah, noble grand; Samuel McLean, vice-grand; George B. Buffum, secretary, and H. Mitchell, treasurer.

The name Charity originated from an act of kindness to a brother in the fall of 1850. At that time a pioneer, named Jacob Letcher, a merchant of Mariposa, came to Stockton for medical attendance. His only acquaintance in the town was William Taylor, a Stockton grocer whose store was in the Mexican adobe building on Main Street just west of Center Street. The sick man was taken to his store, there being lodging rooms in the second story. Mr. Letcher gradually grew worse and the physician told him he could not recover. Being a member of Rockbridge lodge of Odd Fellows in Vermont, he inquired of his attendant, "Are there any Odd Fellows in Stockton?" "I don't know," he replied, "but I will ask Taylor." "Yes," answered Taylor, "Hugh Mitchell is an Odd Fellow." Mr. Mitchell was found and until the day of Letcher's death the sick brother received every possible attention. Brother Mitchell then going to the office of the Stockton Times ordered printed at his own expense a number of circulars with the three links at the top. The circulars which were posted on the houses, fences and trees, stated that an Odd Fellow brother, Jacob Letcher, died December 4 and that all Odd Fellows were requested to attend the funeral at the Taylor, Reed & Co. store. About twenty Odd Fellows were in attendance. A plain redwood coffin had been obtained at a cost of $50 and the body was taken to the place of burial, now the site of the county jail, there being no cemetery at that time. The brothers marched behind the body and at the grave repeated the prayers from memory as best they could, also the burial service, and sang the funeral hymn, "Brother, to thy grave we come at the beat of funeral drum," and thus was the first Odd Fellow in San Joaquin County buried.

Stockton Lodge No. 11, I. O. O. F.

This lodge was instituted June 24, 1853 by Deputy District Grand Master Edwin W. Colt. Its charter members, all former members of the present lodge, were: Thomas K. Hook, noble grand; Dr. Christopher Grattan, vice-grand; Alden Spooner, secretary; E. G. Greenfield, conductor; Westley Harris, Hugh Mitchell, M. Lindauer and J. C. Edwards, ex-Governor of Missouri. To pay their current expense they borrowed $1,500 of Charity lodge at three per cent interest per month. That lodge eight years later had plenty of money and they advertised in November, 1860, "To loan, $3,500 on city property, J. D. Wilkins, Moses Severy, Andrew Wolf, trustees." The first officers were: Thomas K. Hook, noble grand; Dr. Christopher Grattan, vice-grand; Alden Spooner, secretary, and E. G. Greenfield, conductor. Parker Encampment, which is the highest branch of the order, was instituted June 10, 1853, with the following charter members: E. W. Colt, Andrew Wolf, C. O. Burton, Rev. John B. Hill, M. B. Kenney, C. B. Phelps and John Fulton. The Encampment was instituted by Grand Master Samuel Parker and named in his honor. The first officers were: E. W. Colt, chief patriarch; M. B. Kenney, high priest; W. G. Phelps, senior warden; J. Fulton, junior warden; John B. Hill, guide; C. O. Burton, scribe; Andrew Wolf, treasurer. The Grand Encampment, organized in 1855, met that year in Stockton. They again met here in 1867, and October 8, 1918. C. O. Burton of No. 6 and Westley Minta and George Roesch of No. 11 are past grand patriarchs.

Truth Lodge No. 55, I. O. O. F.

This lodge was instituted December 18, 1884, by deputy grand master George W. Gallup, assisted by the grand secretary, Wm. B. Lyons and Daniel Norcross of San Francisco. The lodge was named Truth at the suggestion of J. Pitcher Spooner. Of the twenty-five charter members not one was drawn from the two older lodges. The following officers were elected and installed: C. C. Keniston, noble grand; J. P. Spooner, vice-grand; Ed C. Neilson, secretary; O. F. Cook, treasurer; A. M. Woods, warden; J. A. Bonney, conductor; Thomas Dinning, inside guardian. That evening they elected 135 candidates and initiated 118 in relays of 12, many being unable to attend because of the muddy conditions of the road.

The Rebekah Degree

The Rebekah degree of Odd Fellowship was the work of several women of New York, assisted by Representative Schuyler Colfax, a past grand. Adopted by the Sovereign Grand Lodge September 20, 1851, it was simply a side degree of Odd Fellowship conferred upon Odd Fellows or their wives. The degree was first conferred in Charity Lodge March 8, 1852, upon fourteen members. In 1859 the following wives were given the degree: Mrs. Amada Wolf, Mary Matthews, Rhoda J. Randall, Eliza Pierpont, Elizabeth Benjamin, Sarah C. McKensie, Catherine Ellsworth, Margaret Odell and Catherine Matterson. In 1863 the degree was conferred upon Margaret Severy, Almira Oldham and Delia Wolf. In 1868 the Sovereign Grand Lodge took the degree out of the jurisdiction of the subordinate lodges and organized a Rebekah degree lodge managed and controlled by women, subject to the approval of the Grand bodies.

Lebanon Lodge

This lodge was named Lebanon by Louis H. Lang, a charter member. The dispensation was granted to form a lodge January 19, 1878, and January 24 the lodge was instituted by Grand Master F. W. Dann, assisted by Past Grand Masters J. McDougal, R. E. Wilhoit, and H. T. Dorrance. The charter members comprised thirteen brothers and sisters: M. A. Lang, E. Tretheway, A. M. Rodgers, M. Stamper, Mary F. Thorndike, Martha Saunders, A. L. Torrance, K. G. Long, E. Waring, A. Steiney, E. Shoemaker, Louis Bond, A. Van Vlear. The first officers were A. J. Hyde, noble grand; Mary F. Thorndike, vice-grand; and Louisa Bond, secretary.

Rainbow Lodge No. 97

Rainbow lodge, the third largest in the state, was instituted April 19, 1886, by G. W. Gallup, deputy grand master. The charter membership comprised thirty-six Odd Fellows and the following Rebekahs: Mrs. Sarah Spooner, C. A. Ritter, J. E. Williams, Eliza Spooner, Emma Reynolds, Hattie Chapman, and H. D. Campbell. The officers installed were Hattie Chapman, past grand; Emma Reynolds, noble grand; Mrs. C. A. Ritter, vice-grand; Frank Goodrum, financial secretary; F. W. Ritter, recording secretary; and John Hammond, treasurer.

The Odd Fellows in 1859 celebrated the fortieth anniversary of the order, and it was the finest celebration ever held in Stockton. After parading the streets in their handsome new regalias, they marched into the Stockton theater, where a fine program was given. It comprised music by Condry's band, prayer, song by the Musical Union, reading proclamation by A. C. Bradford, oration, Nathan Porter of San Francisco; benediction by Rev. John B. Hill. The Odd Fellows and their wives then marched to the city hall, where a banquet was spread. The hall was handsomely decorated with flags and banners. The feast closed with responses to twenty-four toasts and the affair ended with a grand ball. Three years later the lodge held a memorial service in honor of Thomas Wildey, the founder of the order on April 26, 1819. His death was flashed over the overland telegraph October 21, 1861, the first "news" over the wire.

Odd Fellowship in San Joaquin County, ac-

ording to its number, has been honored more than any other county in the state, as five grand masters, four grand presidents, two or more grand patriarchs have been in office from this locality. H. T. Dorrance of Charity No. 6 was a past grand master of Vermont, and H. A. Manchester of Stockton lodge, who died April 29, 1877, was a deputy grand sire, the second highest office in the gift of the order. Edwin W. Colt was installed as grand master in May, 1855, Charles O. Burton was grand master in 1865, Karl C. Brueck was grand master in 1898, and three times has been elected representative to the Sovereign Grand Lodge; George F. Hudson from the same lodge, Stockton No. 11, was elected grand master in 1911, and Lloyd Cohen of No. 11, now grand warden, will be grand master in 1923. In the Encampment C. O. Burton and Wesley Minta were chief patriarchs in early days; George F. Roesch was elected in 1894, and John R. Cronin in 1918.

The Stockton Rebekahs also have been signally honored, and Mrs. Elizabeth Condry, a past noble grand of Lebanon lodge, was the first district deputy grand master in the state. Her appointment was dated December 5, 1887, and it came about in this manner: In September of that year the Sovereign Grand Lodge authorized the appointment of women district deputy grand masters, now known as presidents. Elwood Bruner of Sacramento, then grand master, was an intimate friend of Wesley Minta of Stockton, and in redistricting the state, Grand Master Bruner made Stockton District No. 1 and appointed Mrs. Condry deputy. In 1896 Mrs. Marion Greenwood was elected as grand president. Mrs. Etta Stewart was elected to the same honorable position in 1910, Mrs. Laura Lawrie in 1918, and Mrs. Fannie Clancy of Woodbridge Lodge, elected in 1921, also served as grand president.

Canton Ridgely No. 15

Many secret organizations have their military branches: the Masons have their Knights Templar, the Knights of Pythias their Uniform Rank, and the Odd Fellows their Cantons. In 1870 this branch was created in the Encampment and known as the Uniform degree. The degree was organized in Stockton October 6, 1884, and named in honor of James Ridgely, a very prominent Odd Fellow and the author of the past grand charge. In 1885 the branch was organized and known as the Canton Degree, and its members were hailed as chevaliers. Canton Ridgely was instituted February 25, 1886, with the following members: S. P. Bailey, H. M. Balch, Theodore Bohlen, Julius Cohn, James S. Dunham, J. W. Fitzgerald, Rudolph Gnekow, Joel Greenwood, Edward L. Gnekow, J. E. Hall, A. F.

Hillman, George Hinkley, H. E. Holman, John Jackson, Charles M. Keniston, D. F. Northrup, H. E. D. Petsinger, George Roesch, George F. Schuler, E. A. Taylor, Ed Tretheway, and Wm. W. Woodbridge. The officers elected were W. W. Woodbridge, commandant; C. M. Keniston, lieutenant; E. L. Gnewow, ensign; George F. Roesch, clerk; and J. E. Hall, accountant.

The Encampment meets annually in various cities of the state and with them go the Cantons. They assembled in Stockton October 15, 1895, and they have gathered here several times since that date. In that year, on the evening of October 14, they were the guests of Lebanon Rebekah lodge, in the Odd Fellows Hall. The next day, after holding an all-day session, they were tendered a reception by all of the lodges in the Masonic Hall. The program included music, recitations, a speech by Grand Scribe Barnes, and dancing. Wednesday, their degree work concluded with a banquet given by the Rebekahs in the Commercial Hotel. Thursday there was a splendid parade and Canton drill on Hunter Street after the arrival of Brigadier J. F. Crossett and staff, and Cantons Santa Rosa, San Francisco, Oakland, and Sacramento with their bands. That evening the pavilion was crowded with Odd Fellows and Rebekahs, at least 5,000 being present. After prize drills by the Cantons the decoration of chivalry was conferred on Major Mefret of San Francisco. This was a beautiful and impressive ceremony in which the decoration was conferred by General Crossett, assisted by Canton San Francisco, Mrs. Alice Kaftz, Maude Southworth, Louise Schuler, and Carrie Roesch. Finally, kneeling, the candidate was approached by little Elsie Robin, who pinned upon his breast the badge of chivalry.

Odd Fellow Hall and Building

Their first hall was the second story of a brick building on Center Street, still standing. It was about 20x60 feet in size with an entrance by an outside wooden stairway. When holding meetings the members were compelled to close the iron shutters of the windows, thus making it a sweat box in the heat of summer. It was rented by the Odd Fellows and Masons for $250 a month from a gambler named Shirley who had a saloon and gambling tables in the lower floor. The lodges fitted up the hall at an expense of $377, quite a sum for lodges of less than forty members. In less than six months Shirley told them to vacate their hall as he wanted it for gambling tables. Biven & Branco, grocers, had just erected a brick building just south of the Shirley building and Biven, being an Odd Fellow and Mason, the firm rented the second story to the order. In February, 1855, the jewelry store of John & Conrad Ling on El Dorado Street was destroyed by fire. Erecting a two-story brick building the Lings, who were Odd Fellows, offered to fit up the second floor for the order. The organization accepted the offer, and the hall was dedicated July 10, 1855, by Deputy Grand Master E. W. Colt, and Newton Booth delivered the oration.

Grand Lodge Convenes at Stockton

In May, 1855, the Grand Lodge met in Stockton, the first and only time except in 1867. Their meeting was held in the city hall, and the second evening Isaac Zacariah gave a grand display of fireworks at his beautiful garden, corner of Park and Grant streets, for the entertainment of the delegates. They again assembled in Stockton May 7, 1867, and during their visit they were tendered a reception and ball in Hickman's hall, just completed, and a banquet in Lewis & Darcy's restaurant on the Levee. On May 11, the new grand master, Charles N. Fox, and the grand secretary, T. Rodger Johnson, visited Lockeford and instituted Progressive Lodge No. 134. The following officers were elected: Peter Moore, noble grand; Philip B. Wagner, vice-grand; S. B. Sabine, secretary; and Philip Cahill, treasurer.

In 1856 Charity and Stockton lodges were in a flourishing condition, and the members began discussing the question of erecting an Odd Fellows' building. They could find no satisfactory location until 1865. At that time, May 14, a fire destroyed all of the wooden buildings belonging to the city on the corner of Hunter and Main streets. The lodges now decided that that was the place for an Odd Fellows' building and a committee from the I. O. O. F. Association petitioned the council for the purchase of the corner lot, 65x96 feet. The association declared, "We propose to erect a brick building, a building which will be an ornament to the city and a credit to its citizens." The city sold them the lot for $3,000. The association was reincorporated with a capital stock of $30,000, 300 shares at $10 each. Immediately Charity Lodge took 800 shares, Stockton Lodge 300 shares, and Parker Encampment 40 shares. A building committee was appointed and work commenced August 24.

The building was ready for the laying of the cornerstone November 28, 1865. The Grand Lodge was requested to perform the impressive ceremony, having laid the court house cornerstone in 1853. The lodges assembled at the El Dorado Street hall and preceded by Condy's band marched to the site. A very large crowd had assembled, for in that day the ceremony was a very important event.

After music by the band Grand Master Burton called the assembly to order and called upon the grand chaplain, Rev. P. G. Buchanan, for prayer; the Odd Fellows then sang their opening ode commencing "Brothers of our friendly order, Honor here asserts its way, All within its sacred border, Must its high commands obey." The grand secretary, T. Rodgers Johnson, then read a list of the articles deposited in the box, and the Grand Master, placing the box in the stone cavity, sealed it up with mortar. Then came the ceremony of the pouring of the oil, the strewing of flowers, and the scattering of wheat and then the Grand Master declared "In the name of Benevolence and Charity I lay this stone." The deputy grand master, H. T. Dorrance, then declared the cornerstone duly laid. Then followed prayer and the ceremony closed with an oration by John W. Dwinelle of San Francisco. The building was erected at a cost of $42,000. The beautiful hall, at the time the handsomest in California, was dedicated August 21, 1866, by Grand Master C. H. Randall of Sonora lodge No. 10. Long before the hour of dedication the lodge room was crowded with Odd Fellows' wives and family. After marching the streets the lodges entered the hall, and so crowded was it a person could scarcely move. The exercises opened with an anthem by the Episcopal Church choir, comprising Mrs. Charles Pinkham, Mrs. Robert S. Johnson, George Vincent and Charles Pinkham. After prayer and singing of the ode the grand marshal, C. F. Rae, proclaimed it the will of the Grand Master that the hall be dedicated. The president of the association, C. O. Burton, then handed the keys of the hall to the Grand Master and he in a short address declared the hall dedicated. The dedication was then proclaimed by R. E. Wilhoit, the Herald of the North; R. E. Young, the Herald of the East; C. H. Covell, the Herald of the South; and I. S. Smith, the Herald of the West. After each proclamation the trumpet sounded. The Grand Master then handed the keys to the two noble grands of the lodge, saying, "May joy be within its walls and peace a constant guest. May all of the influences that flow hence be good, now and forever, Amen." The dedication ceremony closed with an oration by Newton Booth. That evening there was a ball in Agricultural Hall, its principal feature a dozen or more canaries in cages suspended from the ceiling, and through the entire evening they sweetly sang. Fifty-five years past and January 21, 1922, Grand Master Ketterlin dedicated a new Odd Fellows' hall. Since 1892 the Odd Fellows had been talking of erecting a new building or remodeling the old building, but they could not agree regarding the location, or the size of the building. Finally M. Levy, who had occupied the first story for nearly a quarter of a century as a dry goods store, fearing the building might be sold over his head purchased it of the Association for $103,000, and the Association then erected a fine three-story building on the 50x150 foot lot which had been bought. The building was erected at a cost of $85,000 and the lodges are free from debt and money in the treasury. The building contains a large inside lodge room, closets, and a club room, on the second floor, and a large banquet and dance hall in the third story. A moving picture theater occupies the entire first story.

The Traveler

An occasion of great interest to Odd Fellows was that of April 3, 1909, when the Traveler was received in Stockton was great ceremony and much rejoicing. One of the emblems of the order is a bundle of sticks, and so named Traveler. This bundle of sticks was of especial interest, because they were made by Odd Fellows on board the Atlantic fleet and traveled with them around the world. On each stick was handsomely carved the name of each battleship, and they rested in a handsome carved box. Finally landing in California the Traveler was presented by Odin, a Swedish lodge of Oakland. The Stockton lodges presented it to Sacramento, finally to be presented by the Grand Lodge of California to the Sovereign Grand Lodge. The Traveler was brought to Stockton during the afternoon, accompanied by about 100 members of Odin Lodge, who during the afternoon were given a collation in the Odd Fellows' hall. At six o'clock "the blasts, long continued, of the twenty-five whistles of the city gave notice to the public that the Odd Fellows' festival was on." The fraternity began assembling at the hall, and led by the band they marched to the depot to receive the Oakland and San Francisco Odd Fellows. On their arrival a parade was formed and led by J. E. Hall and W. X. Clark, of the committee on arrangements. Past Grand Master Ogden of Oakland and Charles Nicewonger, noble grand, Canton Ridgely, and the hundreds of Odd Fellows, they marched through the principal streets. At eight o'clock in Masonic Music Hall the ceremony took place of presenting the Traveler to the Stockton lodge. On the stage with the invited guests sat four members of the order who had been Odd Fellows over fifty-two years, namely, Andrew Wolf, eighty-seven years of age; John Grattan, eighty-four; Dr. Christopher Grattan, eighty-six; and Royal B. Parker, ninety years of age. They were escorted into the hall and returned to their homes by A. B. Parker, past grand. It was the delight of the various lodges in presenting the Traveler to present it in a unique or some unusually attractive manner, and Odin Lodge presented it in a model of a Viking ship. The drill team of the lodge were dressed in the Viking uniform of their ancestors and marching into the hall they rolled on a cradle before them the Viking ship. Bringing the ship to rest in the center of the hall and unfurling from the mast head a large American flag, they sang the Star Spangled Banner. Then followed the program of the evening: prayer, B. M. Bixler of Truth lodge; address, "The Lessons of the Traveler," Wm. C. Wall, Truth lodge; baritone solo, James E. Ziegler; Presentation of the Traveler, by Odin lodge; acceptance by O. B. Parkinson, of Charity lodge; selection, orchestra; address, Past Grand Master Ogden of Oakland; duet, double quartet of Odin lodge; remarks, noble grand of Fountain lodge, Oakland; address, "The Cheer of the Traveler," Karl C. Brueck, past grand master of Stockton lodge. The visitors were then entertained in Odd Fellows' hall until two o'clock, awaiting the arrival of the west-bound train.

The Visit of the Grand Sire

On the evening of January 19, 1920, the Odd Fellows of San Joaquin County celebrated the most important event in the history of Pacific coast fraternal organizations, in their reception to Grand Sire H. V. Borst of the Sovereign Grand Lodge. It was a very memorable event as never before had the highest officer visited the coast, save in September, 1878, when John B. Harmon, a California pioneer was elected Grand Sire. Grand Sire Borst was about to visit Australia, sailing from San Francisco, and Grand Representative Karl Brueck persuaded him to visit Stockton. The reception took place in the Masonic hall which was crowded with Odd Fellows and Rebekahs. After a selection by the orchestra and songs by Mrs. Bruce Olmstead and Frank Smith, the Grand Sire was welcomed to California by Grand Master K. C. Keene of Solano County. Responding to the greeting, the Grand Sire was then welcomed by Stella M. Merrick of Los Angeles, president of the Rebekah Assembly. Karl C. Brueck then introduced the Grand Sire, who then made the address of the evening. It was the largest assemblage of state officers ever seen in Stockton and seated upon the stage were a Grand Sire, grand master, two deputy grand masters, and grand secretary, grand treasurer, president, and deputy president of the Assembly, two past presidents, two past grand masters, two grand representatives, and a trustee of the Odd Fellows' Home.

Odd Fellows' Cemetery

It is enjoined upon the Odd Fellows "to visit the sick and bury the dead," and Captain Weber in 1854 deeded the two lodges a block of land on Union and Flora Streets for a burial ground. Some three years later they began to improve the property by enclosing it with a picket fence, planting trees, and flowers, laying of walks and erecting a windmill and tank for the purpose of pumping water for the trees and flowers, and three years later the newspaper, lamenting the condition of the city cemetery said, "We have a fine Odd Fellows' burial ground." The grounds were used as a place of burial for the members of the order and their families until 1874, when interments were discontinued. Care was taken of the cemetery until 1909, when the block was sold to the Western Pacific Railroad. An Odd Fellows' plot was then purchased in the Rural Cemetery and all of the bodies transferred to the new home of rest.

The City Silent

The beautiful city of rest and peace
Where trouble and sorrow forever cease,
The city I love for my friends are there,
Whose spirits have flown to the bright somewhere.

"The time is fact approaching," said the Republican in November, 1859, when measures must be taken to furnish more space for general cemetery purposes in this city. It is proposed to lay out a rural cemetery which it is desirable to fit up after the fashion of some of the eastern cemeteries." In the following year the same paper said, "The Odd Fellows are rendering their cemetery very attractive to the eye by tasteful improvements. They have built a windmill at a cost of $520 for the purpose of irrigating the trees and shrubbery and in a short time they will have the most beautiful city of the dead in the county."

The example of the Odd Fellows, coupled with the cemetery law passed by the legislature in 1859, caused a few citizens to take action in regard to a new cemetery. A meeting was called for that purpose by 18 prominent citizens, March 20, 1861. The meeting was held in the city hall and the Rural Cemetery Association incorporated with the following officers and directors: E. S. Holden, president; Samuel Fisher, vice-president; V. M. Peyton, secretary and treasurer; B. Walker Bours, Wm. Biven and George West.

The trustee selected for the cemetery purposes a tract of land about a mile north of Stockton belonging to Edward M. Howison. The tract comprised some seventy-five acres and to assist in its purchase, Captain Weber contributed $1,000. Sixty acres of the tract was devoted to burial purposes and fifteen acres for the superintendent's home. A place was set apart for Chinese burials, and for a potter's field. The lots, some 1,500 in number, varying in size from 12x20 feet to 24x40 feet, were sold from $20.00 to $150.00, according to the location. The cemetery was dedicated Sunday afternoon, August 31, 1862, in the presence of some 400 persons, including nearly all of the pastors of the city. The ceremony opened with a short historical talk by Dr. E. S. Holden, the chairman of the board of trustees; opening hymn by a choir of twenty-five singers from the various churches; address, Rev. Robt. Happersett of the Presbyterian Church; dedication prayer, Rev. John G. Gassman of Episcopalians; closing hymn by the choir. Since then many additions have been made to the grounds and today over 8,000 of Stockton's former citizens lay asleep in the City Silent.

Montezuma Tribe No. 18, I. O. R. M.

The Independent Order of Red Men is the third oldest organization in Stockton. In 1869 a number of citizens concluded to organize a Red Men's tribe and, assembling in the Hansel & Wollner hall, corner of Hunter and Church Streets, Montezuma tribe No. 18 was instituted, June 8, 1869, by several chiefs from San Francisco. The following officers were elected and installed: Peter Bargion, sachem; Minard S. Thresher, senior sachem; J. R. Selden, junior sachem; Eugene Lehe, chief of records; Steven Badger, keeper of wampum; and M. Biber, prophet. The tribe grew quite rapidly and in 1870 they removed to the third story of the Hook Building on Main Street. The Red Men occupied the west half and the Champions of the Red Cross the east half of the building, both entering their halls by the same stairway. The Red Men fitted up their hall in a costly manner and it was dedicated February 14, 1860, the exercises concluding with a ball in Hickman's hall. This tribe was consolidated with Iroquois tribe No. 35 in 1885. This tribe was instituted June 21, 1870, with fifty-six charter members and the following first officers: J. R. Selden, sachem; E. H. C. Taylor, senior sachem; J. H. O. Brien, junior sachem; C. W. Pondexter, chief of records; Fingal S. Hinds, keeper of wampum; and Robert Stevenson, prophet.

Kaw-Wah-Nita Council, Degree of Pocahontas, was instituted March 6, 1891, with the following charter members and elective officers: Pocahontas, Mrs. Anna Mobray; prophetess, Mrs. Alexander McWah; Wawona, Cora Small; Powhatan, A. F. Hillman; chief of records, Mrs. Fred Hilton; first scout, Mrs. Ed Cruse; second scout, J. L. Mobray; first runner, Mrs. Harlon; second runner, Miss M. Sexton; guard of tepee, Mrs. William Clark; guard of forest, Edward Coons. The additional members were: Mr. and Mrs. George Pierce,

Mr. and Mrs. C. M. Small, Mrs. Sophia, Mrs. Sarah Kaiser, Mr. and Mrs. Dave Winders, R. C. Bonn, Charles Williamson, Mrs. Elizabeth Harvey, Adolph Smallfield, and John Seiler.

Pohono tribe of Red Men was instituted in Red Men's hall, November 6, 1867, by Great Sachem George W. Collins of San Francisco, and the following year, February 26, 1898, Hiawatha Council No. 21 was instituted. The following are the first officers: Pocahontas, Mrs. P. Brown; Wawona, Mrs. Carrie Hilton; prophetess, Mrs. J. Keith; Powhatan, J. F. Farnsworth; keeper of wampum, Mrs. John Earl; conductress of wampum, Ethel Willey. Their officers including Louisa Been, Ella Farnsworth, A. L. Easley, Nellie Washburn, Clara Hunter, Cora Baker, Frank W. Matteson, Edna Willey, L. O. Coon, W. C. Neiman, Grace Armburst, Phoebe Brown, W. Evans, J. Earl, M. S. Alexander, and W. C. Holden, constituted the charter membership.

The Knights of Pythias

This order was introduced into Stockton by the organization of Charter Oak lodge No. 20, January 27, 1872, in Red Men's hall, with twenty-nine charter members. The only living charter member is Joseph Fyfe. The following are the first officers: C. M. Small, past chancellor; W. H. Keep, chief chancellor; W. F. Fletcher, vice chancellor; William Kierski, prelate; William H. Hatch, master of exchequer; Joseph Fyfe, master of finance; J. H. Barney, keeper of records; S. Y. Strait, master of arms; C. C. Lyons, inside guardian.

Uniform Rank No. 5, K. of P.

The uniform rank Knights of Pythias was organized in August, 1883, with the following officers elect: John D. Gall, sir knight commander; William Aaron, sir knight lieutenant; Gus Gumpertz, sir knight herald; Henry Adams, sir knight treasurer; William Lesh, sir knight sentinel. The rank was instituted by fifty-five members of the San Francisco uniform rank. The city members in their new uniforms marched to the train to the martial music of Schmidt & Dreyfous band. As the parade marched down Main Street, roman candles filled the air and colored fire blazed all along the line. After the institution of the rank the entire membership marched to Pioneer hall, where covers were laid for 150 guests.

The state conclave was held in Stockton in April, 1884, and nearly 2,000 knights were present from various parts of the state. Many of the business places were decorated in the Pythian colors and prizes were given for the best decorated building. Main and El Dorado Streets were covered with draperies and two handsomely decorated arches spanned Main Street, a third arch being erected near the Masonic Temple, where the knights assembled. On the second day there was a parade with Thomas Cunningham as grand marshal with a review on Miner Avenue by the grand officers. The third day there was a drill for three handsome trophies by the uniform rank and that evening there was a dramatic performance in the Avon Theater for the entertainment of the visitors. The play was "Damon and Pythias," staged by the Stockton Dramatic Club. The conclave ended with a banquet and ball in Masonic hall.

Stockton in 1901 was a well-known place of assemblage of state organizations, and May 20 the Knights of Pythias and Rathbone Sisters here assembled, the knights meeting in Masonic hall, and the Rathbone Sisters in the Pythian castle. The reception to the orders took place in Masonic hall on the evening of May 20. H. R. Campbell, the chairman of the evening, introduced Mayor W. H. Harrison, who welcomed the order to the city. The response was made by Grand Chancellor J. T. Jeter, then lieutenant-governor of the state. The ladies' quartette, Mrs. F. W. Gifford, Mrs. R. Oullahan, Mrs. R. G. Fyfe and Nan McCarty, then gave two songs, and Mrs. Mae A. Clark, chief of Damon temple, welcomed the Rathbone Sisters to the city. The grand chief, Mrs. J. Stibbens, replied. Wednesday afternoon there was a parade participated in by the uniform rank, Knights of Pythias; Canton Ridgley, I. O. O. F.; the Grand Lodge and local knights, and in the evening there was an exhibition drill and concert in the pavilion. The affair closed Friday night with a grand ball. During the week the business houses were trimmed with the Pythian colors, the court house was handsomely illuminated, and on the west side was a large illuminated sign, "Stockton Extends Greetings."

The San Joaquin County Pioneers

An effort was made as early as 1856 to organize a pioneer society, an organization whose record is forever closed when its last member dies. In this first attempt to organize a society, a call was advertised in the newspapers that all citizens who came to San Joaquin County in 1849 were requested to meet in the city hall February 22 "for the laudable purpose of adopting measures to preserve such historical facts as are being yearly lost, for the future benefit of the county." A meeting was held at the time mentioned, and after some preliminary remarks Dr. G. A. Shurtleff was called to the chair and C. O. Burton appointed secretary. A committee of twelve was appointed to draft a plan of organization, the committee comprising W. W. Stevenson, O. C. Emory, J. M. Buffington, Samuel A. Booker, Dr. E. B. Bateman, Nelson Taylor, E. M. Howison, Judge J. K. Shafer, Amos Gove, J. W. Webster and R. K. Eastman. Another committee of three was appointed to obtain the names of all pioneers "who left their homes in '49 to come to California." A second meeting was held in the hall March 7 and the constitution in defining the eligibility of members declared that only those pioneers who landed in California previous to September 9, 1850, were eligible for membership. An organization was effected by the election of John M. Buffington as president, Dr. George A. Shurtleff, first vice-president; E. M. Howison, second vice-president; O. C. Emory, third vice-president, P. A. Athearn, fourth vice-president; Nelson Taylor, fifth vice-president; C. O. Burton, secretary, and George E. Drew, treasurer.

The Second Pioneer Society

We hear no more of the pioneer organization until 1868. At that time, November 21, a notice appeared in the press, "To the Pioneers of the County of San Joaquin. Pioneers who arrived in this state prior to the first of January, 1851, are respectfully requested to meet at the city hall on November 23, at seven o'clock, for the purpose of organizing an association in this city." About 100 pioneers responded and when the meeting was called to order Dr. Robert K. Reid was selected as president and John H. Webster, secretary. A committee of nine were appointed to draw up plans for the formation of a society. This committee comprising John B. Hall, George S. Evans, Harry F. Hubbard, E. W. Colt, Dr. Christopher Grattan, George A. Keith, R. B. Smith, J. A. Spencer and E. H. Allen were all pioneers who came previous to the state's admission. Pioneer S. P. Gorham, who had previously canvassed the city for pioneers, then reported that he found over 375 who had arrived in California previous to January 1, 1851. This was the first proposed date of eligibility of membership, but the "49ers" kicked and to please them the date of membership was changed to September 9, 1850, and no person was eligible who arrived after that date. The roll was signed by forty-six pioneers, nineteen of the number arriving in 1849. December 7, they adopted a constitution and elected the following officers: Dr. George A. Shurtleff, president; E. W. Colt, secretary, and Thomas K. Hook, treasurer. The vice-presidents were J. B. Hall, John A. Jackson and S. V. Tretheway. The board of directors comprised B. Howard Brown, Dr. C. Grattan, S. P. Gorham, J. A. White, John Schraick, Al W. Brush, William Canfield, George A. Keith and E. W. Atwood.

Pioneer Hall

In 1869 Henry Hodgkins built his fine two-story brick building, corner of Weber Avenue and Levee Street; the Independent newspaper office rented the corner of the second story and Hodgkins fitted up the south half of the building for a hall for the Pioneers. They occupied this hall until about 1890 when they purchased the lot corner of Weber Avenue and Sutter Street, together with the house, a one-story structure brought around Cape Horn. It was the home of John M. Buffington, and later sold to Rufus B. Lane, who sold the property to the Pioneers. They erected a fine two-story brick building, with a store occupied by E. R. Hedges and a fine hall and dance floor in the second story. The hall was dedicated June 3, 1891 by the roll call of the members by the secretary, W. F. Freeman; address, Theodore Lee, president of the society; solo and chorus, Ida Petty, Nellie Baker, Al Sanborn and Harvey Squires; address and poem by Mrs. Joseph Hale, the Stockton poetess; solo, Edward A. Baird; poem, Mrs. W. D. Ashley. The Pioneer Society at one time was very large and influential, embracing as it did the most prominent and wealthiest men of the county. They enjoyed many picnics, gave many social dances, and celebrated many September 9th anniversaries up to the organization of the Native Sons in 1884. The Pioneers then gave way to the younger body, as death and resignation had greatly decreased their number. In June, 1891, the pioneers sold the property to Hodgkins & Stitt. At that time comparatively few of the members were living, and for many months previous to the sale they had not held any meeting or celebrations.

The following are the names of the members of the Pioneer Society, the builders of San Joaquin County. They all landed in California previous to September 9, 1850. A few of the number were what was known as territorial pioneers, having arrived several years before the admission of the state.

Daniel Adee, Elijah W. Atwood, Joseph Adams, Henry Adams, Wm. H. Ashley, Henry E. Adams, Geo. W. Ashley, E. H. Allen.

A. B. Brown, Stephen Bergun, Louis Beyer, B. Howard, Albert W. B. Brush, Morris H. Bond, Charles G. Bruckman, Dr. E. B. Bateman, Henry Barnhart, John H. O'Brien, Wm. R. Barnes, John Behaps, A. B. Bennett, Sanborn Blaisdell, H. G. Boisseller, Charles D. Benjamin, C. D. Bidwell, Laogier Basilio, J. A. Blasingame, H. G. D. Barnhart, Wm. A. Ballard, Louis M. Booth, H. B. Bishop, A. C. Blossom, Charles W. Brunton, Wm. M. Baggs.

Martin Cahill, '44, Edwin Colt, Wellington Canfield, Samuel Catts, '47, Cornelius Chaplin, N. C. Culver, Louis M. Chicard, Francis Culver, Wm. Colnon, Thomas Corcoran, Henry A. Chaplin, Peter Clapp, F. C. Condell, T. J. Chaloner, Dr. Asa Clark, J. H. Cole, H. K. Clifford, J. D. MacClelland, Edward Canavan, R. W. Craig, Henry T. Compton, J. M. McCloskey, John Canavan, C. C. Cushman, Michael Caricof, W. McK. Carson.

Manuel Dyer, David F. Douglas, Stephen H. Davis, Shubel Dunham, Charles Dial, James A. Davis, Charles Dallas, M. J. Draiss.

J. J. Evans, Ransom Eccleston, George S. Evans, Peter Esau, John S. Evans, Wm. Ennis, Ben E. S. Ely, W. W. Easten, Edward A. Everett.

Samuel Ferguson, D. W. Fanning, H. L. Farrington, Philip Fitzgerald, John H. Field, F. M. Ferguson, John H. Fischer, Wm. F. Freeman, J. M. Fisher, John H. Fowler, Russell Farnham, Henry Fisk, J. W. Farley, H. S. Farrington, Wm. J. Floyd, W. H. Fairchilds, S. H. Fickett, J. M. Fowler.

Wm. Gilebert, '44, S. P. Gorham, Dr. Christopher Grattan, George Gray, Andrew Girard, T. D. Gilbert, James M. Garnett, H. C. Gillingham, John Ginn, John Greer, Charles Grunsky, Wm. Graham, Amos E. Gove, John Gross, Wm. Glassen, Ed McD. Graham, John Grattan, Augustus Goodhart, C. Grupe, T. Gaffney.

Thomas K. Hook, Thomas Henderson, John B. Hall, Joseph Hale, Henry H. Hewlett, Columbus Hampton, John H. Haines, George W. Hurley, Henry Hodgkins, Allen M. Harrison, J. B. Harrison, J. A. Henry, Wm. D. Howell, Ben C. Harris, J. D. Hamilton, T. D. Heisell, Charles I. Hamilton, John B. Hall, L. L. Huntley, Hiram Hamilton, J. M. Hogan, Josiah Hunter, N. S. Harrold, J. W. Hammond, Elias Hildreth, Hiram Hall, John W. Hammond, Rowie Harrison, Elias Ireland.

David Jockers, Peter Jahant, Geo. A. Jahant, John Inglis, L. F. Jarvis, Wm. A. Jackson.

George A. Keith, O. P. F. Kallenback, Oly C. Kroh, Joseph Kile, H. Kraft, Geo. M. Kasson.

Wm. Lottman, A. Leatch, D. A. Learned, Theodore Lee, George Lemon, J. A. Louttit, Geo. S. Ladd, C. H. Lindley, Rufus B. Lane, Ben F. Langford, Theodore Lucas, John Lovejoy.

J. A. Munson, J. B. McGowan, Edward Matteson, N. Milner, F. W. Moss, John N. Meyer, J. K. Mead, C. E. Murray, A. C. Meeker, J. P. McClelland, Samuel Myers, J. A. Mowbray, C. B. Montgomery, J. A. Mahoney, W. H. Minard, Jacob K. Myer, John P. Mason, Ira McRay, J. R. McDonald, H. O. Matthews, Jerome Myers, S. L. Morse.

Eli E. Nelson, John Nagel.

Henry Ortman, W. L. Overheiser, Edward Oullahan, Wm. O'Donnell.

S. H. Pickett, John Perrott, Joseph D. Peters R. I. Patterson, Otis Perrine, D. W. Post, F. J. Pratt, Joseph Pratt, R. B. Parker, John Petty, W. H. Post, Enoch Peyton, V. M. Peyton, Joseph Putnam.

Robert K. Reid, Henry Ramsey, Jeremiah Roberson, Wm. H. Robinson, Louis Reffel, C. D. Reynolds, Alonzo Rhodes, Arthur H. Rich, Armand Rolland, H. B. Rodgers, Ben F. Rodgers, C. R. Ralph, M. M. Richerson, S. F. Rodman, J. W. Rover, Wm. Robinson.

Roscoe C. Sargent, Wm. Sanders, Thomas Sedgwick, sr., H. C. Shattuck, John Seamons, Geo. L. Smith, John Shrack, James Smythe, Julius Steiney, Fred A. Spear, Daniel Severy, Russell B. Smith, Charles S. Stevens, Dr. Geo. A. Shurtleff, Charles Sedwick, John M. Small, Henry Stading, W. E. Sanders, James E. Shepherd, J. G. Swinnerton, J. M. Sullivan, W. H. Smucker, W. H. Smith, E. R. Stockwell, Peter G. Sharp, Henry S. Sargent, Harvey Squires, Geo. W. Smith, Joseph W. Simmons, LaFayette Sellman.

George W. Trahern, W. S. Taylor, John Tnohy, Wm. O. Tripp, Henry Tinkham, September 12, 1849, bark Lanark, F. B. Taylor, Thomas E. Tynan, S. V. Tredway, Ben F. Thompson, James Turner, A. J. Tibbetts, John H. Tone, Wm. Tierney, Dr. F. W. Todd, J. W. Vanscrotten, August Vobbe, Nicholas Vicilich.

Andrew Wolf, Roley E. Wilhoit, James T. Wadsworth, Septimus Williams, L. P. Whitman, John Wallace, John C. White, Charles F. Whale, Madison Walthall, Jr., Josiah W. Webster, Charles H. Walcott, Thomas S. Wood, M. Whipple, C. M. Weber, J. O. Winter, Fred Wright, Ben Watrous, John N. Wood, Albert Woods, E. W. S. Woods, Thomas Wilson, James Woods, E. H. Woodbridge, John Wasley, George West, Henry Wiggins, Wm. West, Wm. B. White, Wm. Wright, Geo. R. Wells, Ernest Wagner.

Frederick Yost.

C. E. Ziengenfelder, John H. Ziengenfelder.

Grand Army of the Republic

The Civil War began on April 12, 1861, and ended in May, 1865. In that war, on both sides, 1,500,000 men were engaged, and on the Northern side alone 350,000 men were either killed in battle or died from exposure and disease. From the survivors of the army of the north there was organized the body known as the Grand Army of the Republic. This body of men, banded together by the strongest of humanities—a bond cemented by their life's blood—was organized "for the purpose, among other things, of preserving and strengthening those kind and fraternal feelings which have bound together the soldiers, sailors and marines, who united to suppress the late rebellion." Annually these veterans assembled at their many posts to decorate the graves of their fallen comrades. It is a custom as old as civilization, first inaugurated in the Grand Army because of a little incident in the South. A number of Southern women who assembled in Columbus, Miss., in 1867, to decorate the graves of their Confederate dead, also decorated the graves of their fallen "enemy," the boys in blue. This beautiful trait of pure Christianity was the inspiration of the beautiful familiar poem that commences:

"By the flow of the inland river,
Whence the fleets of iron have fled,
Where the blades of the grave grass quiver,
Asleep are the ranks of the dead:
Under the sod and the dew,
Waiting the judgment day—
Under the one the Blue,
Under the other the Gray."

The incident, first published in the North in the September Atlantic Monthly, 1867, finally led to the order issued May 5, 1868, by General John A. Logan, then commander-in-chief, naming May 30 as Decoration Day, a day on which every post throughout the Union shall assemble and, with appropriate exercises, decorate the graves of their fallen comrades. The day was first observed in San Joaquin May 30, 1869, by the members of the Stockton Post No. 9. Assembling that morning at their hall in the Parker building, they took carriages for Linden, where they decorated the grave of Lieutenant Lyman Davis, Third Infantry, California Volunteers. Over the grave Captain Thomas E. Ketcham and Dr. A. T. Hudson made a few appropriate remarks.

Stockton Post G. A. R.

This post was organized in May, 1867, by Lieutenant R. A. Sedwick, Captain Thomas E. Ketcham, Adjutants E. S. Pilsbury, E. H. C. Taylor, W. N. Glenn and Lieutenant Edward Scott. The post did not receive its charter until February 18, 1868, when the following officers were installed: T. E. Ketcham, captain; Robert S. Johnson, adjutant; Richard Condy, musician, with the following additional members: Lieutenant R. T. Mason, E. C. Wilson, Eugene Lehe, Edward Scott, Charles H. Walscott, and Sergeants George Perry and George Teft. The post continued in existence about five years under the captainship of the following members: T. E. Ketcham, Eugene Lehe, Robert S. Johnson, Edward Scott and C. H. Walscott.

Rawlins Post G. A. R.

We heard no more of the Grand Army until September, 1881. Then R. S. Johnson, signing himself as commander, and Edward Scott, as orderly sergeant, requested all of the volunteers of the late war to assemble at Mozart hall for the purpose of participating in the funeral of our lamented President, James A. Garfield. Some forty-seven comrades assembled and, having no uniforms they wore part of the Stockton Guards' old uniform—a dark blue blouse and cap, together with belt, cartridge box and bayonet sheath. They were the feature of the parade and much admired for their splendid marching and soldierly bearing. Again the G. A. R. passed from sight and memory until February, 1882, when S. D. Waterman as post adjutant issued a circular stating that Rawlins Post No. 23 had been organized and he was authorized to notify all veterans and to request their active cooperation. "All who now join can come in under the same fee as charter members." The post was chartered April 15, 1881, and the following were the charter members and installed officers for 1883: Eugene Lehe, post commander; Robert S. Johnson, senior vice-commander; Robert Daly, junior vice-commander; Samuel D. Waterman, adjutant; Edward Scott, quartermaster; John W. Payne, officer of the day; Victor Heck, officer of the guard; Alfred Nock, chaplain; Robert K. Reid, surgeon; Richard Condy, quartermaster sergeant; Silas P. Adams, sergeant major; R. T. Worden, inside guardian; Emile Ellinger, outside guardian. There were enrolled 152 members, who had enlisted from nineteen Northern states. In the following month the Grand Army boys, uniting with the local military companies, the Stockton and the Emmet Guards and the Mexican veterans, again enjoyed the routine and pleasure of "tenting on the old camp ground." The encampment continued for three days, from May 10, and the camp was named Camp Ketcham, in honor of Captain Thomas E. Ketcham. On the last day of the encampment it was given out that a friendly competitive drill would take place between the organizations. The drill, however, was a scheme on the part of the Pioneers to present the post with a beautiful silk flag, under the guise of winning the prize. The judges selected by John Grattan, a pioneer and very enthusiastic Union man during the war, declared Rawlins Post the winner of the flag, but the local military companies protested against the decision, declaring that they had had no preparation for the contest.

First Memorial Day Observation

In the Rural Cemetery a large plot of ground had been set aside for the burial of the Mexican veterans and the "boys in blue," and May 30, 1882, Memorial day, was first observed. The post, parading the streets to a funeral dirge by the band, marched to the cemetery, where appropriate exercises were held under a large oak tree, and the graves of twenty comrades were decorated to the Grand Army. An oration was delivered by Judge Van R. Paterson, who admonished them to forgive "the enemy," for "remember, my friends, that from the victor is due the first proffer of friendship." Then calling their attention to the incident in the South, he declared, "No more shall the war cry sever. Or the winding rivers be red; They banished our anger forever When they laureled the graves of our dead." In the evening a memorial service was held in the Presbyterian Church. A memorial address was delivered by W. W. McKraig, and an oration by Rev. John Coyle of the Methodist Church. The singing of Keiller's "American Hymn" by the choir was followed by an original poem by Comrade L. E. Moshier. John Grattan then stepped to the platform with a large parade flag, which was presented to the post by Louis Elliott—a gift from the young ladies of Stockton. Eugene Lehe received the flag and the audience then sang "America."

Obtaining Money for Gridley Fund

In decorating the graves in 1882 the committee also decorated the graves of Charles M. Weber, Benjamin Tunis, a veteran of 1812, and R. C. Gridley, and at the head of the grave last named there stood this notice: "R. C. Gridley, who raised $275,000 for the Sanitary Commission." To him the Grand Army proposed erecting a suitable monument, and, having that object in view, in February, 1883, they held a reunion and camp fire, the proceeds of the entertainment to be given to the Gridley monument fund. The camp fire was held in Mozart hall. Five tables extended the entire length of the hall. On exhibition on the middle table was the original sack of flour and above it hung Gridley's portrait. At 8 o'clock the post marched in and occupied the center table. Each comrade saluted the portrait and still standing they sang "Auld Lang Syne." Then the order was given to "fall in" and the 480 plates and cups were soon filled with steaming hot pork and beans and coffee without milk. When the inner man had been satisfied, toasts were in order and speeches were made by leading citizens, while several patriotic songs were sung by the comrades. The last toast was "Reuel C. Gridley," and Henry S. Sargent, an old friend, in responding gave a short history of Gridley's life and the story of the sack of flour. He then began auctioning off name places on the subscription book, and quite a sum of money was obtained from the sale.

The story of Gridley and his sack of flour leads us to Austin, Nev., where in April, 1864, R. C. Gridley was engaged in the merchandising business. On April 18th a municipal election was held, the two candidates for mayor being the Republican, Charles Holbrook, and the Douglas Democrat, David F. Buel. Great interest was taken in the election and a wager was made between Dr. Herrick and Gridley that if Holbrook was elected Gridley would carry a sack of flour on his shoulders from Austin to Clifton, the two points being about a mile and a quarter apart. It was further agreed that should Buel be elected Herrick would carry the flour. The Republicans elected their nominee, and the following morning Gridley appeared to pay the bet. He brought with him from his store a sack of flour, the sack being trimmed with flags and red, white and blue ribbons. A large crowd awaited his appearance and, being a very popular man, he was welcomed by loud cheers. The Austin brass band had been engaged with the understanding that if the Democrats won the band was to play "Dixie," if the Republicans won "John Brown" was the tune selected. A procession was then formed consisting of the city officials, thirty-six horsemen acting as escort, the brass band, then Mr. Gridley, accompanied by Dr. Herrick and Amos Gridley, the latter carrying a large American flag. As the novel procession marched the streets some of the crowd, joining with the band, began singing, "And his soul goes marching on," while others shouted, "Go it, Gridley! Stick to it, old man! Hurrah for Holbrook!" On arriving at Clifton the laughable performance was carried out of the Democrats surrendering to the Republicans the large broom and sponge which they had carried in the procession, thus signifying that the victors had swept the town and now they could absorb all the offices. A nearby saloon keeper then invited the crowd in to take a drink. They quickly responded and the liquor was as free as water, Republicans and Democrats alike spending their money freely. Other saloons were visited and as the money was giving out they began discussing the future of the sack of flour—what should they do with it? One Republican suggested, "Make it into griddle cakes, but don't give any to the disloyal Democrats." This remark angered their opponents and they shouted, "We are as loyal as you." The time was at hand for the fulfilling of a remarkable event. Was Gridley inspired? Who can say? A prohibitionist and a professing Christian, he had been quietly listening to the banterings of the liquor-laden crowd, and now he exclaimed, "This crowd of people had its fun at my expense. Let us see now who will do most for the sick and wounded soldiers. We will put this sack of flour up at auction, to be sold for cash, with the understanding that the buyer will return it to be again sold for the Sanitary Commission."

The crowd was ready for any kind of an exciting joke, and the proposition was quickly accepted. The flour was put up at auction, and after many spirited bids it was sold to the Republican county surveyor for $350. The Republicans yelled loudly because one of their number had made the first purchase. Next it was knocked down to Gridley for $305, then Buel purchased it. He was broke, having spent all his money for drinks, but he offered in payment $1,115 in Indian Department scrip, having been the government agent, but the auctioneer refused it, the terms being cash. Buel then pledged several valuable lots in another town. The auction was continued until $4,400 was received, the money the following day being expressed to Henry Bellows, the president of the commission, then in San Francisco, filling the pulpit of T. Starr King, deceased.

The news of this curious event spread throughout the state and three weeks later the citizens of Gold Hill invited Gridley to visit their city and bring his famous sack of flour. He consented and, arriving there May 16, a procession was formed which halted in front of the Maynard block. At this point Thomas Fitch, "the silver-tongued orator," in an eloquent speech, aroused enthusiasm by pleading for the sick and wounded soldiers who had risked their lives upon the battlefield that this glorious Union might be preserved. When the bidding began there was a spirited fight between the silver mining companies and the auctioneer stopped at $6,000. The procession then re-formed and the "Army of the Lord," as the Gold Hill News christened them, with banners flying and bands playing marched down the canyon through the Devil's Gate to Silver City, and the flour was there sold for $2,000. Again put up at auction in four different places that day, the flour realized $24,000. It was taken on May 18 to Sacramento to the Sanitary Fair but it was not a money-maker there, selling for only $175. That night, however, in the Congregational Church, it was purchased a dozen times, the buyers paying $2,150. In San Francisco, May 28, in the Metropolitan Theater, a number of bidders paid $2,800, the bids running from $5 to $500. The flour was then taken to the Eastern States, and Gridley traveled with it to many large cities, but the returns were not as liberal as in California and he returned to Austin in 1865.

It was found in the beginning that the flour without Gridley lacked inspiration, and he resolved to give his entire attention to its sale, paying his expense out of his own pockets.

The result to him was financial ruin, for the long continued travel undermined his health, none too strong at first, and returning, he found his business almost a failure. Selling out in 1866, he came to Stockton and began partnership in the grocery business with Henry S. Sargent on the site the San Joaquin Valley Bank now occupies. In 1868 he removed to Paradise, Stanislaus County, and there died November 24, 1874. By his own request he was brought to Stockton for burial, and after sacrificing his life and fortune for the Union cause, his body was interred in the Grand Army plot.

Dedication of the Gridley Monument

Gridley's grave in the Grand Army plot was marked only by a redwood board, his name cut therein with a penknife. Believing "that the people of the Union owe to Reuel C. Gridley something more than a debt of gratitude," Rawlins Post in August, 1882, resolved to solicit funds for a suitable monument over his grave, starting the fund by an appropriation of $100, and this was followed in 1883 by the bean supper to obtain more funds. Committees were appointed from the post and from the leading citizens to obtain money for a memorial, but the coin came in slowly and not until 1886 did the committee have sufficient money on hand to warrant calling for monument plans. In that year, however, designs were drawn, the bid of A. C. Thompson of San Francisco accepted, and the monument was unveiled September 8, 1887. Early in the afternoon, the Pioneers, Rawlins Post, Emmet Guards, the fire companies and Stockton Guards, and citizens marched to the cemetery. On arrival at the Grand Army plot, in the center of which the monument had been erected, the immense crowd gathered round about and the exercises began with prayer by Chaplain A. C. Baine. Then followed an oration by James G. Swinnerton, and the reading of the receipts and expenditures of the monument, the total cost being $1,177, which had been collected by a citizens and a post committee through entertainments and subscriptions. The total height of the monument is twenty feet, the figure of Gridley being six feet ten inches. After reading the reports Stanton G. Carter pulled the cord and the Stars and Stripes which concealed the monument fell to the earth. A poem was written by Mrs. Charles Merrill to his memory, as follows:

And Gridley's heart was staunch and true,
 And Gridley's arm was strong to save;
 He felt the work was his to do—
 The work of succoring the brave.
 And when on history's glowing page
 You trace the names inscribed to fame—
 Of soldier, bard and statesman sage—
 Then write the patriot Gridley's name.

Upon his monument in Rural cemetery are these words: "To Reuel C. Gridley this monument was erected by Rawlins Post No. 23, September 9, 1887, for services rendered in collecting $275,000 for the Sanitary Commission."

Women's Relief Corps

In the afternoon of July 1, 1887, in Good Templar's hall, the Woman's Relief Corps, an auxiliary of Rawlins Post, was organized by Mrs. J. B. Russell of Oakland. It was organized "as an auxiliary and a help to the old soldiers and families in sickness or need." The charter members of the corps were as follows, including officers: Mrs. Lizzie D. Waterson, president; Lydia Henry, senior vice-president; Mary Johnson, junior vice-president; Jennie L. Southworth, secretary; Lizzie Condy, treasurer; Joseph Hyde, chaplain; Miss Hannah Browne, Sarah Tripp, Mary Heck, assistant conductor; Susie Keagle, guard; the non-official members being Mesdames H. H. Strong, J. E. Wood, Jennie Miller, Lenora Worden, Mary A. Stoddard, Zillah C. Wood, Nellie J. Weaver, Fidelia Browne, Sarah Tripp, Mary Heck, Jane Barber, Kittie Holman, Louisa A. Black, Nellie Atwood, Mary Lissenden, Flora A. Jacquerman, Lizzie McCoy, D. L. Swinnerton, Eliza Court, Ella M. Drown, Jennie Loomis, Sarah E. Hitchcock, Alma M. Hyde, Marion E. Steacy, Martha A. Hurd, and Alice Adams and Miss Eva Andrews.

One of the objects of the Woman's Relief Corps is "to inculcate lessons of patriotism and love of country among our children and in the communities in which we live." Having this object in view the ladies purchased a large staff flag, and on Memorial day, 1890, it was presented to the high school. The procession in its march halted on San Joaquin Street, at what was then the high school, and after music by the band James E. Eaton in a short address presented a banner. The flag was run to the staff top, the comrades giving three cheers. Emanuel Wolf, of the high school, received the flag, and the procession then moved on to the Avon Theater, where the exercises of the day were held. That morning memorial exercises were held and flags raised over all of the public schools for the first time in the history of the city. May 28, 1891, the Woman's Relief Corps gave a flag festival and drill in honor of Rawlins Post, the stage managers being Mrs. Jennie L. Southworth, Cecelia Holt and Hannah Gray. The program comprised a march of thirteen girls representing the thirteen Colonies, with Emma Loomis as the Goddess of Liberty. The young ladies then sang "The Red, White and Blue," the scene ending in a tableau of the States and Colonies. Then followed exercises with Indian clubs by Grace Henderson, Maud McLaren and Minnie Ruth-erford. Gertrude and Amy Hopkins then sang a duet, "The Carnival of Venice," and Clara Goldsworthy recited "Uncle Sam and His Children." A cornet solo followed by F. E. Southworth, the performance ended in a tableau, "War—Peace."

The memorial services conducted in the Rural cemetery in 1902 were unique, being conducted entirely by women save the prayer by Rev. Alfred S. Clark, rector of the Episcopal Church. Patriotic songs were sung by twelve school girls under the direction of Miss Emily Dodge. Lincoln's Gettysburg address was read by Lizzie Condy, and the address of the day was by Sarah Tripp, who gave much time and research to the statistical history of the Grand Army, including the number of men engaged, the number killed or wounded, and the number of battles and skirmishes. In the following year Governor George Pardee was the orator of the day. Over 500 school children were in the procession and about 5,000 persons assembled in "the silent city."

By executive law, June 14, 1906, was established as flag day, and all citizens throughout the state were requested to throw Old Glory to the breeze. The Woman's Relief Corps also made it the flag gift day, and in 1906 flags with interesting ceremonies, were presented to the Children's Home and the Congregational Church: June 9, 1919, to the United Brethren; May 30, 1910, to the Grace M. E. Church, South; and June 14, 1909, to the city. On the date last mentioned the corps members marched from their hall to Washington Square, where upon the east side a forty-foot flagstaff had been set in cement. The audience formed a circle upon the hill, while the president, Laura Haines, made the introductory remarks. Prayer was offered by Rev. J. P. Jopson, and Sarah Tripp as patriotic instructor, introduced Arthur Ashley, who presented the flag to the city through Mayor George Hudson who, in a brief speech, accepted the standard. A quartet composed of T. T. Smith, Roy T. Moore, J. W. Ziegler and E. W. Butters, gave patriotic selections, and Mrs. Bertha Russell recited "Old Glory."

Stockton Parlor No. 7, N. S. G. W.

Stockton Parlor, Native Sons of the Golden West, alike with other parlors, was composed not only of the sons of the pioneers but of young men born in California of white parentage. The peculiar feature of this order is, that like the Pioneer Society, it was the first order of its kind in the United States. Some six years after the organization of the first parlor, California No. 1, the Stockton Parlor was instituted March 12, 1881, by the grand president, Frank Huggins, of San Francisco. The following officers were elected and installed: Samuel L. Terry, president; George Israel, vice-president; Hugh O. Haas, treasurer; Walter C. Hogan, chaplain; Frank E. Lane, marshal; and W. G. Wallace, Will R. Louttit and Leroy S. Atwood. Also charter members were George L. Wolf, J. G. Zignego, J. W. Glenn and Wm. Smith. The enthusiasm for the lodge soon staled and the attendance was scarcely large enough to form a quorum. Then the meetings were discontinued, but a renewed life was given the parlor in June, '81, by Leroy S. Atwood. He obtained new applicants for membership, and June 11, 1882, the parlor was reorganized in the Good Templar hall, Austin building, on Main Street, east of California. The parlor was reinstated by Frank Huggins, grand president, assisted by Frank D. Ryan, grand vice-president; Henry Lunstead, grand secretary; and T. R. Harold of California Parlor No. 1.

It was customary for many years for the parlors to hold a state celebration in some large city, and Stockton was honored by the first celebration of that nature in 1883 and again in 1896. In order to obtain funds for the 1883 celebration, the Native Sons petitioned for an appropriation to be given towards the state Admission Day celebration to be held in this city, and Councilman John Doyle moved that an appropriation of $100 be given. W. F. Freeman, a pioneer, opposed it on the ground of economy. Hugh T. Corcoran declared that as the money was to be expended in celebrating the deeds and glories of our pioneers, and to perpetuate the admission of California into the Union, the resolution should pass. The resolution passed—ayes, Corcoran, Eschbach, Doyle, Fyfe, Link, Langhovel, Rodgers; noes, Abbott, Freeman, Paulk—August 7, 1883.

Stockton has had the honor of the first and last state celebration, because at the last celebration, the parlors had tired of traveling from city to city and there were so many other events crowding into the years, that the civic authorities no longer encouraged native son pilgrimages. At the time of the '83 celebration there were but eighteen parlors in the state, Lodi No. 18 being the last instituted. At the session of the Grand Parlor in April that year they resolved to hold a state celebration September 9 of each year, and Curtis Lindley, then the grand president, succeeded in having Stockton chosen as the place of celebration. Admission Day came on Monday and on Sunday morning the steamer Mary Garrett arrived from San Francisco with some 400, including delegates from California and Pacific Parlors. They were escorted to Templar hall, also the Native Sons hall, in the Austin building on Main Street and given refreshments. That evening there was a sacred concert in the Avon Theater under the direction of Mrs. Juliet Belding Lane, Mrs. Mamie Huggins Miller and Mrs. O'Donnell Morrissey. Ugo Talbot, the famous English opera tenor, had charge of the musical program. At 9 o'clock trains arrived bearing the Modesto parlor and the Sacramento parlor, firemen and Sacramento Guard. The parade numbered over 1,000 men, this including Governor George Stoneman and his staff. Every organization in Stockton was in line, the Native Sons being dressed in black, wearing Alpine hats and bright blue sashes. The exercises were held on the plaza under a canvas tent seating 2,000 persons. The oration was delivered by the grand lecturer, A. M. Dorn of San Francisco, and Samuel Terry read an original poem. That evening there was a grand ball in the Avon Theater, Ralph P. Lane and Ruth Clifford leading the grand march. Preceding the march the Native Daughters presented the Native Sons with a beautiful flag, Miss Mamie Huggins making the presentation. In 1912 Stockton saw one of the largest gatherings and finest parade ever in the city. Monday was Admission Day and on the previous Saturday throughout the night trains were constantly arriving bringing Native Sons and visitors by the hundreds into the city. The parade on Monday was nearly four miles in length, composed of Native Sons and Daughters only, over 10,000 in the line, this including twenty bands of music and fifteen drum corps. The parade was led by William O'Conner as grand marshal and C. E. Mathey, John Perry, John R. Williams, George R. Baker and E. Welch of Lodi as aids. The National Guard of San Francisco were in line in their swell Zouave uniforms. One of the prettiest features was the turn out of San Joaquin parlor Native Daughters. They rode in canopied chariots two abreast, drawn by horses, handsomely decorated. The chariots were decorated in purple, white, pink, yellow and green, the Daughters dressed in the same colors. The exercises of the day took place in the Yosemite Theater, and included addresses by John L. Davis, grand deputy president and Lewis F. Byington, past grand president; vocal solos by Mrs. A. F. Flanigan and Frank Smith and the Lotus quartette, Thomas T. Smith, Ray T. Moore, Edward Butters and J. E. Ziegler.

San Joaquin Parlor No. 5, N. D. G. W.

This parlor was instituted April 8, 1887 in Native Sons hall by Miss Richling of San Francisco, deputy grand president, assisted by Miss Fonterole. The parlor was instituted through the efforts of Miss Hannah Gray, who sent an application for a charter and secured the members. The following officers were installed: Mrs. Belle Cook Stockwell, past president; Hannah Gray, president; Mrs. Althea Hickman Dunlap, first vice-president; Kate Hilke, second vice-president; Mrs. F. E. Austin, third vice-president; Albertine Hickman, treasurer; Carrie O. Brien, marshal; Emma Debnam, recording secretary; Belle Grunsky, financial secretary; Mrs. Maggie Davis Close, inside sentinel; and Ella Abramsky, outside sentinel. The officers including the following charter members, Nellie Austin, Kate Abramsky, Mrs. Nellie Bossom Moore, Mrs. Kate Gerlach, May Goodell, Nellie Gerlach, Laura Hart, Ella Henderson, Albertine Hickman, Lena Hilke, Mrs. Hattie Keep Gerlach, Addie Clara, Maggie Leffler, Kate Pool, Hattie and Belle Miller, Mrs. Carrie Roesch Durham, Annie Sarah Russell, Nellie Smith, Clara Stier, Etta Smith, Kate White, Bernice Yolland. The parlor has been active among many lines of benevolent work. They organized the first Red Cross society in the county, were the pioneers in tree planting, one a laurel tree having been planted to the memory of Captain Charles M. Weber, in Jones Square. The Grand Parlor has been held twice in Stockton. Mrs. Carrie Roesch Durham was elected grand president at their session of 1889. Mrs. Lena Hilke Mills was grand president in 1897 and Mrs. Mamie Griffin Peyton was elected president in 1910.

CHAPTER XXII

COURTS AND CRIMINALS

The pioneers for lack of some better system adopted the Mexican form of government and courts. In fact they could not do otherwise, as the state had not been admitted to the Union, and there were no American laws or courts in existence. The lowest form of court among the Mexicans was the Alcalde courts which corresponds to our justice-of-the-peace. Then came the higher courts which were known as the Court of the First Instance and Court of the Second Instance. In this county the only higher court was that of the First Instance. Let us notice how these courts operated, judging by a case on record. It was the case of the People versus Tracy. It appears that the district attorney had indicted Tracy for murder and was about to try him for the crime without any preliminary examination. His counsel, Samuel A. Booker, Wm. Lyons, Samuel Brooks and Charles M. Creanor, objected to such high handed proceedings. Paying no attention to their objection the district attorney went on with the trial. Then Tracy's lawyers again objected, stating first his case had not been presented to the grand jury, and second that the court "had no jurisdiction as it was not constituted under the constitution of the United States." The court sustained the objection. Then the sheriff impaneled a grand jury and Tracy was indicted for murder. He was again brought to trial, with more objections from his counsel. Finally his attorneys inquired "What law is in existence and should prevail in this case." After much argument the court decided that the Mexican laws were in force except such as were in conflict with the laws and constitution of the United States. It was a badly mixed case, a murder trial under two different systems of law, and after hearing the evidence the jury acquitted the defendant.

When the state was organized the legislature abolished the Mexican system of courts and established the system in use through the United States. The highest or district court included two or more counties, and the district court in this district included San Joaquin, Calaveras, Stanislaus, and Tuolumne counties. The first district judge was Charles M. Creanor, who was appointed by the Legislature. The district attorney was elected by the voters of each county. The first district attorney, as you remember, was Samuel A. Booker, who was elected in the first state election. The court below the district court was known as the Court of Sessions, one court in each county. This court was composed of three judges, a presiding and two associate judges. Under the new constitution, adopted in 1879, all state offices were abolished, including the courts, and the legislature established one or more courts in each county, calling them Superior Courts. San Joaquin County then had but one Superior Court. It now has three courts, Judges John A. Plummer, George F. Buck and Daniel G. Young presiding. In these courts the tragic trials of the county have taken place; murder trials by the hundred, civil suits and probate cases by the thousand. They have been the scene of many thrilling incidents, the hope and despair of many a criminal. I have a list of over one hundred murders committed in this county during the first thirty years of its history and that is not half of the number. Those that I have are the murders of greatest interest because of some peculiar feature, cold-bloodedness of the act, or the murder of some prominent and leading citizen. There have been thousands of robberies committed on the highway of which you will find recorded a few.

The Hanging of "Mickey Lyons"

The execution of George Baker, or "Mickey Lyons," as he was commonly called, was the first legal execution in Stockton. Baker was a young man about twenty years of age and he was hung for the murder of another young man named Conyers. A short time before a boy of sixteen named Joe Moller had stabbed and killed another boy in cold blood, but he was acquitted. The story of Baker's fate is a sad one. He was a reckless, dissipated youth and associated with the lowest characters. Gambling and drinking were his main occupations, and on the day of the murder he had been playing poker and drinking freely in both the St. Charles Hotel and the Dickenson House. Leaving the latter place, he started for the Levee, and someone pushed him off the walk. He turned immediately, and drawing a knife, stabbed a person near him named Conyers. "Mickey" was arrested and taken to "the brig," a ship then anchored in the channel and used as a jail. Conyers died two days later, and Baker was held to answer for murder. When he was placed on trial, his lawyers, Terry & Perley, failed to sustain their client's plea of self-defense and youthful folly, and he was found guilty by the jury. Judge Ben. J. Williams sentenced Baker to be hung May 20, 1851. A gallows was erected on the block where now stands the Center School building, and on the afternoon of the time set the young man, heavily ironed and sitting on his own coffin, accompanied by Rev. James A. Woods and guarded by Sheriff Ashe and Deputy Thomas Blount, was drawn to the scaffold on a two-wheeled dray. On arrival there was a large crowd of men and women, some 800 in number, made way for this awful scene, and at 3 o'clock Baker ascended the gallows steps. After the death warrant had been read, Baker, "in a clear, unbroken voice," made a confession. The minister then offered a prayer to the Supreme Being, entreating Him to "receive this unfortunate youth into his presence to abide forever." Baker then made a short speech thanking the officers for their kindness and his attorneys for their efforts in his behalf, adding, "For it is little else that they have received for all they have done for me." A few minutes later, the first of those terrible death scenes, of which nearly a dozen were to follow years later, was an event of the past.

Two years previous to this another cold blooded murder had been committed in the slaying of the famous gambler and desperado James Taylor. "He was," says Rev. James Woods, "but twenty-two years of age and the most ferocious desperado that ever scattered terror around his bloody path. He had in other parts of the state encountered in fierce fights other desperadoes and come off victor, but in meeting William Turner he met his fate." Taylor one night, while looking for a fight, entered a saloon on Center street near the well known "El Dorado," which was run by a beautiful little French girl. In fact all of the saloon women in those days were beautiful and fascinating, because they were imported at heavy expense because of their beauty, to deal out drinks, and play monte, faro, poker, and roulette, and attract the men. Well, Taylor wanted some fun, and drawing his pistol, with one sweep of his arm he swept all the beautiful cut glass tumblers and decanters from the bar to the floor, smashing the entire lot. Without offering to pay the damage, he then coolly walked out of the saloon. The following day the girl sent word to Taylor that she wanted him to pay for the glassware. Like many of her class, she had a lover, named William Turner, and Taylor meeting him one day said: "Bill, if you don't pay your girl for the smash-up, I will kill you." Taylor was known to be a man of his word, and Turner knew that either he or Taylor must die. So, watching his chance, one Sabbath morning, Turner saw Taylor having his boots blacked. Quietly creeping up behind Taylor, Turner shot him in the back twice, the second shot instantly killing him. Turner was arrested and tried for the murder, his counsel being Mr. Irving and that famous orator and pleader, Edwin D. Baker, afterward killed in the famous charge at Ball's Bluff, while leading on the California regiment in the Civil War. The courtroom was crowded with anxious listeners and the proceedings were unusually interesting. Baker succeeded in causing a disagreement in the jury, and in the following term of the District Court Turner was again tried. Baker was not then in the case, and Turner was convicted of murder, which meant death. In that term of the court there were three men tried for murder—Turner, Barrillo and Reany—and April 28 Barrillo and Turner were brought before Judge Charles Creanor and sentenced to be hanged. A faithful brother saved Turner's life. Circulating a petition that his doomed brother's sentence be commuted to imprisonment for life he succeeded in obtaining hundreds of signatures, and tender-hearted Governor John Bigler, "Honest John" he was called, granted the petition. Two years later Turner walked from San Quentin a free man, J. Neely Johnson having pardoned him.

Execution of a Mexican

Indelibly stamped upon the memory are many of the events of childhood, and never can I forget the time when I saw my first legal execution. The victim Jose Barrillo, was a Mexican about twenty-seven years of age and one of an organized band of horse-thieves and robbers. His crimes were many, but he finished his criminal career when in a fandango-house he shot and killed, without any provocation, a white gambler named Henry H. Janes. Immediately after the shooting the murderer fled, but he was speedily captured by the officers and placed in the lockup. He was quickly tried, convicted and sentenced to be hanged, for at that time a bitter hatred existed between the whites and all foreigners, especially the natives of Mexico. So intense was this hatred that only two months previous to the execution, two Mexican muleteers, lying asleep by the side of their pack mules on the banks of the Mormon slough, in the early dawn were brutally shot and killed by two white men passing by. The white brutes saw the Mexicans quietly lying asleep, and drawing their revolvers they "blazed away," and then ran off. No efforts were made to find these murderers. But Jose Barrillo's case was different. He, a Mexican, had killed a white man, and, regardless of the law or evidence, he must hang. The forms of law, however, were complied with. The record of the event says: "An immense crowd witnessed the sad spectacle and the assertion of the majesty of the law." On the day of the hanging, I was playing with companions on Main street near Colburn's barn, where the Gnekow block now is, when looking down the street, I saw a procession of about fifty horsemen approaching, chatting, laughing and smoking cigarettes. Each man was armed with a revolver and their little mustangs were prancing and champing on their bits, the foam from their mouths flecking their breasts. The horsemen surrounded a wagon drawn by two horses, and in the wagon the condemned man sat, handcuffed and fastened with a riata to his chair. By his side stood a good padre, reciting the prayers for the dying, at the same time holding before the criminal's gaze a small cross. On arrival at the gallows, which in this instance was a large oak tree then standing on the southeast corner of Main and Stanislaus or Grant street, the wagon was driven beneath an overhanging limb, and the rope, already dangling, was placed around the prisoner's neck. He was then loosened from the chair and the wagon was driven out from under him. The Mexican was strangled to death, and the body was left hanging until the coroner came and cut it down.

The Highwayman Tom Bell

Tom Bell's true name was Thomas Hodges, but he was always known as Tom Bell. Born in Tennessee, he graduated from college with high honors, then graduated from a medical college. In the Mexican war he enlisted in the regiment commanded by B. F. Cheatham—afterwards a Stockton merchant and a partner of General Ketcham—and as an officer won fame and glory. In 1849 Bell came to California, discovered a rich mine in Mariposa County, and "played high roller" until the mine gave out. He had been dissipating heavily during this period, and, being now without a dollar, he stole eleven mules from a Mexican camp nearby, drove them to Nevada and sold them at a high price. He found stealing was a much easier way of obtaining money, than by means of a pick and shovel, and, organizing a company of bandits, began a series of robberies and murders. The first victims of the bandits were Mexicans, but soon they extended their compliments to all whom they met. Bell, in his exploits imitating the English highwayman Dick Turpin, wrote letters to editors, defied the officers to arrest him, threatened to kill those who interfered with his plans and often whipped those travelers found without money. On one occasion Bell came across a traveler who refused to give up his coin and made a fight. The traveler was shot in the thigh and fell from his horse, bleeding profusely, an artery being cut. Bell dismounted, skillfully tied the artery, carried the man to the nearest house, dressed his wound and gave full directions as to its treatment. The patient recovered. In 1852 Bell was arrested in Sacramento for grand larceny. He gave his name as Thomas Hodges, was tried, convicted and imprisoned on Angel Island, there being no state prison at that time. John C. Hayes, the famous Texan, was then the prison warden, and Bell, pretending that he was sick, was sent for treatment to the San Francisco Broadway jail. He escaped from that famous bastille and then, too late, the authorities learned that Tom Bell and Thomas Hodges were one and the same person.

In October 1856, Sheriff Hanson of Placer County learned that the Bell gang was in his vicinity, and with a party of armed men he started out to find them. The officers and criminals came together near a wayside saloon, and amid the crack of revolvers, Lewis Conway was killed, and a bandit named White captured. Bell and a pal called Texas escaped. To the officers White confessed his criminal record, and that his life might be spared, he promised to lead the officers to the rendezvous of the outlaws. Under the guidance of White a party of well-armed men a few days later started for the famous outlaw's retreat. White led them to a small shanty in the midst of a thick cluster of willows near Knights Ferry. The house was occupied by a woman, and she refused to give any information regarding Bell. The party, which was under the command of Judge George D. Belt, who was afterwards killed in this city by William Dennis, then rode down the banks of the Stanislaus River, and by accident, discovered the man for whom they were looking. When about a mile from the house one of the searching party named Price, while crossing the stream, noticed a man endeavoring to conceal himself in the thick willows. Price, thinking this a suspicious circumstance, gave the alarm and the party quickly surrounded the brush. Riding towards a common center they soon came upon Bell and a Spaniard, who were ordered to throw up their hands. Judge Belt, recognizing Bell, exclaimed, "I believe you are the man we have been looking for." "Very likely," replied Bell. The bandit's revolver and bowie knife were taken from him and he was tied upon a horse and taken to Firebaugh's Ferry, the party reaching that point about 11 o'clock a. m. Bell was then informed that at 4 o'clock he would be hung. The outlaw, then but twenty-eight years of age, asked permission to write a letter to his mother and to the woman in camp. The request was granted, and after finishing his letter he asked for liquor. He was given a bountiful supply and in a short time he became deliriously drunk. Talking freely he told of his many crimes and adventures. Near the ferry there grew an oak, and the only tree in that vicinity. It was, therefore, known as "the lone oak tree," and at the hour appointed, Bell was taken to that tree. After he fervently prayed for forgiveness a rope was placed around his neck and a few minutes later he was dangling in mid air.

The Washington Garden Murder

Late in the evening of April 30, 1860, the citizens around town were asking each other, "Have you heard the news?" "No, what is it?" "Esses was shot a while ago by somebody, the police don't know who." Joseph Esses, a German by birth, came to Stockton in an early day with his family, and, purchasing a plot of ground on Market street just west of California, planted trees and grape vines, and started a pleasure resort which he named Washington Gardens.

In summer it was a delightful spot, a cool, quiet place, and hundreds visiting there would sit under the little bowers of vines, slowly sip their lager beer and pluck grapes from the thick, heavily laden branches. Esses had a rather quarrelsome, jealous disposition, and on the evening of the shooting he quarreled with a roomer named Henry Bolles, because Mrs. Esses gave Bolles a rose from the garden. During the fight Esses shot Henry through the arm. The wound was not serious, and Bolles, taking the pistol from the shooter, went down town to have his wound dressed by Dr. Taggert, and then went to Sheriff O'Neal's office to give him the pistol. This movement on the part of the injured man saved him from being arrested as the murderer of Esses, for while he was absent a lively skirmish took place at the house, with the result that Esses was dropped. Who fired the fatal shot? Mrs. Taylor, wife of William Taylor, who lived across the street; John Shea, a tall Irish horeshoer; V. M. Peyton, Charles Huffman and George Dahl each heard three shots. A near neighbor, a large man, in size and appearance like the late Judge Terry, said he heard only two shots. Peyton and Huffman were standing talking on the corner of Main and Sutter streets, and hearing the shots, they hurried to the spot and on the way saw a large man coming out of the gate. On arrival they saw Esses lying on his back near the porch with a five-barreled pistol lying near. According to the testimony of a near neighbor, Esses, after Bolles left the house, procured another pistol and began chasing his wife to kill her. She ran to the near neighbor, who was passing by, for protection. Then Esses shot at him and soon afterwards received the fatal wound. Peyton and Huffman assisted in carrying Esses into the house, and Peyton asked Esses who shot him. "Some large man in his shirt sleeves," said Esses. "I understand that Peachy knocked your arm up and isn't it possible that your own pistol shot you?" asked Peyton. "I'm not drunk or a fool," replied Esses. "Some man shot me who had no business here." Esses lingered for eight days, shot through the lung, Doctor Ryer said. The jury summoned by Coroner Morris H. Bond rendered a then too-common verdict, "Shot by some person unknown to the jury." Esses, a member of San Joaquin Engine No. 3, and the Turnverein, was buried by them.

A Tragedy at Medina's

Four years later, a murder most foul kept busy the criminal officers of San Joaquin. This time the crime was committed near the foothills of the Sierras on the Mokelumne Hill road, some twenty miles from Stockton. At that point an Italian by the name of Frank Medina kept a little country grocery store, the trading place of the farmers of the surrounding country. Medina had been in business since 1861, and by thrift and steady habits had accumulated considerable amount of money. On the morning of December 10, 1869, a farmer driving to the store to purchase goods found the doors closed. This was strange, for Frank was always ready for customers. Pounding on the doors and receiving no answer, he began an investigation. Finally entering the place he found no one there, but the safe was open, the money was gone, and there was every appearance of a robbery having been committed. Help was then obtained and the ranchers began a search for the proprietor and his clerk. Finally in a deep gulch, some three-quarters of a mile from the store, their bodies were found, together with those of two Mexicans, and a negro called "Old Boss." They were all shot through the head, and the hands of each man was securely fastened behind him. It was a startling sight, and there was a cry for justice, but who were the murderers and how came the victims there? No one could tell, and not a clew was left except that the neighbors the previous evening had heard a noise in the store as of a drunken quarrel, and paid no further attention to the disturbance. General David F. Douglas, the old warhorse of San Joaquin took temporary charge of the store, and Coroner Bond held an inquest. No facts were brought out that would throw any light upon the murders, save that the previous day a party of Mexicans were seen riding along the road in the vicinity of the store. The demon of blood was then in his glory for seven men were murdered in San Joaquin County within two weeks. Some years after a Mexican named Padella was arrested as being one of the murderers. No evidence could be found to that effect, and he was tried for horse stealing, found guilty and sent to the penitentiary.

The Murder of a City Official

In the murder of Esses, Golding and Medina there were no court trials, for the finger of justice could not point to a single person, but in the murder of J. P. D. Wilkins, then city collector and street superintendent, there was slight evidence obtained. A saloonkeeper, homeward bound near the midnight hour, March 26, 1873, near the corner of Hunter and Lindsay streets passed what he believed was an old drunk lying near the shade trees. He walked on, stopped, returned and, examining the man, found that it was J. P. D. Wilkins, badly wounded and unconscious. Assistance was obtained, and he was carried to his home, not far away. He was laid upon the bed and upon examination his head was found in a terrible condition, swelled and bruised from the effect of sandbag blows; one across the forehead, a second across the back of the neck, the blows being struck by a man skilled in the use of that cowardly weapon. Mr. Wilkins lingered for three days, unconscious except for two or three times, when his lips moved and he tried to talk but could not, for his vocal organs were paralyzed. Sunday, March 30, he was buried by the Odd Fellows, of which organization he had been a prominent member since 1852. The funeral was held from the Presbyterian church, Rev. F. B. Morse and C. V. Anthony taking part in the service. Who murdered this honored citizen, a man of notable purity of his life? Two men, Ira A. Hall and Bab Durkin, were arrested, being suspected although there was no direct evidence to connect them with the crime. It seems that on the evening of the murder Wilkins, who had been working quite late in his office on his way home entered the Independent saloon and took a glass of beer. In paying for the drink he took money from a bag of silver which he carried. There was a stranger in the saloon at that time, and he immediately went out on seeing Wilkins with the coin. His appearance had been noted, and he and his pal were arrested by Police Officer Jerome Myers. The two men were held in jail for nearly six weeks, the officers hoping that something would turn up to implicate them. The grand jury failed to indict them, and May 12 they were liberated, but were again arrested and taken to Sacramento for robbery.

Before this time the hand of suspicion began pointing to Mrs. Wilkins and a lodger in the house named Bennett. At this sensational point the narrative must go back to 1852. At that time Wilkins was keeping the Crescent City hotel, the property later owned by D. S. Rosenbaum. During the summer his wife died, and Wilkins, returning to the East supposedly a rich man—for all returning Californians were presumed by the Easterners to be wealthy—married his first wife's sister. She at that time was only sixteen years of age, while he was thirty-three. They came to Stockton, and having sold his interest in the hotel, he began working for M. L. Bird, for he was by trade a harness maker. They lived a comfortable but not a happy life, for they had no pleasures in common. He cared nothing for society or amusements, and could not sing a note. She was fond of society and music. She had a sweet voice of fair range and power, and day after day the neighbors would hear her singing as she worked; the old songs, "My Pretty Janè," "Robin Adair," and "Coming Thro' the Rye." She was ever singing these love songs, but her favorite was "John Anderson, My Jo, John" for it was said she left a young lover in her Eastern home. Among those with whom she became acquainted, meeting him perhaps in the dry goods store of Stockwell and Underhill, was Henry B. Underhill, director and organist of the Presbyterian Church choir. He invited her to join the choir and she gladly accepted the invitation, and sang in that choir for ten years or more. Summer and winter she was faithful in her choir work, and to and from her home walked alone or accompanied by some of the church members. Mrs. Wilkins was at heart a good woman, but lively, full of fun and longing for congenial companionship. As the officers could find no trace of the murderers, early in June 1873 they arrested Mrs. Wilkins and Bennett, who had been her lodger. They were given a preliminary examination by justice A. G. Brown and held in jail to await their examination before the grand jury. That body indicted them for the murder of Wilkins, and Bennett was first placed on trial. The case was heard in Judge Booker's court and Bennett was defended by N. Greene Curtis, his brother-in-law, one of the best criminal lawyers in California. The principal witnesses were members of the family. Their evidence was conflicting and the jury failed either to convict or acquit. Then came a proceeding as mysterious as the murder, for Curtis asked for a change of venue to Sacramento county and Judge Booker granted the request. This was equivalent to an acquittal in Sacramento, and Bennett walked from the courtroom a free man. The charge against Mrs. Wilkins was dismissed.

The Swaney Poisoning Case

A murder somewhat similar to the Wilkins case was that of Swaney on trial for murder by poison of John Searles. In the fall of 1867 there lived in the mining camp of Mariposa a family by the name of Terry. There were several children, among them a daughter named Adelia. She was a very pretty girl and at the age of sixteen, encouraged by her parents, she married a wealthy mining man named John W. Searles, who was twenty-four years her senior. In the same town lived A. M. Swaney, who was at that time publisher of the Mariposa Gazette. He was married and had four children. Searles was frequently away from home on mining business, and, as the two families lived near each other, Swaney and Mrs. Searles became quite intimate. Immediately after Mrs. Swaney's death the sympathy of Mrs. Searles for Swaney's children was so deep that she frequently visited them at his home and remained many hours. Then the neighbors began to talk, and one moonlight night the couple were seen out walking. Swaney heard, or claimed that he heard, that Searles was going to kill him. One of the deputy sheriffs, A. W. Bancroft, was married to a Mexican woman, and to him Swaney told his troubles. Calling him aside one evening, where they couldn't be seen, Swaney asked: "Can't you get a Mexican to do the job? Searles is going to Buchanan Hollow soon with $1000 in his pockets. The Mexican can rob Searles and I will give him $200 and will give you some money." Bancroft could speak the Mexican language and was friendly with all the Mexican population, but he replied: "I don't know any Mexican that will do a job, but why don't you challenge him?"

A little later Swaney, who was affected with kidney trouble, as he afterwards claimed, began reading up on poisons, their action and effect. He was told that hydrocyanic acid was good for kidney complaints, and he made inquiry for the acid (prussic acid is usually called), but there was none in town. Then he sent an order to the well-known drug store of Williams & Moore, in Stockton, for a three ounce vial of hydrocyanic acid. Swaney in due time received the poison and on his way to his office he tried to pry off the cover. In so doing the box fell from his hands to the earth, breaking all to pieces. Swaney in his testimony before the coroner's jury testified that he gave the box a kick with his foot and passed on. In less than two days after Swaney received the poison Searles was taken violently sick and died within an hour.

Searles' sudden death and the familiarity of Swaney and Mrs. Searles caused considerable talk. Suspicions of poison now began to fly thick and fast, and ten days after the funeral the coroner had the body exhumed, the stomach taken out and placed in a glass jar, tightly sealed, for examination. The coroner then sent an order to San Francisco for the chemicals necessary to make a poison test. In the meantime the Sheriff and his deputies were busy and Sheriff Crippen sent Dorsey Ramsden, the sexton of the Odd Fellows cemetery, to search Swaney's house for vials of poison. The amateur detective was successful, for, after prying up the boards of the toilet, he found hidden beneath them a broken vial of prussic acid. Just previous to this time John Kessler, a shoemaker, while walking along the street noticed a piece of paper lying upon the ground. Picking it up he found that it was a bill head of Odd Fellows hall, Stockton. Reading the contents, he found that it was Swaney's bill for prussic acid. The shoemaker took this important evidence to the coroner and he showed it to an attorney who said: "Let's go and see Swaney about this." Swaney admitted that it was his bill, and told them the story of his sickness and sending for the acid, and then letting the box fall. When the chemicals arrived Dr. Turner sent for Dr. Buford of Coulterville to come and assist him in testing the stomach of Searles to see if it contained poison. The doctor also called in two or more witnesses. They drank considerable whiskey during the test, and during the examination of Dr. Turner at Stockton Lawyer Dudley for the defense asked, "Did you and Bedford get drunk on the whiskey?" Three separate poison tests were made and the doctors declared that the presence of hydrocyanic acid was shown. After the tests were made Swaney and Mrs. Searles were arrested, indicted and tried for the murder of her husband. The jury disagreed and the defendant then claimed they could not get a fair and impartial trial in Mariposa, and the case was transferred to this county. The trial began May 6, 1868, before Judge Cavis of the District Court and continued sixteen days. Sixty witnesses were examined, among them Judge Alexander Deering of Mariposa county. The entire proceedings were published in the press, being stenographically reported by Attorney Elliott. The defense was represented by William L. Dudley, S. A. Booker and J. H. Budd of this city and Judge Jones of Mariposa. The prosecution was represented by District Attorney E. S. Pillisgury, D. W. Perley and J. Burkholder of Mariposa. After being out seventeen hours the jury failed to find a verdict as there was no evidence showing that either of the parties implicated had given Searles the poison. Later Swaney was acquitted and he then married Mrs. Searles.

Executed for Stealing Horses

There are many persons today who disapprove of legal executions even though the criminal committed a deliberate, unjustified murder. What would they say regarding a law that punished horse stealing by a death sentence. That was the law in 1852. The legislature repealed this severe law in 1853. Under this law two men were hung in Stockton, the only legal executions for horse stealing in the history of the state. You remember of reading in a former chapter of the lawless acts of a party of men under the leadership of Wm. Owens, the gambler. They took to the gallows a man named Wilson, whom they suspected of being a horse thief, and choked him until he made a confession and led them to the camp of the thieves. Five men, James Wilson, Jasper Cochrane, Jerry Boland, James Neal and Frederick Salkman were arrested and taken to jail. They were all indicted for horse stealing and placed on trial. Boland and Cochrane were each sent to the penitentiary for seven years, but James Wilson, alias Mountain Jim, and Frederick Salkman, alias Dutch Fred, were awarded the death punishment by the jury. They paid the "penalty of their crime on Friday afternoon, November 28, amidst an immense concourse of people," said the Times, "amongst whom we were sorry to see a large number of women." It was about three o'clock when the two men were taken to the gallows, near the Methodist Church on Washington street, near Commerce. Salkman, jumping on the platform, remarked in a loud tone of voice, "I take my place to the right, as a soldier always should." Salkman, who was German born, came to this country in early life, and fought in the battles of Palo Alto, Santa Cruz, Cerro Gordo and Reseca de la Palma during the Mexican war. His demeanor was both bold and reckless throughout and he seemed to be utterly careless of his solemn end. He declared "he wanted to die like a man and not like an old woman." "Mountain Jim" or Wilson in a low tone of voice denied committing the crime for which he was being hung, "although he had committed many others." The two men were attended by the Rev. James Woods, and as the trap was about to be sprung Salkman exclaimed in a loud voice, "Here we go, gals." At three-thirty the signal was given and "the men were launched into eternity."

The Cold-Blooded Murderer Eleyea

The most atrocious murder ever committed in this city was that perpetrated on the evening of January 28, 1858, by Jacob Eleyea, the proprietor of a saloon and boarding and lodging house, a low wooden building on Hunter street near the Levee. Some time previous William McWade, an Irish miner living at Mariposa decided to visit the coast. Taking with him about two thousand dollars in gold nuggets, he went to San Francisco and Oakland, and then, with considerable money left, came to Stockton. He applied at Eleyea's for lodgings and was shown a room. He went down to the bar and took a drink and in paying for it drew forth a bag of gold. McWade soon retired, and was not again seen alive. The next morning he was found in the water closet, hanging by the neck. Judging from all appearances, he had hanged himself, but upon examination no abrasions, discolorations or any evidences of strangulation were found on his neck. It appeared to be a case of murder, but who was the guilty party? A red Mexican scarf told the tale, for the stranger was hanged with a scarf belonging to Eleyea. At once suspicion was aroused and he was arrested. He denied all knowledge of the murder, and declared that he had gone to bed at twelve o'clock and had slept soundly all night, had arisen at seven o'clock and had seen nothing of McWade until he saw him dead. Other witnesses, however, at the trial of the case, swore that they had seen Eleyea at two o'clock in the morning. Blood was found on the cot where McWade had slept, and it was also found in the passageway leading from the room to the closet. Over the murder the citizens were deeply aroused, for it was supposed that Jake knew considerable about several murders, and when his trial came on the courtroom was crowded. On that trial the jury disagreed, standing eleven for conviction and one for acquittal, the one man standing out because the evidence was all circumstantial.

The murderer was remanded to jail and in April, 1859, his second trial took place, Samuel A. Booker defending the accused. The prosecuting attorney, Judge Campbell, brought forward several witnesses who swore to hearing a noise and disturbance in the back yard of Eleyea's place early in the morning, and the principal witness, a Turkish tailor who lived and worked next door, swore that in the early morning he heard stifled cries and groans. Soon after this he heard Eleyea's voice asking of his accomplices, "What shall we do with the body? It's too heavy to throw in the slough." Booker tried by every means in his power to have the Court exclude the Turk's evidence, and Judge Creanor being a man of Southern birth, Booker even went so far as to try to prejudice the Court's mind against the witness because of his dark skin. Said the attorney "This Turk, a native of Joppa, near Jerusalem, is darker than the average of Chinamen and darker than an Indian," and he requested the Court to appoint a committee of physicians to examine him and pronounce his color and race. Absurd as such a request would appear today, it was then neither absurd nor unlawful, for there was a law upon the statute books (repealed by the legislature in 1862) that no colored man could testify against a white man, referring to negroes. But Judge Creanor, true to his duty as a judge, refused to exclude the testimony of this most important witness. The trial occupied two days time and the case was given to the jury April 12, early in the evening. At that time they frequently held court sessions at night, so many were the murder cases. The jury was out all night and the following morning at ten o'clock they returned into the court with the following amusing verdict: "We the jury find the defendant guilty of murder in the first degree (a death penalty) with a recommendation to the court for mercy.'

The Law's Delay

At the close of the week Eleyea was brought into court for sentence, and the Judge commanding the prisoner to stand up, asked him if he had any reason to give why sentence should not be pronounced. Then from the lips of this cold-blooded wretch came the most blasphemous words ever heard in court: "I would not tempt the spirit of my God, nor seek His displeasure, but this is true, so help me Lord in Heaven! Judge, I know no more of this murder than you do." It was an awful moment and not a man in that packed room believed a word Eleyea said. Then the judge, in a solemn but firm tone of voice pronounced the criminal's doom: "Upon Friday, the third day of June next, between the hours of ten o'clock and four in the afternoon, you will hang by the neck until you are dead." Not then did justice reach the scoundrel, for Booker, taking the case to the Supreme Court, succeeded in obtaining writ of supersedeas, giving a stay of judgment of six weeks, the writ being signed by Chief Justice David S. Terry. Regarding the outcome of this writ I know not, but Eleyea enjoyed a Christmas dinner, for, although he had been sentenced to be hanged, Governor John M. Downey, on December 23, granted the condemned man a respite until January 13, 1866. Booker, unceasingly laboring to save his client from the gallows, had circulated a petition, which a large number of citizens had signed, praying the governor to commute Eleyea's sentence to imprisonment for life. As the fatal day, the thirteenth drew near, Eleyea gave up all hope and the officials made ready for the execution, but Booker was not idle, and on the evening of the twelfth of January, the sheriff, by telegraph, received word from the Governor that another respite until March 9, would be sent on the morrow. Eleyea had been over two years in jail. Governor Downey refused any more respites and on March 9 justice was satisfied. On that morning as Sheriff O'Neal entered Jake's cell, he handed the sheriff the ends of several matches. Eleyea having been given the matches to light his pipe. Jake said he had saved the poisonous end to kill himself. But when the sheriff inquired, "Why didn't you eat them, Jake?" he replied "Having made my peace with God, I could not reconcile the act with my own conscience."

About four o'clock the criminal was taken from his cell to suffer for his crime, and standing upon the gallows, just before the black cap was drawn over his head, he made another speech. "The Turk," he declared, "has been the cause of all this trouble and expense to the state, and he has sworn my life away!—and my friends, I hope for you all when you come to die that you may enjoy happiness and consolation in the Lord Jesus Christ, as I do today." After making this speech the cap was placed over his head, the trap was sprung and his neck was broken. In twenty minutes the physicians declared him dead. The body was then cut down, placed in a coffin and carried to the Methodist church, where the pastor preached a funeral discourse. Then Eleyea's San Francisco friends, who had been putting up the coin for his defense, had him buried in the city burial ground, just east of where the Southern Pacific depot now stands. From the time of his first sentence to death by Judge Creanor, Eleyea had been frequently visited by two pastors, the Rev. John B. Hill of the Methodist denomination and the Rev. Clark King, and he became very religious.

This brutal murder has always been something of a mystery, and today it is not known positively how McWade was murdered. From indications and appearances it is supposed that Eleyea, with two accomplices, strangled McWade in his bedroom with the scarf. Blood flowed from his mouth, and this was found on the cot and in the hall, where they dragged the insensible man to the closet. There he partly came to, hence the cries and groans heard by the Turk, and one witness swore that he heard the pleading cry, "My God, don't kill me." While Eleyea was lying in jail awaiting his sentence, there were confined with him fourteen persons arrested for horse-stealing, Greene C. Palmer, accused of murdering John Benson; William Crawford, charged with killing John B. Lewis; and William Crossen, accused of the murder of John V. Ford.

The Murder at the "Snug"

It seems that Crawford, who had been celebrating the Fourth of July, 1859, pretty freely, rode to a saloon on the Mokelumne River known as the "Snug" and there found four men playing cards. Crawford wanted to take a hand, but they refused to admit him, and this made him angry. Soon after the refusal a boy fired a firecracker, and Crawford, exclaiming, "If there is any shooting going on I will take a hand," drew his pistol and fired at the bar-keeper. The bullet went wild of its mark, and then Crawford turning round, fired at Lewis, one of the card players. The ball entered his breast and Lewis died in ten minutes. The murderer then, holding out his revolver, said: "Does anyone want to shoot me?" The attendants were paralyzed and Crawford mounted his horse and escaped in the night. Two days later he was caught near Chamberlain's Ferry on the San Joaquin River, and when arrested by Constable L. F. Neeley of Woodbridge and William Brown of Dry Creek, said he was shooting wild and accidentally hit Lewis. "I suppose I will be hung or shot," he said, adding, "anything rather than San Quentin." The body of Lewis was borne into town and a funeral discourse was preached by Rev. McDonald of the Episcopal Church. It was a singular coincident that, as the funeral procession was entering the town on the north, Crawford's capturers were coming from the south, bringing him bound in a wagon. Crawford lay in jail until October, at which time the Grand Jury met. They found an indictment against him for murder, and in December his trial took place. The defendant was represented by Oscar M. Brown, who two years later joined Conner's regiment as a lieutenant colonel, and Lewis Dent, a brother-in-law of U. S. Grant. The district attorney, Judge Jenkins, was assisted by S. A. Booker and John B. Hall and Colonel Huggins. It was a short trial, lasting one day, and the jury, retiring at nine o'clock in the evening, brought in its verdict of guilty of murder in the first degree. This meant death by hanging, as the jury then could not, as now, fix a sentence of life imprisonment for murder.

Crosson's Murder of Ford

On the previous day Crosson had received a similar sentence for the murder of John J. Ford on the San Joaquin River near Harbin's Ferry. On September 5, 1859, Crosson called to see Ford, and they had a fight over a debt for potatoes, Crosson having owed the debt about two years. Crosson got the worst of the difficulty, and declared: "I will get even with you." Ford replied: "I have two guns at the house, if you want to fight. Crosson declined to engage in a duel and went away. Soon afterward, meeting a friend, the latter exclaimed, "There is blood on your face." "Yes," replied Crosson, "I had a difficulty with Ford, and no man can live who has drawn blood on me." The following day Crosson filled up with liquor and while in a fighting mood he called on Ford, gun in hand, and shot him, killing him at the first fire. Crosson then fled, but he was captured the next day and placed in that little brick jail that has confined so many murderers. He also was tried in the December term of the District Court, making three murder trials and two convictions in three days. Crosson employed Booker to defend him, and the district attorney was assisted by Lewis Dent, who in fact conducted the case, for Jenkins' knowledge of law was limited. Dent, who the following day lost his case as the defender of a murderer, now won the case as the prosecutor, for the jury after being out less than two hours, brought in a verdict of guilty. To save Crosson's life Booker tried the same tactics as in the Eleyea case, and circulated a petition that Crosson be imprisoned for life. This called forth a protest from the local editor, who asked: "What is the tendency of this faint-hearted leaning to the side of mercy?" Crawford and Crosson, three days after Christmas, 1859, were brought into court and by Judge Creanor sentenced to be hanged February 17, 1860.

From the time of their sentence until they passed hence, the two men were visited by Revs. Hill, King and McDonald. From early morn on that fatal day these ministers prayed with the doomed man. Near the hour of three the sheriff and his deputies entered the cell to prepare the men for the fatal drop. They were led into the jail yard, and the bright sun was slowly sinking in the west as the prisoners slowly but firmly ascended the gallows. About forty persons were present by invitation to watch the awful scene while every vantage point outside the jail was covered with people. Housetops, trees and she were black with morbid beings anxious to see two men pass into eternity. Even the passers upon the streets waited, for the terrible sight could be seen from the street.

At the schoolhouse on Center Street the boys in the grammar grade, under intense nervous strain, studied hard to get their lessons so that they might not be detained after three o'clock. Every boy that afternoon had his lesson, and when school closed with a whoop and a yell we ran all the way to the jail "to see the hanging." As we arrived we saw two men upon a gallows, their lips and faces bloodless, and ropes around their necks. The sheriff was then reading to them the death warrant and, after he had finished, Crawford, turning to his companion said, "Bill, how do you feel?" "I feel well; I am ready," Crosson replied. When the deputy tied Crosson's hands tightly behind him, he complained, and Crawford remarked, "It won't hurt you very long, Bill; you can stand it." "Oh, yes, that's all right," he answered. The men thanked the sheriff and the ministers for all favors and kindly acts, the black caps were drawn over their heads and the trap fell. Crosson struggled for twenty minutes. Crawford died almost instantly. When both were pronounced dead, the bodies were cut down, placed in coffins and taken to the Baptist Church. A large number gathered there, and Hill and King both preached funeral sermons, King declared that this was the second time that he had attended two murderers, both orphans, and he took for his text the sublime words of Christ, as He was nailed to the cross, "Father, forgive them; they know not what they do."

Black Bart

One of the most frequent criminal acts of that day was the holdup and robbery of the stage and passengers that traveled between Stockton and the mountain camps. One of the most peculiar and gentlemanly highwaymen of the '70s was the man who signed himself Black Bart P-0-8. Late in the '70s a series of mysterious stage robberies took place, one man alone, his face concealed beneath a white or black mask, committing the robberies. The officers of the state were puzzled. They could find no clue, suspected no one, and they designated the lone highwayman by the name of "Black Bart," because he sometimes left notes behind signed Black Bart P-0-8 and occasionally some doggerel verse. In San Francisco there lived a single man known to his friends as Charles Bolton. He dressed in the fashion of the time, wore a diamond pin, a handsome gold watch and chain, and a large diamond ring. He seemed to be a gentleman of leisure and wealth, but occasionally he disappeared from sight for a few days. His friends presumed that he was looking after his mine, for his conversation led them to believe that he was a mining man.

One the morning of November 3, 1883, R. E. McConnell, then driver of the Sonora and Milton stage, was ascending the grade about three miles from Copperopolis, he was halted by a highwayman carrying a double-barreled shotgun, his face concealed by a flour sack with eyeholes cut out. McConnell was alone. His only passenger, a boy carrying a rifle to shoot deer, got on at the ferry and dismounted at the foot of the grade. As the road agent halted McConnell and stood in front of the leaders, he inquired: "Where is that boy that was on the stage with you?" From his high point of observation with strong field glasses, the highwayman had noted the passenger long before the stage's arrival at that point. The driver stated that the boy got off below. McConnell was then ordered to dismount, unhitch the team, and drive behind the stage. McConnell was a brave, fearless man but, being unarmed, he wisely obeyed. The highwayman climbed upon the stage and, smashing open the box with a sledge hammer, found a gold mine—over $4,000 in amalgams, three ounces of gold dust, and $550 in gold and silver coin. Gathering up the loot, with a cheerful, "good-bye," he was soon lost in the brush. A few minutes later the boy reached McConnell. Grabbing the rifle, the driver hastened after the highwayman. About a hundred yards distant he appeared in sight and McConnell fired. The robber hesitated a moment and again disappeared in the heavy underbrush, slightly wounded on the hand. Believing that he was closely pursued, by armed men, hastily left the spot, and in his flight, he lost his black Derby hat, dropped a handkerchief, laundry marked "F-0-7" and threw away a package of papers covered with blood.

McConnell, quickly harnessing his team, drove to Copperopolis and reported the robbery. Officers were soon upon the ground. They included Sheriff's McQuade of Tuolumne and Ben Thorne of Calaveras. At Black Bart's campfire the officers also found a pair of cuffs, nicely laundered, a field glass case, the flour bag bearing the advertisement of a grocery conducted by Mrs. Crawford of Angels. During the search for evidence Thorn surmised that the robbery was the work of Black Bart, and the neatly laundered cuffs led him to believe that the highwayman lived in San Francisco. A few days later the two officers, Thorn with the handkerchief and Thackery with the cuffs, were looking for the owner among the laundries. Thorn soon found a clue, a Chinaman recognizing the laundry mark as his. He said the owner lived at 27 Second Street. Morse then quickly learned the occupant's name, Charles Bolton. Morse finding a friend who knew Bolton, requested him to introduce Morse as a mining speculator. They easily found Bolton on Bush Street, and after the introduction and a few casual remarks, Morse under an assumed name said: "I wish you would go with me, Mr. Bolton, to Wells Fargo's express office to examine some gold specimens." He readily accompanied the officer and Morse, leading him into a back room, Bolton was there confronted by Hume, Thackery and Captain Stone of the San Francisco police. He was interviewed for three hours, but shrewdly he parried all incriminating answers. The following day he was taken to Stockton and lodged in jail. He was then taken to San Andreas, where he confessed the Copperopolis stage robbery, having learned from the officers that they had very strong evidence of his guilt. He also conducted the officers to where the treasure was hid in the hollow of a tree only three hundred yards from the holdup. He was sentenced by Judge Gottschalk to six years in the penitentiary, and after four years he was released. A few days later he disappeared, and from that day nothing has been seen or heard of the famous "Black Bart P-0-8." The officers traced to him twenty-three holdups, beginning in 1873, in which he never injured a person nor molested a passenger. McConnell was rewarded by Wells Fargo with a costly watch and chain. It was a hoodoo, for every highwayman on the road made him a target, saying, "I'm after that watch and chain." McConnell later became a shotgun messenger, and in a hot fight one day he was so badly wounded he was compelled to permanently retire.

CHAPTER XXIII

POST AND RAILROAD TOWNS

In the history of the world nations have arisen, grown to great strength and influence in the affairs of the world and then passed away. So is it with the towns of a state. They were founded, grew to more or less importance in the community in which they were located and having filled their place in the county's history, they passed from memory or they became sleeping landmarks of the past. San Joaquin County has had several of the villages, some are forgotten, some are but skeletons of their former self, and some linger along hoping for a revival of the days of "49". Clements, Lockeford, Waterloo, Liberty, Elliott, Mokelumne City, New Hope, Colledgeville, French Camp, Linden, Woodbridge, Banta, Atlanta are all towns of the past, post road towns built up and maintained by the staging and teaming of the early days and the farming community. Now staging and teaming is dead and the farmers no longer require community centers, for they ride to town on the steam or traction cars, or sail over the roads in their automobiles.

French Camp

One of the oldest of these towns is the historic village of French Camp. We remember that the Hudson Bay Company had their trappers at that point in 1837, and that in 1844, Benjamin Kelsey and his family located for a season. After the discovery of gold and the founding of Stockton, it became quite a trading point for the Southern mines, because of the fact that teams and stages could travel from that point to the mines, either, summer or winter. In fact the winter roads were much the best as the rains packed the sand and made durable roads. Because of its trade some persons believe it would be a rival of Stockton. "Because of Stockton's mud," said the Republican as late as March, 1861, "Quite a number of small craft were employed at present in conveying goods from this city to French Camp. Teams do not attempt to come within four miles of town at present, because of the bad roads, and they pay four dollars per ton to have the goods brought to the camp, where the teams can receive it. A gravel road to French Camp even with a high toll upon it would be a great saving to the teamsters besides giving us one driveway out of town." The French Camp turnpike was built to the village soon after this item was published, and the camp then became a memory. One of the first settlers at the camp was Richard W. Noble and his family, who located there in 1852. Previous to this time Mr. Noble, who had a store at Mariposa, erected an adobe house at French Camp, at a cost of some $14,000. It was built on a knoll in the town; the building with its wall three feet thick being used as a storehouse for his goods. Soon after this he and Archibald Stevenson formed a partnership and opened a store and public house. Then the store of Le Barron & Company was opened and the merchandising place of N. McKinstry. In 1850, Lansing & Snell opened a hotel and store. And about the same time a man named Earle started a blacksmith shop and bakery. Goods for these places during the winter were transported there up French Camp Slough, and the first man to navigate the stream was E. W. Atwood. He began the navigation of the slough in a yawl, carrying about 1,500 pounds of freight and four passengers. Then the little steamer Mint began running to that point, carrying passengers and freight. The first religious service was held in the home of Colonel Lansing. The following year, 1851, a schoolhouse was erected by subscriptions from the farmers and Stockton citizens and it was used for all public assemblies. A second story was added and this was used for a hall for the Sons of Temperance. In 1853, there were two hotels in the place doing big business, and five lines of stages started from that point.

Ripon

Ripon, on the Southern Pacific Railroad, is the most southeasterly town in the county, the district bordering on the Stanislaus River. About twenty miles from Stockton it was first settled up in the early '60, most of the settlers locating along the river. Two of the earliest settlers in the Ripon district, were, W. H. Hughes, who took up a preemption claim in 1857, and Perry Yaple, who located there in 1861, previously owning a barley grinding mill in Stockton. Hughes owned the land where Ripon is now located. When the railroad came through in 1872 he gave them the right-of-way and a depot site. The company erected a small station, and named it Stanislaus station. This station was in use until February, 1912, when it was replaced by the present larger structure. For some length of time Stanislaus City, as some called it, was the terminus of the road then being built in Fresno. The company built a cattle corral, and it was the shipping point for a large amount of stock, including the cattle of Trahern & McMullen and also for the large amount of wheat and barley grown upon the sand plains, the grain being shipped in flat cars to Stockton or Point Costa for storage.

The nucleus of the town was started in 1874, when a man named, A. B. Cook came from San Diego and opened a store. Not pleased with the name Stanislaus City, he renamed it Ripon after his birthplace in Wisconsin. Cook was an enterprising fellow and he had the Government establish a post office there under the name Ripon, and was appointed postmaster. Subsequent postmasters were Perry Yaple Jr., and E. C. Dickerson. The post office was always in some store and the place changed owners several times, each new owner being appointed postmaster. Some of the merchants of Ripon were, Henry Bowman, B. F. Yaple, Frank Hutchingson, and E. C. Dickerson and J. H. Little, who erected a store in 1884. The town at this time was of considerable size containing a hotel, blacksmith shop, school, two large warehouses, and 14 residences, but the writer complained about the tardiness of the supervisors in constructing a bridge across the Stanislaus River. There was no transportation, except by toll ferry, and he declared a free ferry or bridge would bring a good deal of trade that way. Of the substantial buildings in Ripon the first brick building was erected by Perry Yaple, who burned the brick in the summer of 1886. It was a two-story building, the Odd Fellows occupying the second story. This lodge, Mt. Horeb, No. 58, was instituted in Sonora May 27, 1856, by Grand Warden L. L. Alexander. After the discontinuance of gold mining, the lodge began losing its members until scarcely enough members were left to hold the charter. At this time one of the members, Wm. E. Garatt, removed to Ripon and through his efforts the lodge was removed from Sonora to Ripon. The lodge now has 121 members in good standing. Progressive Rebekah lodge No. 229, Ripon, was instituted March 30, 1906 by the Grand Warden Ella Van Court, assisted by Ann Sorenson of Modesto, district deputy grand president. There were eleven charter members, thirty-eight initiated that evening. When instituted the lodge number was 209, but returning its charter some years ago it was again reorganized and given the new number. The town with its 500 inhabitants had several church denominations and buildings, among them the Dutch Reformed, Swedish Mission, Congregational, Dunkards, Christian Science, Free Methodist and Catholic. Along about 1884 the Woman's Improvement Club, first organized to clean up and care for Ripon cemetery, next turned their attention to the erection of a church building, for the use of the several denominations in the town. They collected by subscriptions and entertainments about $800. This was not sufficient money for a building. Then the United Brethren of Lathrop, a branch of the Dunkards, proposed to erect the church provided the citizens of Ripon obtained the lot. The terms were agreed to and the Brethren taking the $800 erected a church edifice at an additional amount of $1,500. The building was erected and used by the different creeds for several years. Then the Congregationalists erected a church of their own, followed soon after by the other denominations. Finally all of the denominations erected buildings, and the United Brethren church was unused for several years. The Free Methodists now hold services there.

The first school was held in an old shack which had been used as a residence. The partitions were torn out and wooden desks and seats put in. Some years later the district was divided, River district being on the south side and Ripon district on the north side of the railroad track, and a new schoolhouse was built. This schoolhouse at one time was located in the grove of locust trees, now growing near the town. They were planted by E. C. Dickerson and Oly C. Kroh to protect the school building from the heat of the sun. The first teacher in these schools was George Hanscom, then living in Modesto. He was followed by Miss Ida Kemp, May Esterbrook, E. C. Dickerson, and J. L. Moulton, the two last named marrying two of their pupils, the Yaple sisters. Ripon was up-to-date with its school service and in 1911 the citizens voted a bond issue for the building of a large handsome school structure. The building was completed in 1912 and dedicated, February 22, with appropriate ceremonies, the principal of the school Thomas H. Uren presiding. Five years later a union district was formed and May 4, 1917, the splendid high school was erected.

The Ripon Finch Murder

Probably the greatest sensation in Ripon was the killing of Phillip Finch by the Rev. James Wells, December 12, 1884. The cause was a difficulty of long standing and seems that in the eastern states Finch had seduced Wells' half-sister. Wells came to California and located at Ripon and Finch followed him and obtained work in the warehouse; at one time he boarded and lodged with Wells' family. Just previous to the shooting it was reported to Wells that Finch had threatened his life. Wells at this time was teaching the Ripon schools on the main street, located where now stands the First National Bank. About 4 o'clock on the day of the murder, Finch was walking towards the schoolhouse and some of the men on the street remarked, "Now there'll be trouble." As Finch came near the schoolhouse Wells came out of the building and walked up to Finch. After a short talk, those watching the affair saw Wells draw a revolver and shoot at Finch four times. Two of the shots took effect and Finch was taken into John T. Bloomer's store. He was attended by Dr. B. M. Brainbridge but died shortly afterwards. As two of the witnesses of the murder John B. Matthews and Thomas Fredericks ran to the scene, Wells exclaimed, "I am sorry I had to shoot you, boy, you have been following me for years. You seduced my sister and this morning you insulted my family." Sheriff Cunningham hearing of the murder by telegraph, hastened to the scene, arresting Wells and bringing him to Stockton jail. Wells was indicted by the grand jury for murder, and his trial came up February 25, 1885, in the Masonic Hall as the old court house had been condemned as unsafe. He had sold his little house in Ripon to pay his attorneys, James A. Loutitt and Wm. Dudley. The prosecuting was represented by the district attorney, Ansel Smith, assisted by Joseph C. Campbell. The jury went to their room on the evening of February 28, and the following morning reported that they could not agree, standing seven to five for acquittal. At a subsequent trial Wells was acquitted.

Manteca

Manteca is one of the progressive towns of San Joaquin County and its progressiveness is shown in the fact that in 1910 with a population of 100 it now has a population of nearly 2,000. Like all of the county towns its first settlers were honest, hard working farmers, who located in the district to till the sandy soil and raise wheat, hay and barley, the profitable crops at that time. It is not positively known who were the first settlers, but a man named "Billy" Jenkins is said to have located in that section of the country as early as 1858 on 320 acres of land. About the same time Wm. H. Lyons, a young Stockton attorney, took up some land there on a soldier's warrant. He did not live there, but took up the land on speculation. Joshua Cowell in 1863 located a half-section of land which included the present town of Manteca and building a little home began raising wheat and barley. Later when those crops were unprofitable he and his fellow ranchers began raising rye. In 1864 Peter Clapp, James Reynolds, Alvin Shedd, and George and Orsemus Sperry and Cutler Salmon, located in that township and became prosperous ranchers. The settlers were few in number, and although neighbors they lived several miles apart, for each farmer eventually owned large tracts of land. They defined the boundaries of their lands by means of deeply dug ditches making an embankment on the inside.

A man named Martin in 1864 built a little residence of brick in that locality and later it was occupied by Peter Clapp. The house now sheathed with wood is in the limits of the town. Another old time building of sixty-seven years ago is the former home of George Sperry. The Southern Pacific in 1870 built a line of road from Lathrop to Ripon, then the center of the grain growing district. Joshua Cowell gave them the right of way and the company erected a small freight platform and station where now stand the present depot erected in 1910. The station was known as Cowell's station. His brother had a warehouse about a mile below, called Cowell's warehouse, and as there was a confusion of names, the railroad company named the station Manteca, a Spanish word meaning butter. It had a prophetic meaning for today Manteca is the largest butter producer in the county. Joshua Cowell, now eighty years of age, justly called the "Father of Manteca," started a small creamery in 1896. It was not a success. A merchant named J. J. Overshiner in 1898 erected a small building across the track from the depot and opened a general merchandising store, and in connection there was a butcher shop. The Manteca-Rochdale store was opened in 1901, and the following year a blacksmith opened, where now stands the Bank of South San Joaquin. Another butcher shop was opened corner Yosemite Avenue and Hogan Road. John A. Boberg in 1909 started the Manteca lumber yard and taking in Carl Palm in 1911 they opened the Manteca hardware store. The first brick building was erected by Joshua Cowell in 1911 on the southwest corner of Yosemite Avenue and Hogan Road at a cost of $9,000; the Odd Fellows leased the hall in the second story. Cowell in 1913 erected a much handsomer two-story brick building diagonally opposite the first building, the one now occupied by the Jacob store. The Odd Fellows in 1913 purchased a lot for $1,200 opposite the Cowell building and erected a handsome building at an approximate cost of $12,000. Renting the lower story, the upper story was fitted up especially for lodge work. The property is now valued at $20,000. As early in 1914 J. W. LeTourneau, Johnson & Carlon, McPherson & Son were in the general merchandising business; Woodward & Douglas, Olsen & Hansen, Woodward & Hines, were selling real estate; Brow's drug store; Manteca Lumber Company; the Wiggin and the Manteca Hotels; Cowell's Stable; W. H. Harrell blacksmith; meat market; Cadwell's barber shop; bakery; paint shop; plumber; cannery and creamery; planning mill; Mrs. Baker's ice cream parlor; Dr. R. H. Goodale, physician; Dr. Moore, dentist; telephone exchange, Wells Fargo agency, post office and two banks.

There are five different denominations and churches in Manteca, including the Methodist, Union or Baptist, Christian, Catholic and Christian Science. The Union Church, first used as a Brethren or Dunkard Church, was built in 1912 in North Manteca, the Manteca Improvement company having given them two lots for that purpose. It is now used as a Union Baptist Church, the present pastor being the Rev. A. P. Brown. The Methodist Church is on West Yosemite Avenue. On the same avenue stands St. Anthony's Catholic Church. The first services were held in Cowell's hall by Father McGough, this being a mission church in Stockton parish. The church was dedicated June 18, 1916, and Father Marchisio has been in charge since the dedication. In October, 1919, St. Anthony was set apart as a parish.

The first teacher of the district school was Miss Wodward, the school being some distance from Manteca. This was in 1867. She had pupils of all ages, one of them being Joshua Cowell, then a young man of twenty-five years. In the meantime Manteca had become quite a settlement, and in 1912 the school was removed from its former location on the river to the brick building now occupied by the Jacobs store. The building was erected by Mr. Cowell. A few years later a fine eight-room grammar school was erected at a cost of $30,000, and a large twenty-room Union high school is just completed in East Manteca at a cost of $200,000.

The town has two banks, each being located in its own brick building on Yosemite Avenue. The first Bank of Manteca was located in a brick building erected by Joshua Cowell. It was incorporated November 28, 1911, with a paid up capital of $25,000. The first president was Joshua Cowell and the directors, Fred Norcross, Joshua Cowell, J. N. Norcross, Ed Powers and John Boberg. Some two years ago the bank increased their capital stock to $100,000 changed the name to First National Bank, and moved to a building erected especially for their use. The Bank of South San Joaquin was incorporated May 18, 1918, with the following officers: Frank Guernsey, president; P. L. Wisdom, vice-president; Hugh Campbell, secretary, treasurer and cashier; Arbor Barth and George Williams, assistant cashiers; and J. J. Overshiner, J. M. Lindsey, John A. Boberg, J. J. Napier and the officers as directors.

The town has several secret societies, including Tryon Lodge of Masons, who meet in the hall of the pioneer Cowell Building; the Woodman of the World, organized March 11, 1921; the Loyal Order of Moose, instituted August 25, 1920; the Odd Fellows organized December 2, 1911; Phoebe A. Hearst Parlor, N. D. G. W., instituted April 12, 1919, and Manteca Rebekah Lodge No. 332. These lodges all meet in the Odd Fellows' Building. The Phoebe Hearst Parlor officers were installed by Grand District Deputy Mamie Peyton of Stockton and her grand officers.

The Manteca water works was started by A. Bucilleri, who used large quantities of water in his cannery; a large iron tank was erected on the west side of the railroad together with a pumping plant and arrangements made to supply the citizens with water for domestic and fire purposes. Three-inch pipes were laid to the street corners and to these pipes hose can be attached. The present fire department is composed of two companies with Elwood Leventon chief engineer and E. W. Sullivan and A. G. Pennebaker, assistants. Including these officers the following are the fire fighters: George W. Swanson, George E. Buthenuth, Benny Fauls, L. F. E. Costa, J. C. Kerr, J. W. Parr, John Jewart, Henry Hyman, Budd Hinkson, C. E. Field, Milo Monson, L. J. Delmege, Jack Greenberg, M. Litchfield, D. E. Stewart and H. B. Alger.

Fred W. Wurster, a Stockton boy, published at Ripon a little newspaper called the Irrigation Bulletin. It was devoted almost entirely to irrigation projects. In 1909 the plant was removed to Manteca and sold the following year to Fred Holman. He changed the name to the Manteca Bulletin. A rival newspaper called the Enterprise was started in 1916 by J. B. Dixon, who sold out in 1917 to a Mr. Bessac. In 1918 the paper was consolidated with the Bulletin. The Bulletin is a four-page weekly with a circulation of 1,000 copies and is at present owned by J. D. Dean, who bought the plant in May, 1918.

East Union Cemetery, where lie the bodies of many of the pioneers who located in Manteca section, was set apart for a burial place in 1872, Alvin Shell at that time giving to the association a small tract of land. Some twenty years later, 1893, Joshua Cowell deeded land just opposite the cemetery for a church, and the Union Church Society erected a small temple of worship. The society was organized in 1887 with Mrs. Emily F. Cowell, president; Mrs. Luda S. Reynolds, secretary; and Mrs. Anna Reynolds, treasurer. Burials were made in the cemetery from time to time, but as the years passed no care was taken of it and it became a disgrace to the community. Finally the society determined to improve the grounds they having in the meantime obtained the church lots, making five acres in all. Obtaining money by subscription the grounds were cleaned up and a handsome gate and arch of cement and marble erected at the entrance. In the pillars supporting the arch there are marble tablets on which are engraved the family names of sixty of the pioneers.

The progressive citizens of the town wisely, as early as 1909, organized a Board of Trade with the following officers: F. F. Langford, president; F. M. Cowell, vice-president; E. N. Pierce, secretary; and Joshua Cowell, treasurer. Through their efforts in 1818 Manteca was incorporated as a city of the sixth class. The first elected officers were: Joshua Cowell, mayor; C. E. Littleton, F. M. Cowell, Andrew Veach and H. S. Erstad, trustees; George H. Singleton, clerk; J. F. Scott, attorney; E. H. Jeffries, engineer; John Boberg, treasurer; and Maro Litchfield, marshal and tax collector. In the second election R. E. Leventon was elected mayor and E. Kepple, F. E. Stetler, R. P. Fuller and J. E. Heeber, trustees; F. M. Roundtree, marshal and tax collector; E. Powers, treasurer; Daisy E. Duvall, clerk.

Were it not for irrigation this article of Manteca could not have been written. It is true that the Spreckels $2,000,000 beet sugar mill, employing some 300 men during the beet grinding season, gave Manteca an uplift, but it was the water that came flowing into their fields in 1903 that meant prosperity. On November 21 they celebrated the event at a small station five miles southeast of Lathrop. It was a proud day in the life of H. W. Cowell who, with Nate Harrold, spent his fortune in pushing ahead the project. The farmers from the surrounding country came in crowds to the celebration, and over 200 Stockton citizens attended, accompanied by a band.

Lathrop

Lathrop is a town of the past, a silent reminder of the time when Stanford and Company endeavored to found a town as a rival to Stockton, but they did not figure on Stockton's waterway to the ocean, which built up the city to a population of 10,000 before there were any railroads in existence. The company laid out the town August 1, 1887, subdividing the tract west of the railroad hotel into sixteen oblong blocks. Up to this time it had been known as Wilson's station. The company named it Lathrop in honor of Stanford's brother-in-law, Charles Lathrop. Every inducement was made to have settlers locate there, as it was a terminal point for trains, thus causing many railroad men to move their families there, and the stopping there for twenty minutes of each passenger train for meals in the railroad hotel. This hotel, one of the largest in the state at that time, was built at a cost of $50,000. It was placed in charge of H. A. Bloss, the popular hotel man, who had been conducting the eating place at the Stockton depot. The hotel was opened to the public May 10, 1871, with a grand ball and a sumptuous supper. Merchants and others began to locate there and some of them were not desirable residents to the company as they opened opposition eating places to the railroad house. As every passenger train arrived times were lively as the opposition hotels would solicit patronage. Then the company prohibited all solicitations on their property, and there were several fights and lawsuits. Passengers, however, continued to patronize the cheaper hotels. Then the company won out by running a long line of box freight cars on the sidetrack just before the arrival of every passenger train. Lathrop reached its highest growth in 1879. At that time it had a population of about six hundred, with three hotels; two restaurants, two general merchandising stores, a school, Knights of Pythias lodge, a Dunkard and a Catholic church. In February, 1886, the hotel caught fire and was totally destroyed by fire. The railroad then transferred their round-houses to Tracy and made that town the terminal. That was the death blow to Lathrop.

The Murder of David S. Terry

Soon after the rebuilding of the hotel Lathrop became famous through the killing of Judge Terry by David S. Nagle, a body guard of U. S. Supreme Justice Stephen J. Field. The two judges had been enemies since they sat together on the Supreme bench of California. Terry at one time publicly denounced Judge Field as "the most corrupt judge ever on the bench." In 1883 a woman named Sarah Althea Hill claimed by a secret marriage to be the wife of Senator William Sharon, a wealthy mining man formerly of Nevada. Sharon denied the marriage, and to prove it the case was contested in 1884 in the San Francisco court. Her attorneys were David S. Terry and George W. Tyler, a former county judge in San Joaquin. She won out, as her marriage contract was declared valid. Sharon then removed his residence to Nevada, so as to bring the contest before the Federal Court, Chief Justice Field, presiding. Frank G. Newlands, the son-in-law of Senator Sharon, was a close friend of Chief Justice Field. In the meantime some curious events occurred. Sharon died in November, 1885; in the following month, Mrs. Cornelia Terry died broken hearted, and in less than two months, January 8, 1886, Terry married Sarah Althea Hill. Mrs. Terry now claimed Sharon's property as his heir, and the contestant was Frank Newlands. The case was tried in the U. S. District Court before Justice Field in September, 1888. It was a curious condition of affairs, Terry pleading his wife's case against Sharon's son-in-law before Justice Field, Terry's sworn enemy, and Newlands' warm friend. During the trial Mrs. Terry sprang up from her seat and exclaimed, "Justice Field, are you going to order me to give up that marriage contract? We hear that you have been bought. How much have you been paid by the Sharon people?" "Marshal, put that woman out," commanded Field. Terry resisted the marshal and some witnesses say he drew his bowie knife. He was sentenced to six months in jail in the Alameda County prison. While in jail he said to some friends, "When I get out of jail I will horsewhip Judge Fields." "But he will resent it," replied his friend. "Then," answered Terry, "if he resents it I will kill him." Terry was released from jail March 3, 1889, and went to his Fresno home. August 14, 1889, Terry and his wife and Judge Field and his body guard, David S. Nagle, unknown to each other were on the Southern Pacific train bound for San Francisco. As the train stopped at Lathrop for meals Field and Nagle entered the dining room and sat down to a table side by side. A few minutes later Terry and his wife entered the room, she without her handbag, containing a revolver, which she always carried. They were conducted to a seat beyond Field, and as they passed Terry apparently took no notice of Field. Sitting down, Mrs. Terry whispered something to her husband, and immediately got up and left the room. In the meantime Terry arose from the table and approaching Field from behind slapped his cheek upon the right and the left side. This, according to the Southerner's code was the highest insult that could be given an enemy. Quick as a flash Nagle with his left hand shot Terry twice and he fell to the floor dead. The first ball pierced his heart and the second bullet pierced his ear as he fell. At that moment Mrs. Terry entered the room bearing her handbag and falling upon her husband's breast appeared to take something from beneath his vest. There was where Terry always carried his dirk knife, according to his own statement. Nagle was arrested by the Lathrop constable and taken to the Stockton jail. A warrant was sworn out and served on Justice Field by Sheriff Cunningham, but immediately he was served with a writ of habeas corpus to produce Justice Field in the U. S. Court in San Francisco. Nagle was tried in the same court on the charge of murder and acquitted on the ground that he had only performed his duty.

Farmington

Farmington is a little settlement well named in 1859 by a man named Wm. Stamper, as it is located in the center of a vast farming district. As early as 1848 two men named David Wells and George Thayer immigrated here from Oregon and erecting a tule house took up 320 acres of land near the present site of Farmington. The place was known as the Oregon ranch. In 1852 Nathaniel S. Harrold purchased the Oregon ranch as a stock farm. He increased his holdings until he had over 5,000 acres of land. In 1868 he built a handsome two-story brick residence costing him $10,000. Another settler there in 1855 was Shubal Dunham, who also became a wealthy farmer and erected a handsome residence. Two other well-known settlers were M. J. Drais and J. F. Harrison. In 1858 W. B. Stamper took up land on the present Farmington site, and in the following year he sold his two lots to David and Wm. Sanderson who erected a blacksmith shop and hotel. Alexander Horn and L. J. Morrow then opened a general merchandising store. The store, after changing hands many times, was later purchased by O. K. Dyke and Fred M. West. When the Oakdale Railroad was built it greatly benefited the town, and in the early '90s there were three hotels, two merchandising stores, a livery stable, three blacksmith shops, a harness store, two churches and a school. There was an Odd Fellows' lodge instituted July 11, 1882, Farmington Lodge No. 296, which is still in existence, and Crescent Rebekeh Lodge No. 234, with at present twenty-eight members.

The first school was opened in a small building on the land of M. J. Drais, with Wm. Chapman as the first teacher. A new school was erected in 1889 at a cost of $6,000. Religious services were there held as early as 1853 by a Presbyterian minister, Rev. M. Crow. In 1872, through the work of the Rev. Charles Yager, a Cumberland Presbyterian pastor, a Union church was built through the subscriptions of members of all denominations, at a cost of $1,500. In 1878 the Methodist Episcopal Church was organized, and in 1889 they built a $2,500 edifice.

Clements

Clements, the most northeasterly town in the county, was founded by Thomas Clements, the biggest hearted and most generous man in that section of the country. The present site of Clements and adjoining bottom lands were purchased by him in 1871 from David S. Terry, and in 1872 Clements located on his ranch. Terry obtained this particular piece of property in 1850, the bottom lands along the river being some of the richest soil in the county.

Terry came to this ranch after his release from "Fort Gunnybags" by the San Francisco Vigilance Committee for the stabbing of Hopkins, and he there practiced pistol shooting just previous to his duel with Senator David C. Broderick. At this time the traveled road ran along the river bottom to the ferry, and in 1854 Terry and a man named Hodge established a flour mill on the flat and called it the Lone Star Mill, Terry naming it after Texas, the Lone Star State, his birth place. The mill is said to have continued in operation until 1885 under the management of S. L. Magee. The only house in that section for many years was the Poland House built by George Poland on the well traveled road to Mokelumne Hill. It was a stage and teamsters' station, and in boyhood the writer well remembers the place, as he slept in the attic over night, while assisting in driving some cattle from Stockton to Sutter Creek. In 1878 a man named Lukins established a blacksmith shop and home at Clements and Daniel Marceau opened a saloon. After the arrival of the railroad George Ringer erected a two-story brick building as a hotel and barroom. Then Moses Bruml and Charles Bomert came up from Lockeford and opened a general merchandising store. Soon after this Bomert was the leader in forming the Farmers' Trade Union, and buying out the M. Bruml and Bogert firm they erected a two-story brick building and put in a $15,000 stock. The San Joaquin & Sierra Nevada narrow guage railroad running from Brack's Landing through Clements to Valley Springs, originated with Jacob Brack and others. They failed in their object, lacking the financial end, and about 1884 the Southern Pacific took it over and made it a broad guage road with Lodi as the terminus. At Clements their agent was Wm. J. Siegel, who had the manifold position of railroad agent, warehouse man, telegraph and Wells Fargo agent, and a notary public. The first postmaster was Charles Bomert, and among his successors were Miss Cecilia Gillis and her sister. Their father was the first justice of the peace.

The schoolhouse was on the second flat, erected by P. A. Athearn in 1869. A two-story brick school was erected in 1877 on the upland about a quarter mile from the town. It was built by the cooperation of citizens. S. L. Magee deeded the land, Thomas Clements gave the brick from his brick yard, and other public-spirited men subscribed the money to purchase other building material and hauled it free of cost from Stockton. One of the first teachers was a Mrs. Hornshell. Later Amy Stowe and W. R. Stone, who later became a Stockton attorney, were teachers. Religious services were held in here by the Rev. W. H. Pascoe, a Congregational minister from Lockeford. In 1891 the Methodist Episcopal denomination erected a house of worship, and the pulpit was supplied by pastors from Lockeford. The Presbyterians had erected a house of worship the previous year at a cost of $6,000, which was dedicated Sunday morning, September 27, 1891. The dedicatory sermon was delivered by the Rev. D. S. McDonald of San Rafael, and those assisting in the dedication were Revs. M. D. Steen, the pastor of the church, J. C. Huber, president of the San Joaquin Valley College at Woodbridge, and Bishop Hott, of the United Brethren denomination.

Lockeford

Lockeford was one of the liveliest towns in the county, and a strong Union town during the Civil War, they hung Jeff Davis in effigy, and organized a military company called the Mokelumne Dragoons, with George C. Holman as captain. Settlers began locating on the river bottom and on the bluffs as early as 1849. D. J. Staples, Dr. D. J. and Elmer H. Locke coming at that time. Charles R. Montgomery located there in 1852, and trees are still standing on his place as landmarks. Joseph Putnam, Edward Whipple, and Daniel Howard took up land near Lockeford in 1851 and gave it the name of the New England ranch, they coming from the New England States. Putnam probably was a relative of Israel Putnam, one of the heroes of the Revolutionary War. Reuben Metcalf, crossing the plains with two oxen, located on the Mokelumne River in '57, and Charles Pope located across from the Athearn ranch in '53, and Mrs. Belle Sheridan, then a girl of four years of age, came with her parents in '52, their home, the Ryan ranch, being west of the Harmony Grove church. Thomas B. Parker settled on his ranch in 1854 and Mrs. Amanda Flanders, Clarence Flanders and Mrs. Clara Howard came to California with their father, L. C. Flanders, and settled near Lockeford in 1860. The "mother of Lockeford," and one of the most patriotic women in San Joaquin County, is Mrs. Delia M. Locke. Marrying Dr. D. J. Locke in Massachusetts in 1855, then a girl of 19 years, she immediately started on their honeymoon for California and Lockeford, arriving there in July. She is the mother of thirteen children, all born in Lockeford.

The first domicile in Lockeford was the log cabin of the Lockes on what is called Yankee Hill. It was erected early in 1851 beneath three large oak trees, still standing. When Dr. Locke returned to the town with his bride the log cabin was replaced by a neat wooden structure now standing in the Locke orchard. The present two-story brick home was built in 1865. If Mrs. Lou M. Locke's history be correct Christian Megerle built the first hotel in 1857, where now stands George Clements' house, and in 1862 Mrs. Amanda Flanders kept the Megerle House. The so-called Lockeford Hotel was moved to its present site in 1859 by a man named Clapp, its owner. The building was erected in 1857 on Bear Creek ranch by Mr. Moore and sold to Clapp. Luther Locke deeded a lot to Clapp on condition that it be opened as the Lockeford House. Captain Vincent, who had been living in a tent, erected a new house in 1857. In 1858 D. J. Locke erected a two-story adobe house to be used as a granary, with a public hall in the second story. In that hall was organized the Lockeford Good Templar Society, the Congregational Church, and the Ladies' Home Library Association. It was also during the Civil War the armory of the Mokelumne Dragoons. A wheelwright named Reed built a home in '61, which is now occupied by M. Bruml. The grandfather of J. C. Hammond built in '67 the house in which he lives. The first store was started in July, 1856, by Luther Locke. It is now the residence of N. H. Locke. It was known as the White House, the post office being in the store. In 1881 Lockeford was quite a manufacturing center; there were three firms making light wagons, two carriage painting shops, Tretheway & Daly employed four men constantly, and C. P. Grant had six men, Benjamin Steacy kept busy nine men and the J. M. Hooly saddlery and harness shop had three men.

The first school was taught in a canvas tent on the river bottom, supported by willow poles. Mrs. Belle Sheridan, who attended this school, called it "The Rag School House." A few years later, 1856, a wooden building was constructed about half way between Staples Ferry and the town. In 1864 the building was removed to Lockeford. The population of the place increased quite rapidly, and so did the children, and in 1874 a much larger and more convenient school was erected.

The first religious service in Lockeford was held November 24, 1861, by the Congregationalists in what was then known as the "Sons of Temperance Hall." This hall, an adobe building on the Locke property, now used as a granary or warehouse, was the public assembly place of all the people. The Congregational Church was there organized in February, 1862, and seven years later at a cost of $2,800, this amount including the bell, they erected a house of worship. It was dedicated September 19, of the same year. The first officers were: David J. Locke, Thomas B. Day, George Hommand, Thomas B. Jeffreys and Isaac Brown. It is still in use for religious services.

The so-called Church of Christ was organized in March, 1876. They purchased a little stone building then located on the Locke grounds, and removing it to its present location anticipated an increase of their numbers. They failed to materialize and the building was sold to the Catholics. They remodeled the building at a cost of over $1,000 and re-named it St. Joaquin Church. It is now in the Lodi parish.

The Lockes were a strong temperance family and as early as January, 1860, a Sons of Temperance Lodge, known as Live Oak Division No. 29, was organized with the following charter members: D. J. Locke, John Griffith, Jacob Hesman, Paul Dennis, John D. Wood, Peter Cahill, J. W. Simpson, John P. Hill, E. P. Megerle, John A. Simpson, R. T. Vance, H. P. Pelton, A. Hall, D. C. Fugitt, P. L. Megerle, T. J. Mofitt. In 1864 a Good Templar lodge was organized called Rescue Lodge No. 115, and this organization absorbed the temperance lodge.

Progressive Lodge No. 134, I. O. O. F., was instituted on May 11, 1867, by Grand Master Charles N. Fox, assisted by Past Grand Patriarch B. W. Barnes and members from Woodbridge and Campo Seco. The officers elected and installed were Peter Moore, noble grand; P. B. Wagner, vice-grand; S. B. Sabine, secretary; and Philip Cahill, treasurer. After the installation of the officers and the initiation of fourteen candidates the brethren enjoyed a banquet in Wm. Kitt's restaurant.

Live Oak Rebekah Lodge was instituted October 26, 1885, by Grand Master Nathaniel Cook and Grand Secretary Wm. H. Lyons. The following officers were elected and installed: Mrs. Clara Howard, noble grand; Mrs. J. Ostrander, vice-grand; Mrs. Wm. B. Piper, secretary; Mrs. M. Bruml, treasurer; Mrs. George Ruger, warden; Mrs. J. B. Thorp, conductor; Mrs. M. G. Flanders, inside guardian; and Miss M. McCloud, outside guardian.

Vesper Lodge No. 194, K. P., was instituted February 7, 1884, with thirty-nine charter members. The first officers were: Wm. Ennis, past commander; Wm. B. Ambrose, chancellor commander; B. F. Foster, vice-commander; J. B. Throop, prelate; Luther Locke, keeper of records and seal; J. Blois, master of finance; M. Bruml, master of exchequer; C. McCloud, master of arms; C. H. Dial, inside guardian; A. V. Tretheway, outside guardian.

During the latter part of the Civil War the town boasted of what was known as the Lockeford Dragoons. They were in existence only a time and disbanding in October, 1867, their equipment consisting of saddles, bridles, swords and uniforms, were returned to Sacramento.

The Lockeford brass band was organized June 11, 1882, with John Wagner, Thomas Daly, W. B. Christy, D. Jane, F. Starkey, J. Curtain, J. Macgurney, Charles Baker, Thomas Baker, J. Brummel, John Blois, John Hammond, Jabez Harris, of Stockton, director. On October 11, 1890, the young men of Lockeford organized a second brass band with Henry Bruml as leader. The members were: Osias Grubs, Augustus Barker, Edward Locke, Virgil Holey, Charles Emsley, Abraham Farrington, George Hartwell, Early Farrington, Charles Maxwell, Daniel Dorsey and Charles Gilos.

Collegetown

Another of the bygone villages is Collegetown. It was so named after the college erected there in 1866 at a cost of $8,000. The building was destroyed by fire and never resurrected. One of the first settlers in that locality was John Kehoe. Another settler was Dr. L. R. Chalmers in 1850, and he it was who caused the location there of Morris College. The settlement is on a line between Dent and O'Neal townships and as a farming center was quite a busy burg. Teaming for Mariposa all passed that point, also the stages for the mountain towns. At one time, 1879, it boasted of the usual wayside saloon, a blacksmith shop and wagon shop, a butcher shop, schoolhouse, church and eight or nine dwellings. The railroad and automobiles were the cause of its decline, and there is now a grocery store, an old schoolhouse, church and two or three residences.

Thornton

This farming center formerly known as New Hope lies at the mouth of the Mokelumne River in the midst of some of the most fertile land in the county. The first settler was Arthur Thornton, who there located in 1855. He erected a two-story home, opened a store in which he and A. Bortland were partners. The town in 1880 boasted of a saloon, blacksmith, stable, postoffice, and several houses. When the Western Pacific Railroad passed through the town they established a station, erected a large freight depot, and changed the name to Thornton, in honor of its founder. May 12, 1880 the town was visited by one of the heaviest hail storms ever experienced in the county. In twenty minutes time the hail fell to the depth of three inches, destroying entirely the heavy fruit crops, and the lightning striking in several places destroyed telegraph poles and trees.

Navigation on the Mokelumne River

The Mokelumne River is a stream of water that runs swift and deep during the spring of the year, fed by the melting snow of the Sierras, but in the fall of the year it is almost dry, above Woodbridge. It is, however, navigable throughout the entire year for light draught steamers, for some ten miles above the point where it enters the San Joaquin River. During the flood of 1852 Woodbridge and the surrounding country was under water and a sailing vessel went as far up stream as Lockeford. In 1857, according to Thompson's history of San Joaquin, Stephen H. Davis of Stockton, sailed a sloop called the Mary Bowers up the Mokelumne River to its junction with the Consumnes River, at Mokelumne City. He there established a lumber yard and building three sloops they sailed up and down the river from San Francisco to Mokelumne City. George P. Taisen purchased one of the sloops in 1860 and he continued running the vessel, but the other schooners were taken off.

In the great flood of 1861-62 the entire country was under water and there was considerable suffering in the mountain camps because of the scarcity of food. Dr. D. J. Locke conceived the idea of chartering a steamer in San Francisco, loading it with provisions, sailing the vessel to Lockeford, and make the town a depot of supplies for the mining camp. Then Lockeford would rapidly grow as the head of navigation on the Mokelumne. Going to San Francisco he chartered a small steamer called the Fanny Ann, Captain Haggerty. The steamer was loaded with supplies and left San Francisco February 12, 1862, bound for Lockeford. Mr. Locke instructed the captain to spend two weeks time if necessary to reaching that point, as he considered it a very important business proposition, which it was, if successful. In the meantime J. H. Woods, the founder of Woodbridge, did not propose to have the rival town of Lockeford be declared the head of navigation, and he bribed the captain of the Fanny Ann to loaf on the job and cast anchor at Woodbridge. The steamer was eight days making that point and arriving February 20, the captain told Dr. Locke that he would take no chances of a shipwreck by snags in steaming to Lockeford. The goods were unloaded at Woodbridge and hauled to the mining camps by team. Woods had certainly put one over Dr. Locke, as the saying goes, and in the town there was great rejoicing. The citizens assembled in Masonic hall, speeches of congratulation were made and $200 was subscribed and Captain Haggerty offered 260 cords of wood if he would make a continuous trips to Woodbridge. He declined the offer.

First Steamer to Lockeford

Dr. Locke was most decidedly angry because of the duplicity of Captain Haggerty, but not in the least discouraged he concluded to try again, but under different conditions.

Again visiting San Francisco he purchased a small steamer called the Pert, on condition that she make the port of Lockeford. We do not know the time taken to make the trip, but the telegraph item went out over the state. "The steamer Pert, Captain Allen, successfully navigated the Mokelumne to Lockeford on April 2, 1862. The event was celebrated with great rejoicing as the deed is done." The little steamer had on board about thirty tons of freight and sixty passengers. A large crowd of farmers from all sections of the country were present to greet the first steamer at Lockeford. Not long after this event the Mokelumne Steam Navigation Company was formed with Dr. D. J. Locke, Edwin Foster, James Talmadge and George L. Locke as directors. They purchased the Pert, paying $4,000 for the steamer, and put her in command of Captain A. P. Bradbury. They also purchased two more steamers, the O. K. and the Mary Ellen, which ran on the river for a time, but the loss of the Pert by striking a snag, blasted all of their future hopes of making Lockeford an inland port.

Woodbridge

The first settlers at Woodbridge were the French Canadian trappers of the Hudson Bay Company, probably in the early '40s, and the first house was a log cabin built by them on the banks of the river. In 1850-51 the country in that vicinity was settled by J. P. and Roscoe S. Sargent, Jacob Brack, James Talmadge, George W. Emmerson, Mathew Webb, Elbert and Henry Chandeler. Alexander McQueen, John C. White, George W. Emmerson, J. P. Sargent in 1851 harvested a crop of barley where now stands Woodbridge. The next year August, 1852, Jeremiah H. Woods with his family located there and camped under a tree while the father erected a log cabin, in which to live. He and McQueen then purchased from the Sargent brothers the Woodbridge site and Woods, building a boat, established a ferry across the river. The place was known as Woods Ferry. Woods was one of the most enterprising men of that day, and he had in view a scheme to outshine Stockton by making Woodbridge the county seat of the new county, the head of navigation to San Francisco, and the main route of travel from Stockton to the capital city, Sacramento. He had a strong rival in Dr. Locke, but he had the advantage of Locke in location and a fertile soil surrounding the proposed town. The first thing was to get the travel, and in October, 1852, John J. Flood, E. H. Comstock and others petitioned the Court of Sessions to order a public road from Stockton by way of Woods Ferry to Davis bridge on Dry Creek. The order was made, J. H. Woods was appointed one of the commissioners to lay out the road, and in August, '53, it was declared a public highway. This road was known even as it is today as the Lower Sacramento road. The travel over the Upper Sacramento road crossed the Mokelumne River at Staples Ferry near Lockeford. This also was the stage road to the capital, but Woods, by making his place a stage station and giving the stage free ferrage, succeeded in getting the stage owners to route their travel by Woods Ferry. Another important thing, Woodbridge was made a post-office and that gave them daily communication with Stockton and Sacramento. In 1854, said Mrs. Laura de Force Gordon, he erected a hotel for the accommodation of teamsters and travelers. In 1858 at a cost of $1,000 he built a toll bridge across the river, which not only made it quicker and safer for travel, but brought him in nearly $10,000 the first year.

James B. Folger, John C. Thompson and H. D. Shinn located in the town in 1860, Dr. Horace Bentley in 1856, Wm. H. Devries in 1860, and Charles O. Ivory in 1867. These men married, erected homes and reared families that became socially quite prominent. The home erected by J. H. Woods is now the residence of Dr. A. E. Arthur and the Folger home is now occupied by C. L. Newton. Dr. Bentley said that when he arrived in Woodbridge there was but one store and one building, the Woods Hotel. He erected the first brick building in 1865. It was a two-story structure in which he opened a general merchandising store and with his family resided over the store. Bentley carried a stock of groceries, hardware and medicines, for he was not only a merchant but a practicing physician. He was also Wells Fargo express agent. John R. Rutledge erected a one-story brick in '68 and did a good merchandising business. Charles O. Ivory, a Stockton blacksmith, moved to Woodbridge in '67 and that made the third grocery store. John Levinsky came down from San Andreas and opened the fourth general merchandising store. The town grew like a mushroom from 1859 to 1870 and almost as quickly faded away. In December, '60, said a correspondent for the press, "Numerous buildings have been erected of a permanent character, families have settled amongst us and business has increased. Some of the improvements are MacIntosh's two-story wagon and blacksmith shop, with three forges; John Levinsky's fireproof building; J. M. Woods & Co., livery and feed stable; Graham & Perry, carpenter shop; Daniel Grist, drinks and fruit; Dan Kelley, boots and shoes; Neeley & Parr, saddletrees and harness; four saloons, and a hotel. The town in 1877 had reached its highest pinnacle and had already begun to recede, for many of its inhabitants had removed to Lodi, Stockton and other points. "At this time," said Mrs. de Force Gordon, "the town possessed a fine Odd Fellows' building, a Masonic hall, three dry goods stores, a blacksmith and butcher shop, shoe store, telegraph and express office, and a flour mill. There are two churches, Catholic and United Brethren, a public school with 115 pupils taught by two teachers, and a population of about 300 persons."

The town was platted in April, 1859, by the community and named Woodbridge as a compliment to J. H. Woods, the enterprising founder of the town. The first sale of lots was made by E. M. MacIntosh and W. Y. Smith for $500, and about the same time Henry Corsaw and John C. Thompson purchased lots, paying $400 for them. Mr. Woods and his wife gave no deeds for the sale of the lots as he had no title. It was Government land and it was not placed on sale until 1865. The citizens took no advantage of the sale and made no effort to obtain a title to their lots. Woods, we remember, was killed in 1864, and his property rights were in litigation. This neglect to preempt their land caused some curious complications. For instance in 1867 Thomas Day filed a claim on a tract of land. It included the burial place of the Masonic lodge, and they were compelled to purchase their graveyard from the preemptor of the land. In 1873 a man named A. S. Thomas preempted another piece of land containing the citizens' dead. Finally the town woke up and in March, 1873, "the citizens of Woodbridge filed their claims to what was left of the old township."

The Messenger of Woodbridge, its sole newspaper, had a short but merry life. It was first issued May 18, 1865, by Shekells & Spencer. J. C. Spencer had been publishing the Mountain News at San Andreas, but the mining camp was being deserted at that time because of the scarcity of gold, and Spencer removed the plant to Woodbridge. In less than eight weeks the partnership was dissolved and Spencer conducted the paper alone two years and then selling out to George Crist, went to Tuolumne City and started the Tuolumne News. Then for the third time he left a dying town and going to Modesto issued the Modesto News. Crist continued the Messenger for a couple of years, he was then compelled to suspend operations as the residents were all moving to Lodi.

The United Brethren in Christ held service in the Franklin and Mokelumne school houses as early as 1864. The services were conducted by the Rev. J. W. Harron and Elder Jackway. In 1878 they built a church at a cost of $2,700. The officers were R. Metcalf, chairman; J. A. Sollinger, secretary, H. J. Becker, R. W. Phillips, H. J. Keene and Thomas J. Pope. In September, 1878, the annual state conference was held at Woodbridge, and one of the important business events was the taking over of the Woodbridge Academy and conducting it as a religious institution. It was not a profitable business proposition and they soon retired, handing the building over to the Woodbridge school trustees for use as a grammar school.

The Presbyterians of the town held services in the Masonic hall as early as 1867, the Rev. Joshua Phelps conducting the services. In May, 1870, they organized a church society, with Andrew Rutledge and John and Andrew Rutledge, Jr., as the elders. In March, 1875, the Rev. Wm. H. Talmage located in Woodbridge and became the pastor.

The Methodist Church South erected a parsonage in Woodbridge and held services in the Woodbridge hall, with W. W. Winters as pastor.

The Catholic church of St. Ann was organized in 1876 by the Rev. Father O'Connor as a mission church of the Stockton parish. They had been celebrating mass in private houses since 1874, and purchasing the one-story brick building formerly the public school, they repaired and fitted it up as a church at a cost of $1,100. It was dedicated with great ceremony November 26, 1876, by Archbishop Alemany, assisted by the Rev. Father William O'Connor.

Woodbridge lodge No. 131, F. & A. M. was instituted May 10, 1850, with eight charter members. The first officers were: Charles Carpenter, worthy master; Wm. H. Young, senior warden; Thomas Henderson, junior warden; L. F. Neeley, tyler. These officers with D. P. McNeil, C. H. Over, John H. Woods and R. H. McCracken constituted the charter members. Their first hall was a two-story building opposite the Bentley store, located on the river bank. Later they erected a two-story brick building on the present Main Street. At one time the lodge had 135 members, now scarcely more than enough to fill the chairs.

Jefferson lodge No. 98, I. O. O. F., was instituted August 2, 1860, by Grand Master Charles O. Burton, with five charter members; Henry Hoerber was elected noble grand; Samuel H. Axtell, vice grand; Freeman Mills, recording secretary; James Taylor, treasurer; and William H. Smith. They held their meetings in the Masonic hall on the bank of the Mokelumne until 1874. At that time the John Levinsky grocery store was remodelled and a second story erected which the lodge occupied.

No recital of the high spots of Woodbridge's history would be complete without mentioning the San Joaquin and Sierra Nevada Railroad, a narrow-gauge line which was projected between tidewater at Brack's Landing on the Mokelumne to the mines and timber belt in the Sierras over the mountains if found practicable. The prime movers in the enterprise were the Birdsall brothers, Thomas McConnell, Ben F. Langford and Dr. H. Bentley, all prominent residents of the district. In August, 1882, the line was ready for business from Brack's Landing through Woodbridge and Lodi to Lockeford. It was completed as far as Valley Springs in April, 1885. This road, which cost over $400,000 to build, was subsequently absorbed by the Southern Pacific. In 1861, when the Central Pacific was organized, another line known as the Western Pacific came to life. This line had a franchise from San Jose to Sacramento by way of Stockton. Charles McLaughlin secured the contract to build this line for $5,400,000, but, after getting twenty miles out of San Jose, he failed, and the road was absorbed by the Central Pacific. A later survey took the railroad through Lodi instead of Woodbridge, and this little town, which was one of the mainstays of the county, gave up its metropolitan dreams.

The Woodbridge Academy

Woodbridge, because of its academy, was known as the "Athens" of San Joaquin county, and the academy later called the San Joaquin Valley College was a notable school of education because of the unusual large number of bright young men graduates in proportion to its enrollment. The school was founded in a very unusual manner. One day in the early 60's T. R. Burkett, then a meat dealer in the town said to C. L. Newton: "What can we do to make the town livelier," and jokingly we remarked, "We might build a high school." "That set us to thinking," said Mr. Burkett. "We concluded to make an effort to found a high school, and when Judge Thompson came into the butcher shop we requested him to draw up a subscription list in proper form for subscription to a high school fund. The judge wrote out a form on a piece of wrapping paper. I circulated the paper and got subscriptions to the amount of $5,000 but the Woodbridge people made fun of it. One day James P. Folger met us and inquired, 'How are you getting along with your high school?' Looking at the list of names he then said, 'I will cash it for ninety-five cents on the dollar, but you want $10,000 instead of $5,000. Give it to me and I will get the money.' In two weeks," said Mr. Burkett, "he had the money, and buying several acres of land we built the building and employed S. L. Morehead as teacher and principal on a five-year contract. His salary was to be a deed of the property at the end of the five years. Several complications took place, and the academy was not opened for several years, the building being unoccupied. In 1879 J. A. Sollinger, a public school teacher, and member of the United Brethren denomination, in their State conference at Woodbridge succeeded in getting them to take over the building and open a college. The trustees of the school, Dr. R. Bentley, E. G. Rutledge, John C. Thompson, Jacob Brack, and Victor Jahant, readily agreed to the United Brethren's terms and the school was established. The first president of the college was Darius A. Mobley, a minister. Later he was the principal of the Stockton high school. Two of his assistant teachers were Wm. H. Kleinfolder and E. H. Ridenour, who taught there for fifteen years and for several years has been an instructor in mathematics in the Stockton high school.

Among the first pupils are many of Stockton of today while other have played their part in life's drama and passed on. Some of S. L. Moorhead's pupils were Jennie Wiltze, Frank William, Fred and Belle Perrott, Wm. Trafton, Nathaniel Green, Avery C. White, Belle, William and Mattie Limbaugh, Edward and Alice Thompson, (now Mrs. Richard C. Minor), Fannie and Thomas Jahant, Nellie, Anna and Emma Emerson, Lottie Weber, Albert Smith, Charles Barton, Mattie and Gussie Folger (now Mrs. C. B. Hart), Laura Hart, Newton R. Fowler, Carrie Dutlin, Addie Green, Annie Newton, Frank Turner, Charles Adams, Minnie Hansen, Eddie Mitchell, Delmar Acker, George Spurgeon, Bennie and May Bentley, Loren Knight, Frank Woodruff and Edward Anderson. Among the later scholars are Avery C. White, who became a lawyer and district attorney, Edward Thompson, city attorney, Robert L. Beaslee, state assemblyman, A. L. Cowell, attorney and editor of the Stockton Mail, Mark Keppel, county superintendent Los Angeles county, and Marion DeVries, congressman and later appointed judge in the United States Court of Appeals. He resigned from all official positions a few months ago. The college closed in the spring of 1897 for lack of support, and the building was used as a grammar school. In December, 1922, the building was razed, and on the site of the historic grounds there arose a splendid $50,000 school building.

The first irrigation in this county was that conducted by Capt. Charles M. Weber in the early '60s in irrigating lands on the south side of the Calaveras River. In 1886 Byron Beckwith conceived the idea of irrigating the land south of the Mokelumne River, and having that object in view he filed a claim of 150,000 cubic inches of water to be taken from the Mokelumne River at or near Woodbridge and carried in ditches to about 100,000 acres of land in that district. In 1888 he enlisted Ben A. Laws in the project and a dam was constructed at Woodbridge and forty miles of canal planned. One branch ran to New Hope and the main branch, ten miles in length, ran towards the Calaveras River with that river as an outlet. In the fall of 1891 everything was complete and November 12 the day of the great celebration when the water for the first time would be turned into the canals. A barbecue preceded the opening of the head gates attended by over 3,000 people. At 11:30 the Stockton Board of Trade arrived, preceded by the Stockton band, and about 1 o'clock the entire party marched to the head gates. Byron Beckwith, the founder of irrigation in San Joaquin County, opened the gates and the waters rushed into the canals. The crowd later returned to the tent. Judge James Swinerton, the president of the day, then introduced the orator, William H. Mills, land agent of the Southern Pacific, who delivered a scholarly address.

Mokelumne City

Probably not one pioneer out of one hundred ever heard of Mokelumne City, and but few persons today could tell its location and yet when it was founded, near the junction of the Consumnes and Mokelumne Rivers, its prospects were bright as the second largest town in the county, for it had deep water communication with San Francisco all the year round, an advantage not possessed by any other town in the county except Stockton. Parties began moving there in 1850. In August of that year the town was surveyed and many lots sold to individual parties for homes and business purposes. During one week five schooners arrived, loaded with groceries, hardware and lumber. "Schooners were constantly arriving with goods," said a writer in the spring of 1860, "and the town is increasing in size wonderfully, and several brick and wooden buildings have been constructed." In August, 1861, the town, included twenty-three houses and a hotel, erected by George Keith at a cost of $5,000, with lots selling in price from $600 to $1,000 each. It was a town of just ten years of history, for all the inhabitants then moved to Lodi.

Linden

This little village, located in one of the prettiest sections of the county, amidst a forest of giant oaks, was first located in 1849 by a teamster named William T. Treblecock. He was hauling freight to the mountain camps and one day during the winter, while driving on the Mokelumne Hill road, he mired in the mud near the present town of Linden. Going on a prospecting search for high land he found it at the locality named. The elevation being high, he believed it a good location for a stage and teamsters' station; and that fall he built there a public house, known as the Fifteen Mile House, at that time being about that distance from Stockton. In time Treblecock sold the hotel to C. C. Rynerson, who had married Mary Wasley, a cousin of Mr. Treblecock.

Again the tavern was sold, together with considerable farming land, 1,500 acres to Samuel Forman. Forman took in as a partner to manage the hotel Alexander C. Bertzhoff, who years after became one of the proprietors of the Stockton Independent. A general merchandising store was established there in 1856 by Thomas McCarter. He sold out in '57 to John Wasley and Rynerson, he and his brother, James Wasley, having bought land on that vicinity in 1852. In 1860 the store was sold to Edward Case and J. S. Smith, who sold to Prater & Aull. In 1861 the town boasted of Masonic, Odd Fellows and Temperance lodges, a hotel, three stores, postoffice, blacksmith and wagon shop, schoolhouse, church and flour mill. In August, 1861, the town was surveyed by the county surveyor, George E. Drew, the block laid off together with six streets, the Mokelumne Hill road being the main street. The town was named Linden, a name suggested by John Wasley.

The first school in the district was on the Charles Hayden ranch and known as the Moore schoolhouse. In 1858 the Jefferson school district was formed and a school established in Linden. This building was destroyed by fire in 1864 and replaced by a much better school building, subsequently four other school buildings were erected, on the same site as the first house. Last year a handsome $20,000 brick building was erected and the contractor, John Lewis, was a former pupil in the school.

The citizenship of the Linden district has always been of a high standard, not only in politics but in temperance and morality. There was a reason, it was settled up by a high class of men and they would not tolerate any lawlessness in that community. There were never more than one or two saloons in Linden, and they were abolished as soon as it was lawfully possible. The first religious service in that section was held in the Moore schoolhouse in 1855 by the Rev. Thomas Barton, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South. The church was regularly organized at that time with the Rev. Ira Taylor as pastor. Two years later they erected a $2,000 house of worship.

The Methodist Episcopal Church, North, also had an organization at Linden with the Rev. H. L. Gregory as pastor, the church being dedicated July 7, 1864.

The Catholics had an organization and edifice in Linden. Erecting a new church in 1884 it was dedicated in September by the Archbishop Patrick Riordan, assisted by the parish priest, Father Cassin.

Valley lodge No. 135, F. & A. M., was instituted July 27, 1858, with the following officers: J. C. Pendegast, worthy master; J. C. Reid, senior warden; J. H. Cook, junior warden; M. M. Gardner, secretary; Thomas T. Wasley, treasurer; W. B. Stamper, senior deacou; J. S. Haines, junior deacon; William H. Russell, tyler, and the following additional charter members: J. H. Cook, J. E. Howland, Thomas T. Brook and J. W. Jarred.

The Odd Fellows lodge of Linden, Scio No. 102, was organized June 13, 1861, by Deputy District Grand Master Calvin C. Covell of Stockton. The following officers were elected and installed: John Wasley, noble grand; Thomas MacCarter, vice grand; Isaac Smith, secretary. The additional charter members included Charles W. Leach, Andrew Showers, C. W. Martin and Charles Oxtoby. All of these lodges met in the second story of the school building, but on the evening of February 11, 1865, while the Good Templar lodge was in session, the building caught fire from an overheated stove and was destroyed. The second story of the brick warehouse was then converted into lodge rooms and handsomely fitted up at a cost of $4,000. The Masons and Odd Fellows still occupy this hall. They have only a working membership, for the pioneers are dead and the majority of the young men have moved away.

The Linden Flour Mill

The Linden flour mill, conducted under three different names, has had numerous change of owners. It was built in 1854 by John Doak and N. Burroughs and in 1857 they sold out to Rynerson & Wasley. In 1865 the mill was destroyed by fire, and rebuilt, again went up in smoke in 1868. In 1871 the Linden Flour Mill Company was organized and they erected a brick mill costing them about $35,000. The mill turned out 120 barrels of flour a day, but competition made the running of the mill a losing game and it has been idle many years.

Escalon

Before the advent of the railroad, the traveler in riding over the French Camp road to the Stanislaus River would notice far out on the plains a large two-story brick house. It was surrounded by trees and shrubs, barns, granaries, and was the only house for miles around. It was the home of "Johnny" Jones, who crossed the plains in 1852 and pitched his tent where Escalon now stands, the country at that time being Government land covered with sage brush. He acquired the amount of land allotted to actual settlers and started to farm it, planting the first grain ever grown in the Escalon country, seeding it broadcast and dragging it in with brush. The yield was heavy and sold for five cents a pound. He began raising cattle for market and purchasing more land until he possessed a small kingdom, 8,000 acres, a tract of land over three miles square. It was no unusual sight to see from six to twelve-horse teams plowing over the field where Escalon now stands. In 1867 he built the brick house for his family residence at a cost of $12,000. The bricks used for it were made by his brother Richard, from a field east of Sexton station, on the Tidewater Railroad. In those days all freight carried from Stockton to the mines above Sonora went via the French Camp road, and many of the teamsters boarded and lodged at his farm. The plains were the homes of many antelope, which he often served on his table.

Escalon is a Spanish word meaning stepping stones. What relation it has to the town is difficult to imagine. James W. Jones, the founder of the town, is said to have seen the name in a book in the Stockton Free Library and pleasing him he gave the name to the place. His father died in 1893, leaving quite a fortune. He willed the old home place to James W., together with the adjoining 1,000 acres. The land at that time was not of any great value, but in the following year along came the Valley Railroad, recorded in another chapter, and the land began to increase in value. As soon as Mr. Jones was assured of the railroad crossing the land he engaged a surveyor and laid off the town. The boundary lines run nearly north, south, east and west, but the streets run diagonally, thus some blocks are square, others oblong, some are rectangular and several blocks are triangular in shape.

John McGinnis, in recording some of the first events in Escalon says, "In the month of August, 1894, I was accosted, in Stockton, by a promoter of the townsite, Mr. Harlon, and was prevailed upon to make the trip to Escalon. The four-horse stage was brought forward by the hostler and James Jones, popularly called 'Jim,' took the ribbons. Leaving there about 9:00 o'clock A. M., driving out the old French Camp Road, we arrived at the Jones home place, the brick house, about noon. With hospitality, an attribute of the Jones family, we sat down to a feast, fit for a king, and did full justice to it. We afterwards walked over and viewed the townsite, east of the then only graded roadbed. It was graded by a railroad company called the 'Valley Road.' We then passed through a thrifty vineyard, the very first vines to be propagated by Johnny Jones—'Jim's' father. We then passed the Jones' blacksmith shop just east, across the road from where the Tidewater depot is now located. I again visited Escalon in 1900. There was then a depot, a store had been built but had not opened for business, the pioneer saloon, and a temporary hotel on the Jackson property, also used as a dwelling and postoffice, Mrs. Jackson being postmistress."

As soon as the town was surveyed Mr. Jones built a good sized hotel to accommodate the prospective buyers who came by stage from Stockton, which was located about where the Presbyterian Church now stands. The first Santa Fe train rolled into Escalon in the spring of 1896. The postoffice and the first store were started by Mrs. Charles Jordan, wife of the station agent, on ground now occupied by the Tuolumne Lumber Company. The second store was built by Nelson Leighton, a large two-story building facing the railroad with a hall above used for social functions. Mr. Leighton installed in his store the first telephone switchboard in Escalon. The first warehouse was built by David L. Jones and John A. Coley in 1897, and another was built later by Haslacher & Kahn, of Oakdale. The first long distance telephone was installed in John Coley's residence; and he was the first real estate agent and grain dealer in the town, and built many of the dwellings for rent and sale.

The Escalon Commercial Club, formerly known as the Escalon Board of Trade, was organized March 11, 1911, with the following officers: A. St. John, president; C. H. Sheldon, vice-president; H. L. MacPherson, secretary; and R. N. Haines, treasurer. They carried out successfully a Fourth of July celebration in 1913, were active in the formation of the irrigation district, saw the Union high school erected, installed a lighting system; succeeded in getting the supervisors to lay some splendid streets, the town not being incorporated, and held a successful community fair in 1917. The following are the past officers of the club elected in June, 1912: H. L. MacPherson, president; S. J. Irvin, vice-president; O. A. Fish, secretary; and W. F. Searcy, treasurer; September 8, 1914, H. L. MacPherson, president; J. H. Martin, vice-president; E. W. Bidwell, secretary; A. Kerr, treasurer; October 16, 1916, H. L. MacPherson, president; E. W. Bidwell, vice-president; H. L. Morgensen, secretary; and Dr. J. M. Carr, treasurer; March 10, 1917, John R. Martin, president; S. R. King, vice-president; H. A. Bierschal, secretary; and C. Moorehead, treasurer.

The school was first opened near the celebrated lone tree as early as 1878. It was in session only six months of the year, with an enrollment of 31 boys and girls, with an average attendance of 15 pupils. After the founding of Escalon the school district was divided, and a new district school started in the new town. The trustees of the new district, two of them, W. A. Owens and J. A. Coley, succeeded in getting the people to bond the district for a small sum and the money was used in purchasing a lot about 1903 and erecting a two-room schoolhouse. The first teacher, Miss Stella Reynolds, had formerly taught the Lone Tree school, with splendid success. The school has had a steady and substantial growth during the past decade and in 1914 it was found necessary to provide larger accommodations for the pupils. The citizens cheerfully voted more bonds, the present grammar school grounds were purchased and a handsome building constructed of hollow tile. The number of scholars continued to increase and last year an additional four class rooms were built at a cost of $18,000. The entire building was then covered with mastic. One of the features of the additional rooms was an assembly hall seating about 400 persons which can be used as a public auditorium. Mrs. Grace Taylor Pearce has been principal for the past nine years and under her administration the school has been placed on the accredited list of the county.

It was not until 1916, says Prof. Oliver E. Irons, that the citizens realized the necessity of a high school. The Escalon Commercial Club took the matter in hand and carried on an active bonding campaign. Although they put in plenty of hard work the proposition was defeated by just three votes. In 1919 the club was more successful and at the bond election, May 16, the bonds for a high school carried by a large majority. Immediately a school board of five members were elected, namely, W. L. Cooms, C. A. Smith, H. L. Morgansen, Otto Peterson and H. H. McKinney, and they have held their offices elected time and again up to the present date.

The Jones club house was secured and school was started in September with Mr. F. W. Denny and Mrs. A. Cowan as instructors. Mrs. Cowan resigned in mid-year and her place was taken by Miss Orr. The total enrollment the first year was thirty-five. In the second year the enrollment of seventy-five pupils overtaxed the seating capacity of the club house and the citizens of the district voted a bond of $85,000 for suitable high school rooms. The building was completed early this year with the following teachers in charge: Oliver E. Irons, principal; Paul B. Boehnecke, Miss Nydia Jensen, Miss Minnie Smith, Miss Ruth Williams, and Miss Stella Barnett, under whose able instructions all classes are progressing rapidly.

The Methodist Church has the distinction and honor of being the first church in Escalon. All other churches now found in Escalon have branched out of this church, so declared the Rev. C. G. Zierk. The church was organized in the Lone Tree section in 1893, during the pastorate of the Rev. John Stevens, later for five years pastor of the Central Methodist church of Stockton. While the church was at Lone Tree Corners, it was on a circuit with Farmington, Atlanta, Riverbank and Oakdale.

It remained at Lone Tree Corners until September 1908, when the building was moved to Escalon. This building stood on the site of the present church until it was torn down to make room for the new structure, which was completed and dedicated on Sunday, April 10, 1921. Since it has become a separate charge the following pastors have been appointed here: U. L. Walker, L. H. Sanborn, Luther Speers, Smith, McWilliams, A. Z. Bose, S. L. Lee, G. W. Grannis, L. H. Jenkins and C. G. Zierk.

The Evangelical Lutheran Church was organized November 15, 1909, by the Rev. Philip Andreen of San Francisco, assisted by David Magunson of Stockton. Subscriptions were obtained in November, 1911 and a building was erected, just west of the old school house in 1913. It was dedicated in the summer of the following year, 1914. The following pastors have been in charge, the Rev. W. X. Magnuson, 1912, Dr. P. E. Berg, 1913; Rev. C. Anderson, 1916; Rev. N. P. Anseen, 1921; Rev. O. W. Westling, 1922.

The Presbyterian Church was organized November 10, 1913, with the following charter members: Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Campbell, Miss Margaret Campbell, Miss Helen Campbell, Mr. S. H. Irwin, Mrs. Minerva H. Erwin, Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Bidwell, Mrs. O. A. Fisk, Miss Leona Kelley, Miss Hazel Delley, Mr. and Mrs. E. A. Clough, Mrs. J. G. Voorhies. Of the original members, ten remain and are living in and around Escalon, three have moved away, and one is deceased. Services were first held in the Community hall, but in 1915 the trustees purchased the pioneer grammar school building and fitted it up for church purposes. The first pastor, Rev. E. B. Davidson, served until October 1, 1915, and during the succeeding two month the pulpit was occupied by the Rev. A. M. Wood, then the Rev. I. B. Surface was pastor until December 1, 1916. In March, 1917, the Rev. A. L. Bone took charge and installed the following year. He is the present pastor.

The Swedish Mission congregation have the prettiest little house of worship in Escalon. It was erected in 1921 through the hard work of the congregation and dedicated October 9 of that year. For many years they held services in the home of one of their members, J. W. Rydquist, with William Anderson as their leader. Most of the congregation and member are farmers and they come from a long distance to worship.

Several years ago a few people interested in Christian Science met in private homes to read the Lesson Sermons together. Some moved away and these meetings were discontinued. On February 1, 1919, new interest was added by Scientists who had moved in, and it was decided to hold regular Sunday services. These services were held in the Jones club house until it was leased to the high school, then the Community Hall was rented. Continual growth ensued and incorporation papers were filed with the Secretary of State on November 17, 1920. A Sunday school was organized in February, 1921. In December, 1921, an architect was engaged to draw up plans for a bungalow style of church. His plan was accepted and the Scientists now have a pretty little house of worship on the Jones tract, on the corner of the French Camp Road and the Boulevard.

The Catholics of Escalon have no local church building, but they attend mass in the Atlanta Church some four miles west of Escalon. Atlanta was founded soon after the Civil War and so named after the famous war song describing General Sherman's march "From Atlanta to the Sea." A number of Irish families had settled in that vicinity and occasionally Father Wm. B. O'Connor of St. Mary's Church would visit Atlanta and celebrate mass in the homes of the parishioners. In the spring of 1878 land for a church and cemetery was donated by John O'Malley, and a small church known as St. Patrick's was dedicated June 23, 1878, by Archbishop Alemany, who the same day dedicated the church at Modesto. Among the contributors to the church were: John O'Malley, Michael Carrol, Peter Vincet, Cornelius Lamasney, Patrick Brennan, Daniel Brennan, Thomas Brennan, Wm. March, Michael McCormack, Laurence Hearty, Dennis O'Neil, John Murphy, Henry Sharky, Vincent Brignolia, Michael Donnelly, Patrick Sexton, John Gannon, Esper Due and others. Atlanta was in the Stockton parish in charge of Father O'Connor, but in the early '80s it was transferred to the Modesto parish. Years later Father O'Connor had Atlanta again under his charge, and he was succeeded after his death by Father Wm. McGough. During his administration the old edifice was repainted and remodeled, and some handsome stained glass windows put in that had been in the St. Agnes chapel, Stockton. In 1918 the Atlanta church was transferred to the Manteca parish, which included the two places named and Lathrop. Father Marchisio is in charge, with headquarters at Manteca.

A little town like Escalon is fortunate in having a progressive paper like the Escalon Tribune, now owned and edited by Oscar H. Neil, who published an excellent historical edition of Escalon in December, 1921. The paper was started by F. S. Thornton in 1912; later his brother purchased a half interest and they conducted it until 1915. Then they sold the plant to S. L. Morgensen, who in turn sold it to Louis Mayers. He engaged Oscar

S. Neil as manager of the paper and in December, 1917, he took charge. The Tribune at this time was badly run down. Mr. Neil in giving the history of the paper frankly stated, "In September, 1918, the farmers bought the Tribune for us. In September, 1921, we became sole owner, proprietor, giving the farmers a chattel mortgage on the plant. In January, 1920, we installed a six-column quarto press that can be geared up to print 1,800 papers an hour. In June, 1920, we installed a 30-inch paper cutter and in September, the same year, a Mergenthaler linotype. The local circulation has doubled."

The Escalon Water Company is the result of a small body of men who formed and joined together for the purpose of supplying the town with water. The company sold stock at ten dollars per share and none could obtain the water unless they were shareholders. Later the shares were bought up by capitalists and the company incorporated under the name of the Escalon Water and Light Company. They installed an electric motor, ran water pipes through the main portion of the town and erected a high steel tank. In 1919 they installed a new motor of twenty-five horsepower with an automatic switch, the pump delivering 350 gallons a minute.

The town has an excellent body of about thirty volunteer firemen, organized in 1913, but a very poor apparatus for extinguishing fires. In December, 1920, the volunteers were reorganized and at that time they elected Frank Sieglekoff chief and Barney Berlinken and Harry Carlson, first and second engineers. Perl Waltz was elected captain of the hose company and George Nelson captain of the chemical tank. The fire alarm for many years was bell set on a tower in Escalon park. Recently they made a big improvement by installing a siren, operated automatically by an electric motor.

The Escalon Women's Improvement Club was organized in November, 1911, in the Athletic club house now called the Community hall. At that time about sixty women assembled and organized under the name suggested. They held their meetings in the Woodmen, Leighton and other halls until January, 1915, when Miss Alice Jones deeded them the old two-story brick home together with two and a half acres of land surrounding it. Several hundred dollars were expended in fitting up the place and they now have fine headquarters. Their first work was in the building of an engine house on the corner of a lot owned by Mrs. Martha Pickens. In 1914, by permission of the Santa Fe Railroad, they filled up the unsightly hole on their property near the depot, and planting trees and rose bushes made a pretty park. They were among the first to suggest the building of good roads and every year they inaugurated a clean-up day. They saw that the child labor laws were enforced and installed public drinking fountains, and after the town became dry pressure was brought to bear for the removal of the large liquor signs that had long disgraced the town.

Gustafson-Thompson Post, American Legion, was organized April 27, 1921, with thirty-two charter members. Over sixty ex-service men were present from Ripon, Modesto, Lodi and Stockton. The following are the charter members: Frank Swass, Dayton C. Flagg, B. Berlingen, F. P. Feliz, H. N. Daubenbis, H. M. Carlson, O. H. Bergen, J. T. Boone, Z. W. Ridley, S. E. Bixler, Louis Betti, Charles Schneider, Alfred W. Adams, Galen L. Albertson, Roy B. Light, Jacob L. Monk, Grover Mahon, John M. McLean, Henry Dughi, Ray Drew, Ernest Kiffe, Claude V. Biggs, John Westgate, Gunner Wiotti, Lloyd Liesy, Edgar Littlefield, Otis C. Powell, R. J. Harder, Otis Lease, C. E. Burnett, Hugh S. Litzenberg and Delmar Von Glahn.

Ellis

Somewhere in this history I state that railroads can build up or ruin a town. Ellis, which gave Tracy its initial growth, is an illustration. Today you can scarcely see where stood the town, but it is a part of country history and briefly we will notice it. Ellis received its beginning from a place called Wickland. It was a small settlement founded in 1861 on Old River, and was the point where vessels came to load with coal, and the inhabitants of Wickland believing that Ellis would soon be a prosperous town moved to that point. The town grew quite rapidly and in November, 1870, it contained some forty-five or fifty buildings of all descriptions, including two hotels, a store, blacksmith shop, warehouse, saloon and livery stable, but ten years later it was practically deserted.

Tracy

Along about 1878 the Southern Pacific Railroad built a branch road to San Francisco, by the way of Martinez, and extended the road along the West Side of Fresno, making a junction at Tracy. They made this a terminal railroad point and the "laying off" place of hundreds of their employees. This gave the town a permanent foundation, and nearly all of the inhabitants of Ellis moved their business houses and homes to Tracy. Among the first hotels were the Tracy Hotel, conducted by Edward Waschuth, the Castle Hotel moved up from Ellis and the San Joaquin Hotel, managed by Charles Ludwig. The town began to build up slowly, but sure, and in 1888 Front Street was almost solidly lined with business houses for nearly a half mile. A fire swept through June 19 of that year and destroyed entirely the business part of the city. Starting in Mrs. Mary Mannis' restaurant near the corner of North D and Front streets, it destroyed four buildings belonging to Mrs. Anna Fairchild, the Mann restaurant, Mrs. Kepler's vegetable stand, D. Silverstein, dry goods, Edward Curran, Commercial Hotel, Peter Kalni, saloon, C. A. D. Burschke, four stores, Lydia Cox, millinery, C. A. Deglisy, grocery store, and postoffice, Charles A. Slack, Arlington hotel, Fabian & Co., general merchandise, Henry Ludwig, saloon, Odd Fellows' building, Henry Statemeon, saloon, Grant Wilson, dry goods, Dr. J. L. Murrell's office, F. O. Housken's office and law library, Cunale Bros., general store, Mrs. Maurice Byrne's bakery, Ernest Gieseke, livery stable.

The buildings were all of wooden construction except the Odd Fellows' three-story brick. It was believed that this building would check the fire but the wind was so strong it carried the flames over and around the building and it was soon on fire in the upper stories. The Odd Fellows were among the heaviest losers as they lost all of their paraphernalia and furniture entailing a loss of over $15,000.

In 1910 the city was surveyed and laid off by City Engineer Robb and the plan was approved July 22 by the trustees. The town covered considerable ground, 6,600 feet north and south, and 4,500 feet, east and west. It was incorporated in 1910 as a city of the sixth class with a population of 2,000. The first city election took place in April and the following officers were elected: Abe Grunauer, mayor; Dave R. Payne, Wm. Schmidt, Charles Canole and James Lamb, trustees. In the second election, April 8, 1912, the women voted for the first time and the entire set of officers were re-elected. The officers elected in 1914 were: D. R. Payne, Nelson S. Dwelly, W. G. Lang, Thomas Garner, Fred Penny, O. E. Lee and W. J. McArdle, trustees; J. D. Van Ormer, treasurer; and Ben R. Clark, who later resigning, Geo. Frerichs was appointed clerk. The present officers are Nelson S. Dwelly, D. R. Payne, W. G. Lang, Thomas Garner, and Sullivan, trustees; Geo. L. Frerichs, clerk; and J. H. Canale, treasurer. The city hall, a very pretty two-story brick, was erected in 1917 at a cost of $15,000. In the rear of the city hall is housed the fire apparatus, a $6,000 La France chemical and motor pump, together with a large steam engine purchased from the San Francisco fire department for $150. It is held as a reserved engine and will play five heavy streams of water. They have a volunteer department, a fire alarm system and a siren run by motor power.

In 1868 a few of the families of Ellis met one day, says Thomas Garner, and organized the Willows district school, and by subscriptions built a small schoolhouse. In 1878 the school had an enrollment of thirty-six scholars. At that time the exodus from Ellis to Tracy took place and the inhabitants in moving took the schoolhouse with them. It was moved to a lot then owned by Dr. Luce. Sometime later the Pacific Improvement Company deeded the school trustees two lots for school purposes. The school was moved to those lots and in time an additional room was built. Still the cry was more room and it became necessary to rent outside rooms. In 1910 the trustees decided to call for bonds for an up-to-date building to cost in the neighborhood of $35,000. The bonds were voted by the citizens at a special bond election and carried by a big majority. On October 27, 1911, the cornerstone was laid by the Odd Fellows under the auspices of Summer Lodge No. 177.

The Tracy Carnival

The three days carnival in October, 1910, was only one of the many joyful events of the progressive city. The citizens had voted Vesta Ludwig as queen of the carnival, and she appointed Ruth Groinmett, Ella Miller and Lila Hart as her maids of honor. On arrival at the throne the Queen was welcomed to the city by the Rev. W. L. Fredrich and after the coronation C. G. Goodwin as chairman of the executive committee presented the Queen and her attendants purses of money as the gifts of the people. Mayor Abe Grunauer then tendered her the keys of the city and she then read her proclamation to the people bidding them have a good time during her reign as Queen, the fun ending Saturday with a masquerade ball.

The Presbyterians were the first religious denomination in Tracy, dating back to 1878, when the worshippers assembled in the homes of their members. In the fall of 1886 they erected a small wooden edifice at a cost of $2,000, and it was used as a union church for several years. Last year they erected a neat little brick edifice, the brick being obtained from the old brick pottery at Carnegie. The members and other persons assisted in the good work, and the building was erected at no great cost. The Methodists, either the German or English, held services in that district long before the founding of Tracy. After the Presbyterians erected their edifice of wood, the German and English Methodists united and held religious services in the Presbyterian Church.

The Catholics also had their services. Father O'Connor of St. Mary's parish visited Tracy once a month, and mass was celebrated in the railroad section house. In 1888 James Egan, Dennis Looney and Edward Kern, interesting themselves in the erection of a church, obtained subscriptions for that purpose and purchasing a lot a pretty little building was erected. St. Bernard's Church was erected on the site of the old building in 1911, Father Moran being in charge of the parish.

The Lutherans were holding services in Tracy twenty-two years ago, Rev. Koenig from San Francisco visiting the town monthly. They erected a small edifice, which was much too small for their use in 1921. In that year they erected a concrete house of worship at a total cost of $7,600, the building costing $6,000. It was dedicated in March, 1922, by the Rev. George C. Jacobson of Stockton, who was the pastor from 1908 to 1918.

A building of which the Tracyites may well be proud is their Union high school, erected in 1917. A union high school district was formed, namely, the Tracy, Carnegie, Naglee, Jefferson and Lammersville districts and cheerfully voted bonds of $100,000 for a high school. The building, the fourth of its kind in the county, is located on a twelve-acre tract east of the town and faces the State Highway. Built in the mission style of architecture it contains eighteen classrooms together with a large auditorium seating nearly 1,000 people and a meeting place for the Farm Bureau and any public and civic event. It was dedicated May 1, 1917, Dr. J. S. West, "the father of the West Side high school," receiving much praise for his untiring efforts for a broader and higher education. After a parade all marched to the new building and entered the auditorium. The president of the board of trustees, William Schlossman, as chairman of the meeting, called upon the Odd Fellows to dedicate the building. After the performance of the beautiful ceremony, Grand Master Clinton H. McCormick delivered an address appropriate to the occasion. On December 7, 1922, there was another interesting educational event, the dedication of Tracy's second fine grammar school building. Located in the western part of town, it is of brick construction finished in stucco and occupies an acre and a half of ground. It is designed in the unit system with a handsome assembly hall, class room, gymnasium and all other rooms in the latest improvement.

Sumner lodge No. 177, I. O. O. F. was instituted in Ellis September, 1870, by Grand Master C. W. Dannals, assisted by Past Grands Dean Woolf and Levinsky. It was instituted with five charter members, each one elected to office except John C. Bonney. The first officers were: H. L. Atherton, noble grand; Martin Lammers, vice grand; E. Wacksmuth, secretary, and E. B. Stiles, treasurer. That evening they initiated Phillip Fabian, R. A. Murphy, Jr., Olaf Nelson, William S. Law, and Charles Herring. September 1, 1921, they celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of the lodge with a street parade, some seventy members in line, led by the Tracy band, followed by a program in their hall.

Few Odd Fellows have had the trials of Sumner lodge, their building destroyed by fire not once but twice, in 1875, and in the big fire of 1898. Their first home in Ellis was in a small wooden structure owned by Herring, the lodge renting the second story. This building was burned in 1875. The lodge then erected a two-story building and moved it to Tracy in 1878. The lodge increased in membership and wealth, and in 1896 they erected on Front Street a handsome three-story brick, one of the prettiest buildings in the county. In the fire of '98 their building was completely gutted with a loss of $15,000 and only $7,500 insurance. As they had not paid in full for the building it was a severe loss, but with undaunted hearts they resolved to rebuild, and in time erected the present handsome structure. It was mortgaged in part to John Garwood of Stockton, but as soon as the crops of 1900 were harvested, Martin Lammers took over the mortgage, which was cancelled April 30, 1921, when the lodge celebrated the 102nd anniversary of American Odd Fellowship, the mortgage being burned with great ceremony.

The name of Samaria Rebekah lodge No. 193, was one of several names suggested by Past Grand Rudolph Gnekow, a very active Stockton Odd Fellow. While attending the installation of the officers of Sumner lodge in January, 1891, he observed that quite a number of the women of Tracy were the wives and daughters of the Odd Fellows. He suggested that they institute a Rebekah lodge in the county. It was instituted April 29, 1891, by Deputy District Grand Master George Schuler, assisted by Hoyle Greenwood as grand marshal and S. M. Spurrier, grand secretary. The following officers were elected and installed: Mrs. Mary Castle, noble grand; Ella McNeil, vice grand; Caroline J. Buschke, recording secretary; James C. Allen, financial secretary, and James Martin, treasurer. The officers were installed by District Deputy Grand President Mrs. Marion Greenwood, assisted by Etta Tinkham as grand marshal, both from Lebanon lodge, Stockton.

Tracy Parlor No. 1866, N. S. G. W., was instituted on Thursday evening, September 29, 1922, with the following officers: George L. Frerichs, past president; James E. Shields, president; Henry Brink, recording secretary; W. M. Lewis, financial secretary; W. S. Peck, treasurer; John Fredericks, marshal. A banquet was given at the San Joaquin Hotel, after the installation. Among the toasts offered as "Our State," W. B. Nutter, of Stockton, "Tracy Parlor, No. 186," J. E. Shields of Tracy; "Stockton Parlor," E. M. Bransford of Stockton; "How a Successful Parlor Should Be Conducted," Ewald M. Grunsky; "The Ladies," George Housken of Stockton.

West Side Lodge No. 118, K. P., was instituted March 10, 1885, with about twenty-five members. The first officers elected and installed were Martin Loomis, past chief chancellor; Charles Ludwig, chancellor; J. S. Moulton, vice-chancellor; Wm. Schult, prelate; Wm. Pruser, treasurer; J. S. Moulton.

The West Side Irrigation District began operations in 1918. The total cost of construction was $495,000. It has a bonded indebtedness of $42.26 an acre. Its source of supply is Old River, really the San Joaquin. The intake canal is 550 feet in length, 25 feet wide on the bottom and carries a depth of 6 feet at low tide. The upper canal pumps, four in number each throws 10,000 gallons an hour, with a combined capacity of approximately 125-acre feet every 24 hours. This canal is seven miles long, 10 feet wide on the bottom and has 14.41 miles of laterals. At the lower canal are three more huge pumps with a capacity of 96 acre feet every 24 hours. This canal is nine miles long, with a six-foot bottom and has 10.71 miles of laterals. The water from these canals will irrigate over 30,000 acres of land in what is known as the West Side, Naglee, Burk and the Banta Carbona districts. To celebrate the event the Tracy Chamber of Commerce sent out invitations to all the country round about and to the leading irrigationists of the state. It was a great May 22, 1921, and after the visitors had been taken over the thirty-five miles drive in viewing the canals they assembled at the high school building, where the following program was given: Selection by high school orchestra; address of welcome, Assemblyman B. S. Crittenden; address, A. L. Cowell of Stockton; selection, high school orchestra; address, R. T. Evans, treasurer Federal Land Bank of California; address, Dr. Elwood Meade, chairman land settlement board of California; selection, high school orchestra; address, C. E. West, appraiser Federal Land Bank; address, Frank Adams, irrigation manager of Department of Agriculture.

CHAPTER XXIV

LODI, THE TOKAY CITY

TWELVE miles north of Stockton lies Lodi, the Queen City of the San Joaquin Valley. It excels all other cities not so much in the number of its population, about 7,000, nor in its area, about one mile square; but it excels in its progress, government, civil pride, splendid churches and schools, handsome residences and social qualities. It owns its own lighting and water plant, sixteen miles of fine asphalt streets, sewerage system, handsome little theater, and fine hotel. And during the past year it has expended over $1,638,000 in municipal improvements, public service utilities, business houses and private dwellings.

Soon after the Civil War J. C. Layman arrived overland and obtained from a man named Spencer his claim to 160 acres of land where now stands Lodi. He got the land for a span of horses. The land was so thickly covered with brush in many places that it was almost impossible to force one's way through. He bought several acres from R. L. Wardrobe, whose land was adjoining Layman's on the east side, at $2.50 an acre. He then owned some 240 acres of land on what is now north of Lodi Avenue and west of the Central Pacific Railroad. Layman with his family lived in a rudely constructed house on what is now

West Walnut Street between Sacramento and School Streets. In 1867 he sold the entire tract to R. L. Wardrobe and Allen C. Ayers for $6.50 an acre and moved to Merced.

When the engineers of the Central Pacific Railroad Company started to find the best and cheapest route from Sacramento to Stockton they made three preliminary surveys over northern San Joaquin County. One of these surveys was through Woodbridge straight into El Dorado Street, Stockton, a second survey about a mile east of Woodbridge, and a third survey over the route where now lies Lodi. Woodbridge was their choice of routes, but it is said the owners of the land refused to give them the right-of-way and asked for damages far in excess of the value of the land. Others say that the engineers were advised to locate their track farther east on the high land, as the Woodbridge route was frequently flooded from the high waters of the Mokelumne River. Woodbridge was a thriving town with a farming community surrounding it, and on tidewater with river communication to the ocean, while the Lodi section appeared to be a waste of sand, forest, trees, sage brush and jackrabbits.

After the survey had been made through Lodi, A. T. Ayers, John U. Magley, R. L. Wardrobe and E. Lawrence petitioned the railroad company to locate a station on their land. As a bonus the three owners first named agreed if a station was there built and a town laid off to give the railroad every odd lot in the proposed town and a railroad reservation of twelve acres in the center of the town. Although the land at that time was of no great value, worth only the Government price $2.50 an acre, it was a good proposition and the company quickly accepted it. The survey was made in the spring of 1869, by the company's surveyor, Isaac C. Smith. He laid off the new town about one-half mile square, true to the points of the compass. It was a tract of 166 acres and included twenty-four acres of Magley's land, twenty-five acres of the Ayres tract and fifty-five acres of the Wardrobe property. A railroad reservation unfortunately was plotted in the center of the town. And now it is a great detriment to the city and getting worse every year. The streets were named running from east to west, Cherokee, Stockton, Main, Sacramento, School, and Church; from the north to south, Locust, Elm, Pine, Oak, and Walnut. Cherokee Lane, now the State Highway, was the eastern boundary of the town. The town plat from which this record is taken was filed in the county clerk's office August 25, 1869, by Dr. E. S. Holden of Stockton. The town was named Mokelumne City, but as it caused a confusion with Mokelumne station and Mokelumne Hill the citizens petitioned the legislature and in 1874 the name was changed to Lodi. Why the four-lettered name of Lodi? Nobody knows. Some say, among them George E. Lawrence, that the name was suggested "by the historic event of Napoleon at the Bridge of Lodi." Others say that in jest, it was named Lodi because of a famous four mile running stallion by that name stabled in the town. Lodi at that time being known as "the sporting center."

Pioneer Building

The first building was the house erected by J. U. Magley in 1868 on the corner of what is now Pine and School Streets. After the laying off of the town the first building was a dwelling erected in August, 1869, by I. N. Stretch on the corner of Pine and Sacramento Streets. He also built a store for J. M. Burt & Ivory, who had come up from Woodbridge. The next building in the town was the famous Hooker House, so named after General Hooker, a famous Civil War general. The house was built for a hotel at Lancha Plana. Later it was removed to Campo Seco. In 1869 "Uncle Dan" Crist bought it intending to remove it to Dover on the San Joaquin River. It was moved to Lockeford, loaded on the steamer Pert, which sailed to Woodbridge. Then the future Lodi was founded and Crist then moved the old-timer to the new town. A postoffice was established and Crist was the first appointed postmaster. In the spring of that year, 1869, J. R. Allison built a stable and he and W. Jacobs established a stage line from Mokelumne City to Mokelumne Hill, the line making connections with the railroad. About the same time Thompson & Folger, from Woodbridge, opened a butcher shop, and Byron D. Beckwith opened a drug store. In September, 1870, John E. Spencer and John Flanigan built the Spencer House and it was opened in February, 1871, by Edward Olwell and J. A. Barry. The following year Spencer himself became the proprietor. In October, 1870, a correspondent wrote: "Our town is growing quite rapidly. Last spring we boasted of having eighteen houses, now we have fifty-six. Rev. Dr. Bryant is preparing to erect a church. R. Lefler & Co. are putting up a large hotel fronting 128 feet on two streets. W. B. Arnold has erected a substantial brick building. Charles O. Ivory of Stockton is putting up a two-story building for his bride, and R. C. Bosworth, James Ellison, C. M. Boalt, Isaac N. Stretch and Samuel Gray are erecting new homes. Woodbridge is contributing quite liberally towards building up the town, moving their houses to the railroad city. Liberty is sending her citizens, so also is Galt. George Crist, formerly the Woodbridge postmaster, is making improvements in his hotel, and has a big run of custom. Peck & Company are running a daily line of stages to Mokelumne Hill, and strangers are here looking for investments." Ten years later another writer declared, "Lodi owes its existence to the caprice of the railroad magnates. Had the railroad been built through Woodbridge, as at first mapped out, the site of Lodi would today have been a stubblefield. The population is about 800, and the various trades are well represented. Cluff & Smith are dealers in agricultural implements; J. E. Spencer has the only hotel, W. J. Rixon, restaurant and bakery; Ellison & Bunke, livery stable; Mrs. Herrington, millinery; Byron D. Beckwith, postoffice; Ralph Ellis, Lodi flour mill; A. Levinsky, dry goods; Ivory & Greene, general merchandise, and Dr. Williamson is the leading physician."

The Big Fire of 1887

One of the most disastrous fires of Lodi was that of October 11, 1887. It broke out on the roof of the Novelty planing mill and within an hour the principal business blocks bounded by Sacramento, Pine, School and Elm Streets were a smoldering mass of ashes. The only buildings left were the Grangers two-story brick and two dwellings in the northern corner of the block. The fire was first seen by the engineer of the mill, Len Williams, as he came from dinner. He instantly gave the alarm and the whistle of the Lodi flour mill was blown. There was no fire department nor fire apparatus, and the citizens' efforts to check the progress of the flames with buckets of water was a hopeless task. The loss was estimated at $70,000 and among the losers were Martin & Rolland, planing mill; Mrs. A. Prieter, blacksmith shop; C. A. Rich, dwelling; G. W. Hill, jewelry store; J. J. Collins, hardware; H. Marker, saloon; A. C. Chalmers, restaurant; W. D. Smith & Son, butchers; Dougherty & Duffy's saloon; George F. Cluff, real estate; Hanson & Co., druggists; Lee & Juline, saloon; Thompson & Flogers, butchers; Richard Cope, harness and saddle shop; A. J. Larson, restaurant, and John Mundell, butcher.

The Lodi Hall Association

The Grangers general merchandising store was erected in 1876 by the Lodi Hall Association at a cost of $9,750, the contract being let September 2, 1876, to Matthew McCarty, the Stockton contractor of St. Agnes' Academy. The association was incorporated April 8, 1876, with a capital stock of $20,000, with shares at $25 per share. The directors were Byron D. Beckwith, Amos W. Gove, John Hutchings, Henry Witte, C. C. Stoddard, N. S. Misener and B. F. Langford. The building is the two-story brick now on the corner of Sacramento and Elm streets, and the men who built were the forerunners of the enterprising citizens of Lodi of today. Not satisfied with erecting a fine building for that day they made further improvements in October, '76, by laying a twelve-foot asphalt sidewalk around the entire building.

Lodi Lodge, I. O. O. F.

The fire was a great loss to the Odd Fellows, as they had just gone into the hall the previous year. Lodi lodge No. 259 was organized May 22, 1877, with fifteen charter members. The first officers were: John Rutan, noble grand; Henry Witte, vice grand; Thomas Russell, recording secretary; Allen T. Ayers, financial secretary, and Ezekiel Lawrence, treasurer. The additional charter members were: Past Grands C. V. Williamson, Morgan Crawford, Howard M. Craig, Samuel Ferdun, Reuben Pixley and John Hutchins. Where the lodge was organized or their place of meeting I know not. Probably in the same place they meet today, the hall being dedicated June 16, 1886. The hall was dedicated by Grand Master C. T. Eachran, assisted by brothers from the Stockton lodges. The ceremony was followed by a splendid program of musical and literary exercises. Then followed a fine supper at the Sargent House given by the Daughters of Rebekah, and the receipts of the supper went towards fitting up the new hall.

Flora Rebekah Lodge No. 162

This lodge, with a splendid membership of 154, including fifty-one Odd Fellows, was instituted October 21, 1890. The first officers were Mrs. E. Hunting, noble grand; Mrs. W. B. White, vice grand; Mrs. John Hunting, chaplain; Mrs. W. C. Green, secretary; Mrs. Reuben Pixley, treasurer; Mrs. H. Witte, conductor; Reuben Pixley, inside guard; Henry Witte, right support noble grand; Mrs. Samuel Ferdun, left support noble grand; Mrs. B. Jory, right support vice grand; Mrs. George Hogan, left support vice grand. A few weeks after the instituting of the lodge the staff of Lebanon went to Lodi and conferred the beautiful Rebekah degree on twenty-one candidates. The team was composed of May Neumiller, Mrs. R. Roebelin, Mrs. Hoyle Greenwood, Alice Kafitz, Ida Confer, Amanda Grider, Mrs. C. H. Keagle, Mrs. Sol Confer, Agnes Steiny, George Hornage, Allie Fyfe, Mamie Oldham, Mrs. Harry Hornage, May Woodhull, Grace Farrington, Emma Waters and Jennie Fyfe.

Knights of Pythias

Lodi lodge No. 41, Knights of Pythias is the outgrowth of Pythagoras lodge No. 41, instituted February 18, 1877, by Charles S. Eichelberger, past grand chancellor, assisted by members from the Stockton Knights. The lodge was instituted with a charter membership of fourteen Knights. The following officers were elected and installed: Henry Witte, past chancellor; E. B. Sherman, chancellor commander; H. C. Gillingham, vice chancellor; H. M. Craig, prelate; John Rutan, keeper of records and seals; Frank Davis, master of finance; M. Bruml, master of exchequer; George Kirkland, master at arms; E. W. S. Woods, inside guardian; W. D. Smith, outside guardian. In the spring of 1883 a new lodge was organized by the former members of Pythagoras lodge. The new lodge was hailed as Salem lodge No. 105. The two lodges were united in January, 1887, under the present name Lodi No. 41. Since 1901 the Knights have met in the Odd Fellows hall.

Chosen Friends

At one time, 1882, the Chosen Friends was a popular organization and a council of the order was instituted in Lodi, December 8, with twenty-five members. The following were the elected officers: P. C. C., W. R. Ellis; C. C., J. A. Wilson; O. C., Henry Kinard; prelate, T. A. Wilson; secretary, C. J. Waldren; treasurer, E. R. Pease; W. M., F. N. Copeland; sentinel, S. H. Turndell; medical examiner, Dr. E. A. Burchard.

The 4th of July, 1885

Lodi has always been famed for its celebrations, and their first celebration of America's Natal day is a well-remembered event. Her enterprise in having a free barbecue as the chief feature of the celebration resulted in crowding the town with visitors. Senator B. F. Langford was president of the day, and A. J. Larson, grand marshal. About 10 o'clock in the morning a procession, including a majority of the visitors, was formed at the corner of Sacramento and Elm streets and the march was taken up to Lodi park. The Lodi silver cornet band and the Lodi glee club furnished excellent music. Senator Langford made a short speech of welcome and F. B. Mills read the Declaration of Independence, Charles Ferdun gave a declamation, and Joel A. Snell supplied the original poetry. The opening prayer was delivered by Rev. W. R. Gober, and the benediction was pronounced by Rev. Dr. N. W. Lane. The oration was delivered by Judge Van R. Patterson, who did himself and Stockton credit. Foot races, base ball, other games and dancing supplied all the enjoyment that was needed after the general attack on the roasted ox, until 4 o'clock, when the horrible organization of Calthumpians paraded and then indulged in literary exercises.

Hartford Post, G. A. R.

The Grand Army of the Republic is fast being mowed down by the scythe of Old Father Time, and in a few more years their record will be complete. In 1890 there were quite a number of the old guard living in Lodi, and on a Saturday evening, May 12, 1890, thirty-three of them assembled and organized a Grand Army Post. They selected the name of Admiral Farragut's famous flagship Hartford as the name of their post. The following officers were elected: T. F. Tracy, captain; John Archer, post commander; Reuben Pixley, senior vice-commander; J. W. Horton, junior vice-commander; B. M. Vichey, adjutant; Eli Dayton, quartermaster; J. J. Robinson, surgeon; Lemon Williams, chaplain; A. A. McClelland, officer of the day. They were mustered in a few days later by Judge Buckley, the newly elected commander.

The Moquelemos Grant Celebration

Probably the most heart-felt celebration ever held in Lodi was that of May 19, 1876, when the settlers in that section celebrated their victory over the Central Pacific Railroad which claimed a large section of their lands. The contest between the settlers and the railroad was in the courts for many years and finally reaching the Supreme Court of the United States, May 8, 1876, the following joyful news was received by Henry S. Sargent of Stockton by telegraph from Congressman Horace F. Page: "Case of Newhall versus Sanger decided for the settlers, sustained in every point." The settlers were so happy over the fact that they would not be dispossessed of their homes that they resolved to celebrate the event with a big barbecue, a monster parade, an oration, games, baseball, and other amusements. Stockton had been invited and an excursion train of twenty-two cars attended the celebration. The crowd of over 2,000 citizens, including the Stockton Guards and firemen both in full uniform, the Knights of Pythias and the San Joaquin band. There was a short parade, an oration by Joseph H. Budd and then the barbecue, in the Lodi park. An immense crowd for that day were in attendance, from 10,000 to 15,000 people from all parts of the county.

The Salem District School

James A. Sollinger, then county superintendent, said in an address in 1883, that at first the school districts were designated by numbers and the children few in number and the school houses far apart. The section around Lodi was known as school district No. 2. The school commissioners were J. H. Woods, D. J. McNeil and Otis Newton. The district included both sides of the Mokelumne River. In 1858 the districts were given names and the Lodi district was known as Henderson, named after Thomas J. Henderson, the first school census marshal. In 1859 the district was divided and that portion south of the river was known as Salem district. In that year the county superintendent, L. C. Van Allen, appointed John Coldwell and George D. Compton as the school trustees of the new district. The first teacher of the school was J. P. Carleton, later a teacher in the Stockton schools. He was succeeded by Hamilton Wermouth, in the spring of 1860. The teacher first named was paid his salary from a subscription fund donated by the farmers. Wermouth was paid from the state and county fund, it amounting to the magnificent sum of $86.85. There was not a dollar in the Salem school fund, and when the trustees gave the teacher the order for his salary, they "fired him" and refused to permit him to continue teaching. Wermouth was determined to continue his school work. Going to a Mr. Willhelm near the ferry he rented the second story of his home and continued his school teaching. The third teacher was a pedagogue who liked his toddy. He would try to conduct his school while under the influence of liquor and one day a trustee gave him a severe caning, and he was discharged. The fourth teacher, Mr. Foster, was very successful in his school work.

The first schoolhouse in the Salem district was built in 1858 on the south side of the Mokelumne River on the land owned by Ezekiel Lawrence. The money for the building was subscribed by the settlers, and the lumber obtained in the mountains was brought to the site by Victor and Peter Jahant. The doors, windows, sash and furniture for the building were made by Mr. Lawrence, who was a carpenter. After the division of the district the little schoolhouse was removed to a point about a mile and a half further south on what is now known as the Barnhart tract. After the railroad came through, the building was again moved this time to the present location of the Salem school. It was again moved to make way for a larger building, and for several years it was the home of James Hutchins. Lucille Lefebvre in a newspaper article published some years ago gives a different account of the first school, which consisted of one room and was located on the northwest corner of Pine and School streets, hence the name of the street. She wrote: "The first schoolhouse on the present Salem school grounds was built in 1872. It was 30x40 feet, two stories high, and cost $2,160. In 1881 a one-room addition was added and the next year another room was added in the yard." The "Lodi Sentinel" published at that time speaks of one building as "the kitchen" and of the other as "the woodshed". Before the last room was added, the extra pupils were housed in Stoddard's hall, which is now the Cosmopolitan hotel, at the corner of East Oak and Main streets. The enrollment at that time was 193. Professor Russell was the principal when the present Salem school was erected. The old building was moved to West Pine Street, where it was used for the dining room of the old Lodi Hotel for years. A pupil in this school was Laura DeForce Gordon, one of the first advocates for woman suffrage and the second woman in the state admitted to the practice of law.

The present Salem school, a wooden two story structure, was built in 1883 at a cost of $12,000, some say $15,000. It is located on Stockton near Walnut street and was quite a school building in its day. The county superintendent in speaking of it said "This magnificent school building with its mighty dome to the heavens is a monument to the enterprise and energy of the citizens of Lodi and Salem district." It was dedicated October 13, 1883, with the following invocation by the Rev. T. B. Palmer; solo "The Old Stone Mill", Lizzie Richardson; opening address, J. A. Solinger, quintette, "Twilight on the Beach" Lizzie Richardson, Mary Wright, Florence Russell, W. C. Green and D. L. Spotts; character recitation, "The Black Horse and His Rider," Cyrus Newton; solo, "When the Robins Nest Again" Lizzie Richardson, closing remarks Professor O. E. Swain; benediction by the Rev. E. B. Palmer. At the close of the exercises those present enjoyed a dance to the music of Boswell's orchestra, comprising Messrs. Boswell, Brattan, Andy Ware and George E. Lawrence. A few years later it was decided to form a high school to include the following districts: Salem, Harmony, Live Oak and Alpine district. An election for school trustees was held in the districts named July 11, 1891, and the following trustees elected: James A. Anderson from Salem, T. P. Heath, Harmony; George Hazen, Live Oak, and M. C. Dow, Alpine. In organizing as a school board John A. Anderson was elected president and George Goodcell, clerk. A part of the grammar school was given over to the high school which was known as the Lodi High School.

The following teachers were the principals of the school up to 1907. O. E. Swain, Freeman B. Mills, Wm. Piper, Edward McCourt, Mr. Somers, C. Adams; 1891, E. B. Wright, Eugene Hogan, M. C. Dow, F. B. Wooten, 1902, George M. Steele, 1904, John Anderson, John Williams, 1911, William Inch.

The Emerson School

The Salem school in 1904 was more than crowded with pupils and as more school room was necessary the trustees called for a bond issue of $25,000 for the purpose of purchasing land and erecting a large wooden building. The bonds were voted and the trustees purchased a block of land just four blocks from Sacramento street between Elm and Pine streets. They named it Emerson after the famous essayist, and it was dedicated in 1907, the last of the fire-trap school buildings.

The Union High School

A mass meeting was held May 18, 1911, for the purpose of discussing the question of a Union high school for the northern part of the county. George E. Lawrence was elected chairman of the meeting and L. V. Peterson secretary. It was resolved to organize a high school to include the Lodi, Lockeford, Victor, Henderson, Woodbridge, Alpine, La Fayette and Houston districts. It was proposed to bond these districts for $150,000, the bond election to take place December 14, 1911. The night before the election there was an immense mass meeting in the opera house which was addressed by Hillard E. Welch, George M. Steele, the Rev. E. B. Winning of the Methodist church, Wm. Inch, principal of the high school, and Hugh McNoble. On the morning of the election there was a parade of over 1000 school children, carrying flags and banners. The vote for the bonds was 931 for and only 366 against. The bonds were sold at a premium of $12,000. The trustees selected as the high school site the twelve-acre tract of Thomas Hutchings just west of the limits of Lodi. There was as usual in every progressive movement, considerable opposition to this site. And at the election for trustees, April 5, 1912, the knockers tried unsuccessfully to elect a new board of trustees, but the old board were re-elected, by a handsome majority. In 1919 the trustees erected a splendid high school in honor of the American Legion and named it Clyde Needham, in honor of the first Lodi boy to die on the battlefields of France. It is built of hollow tile and cost $110,000. Contractors declare it the final work in school construction and equipment. It has ten rooms, including the study room, which has a seating capacity of 400. The school will accommodate 200 pupils. The study hall is fitted with a stage and dressing rooms. There is also a projection room for moving pictures. The social science department is equipped with gas ranges, modern kitchen, dining room and other appliances. There is also a fine manual training shop. The school was opened to students on March 1st. The board of trustees follows: J. C. Kellar, William H. Faust, George A. Keagle.

The school was dedicated February 22, 1921, with very impressive ceremonies including a parade of the American Legion, Woman's Relief Corps, Boy Scouts, Golden Star mothers who lost their sons, and school children led by the Tokay band with Mayor John S. Montgomery as grand marshal, assisted by Walter Jahant, Harry T. Bailey, E. A. Thompson and H. L. Emerson. On arrival at the front of the school building the following program was given, singing of "America" by Mrs. Mary MacAdam Yerbury; prayer, Rev. Charles Price; address, Maj. W. P. Garrison; address, Governor W. D. Stephens; presentation of flag to school by Mrs. Belle Wright for Hartford Corps No. 49, W. R. C.; solo, "Flanders Requiem," Mrs. Yerbury; address, Maj. W. A. Mason, commander of Needham's corps; "Star Spangled Banner," Tokay band. During the afternoon Governor Stephens was given a lunch in the Hotel Lodi as the guest of Maj. W. E. Garrison, Mayor John S. Montgomery, H. E. Welch, John B. Cory, J. M. Blodgett, Dr. J. P. Sargent, J. V. Bauer, V. R. Larson, George H. Moore, T. G. Elwert and Marshall Dement. That evening there was an entertainment in the Lodi theater for the benefit of the Tokay band, the proceeds to go towards paying for their new uniforms.

A second fine school building was erected in March, 1922, at a cost approximately of $65,000, in the southern part of the city on what is known as the Sturla tract. The building, 125x210 feet, is of concrete and hollow tile with a composition roof. The structure which contains six class rooms, including a manual training department, domestic science room, model dining room, large assembly hall capable of seating 400 people, library and board room, with offices for the superintendent and principal. The assembly hall will be fitted with a large stage with all the necessary equipment. The class rooms will be arranged around a patio, with covered walks connecting with each room.

The Methodist Episcopal Church

Approaching Lodi on a Sunday evening the traveler's attention is called to an unusual light in the horizon. Coming near he sees that it is a brilliantly electrically lighted revolving cross, some eighty feet in the air, surmounting the tower of the Methodist Episcopal church. It is a beautiful temple of worship of brick and red sandstone, erected in 1919 at a cost of $50,000, the outgrowth of the evangelistic work of the Rev. Colin Anderson, a Methodist circuit preacher, who held services in that vicinity in the winter of 1861 and '62. His circuit included the Live Oak and Woodbridge churches. Several years later the Rev. J. H. Bryant located in the Woodbridge region and he found forty-six Methodists in that vicinity. After the founding of Mokenlumne city quite a number of Methodists settled in the town, and services were held in their homes with the Rev. J. W. Bryant as pastor.

The Burning of the Church

In 1870 the Christians of the town concluded to erect a house of worship. It was planned to erect a chapel at a cost of $1,500, a Union church in which all denominations could hold services except the Mormons. Unfortunately the building caught fire by some unknown means about 2 o'clock in the morning of February 7, 1878, when nearly completed and was entirely destroyed. With the characteristic energy that has always animated the people of Lodi the citizens held a meeting that evening and resolved to immediately rebuild the church and pay the debt on the destroyed building amount to $600. Subscriptions were called for and some $700 subscribed on the spot. The Methodists of the town having a complete organization, now took up the work and erected a church on the same lot as the destroyed structure, corner of Oak and School streets. One of the charter members of the church was George W. Hill, and in the farewell meeting in the pioneer building February 20, 1920, he said that they occupied the church for forty-five years. During that time and later the following pastors have been in charge: Revs. J. W. Bryant, 1870; E. K. Belknap, '73; E. P. Walker, '75; Hazen White, '77; Charles Haswell, '79; Thomas B. Palmer, '82; W. R. Gober, '84; Edward E. Dodge, '85; Seneca Jones, '86; J. L. Mann, '91; H. Copeland, 1902; Hindson, '04; E. B. Winning, '07; W. P. Grant, '20; J. H. Troxell, '22; the present pastor is H. B. Beers.

The Congregational Church

It is on record that the Congregational Church was organized March 6, 1862, and that "their first services were held in a barn." Proof of their organization at this time was given in March, 1912, when they held their Golden anniversary. In March, 1872, says another account, a Congregational Church of nine members was formed, with the Rev. O. A. Ross of Lockeford as their acting pastor. Mrs. Gertie DeForce Cluff said in the Valley Review in December, 1878, that the church was organized with the following members: Mrs. Crouch, Mr. and Mrs. Gillespie, Mr. Black, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Elliott, and Mrs. Collins. The first pastor was Rev. W. C. Stewart, who rode ten miles to attend services in all kinds of weather. In 1878 the membership had increased to twenty, the organization took a new start and the idea of building a church was determined upon and the following officers elected: Edward Elliott, Sr., and Charles Elliott, deacons, and Charles Elliott, secretary and treasurer, with Dr. Johnson, O. Gillespie, Edward Elliott, Sr., Thomas Farchilds, Charles Elliott, Allen T. Ayers, and L. S. Morse, trustees.

In September of that year, the first Congregational society was organized with Mrs. W. C. Stewart as president; Mrs. Scott, vice-president; Mrs. Collins, secretary and treasurer; Mrs. L. M. Morse, Mrs. A. T. Ayers, Mrs. Thomas Fairchilds, Mrs. Merwin and Mrs. S. P. Sabic, directors.

A lot was obtained on School Street near Lockeford and a small wooden church erected at a cost, building and furniture, of $3,200. As the congregation increased in numbers additions were made to the building. During the pastorate of the Rev. F. M. Washburn, from 1904-11, the present large structure was erected. The following are some of the pastors during the past years: Rev. W. C. Stewart, C. C. Corwin, N. W. Lane, George B. Allen, John W. Brier, Jr., George H. DeKay, M. Washburn, who resigned in December, 1911, because of ill health, W. L. Schwimley and Charles S. Price.

The Episcopalians

Although few in number the Episcopalians are an enthusiastic body of Christians. Organized early in the year 1900 they held services in a public hall, and T. C. Hawley acted as lay reader of the service of worship. Along about 1909 although with only a few hundred dollars in the treasury the vestrymen began making plans for a chapel and a church home. The following year they obtained a site for a church, corner of Lee and Locust streets, and at a cost of $3,000 erected a very pretty edifice, which was completed in September of that year. For a time the Rev. D. O. Kelley of San Francisco was the missionary in charge, conducting the services once a month. The remaining Sundays T. C. Hawley conducted the services. Rev. John Morgan conducted services along about 1893 and in 1911 they had a permanent rector, Rev. W. H. Hawkins, who preached his first sermon May 7 of that year. In 1919 the vestrymen called the Rev. George B. D. Stewart, who had supplied the pulpit of St. John's Church, Stockton, while the rector was in France. Rev. Stewart died in 1922.

The Incorporation of Lodi

The incorporation of Lodi as a city of the sixth class was under discussion as early as 1903, but the opposition to an incorporation at that time, prevented its attainment. According to the law governing cities of the sixth class it was necessary for a majority of the citizens within the limits of the proposed city to petition the board of supervisors to call an election for the citizens to vote upon the question of incorporation. The opposition of the saloon keepers to the movement naturally increased the desire of the better class of citizens for incorporation, and in October, 1906, a petition was presented to the board for supervisors by W. A. Young, Max Elwert, W. A. Spooner and George M. Steele, petitioning the board to call an election for the incorporation of the city of Lodi. As there was a large excess of names the petition was granted and the election called.

The business men were the leaders in the movement, and as they were desirous of hearing a business man's opinion upon the question, they sent an invitation to J. R. Broughton to address them. Mr. Broughton was a banker of Modesto, a business man and one of the leading movers in the incorporation of that city twenty years previous. A mass meeting was held in the Lodi Opera House November 20, 1906. At the conclusion of the address the business men nominated a ticket comprising a board of five trustees and other officers. The trustees were to hold office for four years, two or three, as the case might be, to be elected every two years. The charter also called for the election of a clerk, treasurer and marshal. The Business Men's ticket contained the following names for trustees:

George E. Lawrence, A. W. Keeney, J. M. Blodgett, F. O. Hale, and S. W. Beckman; for clerk, Henry E. Ellis; for treasurer, W. H. Lorentz, and for marshal, A. B. Krutz. Keeney and Beckman declined to serve and Leon Villinger and A. C. Rich were appointed. H. E. Ellis declined the nomination of clerk and J. A. McMahon was appointed.

The election was held November 27, 1906, and the incorporation of the city was hotly opposed by the saloon element. The vote for incorporation was two to one for it. The church bells rang out their joyous peals over the victory, and the Stockton Record, congratulating the citizens, said: "When the church bells of the town are rung in honor of the result of an election it is safe to presume that it has been no ordinary political contest. It would be a great thing for Lodi to be able to print on its stationery as in Riverside and other southern towns: 'No saloons in Lodi.'"

First City Officers

The following officers were elected together with their vote for trustees: J. M. Blodgett, 350; F. O. Hale, 362; George E. Lawrence, 290; C. A. Rich, 181; Leon Villinger, 186. For clerk: J. A. McMahon, 269; his opponent, 124. For treasurer, no opposition, W. H. Lorentz, 391. For marshal, H. B. Coleman, no opposition, 374. A few evenings after the election the citizens held a grand ratification meeting in the opera house. The meeting was addressed by Mayor M. J. Gardner and Judge Wm. B. Nutter of Stockton and by local speakers. The meeting was enlivened by the Lodi band and local vocalists. The first meeting of the trustees was held December 7 in the "new city hall on North Sacramento Street." They had no money in the treasury, no fixtures, books or papers of any kind with which to conduct business, and it was suggested that the trustees dig down in their pockets or hold themselves personally responsible for books, furniture, etc.

The following is the official roster of Lodi up to the present time:

Board of trustees—November 27, 1906, president, George E. Lawrence; J. M. Blodgett, C. A. Rich, F. O. Hale, Leon Villinger. April 15, 1912, president, George E. Lawrence; M. J. Blodgett, C. A. Rich, F. O. Hale, C. A. Black. April 20, 1914, president, F. O. Hale; Max Foldendorf, E. M. Keeney, E. E. Deever, C. A. Black. April 15, 1918, president, C. A. Black; Joseph D. Crose, E. M. Keeney, F. O. Hale, John S. Montgomery. April 19, 1920, president, J. S. Montgomery; Joseph D. Crose, C. A. Rich, F. O. Hale, A. D. Hickok. April 17, 1922, president, J. W. Shattuck; John Mettler, Jr., C. A. Rich, F. O. Hale, A. D. Hickok.

Clerk—November 27, '06, J. M. McMahon; March 9, '14, C. A. Rich; April 20, '14, Harvey S. Clark; February 1, '21, John F. Blakely.

Marshal—April 20, '08, H. B. Coleman; August 8, '20, R. B. McClure; April 17, '22, F. Christensen.

Assessor—Nov. 27, '06, J. M. McMahon; March 9, '14, C. A. Rich; April 20, '14, H. S. Clark, Jr.; February 1, '21, John F. Blakely.

Treasurer—April 15, '12, W. H. Lorentz; April 17, '22, W. H. Lorentz.

Tax Collector—April 20, '08, H. B. Coleman; April 15, '18, W. H. Lorentz.

The Water Works and City Hall

Lodi was supplied with water by a corporation as early as 1891 by the Bay City Gas, Water and Electric Works; G. G. Buckland was the president and J. H. Fish the secretary with offices on Pine and Sacramento streets. They sold the plant to the Carey Brothers, who it appears supplied the citizens as did the Bay City company with water and gas. In November, 1901, the proposition was discussed by the citizens of having electric lights in the town. The Carey Brothers took the matter in hand and agreed to establish a lighting plant in Lodi within two months, and putting a very low rate, asked for a two year guarantee. The guarantee was given and the electric lighting plant was installed with a capacity of 500 lights, sufficient at that time to light the town. The lights were turned off at midnight.

After the incorporation of the city the board of trustees, Messrs. Lawrence, Blodgett, Hale, Rich and Villinger, thought it would be a paying proposition for the city to own its own water works. They made a proposition to the Carey Brothers to purchase the plant. They were also running an electric plant, and asked for the whole thing $55,000. It was certainly some hold-up, for in the spring of 1919 the trustees obtained the entire water and power plant for $30,000. The city at the time was bonded for some $130,000 for the plant, a sewer system, public utilities, etc. The trustees took out the old second-hand wrought-iron water pipes used by the old company and put in steel pipes. Then at the water works they erected on iron stanchions 138 feet in height, a 100,000 gallon steel tank; and with it a first class pumping plant. This plant more than paid for itself in a few years, and at present there is a profit sufficient to pay the overhead expenses of the city.

You remember that when the city was incorporated the city office was in a building on North Sacramento Street rented from the county. With the progressive enterprise that has always been characteristic of the board of trustees they concluded in 1912 to have a city hall owned by the city and stop paying rent.

They could not agree as to its location, as some of them wanted to purchase the Gealey lot on North Sacramento Street as the city hall site. The majority of the trustees voted on placing the building next to the pumping station on North Main Street. A two-story brick building was there erected and at a contract price of $3,995. The building was completed and ready for occupation in July, 1912.

Lodi Fire Department

Lodi's first department was composed of volunteers with H. E. Welch the first chief engineer. The department at this time, May, 1911, consisted of two combined chemical and hose wagons drawn by horses. In November, 1911, there was a reorganization of the department comprising some eight men, and E. H. Stark, who had formerly been the fire department chief in Fergus Falls, Minn., was induced to take the chiefship of the Lodi Fire Department. Stark divided the city into four sections, the division lines being Pine Street and the Southern Pacific Railroad track. At the annual election in May, 1920, E. H. Stark was again elected chief. L. H. Rinn was elected vice-president; H. E. Welch, treasurer; Wm. H. Faust, secretary; M. R. Channell, first assistant chief; J. W. Landback, second assistant chief; T. R. Leeck, foreman of Wide-Awake hose company and M. Roracker assistant; Fred Spiekerman, foreman of Alert hose company and Henry Gimbell assistant; John Schaefer, foreman of hook and ladder company and P. W. Lehman assistant; the chemical engine company has George Olenberger for foreman and Wm. Schnabel for assistant.

The city trustees in September, 1920, purchased a Seagrave triple combined fire pump at a cost of $13,000. It is capable of playing three streams of water and one stream will deliver 750 gallons of water per minute, and from three 50-foot lengths of hose a stream of water was thrown from a two-inch nozzle more than 50 feet in the air and a distance of 200 feet. The machine was pumping 1050 gallons a minute at the time.

Lodi's first Board of Trade was organized February 28, 1887, and was known as the Northern San Joaquin County Board of Trade. The board organized by electing W. C. Childs president-recording secretary; J. B. Ruffman, corresponding secretary; T. C. Riggs, treasurer, and C. A. Rich, director, Lodi district. In 1901, April 9, Lodi's Chamber of Commerce was organized to develop the resources of northern San Joaquin County; to include immigration, foster trade and aid and encourage commercial intercourse throughout the county. The board of directors for the first year were C. M. Ferdun, W. W. Henderson, F. W. Beckman, Ed. Hutchings, George Hogan, C. L. Newton, Al. Breitenbucher, A. T. Cowell, J. B.

Cory, M. Van Gelder and C. P. Garrison. There are now about 150 members.

The Lodi Press

Lodi's first newspaper, the Valley Review, was published July 20, 1878, by Mrs. Gertie De Force Cluff. It was a small seven-column folio, published weekly. Mrs. Cluff conducted the paper for six years, then sold the plant to Walcott & Cheney. They sold the paper a year later, 1885, to Bloomer & Moore, who failed to make good, and it was attached by the sheriff and sold.

In 1885 Mrs. Cluff started an opposition paper to the Review. It was a five-column eight-page sheet, and a year later she sold to Howell & Matteson. Hoping to make the paper a success by changing the name, they called it the Lodi News. The office was destroyed by fire July 7, 1887, and was not again republished. A second Valley Review was issued August 16, 1888, by Frank Cluff, who had formerly acted as manager for his sister's paper, the Cyclone.

The Lodi Sentinel, still in existence, was first issued July 19, 1881, by W. R. Ellis and J. W. McQuaid. Both men later sold out and took charge of other county papers. Frank E. Ellis and his brother, H. F. Ellis, bought the paper in 1887.

Post Office

Lodi today has one of the prettiest and most convenient postoffices in the county, far and away ahead of the little dark corner it occupied in 1869 when Daniel Crist was the postmaster. This was a wooden building liable to be destroyed at any time, and when the Grangers erected their two-story brick building, northwest corner of Sacramento and Elm Street, Byron Beckwith leased the corner store and was appointed postmaster. About that time there was a young man named Robert L. Graham clerking for Beckwith. He learned the druggist trade and in time bought out the drugstore. The office of postmaster went with it and in 1881 Mr. Graham was appointed to the office and was postmaster through two presidential terms, that of Garfield and Harrison. He might have continued as postmaster, but the postoffice department demanded more room, so fast had the business grown, and the office was removed to Elm Street near Sacramento, with Harvey S. Clark, Jr., as postmaster. Clark held the office through 1902-04-06-11, and was succeeded February 9, 1914, by J. M. McMahon. About this time the office was moved to North Sacramento Street near Locust. McMahon was succeeded by John Blakely, and he by Claude Keagle. The present acting postmaster is Emerson E. Herrick, who enjoys the neat new postoffice leased by the Government of the City Improvement Company. The building is a two-story brick structure, 65x85 feet floor space, and is equipped in accordance with the plans furnished by the government. This includes a Government-owned cancelling machine, which is given only to offices handling 3,000 pieces of mail per day. The office employs five clerks and four city letter carriers, besides several rural carriers.

Lodi's Progressive Banks

It is of record that a bank was established in Lodi January 21, 1884, with a capital stock of $375,000. The officers were Andrew Sink, president; and John Nevin, manager. The directors and stockholders were C. A. Rick, Augustus Thiel, Andrew Sink, Samuel Ferdun, John Nevin, W. D. Smith, David Kettleman, L. O. Gillespie, J. J. Hubbard, E. R. Pease, Dr. S. P. Hopkins, Dr. C. V. Williamson and E. D. McGreen.

The Bank of Lodi was incorporated June 7, 1888, with a capital stock of $25,000. It was organized by Ex-Senator Ben F. Langford, one of San Joaquin County's progressive citizens, with the following stockholders, T. C. Shaw, O. O. Norton, M. W. Shidy, John B. Cory, E. E. Moran, C. W. Norton, H. B. Backman, Owen Lacey, George McNoble, Gottleibe Doering, W. D. Sturdevant, Otto Spenker, Reuben Fixley, W. H. Lorentz, C. Fatheringham, Max Elwert, J. M. Blodgett, George E. Wilhoit, Ezra Fiske, R. T. Ogden, J. R. Mitchell, George W. Le Moin, F. W. Beckwith, Charles Sollars, Clara E. Love, Harriett D. Shaw, Mary E. Sargent, Mary B. Shidy and Hedwig Lorentz.

The First National Bank was organized March 1, 1905, with a capital stock of $25,000. Fitting up a neat bank in a brick building at 14 Pine Street, they were ready for business September 12. The officers were John B. Cory, president; M. W. Shidy, vice-president; W. H. Lorentz, cashier; J. P. Shaw, assistant cashier, and C. W. Norton, attorney. The officers, together with H. C. Beckman and O. O. Norton, constituted the directors. The bank immediately became so popular that in May, 1909, they increased their stock to $80,000. Again it was increased February, 1911, to $100,000, and in January, 1922, it was increased to $200,000, with a surplus of $120,000.

On April 9, 1907, the directors of the First National Bank organized the Central Savings Bank with the same officers and directors. The stock was $25,000. It was increased to $80,000 in 1909 and to $100,000, February 10, 1911. In June, 1915, these two banks were moved into the corner of the Hotel Lodi building, a handsome three-story pressed brick building erected by the bank. John E. Cory, who had been president of the bank since its organization, resigned December 3, 1921, and W. H. Lorentz was elected president.

In 1916, May 24, the Farmers & Merchants Bank was incorporated, capital stock $25,000. The first officers were Chris Allbright, president; Lot Lund, vice-president; E. B. Doering, secretary, cashier; H. B. Nelson, treasurer, with John Mettler, Jr., Gottlieb Doering, H. C. Large and Peter Joens, directors. Their capital stock in 1923 was increased to $90,000.

The Citizens Bank of Lodi, the fourth bank in the progressive city, was organized in December, 1921, with the following officers and board of directors: John B. Cory, president; Wilson H. Thompson, vice-president; Frederick Spoerke, cashier, and F. M. Mills, D. D. Smith, Henry Pope, G. L. Meisener, H. A. Fairbanks, M. V. Bare, John S. Montgomery, E. H. Humphrey and Burton A. Towne, directors. They began business in the Beckman Thompson building on School Street with a capital of $250,000. Shortly after this time they purchased a lot on the northwest corner of School and Oak Streets and began the construction of a handsome steel reinforced concrete building, at a cost complete of $90,000.

The Tokay Carnival

What was the idea of a Tokay grape carnival? To show and to advertise to the world the beauty and the value of the flaming Tokay grape, so named because of its beautiful coloring when ripe, like a dark red flame of fire. It grows to perfection in no other section of the land and shipped east in New York it brings fancy prices. The Lodi section in its earlier history was known as the watermelon center and in a single month, August, 1881, they shipped twenty-one cars of melons. Later the growers learned that it was a wonderful grape growing district, and there was three times the amount of money in grapes. As to the amount grown and their value, we have only the report of 1920-21. In the year first named a total of 8071 carloads of grapes were shipped from the Lodi section. At the same time the dehydrators and wineries handled approximately 18,000 tons. In 1921 the Lodi district shipped out 9,133 carloads or 127,962 tons. These are S. C. Beane's figures, the Stockton freight agent of the Southern Pacific Railroad. Last year the crop in that section was estimated at $10,000,000 and yet they lost over $2,000,000 because of the car shortage. This was a prologue to the Tokay carnival, which was considered as a festival of far reaching importance. The idea of the carnival was first thought out by Charles Rey, a business man of Lodi. He interested Henry F. Ellis of the Lodi Sentinel, Joseph Friedberger, W. W. Henderson and Frank Christman. The carnival took place in September, 1907, the month when the Tokay grape begins to ripen into beauty. In commemoration of the event, they erected the Tokay arch, over spanning

Pine Street junction of Sacramento. It is of purely mission style of architecture and erected at a cost of $500 obtained by subscription, and is today one of the most attractive features of the city. The carnival continued for three days, the principal feature being the parade and the crowning of the Queen, Bertha De Almadro, on the first day. The parade formed with J. W. Dougherty as grand marshal. Then came the Lodi band, John Bauer leader, preceding Queen Zinfandel and her pages, Merle Lillie, and Mildred Stannard. Behind the Queen rode her maids-of-honor in a tally-ho, Minnie Harney, Nina Wilson, Myrtle McClung, Inez Smith, Tillie Doering, Florence Snedigar, Gladys Graham and Grace Freeman. Then followed a float representing a gunboat manned by young ladies, who had been drilled by Mrs. C. E. Pickering. A second float, that of the Rebekahs, represented a swan-appearing boat handsomely decorated in the colors of the order, pink and green. On arrival at the Arch the Queen was escorted to the throne on the platform by C. M. Ferdun, who presented the Queen her scepter as Queen of the Carnival. George E. Lawrence, as chairman of the board of trade, in a short address, presented her the keys of the city. At that hour the artillery band from the Presidio, San Francisco, had arrived, and the Coronation ode was sung by twenty-five young ladies, under the direction of May Ferrell, accompanied by the band. At this time Governor Gillett and J. H. Filcher arrived and made a short address. The carnival ended Saturday with dancing and a confetti battle.

The Lodi Brass Bands

Lodi has always been a musical city and not lacking in brass or military bands. As early as 1876 a band was organized with George E. Lawrence one of the promoters of the movement. He told at one time how they decided to organize a band although they did not have an instrument, no music, no director, nor the money to pay for any of the necessities. Finally they saw an advertisement in a paper when an eastern company was selling out a complete set of instruments at a reduced price. With no money on hand they signed a note, there being eighteen members. Several philanthropists were found and $300 paid down.

This band, with a strong determination to succeed, now advertised for a leader, and as it happened, the Forepaugh circus was wintering on the Pacific coast and the band leader came to Lodi. His surprise was a terrific one when he found that not one of the eighteen members had an instrument or knew a note. He was persuaded to stay and after the arrival of the instruments they moved out to a little shack south of the city to practice. At that time, according to Mr. Lawrence, the city was a little strip along the railroad tracks. South from School Street was a forest primeval, and to the east an even worse tangle of brush, while live oak trees literally dotted the "business section."

This band organized in 1876 was a great success for the next two years, but finally died in 1878. There were several bands organized during the past years but they were not a success for some reason. At one time Edward Houseman, Joseph Condy and Jabez Harris of Stockton were band leaders. John Bauer, a competent band instructor, located in Lodi in 1897 and organized a band. He continued his residence in Lodi up to the time of the Allied war and at that time he had an excellent band of musicians.

The Lodi Prohibition Movement

Never in the history of Lodi has there been so much interest taken in an election as that of April 14, 1914, over the question of high licensing the saloons. The contest actually commenced April 4 over the election of a school trustee. Their were two candidates in the running, John H. Davies and Otto Weihe. No particular interest was taken in the election until about noon. At that hour a number of the "dry" workers got out their automobiles and began carrying Davies voters to the polls. Then the wets became alarmed, thinking that Davies was a dry candidate and, getting out their automobiles, began working for Weihe. It was a false alarm, for neither man was interested at the time in the saloon movement. It gave the wets a good scare and it brought out an unusually large vote. Weihe, who had formerly been a school trustee, polled 416 and Davies 270 votes.

It was a hot campaign up to the time of the election. Meetings were held in public halls and the opera house which was crowded to hear such speakers as J. Stitt Wilson of Berkeley, Rev. A. C. Bane, then the president of the Anti-Saloon League of Northern California, Rev. F. A. Keast and Rev. E. J. Dennett of Stockton, in favor of high license. The first mayor of Lodi, then president of the Grape Growers Association, published letters in the press arguing that a high license was a foolish ordinance. Another prominent grape grower threatened, that if the business men voted for high license the association would no longer trade in Lodi. Early in the morning of the 14th the voters were at the polls, and by noon half of the registered vote had been cast. Automobiles were everywhere in sight carrying voters to the polls. Each party had about twenty-five automobiles at work. When the polls closed it was found that the dries had won by a small margin, 655 to 648. A committee of wets then went to the dry committee of twenty-five and requested them to let the raising of licenses rest until after the fall election, as the agitation was hurting business. They agreed. When the State election came on November 4, in which there was an amendment to the constitution prohibiting the sale of all intoxicating liquors, Lodi, in her four precincts, including Elkhorn and Live Oak, polled a heavy majority against prohibition, 559 to 337. The women voting for the first time evidently opposed prohibition, but favored the red light abatement act, which carried, 462 to 320. We all know what happened, the state went dry, including Lodi and in the exclamation of the old Methodist, "Glory to God."

The Women's Improvement Club

Go where you may throughout San Joaquin County and you will find that in the smaller cities and towns the women are taking the lead in improving and bettering the conditions of affairs in their localities. In Lodi the women have made a splendid success of their work, especially in erecting a splendid two-story brick club house, the finest in the county. The club was organized in 1906, the year of the city's incorporation. Its object was to assist in the progress and betterment of the city along civic, literary and other lines. The movement as a local organization was for some reason not a success. Mrs. John S. Montgomery, who was strongly interested in the movement, suggested that the club join the State Federation of Clubs. The suggestion was adopted and in 1908 it joined the Federation of clubs, and was placed in the Alameda district which included Contra Costa, Solano, Alameda, Calaveras, Tuolumne and San Joaquin counties. The uniting with the State body put new life and energy into the club and they did some fine local work in planting trees along the highway, inaugurating a clean-up day every year, placing signs upon the street corners; petitioning the board of trustees to lay cement sidewalks, and other things that might be mentioned. In order to raise money to carry out many of their improvements they gave vaudeville and concert entertainments, gave social teas and dancing parties, and annually held a Jinx day. By these different plans of money making in one year they cleared over $1,500. Each member paid an initiation fee and dues and this money was also devoted to civic improvements. The club today has nearly 500 members and is in a flourishing, growing condition. The following Ladies have been elected as presidents; Mrs. Emma Witte Humphreys, Mrs. Belle Cooledge, Mrs. Dora Clark, Mrs. John S. Montgomery, who was the first president under the Federated Clubs, Mrs. G. L. Meissner, Mrs. J. E. Nelson, Mrs. Cecil B.

Clancy, Mrs. Harry D. Sharp, Mrs. O. S. Newman. In 1913 the name was changed to the "Woman's Club of Lodi."

The Woman's Club House

The crowning work of the club is the erection of a splendid club house 45x100 feet, corner of Pleasant and Pine street, at a cost of $40,000. Up to this time they had been assembling in the homes of their members and in public halls, and the idea of having their own club house was voiced soon after their uniting with the state clubs, and with that object in view in 1915 the Women's Building Association was incorporated with a capital stock of $20,000 with shares at $5.00. They soon found that their capitalization was too small and they then increased the amount to $50,000. As incorporated the officers were Mrs. John S. Montgomery, president; Mrs. W. R. Thompson, vice-president; Mrs. Cecil B. Clancy, secretary; Mrs. C. M. Ferdun, treasurer, and those already named, with Miss Anna Brack, Mrs. Edward Hutchins, Mrs. Mamie Jahant, Mrs. A. J. Cook, Mrs. Theodore H. Beckman, and Mrs. Oliver S. Newman, were directors. Purchasing the lot at a cost of $16,000 at the annual stockholders' meeting and luncheon in the Hotel Lodi, April, 1922, it was decided to proceed immediately with the building of the club house. Work was commenced in November and completed in March, 1923. The building is of the colonial style and is not only fitted up in every way convenient for club purposes but it contains a fine auditorium seating over 600 persons and a large banquet hall.

The Carnegie Library

Lodi's first library was established in 1885, the citizens at that time fitting up three rooms in the Heald building for library purposes. Money was freely subscribed toward the library fund by Congressman J. A. Louttit, Ben F. Langford, Ross C. Sargent and many others, and about $1,500 was subscribed. The record states that the library was formally opened October 24 "with a concert by the local brass band and vocal and literary exercises." The library was supported by donations and entertainments, and February 4, 1887, an entertainment under the direction of Cyrus B. Newton was given in Barnhart hall for the benefit of the free reading room. The program comprised a vocal solo by Eva Custer; recitation, Mary Stevens; instrumental solo, Carrie Ivory; essay, Wm. B. Piper; recitation, C. B. Newton; cornet solo, George E. Lawrence; recitation, Nellie Shattuck. Was this library closed? There is no continuous record of the library until May, 1904. At that time says the State Library report, a library was established in a rented building with a rental of ten dollars per month. The Lodi Public library and free reading room in that year was on Sacramento Street near Pine, and Harvey S. Clark was the librarian. Rev. W. P. Grant of the Methodist conference was stationed in Lodi. Interested in library affairs, he conceived the idea of the library having its own building and he suggested the Southern Pacific Railroad Company that they give the citizens the old depot as soon as their new depot was completed. They agreed, provided the citizens would remove it from the railroad reservation. A few years later it was learned that a gentleman living in Lodi was well acquainted with Andrew Carnegie and his library-giving donations. In every donation he required that the city trustees or those in charge of the library movement must first select and have a clear title to the library site. It was now up to the Women's Improvement Club, and purchasing a lot at the corner of Pine and Pleasant streets an entertainment and dance was given June 5, 1909, and the money was used in completing the payment for the lot for a library. The plans were drawn for a handsome library to cost $10,000 and the cornerstone was laid that year, April 17, by the Grand Lodge of Masons, the cornerstone being laid with appropriate ceremony by W. Franklin Pierce, grand master. There was singing by the Masonic quartette and an oration by County Judge C. W. Norton. The library building was completed early in the following year and opened to the public February 12, 1910, with Jaison Swallow as the librarian. The Women's Improvement Club gave an entertainment in the opera house May 6, 1911, for the benefit of the library book fund. Donations of books were given by many different individuals, the writer gave quite a number of books, and the public Library of Stockton donated several hundred volumes.

The Heroic Dead

In the hallway of the Clyde Needham memorial school there is set in the wall a large bronze plaque and upon it is inscribed the following: "In Memory of Clyde Needham." He was the first young man from the Lodi district to die upon the French soil, his face to the enemy. Needham, who was twenty-two years of age when the Allied War broke out, was living with his grandmother, Mrs. M. F. Fugua, 316 West Locust Street. After entering the army he rose to the rank of corporal, and was killed July 15, 1918, in action in the Champagne offensive. Upon the same plaque is inscribed the names of twenty-seven boys who made the supreme sacrifice, namely: James B. Anderson, John G. Anderson, Harold E. Cary, Joseph Drabkin, August Frey, Ralph Gillespie, Herbert Hovard, Wilbur Huggill, Alexander Linde, George Mauch, Clyde Needham, James Miller, Virgil Pearce, Charles R. Patten, Wm. C. Rossi, Arthur J. Setzer, Roy Spencer, Clyde Stamper, Martin Troy, Henry Trimmerger, W. I. Tredway, Arthur Vincent, Charles E. Walther, Vernon White, Henry Wittmeier, Ora Wynn and Henry Wisthoff. The solemn impressive ceremony of unveiling the plaque took place February 22, 1922, in the front of the school building. After the singing the "Flanders Requiem" by Mrs. Mary McAdam Yerbury, Major W. A. Mason, Clyde Needham's first commander, briefly related that terrible battle that began on the Fourth of July and as the Tokay band played the "Star Spangled Banner," and the large crowd stood with uncovered heads, the Major slowly drew aloft the flag, unveiling the plaque.

Armistice Celebration

After many months of anxiety and worry bedlam broke loose in Lodi, when the news was received about 1 o'clock in the morning of November 11, 1918, that the German army had surrendered. The fire whistle was blown, the church bells were rung, and in a short time everybody was on the streets, the automobilists blowing and tooting their horns. About 4 o'clock the Eagles' drum corps was upon the street and leading a procession the happy throng marched over the town, hurrahing, shouting and singing. During the forenoon hundreds of citizens went to Stockton to the impromptu celebration of victory. They returned to Lodi and about three o'clock a procession was formed at the Eagles' Hall on North Sacramento Street and after marching over the town they halted at the Tokay arch. At that point a platform had been erected, and a meeting of jubilee was held. C. C. Woodward was elected to preside. Then followed a patriotic song by the quartette comprising Wm. Brown, Floyd Lyon, J. C. Ferguson and Rev. J. W. Schwimley, patriotic addresses, Hilliard E. Welch and Rev. E. J. Bradner.

In the life of a parent there is no event more thrilling than the return of the boy from a terrible war, this case upon the field of France. There were tears of grief when they marched to the front and tears of joy upon their return, alive, but many of them crippled in limb and with health destroyed. Such an event occurred in Lodi June 4, 1919. In preparation for the "home coming" the streets were beautifully decorated with evergreens and red and white and blue and that night the town was in a blaze of color. The celebration began with a parade led by the Tokay band of over 600 soldiers, marines, Spanish and Foreign Wars veterans under the command of Maj. W. E. Garrison, Hartford Post, G. A. R., Boys Scouts, Women's Relief Club, Women's fraternal and religious societies and over 2,000 children of the public schools. Several closed cars were in line, each auto with a Golden star upon the door panel. And in the cars rode Mrs. H. R. Hugo, who lost her boy in Belgium; Mrs. L. Rossi, whose son died early in the war; Mrs. P. M. Pearce, her soldier boy dying at Fort Douglas, Arizona, and Mrs. L. M. Spencer, whose son died on Angel Island. The parade formed at the Eagles' Hall on Sacramento Street and after marching through the principal streets they halted at the Tokay arch, and address of welcome was given the returned soldiers by H. E. Welch and there was community singing led by the Rev. W. A. Schwimley. The soldiers were then honored by a barbecue which was held in the Municipal Park.

CHAPTER XXV

AGRICULTURE—HORTICULTURE—MANUFACTURES

A well-known Stockton writer in an article in 1914 very wisely divided the history of the county into three periods. The first period from 1847 to 1869; the second from 1869 to 1898 and the third from 1898 up to the present time. Defining those periods he wrote: "The first period covers the mining excitement. The city of Stockton became the clearing house for the southern miner. Going and coming the miner passed through Stockton's portals. Local commerce began to grow, and the town took on the character of a fixed settlement. The county began to produce foodstuffs sufficient for local demands.

"With the coming of the Central Pacific railroad the second period opens. The Southern mines were in their decline. Wheat fields had begun to envelop the city on all sides. The railroad opened new markets and brought in homeseekers. San Joaquin County began to produce tremendous crops of grain, and the prices of cereals were high. The fields of golden grain poured their treasures into the sustaining and constructive life of the city.

"The third period opens with the decline of grain production, the dividing of the land into smaller holdings, the undertaking of diversified forms of agriculture, together with the rapid development of Stockton manufacturing and commercial prestige. Transportation facilities, internal improvements, modern ideal and influences superseded entirely the regime of the hardy pioneers.

"The modern Stockton is a city of 50,000 population. To its four square miles of area has lately been added one and one-half square miles of suburban territory. Its rural environments are filling so rapidly that municipal boundary lines exist only on the maps. Most of the oaks are gone, but thirty-four miles of fully improved streets are lined with shade trees. The shacks and tents of the pioneers have disappeared, but the wealth of the county is assessed at $59,823,400, and that of the city at $24,000,000." It is now, 1923, $96,917,-879 in the county and over $55,872,573 in the city.

San Joaquin County comprises 926,720 acres of land, this including 250,000 acres of reclaimed delta or tule land. There are now 4,500 farms in the county, embracing an area of 706,308 acres, producing cereals, fruits, vegetables, nuts, etc., to the value of $140,702,-764 in a single year, 1920, and yet most of the farmers settling in the county in early days were from Missouri, and very knowingly shaking their heads when it was suggested that they buy land and commence farming said, "You can't raise any crops on that dry land; the long summer months will dry up everything. We are from Missouri and must be shown." One pioneer writing home to his friends said: "I would advise you not to come to this county as the climate is too dry to raise any vegetable products." One of these Missourians was Silas Hitchcock. He believed the land was of no value except for grazing purposes. And as other settlers began locating in the county near his ranch he declared: "Cattle raising is the only thing," and selling his ranch of 400 acres at ten dollars an acre, he emigrated to Tulare County. The ranch, six miles out on the Mokelumne Hill Road, is now valued at $300 an acre.

There were quite a number of men who had farmed in the Eastern and Middle states and foreign lands, who were quite optimistic regarding farming in San Joaquin. They knew that what had been done could be done. A few Mormon settlers planted a crop of wheat at French Camp in 1847. Joseph Buzzell planted wheat in 1848 on the land adjoining the steamboat landing on Center Street. Then came the gold discovery and the crop was not harvested. John Green planted a crop of wheat in 1849 near the present railroad track on Sacramento Street. W. L. Overheiser in 1851 planted and harvested sixteen acres of barley grown in the Calaveras River district. Overheiser the following year raised over sixty acres of wheat. Roscoe S. Sargent, a typical Yankee from New Hampshire, raised about fifty acres of wheat in 1851 near Woodbridge, and in 1852 raised the same amount of barley. Barley at that time was a very profitable crop, as it was in great demand for horse and mule feed. At that time according to the census there were 3,403 horses, 1081 mules, 1,601 cows, 2,488 work oxen, 5,397 beef cattle, 1,712 sheep, and several thousand hogs. That year there was harvested 5,145 bushels of wheat, 111,889 bushels of barley, 1,627 bushels of oats, 1,245 bushels of corn, 1,400 bushels of potatoes and 4,000 tons of hay. What was the population? Only 5,029. They were classified as follows: 4,569 white citizens, only 987 females; 81 negroes, 21 females; 379 Indians, 168 males.

Land Acreage and Price

As I have already stated Captain Weber offered free of cost 160 acres of land to any person who would locate and live upon his holdings. After the gold discovery the land advanced in price from five to ten dollars an acre. As the population increased and it was found to be productive for wheat and barley, the price of land steadily arose until the average price per acre was fifty dollars. It remained at that price until the railroad days.

Most of those who purchased farming lands bought not less than 160 acres, and buying more land from time to time several of them had from 800 to 1,500 acres. They would use this land for grain raising and pasture land. As the land began to wear out, that is produce a less quantity of wheat than in former years, they would summer fallow a part of the land. The farmer with a small acreage could not do this as he was compelled to raise a crop every year in order to pay taxes and make a living. Hence the desire to obtain more land. And today you may ride along the Waterloo, Linden, Sonora, Mariposa and French Camp roads and along any one of them you will see deserted farm houses, barns and sheds miles apart, but with thousands of acres of grain land lying between. Any twenty acres of this land given over to diversified farming will give a good living to a moderate-sized family.

Fencing the Land

Stock was running loose all over the county. At the same time thousands of beef cattle and sheep were being driven to Stockton and to the mountain camps for food, and horses for use under the saddle and harness. Farmers were compelled to protect their land especially through the seedtime and harvest. On the sand plains they dug wide ditches and threw up embankments. On the black land there was an immense forest of white oak trees. They were felled, chopped into four foot lengths, and rails split out. Then placed together in the form of an X a single stick was placed on top to bind them and it made an animal-proof fence. Then fence posts and lumber became cheaper, a barbed wire factory was established in Stockton, by the Farmers' Co-Operative Union. The rail fences were sold to keep burning the fires of the Stockton homes, the flour mills and steamer furnaces. For several years this was the only fuel of the bakeries, mills and steamers. In 1861 a 100 cords of wood piled on the levee for the use of the steamers was swept away by the flood and floated through the Golden Gate.

Plowing the Field

Thomas Gray sung in his beautiful elegy, in regard to the farmer:

Oft did the harvest to their sickle yield;
Their furrow oft the stubborn glebe has broke;
How jocund did they drive their teams afield,
How bowed the woods beneath their sturdy stroke.

The adobe soil was indeed stubborn, tough and hard to work with the early day methods of plowing and the farmer was compelled to go into the field long before daylight in order to accomplish a fair day's work. It was a long, tiresome job, guiding and walking behind the single plow drawn by two horses and as the evening shades appeared,

"The plowman homeward plods his weary way,

And leaves the world to darkness and to me."
The farmer was dependent upon the "timely rains," which sometimes began about the last of November and continued until late in the spring. His plowing and seeding must be accomplished before the middle of January. Sometimes the early rains would be very light, or none at all, and to plow the dry soil, he could not. Then again heavy rains would fall and he could not plow until the soil dried out. After a time the double plow, drawn by four horses, was invented, and the farmer could do twice the work in the same time. Then came the gang plow drawn by eight horses, the driver sitting on the plow. He could do four times the work of former days, but now he had four times the acreage. Now the large gang plow drawn by a tractor engine does the plowing, working in the daylight hours only, and plowing the land at any time, rain or no rain.

Harvesting the Crop

What would the harvest be? No farmer could tell because it depended entirely upon the nature of the soil, and the weather conditions between seed time and harvest. In the Calaveras River section and from Stockton east and southeast for a distance of eight miles the wheat yield was from 60 to 80 bushels an acre. But after many years the soil grew weary and the crop kept decreasing in bushels until now from 15 to 25 bushels is considered a good crop. I heard Thomas Sedwick say—his farm was six miles east—never in forty years did he get less than twenty bushels to the acre.

The seed of wheat planted was of the Mexican variety with small, light kernels of wheat. It was the same variety as the Mission Fathers planted. Then the farmers obtained what was known as Chile wheat from South America, and after a time they obtained a wheat with well-filled, large heads, known as the white Australian variety. I came across the story of its introduction into San Joaquin County in January, '23. In 1877 a man from Australia was talking with J. W. Smith, a Stockton grain buyer. And during the conversation he handed Mr. Smith three heads of wheat, saying that they had been given to him by an Australian farmer as being of the best variety. The wheat when shelled out made about a large spoonful. Mr. Smith gave the seed to John Holt of Sonora. He planted the wheat and from a half acre of land he obtained fifteen sacks of fine wheat. The seed was immediately introduced into San Joaquin and has been sown since that time.

The time of harvest was from late in June until September, as the wheat crop was heavy and each farmer had to wait his turn for the harvesting of the crop, as the number of threshing machines were limited. The hay was all cut and stacked before this date and most of the barley. The early pioneers cut their wheat with a sickle as did the Egyptians of old and threshed it out Mexican fashion. They built a round corral, covered it thick with wheat stalks and then turning in a band of horses kept them moving until they had trampled out the wheat. It was winnowed in large pans in a heavy wind by throwing up the wheat, when the chaff would blow away. Then came the reaper and binder, a method used today along the coast. In my recollection the header was used, the four horses pushing the machine in front of them. The long knife working rapidly in a horizontal position would cut a wide swath of wheat and falling on the draper or wide canvas would be carried to the header wagon moving alongside the header spout. When filled the header wagon would be driven to the stack where stood the threshing machine. Then the men would unload the wagon with common pitchforks. Then the hay fork came into use, unloading a wagon in five minutes. Then four header wagons were used and the header never rested. The thresher was run by horsepower. Later it was run by steam power, the farmer furnishing wood for fuel. Then came the straw burning machines, using the straw for fuel. Finally the combined harvester was invented which, going into a field of grain, cut, threshed and sacked the grain, leaving it on the ground as the monster machine moved on.

Wheat Transportation and Prices

The wheat threshed, the farmer left it in the field until it was sold. The spendthrift farmer sold his wheat immediately to get the money to pay his debts. He was compelled to take the market price, always low at harvest time. The thrifty rancher held his crop until there was a rising market. The wheat was always placed in sacks averaging in weight 120 lbs. The purchase of sacks was quite an expense, running from twelve to eighteen cents apiece. During the Grange movement in the '70's a law was passed installing a jute mill in San Quentin, the prisoners running the looms. Since that time the state has been furnishing the farmers grain sacks at a little more than cost. Previous to that time speculators in San Francisco would buy up all of the jute, which comes from India, and the farmers were compelled to pay their price. Strange as it may appear, the price of wheat in San Joaquin was governed by the price in Liverpool, England, which was the world market. Every day the Stockton Independent through the harvest season, would publish the price of wheat at the wheat center, also the price quoted in California by the bull and bear speculators of San Francisco. It is recorded that in March, 1859, John H. Cole and Jonathan H. Dodge, two thrifty farmers, sold their wheat at $2.25 per hundred. It was the highest sale price of wheat to my knowledge and the press emphasized the fact that the 175 tons was "sold in one lot." Years later a thousand tons in one lot was no unusual sale. Limited transportation and a small population effected the price of wheat. Then when transportation was speedy and the population greatly increased, large wheat fields were opened up in Canada, Russia and India, and San Joaquin was compelled to compete with the world. In August, 1873, a choice lot of seed wheat sold at $1.75 per cental. At the same time there were nineteen ships aggregating 18,000 tons loading with wheat for foreign ports, and to get these ships off on time, extra prices were offered for wheat, $1.75 per cental.

This brings us up to transportation. The farmers not only in San Joaquin but in Stanislaus County were compelled to bring all of their wheat on sale to Stockton, either by teams or water. A farmer living ten miles out could bring only one load a day to the warehouse, and that only during the dry season. I have seen the levee year after year crowded with teams waiting their turn to unload their wheat in the warehouse. From the adjoining county small steamers, towing barges would bring it to Stockton. Then came the railroad. The San Joaquin River steamers were put out of business, and the farmer profited thereby. He took his wheat to the stations, in a few days it was all safely housed in the warehouse, and at any time he could sell on a rising market. Wheat came in at a lively rate after the railroad came, immense barges carrying 1,000 tons were built, and lying alongside the ocean vessels they would be unloaded. Large Stockton warehouses were erected, housing in all 24,000 tons. It was a sight to see thousands of square feet of space packed solidly thirty feet high with grain.

A Few Figures

In 1869 the census marshal reported 13,475 horses, 1,000 mules, 4,250 cows, 4,500 calves, 7,250 beef cattle, and 36,000 sheep. It also reported 275,000 acres of fenced land, and about 200,000 acres of this land under cultivation. There was 117,000 acres in wheat which produced 1,521,000 bushels; 29,640 acres in barley yielding 622,482 bushels and 24,675 acres cut for hay producing 32,850 tons.

In 1880 San Joaquin County raised the largest wheat crop in the world. In 1883 it was not far behind, the crop being 3,414,970 bushels. To a layman these figures are scarcely noticeable but when you say that it would take 1,024 freight cars ten tons each to transport the crop, then they may take notice. The same year the soil produced 1,200,000 bushels of barley 20,000 bushels of oats and thousands of tons of fruit and vegetables. That year there were 12,406 horses, worth on an average $55 each, 1,585 mules worth 100 each, and 56,478 sheep at an average of $1.25, and 4,202 cows, average $30. Again in 1884 248,350 acres were under cultivation and the harvest in wheat alone was 3,729,250 bushels, 600,300 bushels of barley were also raised. The horses in the county numbered 14,752 at $50 each, mules 1,892 valued at $108 apiece, 4,261 cows worth on an average $32 apiece, and 42,798 sheep at $1.45.

Advancing along the years to 1922, we find a complete change in the production of the county. Wheat is no longer king for it has been superseded by barley, potatoes and grapes. These three crops alone were valued at $31,000,000. Even at that the county "ranks fourth in all of the counties of the nation in agricultural products, and first among the fifty-eight counties of the state in wheat, barley and corn." It is far ahead as the greatest potato producing county in the world. In the nation, in grapes harvested it ranks third; it is fourth in vegetables, aside from potatoes, fifth in hay and forage; sixth in its production of beans and dairy products; and tenth in chickens and poultry. According to the census bureau of 1920 the crops of San Joaquin County were valued as follows:

Cereals	$10,748,208
Other Grains and Seeds.....	3,067,428
Vegetables	9,989,852
Hay and Forage.....	4,497,117
Fruits and Nuts.....	9,432,595
All Other Crops.....	221,666
Value of Dairy Products.....	2,340,938
Value of Poultry.....	377,558
Value of Honey and Wax.....	28,516
Value of Wool.....	105,593

In 1920 there were 4500 farms in San Joaquin County, an increase of 1214 over 1910. There are 926,720 acres of land in the county of which area 706,308 is in farms. The value of all farm property increased from $67,286,628 in 1910 to $140,702,764 in 1920. The value of farm buildings is set at $11,731,875; implements and machinery at $5,855,919, and livestock at $7,329,162.

Farming Machinery Inventions

We have recorded the immense crops raised in San Joaquin County during the past years, but do you realize the fact that these crops could not have been grown were it not for the improved machinery that preceded their growth. It is an old saying that "time and tide wait for no man," neither does the weather. It rains and the farmer must plow and sow his seed within a certain time or he gets no crop. The rains may be long delayed, then he must hurry. There may be very heavy rains and then in the adobe soil he must wait until the ground dries out. Often he had less than two months to do his plowing. Then the gang plow was invented enabling him to plow four times the amount of land he could plow in former times. Now with the traction engine he has beat out Nature, for he can plow at any time, rain or no rain.

The plow is an old as civilization and we have all seen illustrations of the Egyptian plow, a long timber shod with an iron point and drawn by two oxen with a long bar fastened to their horns. Our forefathers used a single plow drawn by one horse, sufficient for them, for their plowing fields were small. But plowing from 160 to 1,000 acres within the time limit was an impossibility. In 1854 Perry Yapple of Stockton, later of Ripon, claims that he made the first improved plow in the state. It consisted of three single plows so set that they plowed a furrow three times the width of a single plow. It was known as a gang plow. Don Carlos Matteson, who was always inventing or improving some kind of machinery, in 1867 invented a reversible gang plow. In 1881, Dr. Christopher Grattan, who gave up practice and took up farming, invented a double gang plow. It cut a furrow eight feet in width, and in August of that year J. H. Cole, using seven horses, plowed 100 acres in four and one-half days, and using twelve horses to a twelve-foot gang plow two men plowed thirty acres in two days.

The farmer cut his crop of wheat, barley or oats, much cheaper for hay than for grain, as he saved the expense of threshing. A certain amount of hay was necessary to feed his own stock and that of the county, and there have been times when hay was worth more than wheat. Haying time began in the month of April and ended in May. When cut the hay was gathered from the soil by a clumsy wooden rake, the driver of the horse walking behind and lifting the rake off when a certain amount of hay had been gathered. Then a high-wheeled rake was invented with a long, steel curved tooth. It picked up a common wagon load of hay, which was released by a spring. At first the hay was stacked by men with the common pitchfork. Then the four-tined hay fork was invented. By use of a derrick and one horse and handled by an expert, for the fork weighed over 100 pounds, it would quickly unload the header wagon, and the stack could be raised much higher than by the old way. Thomas Powell in 1874 invented a rope net for the stacking of hay and grain. The net was laid in the bottom of the header and the entire load lifted at one time. It was not a success.

From Reaper to Combined Harvester

The wheat, barley or oats, stacked from twenty to thirty feet in height, awaited the coming of the threshing crew, for while every farmer had header wagons only a few owned threshing machines. The first threshing machine in the county, 1852, is said to have been owned by Wm. McKee Carson, a farmer living three miles out on the Lower Sacramento Road. His family still occupy the place. All of the machines were imported by sailing vessels from the east. Ross C. Sargent owned the second machine in 1853. In order to give briefly the history of the combined harvester we must go back to 1857. At that time A. L. Cressey, who died last year in Modesto, says that he worked on Dr. Grattan's ranch binding grain after the cradler. One day D. C. Matteson came from Stockton to test out the first reaper ever built in the state. He says, "It was a wonderful contrivance." Cressey drove the machine, and by cutting their neighbors' grain they made sufficient money to purchase it. Two years later a newspaper correspondent wrote, "The reaper, newly invented by Matteson and Williamson, will be the reaper of the state. The entire machine is of Stockton manufacture and Mr. Matteson says he has three completed and intends to hurry up all he can before the harvest." "This reaper," says Don Carlos in 1860, "was quickly knocked out by the headers at a loss to me of $2,000." The headers which I have already described were used for twenty years. During that time the combined harvester was being perfected, a machine that superseded all the reapers, headers and threshing machines in the state, where dry weather crops were raised on level land. Where the air is damp, such as along the coast counties, the farmers are compelled to use reapers and binders. The originator of the combined harvester was an uneducated farmer named David J. Martin, who made his first machine on the ranch of H. H. Thurston some twelve miles north of Stockton on the Lockeford Road. I had the pleasure of seeing the machine and it was an odd looking affair of wood, iron and canvas. Like all combined machines it took some time to get any results worth while, but in August, 1867, the press said, "This machine is considered as one of the greatest labor-saving machines ever invented." Two years later the Independent said, "The machine with three men and twelve horses will cut, thresh and sack the grain from ten to twelve acres a day. On Friday it cut, threshed and sacked 300 bushels of wheat. The header operates a knife eight feet in length and the separator cylinder is two feet eight inches long." It cost $1,200. In 1873 it had been so improved that it cut twenty acres of grain a day. In 1878 J. C. Hoult and David Young invented a combined harvester. It weighed 7,000 pounds, rested on two broad iron wheels, and was sold at $2,000 each. Along in the '80s L. U. Shippee, Ben F. Langford, R. C. Sargent, and others formed a company, and erecting a large building corner of Main and East streets began the manufacture of combined harvesters. One night it mysteriously caught fire, destroying some seventy large harvesters. Some years later Ben C. Holt and his brother, who began manufacturing wagon wheels on the site of the old Catholic burial ground, bought up all of the patents on the combined harvester and began turning them out and shipping them to all parts of the world. They made many improvements, and now have a machine that cuts a swathe from eighteen to twenty-four feet wide and will cut from forty to sixty acres a day, the machine costing $4,225.

With the combined harvester the number of bushels threshed cuts no figure, for if the crop be light then necessarily the number of bushels threshed would be small. The threshing machine sitting by the side of a heavy yield of grain would often thresh a very large number of bushels, and it is recorded that in September, 1872, J. C. Kerr of Lockeford, using a Ray & Scott separator and a straw burning engine in forty and one-half days, threshed out 70,000 bushels of wheat. During eighteen days of that time he threshed 37,000 bushels, and on the Jacob Brack farm, six miles west of Woodbridge, in one hour and twenty-one minutes he threshed out 800 bushels.

The Grange Movement

Today we read of the farmer's bloc, a demand for the farmer certain rights and privileges. The movement is nothing new. In the early '70s organizations were formed throughout the United States known as the Grange or Patrons of Husbandry. The membership was limited to the farmers, their wives and children. The movement was organized to dethrone the speculators, demand a lower tariff and railroad charges. The Stockton Grange was organized August 12, 1873, with twenty farmers and ten women under the following officers: Andrew Wolf, master; W. L. Overheiser, overseer; Thomas E. Ketchum, lecturer; Albert Showers, steward; Thomas E. Brooke, chaplain; Freeman Mills, treasurer; Wm. G. Phelps, secretary; James Marsh, gatekeeper; J. F. Harrison, S. V. Tredway, W. D. Ashley, trustees; Mrs. Alexander Burkett, Ceres; Mrs. W. L. Overheiser, Pomona; Mrs. J. T. Brooke, Flora; and Mrs. James Marsh, assistant stewards. Additional members were John H. Cole, George West, H. E. Wright, Alex Burkett, Charles Sperry, Israel Landers, P. W. Dudley, John Taylor, W. H. Fairchilds, M. Showers and Wm. Mason. There were six granges in the county.

The Delta or Peat Lands

To the west of Stockton there lies several hundred thousand acres which at one time was swamp and overflow land. In San Joaquin lies 188,000 acres of this t^ule land. For twenty years this land was thought to be of no value except as the home of ducks, geese and wild hogs, but since its reclamation expert agriculturists have pronounced it the richest land in the world, equal to if not superior to the diked land of Holland. Hence it is sometimes called "The Holland of America." A small portion of this land at the confluence of Stockton Channel and the San Joaquin River has been under cultivation since 1850. At that time the editor of the Stockton Times wrote, "The ordinary observer who travels over the San Joaquin River, as his eyes survey the vast expanse of t^ule or marsh land extending for miles on either bank, may receive the impression that it is unfit for agricultural purposes and uncultivable except for rice. Now this is an error: By invitation of the Weber Regatta Club we joined them in an excursion to Rough and Ready ranch. It comprises some ten or twelve acres of t^ule land which has been enclosed and recovered. On this land has been produced every species of vegetable at present grown in California. The land is owned by Mr. Downie and he states that in five months the tract had produced 2,000 head of cabbage, 3,000 musk melons, 30 bushels of tomatoes, 1,000 pounds of onions, 20,000 pounds of potatoes, 200 bushels of corn, 2,000 pounds of squashes and pumpkins, together with a large quantity of peppers, beans, radishes, beets, etc. No irrigation is needed from the river as the soil is of a peculiar permeable nature, and fresh water is always found within two or three feet of the surface. We have no doubt that in a few years the t^ule land will comprehend the finest cultivated portion of California." In 1858 the island was in the possession of the Crozier brothers; one of them, James Crozier, having been a Stockton blacksmith. He raised the land three feet above high water, built a house, put in a steam pumping plant and set out about 1,000 fruit trees of every kind. He invited his friends to visit him and the editor declaring, "The beautiful little spot has been the stopping place for the many parties that enjoyed the sport of sailing." At his death in the '80s the property by will passed into the hands of Wm. C. Daggett. He died, and George Buck purchased the property and built a handsome residence; he sold it to Frank Guernsey when elected county judge. This is the beginning of the Delta lands now worth millions of dollars.

Beginning of Reclamation

The Napoleon gardens were partly reclaimed in 1853. In 1857 George Drew, the county surveyor, began the survey of 30,000 acres of land lying on both sides of the San Joaquin River, surveying from a point one mile west of the city to the mouth of the Mokelumne River, the survey being made in connection with the U. S. survey. He said that application for the land had been made by parties in San Francisco." In November, 1860, the surveyor in his report said, "The interest in this description of property is steadily increasing as it will soon become an important part of our territory." In 1872 A. Rowell conceived from the production on Rough and Ready island that the tule lands could be made very productive; he formed a company and began reclaiming the land on the south side of the river. They began by digging ditches from eight to sixteen feet wide and throwing up the levee. A huge Newton pump was installed to draw off the water. In 1874 the paper reported, "The work of reclaiming the tide lands on the San Joaquin River and its tributaries is being pushed forward with energy. Among the most enterprising is the company known as Reclamation Company No. 162, consisting of C. C. Castle, George H. Smith, Sam Wardrobe, Jacob Wagner, C. M. Ritter, J. J. Stevenson, B. F. Sanders, Henry Barnhart, C. H. Cowell. The land embraces 10,968 acres, extending from the Sacramento Road to the mouth of the Calaveras River, then along the San Joaquin to Twenty-one Mile slough, following up said river to the place of beginning." There was to be over nineteen miles of levee twelve feet at the bottom, eight feet on top, and five feet high, placed thirty-five feet from the river. The estimated cost was $1,200 per mile. In September, 1881, the Glasgow Company came from England with John W. Ferris as their engineer. They bought a large quantity of unreclaimed land and taking no advice proposed to show how to build levees. They spent a million or more dollars, placing their levees near the river bank. There came an immense flood of water, their levees broke through and the company went broke.

After thousands of dollars had been lost they built their levees as far back as possible, brought up solid earth from the river bottom to build the levees and dug a wide deep ditch to relieve the heavy overflow. These ditches also served as waterways for transportation. The building of the Santa Fe Railroad across the entire tract also gave splendid facilities for transportation. The islands now produce nearly half of the potatoes raised in the state, together with hundreds of tons of celery, onions, beans, asparagus, berries, and other fruits. In writing of the potato crop, J. M. Bigger, himself an island dairy farmer for several years, said, "These peat lands grow most of the potatoes of California. The annual production is from four to five million bushels, which is more than any other county in the United States produces except one. Big crops of Indian corn are grown in the Delta. This county doubled and trebled its corn production each year for the past four years and this year it will produce 1,500,000 bushels."

Ex-President John M. Perry, of the California Agricultural Society, himself a large Delta land owner, said in writing of levees, "In the early days these levees were known as 'China' levees and were constructed by Chinamen with shovels and wheelbarrows. H. U. Kip, a Chinaman, in a magazine article in 1921, said: "The peculiar nature of the soil would make an interesting story in itself. It represents the years of an accumulation of tules. It burns; it floats; but it is intensely rich." The problem was one of reclamation. It was in 1870 that the Chinese first commenced farming on Sherman Island, and they remained there until the flood of 1878. They worked Staten Island in 1881, then to Bouldin Island. Roberts Island was worked from 1878 to 1884 by Ah Jack, Lew Man, Tong Wo and Lee Louie. Again quoting John M. Perry, "Most of the labor was done in former years almost exclusively by Chinese, but of later years by Japanese, Hindus, Mexicans and Chinamen." The holdings were originally very large and it is only lately that these lands have been put on the market in smaller farms. One of these large holders is the Rindge Company of Los Angeles, and they rent their land to Japanese. The brightest of them all at one time was George Shima, a Japanese, the king of the potato market. He came to San Joaquin County some fifteen years ago and began working on the islands as a common laborer. He saved his money, began renting land, studied the most effective way of raising crops, studied the market prices and became wealthy. It was said he could get more work out of a Jap than any white man, and always on the job he watches every point. In the height of his money making he was feted by the leading citizens of Stockton and tendered a banquet in the Lincoln Hotel. Later he purchased a handsome home for his wife and two children in the fine residence section of Berkeley. Then there was a howl, but their attorney said there was no way to prevent a respectable Japanese from purchasing a residence in "the classic town" of Berkeley.

Shiftless Farmers and Thrifty Farmers

Unfortunately for San Joaquin County a majority of the farmers who located here were men from the far Western and Southern states. They were a body of honest and brave men but with no great ambition in their make up. To sow a little grain each year, enough to make a living, was all they attempted. If their crop was poor or failed entirely, they never worried, they let their butcher, grocer and mortgagee do the worrying. They built shacks of houses and barns and never improved, remodeled or even painted them. They planted no orchards, vineyards, shade trees, plants or flowers, nor raised any fine breed of cattle, horses, sheep, hogs or poultry. Their cattle were half wild and their horses of the mustang breed. My father, a meat seller, asked them, "Why don't you raise a fine breed of cattle?" "Oh," they replied, "It's too much trouble." They sold cattle for $15 or $20 a head while they might have raised cattle, costing no more for feed, to sell at $40 or $60 a head. They bought all of their vegetables and fruits used in the house and some even purchased their butter. There were milch cows running around the house but they had no milk. "It's too much trouble to milk them," said a man living on the sand plains. Is it surprising that they were poverty-stricken all their lives and that their sons and daughters left the farm as soon as possible?

There was a class of farmers, a minority to be sure, who were "go-getters." They came from the New England or Middle States and I will notice a few of them. It was the custom of the State Fair directors to give prizes for the best farms and they sent out committees for that purpose. The committee of 1858 in reporting San Joaquin County said, "The farm of D. J. Staples on the Mokelumne River consists of 600 acres, all well fenced. He has 40 horses and mules, 3 yoke of oxen, 35 cows, a fine lot of young cattle and 100 hogs. He has 500 fruit trees and a well-arranged and a sufficient quantity of ornamentals. He has large, substantial buildings, smith shop, etc."

E. H. Comstock, eight miles northeast of Stockton, took the first premium for his farm in 1857, the State Fair being held at Stockton. His farm consisted of 2,200 acres, "fenced with posts and four rails. He plows about 1,600 acres, has 3 gang plows, 2 large square and 7 triangular harrows, 4 large and 4 common cultivators, 3 reapers, 2 horse rakes, 1 thrasher, 20 horses and 14 oxen. The orchard contains a general variety of fruit trees, about 300 in number, and is enclosed by a fence six boards high. Mr. Comstock's business is grain growing and yet he has some very fine stock."

In the vicinity of Stockton are many large and well cultivated farms. "Mr. Overheiser, three miles from town, has a beautiful and well cultivated farm, 450 acres under fine fence, a fine cottage, granary and large barn."

In the spring of 1875 the Stockton Independent sent out a correspondent to report on county farms. In writing of the farm of J. H. Tone, on the Calaveras, he said, "The Tone place comprises 460 acres in wheat, barley, summer fallow and pasture." Tone was quite a race-horse man. He owned a number of running colts which he started at the county fairs. "In 1852 he lived in an adobe house next to that of John Jones on the sand plains. Mr. Tone now has the finest two-story brick house in the county. The grounds are all tastefully laid out and I noticed honeysuckles, rose bushes, and other flowering plants in bloom." Some of the family are still living on the old homestead.

One of the largest landholders and most prosperous farmers in the county was John E. Moore. He owned a 1,048 acres of land in this county and several thousand acres in Mendocino County and died in the early '90s worth $158,000, a large sum at that time. Coming to San Joaquin in early days he began working for Jeremiah Sarles, driving a milk wagon. He was saving and industrious and getting an insight into the business in time purchased the ranch known to the pioneers as the Oak Grove Cottage and began dairying and farming. I might continue this recital mentioning the names of Jonathan H. Dodge, Shubal Dunham, Mr. Beecher, who was a relative of Henry Ward Beecher, Cutler Salmon, John H. Cole and others who built handsome dwellings and lived comfortably and became wealthy. An illustration of what may be accomplished by two thrifty persons is seen in the work of Loveman L. Rumrill and his wife. They came to California from Vermont, he for his health, and both went to work for J. H. Cole. He took charge of the dairying, she the housework. They made enough money off of the sale of chickens and eggs to pay the grocery bills. Saving their money in five years they had sufficient money to purchase a ranch on part time and at his death they were well-to-do.

Horticulture

The soils of San Joaquin County will produce any cereal, fruit, vegetable, nut, plant or tree grown in any other clime on earth save a few edibles grown in the torrid zone. It will not produce cocoanuts, bananas, guavas and such like. They are a few exceptions. This is not an overdrawn statement but a well proven fact. Unfortunately we have at hand no figures to show the value of the products mentioned for any one year. Joseph Dietrich of the Chamber of Commerce says that in 1922 there were 59,703 fruit-bearing, and 20,662 non-bearing acres, a total of 80,365 acres in fruit trees. There were 5,446 fruiting acres in almonds, 850 in apricots, 147 in apples, 4,684 in peaches, 1,540 in prunes, 1,336 plums, 1,011 pears, 1,570 cherries, 51 oranges, 6 lemons, 1,626 in English and 1,823 in black walnuts, 20,688 in table and 1,375 in wine grapes, 691 in figs, 651 olives, 65, nectarines, 74, quinces, 13, chestnuts, and 7 acres in pecans. As to peanuts, on the islands they are grown by the ton. This is not history but a mild boost for San Joaquin County whose citizens have been so modest that the world knows not its greatness.

The first fruits grown in this county were grapes and, said an editor in 1852, "We are indebted to Captain Weber for the finest and largest grapes we have ever seen. The columns around the piazza and the trellis work of Mr. Weber's residence are covered with vines heavy with long bunches of luscious grapes." They were of the mission variety, imported from Los Angeles. They were luscious but unprofitable except for wine, as they could not be transported any great distance. The captain and a few citizens were the first to plant trees, planting cottonwood trees on the north side of Channel and El Dorado streets, west. Said the editor, "Weber 'Avenue' is a misnomer, as they are cutting down all of the fine oaks. The street would present a noble appearance if on either side poplar trees or evergreens are planted."

About the same time George West and his brother planted a vineyard north of town which later was known as the "El Pinal" winery. Its vineyard produced millions of gallons of wine, brandy and the like until prohibition swept the state. According to the statistics San Joaquin County had planted in 1856, 13,467 grape vines; 1857, 28,640; 1858, 40,000 vines. In the year last named the the State Fair committee reported regarding Stockton, "G. N. Cannon, near the Asylum, had a lot 300 feet square under good cultivation, with 74 three-year old fruit trees. Opposite Mr. Cannon Mrs. Lilly and son had a fine garden of two and one-half acres. In all there were 2,923 trees, peach, apple, plum, almond, cherry, pear, fig, nectarine and apricot, together with currants, gooseberries and all varieties of vegetables, all looking remarkably well. The land was irrigated by windmills. The most remarkable garden showing what has been done and may be done today was that of Rev. Henry Kroh, on San Joaquin Street, 100 feet north of Channel. He had a lot 50x100 feet and a residence for the family. Behind the dwelling he had planted and in bearing condition trees and grape vines, beside considerable shrubbery and vegetables." He had 245 grape vines, 73 nectarines, 27 apple. Our family, living opposite Fremont Square, had on a lot 100 feet square, a large house, a tank and windmill, fruit trees and grapevines which gave a family of ten all the fruit they wanted summer or winter.

I will close the history of early day fruitage by three more illustrations. In 1862 Charles Von Detten had six acres planted to orchard and vineyard, on the corner of East Street and Mokelumne Hill Road, now called Linden Road. He had 7,000 grapevines three years old, which he managed alone with his ten-year-old boy, making wine and peach cordial. Next south was the Helvetia garden, kept by the Gilgani brothers. They had planted on twenty acres 50,000 grapevines and raised vegetables for market. On this same spot a large building is being erected for the use of the 100 and more vegetable gardeners who arrived in the city every morning at daylight with their wagons loaded with garden truck. Alonzo McCloud had 100 acres set out in 15,000 trees, 9,800 being peach trees. McCloud's addition to Stockton is now a part of this land. The ten acres, now the high school site, was as late as 1902 an orchard and vegetable garden managed by Italian gardeners. The site two miles out on the Lower Sacramento Road, now donated to the College of the Pacific, was a very profitable vegetable garden up to the time of its donation. The San Joaquin history, in speaking of it said, "James C. Smith, who owns a large tract of land two miles north of Stockton, has at present about eighty acres rented to persons who cultivate in fruit and vegetables. The garden is irrigated by windmills. The remarkable productiveness of the county is clearly shown upon this farm. Peaches, apricots, plums, cherries, quinces, apples, blackberries, raspberries, strawberries, currants and grapes are grown for market, and also all kinds of vegetables. On most of the land two crops are grown in a season."

Stockton a Manufacturing City

Stockton, in San Joaquin County, is logically the best-located city in the state for manufacturing cities. First, because of the three continental railroads passing through it, diverging to the north, east and south; second, because of its 400-ton steamer and in the near deep water canal to the ocean; third, natural gas and an abundance of water and electrical power; fourth, its central location. W. N. Harris, of the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce, formerly of Stockton, said in 1919 regarding location. "Excluding the territory south of Tehachapi, Stockton is the most centrally located city in the state. The distance between Stockton and Bakersfield, at the southern extremity of the San Joaquin Valley, is 228 miles. The distance between Stockton and Redding, at the northern extremity of the Sacramento Valley, is 217 miles. It is 100 miles from Stockton to the Pacific shore, and 108 miles from Stockton to the summit of the Sierra Nevada range. In other words, if a survey had been made and the center of California's inland empire actually located, it would be but four miles east and five and one-half miles north of the center of the city of Stockton. Think of this fact and contemplate for a moment the present and future of this territory as a producing area. The waterway which led pioneer navigators to this spot and fixed the location of Stockton, pulses rhythmically with the great waters of the world. Through this channel the tides of the Pacific swell and recede. It is the way to the most remote shores. A potentially possible gateway to the commerce of the world."

As a manufacturing center even this day Stockton is no small city. It has within its bounds 208 manufacturing establishments employing over 6,000 men and paying out yearly over $7,000,000, money that goes into the merchants' hands. The time was when the merchant was dependent upon the farmer. If there was a light crop in any season, or the price of wheat was low and the farmer would not sell his crop, then the merchant was compelled to reduce expenses and limit his purchases to the actual needs of the city. That time has passed, for with the raising of fruits and vegetables and the manufacturing of many products with the world for a market, the merchant is no longer dependent entirely upon the farmer.

Manufacturers of Food Products

The first bakers, among them Louis Mersfelder, Charles Potter and John Inglis, obtained their flour imported from Chile. In 1852 this flour was so full of weevils that the legislature prohibited its further importation. Mersfelder since 1856 had a bakery on Channel near Hunter. It is a bakery today. Potter had a cracker factory at the corner of Channel and California streets. There was a French bakery on American, near Market, now a Chinese laundry. How well I remember it. One forenoon it was destroyed by fire. We boys ran away from school and I saw the little Frenchman, who had been asleep in the upper story, come tumbling head over heels down the stairs, his hair and whiskers all afire. Lager beer was manufactured about 1852 and Philip Niestrath had a small brewery run by windmill power on the present Sperry flour mill site. In 1857 Christmas eve about 9 o'clock it burned down. Sitting up in bed, I saw the fire through the window in our home near Fremont Square. In 1852 Peter Rothenbush and Philip Umlauff founded the El Dorado brewery near the Asylum. The Prohibition Act ruined the lager beer business.

The City Flour Mill, corner Main and Commerce streets, was founded by Austin Sperry and Lyons in 1852. Later partners with Sperry were Samuel Baldwin, then Alexander

Burkett, who had been the miller, then Willard Sperry, his cousin. The Sperrys dying, it became a company, which now controls the flour milling interest of the state. At one time there were six flour mills in the county. The City Mill and the Avenue Mill, now the Chamber of Commerce site, owned by R. B. Lane and Stagg, one at Woodbridge, Clements, Linden and Knights Ferry. The Sperry mill now occupies the site on Weber Levee of the old Franklin Flour Mill. It was built in 1853 by Calvin Paige & Company. It was an immense building for that time, three stories in height and installed with expensive machinery imported from England. The walls were not strong enough to sustain the machinery and in 1856 it closed down. The mill cost $75,000 and had a mortgage of $30,000. It lay idle until 1864, when it was taken over by the Sperrys and completely remodeled with the latest machinery. The mill caught fire Sunday, April 2, 1882, and was completely destroyed, with a loss of $140,000 and $70,000 insurance. Today the Sperry, Crown and Union mills in Stockton employ 500 persons, and their pay roll is the second largest in the city. These three mills can turn out 2,750 barrels of flour, 1,000 barrels of cereal, and 100 barrels of stock food per day.

Blacksmiths and Wagonmakers

Next to the food products the most essential manufacturers were the blacksmiths, wagonmakers and harness makers. The principal blacksmiths were John Madden, the father of Frank Madden, with his shop opposite the Elks' building, Frank Duke, corner of Main and California, and Rudolph Gnekow, corner Main and Stanislaus streets. These men during the rush season of summer would work from ten to fifteen hours a day, shoeing horses and mules and mending broken wagons. For several years they were compelled to make their horseshoes and nails.

Among the wagon and carriage makers was J. C. Westbay on Weber Avenue, now the H. G. Shaw building site; J. R. Cory on Channel, now the Electric Light Company office; John H. Hickinbotham & Bro. on Main near Sutter, and Wm. P. Miller. Miller was one of the largest carriage and wagon manufacturers on the coast. Coming to Stockton in 1852 he built his first wagon from a bench under an oak tree. The hubs of the wheels were made from a ship's rudder. He was paid $1,000 for the wagon. In 1853 Mr. Miller established a wagon and carriage making and paint shop at Channel and California streets, and for over forty years carried on business. He erected the three-story brick still standing, and deeded the lot where now stands the W. C. T. U. building. He was a strong prohibition advocate. Another extensive manufactory was that of M. P. Henderson and Clark, established in 1869 at Main and American. Now there is not a wagon and scarcely a set of harness manufactured.

Tanneries and Leather Workers

Just as necessary as the wagon was the harness and the harnessmakers did an extensive business with the teamsters and farmers. Among the principal harnessmaking shops was that of Thomas Scott on Main near El Dorado, who sold to Thomas Cunningham, and he to Patrick Riordon when elected sheriff; that of H. T. Dorrance on Hunter opposite the court house; of J. P. D. Wilkins, Main near San Joaquin, who made the first leather fire hose in the state; and N. C. Hilke, who sold his property to the Commercial and Savings Bank.

These harnessmakers obtained their principal supply of leather from the local tanners, four in number. They were Graham & Stewart, on Stockton Channel; H. R. Potter, who tanned principally sheep skins on Mormon Channel; Harrison Bros., with a small tannery on Sacramento Street; and the Pacific Tannery, corner of Oak and El Dorado streets. The last-named tannery was founded in 1856 by Jacob Wagner on the bank of the channel. His tannery was in an old shed beneath an oak tree, and his tanbank was ground by an old horse in a tread mill. Mr. Wagner had several different partners and at his death the tannery fell to his son and daughter. It is now owned by his son, Edward Wagner, and his son-in-law, George Houskens. They now employ eighty men the year round with an annual pay roll of $100,000. The tannery has a capacity of 150 hides a day and they send their products throughout the world.

Paper Mill Products

In 1870 R. B. Lane believed Stockton a good location for a paper mill. He sent East, bought the necessary machinery and established the mill in a building next to his flour mill. A papermaker from the East, John Lutherwaite, was put in charge and it was a success from the start. It was found that to accomplish much a large mill was necessary. A company was then formed, principally of San Francisco capitalists, and the California Paper Mill organized. A block of land was purchased south of Mormon Channel on Lincoln Street, a one-story brick erected. Installing expensive machinery, March 1, 1878, they began the manufacture of wrapping paper, then print paper machinery was installed, the Stockton and four of the San Francisco dailies partly used the Stockton product. The mill was run continuously from midnight Sunday night until midnight Saturday night, and eighty-five men were employed in twelve-hour shifts. A few years later the mill began using wood pulp to make paper and it was removed to Oregon, where the wood could cheaply be obtained.

Woolen Mill

Opposite the paper mill was the woolen mill established in June, 1870, by Elisha Lambert, a sheep owner, Wm. Dougherty, and James Tatterson, an experienced blanket and cloth manufacturer. The mill at first employed about thirty Chinamen, working under overseers. Then the Chinese boycott came on, in which parties threatened to burn the mill, and the Chinamen were superseded by white persons. Their blankets were of the highest quality, the New York stores guaranteeing them as the best on the market. In a few years Mr. Tatterson died and there being no one to fill his place the mill was closed out. It is now the scouring and cleaning house of E. H. Tryon.

Stockton Iron Works

The first foundry was that of Birdsall & Co., a small concern on Miner Avenue. The Globe Foundry at the corner of Main and Commerce streets was established in 1858 by E. I. Keep and Wm. H. Briggs. The foundry made mining machinery, and steam engines, and nearly all of the engines in the river steamers were manufactured at this foundry. Changing hands many times because of removals and death, it finally passed into the hands of Edward F. Cadle, who had long worked at a lathe in the foundry, and his son, Frank. They made ore cars for the mines, but refusing to employ union labor, the union miners would not handle their cars and the Globe Foundry passed out of existence.

The Stockton Iron Works, established in 1868 on California Street, now a part of the St. Leo Hotel site, is still doing business. It was founded by H. S. and H. L. Farrington, practical machinists, and Galen C. Hyatt, a draftsman. After H. L. Farrington's death the two surviving partners sold out to Trethewey, Earle & Dasher, former employees. At this time the clam shell dredger machine had been invented and the foundry was turning out dredgers and smaller castings of various kinds. The clam shells were monster affairs weighing sometimes from four to six tons each, and it took from twelve to sixteen horses to haul one to the channel. The foundry property became too valuable to use for a foundry site and it was moved to the north side of Stockton below the shipyard.

Shipbuilding

Shipbuilding was quite an industry before the coming of the railroad, then for a time the industry was on the decline, but the increase of business and population has developed an industry far and away larger than in the early days. The first shipbuilder was Stephen Davis, and when he launched the yacht Mary Buffington, it was the talk of the town, and when he launched the little forty-ton steamer from Lindsay Point in 1860 a large crowd witnessed the important event. Mr. Davis through the years from 1864 to 1878 built thirty-nine steamers, barges and tug boats, including the barge Sacramento, of 300 tons, and the steamer City of Stockton, 500 tons. Later, on the same point, E. W. Jarvis built several vessels. On Mormon Channel E. M. Small built the Mary Garrett, the Hattie Fickett, and other river steamers. Now the California Navigation Company keep some fifty or seventy-five men steadily at work building and repairing their Stockton and Sacramento boats.

Agricultural Machinery

Matteson & Williamson, pioneers in the agricultural machinery business, manufactured plows, harrows, reapers, hay forks and harvesters until the death of Mr. Williamson. Haines & Houser, on Sacramento Street, and J. C. Holt, on Center Street, also manufactured harvesters. The Sampson Company made gas engines and tractors. In 1902 the Harris Manufacturing Company was incorporated, the prime mover being Geo. H. Harris, a former superintendent of Matteson & Williamson. Their harvester and header works are on Park and East streets, employing nearly 250 men. In 1883 the Stockton Wheel Company was started by Benjamin C. Holt and his brother on Aurora Street. From a wheel factory they enlarged the plant and formed a corporation and began making combined harvesters and caterpillar tractors. The business increased by leaps and bounds. They continued purchasing more property for the enlargement of their works until at present the plant covers fifteen acres of land; 1,600 men and women are employed with an annual pay roll of $2,500,000. During the allied war they kept steadily employed between 3,000 and 4,000 men making caterpillars to be used against the German army. During that time the entire plant was surrounded by a high fence and guarded day and night by sentinels of the U. S. Army.

National Carton Works

This immense establishment owned and established by the Zellerbach Paper Company in 1918 is one of the most extensive manufactories of its kind on the coast. Purchasing some forty acres of west of Stockton and adjoining the Santa Fe Railroad they erected large brick buildings and installed machinery to the amount of a million dollars for the manufacture of all kinds of paper products. Their products are sent to all parts of the United States and one order alone from China called for 500,000 cartons. In 1920 they made 85,000,000 cartons and, said the superintendent, "that is just a start."

Just beyond the carton factory a lead pencil factory was founded some two years ago, and thousands of feet of logs piled up outside of the place will be made into lead pencils for the use of the civilized world.

Cigar Manufacture

In closing these paragraphs on manufactures I have not cited one-tenth part of the millions of dollars invested. One of the investments that was not profitable was the manufacture of cigars from locally grown tobacco. It will surprise many readers to know that tobacco was ever raised in Stockton, but it could not be perfectly cured because of the dampness of the climate. In 1863 Wm. Gibson, a native of Kentucky and a former school teacher, concluded to try the experiment of raising tobacco. He planted twenty-five acres of tobacco seed on the ground just west of the race track. The seed grew to maturity and was of excellent quality. In his factory he manufactured 3,000 pounds and had 10,000 pounds in the leaf, so the paper stated. Although it was a fairly good smoking tobacco, the experiment was not profitable.

CHAPTER XXVI

MOSAICS OF HISTORY

P. T. BARNUM, the great New York showman, visiting Stockton, gave a lecture in the Methodist Church, North, for the benefit of that denomination. His subject, "How to Be Healthy, Happy and Rich." Although the single admission was one dollar, the church was crowded, and for two hours he held spellbound his audience.—June 10, 1876.

The order of distribution of the Hubbard estate has been made by the court. Mrs. Maria Hubbard is to receive all of the property, aggregating nearly a half million dollars, and is to deed to each of the daughters, May and Lila, $100,000 worth of the property. The estate consists of $50,000 worth of property in Stockton; $80,000, property in San Francisco; $65,000, farming land; $200,000 in secured mortgages; $26,000 in bank stock; household furniture $1,000, and Masonic hall stock $1,000.—April 7, 1890.

For the past few days Captain Weber has had an engineer employed taking levels on his farm on Cherokee Lane for the purpose of digging a canal for irrigation and drainage. He is the first gentleman in the valley to plan a system of canals for irrigation on a large scale, and his enterprise and forethought has demonstrated the fact that the application of water is the most practical way of irrigating the soil.—October 5, 1865.

James Ruddick of the "Old Lodge" saloon, is the owner of a fine sword, formerly owned by General U. S. Grant, who in early days stayed at Knights Ferry with his brother-in-law, Lewis Dent. Later Judge A. E. Baine came into possession of the sword and he gave it to Mr. Oullahan, he in turn presenting it to Mr. Ruddick. It is a straight sword with a black leather scabbard.—March 22, 1867.

Messrs. Matteson & Williamson are preparing to erect a three-story building on the site of their present shop on Main Street near California. The building will cover a space 50 by 75 feet and will cost about $10,000.—June 17, 1878.

J. D. Peters, who is one of the most extensive wheat buyers in the state, has purchased as high as 10,000 tons in a single day, and he estimates that since 1856, when he first began buying, he has bought in this valley alone over 600,000 tons of wheat and 300,000 tons of barley, besides making large purchases from other parts of the state and from Oregon.—July 3, 1878.

The new street car line along California Street is now finished and yesterday, for the first time, the cars were run. The line extends from Main and Center Streets to the Asylum gate on Park Street. About 8 o'clock Captain Smith, accompanied by one of the drivers, leading a horse, proceeded to the steamer wharf, and there, hitching onto a "bob-tailed" car, it was drawn over the graveled street to the turntable and run onto the track. The car attracted considerable attention as it ran up Main Street. George H. Tinkham was the driver on this pioneer line.—May 19, 1875.

At his residence on the French Camp road, near this city, March 25, 1883, Captain William H. Moss died aged 85 years. Captain Moss was born in Virginia and came to California in 1861, at the breaking out of the Civil War, and being wealthy, started the San Francisco Democratic Press with Beriah Brown, a noted secessionist, as editor. When Lincoln was assassinated on April 14, 1865, the mob destroyed the Press and two months later, June 13, 1865, Captain Moss issued the Daily Examiner and published the paper up to the time of his death. Captain Moss was born in very humble circumstances, but his energy and indomitable will overcame all obstacles and he died one of the wealthiest men in this section of the state.—March 27, 1883.

The Stockton Combined Harvester & Agricultural Works about two years ago established a car department and made a success of the enterprise from the start. Orders are now being filled for about forty combination street cars; ten for San Diego, twelve for Portland, Oregon, and six for Seattle. The Stockton street car company has also ordered four more new cars.—March 16, 1890.

On Monday afternoon, a little after 5 o'clock, Pat Breen, an old resident of Stockton, was shot and killed at his home on the Moquelemos grant. The previous day Breen sent a dispatch to the sheriff's office saying, "I want some help at your hands. There is a mob coming here tomorrow, led by Christ Heild and Bill Crawford." A party of thirty armed men on horseback and in a wagon rode to Breen's place. Several of them crowded upon the front porch, and one of them, drawing his revolver, smashed in a panel of the door and shot Breen as he was trying to barricade it. He died in about ten minutes, his wife and two small children witnessing this most cowardly and brutal murder.—September 5, 1882.

The new county hospital building near French Camp is almost ready for its patients. The house will be ready for occupancy long before the weather is sufficiently settled and the roads dry enough to admit the moving of the patients.—January 25, 1895.

A beautiful fountain, with a brick and cement basin, twenty feet across, has been erected on Courthouse Square. The artesian well was capped with a four-inch pipe, and the water plays some three feet above the outlet.—June 14, 1860.

Joseph M. Cavis, who has been a resident of Stockton since 1860, died at 8 o'clock yesterday morning. He was born in New Hampshire in 1825, graduated from college in 1846 and began immediately to study law. In 1852 he came to California and located in Columbia, Tuolumne County. He there engaged in mining until 1855 and then resumed his law practice. In 1861 he was elected to the Senate from Tuolumne County and served two terms. Tuolumne at that time contained some of the brightest minds in California, among them J. M. Barber, James Coffroth, J. W. Mandeville, Leander Quint, N. M. Orr and J. W. Cavis. In 1863 Mr. Cavis was elected district judge and served for six years. He came to Stockton in 1869 and again took up the practice of law. In 1875 he was the Republican candidate for lieutenant governor, with Timothy G. Phelps as governor. Cavis stumped the state making some fine logical speeches, but the ticket was hopelessly defeated because of the actions of Congress on the Chinese immigration. Mr. Cavis in 1876 was appointed postmaster and held the office until 1889, the last term through the Cleveland administration. He was postmaster under four presidents—Harrison, Garfield, Arthur and Cleveland. Mr. Cavis also served one term as judge of this county, and for twenty years he was a member of the Congregational Church and took an active part in church work. Throughout his San Joaquin life he was a campaign speaker and made no statements unless he believed them true. Hence his speeches carried great weight. As a lawyer he took no cases where he believed his client in the wrong, and as a judge so sympathetic was he, in condemning a murderer to be hanged one day, the tears rolled down his cheeks.—January 5, 1892.

Yesterday afternoon the board of police and fire commissioners held a meeting and adopted the following resolution: "Whereas, large bodies of people are congregating in this city in connection with the railroad strike, and a break is liable to ensue and the force of regular police would be inadequate to quell the trouble and protect life and property; therefore be it Resolved, that L. C. Mowry, O. B. Harvey, S. L. Lawrence, J. C. Sullivan, George A.

Black, Thorn McCloud, W. H. Woodbridge, L. M. McLaren, W. R. William, A. G. Payne, J. W. Webb and F. E. Butterfield be appointed special policemen, with compensation fixed at $2.50 per day."—July 4, 1894. (This refers to the railroad strike only.)

The new steamer recently built by C. M. Small on the north bank of Mormon Channel, 400 tons carrying weight, is now at the wharf loading with wheat for San Francisco. She is in command of T. C. Walker and is named Alice Garratt, after a daughter of William T. Garratt of San Francisco, one of the stockholders.—August 2, 1873.

The Stockton Dramatic Club organized last Saturday evening and elected the following officers: Louis B. Noble, president; J. A. Hosmer, vice-president; C. H. Platt, secretary, and Walter B. Starbird, stage manager; committee on plays, J. E. Budd, J. H. Hosmer and W. B. Starbird. The following correspondence was received and answered: "Gentlemen, would it not be possible for you to give a dramatic entertainment for the benefit of the Kansas sufferers. Our citizens would support it liberally. Signed: J. D. Peters, A. W. Simpson, H. H. Hewlett, L. M. Cutting and others." In response: "We will be most happy to play at any time for a charitable object and will name Monday, March 6, 1875, as the date for the Kansas sufferers. We will then present the play of 'Caste,' followed by the laughable farce of 'Toddlers.'"—February 22, 1875.

The concert and ball given in Mozart hall last evening was the most brilliant affair ever given in this city. The ball was preceded by a concert by the Fourth U. S. Artillery band of San Francisco, and some of the leading vocalists of the state, among them Mrs. R. K. Marriner, Walter C. Campbell and S. D. Mayer, the famous organist. The elite of Stockton were present. Among them were noticed Mrs. W. A. Simpson, N. M. Orr, Dr. Clark, George E. McKensie, Otis Perrine, Dr. J. M. Kelsey, Wm. Bivens, the Misses Julia Weber, Alice Brown, Kittie Henderson and Mary Marshall.—December 12, 1873.

A hurricane and tornado accompanied by hail and a heavy rain passed over Milton yesterday at 1:15 o'clock. The hurricane was only eighty yards in width, lasted only a few minutes, but it almost destroyed the town. A dwelling and new blacksmith shop belonging to John Grider was blown to pieces. A. D. Fox's new hall was blown off of its foundation. John's hay barn was completely demolished. The new schoolhouse was blown eight feet away. Flying timbers filled the air, roofs were blown off and several persons severely injured.—December 17, 1873.

Saturday evening last, Chas. Dohrmann, of the firm of Dohrmann & Company, grocers, and Miss Pauline Wetzlar, assistant teacher in the Stockton Seminary, were married at the First Presbyterian Church by the Rev. E. S. Ely. The edifice was crowded with the friends of the happy couple.—June 23, 1870.

The Odd Fellows will soon begin the erection of a handsome three-story brick building on the corner of Main and Hunter streets, the estimated cost being $45,000. The building in size will be 67x96 feet and the foundation walls 43 inches in thickness on solid hardpan. The basement will be seven feet in height, the lower story fifteen feet, the second story fourteen feet and the third story twenty feet. The members expect to dedicate their new building the latter part of next year.—August 3, 1867.

Yesterday in Odd Fellows' hall we were shown eight magnificent new chairs manufactured in San Francisco to order at a cost of fifty dollars each. They are of the Queen Elizabeth style of construction, manufactured of straight grained Eastern oak, and upholstered in plush, in colors suitable to each station.—October 2, 1865.

Joseph D. Peters will soon erect a handsome two-story residence on Sutter Street, near Lindsay. It will be complete in every particular and add materially to the appearance of that aristocratic locality.—Sept. 4, 1861.

Governor Irwin has appointed William H. Hall, a son of John B. Hall, as state engineer, with a salary of $6,000 per year. Mr. Hall, whose well-known reputation as an engineer has been gained by years of service, is a young man reared in Stockton and educated in our public schools. Stockton has sent forth three famous engineers—William Hammond Hall, John Hays Hammond and Ewald Grunsky. All three were reared in Stockton and attended our public schools.—April 12, 1876.

Dr. W. P. Tilden, who was a hotheaded Union man, fired a salute of thirty-four guns because of the news that North Carolina has refused to secede from the Union. The secessionists were angry that a state official should publicly rejoice, and one of the inquired, "Has the firing of a cannon and the raising of flags a tendency to cure insanity?" Tilden replied: "While injurious to none of the cases under by treatment, it is beneficial to some classes of insanity, the victims of which are extremely sensitive to every expression of patriotism, whether by the firing of cannon or the raising of flags. This class is peculiar to the United States and in the clinic of medicine is known as secessia." It was Dr. Tilden who first introduced the custom of giving dances for the most insane patients, a custom continued for several years, as they were helpful to many of the unfortunates.—November 22, 1861.

Mr. Garnett, who is farming on the ranch of Dr. F. W. Todd on Roberts Island, expects to sow the entire 262 acres to barley. When he began work it was virgin soil, nothing but tules, but he succeeded in plowing some 200 acres, for which he receives $5 per acre. He has been plowing under green tules ten feet in height.—November 7, 1878.

Yesterday morning Samuel L. Terry died at his father's home of a complication of diseases. Mr. Terry was one of the brightest young lawyers in California. Born in this city in 1855, he attended the public schools, studied law with his father and received his license to practice at the age of twenty-one years. In 1822 he was elected city attorney, accepting the office only two days before election. He was a past president of the Native Sons, an Odd Fellow and a Mason, and in 1880 was elected as the highest state officer of the Knights of Pythias. He was one of the most popular young men of the community and his loss will be deeply felt.—April 2, 1885.

The sale of the postoffice site was completed yesterday, when United States District Attorney William M. Garber paid to J. M. McCarty $17,500. This was all that the Government would allow for the property, the citizens being compelled to make up the difference—$4,000. A number of lots were purchased and deeds for their sale were recorded yesterday. The property, 121 by 124 feet, was purchased from Mrs. Elizabeth Slaughter, Matthew and Margaret McCarty, James and Ida White, and Clara and James C. Gage. The full amount paid was $21,490. Of this amount Mrs. Slaughter received $10,750, Mr. McCarty and wife $4,875, J. M. White and wife $3,428, and Clara Gage $2,437.—July 27, 1892.

A wealthy drunk was picked up in the bowling alley last Monday by Officer Myers, and on being locked up $150 in money and $450 in gold dust was found on him. He was captured none too soon for the safety of his coin.—July 29, 1858.

A large number of the friends of Henry A. Moore and wife assembled at their residence Saturday evening to assist in celebrating the twenty-fifth anniversary of their wedding. The worthy couple, with their five children standing around them, looked as happy as when twenty-five years ago they stood at the altar in Boswell, Ark. Their wedding trip was a six months' voyage across the plains. Mrs. Moore is a sister of John R. and Charles Williams, Mrs. Debnam and Mrs. Edward Moore.—February 26, 1878.

Workmen are now engaged in erecting electric towers in different parts of the city. The masts are 100 feet in height and one will be placed on Weber Point, one at the corner of Fremont and Hunter Streets, another at the southwest corner of Washington Square.—March 21, 1888.

The Board of Supervisors yesterday let the contract to remove the remains in the county hospital cemetery to Otto Von Detten, fixing his bond at $500. He was the lowest bidder and will receive for removing the county dead, consisting of bones only $1.74 each; for the partly decomposed bodies $2.97, for the remains of smallpox patients $5 each, and for those who died of diphtheria $3.97.—January 4, 1894.

The Young People's Literary Society of the Congregational Church presented the play "Caste" in the theater last week to a crowded house. All of the players did remarkably well, especially Flora Baker and Esther Eccles and Lulu Hogan as "Polly," the servant. Miss Baker has never appeared before on the stage and Miss Hogan, always good in lively parts, reminds us of the piquant Alice Harrison of the California theater. The farce of "Box & Cox" closed the performance.—May 10, 1878.

Weber's Garden is one of the most attractive places in Stockton. It is situated in front of the steamboat landing on the peninsula and to make it secure, Captain Weber has spent thousands of dollars in bulkheading the banks of the channel. In a high enclosure is his private garden and residence. Surrounding this is a public garden open to visitors. This garden has cost Captain Weber thousands of dollars. It is our only park.—August 26, 1861.

Henry H. Hewlett has sold the property on the northwest corner of Main and Hunter Streets to L. and A. Meyer of San Francisco. The lot, 20 by 50 feet, was sold for $16,000. The Meyers intend to buy adjoining property, it is said, and erect a fine brick building. The National Bank, which now occupies the corner, will be moved in September to the Yosemite Building.—July 13, 1892.

Schuyler Colfax will arrive this afternoon by stage from Mariposa, and he will be met at the Agricultural Society's grounds by Mayor Gray, the Common Council, Odd Fellows and citizens, and escorted into town. This evening he will speak in Agricultural hall on the Pacific railroad, after which he will visit Charity lodge of Odd Fellows in social session and confer the degree of Rebekah, Mr. Colfax being the creator of this degree on August 15, 1865.—May 20, 1868.

The rat killing pit at Fred Gerlach's U & I saloon on Center Street was the scene of considerable commotion last evening. About fifty men had gathered to see lively young dogs kill rats. A little later two Mexican women well filled with seltzer water went into one of the boxes and called for liquor. One was armed with a revolver, and just as the rat killing became most exciting the woman in some manner accidentally fired the revolver. In about two minutes the back room was cleared, the men rushing and tumbling over each other trying to get into the open. They believed the police were after them and in the scramble one of the big glasses in the transom was smashed into a thousand pieces. The police were called, not to arrest the men, but the Mexican woman.—October 22, 1893.

Carriages were flying about the city at all hours last night, carrying well dressed ladies and their guest to and from the leap year ball in Masonic hall. It was a very select affair, consisting only of twenty-four couples, and was greatly enjoyed by the merry dancers and about 100 invited guests. The Misses Ackersley, Kelsey and Baggs furnished the favors, and the German was led by Misses Elliot and Jackson. The young ladies called for their guests and partners in carriages and through the evening acted as attendants and managers of affairs. Among those who took part were the Misses Elliot, Cutting, Kelsey, Trahern, Simpson, Tully, Sharp, Taylor, Creanor, Debnam, Littlehale, Bours and Mrs. H. S. Smith. The gentlemen present were Ralph and Frank Lane, Bert Moore, George Sperry, George Wilhoit, Charles Hutchinson, Robert Reid, Frank West, W. G. Starbird, H. W. Earle, Frank Stewart, J. D. Young, William Bours, Eugene Grunsky, Eugene Wilhoit and Theodore Elliott.—January 3, 1888.

Under the direction of the Philomathean Society, a spelling match, in which teachers, pupils and citizens took part, was held in Mozart hall last evening. Over 400 persons were present to witness the contest, the first prize, $10 in coin, was won by B. F. Bagley, a member of the society and a school trustee. The second prize, a $10 order for photographs from J. P. Spooner, was won by Miss Minnie Harkness, the first high school pupil to graduate at the age of seventeen years. Thomas Louttit took third prize, a Webster dictionary.—April 10, 1875.

A reception was tendered the Stanford Glee club by Mrs. Phil B. Fraser and her daughter, Mary, yesterday afternoon from two until five o'clock. Mrs. Fraser was assisted in receiving by Mrs. David S. Rosenbaum, Mrs. Bert C. Moore, Mrs. Ralph P. Lane and Misses Hart and Dudley. The spacious rooms were beautifully decorated with smilax, cut flowers and evergreens.—April 1, 1894.

The old town clock, which so faithfully measures the lapse of time and rings the hours on the city hall bell, was imported to this city in 1867 by Charles Hass, the jeweler. He purchased the clock in Boston and it was exhibited in the agricultural fair that year. James Littlehale, by his own exertions, then succeeded in getting $500 in subscription for the purchase of the clock, the city and county officials appropriating a like amount, $1000 in all. A cupola and clock tower were then erected upon the court house by James Brown (father-in-law of Supervisor Tretheway) and the clock first began timing the hours in October, 1868.—April 12, 1880.

The Presbyterian Church was filled to the doors last evening, it being the occasion of a lecture by the Rev. Robert McKensie on "The Abiding Elements in Scottish Character." The lecture was delivered for the benefit of the Caledonian Society, and during the evening Miss Maggie Hubbard, the organist, played several Scottish songs dear to every son of Scotland, among them being "The March of the Comarin Men," "The Campbells are Coming," and "Bonny Prince Charley," with pleasing effect. Mrs. Gertie Starbird sang several Scottish songs and charmed the audience with her magnificent voice. Joseph Fye introduced the lecturer, who gave a most interesting account of the Scots, land and people.—May 24, 1879.

There is considerable complaint among the teachers of the public schools regarding their contracts. The school trustees bind the teachers to teach one year, while there is no contract compelling the board to keep the teacher any length of time. The contract has been signed by many teachers reluctantly, as several young who hoped to get married during the year believe they will have to teach the entire school term.—July 7, 1894.

The Forefathers' festival was celebrated Saturday evening in the parlors of the Congregational Church, it being an annual observance of the landing of the Pilgrim Fathers, December 20, 1620. Fully 200 members of the church sat down to an inviting feast of salads, mince and pumpkin pie, coffee, etc. The toastmaster, C. W. Norton, first called on the Rev. Irving Lovejoy to respond to the toast, "The Pilgrim Fathers." Other toasts were: "The Congregational Idea in Other Churches," Rev. Thomas A. Boyner; "The Pilgrims and the Sunday School," R. W. Drury; "Reminiscences of Our Church," Mrs. Hannah Thresher; "The New Building," Rev. R. H. Sink; vocal selections were rendered by Frankie Brown, Tom Kenyon and Annie Dewey.—December 12, 1902.

Last evening Walter R. Henderson, at the residence of his parents on Hunter Street, gave one of the swellest parties of the season. The preparations made to insure the pleasure of the guests were elaborately and carefully arranged. The floor of the north and south parlors were covered with canvas, and the handsome chandeliers and walls were decorated with flowers and evergreens, the artistic work of Dr. Henderson's talented daughter Ella. The guests all appeared on the floor in dominoes and after the twelve dances unmasked. During the evening the dining room was open to the guests and bountifully supplied tables were spread with refreshments of all kinds. Over sixty couples were present and among the dominoes we noticed Mrs. Henderson in brocaded satin with point lace, diamond ornaments; Ella Henderson, in garnet plush and silk, trimmings of lace and natural flowers; Delia Wolf in embroidered black velvet and satin, diamonds; Emma Gerlach, nun's veiling and satin, trimmings of Spanish lace; Gertie Biven, pink silk, satin trimmings; Belle Davis, pink domino, diamonds; Nellie Blossom, pink domino, diamonds; Mrs. Chas. J. Hass, white silk, embroidered skirt, pink crepe trimmings of satin and Spanish lace, diamonds; Susie Chase, pink domino; May Goodell, pink domino; Abbie Gray, nun's veiling, Spanish lace trimmings, diamonds; Hannah Gray, light blue silk, lace trimmings, diamonds; Sophia Belding, cardinal satin with gray silk, diamonds; Mamie Huggins, cream colored moire silk, lace trimmings, with natural flowers; Lottie Weaver, white grenadine over black with natural flowers; Bessie Trahern, white satin and plush, lace overdress, diamonds; Carrie Parsons, garnet plush and brocaded satin, with flowers.—February 6, 1883.

The San Joaquin Medical Society held its annual meeting July 28 at the residence of Dr. W. R. Langdon, corner of American and Fremont Streets, and Dr. Elias A. Stockton was elected president; Charles A. Ruggles, vice-president; W. R. Langdon, second vice-president; Samuel Langdon, George A. Shurtleff and A. T. Hudson, censors, and F. W. Todd, secretary and treasurer.—August 1, 1878.

A. J. Hahn has purchased the interests of his sister, Mrs. Julia Brueck, in the Commercial Hotel and hereafter it will be personally conducted by him. At that time, 1894, the hotel was doing a fine business and the principal boarding patrons were the mechanics who worked in the vicinity. At the time I was driving the street car mules on the San Joaquin Street line and I took dinner in the hotel. There were three long tables and all the food except tea and coffee was placed on the table before the dinner bell rang. You should see the boarders tackle the food! And eat, well some of them had no manners. Pies, equally distant apart, were cut into four pieces and set upon the table. Some of the boarders would grab half a pie. I know, I like pie.—October 16, 1894.

A large crowd collected upon the wharf yesterday to witness the departure of the two splendid steamers, the Sophie McLane and the S. B. Wheeler, as they were about to try their respective capacity for speed. A gallant cheer arose from the spectators as they left, and there was great excitement as thousands of dollars have been bet on the results.—Aug. 15, 1851.

A few days since Henry Tinkham, the butcher, lost a number of fat sheep in a rather peculiar manner. He had nearly 500 sheep in a corral on the Sam Miller ranch, Mariposa road. During the night quite a large number escaped from the corral and entering adjoining wheat field began eating the green wheat. Before they were discovered they had eaten so much of the wheat that some of them died from overeating.—May 6, 1870.

A. S. Rider, who was one of Stockton's best known citizens, passed away yesterday. He was born in New York in 1830 and died in his sixtieth year. On August 21, 1851, he and James C. Gage started for California and arrived October 8. Mr. Rider went into the draying business in partnership with Jerome Meyers. In 1852 Mr. Gage bought out Meyers and the two young men continued in partnership for several years. They went into the sheep and cattle business in 1857, pasturing their stock where nows lies Banta. Later Mr. Rider engaged in the livery business, being the pioneer hackman of the city. In 1861, October 11, he married Miss Sarah McLellan, whose mother kept the Crescent Hotel. In 1853, the date of the organization of the company, he joined Eureka No. 2 and remained in active service eight years. For nearly thirty years he led the parade for the exempts.—March 9, 1890.

The head of the notorious bandit Joaquin Murietta, cut off by Harry Love and his companions, and afterwards exhibited throughout the county, in a glass jar preserved in spirits, was levied upon the other day by the sheriff and sold to a fool bidder for $11.—June 4, 1856.

Last Saturday afternoon at 2:30, as several hundred persons gathered on the El Dorado Street bridge to see the working of a new pump, the boiler of the old threshing engine exploded, scattering death and destruction in every direction. In a moment the street was strewn with horribly mutilated bodies and with wounded and disfigured victims. Fifteen were instantly killed and many badly wounded. Among those instantly killed were Robert Johnson, father of R. B. Johnson; James Curry, a pioneer blacksmith; W. C. Adcraft, Michael Crowell, Charles Creanor, son of Judge Creanor; S. B. Clowes, G. W. Felts, William Allen, James Cosgrove, H. B. Bishop, a student; John M. Kirkpatrick, grain and hay dealer; M. E. Folsom, E. R. Avery, the engineer; Foo Lee, and Arthur Tinkham. Among the wounded were Eyman Barbour, William Keyes, Charles Harris, H. Brown, Frank Coburn, Nicola Milco, Alexander Gall, Charles Williams and J. M. Harry. Immediately all of the flags were pulled down to half mast and fire and church bells tolled the sad news. The following day the city was clad in mourning and everywhere funeral processions were seen burying the dead.—February 27, 1879.

The most important event of the present theatrical season will be the opening of the Yosemite Theater on Tuesday evening, July 12, and the reappearance of Charles Frohman's stock company of New York, in the industrial play, "The Lost Paradise." The auction sale for choice of seats in the Yosemite Theater was held last evening in Masonic hall. J. H. Barth was the auctioneer and the choice of box seats was first sold. The premium was in addition to the regular prices. The lower boxes and loges sold at $10 each, and the upper at $8.50 each. The orchestra and the three front rows in the dress circle sold for $1.50 each, and the remaining seats at $1 and 75 cents. H. C. Shaw started the box sales at $5, it was run up to $20 by George Sperry and was sold to Shaw at $22.50. He selected the second box from the stage on the right hand side. George Sperry took the loge on the left hand side for $10; James M. Littlehale, loge for two, right hand, $10; Frank D. Cobb and J. M. Kile, loge No. 3 left and No. 4 right hand, $13 each. George Wolf paid $8 for box G, and Arthur Levensky $7 for box E. C. E. Owens and Dave Rosenbaum $5.50 each for choice of seats. There were 295 seats sold at a premium of $295. This, together with the boxes, made a total premium of $374.—July 8, 1892.

An invitation is extended to all persons interested in the movement for the establishment of a public coffee house, under the management of the W. C. T. U. to attend a meeting in the Central Methodist Church tomorrow evening. They have rented the store on Main Street near El Dorado formerly occupied by Elliott & Beigle, and are now fitting it up. They propose to sell coffee and cake at cost.—March 8, 1884.

Yesterday afternoon about 4 o'clock an alarm of fire was heard and as the old fire bell began clanging a heavy black column of smoke was seen in the vicinity of Simpson & Gray's lumber yard. It was soon learned that the Sperry flour mills were in flames, and in a remarkably short space of time the firemen were upon the ground. The Weber, taking water from the channel, was the first to play upon the fire, it being its month to keep up steam. It took the Eureka several minutes to get up steam from its cold boiler, and set at the cistern at the corner of Main and Commerce Streets, it soon pumped it dry and was obliged to go to the channel for water. The Old Betsey, by Chief Israel Rolf's order, was also put into service. The fire, which it is supposed started from spontaneous combustion in the second story, soon enveloped the entire building, and the mill was soon a seething furnace of heat.

After raging about three hours the east wall fell with a crash and the mill was in ruin. The four-story building was erected in 1852 for a flour mill, but it proved a losing speculation. It remained idle for many years, but in the '70s it was purchased by the Sperry Flour Company and remodeled and refitted with the latest improved machinery, with a capacity of 600 barrels of flour per day. The total loss, including the dwellings of Edward Hickman and John Milan, is about $200,000, partly covered by insurance.—April 3, 1882.

Died in this city, January 17, 1864, Clotilde, wife of Charles Grunsky. She was the mother of Ewald and Lottie Grunsky, two of the first high school graduates, the former now of national fame as an engineer, the latter widely known as a public school teacher.

As Lieutenant Merriam of the 1st California Cavalry was passing the Cumberland Presbyterian Church on Sunday last he noticed a small secession flag flying from one of the back windows. The rebel flag has two red and one white stripe and seven stars in a field of blue. The lieutenant immediately captured the flag and brought it to this office. Secessionists, even though they be ministers, should be very careful about waving disloyal flags in a loyal community. There might be trouble.—October 26, 1863.

Assessor C. O. Burton reported the value of city property $1,130,965; improvements $775,700. The total valuation was placed at $2,835,407, an increase over previous year of $246,678. Mayor Buffington in his inaugural address gave the revenue of the city as follows: From taxes, $48,000; licenses $6,000; harbor master $17,000; rent of city property $5,000; fire department $2,000; hospital, streets and wharves $16,000; schools $7,000; interest $20,000; contingent $10,000. There was a balance of $23,000, which he hoped would be used in the liquidation of the debt. The second expense was very heavy, the committee paying $1,250 a year for two rooms in the McNish building for the boys' school. The monthly expense of the four schools, averaging fifty pupils to each school was $525.—March 5, 1854.

At the close of banking hours Saturday $1,188 had been received for the benefit of the yellow fever sufferers of the South. With various sums yet to be collected, the amount will probably reach $2,000. The following request was sent to the Dramatic Club: "Deeming it to be the duty of the citizens to assist in providing funds for the victims of the yellow fever scourge of the South, we request you to give a series of entertainments for the benefit of the fund. (Signed) Fifty Citizens." In compliance with the request the club will produce on the evening of September 20 and 21 the two famous dramas, "The Octoroon," and "Caste." The following persons will appear in "The Octoroon"; George Peyton, a planter, John E. Budd; Salem Scudder, a Yankee, W. B. Starbird; Jacob McClosky, a shyster lawyer, James H. Budd; Pete, the negro, George E. McStay; Wahnotee, an Indian, William M. Gibson; Paul, a yellow boy, Miss Ella Block; Colonel Sunnyside, a planter, M. S. Thresher; Captain Ratts, Willis Wilkins; La Toche, Lincoln Ruggles; Sambo, George Young; Zoe, the Octoroon, Louise Cahill of San Francisco; Dora Sunnyside, Minnie Clifford; Mrs. Peyton, Mrs. M. S. Thresher; Dido, the cook, George Young. The orchestra of eight pieces will be under the direction of Emile Dreyfous.—September 4, 1878.

The body of Samuel Clarke, the engineer who was drowned by the derailing of the locomotive on the trestle work in Yolo County, was brought here last evening and taken to the residence of his brother, Dr. F. R. Clarke. The funeral will be held this afternoon at the residence, 215 Oak Street. The Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers and the Odd Fellows will attend the funeral. Mr. Clarke was sixty years of age and commenced work on the Sacramento division of the Central Pacific in 1866. In 1892 he wrote a letter to the officers, stating that during his twenty-one years' service he had covered a distance of 1,000,051 miles with only two accidents. He was selected by the Brotherhood as their representative pallbearer at Senator Stanford's funeral.—July 14, 1894.

On Saturday last, while speeding his mule on Main street at the rapid gait of three miles per hour, one of the drivers of the street car line stopped his car to purchase some candy. A short distance from the store he again checked his speed, to pump a drink of water and wash down the candy. The five passengers on board were much amused at the coolness of the driver.—August 6, 1883.

A game of baseball was played yesterday on the green in the northern part of the city near Dr. R. W. Henderson's residence. About forty young men took part, sides being chosen with Mr. Nelson, the school teacher, and Mr. Denning as chiefs. An interesting game of ten innings was played.—January 16, 1867.

A workman while digging the foundation for the Hickman building, corner of Weber Avenue and Levee, at a depth of five feet below the surface, unearthed a Mexican half dollar bearing the date 1723. The question is, how did it get there? The rare and valuable coin was sold to Perk Sampson of the Eureka saloon for three dollars.—January 20, 1867.

The property situated at the corner of Main and Center Streets and known as the Chestnutwood & Moore property, was sold at administrator's sale some time ago to Henry Cowell, the wealthy Santa Cruz lime dealer, for $6,250. The property was owned by George Crossmore, deceased. When the sale came up for confirmation by the court, yesterday, David S. Rosenbaum raised the bid to $9,120, and it was sold to him. The lot, 60x100 feet, is covered by a two-story brick building.—October 3, 1894.

All of the members of the Royal Arch Masons who could be found yesterday were served with summons to answer the suit of Powell S. Lawson in Sacramento to prevent his expulsion from that branch of Masonry. Lawson for over thirty years has been a Royal Arch Mason, and for twenty-five years a Knight Templar. He is a man of wealth and an ex-president of the Sacramento pioneers. The suit is one of many phases of the conflict which has arisen in many Masonic jurisdictions over the so-called Scottish Rite. Lawson is a member of the consistory that is said to be looked upon by Knights Templar as clandestine, inasmuch as it confers twenty-six degrees, including that of the Templar, without asking the local commandery of the order. In some places these consistories confer the twenty-nine degrees from "ancient craft" or "blue lodge" to the thirty-second degree. The charge against Lawson is the violation of an unwritten but well understood law against soliciting persons to enter the Masonic body and he is charged with soliciting a Royal Arch Mason to enter the Scottish Rite consistory of which he is a member. The meat of the conflict in most cases is the reaching out of consistory workers in the Scottish Rite, below the Knights Templar instead of requiring the candidate to become a Knight, a prerequisite to admission to the higher degrees, sometimes called "ineffable." The short cut was at one time so cheap in Chicago that a Master Mason could get the twenty-nine extra degrees at an expense of ten dollars to twenty dollars, while to go through the intermediate degrees would have cost $100.—August 7, 1898.

The magnificent pipe organ in the Central Methodist Episcopal Church was heard in all of its beautiful combinations last evening when Professor Carl of New York gave a recital. The grand tones of the instrument were new to many persons who had not previously heard it. The professor thoughtfully introduced some old-time melodies to interest the people who love the songs of their childhood days. The ladies' trio by Clara Lefflers, Albertina Parker and Mrs. Bender was heartily applauded and the instrumental quartet comprising Professor Steele, John Patterson, Theodore Elliott and Sam Frankenheimer was well received.—September 4, 1895.

Died suddenly at the residence of his daughter, Mrs. George Gray, Dr. Joseph Hammond, age seventy-eight years. Doctor Hammond was one of Stockton's pioneers. He arrived in the city in 1850. Six months previous he shipped to California a frame house by the way of Cape Horn, and sailed a few days later. By coincident he and the vessel with the frame house entered the Golden Gate the same day. The house, loaded on a scow, was towed up the San Joaquin River to San Joaquin City, where it was put up. A year later the house was removed to Stockton, and later sold to O. P. F. Kallenbach, a Stockton pressman.—January 2, 1870.

David S. Terry, one of our most prominent citizens, is soon to visit the Atlantic States. Mr. Terry came with the first settlers to Stockton and by his integrity and ability as a lawyer has succeeded in laying the foundation for a large fortune.—September 11, 1852.

"Yesterday D. S. Terry, one of our most valuable citizens, returned, bringing with him a wife, a most valuable acquisition to society in San Joaquin County.." (Little thought Mrs. Terry that in less than five years she and her husband would be the center of the most exciting event in California, and that thirty-five years later Sarah Althea Hill would supplant her place in her husband's love.)—February 22, 1853.

The comet, that splendid vision of the heavens, never before appeared so brilliant as last evening. It was truly magnificent, and doubly discounts all the fireworks shows ever seen. It is wandering to the southwest and it is said to be 50,000,000 miles from us.—October 5, 1858.

Some 200 of the friends of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Hale gathered at their residence on California Street, Tuesday evening, May 29, to celebrate the twentieth anniversary of their wedding. The presents were numerous and beautiful, the most costly being a 150 piece china set which was presented by friends. The twain were again united by H. T. Dorrance, and letters of congratulations were received from the Rev. E. L. Rexford, Unitarian minister in San Francisco, and from Mrs. Hale's former pastor, J. H. Farnsworth, of New Bedford, Mass. The gift of Mrs. Pickering from Rockport, Mass., was a poem, beautiful in thought and sentiment, of which the following was the first verse:

There is a holy tie that binds
Two loving hearts in one:
Through weal and woe, in storm and calm,
Till life's long race is run.
This holy tie ordained of heaven,
And sanctified below,
United two fond, faithful hearts
Twice ten long years ago.

Engrd by Campbell Brothers for Historic Record Co.

Berry Holt

BIOGRAPHICAL

BENJAMIN HOLT.—Linked indissolubly with the history of Stockton, the name of Benjamin Holt, inventor, industrial genius, loyal citizen and friend, will occupy forever a distinctive place in the annals of the city, for there has been no more loyal supporter of her fair name than he, none more devoted to her welfare, and, as the builder of Stockton's greatest industrial enterprise, no one more prominently or practically connected with her development and up-building. His genius and industry not only enriched the community, but carried its name across the mountains and the valleys and the seas, aiding in lifting the hard burdens of agriculture in the far places of the earth, and greatest of all, contributing at a crucial moment in the struggle of the Allies a new, unheard-of weapon of warfare that brought terror to the hearts of the enemy. A record of the salient points of his career, illustrating the steps taken in his onward and upward march to attainment, should, and undoubtedly will, prove a source of inspiration to the ambitious men of the present generation whose aspirations lie along lines of a nature more or less similar to those pursued by Mr. Holt, preceding the period since which his position in the inventive and manufacturing world has been assured.

A native of the Granite State, so many of whose sons have gone forth as leaders in the professional and commercial life of the nation, Benjamin Holt was born in Merrimack County, N. H., on January 1, 1849, the seventh of eleven children born to William K. and Harriet Parker Holt. The public schools in the neighborhood of his boyhood home furnished his early education, supplemented by a course of study at an academy at Tilton, N. H., and later, at a Baptist institution of learning at New London, Conn. In 1868, with his brothers, W. Harrison, A. Frank and Charles H. Holt, Benjamin Holt began the manufacture of wagon spokes and hubs, and in 1873, he established his plant at Concord, N. H., greatly enlarging its capacity and adding to its output the manufacture of felloes, wheels, bodies and running gears. Here he continued in business for ten years, building up an extensive trade and becoming well known in commercial and manufacturing circles throughout the East.

His brother, Charles H. Holt, had come to San Francisco, Cal., in the early days and established a wholesale hardwood and wheel business. In this enterprise he was joined in 1871 by William Harrison Holt, A. Frank Holt and Benjamin Holt, although the latter did not come to California until 1883, when he had disposed of his interests at Concord, N. H. This year, 1883, marked the beginning of this great industry at Stockton, as at this time he and Charles H. Holt there took up the manufacture of wheels and wagon material under the name of The Stockton Wheel Company. In 1892 the name of the firm was changed to its present one—The Holt Manufacturing Company. Throughout the entire history of the Holt Company, Benjamin Holt was the mechanical head of the company and its president since its incorporation in 1892. It was he who perfected the combined harvesters which greatly reduced the cost and labor of harvesting grain by combining the operations of cutting, threshing and cleaning. It was he who invented the self-propelled combined harvester, a combination of tractor and harvester. It was he who invented the "caterpillar" tractor, which proved the only solution of the problem of traction on soft and sandy places and over rough ground. The British tank, which struck such terror in the ranks of the German armies when it first appeared on the battle line in France, was founded directly upon the principle of this invention. During the campaign in Belgium, at one of the most trying periods in the history of the Allies, General E. D. Swinton, of the British army, saw one of Holt's caterpillars in action, and from the underlying principle of its traction conceived the idea of the fighting tank, and during the war General Swinton came all the way to Stockton to meet Benjamin Holt, the inventor, to pay tribute to his inventive genius and to tell the story of the origin of the tank. More than 100 inventions cover his achievements in the line of industry, and they have been material factors in revolutionizing methods in agriculture, not alone in the cultivation of vast additional areas, but in the solution of the labor problems of the farmer through the reduction of the manual labor necessary, particularly in the busy harvest season. Two large factories comprise the Holt industry; one at Peoria, Ill., and the Stockton plant.

In 1890 Mr. Holt was married to Miss Anna Brown, a daughter of the well-known '49er, pioneer, miner, and later San Joaquin County farmer, the late Benjamin E. Brown of Stockton. Mr. and Mrs. Benjamin Holt became the parents of the following children: Alfred B. Holt, of Peoria, Ill.; William Knox Holt, of Stockton; Mrs. Anne Holt Atherton, wife of Judge Warren Atherton, of Stockton; Edison Ames Holt, of Stockton; and Benjamin Deau Holt, of Peoria. Mrs. Benjamin Holt, the widowed mother, continues to reside at 548 East Park Street, Stockton, loved and respected by all.

While Mr. Holt had been in failing health for about a month, death was not believed to be imminent, so that when the end came suddenly on December 5, 1920, at St. Joseph's Home, it came with a shock to the entire community. The mind of the great inventor was clear and active to the last, and one of his last requests is said to have been for information concerning progress upon an experimental machine in course of development at the plant.

Thoroughly democratic, Benjamin Holt moved about his great plant generally in his shirt sleeves, calling by their first names employees who had long been associated with him. In one corner of the works a room was set apart for him. This was "Uncle Ben's" experimental room, and here he worked out the mechanical problems of the many devices that will ever be associated with his name. Modest and unassuming to an unusual degree, he shrank from any publicity, and when General Swinton came to Stockton to publicly acknowledge England's debt of gratitude to the inventor—a notable occasion in Stockton's war activities—it was with great difficulty that Mr. Holt was induced to occupy a seat of honor on the platform with the distinguished British officer at the mass meeting held at the auditorium. Fame came to him, but the simple routine of his life was undisturbed; the friends of his early days were still the friends of his choice. He was still Ben Holt—unchanged by the plaudits of the multitude; plain, honest, industrious and true.

CAPT. CHARLES M. WEBER—A record of the life of Captain Weber, through the most important and fruitful years of his activity, might well be called also a history of the city of Stockton, of which he was the founder. The high standing of this place as a business center, as a locality of beautiful homes and prosperous people, may be attributed in no small degree to his early labors, and finally, when he was taken from the scenes of his usefulness, his body was laid to rest in a city of the dead whose site had been donated by him years before and whose artistic surroundings resulted from his cultivated taste and great liberality. As he recounted in his last days the history of his home town, he might well have exclaimed, "All of which I saw and part of which I was." No recital could be made of the early days of Stockton without considerable mention of his identification therewith, and his name is worthy of perpetuation not only in local annals, but also in the annals of the state which he chose for his home.

The birth of Captain Weber occurred in Homburg, Bavaria, Germany, February 16, 1814, during the reign of Emperor Napoleon I. It was the ambition of his father, who was a Protestant minister, that he should be educated for the ministry, and his school life was planned accordingly. He was early sent to the common school in Homburg, and upon his graduation therefrom entered the academy and began the study of ancient languages and French, at the same time receiving several hours private instruction daily, so that he might be prepared for the German universities at the proper age. The failure of his health under this undue mental pressure made it necessary for him to leave the university, where he had every prospect for making a fine record. This change in his plans was the means of turning his attention to the mercantile business, for which he had a natural adaptation, and which proved the entering wedge to his subsequent career in the New World. He had been in business but a short time when his thoughts turned to "the home of the free," and accompanied by a cousin he set out for America in 1836. It had been his intention to proceed up the Mississippi from New Orleans and visit a relative, Judge Hildegarde, at Belleville, Ill., the father of Eugene Hildegarde, professor emeritus of the University of California. The river was blocked with ice and instead he remained in New Orleans, where he secured employment in mercantile pursuits. Yellow fever was at that time very prevalent in the south and Mr. Weber fell a victim to the scourge. After his recovery he went to Texas, and while engaged in military service against the Mexicans he was again taken ill, in 1840, and by the advice of his physician he determined to locate in a cooler climate.

During the spring of 1841, while at St. Louis intending to proceed to Belleville, Ill., Captain Weber read a glowing description of the Pacific Coast written by Dr. John Marsh, a resident of California. The account was so fascinating and alluring that he determined to cross the desert to the coast and accordingly he joined the Bartelson party for the long journey to the West. It was his intention to spend the winter on the coast and then return to the States, but like so many other immigrants, when he fell under the witchery of the genial climate he wished to locate here permanently, and after spending the winter at Sutter's Fort he made no plans for returning to the East. His object in going to Sutter's Fort had been to make the acquaintance of Captain Sutter, to whom he had letters of introduction, and by whom he was employed as overseer during that winter. While there he found a quantity of seeds which had been presented to Captain Sutter as tokens of friendship and good will from William G. Ray, the representative of the Hudson Bay Company, the Russian agent at Bodega and captains of vessels on the coast. These seeds he planted as an experiment and from this was developed the fact that the valleys of the San Joaquin and the Sacramento were capable of becoming a paradise of fruits and flowers. Among the seeds were three varieties of tobacco, various flowers and vegetables, all of which grew and thrived wonderfully in the fertile soil.

It was about this time that Jose Jesus, the celebrated chief, visited the fort and Captain Weber formed his acquaintance. The two became friends, and in after years the chief was able to prove helpful to his comrade. With keen foresight the Captain decided that California eventually would be admitted, in part or whole, into the United States, and therefore he believed investments in land would prove profitable. Visiting San Jose in the spring, he formed a partnership with William Gulnac, and in 1842 they built a flour mill, embarked in the manufacture of shoes, made soap and also sea biscuits. The shoes they made were the first to be made in the entire state. July 14, 1843, Gulnac, who was a Mexican citizen, petitioned Governor Micheltorena in behalf of Captain Weber for a grant of eleven square leagues of land, to be located in the vicinity of French Camp in the San Joaquin Valley. He expressed a preference for the east side of the river, believing that this stream might form the line between Mexico and California in case of a division; another reason for this preference was that the east side was protected by the Hudson Bay Company's trappers. The governor granted Gulnac the tract of land known as the Rancho El Campo de los Franceses, January 13, 1844, and afterward this tract was transferred to Captain Weber. Cattle were herded upon the land and for a time the camp had its headquarters at the present site of Stockton, but later moved nearer to Sutter's Fort for the protection thus afforded. Having met with no success in an attempt to settle the grant, Captain Weber obtained a passport from the alcalde and visited Sutter's Fort for the purpose of making a treaty with Jose Jesus. In this he was successful and their alliance remained unbroken until the death of the chief. The Captain agreed to aid him in case of war between the Americans and native Californians or Mexicans. The chief advised the building of the village at the present site of Stockton and agreed to provide a war party in case protection was necessary from the Indians or Mexicans. During the Micheltorena wars the Captain rendered staunch assistance, joining the native Californians against the Mexicans, and when war was declared between Mexico and the United States he aided the latter and with his characteristic energy organized a cavalry company at San Jose and became its captain. After having made his home in San Jose from 1842 to 1847 he returned to the peninsula and here remained until his death.

CAPT. CHAS. M. WEBER

With prophetic vision Captain Weber saw the possibilities which awaited those willing to take up their abode in the little settlement of Stockton, but men could not see the future as he did, and in spite of the liberal offers which he made they still held back, among other things fearing attacks from the Indians and an outbreak of the small-pox scourge. A writer in the Stockton Times in 1850 says: "Having been a resident of California for many years, and having known Captain Weber for four or five of these, I venture to say there are but few Americans now in this country who have lived here for any length of time, who have not been recipients of favors from this gentleman." There had been a large number of grants given in what is called the San Joaquin district, but none had the hardihood to settle their grants until 1846. It was next to impossible for Weber to get men enough to offer any protection against the Indians, as everybody thought the risk too great for the benefits received. He succeeded in getting a few to settle with him, among whom were B. J. Thompson and Andy Baker, and finally, after losing cattle and horses and paying an extravagant price for labor, he succeeded in establishing a ranch where Stockton now stands."

Concerning the home of Captain Weber, the famous poet and traveler, Bayard Taylor, writes as follows: "We were greatly delighted with our visit to Captain Weber's, who transformed a tract of land between two sloughs into a garden. There is no more delightful villa in existence. A thick hedge, outside of which is a row of semi-tropical trees, surrounds the peninsula. The gate opened into a lofty avenue of trellis work, where the sunshine strikes through branches of amethyst and chrysolite, while on either hand beds of roses fill the air with odor. The house is low but spacious, the woodwork of natural redwood. Vine-covered verandas surround it and every window discloses a vision of plants that would be the glory of any greenhouse on the Atlantic Coast. In Mrs. Weber I found the acquaintance of my former visit. Well I remember the day when, hungry and footsore, I went to the door of her father's house in the valley of the San Jose and found her reading a poem of mine. Her father saddled his horse and rode with me to the top of the mountain, and her own hands prepared the grateful supper and breakfast that gave me strength for the tramp to Monterey. The garden delighted us beyond measure. The walks were waist deep in fuchsias and geraniums, and the pepper trees, with their loose, misty boughs, hailed us as do friends from Athens. A row of Italian cypresses were shooting rapidly above the other boughs in the garden. How they will transform the character of the landscape when their dark obelisks stand in full stature!"

As may be inferred from the above, Captain Weber was a lover of flowers, and indeed, from the time of his early experiences with seeds which were given him by Captain Sutter he never ceased to experiment with very kind of seed or shrub that came under his notice. Many of these he obtained from Japan and Europe, and also from the missions. As an incentive to others to follow his lead in this enterprise he supplied those interested with seeds and shrubs from his own garden, and was especially interested in inculcating the love of nature in the hearts of children. With him, time and money were no object in furthering this cause, and no county fair was complete without his exhibit of fruits, flowers and shrubs. For many years his garden was open at all times to the public.

Meanwhile Captain Weber was aiding the development of Stockton by every means within his power. Every church that applied to him received a donation of land. Land was also given to the city and county, and August 28, 1851, he deeded the public squares, streets and channels to the city. The land occupied by the San Joaquin Catholic cemetery was donated by him and he gave a large portion of the purchase money for the Rural cemetery. In later years he devoted much personal attention to the garden of St. Agnes' academy, which was noted for its beauty. To protect the city from overflow, he superintended the building of a bulkhead on Stanislaus Street and dug a canal on East and North Streets; $30,000 of his money went into the improvement of California Street, and he gave generously to the building up of other avenues. When the natural course of events made the property in the valley valuable, squatters began to give him trouble. The heirs of Gulnac attempted to wrest the land from him and in defending his title he spent vast sums of money, rendering necessary in order to pay for the litigation, the sacrifice of his valuable property in San Francisco. Finally he had the gratification of receiving the incontestable patent signed by President Lincoln. While it was necessary for him to eject squatters for the protection of his title and the title of those to whom he had sold, many of these squatters found in him a staunch and generous friend, who aided them to get a start elsewhere. Besides the property which he owned in San Joaquin County Captain Weber owned a large ranch in Santa Clara County, upon which he engaged extensively in breeding and raising high-grade horses and cattle.

During the Civil War Captain Weber was staunch in his allegiance to the Union cause and exerted a powerful influence in moulding the sentiment of this region. Early in the war he sent to Oregon and bought for a flagstaff a pole 120 feet long. This he planted on an island west of his residence. After every Union victory the stars and stripes could be seen waving in the air and for miles in every direction the sight would tell that Union arms were again victorious. In politics the Captain voted with the Republican party, but he was not a politician and preferred to devote himself to movements for the public good, without respect to political ties or views. When he passed away, May 14, 1881, the people of Stockton regarded his demise as a public loss. A large concourse assembled to pay him the last tribute of respect when the funeral was held, under the auspices of Archbishop Alemany of San Francisco. Up to the day of his death he was in full possession of his faculties and actively interested in all of his various enterprises.

The marriage of Captain Weber united him, November 29, 1850, with Miss Helen Murphy, a member of the celebrated Murphy party of 1844. Three children were born to them, of whom Charles M., Jr., at one time represented Santa Clara County in the state legislature; both he and the younger son, Thomas J., are now deceased. The only daughter, Miss Julia H. Weber, of Stockton, makes her home near the city so indissolubly associated with the life-work of her father and is everywhere honored as a member of an interesting and celebrated pioneer family. Mrs. Weber, who died April 11, 1895, was a daughter of Martin and Mary (Foley) Murphy, the latter an aunt of Bishop John Foley of Detroit and the late Bishop Thomas Foley of Chicago. In temperament Captain Weber was impulsive, though forgiving and large-hearted, was liked by all with whom he came in contact in every walk of life, and he was also highly respected for the high moral principles which actuated him in all he undertook.

JOHN NEWTON WOODS.—Highly honored among the pioneers of San Joaquin County was John Newton Woods, extensive land owner, capitalist, prominent lodge and church member and public-spirited citizen, and his eventful life was one which in every respect commanded the most profound esteem and admiration of all with whom he came in contact. The family of which he was a member became established in America during the Colonial period. An ancestor, Henry Woods, who was born in Virginia, followed the tide of emigration that drifted toward the West, and settled in the wilds of Kentucky, where he was killed by the Indians in 1790. Later the family became pioneers of Ohio, where in Brown County, Johnson Woods, the father of our subject, was born in 1815. During early life he removed to Indiana, where in 1834 he married Miss Louisa M. Eastes. The American progenitor of the family on the paternal side was Rev. Robert Wooster, a native of London, England, born in 1727, who crossed the ocean to the New World and settled at Brownsville, Pa. Renouncing his allegiance to the King of England, he aided the colonies in the War of the Revolution. Afterwards he became one of the earliest settlers of Fayette County, Ind., and officiated as the first minister of the Methodist Church west of the Alleghanies.

It was characteristic of Johnson Woods that he should display in his life the love of pioneer scenes that had been inherited from his ancestors. During 1840 he removed from Indiana to what is now Savannah, Mo., where he built the first house in Andrew County and engaged in trading. When news came of the discovery of gold in California he determined to brave the perils of the unsettled West in an effort to find gold and started on the long journey, arriving at Hangtown on August 1, 1850. Soon after he began to prospect on Woods Creek, which was named for him, and was already meeting with success when he was killed on February 1, 1852, by a former friend whose enmity he had incurred by testimony given against this man in a fraudulent claim case. Surviving him were three sons and two daughters and his wife, who was born in Rush County, Ind., in 1820, and died in Tulare County, Cal., on June 12, 1906, at an advanced age.

John Newton Woods was born in Fayette County, Ind., June 7, 1837, and when fourteen years of age he began to work as a clerk in a general merchandise store at Savannah, Mo., where he gained a practical business knowledge. Five years later he returned to his native state, Indiana, where he spent eighteen months at Knightstown, Henry County, and then came to California via Panama, landing at Stockton December 2, 1857. For a time he made his home with his uncle, Jeremiah H. Woods, the founder of Woodbridge, and in 1858 he bought 320 acres of land, on a portion of which the town of Acampo now stands, and was laid out by him. In 1859 he embarked in the mercantile business as Porch & Woods, but the following year he sold out and went to Virginia City, Nev., to try his luck at mining. On his return to Woodbridge he conducted a business from 1861 to 1863 under the firm name of Woods & Davis, then sold out his interest. In 1864 he sent for his mother and two brothers, Albert and the late E. W. S. Woods, who came hither from the old family homestead in Missouri. At this time he became actively engaged in farming on his ranch at Acampo, enlarging it to 640 acres, and continued there until 1877. With his brother, E. W. S. Woods, he became joint owner of about 8,000 acres in Tulare County, known as the Buzzard Roost ranch and after operating it for some years they sold it and purchased 8,700 acres on Roberts Island, so that they were among the largest landowners in Central California and did much to develop the rich Delta country, albeit suffering heavy losses at different times when the disastrous floods broke through their levees.

From 1877 to 1882 Mr. Woods was manager and secretary of the Grangers Union of Stockton and in 1883-84 was deputy treasurer of San Joaquin County. He was made a Mason in 1858 in Woodbridge Lodge, No. 131, F. & A. M., being the first member initiated, later becoming a member of Stockton Chapter No. 28, R. A. M., and Stockton Commandery No. 8, K. T. He became a 32nd degree Scottish Rite Mason, was a member of the Shrine, the Eastern Star, and was one of the early members of the Stockton Elks. In recollection of his identification with early events in this locality he held membership with the San Joaquin County Pioneers and greatly enjoyed the reunions of these early settlers to whose energy and fortitude the present generation is so greatly indebted. Mr. Woods was prominent in the Democratic party and was an active political worker, representing the local organization in some of the most important conventions and for twenty years or more was a delegate to every state convention. For many years he was a member of the State Central Committee and represented his district as a delegate to the national Democratic convention held in Kansas City in 1900. For five years he was a member of the board of managers of the State Hospital at Stockton, and in this as in all things, he discharged his duties with efficiency and fidelity.

The marriage of Mr. Woods took place on December 22, 1864, and united him with Miss Annie Victoria Farmer, who was born in Greenfield, Mo., January 24, 1843, and came across the plains to California with her parents in 1859. They first settled at Sacramento but later moved to Amador County and it was there that the marriage was solemnized. Two daughters blessed this union: Jessie Lee married the late George E. Wilhoit and sketches of their lives appear elsewhere in this history. Mary L. was Mrs.

John N. Woods

McDonald Douglass, who was born on Washington's birthday, February 22, 1869, and passed away July 4, 1919, her birth and death being on patriotic days. She always showed a keen patriotic spirit and during the late war was an enthusiastic worker for the various Liberty loan and other war drives. During the first Liberty loan drive she sold one million eight hundred thousand dollars of Liberty bonds. The death of Mrs. John N. Woods occurred at Stockton April 7, 1900. Mr. Woods greatly mourned her passing and only survived her until December 4, 1906, when he passed away after a brief illness. A devout Methodist, he was one of the stewards and trustees of Grace Methodist Church at Stockton from 1872 and did much for the furtherance of Christianity. He willed this church its present site, 75x100 feet, on the northwest corner of Channel and Stanislaus streets, and with it a legacy of $25,000 to build a new church as a memorial to his wife, a bond of unusual affection and devotion existing between them. This bequest was faithfully carried out by his two daughters, who followed their father's desires in every particular and also added another $9,000 to complete and furnish the present beautiful church. His life was so clean, so devoted to those whom chance or circumstance drew near him, so benevolent, that it will ever remain worthy of emulation.

MRS. JOHN NEWTON WOODS.—An estimable and greatly loved woman whose long years of residence at Stockton had made her much endeared to a large circle there, was Mrs. John Newton Woods, the wife of one of San Joaquin County's honored pioneers, whose life history is given in a preceding sketch. Mrs. Woods, who was in maidenhood Miss Annie Victoria Farmer, was a native of Missouri, born at Greenfield on January 24, 1843. In 1859 she left her studies at the Moravian Academy, Salem-Winston, N. C., to accompany her parents across the plains to California and though but a young girl at the time she ever carried a vivid picture of that long, toilsome journey of over five months. The family settled at first in Sacramento County, then removed to Amador County, and later took up their residence at Woodbridge, San Joaquin County, where her father became a well-to-do stock raiser and farmer.

In 1864, while the family were residing in Amador County, Miss Farmer was united in marriage with John Newton Woods, and they took up their residence on the larger ranch he had purchased in 1858, the year after he came to California, and part of this place is now the site of Acampo. This remained the family home until 1877, when they took up their residence in Stockton, where Mrs. Woods resided until her death, on April 7, 1900, survived by her devoted husband and two daughters, Mrs. Jessie Lee Wilhoit and Mrs. Mary L. Douglass; the latter passed away on July 4, 1919. Mrs. Woods was one of Stockton's best known women, occupying a leading place in social circles, where she numbered her friends by the hundreds. She was a member of Homo Chapter O. E. S., Stockton. A prominent member of Grace Methodist Church, her many charitable acts and kindly deeds will ever make her memory revered.

ALEXANDER C. OULLAHAN.—A splendid example of what a man may accomplish who follows an intelligent, honorable and persistent course is shown in the career of Alexander C. Oullahan, managing secretary of the Stockton Chamber of Commerce and ex-mayor of the city. A native son, he was born in San Francisco, December 17, 1871, a son of the late pioneer couple, Denis J. and Julia (Baine) Oullahan. The former was a pioneer of the state and served as state treasurer under Governor Stoneman. He became prominent in business circles in the state and died in San Francisco in 1889. The grandfather, Robert Oullahan, was a civil engineer and was attached to the Royal Engineers Corps of the British Army.

Alexander C. was educated in the public schools of Stockton, whither his parents had moved in 1873, and at St. Mary's school of this city; then he took up the study of law and after mastering the rudiments of the profession, became associated with J. D. Peters and thereafter devoted his time and attention to water transportation and the grain industry in this county. Later he represented G. W. McNear, the well-known grain exporter.

On February 1, 1916, Mr. Oullahan was appointed to the office of mayor of Stockton, by the city council, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Mayor R. R. Reibenstein. So well did Mr. Oullahan administer the city's affairs that the following October he was unanimously elected to the responsible position, serving under the charter which he helped to prepare. During his administration the city of Stockton enjoyed the greatest period of growth in its history and many of the big movements looking towards greater prosperity and progress were started. One of the achievements of his administration was the acquisition of Oak Park by the city, consisting of 30.6 acres and formerly known as Goodwater Grove by the old settlers. In 1905, Mr. Oullahan had been elected to serve as a member of the city council and was thus well prepared to discharge the duties of the office of mayor, and it has been repeatedly said that he was one of the best-liked and most popular mayors that Stockton has ever had. He was mayor during the War period and named the exemption board, and was active in all war service.

When the Chamber of Commerce was organized Mr. Oullahan was among the most ardent supporters of the movement and has ever taken a keen interest in all public activities since reaching early manhood. His appointment as managing secretary of this important body was a most wise choice, as he is undoubtedly the right man for the position, both by training and education. His foremost positions in the city places him in the front rank of the upbuilders and builders up of city and county, and Stockton recognizes in him a worthy and honorable citizen. Politically he is a Democrat in national affairs but is so broad-minded that in local matters he considers men before party. Wherever he has been most needed there he is to be found at all times and as managing secretary of the most important body of citizens of Stockton he has continued the good work and been the means of making the city of Stockton known all over the United States. During his busy years Mr. Oullahan has been a contributor to the press of California, and while in the employ of J. D. Peters he published a monthly magazine called the Buzz. Besides his ability as a writer he has distinguished himself as a public speaker. He served seven years as a member of the library board, resigning after being appointed mayor.

When Mr. Oullahan married in San Francisco on Nov. 23, 1897, he chose for his wife Miss Catherine V. River of San Francisco, a lady well qualified to be the helpmate of just such a public man and who shares with him the good will and confidence of their host of friends. They have three children: Leanore J., Alexander C. J., and Catherine M.

EZEKIEL WILLIAMSON SMITH WOODS.—

A model citizen whose life work was direct, straightforward and highly constructive, the late Ezekiel Williamson Smith Woods stood among his fellowmen as one of the biggest and most thorough builders of Central California and whose work added inestimably to the wealth of the community. The development of his lands, which were uncultivated acres when he took hold of them, has thrown many thousands of dollars into this locality, benefiting this section of California generally, in that a tract of its richest land was brought to its generous yield under Mr. Woods' able management. When he passed away on June 22, 1922, he had amassed a fortune appraised at considerably more than a million dollars, the largest estate ever filed in this county.

Mr. Woods, popularly known as "Smithy" Woods, was born in Missouri in May, 1849, in the humble home of his parents who had journeyed from their childhood homes in Indiana to pioneer in the new west. His father was engaged in selling Missouri mules to Southern planters, and his partner, Ezekiel Williamson Smith, asked that his name be given to the new arrival in the Woods family. Mr. Woods always felt that it was an honor to have borne the name of this sturdy frontiersman, who was an uncle of the late James C. Smith, father of Charles B. and Dow Smith, well-known farmers here. Mr. Woods' father came to California in 1850, lured to the land of gold by the stories that reached even the backwoods hamlets, leaving his little family at the home place and planning to have them join him at the mines. He landed in Placerville and went on to Mariposa, where he was killed in a mining trouble. His brother, Jerry Woods, came to California the next year to look up the pioneer, and settled on the land where Woodbridge is located, the village being given his name. He conducted the first ferry over the Mokelumne at that point and was killed there in June, 1864.

Here the interesting California careers of the Woods brothers, John N., and E. W. S., start. John N., who became one of the best-known citizens of San Joaquin County, and a trusted public official, came out from Missouri in 1857 to join his uncle, Jerry Woods, at Woodbridge, and his first letter, sent to his mother urging her to come to California, was one of the first carried east by the pony express. The Civil War came on and in January, 1863, the mother and her boys, one of them the subject of this sketch, left for California, sailing on the steamer Northern Light from New York in February. The steamer made a long detour to avoid the privateer Alabama, then feared on the high seas, and reached the Isthmus safely. They came up to San Francisco on the Sonora, arriving in Stockton March 14, 1863. They went direct to Woodbridge, near where John N. had taken up homesteads for himself and his mother on the present site of Acampo. That section was heavily timbered and covered with chaparral, but the boys soon cleared the land. The next year, 1864, was dry and cattle died on every hand, food becoming scarce and very high. In 1859 the railroad was built through that section and the boys sold their wood to the company. They also chopped out the right of way for two and a half miles north of the river, for which they were paid $125, which to them was big money. In 1869 the boys started with their four-horse team over the Sierras to the White Pine mining section in Nevada, and here they made as much as fifty dollars a day, hauling rich ore to mills or shipping points, but the life was not to their liking, so after a few months they returned to California.

E. W. S. Woods later went to Butte County, hearing that the lands there offered good chances, and there his honesty and integrity won for him the backing of a bank president in Chico, who advanced him money for his farming operations, trusting him because he was known to be honest and capable. "He's honest and will make his way in the world," this far-seeing banker declared, and he later made Mr. Woods his confidential agent to handle big business. The year 1876 brought bumper crops and Mr. Woods prospered, selling a section of good land for fifty dollars an acre. He then returned to Stockton, where his brother, John N. Woods, was well started on his way to wealth, being connected with the Farmers' Union there. The brothers then started their investments in lands. Among their purchases they bought a section of the Mitchell ranch near Modesto, picked up a half section east of Farmington, and were directed to Tulare County by George Crossmore, a wealthy local capitalist, who financed them in their purchase of 9,000 acres near the present city of Tulare, for $45,000.

In 1880 Mr. Woods moved to the Tulare lands with his family and there began the hard struggle that brought the brothers great wealth. There was then but one house between their place and Tulare Lake, but the plucky young farmer and his helpful wife made the best of their surroundings and brought the tract into marketable condition by the introduction of water, drilling some of the first artesian flowing wells in that county and used for irrigation. Six years later they had 1,000 acres in alfalfa, a large herd of cattle and had enlarged their acreage to 14,000. Selling out to a Los Angeles syndicate, they paid back Mr. Crossmore his $45,000 and cleaned up $375,000, also selling their Modesto ranch for forty dollars an acre, just double what it had cost them.

In 1887 the Glasgow California Company owned the upper and middle divisions of Roberts Island, and after it was leveed Easton & Eldridge got an option on the 20,000 acres for thirty dollars an acre. The Woods brothers were promised a third of it, but were crowded out and finally had to buy separate tracts, securing 12,000 acres at forty-five dollars an acre. Later they bought the Gersbacher tract of 1,100 acres with the growing crops, and when harvested, the land cost them twenty-seven dollars an acre; they also then got 3,000 acres from the option holders, which, after the crops were sold, cost them eighteen dollars an acre, now easily worth $500 an acre. On March 22, 1893, the levees broke and the Woods brothers were broke but not discouraged, though they owed $120,000 on the property. When some bankers wanted to close them out, J. D. Peters of Stockton stood up in a

Engraved by Simpson Brothers for Historic Record

E. W. S. Wood

bankers' conference and announced that he would give his check for any amount needed to carry John and "Smithy" Woods, and their credit was again established. Balfour Guthrie advanced them $40,000 and they bought the dredger Roberts Island and rebuilt the levees. They got no crops in 1893 nor in 1894, but in 1896 they sold their crops to Balfour Guthrie for $165,000 and the next year they received $130,000, thus making money fast, though they were paying $18,000 a year interest. That their judgment was well founded was shown by the fact that when Mr. Woods' will was filed, one tract of land on Roberts Island was appraised at $912,027.

After this life ran along smoothly for the plucky farmers, who were undaunted by disaster, and they amassed large fortunes through their foresight and industry. In December, 1900, when John N. Woods died, the brothers owned over 8,000 acres of farming lands in fine shape, a vineyard of 800 acres at Acampo, worth at least $500 an acre, besides other valuable properties, which were amicably divided between the heirs of John N. Woods and the surviving brother, E. W. S. Woods.

Mr. Woods' first marriage united with him Miss Lydia Downing, who passed away in Acampo, and in Elliott, Cal., May 8, 1878, he was married to Alice M. Markle, born in Fairfield, Jefferson County, Iowa, a daughter of George and Sophronia (Springer) Markle, who were born respectively in Holland and Indiana. Coming to Pennsylvania as a young man the father later moved to Iowa where he met and married Miss Springer and engaged in the mercantile business in Keokuk until his death. Afterwards the mother and the children came to California via Panama, arriving in San Francisco in July, 1867. Mrs. Woods survives her husband making her home at 1109 North El Dorado Street, Stockton, surrounded by a large circle of friends, who hold her in high esteem for her many gracious qualities and her generous spirit. Mr. Woods was also survived by a brother, A. J. Woods, of Stockton, and three sons, Lloyd H., Armand and Marcy Woods, the two former of Stockton, and the latter at Monterey. He also left two granddaughters, Mrs. Maria Park Grunsky and Alice Armand Woods, and a grandson, Lloyd Henry Woods.

Mr. Woods was a Knight Templar and 32nd degree Scottish Rite Mason as well as a member of Islam Temple, A. A. O. N. M. S., in San Francisco, and a member of Stockton Lodge No. 218, B. P. O. E. He was deeply interested in the cause of education and served as a member of the board of education for twelve years, being president of the board for six years of the time. He was president of the board of trustees of the Stockton high school while the building was being built and took a strong stand for the present location of the high school instead of close in where they would soon be crowded for room. Looking into the future they now have by his foresight four blocks of ground for the high school site. Mr. Woods, with his brother John N. Woods, was also largely interested in mining. Since his death Mrs. Woods, ably assisted by her sons, is looking after their large interests, the sons having the management of the large ranches and vineyards. Through all the varied experiences of his interesting career, Mr. Woods had the confidence and respect of every one with whom he dealt and the universal commendation as a man who had never done any one injury nor ever taken advantage of a man in a trade, rather taking the worst in any deal in which he was concerned. Never sacrificing principle to personal expediency, he ever showed signal integrity of purpose, placing true valuations on men and affairs, and well deserving the high place he held in the community's esteem.

DENNIS BURNS.—The enviable distinction of being the oldest building contractor in point of service in Stockton is due Dennis Burns of 921 South California Street, who was born in County Wicklow, Ireland, on May 4, 1854, and came to this country in 1859 when his father brought his family, including the mother and two sons, to America. He was thus reared and educated in Greenwich, Conn., and in that town was apprenticed to the carpenter trade. He served under an experienced contractor, and he himself became an expert carpenter. In 1873, at the age of nineteen, he left home, and for two years he worked at his trade in Erie, Penn. Late in 1874, however, he pushed on West to San Francisco, and in the Bay city found work on the Grand Opera House, and later he was given employment in a planing mill there. After that he did contracting for himself, beginning in a small way; but finding things rather dull in San Francisco during the Centennial Year, he went inland to Stockton and took charge of the building of a house for L. Henderson, near Acampo; and since that time, he has been continuously active hereabouts, operating, always more and more extensively, not only in San Joaquin County, but erecting many buildings in Amador, Stanislaus, and Contra Costa counties.

In Stockton, Mr. Burns built the United States Hotel, the El Dorado School, the Weber Hall, St. Joseph's Home, (all save the last hospital) and remodeled St. Mary's Church and added to it the spire. He also put up Dr. Asa Clark's residence in the State Hospital grounds, the Jackson school, the first City Pavilion, the Hickinbotham Block on East Market Street, and also the Hickinbotham residence, and many fine homes in the northern part of the city. He constructed the buildings for the Tesla Mines in Contra Costa County. He laid the timber in the Court House erected in 1890, and erected the County Jail on North San Joaquin Street, and was for two years superintendent of building of the San Joaquin County Jail, and built the San Joaquin County Pavilion. His work has always been first class, and it is not surprising that such has been his prosperity here that he now owns valuable real estate in Stockton, including four houses on the South side, which he himself built. He put up one of the finest residences erected on the South side, having bought the lot from the late Captain Weber.

Mr. Burns was married at San Francisco in 1880 to Miss Mary Elizabeth Kelly, a native of Maine, and they have had ten children, seven of whom are still living. Catherine has become Mrs. Kerblow, and the mother of four children. Ana is Mrs. Murl, and the mother of two children. Maude is Mrs. Richmond, and she has one child. Georgie is Mrs. Springer, and she has one child, a son Sydney. The sons are: Edward; Robert, who was in the World War serving as a member of the Ninety-first Division, and he saw active service on the battlefields of France; Harry married Miss Clara Anderson, of San Francisco.

MARTIN J. LUND.—With the wonderful transformation that has taken place in the Delta district of San Joaquin County the name of Martin J. Lund will ever be prominently associated, for he has been identified with this section for forty-seven years and no one has taken a more active interest in bringing it to its present high state of development. He was one of the first men to build levees in the Island district for the protection from floods of the rich peat lands which are today the most valuable and fertile farms in California.

A native of Sweden, Mr. Lund was born at Skane, November 9, 1851; his father was an educator as well as an attorney at law, so that Martin naturally received a good education. Later he apprenticed himself to learn the bricklayer's trade, working in this line until he was twenty-one. In 1873 he left his native land and came to Boston and after spending some time in Michigan and Indiana he made his way to California in 1875 and was first employed on a farm in Contra Costa County, near Concord. In 1877 he came to Union Island, San Joaquin County, and since that time the history of this now fertile spot has been a part of his history, for he has been a leader in every step of its development. He also helped to develop Roberts Island, building the levees from the first shovelful, and assisted in making them higher and higher each year.

In 1883 Mr. Lund began farming on his own account, leasing 500 acres which he devoted to wheat, using a header and stationary thresher; in 1888 he began using a steam thresher, enlarging his operations from year to year until he was cultivating 6,000 acres on Union and Roberts islands, raising more than 100,000 sacks of wheat and barley a year. Formerly he used 100 horses and mules in operating his large holdings but he has always been among the first to use any improved machinery and methods. He began using a combined harvester in 1892 and when the tractor came into use he had one of the first in California. His ranches are all equipped with the most modern machinery and all details of the ranch work are carried on in the most systematic manner, 75 to 100 practical harvest hands being employed during the busy season. Mr. Lund is a man of original ideas which he puts into practice with gratifying results; he has had years of experience which has taught him that each season is different because of varied conditions and so he is always prepared to meet emergencies. His achievements have set a good example to others and his plans and ideas have been followed by many landowners because he has demonstrated practical results. Especially is this true of the levees, canals and irrigation ditches he has built which are modern in every respect. In 1896 Mr. Lund purchased 870 acres on Union Island and he has added to this until he now has 1,560 acres of rich land devoted to barley, wheat, potatoes, beans and many other staple products. During his long career as a rancher he has not always been on the winning side as a producer as he had many setbacks in the way of losses amounting to thousands of dollars, particularly from the heavy floods which broke through the levees a number of years. He showed his true stamina and courage at these times by assisting in rebuilding the levees higher and recuperating his losses by raising larger crops. Besides his grain raising Mr. Lund devoted much time to raising fine draft horses, having a number of splendid thoroughbred Percherons.

On September 26, 1888, at Stockton, Mr. Lund was married to Miss Mary Moran, born at Bodega Bay, Sonoma County, the daughter of William and Hannah Moran, worthy pioneer settlers of San Joaquin County, whose histories are found on another page of this work. Mr. and Mrs. Lund have one son, John William Martin, who was educated in the public schools, St. Mary's College, and Heald's Business College, Stockton, and he is now associated with his father on the farm. He married Miss Anna Charlotte Van Horn and they have two children, Martin Stanley and John William. For fourteen years Mr. Lund resided on Roberts Island, during most of which time he was associated with the Woods brothers in large farming operations, and he served as school trustee there. He was one of the organizers of the school district on Union Island and always a leader in matters of education. Aside from being an eminently successful farmer Mr. Lund is a wide-awake booster for good roads. He has been an active worker for the proposed highway across Union Island and has given a sixty-foot right-of-way through his holdings to Old River, where a bridge connecting Clifton and Coney Islands is planned. In all matters that tend toward the upbuilding of this section he shows the same public-spirited interest and is one of the best-known men in the vicinity of Stockton. With his son he is a member of the Stockton Elks and in politics he is a staunch Republican.

Mr. Lund aside from his country residence maintains a home in Stockton from which place he superintends his large affairs. He gives no small degree of credit for his remarkable success to his estimable wife who has always nobly encouraged and spurred him on in his ambition and aided him in every way to accomplish success. She is a woman of much culture and presides gracefully over their home, and both being liberal and kind-hearted take great delight in dispensing the good, true old-time Californian hospitality, so it is indeed a pleasure to have the privilege of visiting at their home.

GEORGE H. TINKHAM.—"I am what I am; what I might have been I know not," said Mr. Tinkham to the writer when asked for a short sketch of his life. "My ancestors on my father's side were Scotch-English, and on my mother's side were Dutch. The Tinkhams were leading actors in the Revolutionary War and in the War of 1812. My mother and her parents were born in Boston, Mass., and there I was born, within sight of the Charleston bridge, in March, 1849." Mr. Tinkham says many a time has he played on Bunker Hill, and listened to the chimes of the historic Tremont Street Church. His father emigrated to California in May, 1849, and four years later, his wife, Mrs. Frances Baxter Tinkham, with her two children, Francis Isadore and George H., joined him at Stockton, having come via Panama.

George H. attended the Stockton schools, A. H. Randall the teacher, until he was seventeen; there were no high schools at that time, and he later attended the San Jose State Normal for one term. He worked for his father in the City Market on Main Street, where now stands the Wonder. After some years spent in the market he says, "My brother Edgar took my place and I went roaming. During the intervening years, up to a certain date I engaged in various occupations, among them ranching, sheep-herding, clerking in a grocery and a drug store, drove a street car, water sprinkling wagon, was editor of the Weekly Record, and occasionally a news-item writer for the Stockton Independent." While working in the butcher shop Mr. Tinkham says he became a member of the brass band, thirteen in number, he playing third E-flat tenor. It was the only brass band in the county and he declares he "had the time of his life playing at theatres, picnics, political meetings, serenades, celebrations, etc." While a member of the band and only eighteen years old, he voted for U. S. Grant for president, the Republican party let no votes get by then. He sang baritone from time to time in the Presbyterian, Congregational and Baptist churches. In November, 1876, he joined Charity Lodge No. 6, I. O. O. F., of which his father was a charter member; fortunately he has never drawn a dollar in sick benefits; he joined Rainbow Lodge, No. 97, Daughters of Rebekah, in November, 1895; and in 1915 was made a member of Stockton Lodge No. 391, Loyal Order of Moose. He was a member of the Stockton Guard, Capt. L. E. Lyon, and honorably discharged; was a member of the volunteer fire department, Eureka No. 2, until the arrival of the steam engine.

Engel & Brothers for Historic Record

H. J. Lund

In giving his book-canvassing experience which led to his becoming a writer, Mr. Tinkham said, "In 1878 I was canvassing for a book, the 'Life of Bismarck,' entering a saloon one day, Barney Killion, a rollicking young Irishman who had known me since boyhood, was standing at the bar, lightly tapping me on the back, he exclaimed, 'Say, Tinkham, why don't you write the history of Stockton?' Like a streak of fire the same question flashed in my brain and after fourteen years of roaming I had found my occupation. I wrote the history and enjoyed every hour of its compilation, but it was a labor of love without any remuneration. In getting subscribers enough to pay the printer I obtained a paying position; this was the janitorship of the Weber School building. I had read one morning in the news items in the paper of the sudden death, by heart disease, of George Lemon, the janitor. Letting no grass grow under my feet I went to John Yardley, the grocer, on Weber Avenue, and one of the school trustees and said, 'I see that Mr. Lemon died last night and I would like the job.' 'Well, George, I guess you can have it.' Going upstairs to Mr. Lemon's bedroom, where that departed Christian soul lay upon the bed, Mr. Lemon took the schoolhouse keys from his pocket, and as usual, at nine o'clock that morning the schoolbell rang out. During the leisure hours of my school work and at various times later I compiled the book, 'California Men and Events.'

"In 1907, while cleaning books in the public library, dressed in overalls and a checkered blouse, a prepossessing young gentleman approached me and asked: 'Are you George Tinkham?' 'That's what they call me,' I replied. 'I have been told that you would be a good person to write the history of San Joaquin County for our company.'" Mr. Tinkham answered with a good deal of hesitancy, and, making numerous excuses, tried to decline. Nevertheless he took on the job and completed a very satisfactory edition. In his own words, "I wrote that history; it was easy, as I had written historical sketches off and on for years for the Mail and Record. For the Record, daily for the past six years I have been writing, 'Twenty Years Ago Today' stuff. Since 1907, that same gentleman, H. A. Preston, has returned at various times and requested me to compile several histories for his company. During the many years I have worked at these tasks I have enjoyed my work; it not only has been a pleasure to me but to thousands who read my articles.

'Then scatter the flowers where'er you go,
That friends and strangers all may know
The blessings of well-doing.'

The following histories, all but the first two, were compiled for the Historic Record Company by Mr. Tinkham:

History of Stockton, 1880; The Half Century of Odd Fellowship, 1906; History of San Joaquin County, 1908; History of Monterey and San Benito County, 1910; History of Stanislaus County, 1921; History and Progress of San Joaquin County, 1923.

Mr. Tinkham states, "I have seen five deaths in the family group, but in the words of Jean Ingelow:

'We are all, all here,
Father, mother, sister, brother,
Each who hold the other dear,
We are all, all here.'

We are not spiritists—my Grandmother Tinkham was a Spiritualist—but the remembrance of the loved one is deeply graven on the tablet of memory. 'We are all, all here.'

MRS. AGNES STEINY FINKBOHNER.—A native daughter of Stockton whose father was a '49er, is Mrs. Agnes Steiny Finkbohner; she is the daughter of Julius and Amelia (Seiffert) Steiny, natives of St. Petersburg, Russia, and Saxony, Germany, respectively. Julius Steiny came to the United States in 1845 and lived in Baltimore, Maryland; he served on the American ship Congress during the Mexican War under Commodore Stockton of the U. S. Navy. He was discharged at Norfolk, Virginia, in 1848, and came around the Horn to California in December, 1849; he engaged in the shipping business with Henry Fiske on the San Joaquin River until 1853; in 1856 Miss Amelia Seiffert came via the Horn to California and in 1861 she was married to Julius Steiny in Stockton. Two children were born to them, Theodore died December 25, 1922, leaving two sons, Homer Julius Steiny of San Francisco, and Loomis F. of Stockton; and Agnes, the subject of this sketch. Julius Steiny became an influential citizen of Stockton and for seven years was county assessor and later city clerk of Stockton; he died at the age of sixty-three, honored by all who knew him; his wife passed away at the age of seventy-three.

Agnes Steiny received her education in the grammar and high schools of Stockton. On August 31, 1892, in Stockton, she was united in marriage with George Finkbohner, also a native son of California, a son of Jacob and Barbara (Kuhn) Finkbohner, early settlers of California, arriving about 1853. Jacob Finkbohner engaged in business in Stockton and his son George was reared and educated in that city and today is one of Stockton's influential business men. Three sons have been born to them; Theodore is chief clerk of the Southern Pacific Railroad division office of the Stockton division; George is assistant cashier of the Sacramento and San Joaquin Bank; Otto is a farmer.

HON. CHARLES WILLIS NORTON.—In the enumeration of the men of the present generation who have won honor for themselves and at the same time have honored the state to which they belonged, distinct recognition is accorded Hon. Charles Willis Norton, for he was one of the distinguished citizens of California and figured prominently in the affairs of state and county. He was a native son of California and among those who knew him from his youth up, he won the recognition which is only accorded to sterling worth and upright American manhood. He was born on his father's ranch near Lodi, San Joaquin County, July 18, 1861, a son of Oscar O. and Maria Julia (Elliott) Norton, born in New York and New Hampshire, respectively. The American branch of the Norton family was represented by Thomas Norton, who came from Ackley, County Surrey, England, in 1639, and settled at Guilford, Conn. Ebenezer Norton, an ancestor of our subject, was a colonel in the Revolutionary War and was a member of the general assembly of Connecticut, and Medad Norton, a brother of Mr. Norton's paternal great-grandfather, was a soldier and fifer in the Revolutionary War.

The father, Oscar O. Norton, was reared in his native county of Schuylcr, N. Y., receiving his education in the public schools and at Starkey Academy. In his twenty-third year, he went to Illinois, where he remained until 1859 when he started for California, coming via the Isthmus of Panama and arriving in San Francisco on July 15, and that same year he settled in San Joaquin County, where he followed carpentering until 1864, when he went to farming about ten miles from Stockton. He farmed this place for many years, then the ranch was purchased by our subject and in 1881, the father purchased another ranch, where he made his home until 1903 when he located in Stockton. By his own efforts and able management this ranch was brought to a high state of cultivation and was regarded as one of the best in the country. On October 4, 1860, Oscar O. Norton was married to Miss Maria J. Elliott, who, with her parents crossed the plains to California in 1858 and settled near the ranch later owned by Mr. Norton. They were the parents of three children: Charles Willis, Mrs. Alice E. Hurd, and Arthur L.

Charles Willis Norton grew to manhood on the farm and attended the public schools of the county and was graduated from the Stockton high school; later he took up the study of law in Mr. Minor's office in Stockton, and in 1896 was admitted to the bar. While studying law he was elected public administrator of San Joaquin County. From 1899 to 1902 he was deputy district attorney for the county and from 1906 to 1916 he was district attorney, his most famous case being the trunk murder mystery known as the Le Deux case, and it is the consensus of opinion that Judge Norton was the leading criminal lawyer in the county. Elected Judge of the Superior Court, he served until he resigned on account of ill health. In his twenty-sixth year, Judge Norton planted a vineyard on the home place near Lodi and as the years went by he became one of the leading viticulturists of that section, owning and operating one of the largest vineyards of the district. In partnership with Mr. Angier, under the firm name of Norton & Angier, he conducted a general fruit shipping business.

Near Lodi, on January 1, 1885, Judge Norton was married to Miss Nellie F. Staples, also a native of San Joaquin County, the only child of Capt. John F. and Mary Emma (Simpson) Staples, natives of Maryland and Missouri, respectively, who crossed the plains to California in early days. Captain Staples located at Staples Ferry, established by his brother, D. J. Staples, and there he was married to Miss Mary Emma Simpson. He was a captain in the Civil War and came of Mayflower stock. Some years after Mr. Staples' death, his widow married Dr. J. L. Sargent, a prominent physician, and later a successful cattleman in this county. Dr. Sargent has passed away, but Mrs. Sargent makes her home with Mrs. Norton. Judge and Mrs. Norton were the parents of four children: Oscar Sargent served in the tank corps in France during the World War, now in charge of his mother's ranches; Lillian is Mrs. Eric Brandstad, wife of a successful rancher; Sylvia is the wife of Brace R. Davis of San Francisco; and Willis S. is deceased. Judge Norton gave no small degree of credit for his success to his faithful wife who so bravely encouraged him in his ambition to reach the highest place in his profession, as well as aiding him in his business enterprises by her able co-operation and counsel. Judge Norton rose to the highest office in the gift of the people of the county, that of Judge of the Superior Court, and all of his decisions, while on the bench, were fair and he was faithful to every case committed to his charge. He spent his whole life in San Joaquin County and was well known and highly esteemed throughout the state.

Judge Norton was very prominent in fraternal orders, being a member of Lodi Lodge No. 250, F. & A. M.; Stockton Chapter, No. 28, R. A. M.; Stockton Commandery No. 8, K. T.; Islam Temple, A. A. O. N. M. S., San Francisco; Lodi Chapter No. 150, O. E. S.; Stockton Lodge No. 218, B. P. O. E.; and Stockton Parlor No. 7, N. S. G. W. He was the recipient of many honors in fraternal circles, having served one year as illustrious master of the Grand Council of Royal and Select Masters and one term as grand high priest of the Grand Chapter, R. A. M., of the state of California. In politics he was a staunch adherent of the Republican party platform and his religious views were that of the Congregational Church. He was the founder of the First National Bank of Lodi and served as a director; he was also a director in the Lodi Investment Company, owners and builders of Hotel Lodi and the Lodi theater building. Judge Norton passed away on July 11, 1918, and since his death, Mrs. Norton has planted more land to grapes, so that there is now 360 acres under cultivation. Well known throughout California, where his entire life was spent, Judge Norton took great pride in the achievements of the state, in its marked and rapid progress, and he was numbered among those who always upheld its professional status.

The remarks of George F. McNoble speaking for the court out of respect to the memory of the late Judge C. W. Norton are as follows: "If the court please, it is with deep regret and genuine sorrow that we are called upon this day to learn of the passing of our late distinguished brother, Judge C. W. Norton. Although his death has been daily expected, his departure is none the less keenly deplored. Few men of his time, in our midst, have been more universally respected, honored and admired than he. High honors and public favors fell to his lot and more than this, was the great personal respect in which he was held by all the people. He won and held the esteem of all classes of men by his probity of character, his even-handed fairness and his uniform courtesy. It was his good fortune not only to be honest in all his dealings with men, but also to have all men believe in his sense of justice and honor. As an advocate and public prosecutor, he showed great poise and absolute fairness and often won by the very faith that men had in him, without waiting to scan too closely the complex details of the case. As a judge, he went on the bench in middle life with a mind ripened and broadened by varied experiences and from the very beginning he won and held the esteem and admiration of the bench, bar and litigants generally, by the calmness and fairness with which he disposed of the business of the court. While not quick to make new acquaintances, or to ingratiate himself into the favor of men, yet he had the quiet faculty of earning the respect of all whom he met and of retaining that respect untarnished throughout his lifetime. In early life he had the practical experience of the field and farm. He served one term as public administrator, one term as an assistant in the district attorney's office, one term as head of that office and the last ten years of his active life were spent on the bench. Scarcely has it fallen the good lot of any man to have gone through as much of combat and of struggle in times of strenuous opposition, both professionally and politically and to have come out of the fight with a character unassailed and a reputation unblemished. His sympathies were many sided. He enjoyed athletics even until late in life and participated in many helpful games. As a traveler, he spent his vacations in tramping through the high Sierras and was very familiar indeed with the beauties of California's mountains and valleys. As a farmer and grape grower he was a success and the products of his vineyard sold with his name on the outside of the boxes without interior inspection, in foreign markets. In a fraternal way, he was unusually honored and if his life had not been cut short, it is clearly within the line of truth to say that no man in the state scarcely would have held more fraternal honors. However, it was a jurist and arbiter of the disputes of men, that he won his most signal honors. It is safe to say that no man within our memory had a better all-round equipment for judging and deciding the disputes of mankind coming into court, more fairly than he. He had the friendship of all the members of the bar and more than that he had the respect based upon the appreciation of his genuine merits." He was an honored member of the American, State, and San Joaquin County Bar associations.

L. H. Norton

ROLEY E. WILHOIT.—The genealogy of the Wilhoit family is traced to Germany, but its first representative in America crossed the ocean during the colonial history of our country and settled in Virginia, where several generations lived and labored with a fair degree of success. Following the trend of emigration toward the unsettled wilderness of the West, the family pushed across the mountains to Kentucky in an early day and aided in the agricultural development of that commonwealth. Julius and Lucy (Ewell) Wilhoit, parents of Roley E., were born, reared and married in Virginia, but while still young they became pioneers of Kentucky and from there moved to Illinois, settling in Edgar County. By dint of the utmost frugality and indefatigable energy they accumulated large holdings and acquired the title to about 800 acres of farm land. Among their eight children was a son, J. Y., who enlisted in the Union army at the opening of the Civil War and took part in various engagements until he fell into the hands of the enemy, later dying in Andersonville prison.

While still quite young, Roley E. Wilhoit accompanied his parents from Jefferson County, Ky., where he was born March 1, 1830, to Edgar County, Ill., where he attended a country school and an academy. After leaving the home farm he clerked in a drug store for a time. On hearing of the discovery of gold he determined to emigrate to California and began to make plans for that purpose. With nearly one hundred young men from various parts of the country, in 1850, he outfitted for the trip across the plains, and in May started from St. Joseph, Mo., arriving at Hangtown, Calif., on August 8. After mining there for a short time, Mr. Wilhoit proceeded to Mokelumne Hill, where he worked in the mines during the winter, and in the spring went to Jackson, Amador County, later to Folsom, mining at Willow Springs for a time.

Arriving at Stockton May 8, 1852, Mr. Wilhoit secured employment on a ranch and in the fall began to haul freight to the southern mines. On account of the high water he was forced to convey his goods to French Camp by boat and there he loaded them on wagons for the remainder of the trip. For nine years he was engaged in freighting and teaming. During the last six years he had a partner and the firm of Bostwick & Wilhoit conducted a large business in their line. During 1861 Mr. Wilhoit was elected county recorder and this position he filled by successive elections until March, 1868, when he embarked in the abstract, conveyancing and real estate business. From small proportions the business has grown until it ranks with the largest of its kind in this part of the state. The business was conducted alone by Mr. Wilhoit for eighteen years, when he took his two sons into partnership; still later the Wilhoit Abstract & Title Company was incorporated, with the three members of the family and Messrs. Taylor and Comstock. It is now known as the San Joaquin County Abstract Company.

Mr. Wilhoit was one of the organizers of the Stockton Savings & Loan Society, now the Stockton Savings & Loan Bank, was a member of its original board of directors and many years ago was elected its president, serving for six years, when he resigned on account of his health, and his son, E. L. Wilhoit, succeeded him. Mr. Wilhoit, however, continued as a director and a member of the finance committee and it was while attending a meeting of this committee in the bank that he was stricken by death.

Interested in all movements for the welfare of the city and county, Mr. Wilhoit was one of the organizers and a prominent member of the Pioneers' Society; from 1872 to 1878 he served as a member of the county board of supervisors, being chairman of the board for two years, and from 1870 to 1873 was a councilman, and chairman of that board for two years. After his election to the board of education of Stockton he was chosen president of that body and filled the post with efficiency and fidelity to the interests of the schools. As early as 1859 he became identified with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and in 1869 was made a Mason and was one of the oldest members of the Knights of Pythias. He was an active member of St. John's Episcopal Church and vestryman for many years, and he was the oldest in point of service of any senior warden in California.

Mr. Wilhoit's first marriage took place in Stockton October 7, 1861, uniting him with Miss Delia Dwelly, who was born in Maine in 1844 and died in Stockton January 14, 1872. Three sons and a daughter survived her: George E., deceased; Eugene L., and Arthur and Alice, twins. The latter was the wife of Judge George Buck and she is now deceased. The second marriage of Mr. Wilhoit took place in Stockton December 11, 1873, and united him with Miss Janet French Tilton, who was born at St. Johns, New Brunswick, in 1849. She passed away July 21, 1911. Three children were born of this union, a son who died at the age of six years, and two daughters, Mary Wilhoit Hodgkins and Elsie Wilhoit Hodgkins, both of Stockton. Mr. Wilhoit passed away June 21, 1922, having reached the age of ninety-two years and four months, his death closing an eventful career full of accomplishment, his labors playing no small part in the progress brought about through the span of his residence of seventy years in Stockton.

GEORGE EWELL WILHOIT.—A native-born son of Stockton who spent almost his entire life there, George Ewell Wilhoit occupied a high place among the leading business and professional men of the city of his birth. A staunch supporter of all movements for the community's good and intelligently interested in public affairs, he was of the type of citizenship valuable in the progress of any city and necessary to the rise of any commonwealth. He was the eldest son of Roley E. Wilhoit, whose parents, Julius and Lucy (Ewell) Wilhoit, were born, reared and married in Virginia, where forebears of the family had settled in the early Colonial days. Soon after their marriage, Julius Wilhoit and his wife became pioneers of Kentucky and from there moved to Illinois, settling in Edgar County, where they accumulated large land holdings.

Roley E. Wilhoit, who was born in Jefferson County, Ky., March 1, 1830, when quite young accompanied his parents to Edgar County, Ill., where he attended the country schools and an academy. On hearing of the discovery of gold in California, with nearly a hundred young men he started across the plains in May, 1850, and on August 8, they reached Hangtown. After spending some time in the mines at various localities, he arrived at Stockton May 8, 1852, and in the fall began to haul freight to the Southern mines, continuing in this business for nine years. In 1861 he was elected county recorder and in this position he filled until 1868, when he embarked in the abstract, conveyancing and real estate business, which grew until it ranked with the largest in this part of the state. This he eventually incorporated as the Wilhoit Abstract and Title Company. Always a leader, Mr. Wilhoit was prominent in public affairs and served as a member of the board of supervisors and as president of the board of education. He was probably the best informed man on land values in San Joaquin County. He passed away June 21, 1922, at the age of ninety-two years and four months.

The eldest son of R. E. and Delia (Dwelly) Wilhoit, the latter a native of Machias, Maine, George Ewell Wilhoit was born at Stockton March 17, 1863, and after attending the grammar and high schools, took a course in the Stockton Business College. In 1881, on account of impaired health, he went to the Hawaiian Islands and while there was with the banking house of Bishop & Company. After two years he returned to Stockton restored to health and became associated with his father in business. The abstract and real estate business of R. E. Wilhoit was founded in 1868, and on May 1, 1886, his sons, George E. and Eugene L., were admitted as partners, the firm becoming R. E. Wilhoit & Sons, continuing under that title until the incorporation of the business at the Wilhoit Abstract and Title Company. Himself an expert in perfecting titles, Mr. Wilhoit became vice-president of the company and displayed unusual ability in guiding the policies of its responsible activities.

On October 2, 1890, Mr. Wilhoit was married to Miss Jessie Lee Woods, the daughter of one of San Joaquin County's honored pioneers, John Newton Woods, and one son was born to them, John Newton Wilhoit. Prominent in the life of the community, Mr. Wilhoit was associated with the Pioneer Society, Native Sons of the Golden West, the Elks and the Odd Fellows. While still in the prime of life he was taken from the scene of earthly activities, passing away at Long Beach, where he had gone for a rest from business cares, on March 15, 1921. All who knew him held him in the highest regard for the sterling worth of his character and his death was deeply felt in his native city, where he had been a leader for many years.

MRS. JESSIE LEE WILHOIT.—Belonging to the third generation of California pioneer forebears, Mrs. Jessie Lee Wilhoit is a representative of the Woods family who were prominently identified with the upbuilding and development of San Joaquin County and who left to their descendants not only a rich legacy of lands and material wealth but those sturdy and noble traits of character that are the foundation of all true development. Her parents were John Newton and Annie Victoria (Farmer) Woods, the former a native of Indiana who came to California via Panama in 1857, while Mrs. Woods, who was born in Missouri, made the journey across the plains with her parents in 1859. Both parents are now deceased and a detailed sketch of their lives will be found on another page of this history.

Mrs. Wilhoit was born at Acampo, San Joaquin County, the site of this town being part of the 320 acre ranch which her father purchased in 1858, the year following his arrival in California, and this with additional land which he purchased, remained the family home until 1877. Since she was about ten years of age, Mrs. Wilhoit has been a resident of Stockton and here she received her early education, later attending Mills Seminary at Oakland, where she graduated in 1887. On October 2, 1890, she was united in marriage with George Ewell Wilhoit, whose father, R. E. Wilhoit, was one of Stockton's prominent pioneer business men. George E. Wilhoit rose to a high place in Stockton's business and professional circles but his successful career was cut short by his demise on March 15, 1921, while taking a much-needed rest at Long Beach, Cal. Mr. and Mrs. Wilhoit were the parents of one son, John Newton Wilhoit, who since discharging his patriotic duties in the service of his country during the World War has become a successful bond broker at San Francisco.

Geo. E. Wilhoit.

On the death of her father, John Newton Woods, Mrs. Wilhoit and her sister took charge of his large estate and has devoted much of her time to looking after the large interests left her. She finds time, however, to take an active part in civic and social affairs, and is a member of the board of managers of the Children's Home, a director of the Day Nursery and the Philomathean Club, a member of the Eastern Star, president of the Mills Club of Stockton, and she also belongs to the Civic Center Club in San Francisco which numbers 2500 women as its members.

In point of the number of years of membership she is the oldest member of Grace Methodist Episcopal Church of Stockton. In his will John Newton Woods left a legacy for a new building for this church and Mrs. Wilhoit with her sister added liberally to this and carried out the provisions faithfully and with much capability, following in the footsteps of her esteemed father in demonstrating her ability to handle large affairs.

Aside from having traveled extensively throughout the United States Mrs. Wilhoit has traveled much in Europe. In 1908, with her husband and son, she spent two months on a Mediterranean cruise, taking in Egypt, Algeria, the Holy Land, Malta, Sicily, Greece, the Canal Zone and Panama, and also a trip to the Hawaiian Islands. Cultured and talented, Mrs. Wilhoit is a well traveled and well read woman and is indeed an interesting conversationalist.

JOHN NEWTON WILHOIT.—Representing the fourth generation of California pioneers on the maternal side and the third on the paternal, John Newton Wilhoit can well look back with pride on the achievements of his forebears in the part they played in the early days in the upbuilding and development that has transformed San Joaquin County from a wilderness to a garden spot. Born on August 12, 1892, he is the son of George Ewell and Jessie Lee (Woods) Wilhoit, and the grandson of Roley E. Wilhoit and John Newton Woods, more extensive life histories of these pioneer families being found elsewhere in this volume.

Reared in his native city of Stockton, Mr. Wilhoit attended the public schools there, supplemented with a course at Belmont Military Academy. When the United States entered the world conflict, he enlisted with the American Ambulance Corps and went overseas, serving with his unit until ill-health forced him to return to California. After his recovery he again enlisted and was stationed at Camp Lewis until his health again became impaired, when he entered the secret service of his country, serving in this department of activity until the close of the war. He then gave his attention to looking after his vineyard near Lodi and his city property, being half owner of the Douglass-Wilhoit Building. Later he established himself in the bond brokerage business at San Francisco, where he has met with splendid success in handling high grade bonds and securities.

Mr. Wilhoit's first marriage was to Miss Merle R. Gossett and to them was born a son, Douglass Woods Wilhoit. His second marriage united him with Mrs. Ethel Nixon of San Francisco and they are now traveling in Europe. Mr. Wilhoit is a member of Grace Methodist Church, Stockton; he is also a member of the Anteros Club and on account of his pioneer ancestors is a member of the San Joaquin County Pioneers. He is a well-traveled young man having been with his parents on their Mediterranean cruise as well as their trip to Continental Europe and England. He also made a trip around the world and has visited the West Indies besides traveling extensively over the Western Hemisphere.

J. M. KILE.—A successful practicing lawyer of Stockton and a Californian by birth, J. M. Kile was born on his father's ranch near Thornton, San Joaquin County, on February 16, 1865, and is the son of Joseph and Katherine (Hardesty) Kile, the former a native of Ohio and the latter of Indiana. In 1849 Joseph Kile crossed the plains to California and after a short stay in the mines in the year of 1850 took up a Government claim near Thornton which was devoted to cattle raising and grain farming. In 1873 he removed to Stockton where he spent the remainder of his days. He was identified with the Methodist Episcopal Church South, and was a member of the San Joaquin Pioneer Society, and was also a Mexican War veteran. During the early days of his residence on the ranch he erected a house which was considered in those days very fine, and it is still standing. This old home place is still in the possession of the family and is probably the oldest ranch in the county, founded over seventy years ago, to remain in the possession of the descendants of its original owner. This ranch consists of 750 acres, about 700 acres of which is owned by our subject and the remaining portion by Joseph Horton, his son.

J. M. Kile was educated in the Stockton grammar and high schools; then entered Vanderbilt University at Nashville, Tenn., graduating in law with the class of 1886. Returning to Stockton he began the practice of his profession and is now one of the pioneer attorneys of Stockton.

The marriage of Mr. Kile in Tennessee united him with Miss Rachel Horton, a native of that state and a granddaughter of Ex-Governor Cannon, and they are the parents of one son, Joseph Horton Kile, a graduate of Stanford University, who has erected a fine house on the portion of the ranch owned by him, where he resides. Sixty acres of this ranch is devoted to orchard and vineyard and some 500 acres is rented out as a dairy and alfalfa ranch. The family have always been active members of the Methodist Church South and for many years Mr. Kile was a member of the board of stewards. He is a member of Stockton Parlor, N. S. G. W., is a director in the Roberts Island Dredging Company and the Yosemite Theater Company. The latter company erected the Yosemite building and theater. He is also a member of the San Joaquin County Pioneer Society.

MRS. HANNAH STURTEVANT GEFFROY.—Numbered among the honored pioneers of San Joaquin County is Mrs. Hannah Sturtevant Geffroy, who came to California via the Panama route in 1864 and since 1875 has been a continuous resident of the county. She has witnessed the growth and development of the Lodi section of the county from a wilderness of underbrush and timber to the present high state of cultivation and prosperity. Mrs. Geffroy is a native daughter of New England, her birth having occurred in North Abington, Mass., December 12, 1849, a daughter of George and Susannah (Shaw) Hammond. The Hammond family dates back to 1634, when the first of the name came to America on the ship Griffin, and from Benjamin Hammond are descended men and women prominent and influential in the early days of Massachusetts. There were eight children in the family: Delia, Mrs. D. J. Locke, residing in Lockeford; Susan, Mrs. Geo. Locke, deceased; Roland, deceased; Dr. Josiah Hammond of Butte, Mont.; Horace, deceased; Mrs. Geffroy, the subject of this sketch; Clara, deceased; John C. Hammond of Lockeford. The entire family of children were born in the same house in North Abington, Mass. The paternal grandmother, Hannah Sturtevant, after whom our subject was named, lived to be ninety-one years old, while the father of our subject lived to be almost ninety years old and the mother died at the age of sixty-five. The family came to California at different times, then the father returned to the Massachusetts home and brought the remaining three children to California in 1864 via Panama. The ship which took them to Panama was convoyed against attack from the rebel naval vessels. The father leased the Staples ranch at Lockeford, where he farmed for a number of years.

On March 17, 1867, on the Staples ranch near Lockeford, in a house that was brought around the Horn in sections, occurred the marriage of Miss Hannah Sturtevant Hammond and Thomas Bush Geffroy, born April 4, 1832, in Newport, R. I. His father passed away when he was eight years old. Mr. Geffroy was trained for West Point and received his appointment, but it was at the time of the great gold excitement so instead he joined a party of seven and bought and stocked a vessel to come to California around the Horn and arrived in San Francisco in 1849, where the party disposed of the vessel and went to the mines. However, Mr. Geffroy's success in the mining venture lasted but a short time, then he went to Monterey County, where he became prominent in the political circles of the county and was a member of the first legislature of California that convened at San Jose and Mrs. Geffroy has preserved the manuscripts of his work in that body. For many years Mr. Geffroy was county clerk of Monterey County; he also served as deputy sheriff of the county and was translator in the courts of the county, translating the grants from French and Spanish to the English language. His health gave away and he was forced to seek an outdoor life and engaged in the stock business, first in Monterey County, then in San Joaquin County, where he met Miss Hammond. The family resided in the vicinity of Lockeford for a few years, where Mr. Geffroy rented railroad land for stockraising and where their three oldest children were born; then the family removed to Oakland, and made their home for five years; then they moved back to San Joaquin County, in 1875, where they have continuously resided. Mr. Geffroy purchased a fifteen-acre ranch one-half mile west of Lodi on the Sargent Road, where he engaged in farming for thirty-two years, or until his death on July 7, 1907. Mr. and Mrs. Geffroy were the parents of eight children: Mabel, Mrs. C. F. Walker of Yreka, Cal., has one daughter, Mrs. Gertrude Otis of Oakland, and she has three children—Geraldine, Wilbur, and Glen; Carrie, Mrs. E. J. Thomas, also of Oakland; Bertha, Mrs. Leslie Dye, resides in Lodi and has three children—Charles, Edna, and Eleanor; Arthur died in 1877, aged three years; Susie, Mrs. W. W. Hubbard of Stockton, has two children—Wilma and Wayne; Amos died at birth, and his twin Amy, is Mrs. Emmitt Gordon, who resides in Acampo and has five children—Dorothy, Kenneth, Neil, Joyce and Barbara; Ralph Geffroy resides in New York. Since the death of her husband Mrs. Geffroy has made her home in Lodi at 221 West Elm Street, and she is an esteemed member of the Congregational Church in Lodi and is the oldest in membership of that organization.

WILLIAM J. ZIEGLER.—On May 15, 1853, William J. Ziegler, the subject of this sketch, was born in Wudenberg, Germany. About two years later, the news of California's far-famed gold discovery having reached them, his parents, Mr. and Mrs. John Jacob Ziegler, decided to seek their fortune in this great venture of the West and with their children, started for America, coming around the Horn in a sailing vessel as so many of the early pioneers did, landing in San Francisco some months later. From San Francisco, they made their way to Sonora and Jamestown and there near the old Sullivan Creek, they established their little home. Here the father tried his luck at mining, at first very successful, but later failing in the venture, he decided to bring his family to Stockton, where he might return to his former business, that of a tanner, which business he followed until his death in the winter of 1904. It was about the year 1868, when Mr. and Mrs. Ziegler established their little family, consisting of William J. Ziegler, Mrs. Louise Meyers, August Ziegler, Mrs. Emma Held (now deceased) and Mrs. Sophia Chance, in the old family home, the site of which is now occupied by the Holt Manufacturing Company.

Being anxious to follow the tanning business, both August and William Ziegler entered the employ of the Wagner Company that year. August Ziegler's health breaking down, he gave up the business, but William J. Ziegler being interested, zealous and industrious, continued to learn the business with all of its details. With the exception of a few years spent in a tannery at Santa Cruz, Mr. Ziegler worked continuously for the Wagner interests until a few months before his death. In July, 1918, when the big fire destroyed a greater portion of the Wagner Leather Company plant, Mr. Ziegler was severely injured in the heroic effort to prevent the firemen and other volunteers entering a dangerous section of the burning building and in an attempt to protect the company's tanning liquors by the closing of certain valves. This was the inception of his frail health, which led him to retire in March, 1920, from active duties. On March 17th, 1920, his beloved wife passed away and grief over this loss, together with complications which set in, brought on his death, in Santa Cruz, on July 19th, 1920.

On May 5th, 1885, Mr. Ziegler married Elizabeth Charters, born in Stockton, and to them were born the following children, Fred, Lottie, Oscar William, Mrs. Arthur C. Hannigan and Mrs. Clinton E. Spencer, all residents of Stockton. In the earlier days of Stockton, Mr. Ziegler was prominently identified with the Volunteer Fire Department. For thirty-five years he was prominent in the I. O. O. F., being a past noble grand of Stockton Lodge No. 11, and he was a member of the old Turnverein of Stockton.

F. D. Cobb

FRANK DYCKMAN COBB.—Among Stockton's most successful business men, whose time and energies were devoted to its permanent improvement both in its commercial and civic advancement, was Frank Dyckman Cobb, one of the city's most public-spirited citizens and his passing away on May 9, 1919, removed from its activities a staunch supporter of all the community's forward movements. Mr. Cobb was a native of Michigan, born in Kalamazoo on May 1, 1849, the son of Samuel P. and Prudence (Dyckman) Cobb, both representatives of old Eastern families, the father a native of Vermont, while Mrs. Cobb was born in New York, in Onondaga County, on October 9, 1828. After her husband's death, on November 26, 1852, she became the wife of Marshall Hale and passed away in California in January, 1907.

Frank D. Cobb was educated in the public schools of his native state and at Hillsdale College, Mich. At the age of nineteen he entered the bank of his grandfather, E. B. Dyckman, at Schoolcraft, Mich., where he obtained a training that was of value to him in later years. Later he became a partner of his stepfather, Marshall Hale, in a general store at Schoolcraft, under the name of Hale & Cobb. In 1872 he bought out Mr. Hale's interest and went into business with W. B. Cobb, and later he was associated with his brother-in-law, O. H. Barnhart, under the name of Barnhart & Cobb, carrying on a store, lumber yard and a 200-acre farm.

In 1878, Frank D. Cobb disposed of his extensive interests in Michigan and came to San Jose, Cal., where his stepfather and mother and their six children had preceded him in 1875. In 1879 he became a partner in the firm of O. A. Hale & Company, which has since been incorporated under the name of Hale Bros., Inc. In 1884 Mr. Cobb located in Sacramento as manager of Hale Bros., and in the fall of 1885 he came to Stockton as manager of the company's thriving establishment here, and at once became identified with the city's progressive element. As one of the organizers, with O. A. Hale, of the Commercial Savings Bank of Stockton, Mr. Cobb had an important place in guiding the financial affairs of this city and he occupied the office of vice-president from its organization until his death.

Besides his mercantile and banking interests, Mr. Cobb was the owner of a valuable tract of thirty-one and a half acres of the old Shippee place on Cherokee Lane, and here he developed a fine orchard and vineyard. Fine horses were his particular hobby and he owned some fine trotting and driving stock, in which he took great pride and pleasure. He was appointed by Governor James Budd as a member of the State Agricultural Society and was active at the annual State Fair held in Sacramento in the days when trotting and pacing events were the chief attraction. An excellent judge of horses, he frequently acted as judge in the races held at Stockton by the San Joaquin County Fair Association.

In Schoolcraft, Mich., Mr. Cobb was married to Miss Hattie Myers, a native of that state, and the daughter of Henry B. and Mary Ann (Randall) Myers, old Eastern families of Holland Dutch and French descent, respectively. Mr. and Mrs. Cobb became the parents of two children: Boyd S., who lives in Los Angeles, is married and has one daughter; Mrs. Carra Prentis Cobb Giesea of Oakland is the mother of four children. Mr. Cobb was prominent in Masonry and was a member of San Joaquin Lodge No. 19, F. & A. M., Stockton Chapter R. A. M., Stockton Commandery No. 8, K. T., Islam Temple, A. A. O. N. M. S., of San Francisco, and he was a charter member of Stockton Lodge No. 218, B. P. O. E. Mr. Cobb was a man of a very pleasing personality and endowed by nature with much business acumen, coupled with a generous and kind disposition, he was very helpful to the needy and many worthy families in need received generous help from him. However, all his benefactions were accomplished in an unostentatious manner. These traits made him greatly loved by all who knew him and his passing left a void in the community that could not be filled. A splendid type of citizen, Mr. Cobb loved Stockton and always predicted its great future, and the influence of his upright life will ever make itself felt. Mrs. Cobb continues to carry on her husband's charities as far as she is able and in her modest and quiet way still makes her home at the Cobb residence, 430 North Sutter Street, where she is surrounded by a large circle of devoted friends, who appreciate her many attributes of mind and heart.

FORNIA S. CURTIS.—To the honor of being a native of the beautiful state of California Fornia S. Curtis adds the distinction of being the son of one of the state's sturdy pioneers, Bradner Curtis, who survived thirty-two years after locating here, yet lived to see many marvelous strides in civilization and to enjoy many of its benefits. He was born on the parental homestead in San Joaquin County, May 26, 1859, the youngest of four children born to Bradner and Kezia (Benton) Curtis, both natives of New York. Fornia S. Curtis was educated in the schools of his native county and remained at home assisting with the care and responsibility of the home ranch until his father's death in 1881. In 1882 the property was divided and Mr. Curtis raised grain on his and his mother's portion for a few years, then he raised garden truck on his share until he leased it for that same purpose and came to town. He still owns thirty-five acres of the old homestead which is farmed to truck produce and he is living in Stockton practically retired from active business cares.

On February 8, 1893, Mr. Curtis was married to Miss Trinnie M. Helmer, a native of San Francisco, born October 29, 1873, the daughter of William and Trinnie Helmer, natives of Canada and San Jose, Cal., respectively. Three children have blessed the home of Mr. and Mrs. Curtis; Benton F. is a prominent Odd Fellow, being a past noble grand of Truth Lodge No. 55; past patriarch of Parker Encampment and a member of Canton Ridgley; he is a mechanical draftsman with the Stockton Iron Works; he married Miss Harriet Glover, a native of Stockton; Vernon W., the second son, is secretary of Meisner & Sons, Sacramento, a large manufacturing firm; he married Miss Frances McConlogue, born in Benicia, and they have one daughter, June Frances; Helmer B. is office manager for the National Cash Register Company in Stockton; he married Miss Hazel Allen of Healdsburg, Cal. In his political sentiments, Fornia S. Curtis is a Democrat, but notwithstanding this he never lets party lines prevent him from voting for the best candidate for the office in question. He was reared in the faith of the Episcopal Church and has ever adhered to its teachings, and with his family is a communicant of St. John's Episcopal Church at Stockton, and one of its staunch supporters, Mrs. Curtis is a member of the Woman's Auxiliary of the Y. M. C. A. and the Woman's Relief Corps G. A. R. Personally Mr. Curtis is a man of much worth, integrity and earnestness of purpose, and throughout San Joaquin County, where his entire life has been spent, he is esteemed as one of its best citizens.

HON. CHARLES LAMB.—A resident of California from his earliest recollections, the late Charles Lamb was a typical and thorough Californian in his tastes, although he spent considerable time in other localities, where he passed through many interesting experiences as a cowboy and later a mining prospector. Mr. Lamb was born at Charleston, Lee County, Iowa, on January 18, 1859, and when he was nine months old his parents, James and Sarah Lamb, crossed the plains to California, first locating in Amador County, but later settling in the northern part of San Joaquin County. Here Charles Lamb was reared on the home ranch, attending the country schools, and remaining there until he was twenty-one, when he started out to see something of the world.

Going to Mason Valley, Nev., Mr. Lamb did not remain there long, but continued on to Eastern Oregon, where for a year he rode the range, an experience that proved of untold value in later years, giving him a rugged constitution which enabled him to withstand exposure and hardship. From Oregon Mr. Lamb returned to California, and for fourteen years engaged in ranching and stockraising in Tulare County, going to Los Angeles in 1894, where for two years he was in the employ of the Los Angeles Street Railway. Leaving there, he made the long journey to Alaska, reaching the Yukon district in June, 1896, before the discovery of gold made that locality famous. He took up a number of mining claims, which yielded large returns, the most productive being the Number 8 El Dorado Creek mine. His experiences in the rugged North would have made an interesting volume, could they have been written, so primitive were the conditions at that time. There were no steamboats on the upper Yukon and he and his companions were obliged to pack their supplies across the mountains to the river, where they constructed boats in which they navigated the lake and descended the river. Hardships and privations met them on every hand, but thanks to his sturdy physique, Mr. Lamb was able to come through them all safely. He later returned to Stockton, but made frequent trips to Alaska, looking after his mining interests there, meanwhile becoming more and more interested in farming in San Joaquin County, in which he made an outstanding success. He owned considerable ranch land in the county, and on his ranch at Newhope, now called Thornton, he was extensively engaged in raising grain and beans and was attended with very good success.

At Visalia on December 16, 1887, Mr. Lamb was married to Miss Belle Norcross, a native of the typical old New England town of Farmington, Maine, and one daughter blessed their union, Edna, the wife of Amerigo E. Gianelli, and they have a son, Edward. After his initial trip to Alaska, Mr. Lamb was accompanied by his wife on his subsequent trips, with the exception of one year. As the country improved and became less rough and crude, she enjoyed the experience of the trips, having made both the outside and inside passages to the frozen North. In 1897 and 1900 they were also accompanied by their daughter.

Mr. Lamb was a staunch Republican, active in the affairs of his party and was a member of the assembly of the California State Legislature from Stockton in the thirty-fourth session, 1919, and while there served on important committees, taking a leading part in progressive legislation. During his mining career, Mr. Lamb with his family passed their winters in San Francisco, where he had many warm friends among the business and professional men, being almost as well known there as in Stockton. After 1912 they made their home in Stockton and here on January 6, 1920, Mr. Lamb passed away, while still a member of the assembly. He was a very popular member of Stockton Lodge No. 218, B. P. O. E. A self-made man in every sense of the term, Mr. Lamb left behind him an honored record in all of his affairs in which he had met with an unusual degree of success.

REV. FR. WILLIAM B. O'CONNOR.—"If you knew him well as a man you caught the full meaning of the truth that human nature is made in the image and likeness of God. If you knew him as a priest you caught the full meaning of the truth that ministers of God are anointed from on high with a touch of divinity itself. As a man and as a priest he was all that heaven and earth desire." Such a man was Father William Bernard O'Connor, who for forty-three years served in the Master's vineyard, and forty of those years were spent in Stockton and San Joaquin County, laboring in an humble field and working in silence, making no noise, no pretensions. The governing spirit of his life can be summed up in one simple statement that he never had a selfish thought and that his work was never done.

William Bernard O'Connor was born in the parish of Ballyhea, Charleville, County Cork, Ireland, in October, 1841, the son of John and Mary (Rea) O'Connor, who were farmers and were able to give their children the advantage of having a private teacher in their own home. At an early age William B. was sent to Mount Mellory, a famous educational institution in Ireland, conducted by the Trappist Fathers. Here he finished his courses at the age of twenty-one, then felt called to the priesthood and soon made up his mind that God called him to labor in his vineyard. In 1863, he entered All Hallows College, where he read Philosophy and Theology and received his ecclesiastical training. On June 24, 1868, he was ordained and at once was assigned to the Archdiocese of San Francisco.

With twenty-one other priests young Father O'Connor left Ireland on the ship City of Boston for New York—this vessel, by the way, was lost with all on board on its next return trip from Ireland. After a voyage of eleven days the vessel landed in New York on August 17; here he spent a short time and then went to Earlville, Ill., whither his brothers and sisters had located upon their arrival in America a few years previous, and after spending a month visiting he continued his journey to San Francisco by way of Cape Horn. Immediately reporting to Archbishop Alemany, Father O'Connor was made assistant to Father Grey in St. Patrick's parish in San Francisco; later he was transferred to St. Joseph's Church in that city. So well did he discharge the duties imposed upon him that the young curate made a deep impression with the archbishop and he sent him to Stockton to take charge of St. Mary's parish, which included the outlying country and districts tributary to Stockton. He celebrated his first mass in Stockton on March 19, 1872, and from that day until he died he toiled unceasingly for his church, his people and humanity, whatever their creed. Entering upon his new labors with vigor and quiet determination he toiled unremittingly for the salvation of the souls of his people. He always found time to listen to their troubles and to counsel with them; often his disinterested judgment was sought by others than Catholics, upon matters pertaining to their business and family affairs. He gave advice and encouragement to all who came to him and locked forever in his breast the confidences thus reposed in him.

Engraved by Sampson Low, 11, Abchurch Lane, London, E.C. 4

Chas Lamb

Father O'Connor soon began to plan improvements here, in fact he was always planning to better conditions and to carry forward the work of his Master. In 1875 he made application to establish a convent under the management of the Sisters of the Order of St. Dominic. Arrangements were made to conform to his request and with the generous assistance of Captain C. M. Weber, who furnished a site and financial aid, also aid from other sources, St. Agnes Academy was completed and dedicated on March 17, 1876. A few years later he built St. Joseph's School for the accommodation of the small children unable to attend the convent. The Sisters from the Academy were put in charge. The consummation of this wish only gave impetus to his next desire—the establishment of a parochial school for boys. Father O'Connor made arrangements to have the boys receive instructions from the Sisters and classes were formed in a frame building at the northwest corner of San Joaquin and Washington streets. Upon the recommendation of Cardinal Gibbons, Father O'Connor made up his mind that he would do everything possible to induce the Brothers of Mary, whose parent house is in Dayton, Ohio, to come to Stockton. His labors bore fruit and in August, 1884, they took charge of the school. This was the first advent of the Brothers of Mary in the West; now the Brothers are teaching in many cities in California.

Always looking ahead, Father O'Connor saw the necessity of having a larger plot of ground for their cemetery than the one block of ground already in use. Taking the matter to Captain Weber, he again showed his generosity by a free gift of land now embraced in the San Joaquin Cemetery to be consecrated as God's acre. In 1893, this tireless worker began making arrangements in and about the church. This task was completed on June 24, the twenty-fifth anniversary of his advent in Stockton and he was given a large reception on this, his silver jubilee. Father O'Connor was presented with a purse of $1,000 on condition that he use the money for himself. But he stated he accepted the gift without conditions, and later applied the entire amount to the church. Another building, which is the result of his endeavors is the modern parsonage, erected in keeping with the dignity of the parish and a comfortable home for the priests. It was furnished under his personal direction, and it was only several years later that some of his friends discovered that he had no rug and slept on an old bed-lounge. It was characteristic of the man, as there was no necessity for this. He was then in poor health and when it was suggested that he put away the old furnishings and have more modern equipment he replied, "There are many that have worse." A little conspiracy was formed and when the good man was out of the city for a day, a carpet was put down and a comfortable bed put in place of the old lounge. Upon his return he noted the changes, conformed to them, remarking in his kindly way, "Somebody has been pretty busy during my absence."

The greatest achievement of Father O'Connor was the founding of St. Joseph's Home, which was dedicated with appropriate ceremonies on March 19, 1899. The good priest well knew that the saddest condition of human life is desolate old age without a home. He saw the need of such a home and conceived the plan for relief. The project seemed so visionary at the time that only the stoutest heart could work out its solution. It needed much money for building and equipment and what money he had was needed in the parish work. He told his plans to J. D. Peters, who immediately gave Father O'Connor $10,000. Miss Julia Weber and others also gave generously and the building was completed in good time. For the following fifteen years he saw old age ministered to as it had never been before and he lived to see the Home take a commanding position among the benevolent institutions of the state. It was here that he passed his last days, cared for by loving hands and enjoying the taste of peace and joy he had so wisely provided for others. The Home, with hospital annex, is provided with all conveniences and comforts and presided over by the Sisters of St. Dominic.

Father O'Connor was a consistent advocate of temperance and organized temperance societies among his people. From his early manhood until his death he never used intoxicating liquors. After a life filled with good deeds and unceasing toil that others might be benefited, Father O'Connor passed away on December 26, 1911. His physical strength was not equal to the task imposed upon it by his indomitable spirit and he retired to St. Joseph's Home, which name he had given the haven of refuge built under his personal supervision. He is sadly missed for he was everywhere that human need was. The sick, the sinning, the sorrowing, the struggling, the unfortunate, the dying—these were his daily schedule. Distress in any form could call him at any hour of the day or night, and he always brought a cheerful heart. He spent himself for others, he never looked for recognition, but screened his good works behind a modesty, real, inherent, simple and true. He was no ordinary man and was respected by men of all creeds.

In reviewing a life like that, which never knew a selfish thought, which abounded in heroism that sounded the last depths of unselfish devotion, as was shown during the scourge of smallpox that once visited Stockton, we need not mind the circumstance that he achieved in an humble and restricted sphere when we venture to award him a place among the great; for we can say of him as was said of another, "Prime ministers and princes are private citizens beside a man like that." But his work is done. He brought his life work to a full completion. He was a saint on earth. In commemoration of his life work a statue was erected and unveiled in the grounds of St. Joseph's Home and Hospital on June 7, 1914.

ANDREW McCORMICK.—It is very interesting to write the story of a successful business man, who is also at the same time very progressive, enterprising and liberal, giving of his energy and best endeavor to improve and build up the community where he resides. Such a man is Andrew McCormick, a representative business and mining man of Stockton, who was born in Sonora, Tuolumne County, Cal., December 17, 1861. Ever since 1854 the McCormick family have been prominently identified with the history of California, for Daniel McCormick, the father of our subject, a native of Ireland, came from Philadelphia around Cape Horn in a sailing vessel in 1854 and settled near Sonora. He had emigrated in youth to Manayunk, near Philadelphia, where he married Margaret McCormick, also a native of Ireland, who had also come to Philadelphia in her youth. After his arrival in Sonora Mr. McCormick engaged in mining for a short time, his family joining him a few years later. Later on he became proprietor of a general merchandise store in Sonora. In those days gold dust was the medium of exchange for all supplies. This dust he sent to the mint in San Francisco and aside from some gold pieces he received, the balance was deposited to his credit with Donohue, Kelly & Company, San Francisco, from which he checked it out. Later he engaged in the cattle business and operated a butcher shop and in time became a large landholder. He passed away at the age of fifty-five, his widow surviving him until 1908, passing away at the age of seventy-three.

Mr. and Mrs. McCormick had six children, all boys: John was in charge of the Stockton business of the M. McCormick Company; he served as councilman and died in San Francisco in 1907; James died at Sonora in 1905. These two were born in Philadelphia, while the four youngest were born at Sonora. Daniel died in Stockton about 1910; Joseph passed away in Stockton in 1902; Andrew is the subject of this review; Frank, who was president of M. McCormick Company until his death in 1908, passed away at their Linden ranch where he had gone for a few days on account of his health. Their mother was a woman of wonderful business acumen and kept the boys together in business, advising them to work for themselves and be united in their efforts. She was energetic and active and left her impress on the community for her sterling qualities and her strong personality. Her influence for good was appreciated by the people, and at her passing she was deeply mourned by her family and friends. Her memory was very dear and precious to her sons and her advice was followed, for they continued in business together until they passed away, dwelling together in harmony and peace and cooperating agreeably, each doing his part and aiding in making the business a success.

Andrew, the fifth son, was born at Sonora, Cal., on December 17, 1861, and was reared on his father's ranch and received his education in the public schools. At an early age he went into partnership with his brothers and engaged in the cattle business and in connection ran a meat market in Sonora, at one time owning 9,000 acres of land in Tuolumne County on which ranged 900 head of cattle. In 1884 the brothers bought 320 acres of land near Linden and raised grain for a period of seven years; then in 1891 they purchased a meat market in Stockton on Center Street owned by John Gross, where they carried on a large business, at the same time maintaining the meat market at Sonora; later their business was removed to the corner of Main and Center streets, where they remodeled the old building for a modern butcher shop and cold storage plant; later this became the headquarters with branch stores in many other parts of Stockton. Aside from the raising of stock, they bought cattle from all over Sacramento and San Joaquin counties for their own abattoir and also shipped to San Francisco. They built a large abattoir on the French Camp Road on a tract of 600 acres. After doing business for some years as McCormick Bros., they incorporated as M. McCormick Company, in honor of their mother. She had always been their guiding star and by her influence had kept the family together in business. When his brothers had passed away, Andrew assumed full charge of the business and continued it and in the course of time increased it to large proportions, putting in all of his time in looking after the business, ranches and cattle, as well as the mines. After making a success of the business, he finally divided the property among the heirs and meantime he purchased some of the interests. He continues to hold the M. McCormick Company and carries on his business that way; he still owns the two ranches, one on French Camp Road and the Linden ranch on which he has installed four pumping plants, devoted to the raising of vegetables and fruit; the French Camp ranch is also irrigated with a pumping plant. In 1884 Mr. McCormick moved to his ranch near Linden and made his home there until he removed to Stockton in 1900. He owns a number of valuable gold producing mines in Tuolumne County, including the Golden Gate mine, the Draper, and the McCormick mine, which he is developing. He is the vice-president of the Sacramento Gas Company, which was formerly the Sacramento Natural Gas Company, established by a brother, John McCormick and two associates; this company being the first to develop natural gas in Sacramento.

The marriage of Mr. McCormick united him with Miss Zelma Paradis, a native of Manistee, Mich., and they are the parents of three children, Jack P., Elaine, and Daniel. By a former marriage Andrew McCormick has one son, Le Roy, who was in the merchant marine during the World War. Mr. McCormick is a member of Stockton Lodge No. 218, B. P. O. E. He is a truly self-made man in every sense of the word, for he has forged his way upward step by step until he has become a man of means and independence, wielding a wide influence for good in his community. A man of pleasing personality, with affable manners, he is well informed and it is a pleasure to meet and converse with this interesting pioneer.

HENRY TINKHAM.—"I believe that all things are for the best." "Do unto others as you would be done by." This was the philosophy and the life axiom of Henry Tinkham, who was born in 1820, in the old Green Mountain State, of a Scotch father and an English mother. The family can be traced back to the great-grandfather, who in 1776 served as a captain in the Revolutionary war; and his grandfather was a private in the war of 1812.

Young Henry, like all of the New England boys of that day, worked hard all summer on the little rock fenced farm, where, as he declared, "It took all summer to raise enough to live on through the winter."

Andrew M. McCormick

He had but two suits of clothing a year, the cloth being woven and made up by his mother; Henry, with the other children in the family, walked to church, barefoot through the snow, carrying his shoes under his arm, so that he might wear them bright and shining in the meeting-house.

During the winter months he attended the district school, the teacher being such as Goldsmith describes, "A man severe he was and stern to view, I knew him well, and every truant knew." On one occasion the teacher gave Henry a whipping for misbehavior, sometimes, however, the pupils gave the teacher the whipping, but in this instance Henry got the birch rod, the teacher always keeping a supply on hand, as the birch trees grew near by. On going home he received no consolation from his father, the latter quietly remarking, "Now, Henry, if you get another whipping at school, I'll give you one when you come home." His father, Daniel Tinkham, was a man beloved alike by his family and the community in which he lived, for his sterling qualities of heart and mind, but severe in discipline and unwavering in his ideas of right and wrong, he believed in upholding parental, educational, civil and religious authority.

At the age of eighteen Henry Tinkham obtained a position as a clerk in the Woodstock dry goods store, but not liking the work, for he was a strong, active, ambitious young man, he later took passage on a stage for Boston, and asked for work in a hardware store. The proprietor said to him, "All right, come around in a few days." The stage journey had taken all of his money, and the applicant replied: "Well, I am out of money and I want work now." The employer immediately put him to work; he remained about a year, then became an apprentice meat cutter in one of the markets of old Fanenil hall, historic as the birthplace of American liberty. He was employed in the meat cutting business three years and during this time, in the words of the Yankee song, he went "sparkling Sunday night" and during a part of the time he was one of the quartette in the Park Street Unitarian Church. The result of his "sparkling" was his marriage to Frances Baxter, the family being one of the oldest in Boston. The fruits of this marriage were four sons and four daughters, viz.: George Henry, Frances Isadore, Etawah (Etta), Elmer, Lillian, now Mrs. Thomas Shaw of San Diego; Edgar, Marian, Mrs. E. L. Gnekow of Stockton, and Alfred, who passed away in 1922. The father died in 1896, the oldest daughter in 1901, and the wife and mother in 1905.

Between the marriage and death of Mr. Tinkham there lies fifty years of an industrious, honorable life in business, home building, protecting and sustaining; the home was his life, the business an auxiliary, as "His home the spot of earth supremely blest,

A dearer, sweeter spot than all the rest."

To build the home, when the cry of gold resounded throughout the east, with a company of one hundred and sixteen young men he started for California, expecting to make his fortune in a few months and return. Chartering the bark Lenark, they loaded her with provisions sufficient to last two years, and after a long voyage of six months, September 12, 1848, they anchored in the harbor of San Francisco. The company parted, some going to the mines, Mr. Tinkham being of this number. They sailed up the San Joaquin river seven days, during which time it rained heavily, and they were compelled to sleep in their wet blankets on the open deck. As a result Mr. Tinkham was taken sick with fever. The party he was with purchased a two-wheeled ox cart and oxen to carry their supplies to the mines, and after placing Mr. Tinkham on top of the load they started to the Sierras. The hot sun's rays beat upon the open cart as it jolted over the rough road and added to the already intense sufferings of the sick man. Although the teachings of his youth helped him to bear patiently the ills of life, yet one day, when very hungry and thirsty, he resolved, if die he must, to die with a full stomach. The party had gone on a bear hunt, leaving him alone, and crawling from the cart, he found some crackers and cheese and the water canteen. He ate and drank all he desired, the result of which was surprising, for two days later he had recovered from his sickness.

Locating at Hawkins' Bar the party began mining, and after several days sluicing they obtained about $3,000 in gold dust. One night it rained heavily and the following morning when the party arose everything was gone. Money and tools had been swept away in the flood that came rolling down the canyon. Mr. Tinkham then came to the conclusion that he had had all the mining he wanted.

Returning to Stockton he hired out to Harry Morton, a butcher, for $300 a month. The following morning his employer said: "Can you dress a beef?" "Yes, I guess so," Tinkham replied. "Well, go out and shoot one of those steers and bring it in." The cattle were running loose where now stands the courthouse. Never in his life had he dressed a bullock, but he was an unerring rifle shot, and in the "green hills" of Vermont, many a time he had gone bear or woodchuck shooting. Taking a rifle he singled out an animal and shot it through the brain, and somehow caused it to bleed profusely. Fortunately a butcher was dressing a beef nearby and he finally gave the amateur butcher a lesson in the business, and from that time on he had no trouble. Two years later Mr. Tinkham opened a meat market at the corner of Main and Sutter streets, and in 1854 he opened the City Market opposite the Yosemite hotel, and for more than fifty years he was engaged in the business.

He made and lost several fortunes; thousands of dollars were lost in bad debts, for he would not become involved in lawsuits nor engage in any transaction that would involve the good name which he so highly prized, or cause any suffering to a poor debtor or his family. Very sympathetic in his nature and generous and charitable even beyond sound judgment he believed that the getting of money could never be justified in doing a wrong act.

He was for many years an Odd Fellow and a member of Charity Lodge No. 6 and Parker Encampment No. 3 and during the four years of his patient, uncomplaining sickness they faithfully fulfilled their obligation. He was also a volunteer fireman, being a member of Eureka No. 2, and was a member of the San Joaquin County Pioneers. In politics he was a Republican, and at one election, at the "solicitation of friends" his name was placed before the convention for sheriff. They promised to support him, but this they failed to do, and it so disgusted him he never again would consent to run for office, for a lie to him was a lie, whether in business or politics.

A man of fine sensibilities and tastes, he despised vulgar language or stories, and had no regard for unclean men or actions. In his family he was the head, his word was law, yet he was never rude or harsh in tone or action, but gentle, kind and considered generous and unselfish, and ever thoughtful of those he loved. His family all present, he passed from earth as quietly as a sleeping child, his life an open book without a stain.

LAFAYETTE SELLMAN.—The career which this history narrates began in Canandaigua, Ontario County, N. Y., November 23, 1826, and closed in Stockton, Cal., March 25, 1889. Between these dates are recorded the events of an industrious and useful life, whose later efforts are perpetuated in a prosperous enterprise known as the Stockton City Laundry, one of the most up-to-date and reliable enterprises of its kind in the city. The founder, Lafayette Sellman, was reared on a farm in the east; until reaching young manhood, when, in 1849, he set out for the gold fields of California, coming via Panama. His first and only experience as a miner was in the mines at Brown's Flat, Tuolumne County, where he became convinced of the uncertainties attending such a life and wisely determined to give it up and engage in something from which he could hope for more stable returns.

Following his mining venture Mr. Sellman went to Sonora and for a time engaged in the cattle and dairy business there, but it was not until he came to Stockton that he was satisfied that he had found the place offering the most inducements, both in the way of business prospects and as a suitable place to make his future home. While he was satisfied that he had found the right place for a location, still he had a desire to see Oregon, and thither he went soon afterward, but the fact that he remained only twenty-four hours before returning to Stockton is ample evidence that he had no desire to change his opinion. It was after his return from Oregon, about 1871, that he established the nucleus of the laundry business which with the passing of years has grown to its present large proportions.

Extensive improvements, made necessary on account of its growth, have made it one of the best-equipped laundries on the Pacific Coast. The expenditure of $50,000 has made it possible to install an electric-drive system of 100 horsepower, all run by a single motor; there has also been added a fine equipment of modern machinery, such as a steam pressure shirt-ironer, a special ironer for neckbands and cuffs. The curtain stretcher is a late invention, $9,000 has been spent in remodeling the working room alone; the flat-work ironer was installed at a cost of $6,000. A machine for softening water was installed at a large cost in the new building, which is 50x150 feet in size, and through the introduction of this machine, the use of soaps and sodas has been greatly reduced. A girl's rest room has also been provided, with lockers for each girl, and hot and cold water, and an attractive lunchroom add to their comforts and pleasures. Since the death of Mr. Sellman, the business has been continued by his wife and children, Mrs. Sellman being president, Mrs. J. Y. Coates, secretary and treasurer, and Herman G. Meyer filling the two offices of manager and vice-president. As president of the company Mrs. Sellman has endeavored to follow out the wise policy of her husband in the management of the business, and that she has been successful is seen in the continually increasing patronage.

Mr. Sellman was first married in New York, this marriage uniting him with Miss Margaret Coon, by whom seven children were born, all now deceased. The mother of these children passed away in 1875, and on December 18, 1878, in San Francisco, Mr. Sellman married Anna Shafer, a native daughter of San Joaquin County and the daughter of Adam Shafer, a native of Germany and a California pioneer, who followed stock raising and teaming in Calaveras County. Six children were born of this marriage as follows: Henry Lafayette, is now deceased; Mrs. Grace S. Coates; Mrs. Maude S. Mathers; Julia died at five and one-half years of age; Mrs. Elsie S. Pike; and Mrs. Ivy F. Peters, all of Stockton. Throughout his residence in Stockton, Mr. Sellman was one of the city's most earnest and devoted citizens, and for two terms served efficiently as a member of the city council. He was also a well-known member of the Independent Order of Red Men, holding membership in Iroquois Tribe, in which body he passed through all the chairs, and he was also a member of the Pioneers Society of the county. Mrs. Sellman is a member of Lebanon Lodge, Daughters of Rebekah, Stockton Hive No. 2, Lady Maccabees, and of Kauwaunta Council, Degree of Pocahontas.

MRS. ANNA SELLMAN.—A woman of splendid attainments and much native business acumen who is greatly interested in the growth and development of Stockton is Mrs. Anna Sellman, a native daughter of San Joaquin County, who was born at French Camp. Her father, Adam Shafer, came from Germany to Canada when about twelve years of age, where being thrown upon his own resources he bravely made his own livelihood. On the discovery of gold in California he started for the New Eldorado and on reaching California engaged in teaming and farming. In Stockton he was married to Mrs. Julia (Behrent) Kuhn, a native of Germany, who came to California in pioneer days with her first husband, but he passed away here in early days. After their marriage they engaged in farming and stockraising near what was then Telegraph City. Both have now passed to the great beyond. This pioneer couple were blessed with five children: Anna, Mrs. Sellman of this review; Henry died in March, 1920; George resides in Tuolumne County; Julia died at four years; Albert lives near Escalon.

Anna Shafer's childhood was spent on the farm where she attended the public school in the Telegraph district. When she was fifteen years of age her mother died and five years later her father also passed away and she then came to Stockton to make her home. Here she met Lafayette Sellman and the acquaintance resulted in their marriage in 1878.

Mr. Sellman was an early settler and successful business man in Stockton, who passed away in 1889, and after his death Mrs. Sellman assumed the management of his affairs and continued to build up the laundry on the plan he had started and the property has been greatly enlarged and improved and is still owned by the family. Through Mr. Sellman's capability and energy the City Laundry was the largest and leading one in the county in his day and Mrs. Sellman with the same pride has continued by progressive methods and expending of vast sums to keep in the lead, being ably assisted in her endeavor by her daughter and her manager, Mr. Meyer. About 1892 she built her present home on East Weber

Lafayette Selman

Engd by Campbell Brothers for Historic Record Co.

Anna Sellman

Eng'd by Campbell Brothers for Historic Record

Street, and it has been the family home ever since.

About fifteen years ago she incorporated the Stockton City Laundry, of which she is president. It is a close corporation owned by the members of her family; the establishment being one of the leading enterprises of the city, is notably a member of the Stockton Chamber of Commerce and the Merchants Association.

Mrs. Sellman is a member of the Central Methodist Episcopal Church, is active in its societies and contributes liberally to its benevolences. She is a member of Lebanon Lodge, Rebekahs, Ladies of the Maccabees and Kauwaunita Council, Degree of Pocahontas. Her enterprise also finds other outlets than the laundry, for she is a stockholder in the City Bank, also the Commercial and Savings Bank, the Union Safe Deposit Bank and the Stockton Savings and Loan Society. Being an ardent protectionist she is naturally a strong Republican.

JACOB BRACK.—A name worthy of perpetuation in the annals of San Joaquin County as that of a pioneer whose faith in its future was itself an incentive to others, is that of Jacob Brack. Good reason had he to be thankful that he resolved to come to California when he heard of the discovery of gold; the mines did not yield to him of their riches, but the soil rewarded his cultivation with bountiful crops, the lands rewarded his faith by swift increase in value, and by vessel and railroad his products were carried to the markets of the world. This honored pioneer of 1849 was born in Switzerland, February 20, 1825, being a son of Jacob and Mary (Kestler) Brack, both natives of that country. After having obtained a common school education he was sent to a gymnasium, where he remained a student until eighteen years of age. About this time he decided to seek a livelihood in the New World, and in 1844 he sailed to the United States, landing at New Orleans, where he proceeded up the Mississippi river to Burlington, Iowa, and from there went to Galena, Ill., for the purpose of securing employment in the lead mines. The work kept him steadily engaged, but offered no opportunity for advancement, and when in 1848 he heard of the discovery of gold in California he immediately determined to go to the Far West.

As a member of a train commanded by Captain Schoe and consisting of a large equipment of wagons drawn by oxen, Mr. Brack crossed the plains during 1849, and encountered many thrilling adventures while following the trail laid out by Capt. John C. Fremont. Upon arriving at Placerville he tried his luck at mining. A brief experience convinced him that he could achieve greater results at other employment, and accordingly he began to work for Sargent Bros., prominent stockmen of that day. In 1850 he bought a small tract in the vicinity of Woodbridge, San Joaquin County, and immediately embarked in ranching for himself. The following year he went to the tule lands of the county, where he began to raise cattle and sheep, also raised various general farm products. With the Sargent brothers as partners Mr. Brack purchased a tract of 1,500 acres of land, the subsequent sale of which brought a fair profit. Next he bought 10,000 acres, for which he paid $200 to close the deal, and went into debt for the balance of the $50,000 constituting the purchase price. With shrewd foresight and the utmost confidence in the future of this region, he believed himself justified in burdening himself with such a debt, and events proved his sagacity. A portion of the land had a frontage on the waterway, which enabled him to begin extensive operations on an independent basis, and he raised large quantities of barley and wheat. Selling one-half of the immense tract, at the end of two years from the time of purchase he still owned one-half of the property and was entirely free from debt.

The business grew to such proportions that Mr. Brack purchased a vessel and shipped his own products to San Francisco and other markets. In addition, to secure facilities for freight by land, he was one of those who built a railroad from Lodi to Spring Valley, Calaveras County, this being now a branch of the Southern Pacific Railroad. By land and by water his products reached the markets of the state and brought fair returns for his labor and his investment. His name became known as that of a prosperous and sagacious rancher, and when in 1906 he retired from the active management of the ranch and removed to Lodi, it was a distinct loss to the agricultural interests of the region. Throughout active life he made ranching his principal occupation, but he had other interests.

The marriage of Mr. Brack in 1854 united him with Miss Lena Meyer, who was born in Germany, came to California in 1852, and died in San Joaquin County in 1905 at the age of seventy-six years. They were the parents of eight children; Mrs. Mary Diers, died in San Francisco; Henry; John, both of Stockton; Mrs. Doretta Keller, of Lodi; Mrs. J. H. Schlect, of San Francisco; Jacob, of San Francisco; Miss Anna Brack, of Lodi and Caroline, died 1887. There are (1922) nine living grandchildren and seven great-grandchildren. Mr. Brack passed away on March 4, 1912. He was a man of sterling qualities, a good and generous parent, and an upright citizen.

BRADNER CURTIS.—It is ever interesting to recount the life events of the pioneer, who endured the privations of this new country and passed through the hardships and dangers incident to a sea voyage in a sailing vessel following the gold discovery in California. Bradner Curtis was born in Williamson, Wayne county, New York, January 9, 1825, and in young manhood he learned to be a pattern maker and was employed by his brother, who engaged in the foundry business and in manufacturing agricultural implements, up to the time he left for the West.

During his school days Bradner Curtis formed the acquaintance of Miss Kezia Benton, who was born in Canajoharie, N. Y., December 20, 1822, was educated in Canajoharie Academy, on the Mohawk River, and still later was a pupil in Cortland Academy, both in New York State. She was a daughter of Hiram and Cynthia (Hodge) Benton, on her mother's side, being a descendant of a colonist who came in the Mayflower. The acquaintance of the young people formed during school days ripened into a deeper affection that resulted in their marriage September 23, 1849. In December of the same year, they sailed from New York harbor bound for California, on a vessel that had formerly done service as a packet, but had been reconstructed for use as a sailing craft. Eight months were consumed in the voyage, although they were at no time out of sight of land, and while passing Valparaiso they could hear the natives calling to them. Some of the delay was due to the fact that at Cape Horn they were compelled to lay over for one month, owing to heavy storms prevailing at the time. They reached San Francisco in July, 1850, and after remaining there for two days, having been met in the meantime by Mrs. Curtis' two brothers, Hyland and Byron Benton, the latter conducted them to Mormon Gulch, near Tuttletown, Tuolumne County, where the brothers lived while they teamed from Stockton. Mr. Curtis also became interested in mining and started a trading camp there, but finally hired a man to help him at that, while Mrs. Curtis took charge of the trading camp and she baked pies and pastry, which were rapidly bought up by the miners and Indians. Mr. Curtis was the first man to build a sluiceway on the creek at Columbia and this creek was named after him. Mrs. Curtis was the first white woman in the mines near Sonora, Tuolumne County. They remained in that vicinity for about three years, during which time he made sufficient money to enable him to start ranching here.

Removing to Stockton from Tuolumne County, Mr. Curtis bought 320 acres of land just north of the city, some of it being purchased for twelve dollars per acre; this land was a part of a Spanish grant which Captain Weber had bought in the early days. The assessed valuation of this land is now $200 per acre; this ranch was farmed to grain. Thirty acres of this tract was sold in 1885 to the Caledonian Club for $10,000; later it was bought by the Stockton Electric Railroad Company and sold by them to the City of Stockton for $30,000. It is now Stockton's amusement park, known as Oak Park, and is valued at $75,000. Mr. Curtis named this thirty acres Goodwater Grove, from a fine well of cold water on the place; this grove was used as a picnic ground for many years by the residents of Stockton. Mr. Curtis bought a block of land in Stockton from Charles Whale, bounded by Center, Commerce, Vine and Rose streets. At the time of purchase it was a grain field and Mr. Curtis built a house on this property and made his home there until his death, March 4, 1881. Later Mrs. Curtis moved a house from the ranch and these two houses are still standing on the property. Mrs. Curtis has reached the advanced age of 100 years, December 20, 1922. Mr. Curtis was a prominent Odd Fellow for many years, holding a membership in Charity lodge. Mrs. Curtis erected a family vault in the Odd Fellows' cemetery at Sonora, where in life Mr. Curtis had made his first start. Four children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Curtis: Mrs. Belle K. Jackson, born in Tuttletown; Frank B. and Forest D., both deceased; and Fonia S., all born in San Joaquin County.

REES BOWEN THOMPSON.—The life of this early pioneer began in Tazewell County, Va., February 10, 1830, and closed in Oakland, Cal., July 3, 1908. Between these dates were enacted a life of usefulness exerted unselfishly toward the betterment of his adopted home in the west. Leaving his southern home in the year of 1850, Rees Bowen Thompson came to California across the plains, going direct to Hangtown, now Placerville, where he engaged in mining. After he had remained there a year he returned East for his parents, with whom he had moved from Virginia to Missouri. With his parents Mr. Thompson again took up his westward march in 1852, crossing the plains this time as he had done two years previously. Coming direct to San Joaquin County, he settled eighteen miles from Stockton near a place which has since become known as New Hope, where he purchased a large ranch and engaged in the cattle business until the year 1880.

Mr. Thompson's interest in and qualifications for public life led to his election as representative to the Legislature from San Joaquin County in 1880, at which time he was the only member of the Democratic party in the house. He was elected by a large majority, his great popularity with both parties taking many votes from his opponent on the Republican ticket. After his election to the Legislature Mr. Thompson disposed of a portion of his ranch property and the following year, 1881, removed to Oakland, which was his home thereafter until his death, July 3, 1908. While living in New Hope he was united in marriage, July 4, 1865, with Miss Josephine Hardesty, a native of Indiana, who died in 1910 in Oakland. Mr. Thompson was a man of much worth, integrity and earnestness of purpose, and it can truly be said of him that he was representative of the best in American citizenship, living up to a high standard in public and private life.

MRS. MARY ANN WILSON.—A California citizen since 1860, Mrs. Mary Ann Wilson owns a fine estate on the French Camp Road, ten miles south of Stockton, which she has handled to good advantage since her husband's death, but she has now turned the active management over to her son, James A. Wilson. She was born at Peoria, Ill., March 17, 1849, a daughter of James and Catherine (McCue) Kenney, both natives of Ireland. Her father, James Kenney, came to America in a sailing vessels in the early '40s and settled in Illinois; in 1852 he removed to Minnesota and remained there until coming to California. In 1860 the family started across the plains from St. Joseph, Mo., and almost eight months were consumed by the journey. Arriving in San Joaquin County, Mr. Kenney was employed by Captain Weber on his extensive ranch near Stockton, and later he farmed 160 acres in the vicinity of Wallace, which was his home at the time of his death in 1892, Mrs. Kenney surviving him until 1903.

Mary Ann Kenney was reared in Stockton, attending the Center Street school, and later she attended Dr. Hunt's seminary in Stockton. In 1877 she was married to John Peter Wilson, a native of Gothenburg, Sweden, where he was born April 23, 1838. In the early '70s Mr. Wilson came to America and first settled in Michigan; later he came to California, where his brother John had already settled. Mr. Wilson was a farmer by occupation and was thrifty and economical so that when he came to San Joaquin County he invested his savings in a splendid ranch, where Mrs. Wilson now resides. He was a charter member of the Ripon lodge of Odd Fellows and in politics was a staunch Republican. He was a successful agriculturist and was an esteemed resident of his locality. He passed away in January, 1910, mourned by his widow, five children and five grandchildren; the children of the pioneer couple being as follows: John A. was a graduate of the law department of the University of California and was a successful practicing attorney in Stockton when he passed away in July, 1919. He is survived by his widow and two children: Kathryn married D. R. Beebe and has one child, and they live at Coaldale, Canada; Mrs. Ella Frances Olson Powers has one son; James A.; and Joseph A., who is married and has one boy. Mrs.

Mr. & Mrs. J. Williams

Wilson is today one of the venerable pioneer women of San Joaquin County. More than half a century has passed since she arrived in California, and her mind bears the impress of many events which now constitute a part of the history of the county.

THOMAS CUNNINGHAM.—It is interesting, instructive and profitable, on occasions, to review the lives of men who have risen through their own efforts to honor and distinction among their fellowmen. Thomas Cunningham was, perhaps, not only the best-known man in San Joaquin County, but also widely known throughout the state, over which his active career as sheriff in this county, for over a quarter of a century, had carried him. He was a native of County Longford, Ireland, where he was born on August 17, 1838, the youngest of a family of seven children. When ten years of age he came to the United States with relatives and located in Brooklyn, N. Y. There he served an apprenticeship at the harness-making trade with his brother-in-law, and while so employed devoted his spare time to study and in attendance at night school as he had a chance. He worked there until 1855, when he left for California via Panama, and landed in San Francisco on June 16, 1855. Soon after his arrival there he came to Stockton and found employment with Peachy & Baggs, harness-makers. He afterwards worked in the same line of business for George Ellsworth and H. T. Dorrance. In 1860 he started in business for himself, on Main Street near Eldorado, having bought out the stock of J. W. Scott.

In 1861 Mr. Cunningham was married in Stockton to Miss Catherine Quirk, of the Isle of Man, who died April 4, 1875. They became the parents of three children; Mrs. Lillian May Confer, deceased; Margaret Ella; and Katherine Q., wife of Frank S. Boggs. Mr. Cunningham was a leading member of the old Volunteer Fire Company, and in 1857 was elected a member of the Eureka Engine company No. 2, and he soon stood at the head of the company as its foreman. In 1865 he was chosen chief of the Stockton Fire Department and served in that position for several terms.

In 1865, and again in 1870, Mr. Cunningham was elected a member of the Stockton city council from the third ward; and was distinguished for the soundness of his views upon all matters of public interest presented during his term. It was at this time when the question was before the city council of granting a franchise by which the Stockton & Copperopolis Railroad could gain access to the water front through Weber Avenue. Councilman Cunningham stood alone in determined opposition to the measure; contending that railroads should reach the wharves, mills and warehouses by some obscure route, as is being done today, but when the final vote was taken upon the granting of the franchise, his vote was the only one recorded in the negative. He predicted then in his final stand before the vote was taken, that if the railroad was kept off the avenue, that it would be the main business street of the city, extending as it did from the water front to the Central Pacific depot and out toward the tributary country beyond. One can realize now, after more than forty years, the foresight of this man at that time. It was a long, hard fight to get the steam cars off Weber Avenue, and the boom it has taken as a retail street with splendid, modern buildings since they were removed and the electric street car system substituted is remembered by many of the residents.

In the fall of 1871 Mr. Cunningham was nominated by the Republican party for sheriff of San Joaquin County and unanimously elected. He took office on the first Monday in March, 1872, thus entering upon one of the longest and probably the most notable career of any sheriff on the Pacific Coast. Pessimists on all sides wagged their heads and prophesied that this "harnessmaker" would prove a dismal failure when confronted with the duties of his office, but this adverse criticism proved a blessing in disguise, for it aroused all the latent energies of his mind and indomitable will. From that time until his voluntary retirement in January, 1899, he was continuously in office, and during the unsettled period of the early part of his career he had many opportunities of showing his tact and courage. In the saddle, over mountain passes and through swamps, about the campfire and in the stealthy watch of the silent night, on guard for the good of the commonwealth; from the trailing of Vasquez and his band for 6,000 miles until they were finally run to earth near Los Angeles in 1873, up to the tracking of the train robbers in southern San Joaquin Valley in 1898, just before he retired from office, he took a prominent part in every important man hunt in the state; was at the seat of danger wherever there was a disturbance, as in the Moquelemos grant and other settlers' troubles; and was in general a tower of strength on the side of law and order over the wide territory where his influence was felt and his determination known.

One of the leading characteristics of this remarkable man, that enabled him to hold an office continuously for such a length of time, was his kindly sympathy for even the most hardened criminal. His manhood life abounded in deeds of charity, known only through the recipients of his generosity. Between Thomas Cunningham in civil life and social intercourse with his fellowmen, and Sheriff Cunningham in his constant and fearless efforts for the suppression of crime within his jurisdiction, the line was sharply drawn, and one is at a loss to understand how these two qualities could combine to such a degree in the same individual. An illustration of the peculiar tact and strategic ability that stood this veteran sheriff in hand throughout his brilliant career, is the following: When in 1894, during the extreme industrial depression of that year, a branch of that army of unemployed and impecunious men, on their way to Washington to present their grievances to the Government, rendezvoused at Sacramento, and remained for months, exhausting the hospitality of its citizens and disturbing the general peace of the community; the time came when they received orders to move on and they then commenced preparation for a descent upon Stockton. Anticipating this visit Sheriff Cunningham appeared before the board of supervisors and submitted his plan of operation, asking their cooperation to the extent of appropriating a comparatively small sum of money to enable him to prevent this infliction upon the community. The supervisors heartily approved the sheriff's plans, and freely voted the required aid. The "army" was soon on the march; but they had heard of "Tom Cunningham," and approached the borders of this county with forebodings of a hostile reception. On reaching the county line, to their surprise, they were met by the sheriff, wearing his blandest smile, and with assurance of his hearty sympathy for them in their forlorn condition, and that he would do all in his power to forward them toward their ultimate destination. He directed them to place their blankets and luggage on wagons he had drawn up for the purpose and after partaking of a lunch prepared for them, they were ready for the march to the camping ground in the city the sheriff had kindly provided for them. Arrived on Banner Island, a grand feast awaited them, comprising all the substantial and delicacies of the season, and the inner man being fully satisfied, they were in excellent good humor. About this time a tug with two barges, drew up to the landing. The sheriff then informed them he had yet one more proof to offer of his good intentions towards them. He had provided these barges to speed them on their journey toward their destination, to the extent of the navigable waters of the San Joaquin river. This announcement was received with loud acclamations of approval, and they thereupon embarked with alacrity, and were soon ready to bid adieu to Stockton and their good friend, Tom Cunningham.

In the conduct of the affairs of his office, nothing escaped the sheriff's searching scrutiny and he required from his under-sheriff to the humblest attache of the county jail, the same orderly system and thoroughness in the discharge of the duties assigned him, as he observed himself. As an instance of his reputation and influence among the criminal element is the following: A young emigrant from the rural districts of England, after working hard and faithfully for three years on a ranch in the Sacramento Valley, without once leaving the ranch, determined to make a trip to San Francisco and deposit his savings at interest in the Hibernia Bank; so taking a check for his three years' wages, he took the train for the metropolis. Being of a trusting disposition, his fellow boarders in the house where he stopped were not long in finding out the reason of his trip to San Francisco. In a short time he was inveigled into a game of chance, made to endorse the check, and had soon lost every cent. The gamblers then magnanimously loaned him enough money to pay his way back to the ranch, where he arrived heartbroken from the loss of his three years' labor. In due time the check came back with another name endorsed upon it. The case was called to Mr. Cunningham's attention, and on his next trip to the city he took the check along with him. Calling upon his friend, the captain of the San Francisco detective force, he showed him the check and related the story. "Come along with me up the street," said the captain, "we will see what we can do." Arriving at the gambler's place of business, Mr. Cunningham remained outside upon the sidewalk, while the captain went inside. Upon being shown the check, the gambler grew very indignant. "It was his own fault," said the gambler, "he took a chance at the game and lost his money." "He knew nothing about your game," said the captain; "you have robbed the poor man of his three years' savings, and I want the money back." "Where is your evidence?" said the gambler haughtily. "Tom Cunningham is waiting outside; he has come down especially on this thing; you know he generally gets what he goes after. I guess I will call him in." Like a shot the gambler was at the front door peering out stealthily. In a moment he returned trembling like a leaf. "What are you going to do?" said the captain. "Well, don't make any disturbance and I'll dig up this time;" and he did, in hard gold coin to the amount of the check—such was the terror of the crooked fraternity of the name of "Tom Cunningham."

Sheriff Cunningham was known and honored by every officer of the law in California, from Oregon to San Diego, and from the mountains to the sea, for his bravery, sagacity, sterling integrity, and self-sacrificing devotion to the duties of his high and responsible office. For forty-five years Stockton was his home. Anything that came up for its betterment found him a ready supporter. Public-spirited, always giving aid to those less fortunate than himself; and it will never be known how much he gave away in private relief. He belonged to many orders which worked for the benefit of man. He was a member of Morning Star Lodge, F. & A. M.; Stockton Chapter, R. A. M.; Stockton Council, R. & S. M.; and Stockton Commandery, K. T. He was also a member of Charity Lodge, I. O. O. F., having joined in 1858; Stockton Lodge B. P. O. E.; Charter Oak Lodge, K. P.; and Iroquois Tribe of Red Men. He died suddenly of heart disease at Tuttle town, Tuolumne County, on November 26, 1900, while on a journey to a ratification meeting at Sonora after the political campaign of that year. His name was known throughout the length of California, and throughout the adjoining states, as a name that carried with it respect and honor among law-abiding citizens and fear among the criminal element; and his name stands out with that of C. M. Weber, the founder of the city, as one that Stockton prizes most during her first half century of existence. There is engraved upon his tombstone in the Stockton Rural Cemetery the following quotation emblematic of his life and death:

"Faithful toiler, thy work all done,
Beautiful soul, into glory gone;
Virtuous life, with the crown now won,
God giveth thee rest."

OSCAR MARSHALL.—A man of genius, of most interesting personality, and the worthy representative of a pioneer, historic family, the late Oscar Marshall was highly esteemed as a man whose honor was above reproach by his generation, in which he was widely known, and will be long and pleasantly remembered by posterity as a Californian who did much to make in truth the Golden State, and as a distinguished citizen of Stockton in particular. He was born at Davenport, Iowa, on March 17, 1847, the son of Thomas and Rebecca (Butterfield) Marshall, the former a native of Nantucket, Mass., and the latter of New Hampshire, both now deceased. Thomas Marshall emigrated to Iowa in early days, and from there, in 1849, started across the plains for California. Early in the spring of the next year he arrived here, and soon bought some land from Captain Weber, on the Calaveras River. There he farmed to grain and raised cattle in the Delta district; and in later years, or during Governor Haight's administration, he was a deputy in the Secretary of State's office at Sacramento. In 1856 he bought a house at the corner of American and Sonora streets in Stockton, which had been brought around the Horn by Captain Taylor, and is still standing there, in a good state of preservation. Four children were born to this worthy couple. Mrs. Sarah Hall of Berkeley and Oscar were born in Iowa, and Mrs. Eureka Washburn, deceased, and Mary P. were born in Stockton.

Coming to California so early, Oscar Marshall was educated in the Stockton schools, and during the building of the Southern Pacific Railroad, he helped in the survey. He spent a deal of his time on the islands in the Delta district working with his father and enjoying hunting and fishing. He was a born genius, a great lover of nature and a close student of natural resources. He built a catamaran which ran for many years between Stockton and islands upon the San Joaquin River. He was an authority on soil conditions, and opposed to the building of the diverting canal, having made a thorough study of the Delta waterways. He was a very progressive man, with brilliant, practical ideas, but was ahead of his time. In early years he joined the Stockton police force, when that efficient and faithful body was small, and he served for many years, or until he was retired, as one of the first men to have been appointed. He was frugal in habits and believed in the future of Stockton and invested wisely in real estate which has greatly increased in value in the passing years.

Mr. Marshall and his sister, Mary P., were close companions, for our subject never married; and before his death, in May, 1911, he willed his estate to his sister, who makes her home at 1035 North Edison Street, in a home she had built according to her own ideas. She is fond of outdoor life and has a fine collection of birds, the pheasant and finch in particular being well represented. She takes a keen interest in California history, and is proud of the fact that Grandfather Marshall built for his residence what was the first frame house in Stockton, and which has been in the possession of the family ever since.

RICHARD LAUXEN.—As a pioneer in the furniture business in Stockton, Richard Lauxen held a position in the commercial world second to none, and he deserved the good-will and universal esteem which was accorded him for his unselfish devotion to the best interests of the community in which he lived, and helped very materially to build up. A native of Germany, he was born on January 21, 1854, in the little picturesque town of Ulmen, near Coblenz, a village noted for its ruined castle that stood near his boyhood home. As a lad he was accorded the best of educational advantages and when he was only seventeen he was proficient in Latin, Greek and French, and was preparing for the profession of the law, when the war of 1870 materially changed his plans and he decided he would seek the opportunities offered by the New World and California. Leaving home he sailed for America and came direct to California, arriving when in his seventeenth year in San Francisco and soon found employment with the firm of W. J. Heney & Company, furniture dealers, with whom he remained for several years. In 1880 he made his first trip back to his native land and remained for about two years, and on returning located in Stockton, arriving March 17, 1882.

Mr. Lauxen entered the employ of Sylvester & Moye, who had a furniture store in the Newell Building on Main Street, and who also carried on a furniture factory of their own. In 1886, at the time of the great boom in Southern California he went south but returned to Stockton in September of the following year. Immediately Mr. Lauxen organized the firm of Lauxen & Catts, which opened its doors on December 1, 1887, and has been in continuous operation ever since, his partner being George Catts, his brother-in-law. Their store was first located where Tully & Kramm are now situated, but later they moved into more commodious quarters next door, now the site of the Yost-Dohrmann Company, at that time being on the extreme eastern edge of the business district. Eventually the firm bought out the local interests of the John Breuner Company, and moved into the Hubbard Building at the corner of Weber Avenue and San Joaquin Street, where they have maintained headquarters ever since. With their characteristic energy, honesty and reliability, the founders built up a business which today has an enviable trade throughout the San Joaquin Valley and the Mother Lode district. The standing of Richard Lauxen as a representative business man is shown in his participation in all progressive movements that had for their object the building up and the upbuilding of San Joaquin County; he was one of the organizers and a member of the first board of directors of the Commercial & Savings Bank, and formerly was on the directorate of the Stockton Savings Bank, now the City Bank. His health began to fail in 1906 and five years later he disposed of his interests in the company of Lauxen & Catts to Mr. Catts, and for the following ten years spent considerable time in travel; but in February, 1921, he came back into the firm, purchasing the half interest that he had once sold. It has been said of Mr. Lauxen that he was one of the very best furniture men in the state, which is attested by the large and lucrative trade that he was instrumental in building up here.

The marriage of Mr. Lauxen on April 16, 1884, united him with Miss Margaret Letitia Catts, a native daughter of Stockton and a lady well qualified in every way to be just the helpmate of a man with Mr. Lauxen's ambitions. Of this fortunate union three children survive: Miss B. Lita Lauxen; Richard Lauxen, Jr., and Miss Margaret Lauxen, all of whom have graduated from the University of California. The son is acting as secretary and treasurer of the Lauxen & Catts corporation. In 1892 Mr. Lauxen made a second trip back to Germany, taking his family with him and they enjoyed a year abroad; again they accompanied him in 1908, staying for several months. He made another trip in 1913, with his friend of long years standing, John H. Smith, now deceased. Mr. Lauxen was active in fraternal circles and was a member of Stockton Lodge No. 218, B. P. O. E.; took an active part in the reorganization of the lodge in 1893, and later was president of the building committee which erected the Elks' Building; he was also a member of the Yosemite Club. As a charter member of the Young Men's Institute he took an active interest in the order, helped organize it in 1884, and he served as a delegate to the Grand Institute on various occasions; and he was a member of the Knights of Columbus, where his character and influence were welcomed. He was a member of the Turnverein, now the Fidelity Lodge of Stockton. Mr. Lauxen was a man among men, popular among all classes, of a kindly disposition and winning personality which enabled him to make friends wherever he went, and when he died on December 6, 1921, he was mourned by a wide circle who knew him as a man whose loss to the state can never be filled.

CAPTAIN JOHN McMULLIN.—Possessed of a temperament that fitted him for daring deeds and the endurance of frontier hardships, Captain John McMullin came to the regions of the Southwest at a period when ample opportunity was afforded him for the exercise of his natural instincts and the gratification of his desire for adventure. The record of his life reads like a romance, such as was often lived out in the careers of the hardy pioneers of the early part of the nineteenth century, but it was not his good fortune to be spared to witness the marvelous prosperity of the West and the remarkable development of its vast resources. Death ended his labors ere success had crowned his efforts, yet he had been able to lay the foundations of a prosperity that later brought ample returns to his family and, in addition, he had been an integral factor in laying the foundations of our commonwealth broad, deep and strong, capable of sustaining the superstructure of twentieth century civilization.

Born in Baltimore, Md., June 27, 1824, John McMullin was taken to Florida at the age of four years and afterward attended the schools of Tallahassee. When fifteen years of age the desire for adventure led him to run away from home for the purpose of joining Col. Jack Hays. After arriving at San Antonio, Texas, he traveled westward alone through the country of hostile Indians and in due time arrived safely at the camp of Colonel Hays, whom he told that he was not afraid of any hardships endured by soldiers. Many times in later days his courage was brought to a test and in every instance he proved himself undaunted by any hardship, undismayed by any peril, and through all that wil dregon he became known as a brave Indian fighter. Though always in the thickest of the fights, he escaped without injury and seemed to lead a charmed life, for none was more eager than he to throw himself into the most dangerous places and sustain the weakest division. His bravery elicited the highest approval of his superiors and led to his promotion to the rank of captain, in which capacity he took part in the Texas and Mexican wars. As a member of a party of 180 soldiers he made a raid from Texas into Mexico. During the war he was taken prisoner by the Mexicans and for two years he was confined in the City of Mexico, in the castle of Perote, which is still standing. Eventually he was exchanged, though in the meantime he had made several unsuccessful efforts to escape rather than suffer the indignities heaped upon the prisoners.

As early as 1848 Captain McMullin had decided to establish himself in California and had already started via the Mexican overland route when he received news of the discovery of gold. When he started for California Captain McMullin came through Vera Cruz, and while there met a banker and the two became well acquainted. This banker said that he had a brother somewhere in California and gave Captain McMullin a letter to hand him if he should run across him in the new country. A comrade on his journey from Mexico was G. W. Trahern, who had served with the Captain in the Mexican war. On their arrival in the mines they concluded to go into the cattle business, buying them in Southern California and driving them to the mines. Meantime an incident occurred which was remarkable. Going into a business house in one of the early mining towns to see the proprietor, on learning his name he found him to be the brother of his Vera Cruz friend and the Captain said, "I have a letter for you." After reading the letter the gentleman said, "Do you know what this letter contains?" The Captain replied that he did not have the least idea. The gentleman then said, "This letter contains unlimited credit for yourself," but the Captain said he could not accept it for he was a stranger to him as well as his brother. The gentleman, who was a wealthy business man, said that the offer was always open, nevertheless, but Captain McMullin remained firm and did not use the credit volunteered him. He and Mr. Trahern then proceeded to Los Angeles and purchased a band of cattle which they drove to the Southern Mines, crossing the San Joaquin River at Casa Blanca. Selling the cattle in the mines they netted splendid returns. At the crossing of the San Joaquin River they became acquainted with the Imus Brothers who had settled there. Finding this was a favorite crossing for the herds of cattle driven to the mines, Captain McMullin concluded it could be a good location for his headquarters, so he purchased the place from the young claimants and this became the nucleus of his large holdings. The Imus boys had sent to Boston for the material for their house and it came in parts around the Horn on a sailer. This house they had painted white, from which it had taken its name, Casa Blanca. The tract comprises 640 acres, to which he added by purchase from time to time until he had a ranch of about 30,000 acres lying in San Joaquin County between the Stanislaus and San Joaquin rivers. Here he engaged in raising stock, finding the mountain range very suitable for breeding horses, for they thrived better here than in the valley and he raised some fine specimens of horseflesh, of which he was a great admirer.

Throughout his life Captain McMullin was loyally devoted to the progress of Stockton and his death, which occurred in 1868, was a serious loss to the highest citizenship of the entire county. Through his large holdings and his commanding personality he had ever been a prominent figure in the history of the county and had been instrumental in promoting movements for the general welfare. One of his hobbies was a fondness for fine stock. As an organizer and president of the first county fair association, he had been in a position to arouse an interest in stock among the ranchers of the valley and had introduced many breeds of exceptional merit through his own efforts. In spite of maintaining a constant interest in politics he never aspired to office and invariably declined appeals to fill positions of that nature, yet in other ways he was ever alert to aid in the upbuilding of the community. The first theatre building in Stockton was owned by him and many other early enterprises were fostered by his progressive spirit. During the Civil War the governor of Texas offered him a post as chief of cavalry, but although he desired to go he had a family of little children and felt that his first duty was to them, so declined the honor. Land in Texas which he secured in an early day is still owned by his heirs, as is also the Stanislaus and San Joaquin county lands and the Stockton real estate.

During a visit in Washington, D. C., Captain McMullin met Miss Eliza Fleming Morgan, who like himself came from a sturdy stock fitted to endure the privations in frontier regions. She was a native of Kentucky, a daughter of an officer famous in the annals of that state, and he was the son of Col. Simon Morgan, an officer in the Revolutionary War.

CAPT. JOHN McMULLIN

Her father, Gen. Daniel Morgan, was born in Virginia and with his father was a pioneer of Kentucky, where he became a large landowner and a man of wealth and distinction. Influential in politics, he served in the Kentucky Senate for twenty-five years, where he helped to make the constitution of that state, and he also served as a member of Congress. He married Miss Anna Clarkson, a native of Virginia, descended from some of the most prominent old Virginia families, including the Picketts, Marshalls, Keiths and Scotts.

The youngest child of the family, Eliza Fleming Morgan, was educated at Bishop McIlvain's finishing school in Cincinnati. About the time she completed her education, John J. Crittenden, a warm friend of the family, was U. S. senator from Kentucky and he persuaded General Morgan to let his daughter accompany his family to Washington to spend the winter. It was there she met Captain McMullin, the acquaintance resulting in their marriage at her home in Kentucky June 18, 1857. Their wedding trip took them to White Chapel Springs, Va., and soon after their return they came to San Francisco, reaching there in the fall of that year. Captain McMullin purchased a home in the city, but as soon as Mrs. McMullin discovered that so much of her husband's time had to be spent on the ranch she expressed a desire to make their home there, so he had Casa Blanca fitted up for their reception. Mrs. McMullin had always been a lover of the great outdoors and particularly of horseback riding, and the years of outdoor life she enjoyed here have undoubtedly contributed to her continued good health and wonderful constitution.

All of their nine children were born in California, with the exception of Eliza M., who is a native of Kentucky. Anna married John C. Hays, Jr., of Oakland, son of Col. John Coffee Hays of the Mexican war and better known as "Jack" Hays, the celebrated Texas ranger. Mr. and Mrs. John C. Hays, Jr., have two sons, John Coffee, Jr., and Harry T.; Eliza M. married E. B. Perrin of Williams, Ariz., and they have a son—Lilo McMullin Perrin; Rebecca was the wife of Francis J. Heney of San Francisco; Beauregard is unmarried; Elizabeth M. married Judge C. L. Weller, and their daughter Anna is the wife of Commander Earl B. Shipp, who is stationed at Washington. John, a graduate of Princeton, was one of the leading men of Fresno, Cal., where he was president of the Fresno National Bank, as well as of the Fresno Irrigation Company and the Fresno Ice Company, and identified with other business activities. By his marriage to Miss Betty Hays, daughter of Col. John Coffee Hays, he had three children, John, Jr., Eliza Morgan and Harmon Hays, by whom he is survived; Susan H., who first married Thos. S. Williams, later became Mrs. Edward Fant; Morgan and Henrietta.

After the death of her husband, Mrs. McMullin made her home in Kentucky for ten years, then returned to California. Changes of residence, however, left undimmed her loyalty to San Joaquin County, for which she cherishes a deep affection as the home of her happy married years, the birthplace of all of her children but one, and the center of many warm friendships formed during those busy years. Proud of the military records of her ancestry, she taught her children to display a patriotic spirit in every act and in her own life has shown the possession of the loyalty of her ancestors. On the organization of the Sons of the Confederacy at Lexington, Ky., she became a charter member. At that time there was no ladies' auxiliary, but later she identified herself with the Daughters of the Confederacy and in 1906 she became a member of the Albert Sidney Johnston Chapter of San Francisco. She is also a member of the Daughters of the Revolution. In her religious life she is affiliated with the First Presbyterian Church of San Francisco but her broad-mindedness and charitable disposition leads her to liberally assist various churches, regardless of denomination. Possessed of much native business ability, she has been deeply interested in improving the vast acres left by Captain McMullin and thus has greatly enhanced their value. She has also acquired other tracts of land in the various counties of the Valley which have become very valuable by the improvements she has made upon them. A cultured woman, she has left her impress on the civic and social life of the county in her stand for righteousness in public and social life and for the high moral uplift of the community. Like her gallant husband she has been a liberal contributor to all public movements for the betterment of county and state.

ALFRED L. COWELL.—Prominent among the representatives of the bar in California is Alfred L. Cowell, the attorney-at-law and irrigation expert of Stockton, who was born at Woodland, Yolo County, Cal., on March 17, 1870, the son of Alfred H. and Emeline (Hubbard) Cowell, both natives of Ohio. Mr. Cowell crossed the great plains in 1858, riding a mule, while Mrs. Cowell came out to California, when only ten years old, by way of the Isthmus, so that they were married in the Golden State. In 1885, Mr. Cowell removed from Woodland and located at Woodbridge, in San Joaquin County, where he kept a general store.

Alfred Cowell attended the San Joaquin Valley College at Woodbridge, from which he was graduated in 1892, when he went East and became a student at Union Biblical Seminary, Dayton, Ohio, after which he returned to Woodbridge and became president of the San Joaquin Valley College, which responsible office he held from 1895 through 1897. For the next year he was principal of the Lodi high school, and from 1898 to 1899 he was principal of the Siskiyou County high school at Yreka. In July, 1899, he became reporter for the Mail newspaper at Stockton, and later, until 1911, he was editor of that influential journal, and then, going to Modesto, he bought an interest in the Modesto News. While there, he became particularly interested in irrigation, and he was appointed secretary of the California Irrigation Districts Association, and since then he has been active in behalf of irrigation projects in the San Joaquin Valley. During the session of the California Legislature in 1913, he represented the association at Sacramento in securing important amendments to the irrigation district laws of the state.

From 1914 to 1916, Mr. Cowell was assistant director of congresses at the Panama-Pacific Exposition, held in San Francisco in 1915, working under Director J. A. Barr, of Stockton; and he also taught in the Stockton high school for a year. Then he studied law, and in 1918 was admitted to the bar. Since then, making irrigation matters a specialty, he has taken part in the organization of some of the largest irrigation districts in the San Joaquin Valley and devotes nearly all his time to district affairs.

When Mr. Cowell married, at Woodbridge, in 1896, he chose for his life-companion, Miss Alice Gingrich, a native of Pennsylvania. He is a member of Charity Lodge No. 6, I. O. O. F., at Stockton.

JOHN WHEELER JONES.—Among the foremost pioneers of the farming sections of San Joaquin County we mention John Wheeler Jones, one of the progressive grain and stock raisers whose name is indelibly stamped in the minds of the descendants of those who laid firm the foundation of this glorious commonwealth. A native of North Carolina, he was born in Guilford County, March 10, 1821, and was descended from ancestors whose blood is of English, Irish, Welsh and Scotch mixture, making up that hardy type that is continually pressing towards the frontier. His parents were Electus and Mary (Lambeth) Jones, the father having served in the Navy during the War of 1812, and who had died before John W. started for California. His mother lived to reach the fine old age of ninety-one and passed away at the home of her son in California on February 20, 1885, leaving three sons and two daughters, all now passed to the Great Beyond.

John W. Jones was reared on a farm in South Carolina, later going to Georgia, where he became an overseer on a large plantation but threw up his job rather than whip a female slave. He next moved into Tennessee, where his first marriage was celebrated on December 2, 1842, which united him with Miss Mary Ann Allen. Six children were born to them, two dying in early childhood in Missouri, whither they had moved soon after their marriage. That state continued to be their home until 1852, when Mr. Jones, accompanied by his wife and four children and his mother, joined an emigrant train bound for California and after about six months' travel they arrived at the end of their journey, but with saddened hearts, for the good wife died of the dreaded cholera and was buried on the plains. Soon after his arrival here Mr. Jones began teaming to the mines from Stockton and met with the usual success which followed that business. In 1855 he located a homestead on part of a quarter section of land and bought out squatters who had the rest, and this parcel of land was always known as the "old homestead" and is situated where the town of Escalon now stands. Very soon after he had located on his ranch and while teaming, Mr. Jones made his home a place where the freighter and traveler could find a good meal, the fresh meat being antelope and killed by Mr. Jones, who was a fine shot, nearby in the sagebrush. On one parcel of land he later owned had been located the Blue Tent Tavern, so-called on account of the tent cloth being that color. This was known far and wide as a stopping place of all passers-by and was located on the French Camp Road one mile east of his home place. He added to his holdings as he prospered in later years and was rated one of the largest landholders in this part of the state, owning 8,000 acres in Dent Township, surrounding the old home place, with one mile frontage on the Stanislaus River; in 1866 he bought about 25,000 acres in Stanislaus County; and he also had 2,500 acres of grazing land on the West Side in San Joaquin County. Showing his foresight he bought 8,000 acres in Tulare County, paying $100,000 for it, which included the crop of grain and this he harvested and sold for $80,000 in 1879. He was the first man to set out a vineyard in this section of the county and he also had an orchard of several varieties of fruits and nuts, showing that almost everything would grow if given half a chance. It was he who broke the first furrow in the land and he sowed the grain by hand and covered it by dragging brush over the ground, there being no harrows here then. He harvested a crop that ran thirty sacks to the acre and sold it for five cents a pound. When he was working away on his place trying to get in his crop people passing were often heard to make disparaging remarks about the futility of such labor, but Mr. Jones persevered and reaped his harvest.

In 1857, Mr. Jones made a trip back East and bought a band of cattle and drove them back to California to raise the standard of the California stock. On his return trip he fell in with a party that included John W. Dunlap and his family, who were on their way to California. In this party was a young lady who bore the name of Catherine Martin Dunlap, born December 25, 1832, in Springfield, Ill., and their wedding occurred in California on September 7, 1857. Settling on the old home place, in 1861, Mr. Jones erected a commodious two-story brick house containing eleven rooms, the bricks having been made nearby. This colonial style house was the scene of many a social gathering and is still standing on its original site. It was donated to the Woman's Improvement Club of Escalon by Miss Alice D. Jones and was used for the sessions of the first high school of the town until a suitable school building could be built. Of the second marriage of John W. Jones there were eight children born, all now deceased except one, Miss Alice D. Jones, of Stockton. In order of birth they are: Caleb Franklin; Lucinda Caroline married Joseph Dolan and lived near Montpelier, Stanislaus County; William Joshua lived four miles east of the old home place; Emeline N. married Romaine Moll and lived on the Blue Tent Place; David Lincoln settled on the Stanislaus; Miss Alice Deborah, of Stockton; James Wesley, who had the home place; and Albert Wheeler, who died aged seven years.

In 1870 Mr. Jones distributed some 15,000 acres of land equally among the three living children by his first marriage. They were Levi J., who had married and lived in Stanislaus County; Mrs. E. A. (Hall) Humphrey, who also lived in that county until her marriage with Mr. Humphrey, when she located in Sacramento; and Mrs. Willis Bledsoe, who lived in Modesto. The son Electus, who was brought from Missouri, died aged fifteen years.

In 1878 Mr. Jones built a small schoolhouse on his ranch and hired a private teacher for his children, although others were permitted to attend and their parents paid their share of the teacher's expenses. Mrs. Catherine Jones died in Dent township in 1880, and Mr. Jones survived until September, 1893. He made one trip East after the death of his second wife but soon returned to his home. Mr. Jones was a hard worker, honest in all his dealings, ready and ever willing to lend his aid to those in distress and was one of the staunch upbuilders of the county. He met with many reverses and discouragements in his early life here and at one time offered to let a navigation company have his ranch and possessions for a ticket East, but they would not accept and he had to hang on till with the passing of years he became one of the wealthy men of the county. He was a Republican in his political affiliations and during the Civil War found conditions about him full of sectional hatreds, when a man's life counted for but little. The large property he accumulated was divided among the heirs and 1,000 acres of the home place were sold by his son, James Jones, part of which is now the Escalon townsite. Miss Alice D. Jones has platted ten acres as the Pioneer Addition to Escalon and the streets are named after her brothers and sisters; she has also subdivided 1,200 acres into five-acre tracts and upwards to eighty acres and is bringing into the district south of Escalon a very desirable class of ranchers. She is doing her part as the daughter of the pioneer to continue to build up from the firm foundation laid by her worthy father.

John W Jones

WILLIAM PAYSON MILLER.—During his lifetime numbered among the leading business men and manufacturers of Central California, the career of William Payson Miller records an instance of a rise from the bottom of the ladder to a place of prestige and prosperity, due alone to his indomitable perseverance and integrity. A native of Maine, Mr. Miller was born at Windsor, October 8, 1825, his parents being Thomas and Jane (Pratt) Miller, born at Little Cambridge and Vassalboro, Maine, respectively. His maternal great-grandfather, John Taber, was said to be the first banker of Portland, Maine; Mrs. Jane (Pratt) Miller's parents were Nathan and Mary (Taber) Pratt, the former born at Little Cambridge, Massachusetts, and the latter at Vassalboro, Maine.

When William P. Miller was three years old his parents removed to Vassalboro and later to Palmyra, then to Augusta. William attended school only during the winter terms, working out in summer on the neighboring farms, for there were six children in the family to support and all that could had to lend a helping hand. When he was sixteen years old he went to work for an uncle, Thomas Partridge, learning to make wheels and the woodwork for farm wagons, and later he engaged in business for himself at North Vassalboro, running his shop for about two years. There, in 1847, he was married to Miss Phoebe Roberts, who died September 17, 1849, leaving a son Edward, who came to California when he was twenty-one and made his home in Stockton for many years. The following year Mr. Miller decided to come to California, and leaving New York on the old ship Clarendon in the fall of 1850 he spent 196 days on the trip, reaching San Francisco April 6, 1851. Unable to find work in his trade of wheelwright, he finally secured a place as a carpenter on a little church being erected, his wages to be paid when the job was completed. Many were the hardships of those days and for some time his only food was a loaf of bread and water, for which he paid ten cents a pail. Through a chance meeting with John R. Corey, a carriage maker for whom he had once worked in New Bedford, Massachusetts, Mr. Miller later came to Stockton and secured employment at the wagon shop of J. W. Smith of Channel Street, at seven dollars a day. In the spring of 1852 he established a woodworking shop of his own, and working in conjunction with two blacksmiths from New Bedford, Massachusetts, named Skiff and Tucker, he began turning out wagons, one of the first being a freight wagon which was sold to Sam Foreman for $900.

During the first summer the shop had no doors nor a floor; a few boards were laid overhead and there he slept. However, this humble beginning was the foundation of the splendid carriage building establishment which he built up at Stockton, a model factory at that time, with a reputation for superior workmanship second to none on the Pacific Coast.

In June, 1855, he was married to Miss Pamela Tilton, a native of Easton, N. Y., who came to California in 1853. They adopted a daughter, Millie Louisa Franklin, whose sketch appears elsewhere in this work. Mrs. Miller passed away August 17, 1891, and on November 10, 1892, Mr. Miller was married to Mrs. N. Jane Neill, whose death occurred November 20, 1894, Mr. Miller surviving her until May 8, 1897, his passing away removing from the ranks of Stockton's early settlers one of her most honored and trusted citizens, whose life was one of the highest integrity. A firm supporter of the Republican party from its earliest days, he was an abolitionist by principle and took an active interest in all movements for the putting away of slavery. He was a friend of temperance and liberally donated funds for temperance work, never using either liquor or tobacco in his entire life, and after the organization of the Prohibition party he became an active worker in its councils. He was a member of Weber Engine Company No. 1 and took an active part as an exempt fireman in later years. In 1854 he was a member of the city council. He was a director of the Stockton Savings & Loan Bank for many years.

MRS. MILLIE L. FRANKLIN.—The only representative of one of Stockton's honored pioneer families, Mrs. Minnie L. Franklin today resides in the old home erected by her father, but at that time it stood alone in a large grain field, while now it is on one of Stockton's busy streets. A native of San Francisco, she was reared and educated at Stockton and at the College of the Pacific at San Jose. Her adopted parents, William Payson and Pamela (Tilton) Miller, both came to California in the early days, the father in 1851 and the mother in 1853, the latter being a native of Easton, N. Y. William Payson Miller was born in Windsor, Maine, and when twenty-five years old he left his native state and journeyed to California on the old ship Clarendon, which required 196 days to make the trip. After many hardships in those early days, and with no capital but what he earned by his daily toil he was able to establish at Stockton one of the large carriage manufacturing factories of the Pacific Coast. One of Stockton's most honored citizens, an account of his life will be found in more detailed form on this page.

Mrs. Franklin's first marriage, on May 1, 1894, at Stockton, united her with F. H. Scofield, and they later removed to Montesano, Washington, returning to California in January, 1896. Her second marriage, which occurred on May 12, 1904, at San Rafael, California, united her with Frederick M. Franklin, from whom she separated in 1912. She has one son, who was born at Stockton, May 17, 1896, who after attending the Stockton high school took up automobile work, soon becoming superintendent for E. Allen Test of Stockton. His proficiency gained him a promotion to the Dodge Company branch at Oakland, where he has charge of their shop.

WILLIAM MORAN.—A resident of California since 1862, William Moran is one of the state's most worthy pioneers, for he has contributed much to the improvement and building up of this great commonwealth. He was born at Carrick, on the River Suir, in County Waterford, Ireland, March 1, 1833, the son of Edmond and Hanora (Barton) Moran. The father, who was a farmer, passed away in his native land and after his death Mrs. Moran came to Massachusetts where she resided for the remainder of her life. They were the parents of eight children, only two of whom are now living, William Moran of this sketch, and Edmond Moran, who resides in Charlestown, Mass.

William Moran grew up on the farm in Ireland and remained there until nineteen years of age, leaving there in 1852 to come to America where he felt that greater opportunities awaited him. He located at Chelsea, Mass., and went to work on a farm where oxen were still being used to carry on the farming operations. On July 8, 1860, at Chelsea, he was married to Miss Hannah Linskey, who was born October 14, 1840, in County Galway, Ireland, the daughter of John and Mary (Mitchell) Linskey, farmers in Galway. The mother died there and the father came to Pennsylvania but passed away soon afterward, leaving four children, of whom Hannah was the eldest. She came to Massachusetts in May, 1849, with an aunt and attended school at Chelsea, and it was here that she met and married Mr. Moran.

In April, 1862, William Moran started to California by way of Panama, landing at San Francisco on May 5th, and in December of that year he was joined by his wife and their son, William B. Mrs. Moran's journey was indeed an eventful one; she was a passenger on the Aerial from New York to Aspinwall which was captured by the Confederate cruiser Alabama, as this was during the stirring days of the Civil War. The passengers were kept for two days on the Island of Jamaica before they were allowed to proceed on their journey. Crossing the Isthmus of Panama they took the steamer Constitution to San Francisco, arriving December 27, 1862. For the first year Mr. Moran was employed in San Francisco and in the spring of 1863 he went to Bodega Bay, Sonoma County, and began grain farming, raising a good crop of oats. In the fall of 1864 he removed to Santa Clara County and purchased a fifty-acre farm six miles east of San Jose and there he followed farming until the lands on the west side in San Joaquin County were opened for settlement, taking up his residence there in 1867 on a homestead of 160 acres at Mohr's Landing, near Bethany. Here he built a house and made improvements, breaking the virgin soil and raising grain. He sold this ranch in 1875 and engaged in sheep raising and had just gotten nicely started when the memorable drought of 1877 left him with many others with nothing to feed their sheep and he sustained a heavy loss. He then located at Ellis, now Tracy, a few miles from his old homestead and in 1878 began farming near Corral Hollow, continuing there for sixteen years, then bought 320 acres on the boundary line between San Joaquin and Alameda counties, near Midway, all but a few acres being in San Joaquin County. He improved this place, building a residence, made a success of raising grain and hay and with the aid of his family, who were all capable and industrious, he was able to gain a competency.

Mr. and Mrs. Moran were the parents of eleven children: William B., passed away in Siskiyou County in 1900; Mary, Mrs. Martin J. Lund, of Stockton; Anna and Katherine reside with their parents; Nancy died in infancy; Louise, Mrs. Dana Troth, of Tracy; John Edmond passed away in Stockton on April 20, 1922; Nellie, Mrs. David Lake, of Oakland; Harriett, Mrs. Thomas Mournian, resides near Antioch; Elizabeth, Mrs. George Hicks, of Oakland; Emmet is a rancher of Stockton. In 1910, wishing to retire from active business, Mr. and Mrs. Moran rented their farm and took up their residence at 2116 Twenty-sixth Avenue, Oakland, where they reside in comfort with their two daughters, Misses Annie and Katherine Moran, who give their parents the most devoted care, looking after their well-being in every way. While living at Tracy Mr. Moran was a prominent member of the Grange, passing through all the chairs. In 1872 he joined Sumner Lodge, No. 177, I. O. O. F., at Ellis, now Tracy, is a past grand and now the oldest member of the lodge. He is also a member of the Rebekahs in Tracy. In politics he has long been a strong Republican.

July 8th, 1910, Mr. and Mrs. Moran celebrated their golden wedding at their home on the ranch. The affair was made a great demonstration by the members of the family, their friends and neighbors. There were beautiful decorations and an abundance of flowers, and the wedding repast was delightful and much praised by those present, and many toasts were given for the health and longevity of the couple. It was a most enjoyable occasion and Mr. and Mrs. Moran were the recipients of many beautiful gifts. Sumner Lodge of Odd Fellows at the first session after the golden wedding passed an appropriate resolution for the honored couple, and presented Mr. Moran with a lodge emblem as a token of the high regard in which he was held by the members of the lodge. Each year since then the Morans have celebrated their anniversary at their home and at their sixtieth anniversary the members of the family presented them with a fine phonograph. On July 8, 1922, they celebrated their sixty-second anniversary. They have been wonderfully blessed and take much pride in their devoted children.

JOHN BURGESS HARELSON.—Typical among the interesting stories of worthy California pioneers always likely to engage the attention of the historian and to inspire the American youth, is that of the late John Burgess Harelson, a native of Kentucky, where he was born in 1818, who long was highly regarded by his associates and contemporaries as a representative of the Blue Grass State. In 1836, when still a young man, he made an adventurous trip to South America, where he stayed, however, for only a short time; and soon after his return, he migrated to Wisconsin, where he settled at Lancaster, in Grant County. In 1850 he first visited California, crossing the great plains to get here; and after mining along the Sacramento and the American rivers, he went in for teaming and hauled provisions to the mines.

In 1852 Mr. Harelson returned to Wisconsin and there he married Miss Candace Graves, who was a native of Missouri but had accompanied her parents to Wisconsin. Mr. and Mrs. Harelson, in 1864, made their way over the continent to the Golden State, and it is not surprising that, with Mr. Harelson's knowledge of Northern California, they should settle in San Joaquin County, whither a brother, Edmund Harelson, had preceeded him. In 1865, he bought from Captain Weber 120 acres of land on the Waterloo Road, six and one-half miles northeast of Stockton, and there he continued to live the balance of his natural days. He attained the fine old age of 84 years, and his dear wife, who had so devotedly shared hard work, hardships and even dangers, as well as joys and comforts with him, when she passed away, in 1918, was then 87. Mr. Harleson breathed his last on December 10, 1901, esteemed as a successful grain farmer and beloved as a good provider for his family, and widely honored as a public-spirited citizen.

William Moorom
Mrs. Moorom

Five children blessed the family life of Mr. and Mrs. Harelson. Ella, the eldest, became Mrs. J. B. Worley of Hanford; Martha L. is Mrs. Henry Irvine, and resides at Henry, Nebraska; Lucy, the third-born, is Mrs. S. B. Overhiser of San Diego; Flora became Mrs. J. L. Fulton of Waterloo; and there her sister, Miss Effie Burgess Harelson, also resides. Ella and Martha and Lucy were born in Wisconsin, and the other two girls entered the family circle under the sunny skies of California. Mrs. Worley has a family of eleven children; Mrs. Irvine has one daughter; and Mrs. Overhiser has one son.

Flora, who lives with her sister on the old home place, was married on March 12, 1904, to John L. Fulton, a native of Illinois, who was a son of Levi Fulton, a New Yorker, and his good wife Cynthia. In 1903, Mr. Fulton came to California as a druggist; and after their marriage they moved to Watsonville, and during their seven years there Mr. Fulton conducted a drug store. He also owned a ranch at Willows. He sold the store in 1910 and then they took up their residence on his ranch of 80 acres in Glenn County; but he soon also sold the farm, and after that they lived at Oakland, where he was taken with pneumonia. He did not improve, and a trip to Arizona was undertaken in the hope that he would find the change of climate just what he needed; but even there he failed to mend, and to the sorrow of all who had come to admire and love him and had found in him the best of advisers, the most helpful of friends, he died, in December, 1911, preceded by the death, in November, of their only daughter, Lois, who died in Arizona.

A portion of the old Harelson ranch is a souvenir of the days of '65; and when Candace Graves Harelson died the ranch was divided, and now the two sisters referred to as residing there own some fifty-nine choice acres. They had attended the Greenwood grammar school and the Stockton high school, and there laid the foundation for that education to which they have ever since added by wide, broad reading and study; and one could not wish for a more enjoyable hour than in their company, their culture adding to the charm of the old-time Harelson hospitality, now the more to be appreciated since in other sections the once famous welcome of the Californians has become a tradition.

MRS. SUSAN JANE JACK.—An honored pioneer of San Joaquin County is found in Mrs. Susan Jane Jack, who was brought to California by her parents in 1852. She was born near Van Buren, Crawford County, Arkansas, May 12, 1848, the eldest daughter of Robert Foster, a native of Alabama, who removed to Arkansas in the early '40s, where the family became large planters and slave owners. He married Caroline Hargrave, a native of Arkansas, and in 1852 started across the plains with ox-teams, with a number of other families, to California, bringing with them stock and supplies. Arriving in California, the father settled on the Linden Road about eight miles east of Stockton and followed farming until he removed to Merced County and engaged in grain farming. From there he went to Fresno County, where he became well known as a sheep and stock raiser; then disposing of his California holdings, he removed to Flagstaff, Arizona, in 1884, where, in partnership with a brother, he acquired large land holdings and engaged in stock raising. There he passed away in 1886, the mother preceding him in 1865. Our subject is the second eldest of a family of ten children, five of whom now survive.

Susan Jane Foster received her education in the Greenwood and Chartville schools and on January 14, 1866, was married to George G. Jack, a native of Tennessee, born April 17, 1833. His boyhood was spent on his father's farm and in 1850 he made a prospecting trip to California, spending some time in the Southern mines, returning to the East at the outbreak of the Civil War. He enlisted in Arkansas as a private in the cavalry on the Confederate side; he was in the battle of Pea Ridge and served throughout the entire period of the war without being wounded. Soon after the war was over he started for California on his horse, "Old Bill," used during the war, and came overland via the Santa Fe trail, a brother, John Jack, and another comrade, Joe Looper, accompanying him to San Diego, then to Los Angeles and over the mountains to San Joaquin County, arriving in June, 1865. Mr Jack purchased 100 acres of choice land on the Copperopolis Road and for twenty-two years the family resided here; then the family moved to Lockeford and spent seven years; then to Waterloo, settling on the Long homestead, where Mr. Jack passed away April 13, 1905. He is survived by his widow, our subject, six sons and six daughters: Miss Lulu; George, of Lockeford; Frank, of French Camp; Wm. T., of Stockton; Albert J., of Manteca; Mrs. Alice Leisz, of Ceres; Harry S., of Manteca; Mrs. R. E. Minaken, of Napa; Mrs. Aaron Keppel, of Manteca; Martin E., of Manteca; Mrs. Ray Stuart, of Ripon; Mrs. George LeMoin, of Manteca. At the present time there are twenty-five grandchildren and three great grandchildren. From the time of taking up his residence in the county, Mr. Jack served on the Democratic County Central Committee and was a liberal contributor to public and private charities.

In 1912, Miss Lulu Jack purchased forty acres of the Carter homestead near Manteca, which has been improved and developed into a fine home place and here she and her mother reside. Miss Jack was graduated from San Jose Teachers' College in 1895 and has followed her profession of teaching in the public schools of the state ever since.

JESSE STEWART LEWIS AND LUDWIK S. PAZNESKI.—For the past twenty-eight years Ludwik S. Pazneski has been a resident of San Joaquin County where he first worked as a well-borer, following this line of work for three years when he began farming on the Lewis ranch which has since occupied him. He was born in Poland, about seventy-five miles north of Warsaw, in the state of Plosck, July 22, 1872, a son of John and Elizabeth (Jesineska) Pazneski. He was reared and schooled in his native land until his nineteenth year, when he came to the United States and found employment on a farm near Paterson, N. J.; then he worked in the iron foundries of that city until his removal to Stockton, Cal., in 1894. Ludwik S. is the eldest of a family of four, the others residents of Poland.

On December 1, 1897, in San Francisco, Mr. Pazneski was married to Miss Caroline Lewis, born on her father's ranch six miles from Stockton on the Waterloo Road, the present home place of Mr. and Mrs. Pazneski. Caroline Lewis is a daughter of Jesse Stewart and Mary Ann (Hobbs) Lewis, natives of Missouri and Indiana, respectively, of Scotch and English ancestry. Jesse Stewart Lewis was a great-great-nephew of Daniel Boone, his great-grandmother being Hannah Boone, whose sister, Anna Boone, was the grandmother of Abraham Lincoln. The mother of Jesse Stewart Lewis was a sister of Major Archibald Sloan, of the American Revolution. Mary Ann Lewis was the niece of Ben Kelsey for whom Kelseyville, Cal., was named, and he married Nancy Roberts, the first white woman to come to California. Jesse Stewart Lewis was a farmer by occupation in Missouri, and in 1853 crossed the plains to California with his wife and family in an ox-team train and prairie schooners, the journey taking about six months. Upon arriving at Stockton Mr. Lewis engaged in freighting to the mining camps, making his headquarters on the ranch he had bought in 1853, soon after his arrival, and where Mr. and Mrs. Pazneski now reside. He first bought 120 acres, but when the Upper Sacramento Road was put through the property was resurveyed and it left 110 acres in the home place; he also owned 120½ acres, known as the Sam Clark ranch, later owned by Cy Moreing. In 1866, when the Waterloo Road was put through, Mr. Lewis fenced off four and one-half acres, erected a small house in which relatives lived for about seven years, then he arranged to move the Greenwood school house, which is now located on the northwest corner of that small tract. With Cy Moreing and his partner, he owned the old Harvey and Graham ranches and a half section of land at Bellota. Besides his own holdings he leased considerable land on Roberts Island on all of which he raised grain extensively.

There were eight children born to Mr. and Mrs. Lewis: J. K. P. Lewis, of Ashland, Ore., is the eldest; Arrena J. became the wife of Cyrus Moreing and died in 1884; Flora Ellen was the wife of Joseph Parrish and is deceased; Lydia died at the age of eighteen; Thomas H. died when he was thirty-three years of age; Mary E. is the widow of C. C. Franklin of Stockton; William died at the age of twenty-six; Caroline is the wife of L. S. Pazneski. She began her education in the Greenwood school, then spent two years in high school; took a business course in a commercial school in Stockton, at the same time that she pursued her musical studies under

Mrs. Van Vlear-Ladd and other instructors. She has lived on the old Lewis ranch all her life, remaining with her parents while they lived. Her father died at the age of seventy-eight years and eight months, in 1899, her mother surviving until 1910, when she had reached the fine old age of eighty-nine years and eleven months. When her mother died, Mrs. Pazneski received fifty acres of the home place and a strip of land two rods wide and extending from the home place to the Waterloo Road, lying on the west side of Harrelson's and the Greenwood school lot and comprising about two acres, as her portion of the estate; later thirty-one acres were purchased and this acreage constitutes the home place of Mr. and Mrs. Pazneski. Here Mr. Pazneski has set out a vineyard and orchard and farmed to grain with considerable success. On this place stands one of the largest mission fig trees in the state, measuring over fourteen feet in circumference at the base and the shaded area is over 300 feet in circumference. It was planted by Mr. Lewis in 1856 and people from all parts of the country come to see it. Mr. Lewis was a trustee of the Greenwood school for many years, was a Democrat in politics and always ready and willing to do his share to make the county a better place in which to live and always extended the old California hospitality to all who visited their ranch home. This spirit is being kept alive by his daughter who is following in his footsteps and takes a great interest in community affairs as well as politics.

BASILIO LAOGIER.—Among the pioneers of this western commonwealth, the late Basilio Laogier was a native of France, born in Nice, March 6, 1820, the son of Charles and Josephine (Moisin) Laogier, also natives of that country, the father maintaining a wholesale and retail mercantile establishment and also managing a hotel at Nice. There the son was reared and educated and soon after leaving school he secured a position with the French government in the arsenals and for three years his duties kept him in Algiers. At the end of this time he remained there three years longer on his own account during this time carrying on a profitable business as locksmith and gunsmith. Thereafter he returned to France, and during the month he spent in Marseilles he made preparations to start on an extended tour of the world. From Marseilles he shipped to Rio Janeiro, Brazil, and after stopping there for a time resumed the voyage, rounding Cape Horn and finally reaching the port of Valparaiso, Chile, in safety. From this South American port he continued his travels to San Francisco, arriving at that port January 22, 1850. He had not been in that city, long, however, before he was attracted to the mines, and going to Mokelumne Hill, he mined there with average success for a few months, and then returned to San Francisco, reaching that city the day following the disastrous fire. Six months later he again went to the mines, but after seven months more of this life he gave it up altogether and thereafter settled in Stockton, where for a time he conducted a locksmith establishment. Believing that a lucrative business could be established in hauling supplies to the mines, he embarked in the pack-train business in 1858, hauling goods to Murphys, Virginia City, and other mining camps in that vicinity. In the course of a few years interest in the mines there began to lessen, and at the same time the cost of fodder for his mules had increased to such an extent as to make continuance at the business almost prohibitive. Some idea of the cost may be gathered from the fact that during the year 1864 the feed for his pack mules cost him at the rate of $300 per month. This condition of affairs made it necessary for him to change his location, and from there he went to the mining region about Sacramento, hauling, supplies to Red Bluff, Colusa, Tehama, and Yreka. He also attempted to take the Indian trail to Klamath Lake, but the Indians resented the intrusion and drove him away, and he then journeyed by way of the lava beds, Warm Springs and Fort Dalles to Dalles. From that point he sent his pack-train overland to Umatilla, while he himself took the steamer for that point, and from there took a cargo to Bannock City. The expedition proved sufficiently profitable to warrant two more similar trips. He then proceeded to Placerville, Centerville, passing through Oregon on his way to Walla Walla, Wash., which city he reached on November 25, in the midst of a heavy snowstorm. From that point he took a steamer for San Francisco, reaching that city January 10, 1865, and after having his gold coined at the mint, continued his journey to Stockton. Here he entered the brokerage business and real estate and still later he opened a grocery store. Finally, however, in 1870, he retired from active business altogether and thereafter lived retired until his death, May 3, 1897.

Jesse S. Lewis.

In Stockton, March 27, 1869, Mr. Laogier was united in marriage with Miss Dionisia Ponce, Mrs. Laogier was born in Chihuahua, Mexico, and is the daughter of Nemesio Ponce, a merchant and trader in that Mexican city. They were the parents of one daughter, Mrs. Ysabel L. Young, the wife of the late William J. Young, a prominent physician and surgeon of Stockton. Mrs. Laogier, too has passed away. She was a woman of fine public spirit and generous to those less fortunate than herself; she was a member of the Catholic Ladies Aid and for many years was grand director of the order; she was also active in the work of the Children's Home in Stockton. Mr. Laogier was a well-educated man, his extensive travels giving him an unusual opportunity to exercise his ready observation, a faculty which added to a keen intellect resulted naturally in a fund of information. His early residence in the state made him eligible to the San Joaquin Society of California Pioneers, of which body he was a prominent member.

HON. FRANK S. BOGGS.—An eminent representative of the California realty world whose wide and valuable experience as a man of public affairs has enabled him to become of especial service in the rapid development of the Golden State, is the Hon. Frank S. Boggs, state senator from the Tenth District. He was born on his father's farm near Colusa, Cal., on October 28, 1871, the son of John and Louise E. (Shackleford) Boggs, both of whom are now deceased. John Boggs was a California pioneer who crossed the great plains in '49 from Howard County, Mo., and farmed in Colusa County for many years; and he long represented Colusa and other northern counties in the State Senate. He was able, therefore, to give the subject of our story many opportunities, and so to start him well in the world.

Frank Boggs attended the district schools of Colusa County and boarding schools in both Benicia and San Francisco, and in 1894 he was graduated from the University of California with the degree of Bachelor of Letters. He located in Stockton in the fall of the same year, and began the development of 1314 acres of land in the Delta district owned by his father. The land had been flooded several times, and Frank Boggs began a reclamation campaign; and since that time he has been actively engaged in developing the property known as the Boggs Tract. He has also sold a part of the land, 900 acres now remaining. He has cultivated some of it as farm land, and the remainder has been subdivided into lots known as the Boggs Tract Subdivision or the Yosemite Subdivision, each containing half-acre lots. This property adjoins Stockton on the west, and a portion of it is within the city limits.

Mr. Boggs was also engaged in the real estate and insurance business in Stockton while making these subdivisions, being associated with the Union Safe Deposit & Loan Company, and he was always successful in that field. He has other real estate holdings of his own in the county, and he has been a director in the San Joaquin County Fair Association and also of the County Farm Bureau since their organization. It is not surprising, therefore, that he was elected to the office of state senator of the Tenth District, which includes San Joaquin and Amador counties in 1918, for a four-year term, nor that it has often been remarked that he was the best Senator the district ever had. He has looked after the interests of the farmer in particular, and the latter everywhere has found in him the most faithful of representatives. He was also chairman of the committee on public morals in the session of 1921, and a member of the following committees: navigation, commerce and education, elections, finance, governmental efficiency and economy, irrigation, reapportionment, revenue and taxation. A Democrat in national political parties, he was elected by a large majority in a strong Republican district, and has no opposition for reelection in 1922. When the World War broke out, he was made chairman of the Stockton City Exemption Board, and served from the beginning to the close of the war, making a fine record, so that he was highly complimented by the Governor and U. S. officials for the manner in which he carried on the work committed to him. He is a director in the Stockton Chamber of Commerce, and also a director in the Morris Plan Bank of Stockton.

At Stockton, in 1899, Senator Boggs was married to Miss Katherine Cunningham, the youngest daughter of the late Thomas Cunningham, sheriff of San Joaquin County; and three sons have blessed the union—John C., who is at the University of California, Thomas W. and Frank S. Boggs, Jr. Mr. Boggs has been treasurer of the San Joaquin Blue Lodge of Masons and also of the Knights Templar for twenty years, and has passed through all branches of the Scottish Rite, Islam Temple, A. A. O. N. M. S., of San Francisco, and is a past commander of the Stockton Commandery. He was a member of the building Committee having charge of the erection of the new Masonic Temple, recently completed on Market Street, Stockton, representing the San Joaquin Lodge; and he belongs to Lodge No. 218 of the Stockton Elks, and to the Stockton Lions Club. He is an ex-president of the San Joaquin County Farm Bureau, and ex-officio member of the board of directors. He is a very active worker in the interest of the Bureau, and devotes much time to it. He is a member of the University of California Club, and is active in Boy Scout work; being ex-president of the Boy Scouts; and a member of the Stockton Y. M. C. A.

B. C. WALLACE.—It is interesting to chronicle the story of the successful man, one who, by his own ability, energy and industry has accomplished his ambition, and by his generosity, integrity and honesty of purpose has acquired the esteem of his fellowmen and become highly respected and influential. Such a career is that depicted in the biography of B. C. Wallace, the head of the oldest funeral director establishment in Stockton, a prominent and progressive citizen who has long been identified with San Joaquin County's affairs and people. He was born near Lockeford, twelve miles northeast of Stockton, on May 24, 1876, and comes of the Civil War inflow of settlers in California. His parents are M. Turner and Martha (Harrington) Wallace, the former born in Randolph County, Mo., May 27, 1842, and Van Buren County, Iowa, July 26, 1844, respectively. They were married in Davis County, Iowa, September 24, 1863, the ceremony being performed in Bloomfield by Rev. Peak, a Baptist clergyman. The year after the marriage the young couple decided to come to California. On April 6, 1864, they left their old home in Iowa in an ox team train, making the overland journey without any serious mishap, except having their cattle stampeded by the Indians, but were fortunate in their recovery. They crossed the Nevada line into California September 2, 1864, remaining in Honey Lake Valley, Lassen County, until May, 1865, when they crossed the Placerville grade and arrived at Chinese Camp June 1 and in Stockton June 5. Here they remained until September, 1866, when they removed to Sonoma County and followed farming. On July 4, 1874, they moved to Harmony Grove, San Joaquin County, and on November 14, ten years later, they went to Lodi, residing there for seventeen years. M. T. Wallace was a well-known and reliable man, serving six years as justice of the peace in Lodi.

In 1901 M. T. Wallace with his wife removed to Dinuba and soon afterwards was elected justice of the peace and has been re-elected every four years, the last time in 1922, without opposition and is now entering his seventeenth year in that office in Dinuba. Mr. and Mrs. Wallace in 1913 celebrated their fiftieth wedding anniversary and expect to celebrate their sixtieth wedding anniversary in 1923. They are devout Methodists and Mr. Wallace is a local minister of no mean ability and has preached throughout this section of California. This worthy pioneer couple were blessed with eleven children, five of whom are living, our subject being the oldest son; the others are Mrs. Laura Pope, Mrs. B. F. Patterson, Earl E. Wallace and Miss Pearl Wallace.

B. C. Wallace attended the schools of Harmony Grove and Lodi up to the age of thirteen years, when he started out to make his own livelihood. His ambition from a youth was to become a funeral director and he began the study under Andrew Ruttaige, the Lodi funeral director, and making rapid progress he was soon his able assistant, continuing with him for a period of five years. He then formed a partnership with F. O. Hale under the firm name of Hale & Wallace, in Lodi for a year at the close of which Mr. Wallace sold out and dissolved partnership. In 1900 he went to San Jose where as embalmer he worked for the W. B. Ward Undertaking Company for one year when he returned to Stockton and in 1901 he began business in Stockton as Rogers & Wallace, but in 1906 Mr. Wallace purchased Mr. Rogers' interest and since then has built up one of the largest and most complete funeral director establishments and he is now the oldest in his line of business in Stockton.

Mr. Wallace is a licensed embalmer, having taken a course with the Hennessey School of Embalming in San Francisco, from which he was graduated in 1899. He believes in being abreast of the times and in 1912 he was the pioneer in securing the first automobile equipment for conducting funerals in Stockton. Seeing the need of a larger and more modern cemetery for the rapidly growing city he was one of the organizers of Park View Cemetery, located about seven miles southeast of Stockton. Mr. Wallace has taken a most active part in its development and is secretary of the corporation. Individually he built and owns the crematory and also a community mausoleum with 312 crypts, both located in Park View Cemetery. The funeral chapel is located at the corner of Stanislaus and Channel streets in their own building, formerly the residence of John N. Woods, which was purchased by Mr. Wallace in 1910.

Mr. Wallace's marriage united him with Miss Elsie Wheeler, a native of Stockton, descendant of an old pioneer family, the daughter of Lewis and Amanda Wheeler; the former is still living and the mother has passed away. Mr. and Mrs. Wallace's marriage has been blessed with two bright children, La Verne and B. C., Jr. As an official of San Joaquin County, Mr. Wallace served two terms as county coroner from January, 1907, to January, 1915. During the World War he was active in Liberty Loan and allied war work, being captain of one of the drive teams, doing herculean work in aiding in the raising of funds. He is very prominent and popular in fraternal circles. He is past master of San Joaquin Lodge No. 19, F. & A. M.; is a member of Stockton Chapter, R. A. M.; Stockton Commandery No. 8, K. T., and as a 32nd degree Scottish Rite Mason is a member of San Francisco Consistory No. 1, as well as a member of Aahmes Temple, A. A. O. N. M. S., Oakland. He is a past patron of Home Chapter No. 50, O. E. S., and past grand of Charity Lodge No. 6, I. O. O. F., Stockton. Besides he is affiliated with Charter Oak Castle, K. of P., Stockton Parlor No. 7, N. S. G. W., Woodmen of the World, Modern Woodmen of America, Foresters, Red Men, Junior Order of American Mechanics, Eagles and the Loyal Order of Moose, the Anteros and Rotary Clubs, all of Stockton. He is past president of the California Funeral Directors' Association, a member of the National Funeral Directors and National Select Morticians' Association. He is a prominent member of the Central Methodist Episcopal Church, has been a member of the official board and he has been chief usher and plate collector for sixteen years. He is assistant superintendent of the Sunday school, a position he has held for ten years and takes an active part in the benevolences of the church. Mrs. Wallace is also active in the Methodist Church and its societies; she is also a member of the N. D. G. W. and Homo Chapter No. 50, O. E. S. Mr. Wallace has a host of friends who appreciate him for his true worth. Optimistic for the great future of the county he is enthusiastic in his support of movements that have for their aim the development of this wonderfully rich section.

B. C. Wallace

JOHN W. HANNAN.—A member of the legal fraternity of Stockton who had been a resident of this city practically all his life was the late John W. Hannan, city attorney of Stockton almost up to the time of his death. Mr. Hannan was a native of Nevada, and was born there in Esmeralda County on November 19, 1879. His parents were John C. and Ethel (Roscot) Hannan, the former born in Tuolumne County, Cal., while Mrs. Hannan, who has passed away, was a native of Montreal, Canada, but moved to Minnesota.

In 1885 Mr. Hannan accompanied his parents to Stockton and here he was educated in the public schools, St. Mary's College, and also had a course in the Stockton Business College. In 1907 Mr. Hannan joined the Stockton Police Department, where for some time he was desk sergeant and later a patrolman. During these years his ambitions led him to take up the law and he spent four years in the study of law under Charles De Legh, one of Stockton's well-known attorneys. As a reward for his years of diligent study he was admitted to the bar in 1915, and on October 4 of that year he was admitted to practice in the U. S. Circuit Court. In the following year, 1916, Mr. Hannan was appointed prosecuting attorney for the city of Stockton, a post he occupied with credit to himself and to the satisfaction of his constituency until he resigned, January, 1922, to devote all his time to private practice, but he was not permitted to long continue in his ambition for he was stricken suddenly by death, March 10, 1922.

Mrs. Hannan before her marriage was Miss Anna Laura McGinnis, a native daughter of California, born in Santa Clara County, and one child was born to them, a son, Merlin F. C. Hannan. Mr. Hannan was always a Democrat in his political views and fraternally was a member of the Knights of Columbus and the Knights of the Maccabees.

HENRY BLOHME.—The experiences of the pioneers in a new country are but little appreciated by the younger generations for they know nothing of the soul-trying experiences encountered nor the hardships endured by those pathfinders who have blazed the trail for our present-day prosperity. Henry Blohme has always done his share towards the building up and the upbuilding of San Joaquin County ever since becoming a resident here. He was born at Wulmstorf Amt Verden, in the kingdom of Hanover, Germany, on February 15, 1839, a son of Christopher and Dorothea (Meyer) Blohme, farmers in that country, the father having lived to reach the fine old age of ninety-seven before he answered the final call in 1893. His good wife had died many years before.

Henry was educated in the public schools of his native land and reared to farm life until 1858, when he decided he would come to the United States to make his own way in the world. He left Germany on a sailing vessel and after a voyage of sixty days landed in New York City. In Brooklyn he secured employment in a large grocery store as a clerk and after a short time he had won the full confidence of his employers who, when they found he was going West, offered to make him head clerk if he would stay. He worked there for a year, or until he had saved enough money to bring him out to California where he had a number of relatives living and who had written him to come West. They were Mrs.

Jacob Brack, Henry Meyer, Charles Meyer and John Meyer, brothers and sister of his mother. On his trip to California he was accompanied by an uncle, Herman Meyer, and they left New York on December 4, 1859, coming via Aspinwall, where they had to wait a week for a ship, and they reached San Francisco on January 3, 1860, and proceeded by water direct to Stockton. Arriving here Mr. Blohme found work on ranches, receiving for his services twenty-five dollars a month; earning every penny of it by putting in long hours and working very hard. Being young and vigorous the hard work did not dampen his ardor nor dull the determination to get ahead. By the strictest economy he saved sufficient money to make a payment on some land consisting of 320 acres on the Copperopolis Road, about nine miles from Stockton. This was undeveloped land and he paid $10,000 for it and at once planted a crop of grain but only harvested about half a crop on account of a dry year. In 1871 he got nothing for his work, but he had a little experience with irrigation that gave him a good return on about two acres that he was able to flood with water that ran down the road from overflow on the ranch adjoining his. He worked by the day helping others to harvest and with their machine cut his own wheat and found he had about forty bushels to the acre on the two acres he had put water on. There were no improvements on his ranch except an adobe house and barn when he bought it, but he later built a modern and commodious ranch house and this has been his home place ever since.

In 1871 Mr. Blohme made a trip back to his old home and visited his father, then returned to Stockton and resumed his ranch work. As he prospered he added to his holdings another 160 acres in 1882, paying seventy-five dollars per acre. He has farmed to grain all these years and has made an average yield of fifteen to eighteen sacks to the acre. He has also raised considerable stock with good success. In 1895 Mr. Blohme bought forty acres near Woodbridge, which he set to Zinfandel and Mission grapes, for it had been demonstrated that grapes would thrive on that land. The product was sold to the winery, and the prices were from ten dollars and up per ton. He is a member of the Woodbridge Vineyard Association. This vineyard is one of the oldest as well as one of the best producers in the county. In 1892 Mr. Blohme made a second trip back to see his father and the girl he had left behind him, and in 1893 journeyed to New York from California to meet his intended bride, who had come from the same section of Hanover as had Mr. Blohme. She was in maidenhood Betty Anna Adelung, born in Wulmstorf Amt Verden. They were married in New York and their wedding trip was the journey to California.

In 1894 Mr. Blohme bought three and one-half lots in Stockton and in September, 1908, the family moved into town in order that the children could have the advantages of the city schools. This continued to be their home until August, 1922, when they returned to the ranch on Copperopolis Road, having sold the town property which is to become a part of the site for the auditorium. Mr. and Mrs. Blohme have had three daughters born to them: Dorothea, the eldest, died aged sixteen months; Henrietta C. R. and Betty Anna.

The family are members of the Lutheran Church in Stockton and contribute liberally towards all progressive movements that have for their object the making of San Joaquin County a better place in which to live and thrive. For many years Mr. Blohme was a member of the old Granger's Union of Stockton; and he also served as a member of the board of trustees of the Chartville school district. Take it all in all his has been a busy life and he likes to recount the stories of life and living conditions in the early days when he first became a resident of the county. Mr. Blohme and his family have always made friends and it is with a great deal of satisfaction that in the latter years of Mr. Blohme's life he still retains the esteem and confidence of all who knew him. Today there are but few of the pioneers still living, but they laid secure the foundation of the commonwealth that those who come after will be able to enjoy the comforts denied their forefathers and by so doing are entitled to the best there is in store for the fine old pioneers.

CHARLES L. ORTMAN.—It is interesting to chronicle the life of a native son who had the ambition and courage to take a stand for the right and then fight for it, and who won the confidence and respect of the community where he was born and reared. Such a man was the late Charles L. Ortman, the son of pioneer parents, prominent in the development and building up of the Stockton section. He was one of Stockton's most successful business men, and he served for three terms as county assessor, his acquaintance throughout the county being perhaps second to none. Born on the old Ortman homestead at the junction of the Linden and Jack Tone roads he spent his entire life there. Mr. Ortman, of late years took a great pride in his boyhood home place and made it a very attractive property, an excellent almond orchard thriving there at the present time; and was one of the first San Joaquin farmers to go into the almond growing business on a large scale, planting sixty acres, from which he received profitable returns each season.

As county assessor, Mr. Ortman made a great record. He was the first California assessor to assess the Western Union Telegraph Company's franchise as a county property, and defeated a bill in the legislature which practically exempted franchises from taxation. When the Western Union refused to pay, Mr. Ortman levied on the company's safe, hired a drayman and walking into the telegraph office, seized the safe and carted it away. Thus was the payment compelled and a state-wide precedent established. He was the first assessor to assess railroad fencing, railroad cars other than those belonging to the corporation; first to assess gas wells; he lowered the tax on land and raised the assessment on valuable income producing property; had framed by his private attorney and secured the passage by the state legislature a law assessing national bank stock; compelled the Santa Fe Railroad Company to pay taxes in San Joaquin County on its valuable land holdings; added millions of dollars to the assessment rolls of the state, thereby reducing the rate of taxation. In five lawsuits with tax shirkers he was upheld in every instance. He found that some of the larger stores in Stockton were assessed lower than the smaller ones, and in raising the valuation on income property, also raised the valuation of some of the larger stores five times more than the previous assessment; he was also the first assessor to assess the barges belonging to the Navigation Company. He appeared many times before the legislature at Sacramento, and although many corporations fought him on their assessments, he won out every time, but in some instances carried the cases to the Supreme Court of the state. His motto was, "the rich man, as well as the man of moderate property, should bear his just proportion of taxation." He was ever a progressive Republican, and was never weary in contributing to raise the standard of civic ideals. Mr. Ortman was noted for his fairness and honesty, but he was firm in his convictions and once he reached a conclusion he proceeded to carry out his plans regardless of counter influences. Upon quitting public life, Mr. Ortman entered the automobile business as a partner of Walter Hansel, whose biographical sketch will be found elsewhere in this volume, under the firm name of Hansel & Ortman. Success rewarded them from their earliest operations. The firm is one of the oldest on auto row and one of the largest in the San Joaquin Valley. Keenly attentive to business, kindly, courteous and obliging, Mr. Ortman made friends of all with whom he came in contact. His death brought genuine sorrow to a great many residents of San Joaquin County who held him in the highest regard. Mr. Ortman was fifty-nine years old when he passed away and is survived by a devoted wife, and a son, Carl S. Ortman. Fraternally he was a member of the Stockton Lodge of Elks and Stockton Parlor of Native Sons of the Golden West.

Carl S. Ortman is also a native son of California and was born in Stockton October 22, 1892, and received his education in the public schools of his native city. After finishing his education he entered the automobile business with his father and later became manager of Hansel & Ortman, auto dealers. Fraternally he is a thirty-second degree Mason, is a director in the San Joaquin Auto Trades Association; and a director in the Lions Club of Stockton. His marriage united him with Miss Althea Morse, a native of Rhode Island, and they are the parents of one daughter, Carla. Mr. Ortman is following closely the standards as maintained by his prominent father, and stands high in the estimation of the citizens of the community.

FISHER R. CLARKE, M. D.—On the pages of Stockton's pioneer history appears the name of Fisher R. Clarke, who, for more than thirty years, has practiced the medical profession in that city. He was born in the rural districts near Bangor, Penobscot County, Maine and received his education in the public schools of his native county; he was then employed as a school teacher in Somerset and Penobscot Counties for several years. During the year of 1872 he came west to California on one of the early emigrant trains to cross the continent and upon arrival in Sacramento taught school for two years. In 1874 he took up his residence in Stockton and founded the Stockton Business College, which he conducted successfully for twelve years. For two years he taught mathematics in the California Military Academy in Oakland, Cal. Following this he took up the study of medicine in the Cooper Medical College of San Francisco and in 1891 was graduated from the Kentucky School of Medicine located at Louisville, and during the same year started practicing medicine in Stockton. For the past twenty-eight years he has been surgeon for the Southern Pacific Railroad at Stockton. Dr. Clarke has also been interested and active in farming pursuits in the San Joaquin Valley, having owned and farmed to grain and stock, a section of land near Escalon, which he later disposed of.

L. L. Ortman

Dr. Clarke's marriage united him with Miss Mae A. Corson, a native of Maine and an old student. They are the parents of one son, Reed M. Clarke, an attorney of San Francisco. He is a graduate of the Stockton high school and the University of California; at one time was assistant district attorney of San Joaquin County; he is now associated with the firm of Klein, Clarke & Gerlach. During the World War he was commissioned a lieutenant. Dr. Clarke has always been active in the educational affairs of Stockton and San Joaquin County and has served as a member of Stockton Board of Education. Many prominent business and professional men of Stockton were students of Dr. Clarke during the time of his management of the Stockton Business College. He is a member of the national, state and county medical societies, and fraternally is a member of the Knights of Pythias and the United Workmen. In whatever line of work he has been engaged, his plans and ideas have been of a constructive nature, and his popularity and success has been achieved by conscientious toil and intelligent application to the task in hand.

THOMAS J. STEPHENS.—Among the early settlers of San Joaquin County and the proprietor of the Stockton Nursery, Thomas J. Stephens has long been an authority on soil conditions and horticulture. Coming to this state with his parents when only six years old, he has thus, for more than a half century, been a witness of the great changes which have occurred here. He is a native of Marion County, Ind., born on September 27, 1854. His father, Christopher S. Stephens, was a native of Kentucky and served in the Mexican War, and after the war located in Marion County on a soldier's bonus claim of eighty acres, which is now a part of the city of Indianapolis, Ind. On his property he erected and operated a sawmill, one among the first in that section. In the fall of 1860, Christopher S. Stephens left Indiana for Missouri and the following spring of 1861 started across the plains to California with an ox-team and arrived in Lockeford in the early fall. He farmed rented land until 1863 when he purchased 200 acres from Moses Long, a part of the Captain Weber grant at Waterloo, where he lived and farmed to grain for many years. He passed away in 1918 at the ripe old age of ninety-one. In those early days of the county, Christopher S. Stephens was prominent in Democratic politics, served as justice of the peace of O'Neill township, for many years was a school trustee, and in 1884 served one term as member of the assembly. He was a member of the Stockton Grange and of the Mexican War Veterans of Stockton. He married Miss Melissa Walker, a native of Indiana, and they were the parents of five children, one daughter was born while crossing the plains and the youngest child was the only one born in California. Mrs. May Penny, the oldest daughter, is now deceased; Thomas J. is the subject of this sketch; Mrs. Ambrose resides in Lockeford; Mrs. J. E. Hall lives in Stockton, and Fred resides in Waterloo. Mrs. Stephens died in 1874. Mr. Stephens married a second time and had three children.

Thomas J. Stephens was educated in the district schools of the county and later attended the Stockton high school. As a boy he helped his father on the home place and when he was twenty-one years old he rented two ranches in the vicinity of Waterloo and began raising grain on his own hook. In 1879 he rented grain land on Roberts Island which he farmed for seven years; in the meantime, in 1881, he had purchased 100 acres adjoining the old home ranch, this he farmed until 1890 when he removed to Stockton and three years later disposed of his Waterloo ranch. He was one of the first men to plant an orchard in that district, planting five acres to nearly 100 varieties of fruit trees, for the purpose of ascertaining the fruit best adapted to the soil of that locality. For fifteen years he engaged in shipping green fruit to Eastern markets and shipped the first carload of grapes from Lodi, and the first carload of fruit from Oakdale, shipping through the Earl Fruit Company and averaging seventy-five carloads each season. When he settled in Stockton in 1890 he bought the Stockton Nursery, which was then located on the spot now occupied by the Hotel Stockton; then was moved to 24 South Hunter Street, the present site of the Masonic Temple, and in the fall of 1921 moved to his present quarters on East Lindsay Street. This nursery is one of the oldest in California and was established in 1854 by W. B. West. Mr. Stephens specializes in fruit stock which he buys in California, Iowa, Missouri, Oregon, Washington, Kentucky, and other Eastern places; he also carries ornamental trees and shrubs. He is an authority on soil adapted to fruit growing and his advice is frequently sought along these lines. He furnished the cuttings and laid out for planting the Baldwin & Howell Colony now being developed at Peters; also the Asa Clark ranch near French Camp. He furnished 7,000 pear trees for planting in the Delta district and cherry trees in large numbers recently planted in the eastern part of the county.

The marriage of Mr. Stephens united him with Miss Jessie Moreing, a native of Wisconsin, and they are the parents of five children: Nellie, Mrs. W. E. Dawson, of Stockton; Theodore J. married Evelyn Gerschbacher and has three children; Roy R. married Miss Lucile Budd and has one child; Myrtle, Mrs. Asa M. Clark, of Stockton, has one son; and Leah. Theodore J. and Roy R. are the founders of Stephens Bros., Boat Builders of Stockton. As lads they were always making toy boats which they sailed on the river; they left school when they were sixteen years old and earned enough money to buy a lot of boat lumber in San Francisco, and their first boat was started in their father's back yard; this was fifty long and ten feet wide, and after being finished it was launched and found to be seaworthy. This boat was sold and they took a contract to build a speed boat run by gasoline for a Stockton man, the first of its kind built in Stockton, called the Gee Whiz. The boat was a success and as the business grew they established a plant on the river front and have built all sizes of boats from a small row boat to large river barges and tug boats; they have built for the Coleburg Motor Boat Company and the Island Transportation Company, both of Stockton, operating on the river. Since the establishment of their business they have constructed more than 150 launches and speed boats and their shipyard and plant is modern and well equipped. Fraternally Mr. Stephens is a member of the Woodmen of the World of Stockton, and he is a member of the Pacific Coast Nursery Association and the California Nursery Association.

GEORGE W. DOHRMANN.—For over a half century the name of Dohrmann has figured conspicuously in insurance circles of Stockton and George W. Dohrmann is ably sustaining the reputation of the family in this connection, being president of the Dohrmann-Wolf Agency, which is conducting one of the leading insurance agencies in Central California. He is one of Stockton's native sons and was born September 10, 1878, of the union of Charles W. and Pauline (Wetzler) Dohrmann, both natives of Germany. The father was born in the province of Schleswig-Holstein, June 21, 1846, and his parents were William and Frederika (Behred) Dohrmann, the former of whom was born in 1805 and died at San Francisco, Cal., in 1886, while the latter passed away in Germany in 1856. As a young man Charles W. Dohrmann came to the United States and from New York City he made his way to California, going by the Isthmus route. On January 6, 1864, he arrived at San Francisco and then came to Stockton to join his brother Adolph, who had preceded him to this country and was engaged in the grocery business in this city. For a time Charles W. Dohrmann worked for his brother and in 1868 purchased the business, which he conducted until 1871. In May, 1868, he embarked in the insurance business in Stockton, his being the second agency established in the city, and he was very successful in this field. He originated the plan of insuring growing grain crops, being the first man in California to adopt that policy, and with the passing years his business steadily grew until it extended all over the San Joaquin and Sacramento Valleys. He organized the Alta Insurance Company of Stockton, of which he acted as manager for many years, and he also engaged in farming, being the first man to break ground on the upper portion of Roberts Island. At one time he owned about 1,000 acres of land which is now the site of the State Hospital Farm on the Lower Sacramento Road, all of which was planted to grain, and he was one of the first to subdivide ranch property, opening the Meyers tract northeast of Stockton. His initiative spirit and notable business ability led him into important connections and he was numbered among the foremost citizens of Stockton. In 1884 he joined the California National Guard and in 1888 served as a major of the Third Brigade. He was a member of the Turnverein, the Ancient Order of Druids, the Knights of Pythias, Stockton Lodge, No. 218, B. P. O. E., and San Joaquin Lodge, No. 7, of the Masonic order. On June 23, 1870, he married Pauline Wetzler, who was born in Saxony, Germany, and came to Stockton from Dixon, Ill., during her childhood. She was an instructor in the Sacramento schools and later both she and her sister became teachers in a young ladies' seminary at Stockton. She served as grand matron of the Grand Chapter of California, Order of the Eastern Star and visited more lodges during her term of office than any other incumbent in the position. After her husband's death, which occurred on October 26, 1893, she carried on his insurance business successfully and later was joined by her son, George W., at which time the firm style of P. W. Dohrmann & Son was assumed. She is a most capable business woman and became an active member of the Stockton Chamber of Commerce. To Mr. and Mrs. Dohrmann were born six children, four living: Augusta E., the wife of William Clayton; Louise B., now Mrs. A. Weiss Berger; Marie J., now Mrs. E. C. Warner; and George W. One of the daughters, Louise, was the first woman in this part of the state to be employed as a special agent representing insurance companies as traveling representative.

George W. Dohrmann, the only son in the family, was educated in the Stockton public schools and as a young man went to San Francisco, completing an apprenticeship to the machinist's trade in the Union Iron Works. Following the outbreak of the Spanish-American War he enlisted in the transport service, starting as an oiler and being advanced to the position of third assistant engineer. In 1900 he returned to Stockton and joined his mother in the insurance business, with which he has since been identified. In 1914 the Peters-Wolf Dohrmann Insurance Company was formed and since the withdrawal of Mr. Peters their interests have been conducted as the Dohrmann-Wolf Agency, of which the subject of this review is the president. Their offices are located at 406 East Market Street and they have established a prestige for protection and reliability that is far-reaching and effective. They write every form of insurance, representing the strongest and most reliable companies in the field, and their business is one of large proportions.

Mr. Dohrmann married Miss Bertha Waldenmeier, a native of San Francisco, and they have five children: George W., Jr., Ida W., Alinde Pauline, and Virginia and Barbara (twins). His public service finds expression in his membership in the Chamber of Commerce, while he is also connected with the Elks, belonging to Stockton Lodge, No. 218. He is a representative of one of the honored pioneer families of Stockton and the spirit of the father has descended to the son, who displays the same enterprising spirit and marked business acumen that characterized the latter and placed him at the head of extensive business interests.

JACOB WAGNER.—During the year of 1846, a youth of sixteen set sail from Germany for the United States to join an older brother at New Orleans in the hope of achieving a greater success here than his native land afforded. This was Jacob Wagner, who was born at Eisenbach-on-the-Rhine, in Bavaria, October 15, 1830, and whose education was received in the institutions that are the pride of that country. The ship on which he sailed cast anchor in New York, and lacking means to go farther he went to work to earn money to get to New Orleans, where his brother was engaged in the butcher business. Soon Jacob had saved enough to get to New Orleans and upon his arrival there went to work for his brother and there learned the trade of butcher. He was frugal in his habits, saved his money and when the news of the discovery of gold in California was brought to New Orleans the young man wanted to go West. After a time, with the savings resulting from his industry and frugality he was able to pay for his transportation to California. Leaving his brother's employ, he came via Panama and during 1852 arrived at

Geord Thoman,

San Francisco. He spent about a year at that city and in Sacramento, and in August, 1853, arrived in Stockton, where he made his home thereafter until the time of his death, following his trade and building up a fine business and at the same time doing his part to help build up the city of Stockton and San Joaquin County. He was a volunteer fireman, belonging to San Joaquin Company.

For a time, Mr. Wagner worked for a Mr. Woerner, in a market on Hunter Street and then from 1855 for six years he conducted a market at Vallecito in Calaveras County, supplying the mining camps with fresh meat. Returning to Stockton, in the fall of 1862, he opened a market on American Street and Weber Avenue, where he continued in business until 1881, when he sold out and retired, meanwhile building up a fine business and surrounding himself with a wide circle of friends. He erected the building now occupied by the Wagner Meat Co. and took his sons into partnership. In connection with his local business, he engaged in buying and selling sheep, cattle and hogs, and for fifteen years or more he owned a ranch of 1400 acres on the Lower Sacramento Road, on which he pastured his stock. During the early period of his identification with the meat business there were few improvements and the industry was conducted under great handicaps of hardship and exposure. Later improved methods were introduced, modern machinery was purchased, a fine plant was equipped, and the business became much easier to manage. After having engaged in the meat business for more than forty years, Mr. Wagner turned his market over to his two sons, Louis J. and Jacob K., who carried on the business together until the death of the former, when the latter became the owner.

Jacob Wagner's marriage was solemnized at Stockton in 1855 and united him with Miss Lena Kuhn, who was born in Confeld, Prussia, in 1834, and crossed the plains with her people to California in 1852. They became the parents of ten children, as follows; Lena, the wife of Henry Braek, of Stockton; Katherine, the widow of Herman Dortmund, of San Francisco; Annie, wife of William J. Lester, of Stockton; Bena, wife of T. A. Armstrong, of Stockton; Louis J., who died October 3, 1919; Fred, died November 9, 1896; Emma, the widow of W. H. Bennett, of Stockton; Amalia, who became the wife of Clarence A. McCall, of Washington; Jacob K., owner of the Wagner Market, and Clara, the wife of Dr. William Ludlow, of Berkeley. In his younger years, Mr. Wagner took considerable interest in various lodges and was active in the Odd Fellows, the Knights of Pythias, the German Turnverein and the Druids. His life was one of activity and his last days were quietly passed in his home in Stockton, surrounded by friends and loved ones. He died May 27, 1909, and Mrs. Wagner passed away July 15, 1910, mourned by a wide circle of friends.

EDWARD F. HARRIS.—An aggressive successful organizer, whose fortunate handling of enterprises has made him exceedingly popular, is Edward F. Harris, the president of the Commercial and Savings Bank of Stockton, a native son of California, born in Lassen County on September 18, 1877. He was the son of C. E. and Emily M. (Dees) Harris, the former a native of Indiana and the latter of Arkansas. His father crossed the plains in the late '50s via the Donner trail. Upon his arrival in California he first located in the Marysville district; later removed to Lassen County where he followed stockraising and also ran a sawmill; he was also a prominent figure in county affairs and was at one time county assessor; he removed to San Joaquin in 1883 and engaged in farming in the Delta district and was one of the first men to engage in farming on the islands. There are five children in the family: William is a rancher at Lockeford; Edward F. of this review; Luey is a teacher in the Stockton schools; Mrs. L. F. Youdall resides in Stockton, and Mrs. James Gianelli in San Francisco. The father died in Stockton March 21, 1919, seventy-nine years old.

Edward F. Harris began his education in the public schools of Stockton, then took a business course in Heald's Business College; he then entered the realty office of Connolly & Crane, going from there to San Francisco, where he was employed in the office of the German Insurance Company for three years; returning to Stockton he was one of three men who organized the Commercial and Savings Bank of Stockton. The bank was established in 1903 with a capital of $300,000 and at present the capital is $500,000 with a surplus of $200,000 and assets of $7,000,000. Their modern ten-story bank building was erected in 1915 and is among the most modern bank and office building in the state. It is the youngest bank in Stockton and the third largest in point of business transacted. Mr. Edward F. Harris was elected president in August, 1921, to succeed John Raggio. The other officers of the institution are as follows: C. W. Hawks, secretary and cashier; Geo. H. Harris, vice-president; Louis Bacigalupi, assistant cashier; L. C. Schwartz, assistant cashier.

Mr. Harris' varied interests occupy the larger portion of his time and energy, but he finds time for the activities of the Boy Scouts and each season he takes the boys to his summer camp at Dorrington in the mountains for an outing; he is a director in the Harris Manufacturing Company of Stockton; is secretary of the El Dorado Syndicate which built and owns the modern brick garage building at the corner of Miner and El Dorado streets; this building was the start of automobile row on North El Dorado Street. Mr. Harris is a member of the San Joaquin County Farm Bureau and is as well known in farming circles as in banking, having devoted a large part of his time to his farming interests. For a number of years he farmed eight ranches on the islands, Roberts Island being the center of his activities, most of which he has disposed of. He now devotes much time to the development of his large dairy farm near Clements, which has become one of the show places of the county. It is modern and up-to-date in every appointment, with 100 thoroughbred Holstein cows; this ranch has 150 acres in alfalfa, 400 acres in bottom land and 500 acres in range land; the place is also well stocked with beef cattle. It is one of the best appointed dairy farms in the state, having an electrical pumping plant with cement pipes for irrigation, modern dairy barn sanitary in every particular. The marriage of Mr. Harris united him with Miss E. May Heller, of San Jose, Cal., and they are the parents of two children, Lowell E. and Jean L.

Mr. Harris is active in all civic affairs and is a member of the Rotary, Yosemite, Golf and Country clubs of Stockton; in his fraternal relations he is a member of all the branches of Masonry including the Shrine. His invaluable experience and common-sense views, together with his breadth of vision, enable him to make all that he set in motion roll on to the desired-for goal and as a citizen of high standards and attainments is a model to others.

EMMET A. MORAN.—A prominent and enterprising young man who is meeting with deserved success in his large farming operations is Emmet A. Moran, a native son, born on the old Moran place near Tracy, March 30, 1884, the youngest of eleven children born to William and Hannah (Linskey) Moran, early settlers of California. He spent his boyhood on his father's ranch, making himself generally useful, at the same time attending the local school. After his school days were over he continued on the home place, being of great assistance to his father in the growing of great grain crops on their 800-acre ranch.

Mr. Moran remained at home until his parents retired and moved to Oakland, then took up his headquarters at Livermore and began stockraising. In partnership with John J. Callaghan he followed sheep-raising at Corral Hollow and for four years ran about 5,000 head, but on account of his health he sold out and the partnership was dissolved. After a period of recuperation he began farming operations on Union Island. In 1914 he put in his first crop there and two years later he formed a partnership with his brother, J. E. Moran, as Moran Bros., and engaged in growing grain on a large scale. Beginning with 2,200 acres of leased land they enlarged their operations to 6,000 acres, which they handle with the most modern equipment, using three Best tractors and four combined harvesters. In 1921 Moran Bros. were leaders among the barley growers of the state, raising the largest crop of this grain. Their yield of barley was 180,000 sacks, averaging about 30 sacks to the acre. All of it was taken to Pt. Costa where it was loaded on big ocean-going vessels and exported direct to England. That same year they raised over 10,000 bags of beans and the year before they threshed 14,000 bags of beans. Thus from a small beginning they increased their outfit rapidly so they were among the largest ranchers in San Joaquin County. J. E. Moran passed away on April 18, 1922, and since then Emmet A. has had the entire management of the large holdings and continues their large farming operations. He owns a modern residence beautifully finished and furnished at 1429 North Baker Street, Stockton, where he resides with his family.

On January 3, 1911, in Oakland, Mr. Moran was married to Miss Susie Eleanor Callaghan, born at Livermore, Cal., the daughter of John and Margaret (Moy) Callaghan, both natives of Ireland and early settlers in Livermore Valley, where Mr. Callaghan was engaged in farming and stockraising. They were the parents of seven children, five now living: John J. is an attorney at Livermore; Henry J. is radio chief for the Government at Mare Island; Margaret is Mrs. Owens of Livermore; Edward F. is a stockman and resides at Stockton; Susie Eleanor, who is a graduate of the Livermore high school, married Emmet A. Moran of this sketch and they have two children, Lloyd and Phyllis. Mr. Moran is a member of Stockton Parlor, N. S. G. W., Independent Foresters of America, Stockton Lodge No. 218, B. P. O. E., and the Pines Club of Livermore. While residing at Livermore he was a member of Company I, N. G. C., and served as school trustee of the Midway district. In politics he is a staunch Republican.

GEORGE F. ROESCH.—An efficient public official who is also a popular and influential leader in California fraternity circles, is George F. Roesch, the Deputy County Assessor of San Joaquin County. A native son, he was born at Stockton on September 4, 1869, the son of J. Conrad and Christiana (Strohmeier) Roesch, both natives of Germany and both now deceased. They came to California by way of the rough Panama route, the father in the Argonaut days of '51, and the mother later, and they were married in California where, for the remainder of their lives, they did pioneer and worthy service in helping to develop the Golden State. Mr. Roesch in time came to Stockton and worked on the Grunsky ranch east of this city; and for a while he drove an ox team to the mines, hauling freight. Later he located at Mokelumne Hill, in Calaveras County, and turned his attention to various occupations, always popular with those for whom he worked, or with whom he had any business dealings. Mr. Roesch took a live interest in local affairs, as a very public-spirited man, and was a member of the old Volunteer Fire Department in early days, and ran with the primitive hand-engine seen at that time. Both he and his good wife were members of the German Methodist Episcopal Church, and the parents of three children: Wm. C., died at the age of twenty-nine; Mrs. C. R. Durham, of Stockton, and the subject of this review. The father died in November, 1872, highly honored and esteemed by all who knew him.

Mr. Roesch had bought a corner lot at the junction of East Market and Stanislaus streets, and there erected his home, the house being later enlarged; and George F. Roesch lives on the site on which he was born. Having attended the Lafayette grammar school, he next pursued courses in the famous Stockton High School, and topped off his studies with an excellent training in commercial branches in the Stockton Business College. For a time he clerked in the mercantile establishment of P. Samuels; next he learned the butcher business with C. M. Aldus, and later he was with the Avenue Meat Market. He then spent four years in the carpenter trade, and after that entered the employ of the Chicard & Worth Draying and Forwarding Company, doing local work and teaming to the mines. His next advancement was as a member of the draying firm of Sperry, Roesch & Company, N. B. Sperry and Messrs. Hewitt & Carpenter also being members of the same firm. In 1891, however, he sold out his interests and quit the business field.

In that year he entered into the political arena, and was elected city assessor; and in 1893, he was re-elected, also on the Republican ticket. He was then appointed deputy county assessor under C. L. Ortman, and in that responsible capacity he has served his fellow-citizens ever since, excepting one term.

Mr. Roesch is a trustee, secretary and treasurer of the German Methodist Episcopal Church, but he is known widely in particular on account of his great activity, influence and usefulness in Odd Fellow fraternal matters. On January 18, 1884, he joined Stockton Lodge No. 11, I. O. O. F., and progressed through all the chairs of the subordinate lodge, and he has also made all of the chairs of the Grand Encampment. He has attended two sessions of the Sovereign Grand Lodge, and has been one of the two members from California to represent the Grand Encampment of the State. He has been secretary of Stockton Lodge No. 11; vice-president of the board of directors of the Odd Fellows Hall Association, and secretary of the associate board of trustees. He has served as clerk of Canton Ridgely ever since it was formed in 1884, and trustee of Parker Encampment, and also trustee of Lebanon Rebekah Lodge No. 41. He has been a member of the general relief committee since 1887, and is its present secretary. He is also a member of Morning Star Lodge No. 68, F. & A. M., a member of the Stockton Parlor of the N. S. G. W., and he belongs to lodge No. 218 of the Stockton Elks, and Charter Oak Lodge No. 20, Knights of Pythias.

Ed Moran

RICHARD R. REIBENSTEIN.—Vigorous in mind and body, clear-headed and the possessor of unlimited energy and sound judgment, the late Richard R. Reibenstein contributed his full share towards developing the resources of San Joaquin County. A native of Stettin, Prussia, he was born on December 10, 1850, and when a small lad of two years was brought by his parents, Bendict and Amalia Reibenstein, to America and then to California via Panama, settling in Stockton, where his father engaged in business and here he passed away in 1857.

Richard R. received his education in the public schools of Stockton and at the age of sixteen took up the trade of carpenter and the following year built a house for his mother. He continued to work at his trade until he was twenty years old, when he established his own contracting business and continued until 1911. From early manhood he was much interested in public affairs, especially in the growth and improvement of his own locality. His first call to public service in an official capacity was in 1877, when he was elected public administrator; four years later he was re-elected to succeed himself, which was proof of his capability. During 1883 he served as a member of the Stockton board of education; later he served two terms as city councilman, and in 1889 was nominated by the Democratic city convention for mayor of Stockton and was elected, serving one term, when he again became a member of the council, where he served two terms. In 1897 he was appointed superintendent of streets of Stockton, under whose management many substantial and permanent improvements were completed; in 1909 he was again elected mayor and was reelected again in 1912, when the new charter was inaugurated. He served as one of the trustees of the Glen Ellen Home for Feeble Minded under Governor Budd.

The marriage of Mr. Reibenstein united him with Miss Bertha Belau, a native of San Francisco, daughter of Michael Belau, pioneer upbuilder of San Francisco of 1851, where he lived and died. They had one daughter, Alberta A. Reibenstein. As a boy Mr. Reibenstein was a member of the Weber Engine Company, a part of the old Volunteer Fire Department and was always active among the Exempt Firemen's Association. Fraternaly he was affiliated with the Truth Lodge of Odd Fellows, the Yosemite Tent of Knights of Maccabees, and Stockton Lodge of Moose. At the time of his passing away on January 12, 1916, he was president of the Home Builders Investment & Security Company and director in the Union Safe Deposit Bank of Stockton. His religious faith was that of the First Baptist Church. Thirty-five years of the best part of his life were spent in public service and he was considered the most popular of Stockton's mayors, and deserves the credit that he receives for his untiring influence and activity for the development and upbuilding of Stockton. The esteem with which he is held in the community is indicative of the prominence and popularity of this representative citizen, and a large circle of friends and acquaintances regret his demise.

ROBERT POWELL.—A straightforward citizen who feels a keen interest in all that pertains to the rapid and permanent development of San Joaquin County Robert Powell has for more than thirty-five years been a leader in the contracting and building industry of Stockton and tributary country; he ranks today as the pioneer builder of the Gateway City. A native of California, he was born at Angels Camp, Calaveras County, November 17, 1860, a son of William and Emma (Wilson) Powell. His father was a pioneer of California, having located here in 1849; he passed away when our subject was thirteen years of age. Robert worked in the mines and quartz mill in Calaveras County and meantime had learned the carpenter's trade. In the spring of 1883 he located in Stockton and worked at the trade of carpenter for two years, and in 1885 became a contractor and builder. Many of the first homes and stores now standing in Stockton were erected under contract by Mr. Powell, and the picturesque old Mansion house on Victoria Island in the Delta, built more than thirty-five years ago for Tom Williams, a pioneer of the island section, was rebuilt by him. He supervised the erection of the Stockton high school building, the San Joaquin Bank Building, the Episcopal Church, the Christian Church, the Central Methodist Church, the Jewish Synagogue, the H. E. Shaw business block, the Y. M. C. A. Building, the Belding block, Children's Home, and many imposing homes, as well as industrial and manufacturing structures. The home of Harry Hammond, editor and publisher of the Byron Times, at Byron, on the edge of the Delta, one of the most attractive homes in that section, was a building achievement of Mr. Powell. As a contractor and builder he is well prepared to rank as a leader in construction work. He owns and operates a modern mill in Stockton, located at No. 945 East Lindsay Street, where he manufactures finished building products to meet all requirements. A specialty is made of turning out interior and decorative effects for home buildings, offices, stores, banks and other structures. Plans of architects are given that personal supervision that insures its correctness as to details. Mr. Powell employs a large force of skilled workmen in every branch of the trade, each crew operating under a competent foreman, thus insuring the carrying out of plans in a representative manner. Stockton is proud of the achievements of this leader of construction work because his endeavors always stand for meritorious projects. He was a worker, with others, for the splendid Borden Delta road constructed across the so-called island sections between Stockton and the Byron-Brentwood-West Side country, a highway that attracts hundreds of tourists to these interesting sections of Central California. The proposed $4,000,000 Stockton Harbor project, now in its substantial development stages, is also backed by Mr. Powell, because he believes that such a giant development will add many thousands of people to the steadily growing population of his home city and cause a greatly increased impetus in home construction and the building of more industrial plants, stores and warehouses; that it will mean a new era of substantial improvements for Stockton.

Mr. Powell's marriage united him with Miss Josephine Bateman on August 27, 1893. Miss Bateman was born in Stockton and is a daughter of that well-known pioneer, Dr. E. B. Bateman. Fraternaly Mr. Powell has been identified with the Knights of Pythias for many years.

NELS J. LUND.—A very optimistic, experienced and enterprising ranchman whose industry and thrift have netted him abundantly and made his operations of interest to others, is Nels J. Lund, the proprietor of some 345 acres of excellent Delta land on Union Island; he was born in Skane, Sweden, on November 21, 1877, the eldest son of Peter and Annie (Norquist) Lund, both natives of Sweden, his father being an expert machinist and specifically a blacksmith by trade. The family emigrated to America in 1881, and settled at Sheridan, Mich., and Mrs. Lund, who has attained the age of seventy-two is still a resident there, where our subject purchased a home for her, to have and to hold as long as she may live. This filial act is of credit to Nels, for he was forced to go to work, by family circumstances, at the early age of fourteen, then saying good-bye to school and much that a boy holds dear, and help support the family by working a while in timber and lumber camps.

When he left home he went to work on the W. A. Stearns ranch, near Sheridan, for six years doing general farming, and the last four years there he was foreman of what was locally known as the extensive "Stearns Properties." He did so well that, in 1897, he was encouraged to make a visit to his uncle, Martin J. Lund, reaching Stockton on December 12. He was persuaded to remain in California, and thereafter was much encouraged in his work by his prosperous relative. He worked for his uncle in the Delta region until 1901, at the end of which time he returned to Michigan, where he was married to Miss Ruth Forward, who had been a schoolmate in the Wolverine State. That same year, they came to California together, to take up ranch life. Mr. Lund has since always been active as foreman of large holdings in Union or Roberts Island, or in ventures for himself, continuing until 1908 to manage properties for others. For three years in 1904-05-06 he was in the employ of Wood Bros. in charge of the cutting of 1600 acres of alfalfa five times each year; also of baling the hay and placing it in the warehouse. He also cut 1500 tons of grain hay which was baled and warehoused. During this time he kept the time of the men and paid them as well as purchased the supplies and paid the bills and had access to Woods Bros. bank account as his signature on Wood Brothers checks was always honored. Mr. Lund certainly can take pride in having gained their confidence to such an extent. On the other hand it was not misplaced and he was faithful to the trust placed in him. For fourteen months Mr. Lund was a fireman on the San Joaquin Division of the Santa Fe Railroad, and for seven months he had charge of the boilers of the Belding Refrigerator Works at Sheridan; but since 1908 he has farmed on his own account, taking up his residence on Bixler Lands, at Fish Camp, where he has cultivated from 2,000 to 5,500 acres a season. He has produced beans, barley and potatoes in large quantities, and to accomplish this, he has come to own some four caterpillar outfits, with two Best steam tractors. His farming equipment also includes three Harris bean threshers, and two Best threshing outfits, and when one learns that these are operated for the harvesting of crops on Mr. Lund's leases, one can realize the extent of his large Delta operations. In 1912, for example, he raised a potato crop that yielded 300 sacks per acre, but due to the extremely low prices in the market of that year, was fortunate in making expenses. Like many another, he has made and lost heavily in Delta farming, but he has never failed to pull through, for he long ago established the reputation for meeting all obligations, no matter what their aggregate might be, and his creditors have always thus stood by him. He owns desirable real estate at Stockton, besides a home worth $10,000 in that city, where his family reside on account of the superior educational advantages. A Republican in matters of national political import, he is a strong advocate of a high protective tariff, and believes that he in particular has had good reasons for his doctrine.

Four children were granted Mr. and Mrs. Lund: Altamont, the eldest, is deceased; Lloyd L., Nelson and Thelma. Mr. Lund is active in the following lodges: the Maccabees, to which he has belonged since he was eighteen years old; the Red Men, at Stockton; Stockton Lodge No. 218, B. P. O. E.; Stockton Lodge No. 83 of the Eagles; and Charity Lodge No. 6, I. O. O. F., and he has always contributed liberally to the benevolences of each. Mr. Lund is well and favorably known and has a host of warm friends and admirers who are pleased to note his rising success. He is liberal and kind-hearted and dispenses his hospitality in a free and unostentatious manner. He is enthusiastic in his praise of the great opportunities in California presented to young men who are energetic and not afraid to work and he is particularly sanguine for a great future for this fertile Delta country.

JOSHUA BERTRAM WEBSTER.—During his lifetime there were probably few members of the legal profession in California more widely known or accounted more of an authority on patent law than the late Joshua Bertram Webster, who passed away December 7, 1914. Endowed with a keen mentality and a broad and liberal experience, he maintained a high standard of professional ethics, and occupied a well-deserved place in the community which was his home for so many years, as a member of the law firm of Webster, Webster & Blewett. His father, Joshua Webster, was born in West Parish, Haverhill, Mass., on the old Webster farm, on August 17, 1795, and passed away at Stockton, January 7, 1871. On November 24, 1820, he married Elizabeth Bartlett Chase in Haverhill, Mass., and in 1825 they removed to Boston, where he engaged in the sale of shoe trimmings and clothing. In 1837 he became a director of the Kilby Bank of Boston, and was prominent in the life of the Hub City of those days. He was the founder of the town of Maplewood, Mass., in 1847; here he bought 200 acres, and laid out the town with wide streets and ornamental trees. To boom the future town, he formed a company for the purpose of promoting a railroad through the town, running from Malden to Saugus, and he was the first president of the company, as well as the owner of much real estate in this section. Active in politics, he was an old-time Whig and later a Republican, and as a Whig, he was an intimate acquaintance of Henry Clay and Daniel Webster.

Nels J. Lund

Joshua Bertram Webster was born at Boston, Mass., September 24, 1838, and attended the public schools there until he was sixteen years of age, then went to sea as a sailor, to satisfy his love of adventure, his first voyage being to England. When he returned to America, he shipped for San Francisco, going around the Horn and arriving in San Francisco in 1856, just in time to participate in some of the activities of the Vigilantes, and witnessing many of the stirring events of that period. In 1857 he located at Stockton and the following year he went to Cape Flattery, where he opened a trading post and dealt with the Indians for three years. Returning to Stockton in 1861, he engaged in the hardware business there for a number of years, but he had for many years desired to enter the legal profession, so took up the study of law at Stockton and was admitted to the bar in 1882. He specialized in the field of patent law and was known throughout the state as an expert in the field of intricacies of its practice. During many years and under many national administrations he served as U. S. Commissioner for the district of Northern California, and in his court, defendants were arraigned before being taken before the U. S. District Court for trial. A man of cool, judicious mind, in his legal work he carefully weighed all the evidence before him, and when he had determined where the preponderance of right and justice lay, he had the courage to give his verdict accordingly.

During the early days of Stockton, Mr. Webster was a member of the famous old Volunteer Fire Department, and was prominent in the ranks of the Exempt Firemen, being president of that body for a number of years. Always a firm advocate of Prohibition, he stumped the state in its advocacy, and that in the days when it was far from being a popular issue. He also espoused the cause of the Salvation Army and gave freely to its charitable activities.

On September 4, 1875, Mr. Webster was married to Miss Alta Marie Stowe, who passed away on February 8, 1885, the mother of the following children: Violet Alta is the wife of George F. Dunham, a prominent architect of Portland, Ore.; Royal Bertram is a priest in the Roman Catholic Church and a teacher in St. Patrick's Seminary at Menlo Park, Cal.; Ethel May is the wife of Edward H. Charette, a druggist by profession; he served two years with the Red Cross in Siberia and was taken prisoner there, passing through many hardships and perilous experiences; they now reside at Stockton; Percy Stowe Webster is a prominent attorney at Stockton.

Mr. Webster's second marriage, which took place on September 19, 1889, united him with Mrs. Helen A. (Proper) Morgan, who was born near Syracuse, N. Y., and came to California with her mother in 1855, when she was seven years of age, her father having preceded the family here in 1849, mining in Calaveras County; there Mrs. Webster was reared and for nineteen years taught school there and in San Joaquin County. Her first marriage united her with Rev. Caleb Morgan, a Congregational minister, who passed away in 1868. She takes an active part in the work of the Congregational Church at Stockton, and maintains her residence in the family home at 436 East Lindsay Street.

JACOB SIMON.—A very interesting old resident who has followed various occupations and who has contributed much to the progress of the community in which he has resided since 1867, is Jacob Simon. He was born in Bosenbach, Bavaria, Germany, on December 12, 1852. Both of his parents died when he was quite young. Learning of the great opportunities of the New World, he set out for America when only a lad of fifteen. Upon arriving in New York he soon left for California via the Panama route, and after arriving in San Francisco, where he spent a few days, he left for Stockton, arriving there with but twenty-five dollars in his pocket and with no knowledge of the English language. His first employment was with the Pacific Tannery, where he worked for twenty dollars per month. In order to save money, he bought a cot and blanket and slept in the tannery; after five years he entered the employ of the El Dorado Brewing Company and was with them for five years; then in 1876 he became caretaker of Turner Hall and remained in that capacity for six years. He next established a grocery business at the corner of Main and Grant streets with Mr. Smith as partner. At the end of five years he disposed of his interest and purchased the old Columbia Hotel at the corner of San Joaquin and Channel streets and for the next twenty-two years he conducted the hotel with satisfaction to the public and profit to himself. His next venture was the purchase of a 320-acre tract of land in Whiskey Slough, Roberts Island, and was the first man to put in a crop of any kind in that part of the island. One season he raised 28,000 sacks of potatoes which he sold for thirty-five cents per sack; pink beans brought him seventy cents per cental, and barley seventy-five cents per sack. He passed through three devastating floods which completely used up all his profits. He then gave up his ranching project and became the city agent for the El Dorado Brewing Company, and continued with them for five years. In May, 1908, he had his first vacation and enjoyed a trip to Europe and his old home. Upon his return to this country, he wrecked the old Columbia Hotel and erected a modern, three-story brick building on the site, and is known as the Simon Building and was originally built for and occupied by the Heald's Business College. It is now run as Simon's Hotel. He has dealt quite extensively in the buying and selling of real estate and is the owner of much valuable property in Stockton. Mr. Simon has always taken an active part in the affairs of the county and city and served as police and fire commissioner of Stockton for six years, the longest period the office was ever held by one man; then he served as park commissioner of Stockton under three different mayors. For more than a quarter of a century he has been connected with the San Joaquin Building & Loan Association and is now vice-president of that organization and is its official appraiser. In politics he has always been a Republican and cast his first vote for Horace Greeley.

Mr. Simon was married to Miss Emma Grassberger, a native of Brooklyn, N. Y., who came with her parents to Stockton in 1859. Her father was J. A. Grassberger, who erected the old Columbia Hotel and ran the same from 1861 to the time of his death. Mr. and Mrs. Simon are the parents of five living children: Emma is the wife of Thomas Gough, assistant cashier in the Bank of Italy, at Stockton; Elsie is the wife of B. P. Foster of Modesto; Frona is the wife of Joseph Susa, and they reside at San Francisco; Ruby and Eda are single. Fraternally Mr. Simon is a member of the Elks, San Joaquin Grove of Druids, and Court Schiller, Foresters of America. For many years he has been a member of the old Turnverein and served as its treasurer for twenty-seven years. Mr. Simon is living retired from active business cares, but he finds his time well taken up with his personal affairs. He still takes the deepest interest in all problems pertaining to the future of both city and county and has always taken a very live interest in the San Joaquin County Fair. He has served as a director for many terms. His last appointment is a commission as a member of the Board of Managers of the San Joaquin Valley Agricultural Association bearing the date of May 27, 1922, and he is at present the president of said board.

LOUIS N. DOUVILLE.—Among the old-timers of San Joaquin County who has resided in California for over half a century is Louis N. Douville, for many years a successful cement contractor, but now retired from business activity. A man of forceful character, he has held premier rank among the men of his class in San Joaquin County, and his mantle of reliability and thoroughness has been transferred to his son, Louis N. Douville, Jr. He was born at Quebec, Canada, March 15, 1852, and was reared in that city until he was eighteen years old, when he concluded that nothing could be gained by remaining in Canada. When he arrived in Stockton in 1870 he could not speak a word of English, coming from Canada on an emigrant train which occupied fourteen and a half days to make the trip. His first employment was on a threshing machine for Charles Doyle, where he worked for three months; he then bought a hay press of his own, which he operated throughout the county for the next ten years, when he was employed by Dr. Asa Clark at his private asylum on South Center Street, remaining there for three years. He then entered the employ of the Gray Brothers, cement contractors of San Francisco, becoming foreman for them. He had twenty-seven men under him in his work, building streets in San Francisco, Alameda and Oakland; also doing cement work in new subdivisions in these cities; he did the cement work on the salt water reservoir at Geary Street and Central Avenue, San Francisco; also the reservoir in San Rafael. Then he built miles of street sidewalks in Stockton and when he entered business for himself, he helped to do the cement work on the first paved streets in Stockton.

Mr. Douville's marriage united him with Miss Delia Hannan, a native of Stockton, and a daughter of a California pioneer. They are the parents of two children: Louis N., Jr., and Ethel, Mrs. Roy E. Gibbon. Louis N. Douville, Jr., was born in Stockton May 23, 1890, and received his education in his native city; he then went to San Francisco and was in the employ of the T. & D. theater for two years when he returned to Stockton and became a conductor on the street cars; then he became associated with his father in the contracting business. Among his more important contracts are the following: the foundation of the Studebaker block on Weber Avenue; St. Agnes Academy and St. Joseph's Hospital. During the four years since his father retired from active business life, he has had the contract for cement work of the new subdivisions, the Yosemite Terrace, Tuxedo Park, Salfield's addition at Oak Park; in Rio Vista he laid the foundation for the Standard Oil tank, cement work in a number of dairy barns, foundations for bungalows in Manteca and on the Hugh Tye block on South San Joaquin Street, Stockton; cement work on annex of the Union Planing Mill on South Sutter Street; on the Stockton Mineral Baths; and laid the cement floors in the Lafayette school building. He is a first-class workman in every particular, thorough and reliable; his prices are very moderate and all his work is guaranteed. He is a member of the Eagles of Stockton. He married Miss Barbara Christy, a native of California, and they are the parents of three children: Clark, Geraldine, and Jack. Mr. Douville, Sr., is a member of the Iroquois Tribe of Red Men of Stockton and he has always led a useful, upright life.

MANSFIELD F. GREGORY.—The opportunities afforded by the West to men of energy and determination are exemplified in the success of Mansfield F. Gregory, one of the leading citizens of San Joaquin Valley, whose prosperity is the result of wise investments and industrious application since he came to this valley some fifty-four years ago. His valuable fruit and grain ranch of 640 acres is located twenty-six miles east of Stockton, where he settled in 1870 and has continuously resided ever since. He was born near Bingham, England, July 4, 1841, and he traces his lineage back to the time when his grandfather Mansfield Gregory was mayor of Leicester, England. Wellington Gregory, the father of our subject, was the proprietor of a hotel in London and Mansfield F. was sent to the Academy at Derbyshire for his preliminary education; later he entered the College of Plymouth and completed his education with a course at the College of Pas de Calais, France. About 1852 the father of our subject had removed to America and located on a homestead twelve miles from St. Paul, Minn., at that time an outfitting post.

At eighteen years of age, Mansfield F. Gregory left home determined to reach America, coming via a sailing vessel, and six weeks were consumed in making the voyage and in September, 1859, he arrived at St. Paul. He was not, at that time, in robust health and the Minnesota winters proved very trying to him, and in 1868 he sought a milder climate and spent a season in Florida; then concluded to try the California climate. Accompanied by his wife, he went to New York and there took passage on the S. S. Arizona bound for Colon. Arriving in Colon they crossed the Isthmus of Panama and boarded the S. S. Colorado for San Francisco, arriving in the Bay City on Christmas Day, 1868. At that time a severe smallpox epidemic was prevalent in San Francisco so Mr. Gregory came to Stockton. He soon invested in land, buying 160 acres eight miles southeast of Stockton, where he remained long enough to harvest one crop, selling out in 1870 when he removed to his present location twenty-six miles from Stockton and purchased the Boyd and Gorham ranch, on which, in 1849, was located a sheep camp. Mr. Gregory has added to his ranch from time to time until he now owns 640 acres, which he has developed to orchards of peaches, apricots, prunes and walnuts,

Mansfield F. Gregory

Ann M Gregory

besides raising large quantities of wheat and barley and since the beginning of his agricultural activities has owned considerable choice livestock. In 1920 his prune orchard yielded enough fruit to make fifty tons of dried prunes. Mr. Gregory also owns valuable farming land in San Joaquin County and real estate and securities in the city of Stockton.

On Christmas Day, 1862, at Cylon, Wis., Mr. Gregory was married to Miss Anna Gibson, born in Pittsburgh, Pa., March 2, 1844, a daughter of John and Anna (Cassidy) Gibson, both natives of Pennsylvania. Mrs. Gregory removed with her parents in 1851 to Dane County, Wis., locating near Madison, but two years later they removed to Hudson, Wis., and there she grew to womanhood, receiving a good education in the public schools.

She is a refined and cultured woman and their union has been a very happy one and has been blessed with eight children, three of them born in Wisconsin and five in California: Ford Gibson, Clara Victoria and Anne Belle are deceased; Stockton Mansfield is married and has four sons and is associated with his father in their ranching enterprise; Wellington Russell is married, has four sons and makes his home in Stockton; Froane Livingston lives in Los Angeles, is married and has a son; Ann Inez is the wife of Ed Gall and they have two children and reside near Milton, Cal.; Frisbee Roy is also associated with his father in farming, is married and has a son.

There are seven grandchildren and three great grandchildren and the reunions on the old home place are the most enjoyable of times and are anticipated with the keenest delight by all. Mr. Gregory received his U. S. citizenship at San Andreas in 1875; he is past master of the Grange at Jenny Lind and for the past twenty-five years has represented the Firemans Fund of San Francisco and is also the agent for the Home Insurance Company of New York City; always a friend to the cause of education Mr. Gregory was for many years trustee of Chaparral school district. The Gregory residence is built on a slightly eminence amid large oak trees, and the view of the surrounding country is a delight to the occupants of this home, where old time Californian hospitality is dispensed and where peace and comfort prevail.

EDWARD THOMAS.—A lamented pioneer, highly esteemed in his day, whose beneficent life and work may be traced in more than one department of modern activity, was the late Edward Thomas, who was born in Wales in 1827, and there grew up in that famous mountainous country by the sea which has been the native land of so many men and women of notable character. In 1848, the year so notable for political revolutions in Germany, France and elsewhere, young Thomas left home and crossed the wide Atlantic in a sailing vessel, spending twenty-one days on the ocean, and eventually safely landing in the metropolis of the New World. He did not remain in New York, however, but came on to Pennsylvania, and then to Minnesota; but his restless spirit did not permit him to tarry in even these great commonwealths and he never stayed his foot until, in the year of the Argonauts, he arrived in California.

To reach the Golden State he sailed down the Mississippi River to New Orleans, and there embarked for San Francisco on a vessel bound around Cape Horn; and at the end of some 216 days, when he and his fellow-passengers had shared many a narrow escape on the boisterous waves, he saw for the first time the harbor which meant more than paradise to the founders of this section of our country. San Francisco at that time was so emphatically in the making that Mr. Thomas found no difficulty in securing work at the carpenter's trade; but he soon made his way to the American River, where he also sought gold; then on to Calaveras County, and there he remained digging for several years. He did something more, however, than commit himself to the uncertain search for the shining metal; he joined others, as a stockholder, in forming the Union Water Company, and helped supply the water needed for the miners. These various enterprises proved sufficiently remunerative that he remained in that section for more than twenty-five years, and for nearly two-thirds of that period he was the manager of the water company, and he came to hold valuable interests in neighboring mines.

Meanwhile, as prosperity more and more smiled upon him, Mr. Thomas was able to return to Europe and his native land, reaching Wales in 1861 and staying there about three years; and when he could no longer resist the lure of California and prepared to come back here again, he chose for his wife and life partner Miss Jeanette A. Powell, marrying her on April 6, 1864, and then sailing with his bride for America. Two children were born of this union: The eldest died in infancy; Mary A. became the wife of James A. Nelson, an agriculturist living on Roberts Island, in San Joaquin County.

Seventeen years after he had returned to America, Mr. Thomas disposed of his holdings in the Southern mines, and removed to French Camp, in San Joaquin County, where he established and for years conducted the popular hostelry known as the French Camp Hotel. He was an ideal host, and on account of his conscientious attention to the wants of the traveling public built up such a paying patronage that when he disposed of it, in July, 1903, he let go a profitable enterprise. Thereafter, he lived to a venerable old age, making his home, as a retired country gentleman, with his daughter, Mrs. Mary A. Nelson, on Roberts Island; and there, on the fourteenth of December, 1906, he passed to the great beyond, and his body was interred in Murphy's Cemetery, beside that of his devoted wife, who had preceded him to the grave many years before, January 13, 1870.

The demise of Mr. Thomas was keenly felt by a wide circle of friends and acquaintances in the county, for his strong character and winning personality had endeared him to all who in one way or another knew him or had dealings with him. His mind was virile and enriched, and he loved to recall the great and many changes which had occurred in California during his residence here. At a period when there was a dearth of the conveniences of life, and when a lawless element often held sway, he helped to develop the mineral resources of the country, and to make straight and easy the pathways for those who followed after. His life history, therefore, as it has already been well said by one historical writer, if written in detail, would prove most interesting and entertaining, since it would reflect clearly the stirring picture of those early, eventful days. The name of Edward Thomas, therefore, will always be inscribed high on the roll of California's honored pioneer citizens, for he was long and most honorably identified with the founding of the Pacific State. A staunch Democrat, most of his life, he was nevertheless such a broadminded citizen that he was above mere partisanship, hence his influence as an exponent of civic pride and honor was broader and more lasting, and it is pleasant to think of him as a patriot who still moves in the affairs of men.

FRANK A. FALLMAN.—One of the pioneer families of California is that which now finds a representative in San Joaquin County in Frank A. Fallman who, for the past twenty-six years has been active in the development of Delta farms, being connected all those years with the dredgers that are constantly at work reclaiming the delta lands of the county. A native Californian, he was born at Rio Vista, Cal., August 14, 1869, a son of Louis Fallman, a native of Germany, who came to California via Panama in 1857, where for many years he was engaged in blacksmithing on Grand Island.

Frank A. Fallman was reared and educated at Rio Vista and learned the trade of blacksmith with his father. At eighteen years of age he shipped on a vessel to Alaska hunting for seals and on returning to California he went into business for himself on Grand Island. In 1893 he took a second seal hunting trip to Japan and Alaska, and upon returning to California, he began work on the Grand Island dredge and later was placed in charge of same, remaining for seven years; then he went to Roberts Island in charge of the dredger, which occupied him three years. In March, 1903, he entered the employ of L. A. Phillips, where he has remained up to the present time. He has taken an active part in reclaiming the delta country lands and was with John Hurd in the first reclaiming of Union Island. The dredging outfit of which he is now in charge, consists of four large clam dredgers, two large clam dredgers, one steam shovel, several large tow boats, one steamer and one electric pump, and in the busiest season of the year has charge of seventy-five men.

MARTIN LAMMERS.—When one considers the important part played by irrigation in the development of Central California, the enviable status of Martin Lammers will be apparent, for he was one of the well-known citizens of his district, honored especially for his efforts in the development of water for irrigation. A native of Germany, he was born in Hanover on October 26, 1831, and was fortunate in receiving a good education in the public schools of his native country. In 1854 he left his native land for America and arriving in San Francisco he engaged in the mercantile business until 1856, when he located in the San Joaquin Valley, where he settled on the plains near what was then known as Mohr's Landing. From an humble financial condition he worked himself upward to a position of prosperity and prominence through reading, observation and practical experience.

During the session of 1876, Mr. Lammers was a member of the General Assembly of California and gave his support to the Republican party; he was the author of and introduced what is now known as the West Side Irrigation bill, comprising a section extending from Tulare Lake to Antioch, Cal., the purpose of this bill being to provide irrigation for this section of the country and thus reclaim its arid lands for cultivation. He was an alert and active member of the House and his public career, characterized by a patriotic devotion, bore much fruit which can now be traced through the succeeding years.

Fraternally he was a charter member of Sumner lodge of Odd Fellows and the Knights of Pythias of Tracy and his life exemplified the beneficent spirit of these fraternal bodies, being ever true and loyal to their teachings. The Lammersville school district, west of Tracy, is most appropriately named in honor of Martin Lammers and his two brothers, Deitrich and Neil Lammers, who also came to California in early days, and who are now deceased, all men of genuine worth and held in high esteem in their community. Mr. Lammers lived to witness much of the growth and prosperity of the section which he labored so hard to build up and his memory forms a connecting link between the primitive past with its hardship and privations and the progressive present with its advancement and opportunities. Mr. Lammers passed away on November 2, 1909, mourned by the entire community for which he had accomplished so much.

RANSOM ECCLESTON.—Many of the pioneers who came to California in the early days were disappointed in the primary object of their journey, that is, making their fortunes in the mines, yet turned their energies into other channels, and in so doing became the substantial upbuilders of the commonwealth. Among this number was the late Ransom Eccleston, who passed away in Stockton November 15, 1907. He was a native of Ohio, born in Clermont County, September 6, 1825, and was reared and educated in the vicinity of his birthplace. He was a young man of about twenty-four years when the wave of excitement incident to the finding of gold in California passed over his home locality and as a result he was among the number who were attracted to the gold fields. Without loss of time he made preparations for the journey across the plains, and November, 1849, found him in the state ready to try his fortune as a miner. He soon learned, however, that his forte did not lie in this direction and he wisely turned his attention to other means of earning a livelihood.

Before settling down permanently, however, Mr. Eccleston took a trip to the Sandwich Islands, and upon his return to California in the spring of 1850 he located near San Andreas, Calaveras County, where he first became interested in the hotel business, and in addition was proprietor of a general store. Following this, in 1866, he came to Stockton and thereafter made this city his permanent home, following the hotel business. He was successively proprietor of the Franklin House, Eagle House, Grand Central and Avenue House, all of which were noted for the cordiality extended to guests, as well as for their superior accommodations. At the time of the meeting of the first state legislature in Sacramento he was also proprietor of the State Hotel in that city.

In San Andreas, Calaveras County, Mr. Eccleston was united in marriage with Miss Sarah Elizabeth Samsel, the ceremony taking place August 22, 1854, and of the children born of their marriage two are living, as follows: Mrs. W. C. Matteson, of Stockton, and Oliver H. Eccleston, whose sketch will be found in this work. Mr. Eccleston passed away November 15, 1907, his wife surviving him until June 26, 1922.

Ransom Eccleston

LAWRENCE M. LARSON.—A noted traveler and lecturer, asked to epitomize Sweden, replied: "This is the home of the honest man." Exemplifying in his life the salient traits of his race, L. M. Larson became one of the leading and respected farmers and dairymen of San Joaquin County. He was born in Sweden, March 24, 1850, and was there reared and educated. His parents, also natives of that country, are now deceased. Lawrence M. remained in his native land until he was eighteen years of age, then in 1868, he boarded the steamer "City of Baltimore," in the harbor of Gothenburg, and after a voyage of fifteen days (being accompanied by his brother-in-law, Carl Anderson, and his wife, from Sweden) he landed at New York, after which he at once made his way to Goodhue County, Minn. While in Minnesota he attended school for two winter seasons, and thus greatly improved his knowledge of English as well as adding to his general information.

On reaching the Pacific Coast in 1873 he came direct to San Joaquin County, where he was engaged in farming for a few years, and then removed to Stanislaus County, which continued to be his place of residence until he moved to Manteca in 1896. He settled on his ranch at Manteca, where he owned and cultivated eighty acres of land, twenty acres of which is in the town limits. He was most progressive in his methods of farming and his labors were attended with excellent results. His ranch is under a high state of cultivation, made so by irrigation. He was a very strong advocate of irrigation and his own work proved the value of this plan of making the soil fertile. He engaged in the dairy business and was a director of the Cowell Creamery Company.

Mr. Larson was married in October, 1884, to Miss Reora Talley, who was born in Scott County, Ind., and is a daughter of the late James Talley. The mother, Elizabeth Talley, makes her home with her daughter, Mrs. Larson. The Talleys came to California in 1863 and have resided in San Joaquin County practically ever since. Mr. and Mrs. Larson are the parents of five children: Hugo is married and has one son, Herbert, and they reside in Oakland; Bertha is Mrs. Valdeman Christiansen, and resides at Coalinga; W. Torkel is married and resides at San Antonio, Texas. He is a first lieutenant of aviation; Chester resides at Long Beach, and is an oil driller. He served overseas in the U. S. Army and was honorably discharged April 25, 1919; Willard is taking up mining engineering at the University of Nevada, resides at Long Beach and is in the employ of Shell Oil Company of California. Mr. Larson usually voted with the Democratic party, and he served as trustee of the Union school district before there was a school in town, and was the first assessor of the South San Joaquin Irrigation district, serving until 1914. He was one of the original sponsors of irrigation, and helped fight the project through to its culmination, giving of his time and means to put the South San Joaquin project on its feet. Mr. Larson was very active in the incorporation of the city of Manteca and his influence and activities figured largely in the success and consummation of the bond issue. He was president of Rochdale butcher market. Retiring from active farming pursuits, Mr. Larson gave his attention to his real estate holdings and his hobby was the reading of good books—his favorite author being Dickens. He passed away on September 18, 1922. Mrs. Larson has been truly a helpmate to her husband in all of his interests and she owns the Maple apartments in Manteca and other property.

JAMES WALTER GRAVES.—Decidedly among the most popular of public officials in San Joaquin County is James Walter Graves, the wideawake and efficient constable of Castoria township, a pioneer citizen, and one of the honored residents at Manteca. He was born at Lancaster, Wis., in 1857, and accompanied his parents, Henry B. and Lorena R. (Howell) Graves to California, crossing the plains with an ox-team train, and reaching the Cutler Salmon ranch at Dutch Point, Castoria township, on October 2, 1864. His father was a native of Kentucky and a farmer, although he also served as a circuit judge in Missouri, where his home was maintained from 1857 to 1864. Mrs. Graves, on the other hand, was a native of Virginia, and well represented the fine old Dominion. Out of their family of twelve children, only two now survive—J. C. Graves of Stockton and our subject.

James Walter Graves grew up in this county and profited by a good common schooling; after which, in 1877, he was duly graduated by Heald's Business College of San Francisco. Then he entered the employ of Bancroft and Co., the publishers, in San Francisco, but at the end of sixteen months he left the city on account of ill-health, returning to the ranch in this county. In partnership with his father and older brother, N. H., he next took up sheep raising and for several years was active in Corral Hollow, where he regained his health; and with the exception of eighteen months spent in the Santa Clara Valley in orcharding, he has made this county his home since 1879. He now owns a fine ranch one and one-half miles north of Manteca, where he maintains his home.

In 1880, on the French Camp Road, Mr. Graves was married to Miss Emma Liesy, a native of this county, who passed away in 1883; and two years later he married a second time, when he chose for his wife Miss Carrie Smith, who was born in Wisconsin and came west in 1880. Two children were born to the first union: D. F. Graves is married and resides as a rancher near Lathrop; and Dr. C. E. Graves is a veterinary surgeon and resides at Santa Cruz with his wife and one son, Harold. One son, Cleve, was born to the second union; he was a partner with his father, but he passed away on December 6, 1921, survived by his widow and a son, Kenneth.

Mr. Graves served as deputy sheriff under Thomas Cunningham, as early as 1890, and as deputy constable until April, 1918, being elected to the office of constable of Castoria township, in the administration of which he has shown signal ability. He was elected again in 1922, receiving the highest vote of any county officer in his township. He is a stand-pat Democrat and is a charter member of Lathrop Camp No. 92, M. W. A., in which he is a past officer. He is also a member of Charity lodge, No. 6, I. O. O. F., Stockton, and of the Manteca Lions Club.

Mr. Graves opened the second real estate office of Manteca, known as the Irrigation District Land Co., and he maintains a careful vigilance as to all details regarding information given out to his patrons, and is well known for his ability in appraising lands of this valley. He has served as the secretary of the Manteca Creamery from its day of operation in 1896 for one year, when he resigned to become manager of the Co-operative Butcher Shop. He has always been a strong advocate of irrigation, and one of the prime factors in the move which culminated in the incorporation of Manteca in 1918. From 1907 to 1910, he was chairman of the commonwealth committee of this county; from its organization, for five years he was chairman of the Manteca Board of Trade; he wrote the maintenance bill of the State highway, and was active in getting it into the legislation of the state. He was also the author of the shooting ordinance as to State Highways, the incentive having been an accident on his own ranch in 1909. Through the untiring efforts, also, of our subject the standard of quality of the rock and construction material has been greatly elevated, his good work in this direction having been accomplished in connection with others, notably Dr. Goodale and Orrin Henderson of Stockton. Always public-spirited and progressive, Mr. Graves has taken the lead in several important movements, all of which have borne good fruit.

CHARLES L. NEWTON.—An experienced, successful vineyardist, who has also been able to serve his fellow-citizens in the official capacity of county supervisor, is Charles L. Newton, a native of California, having been born in Amador County on January 27, 1857. His father, Dr. Jabez Newton, came to California in September, 1849, and landed at French Gulch, in El Dorado County; he was a member of the Connecticut branch, dating back to the Mayflower, and a descendant and relative of men high in public and professional stations. Dr. C. B. Newton, a younger brother of Jabez, was a regent of Bellevue Hospital, in New York, and Dr. Jabez Newton was also a well-known physician, although after coming to California, he abandoned practice and went in for mining, in Eldorado and Amador Counties. He opened up a copper mine between Ionia and Jackson in Amador County which became well-known as the Newton Copper Mine. When he came to Woodbridge, he helped to lay out the town, and then he settled in the locality.

In this vicinity, therefore, Charles L. Newton went to school, and at the San Joaquin Valley College, conveniently located at Woodbridge, he completed his studies. His father had gone into the hotel business while in Amador County, while he was locating mines, and in that county he acquired about 2,000 acres of land, which he sold on coming to Woodbridge. For many years, Dr. Newton was proprietor of the Keith Hotel at Woodbridge, until he retired, and he lived to be 83 years old. He had married Miss Mary E. Rutledge, a member of a family whose history is elsewhere sketched in this volume, and she lived to her seventy-sixth year. Five children were born to this worthy couple. Our subject was the eldest; then came Prof. C. B. Newton, of San Francisco; J. F. Newton, deceased; Annie, Mrs. J. S. Mayberry, of Antioch; and Jennie, Mrs. A. C. White, of Stockton.

After finishing his schooling, Charles Newton went into the butcher business in Woodbridge, purchasing the interests of the firm of Thompson & Folier; and this shop he ran for about ten years. On September 26, 1883, he was married at the old Jahant ranch, about four miles north of Woodbridge, to Miss Katherine Jahant; the wedding being a noted affair. Rev. A. J. Compton performed the ceremony, and not less than eighty invited guests attended.

Her parents were Victor and Soli Jahant, the former a native of Ohio and the latter a native of England. He came to California in 1852, and two years later bought some 640 acres originally located by Charles Grassard and Peter Jahant, in 1853, and the next year Victor Jahant came into possession of said section of land located in Liberty township, four miles north of Woodbridge. Mrs. Newton was one of a family of seven children. Her father was a very energetic farmer, and kept his ranch in a fine state of cultivation, always using the best farm machinery he could buy. Wheat at that time was the main product looked for, and he raised some of the best in the state. In 1877, he built a splendid ranch home and there he established his family.

Mr. Newton sold his business in Woodbridge in about 1887 and they moved to Shasta County, and located at Anderson; there Mr. Newton opened a butcher and ice business; and he also carried on the forwarding business at that point, and remained in this line of activity for four years. On his return to Woodbridge he engaged in butchering for a year, and he then took a position with Thompson and Company, at Lodi, where he remained for one year and a half, resigning to assume public office.

He was elected county supervisor, 1899, and later he was re-elected four times, giving twenty years to the public service. During the years he served as supervisor he was for many years chairman of the finance committee and also chairman of the committee on roads, bridges and franchises. Always an advocate of good roads and road improvement he saw the need for bonding the county to build permanent roads, but it took two years to get the people thoroughly interested so a bond issue of $1,890,000 was voted which built the splendid permanent roads of today. Thus San Joaquin County was the first county in the state to issue bonds to build permanent highways. In fact, Mr. Newton, as supervisor, was an enthusiastic supporter of every movement for the building up of the county and bettering the condition and enhancing the comfort and happiness of its peoples. Mr. Newton, though repeatedly offered the chairmanship of the board, steadfastly refused the honor in order that he might better carry the work he planned from the floor. He was a member of the committee appointed from different county supervisorial boards to handle the San Joaquin Valley exhibits for the Panama-Pacific Exposition in San Francisco in 1915. Feeling after giving twenty years to the office of supervisor that he had done his duty faithfully and wishing to be free to look after his private business and ranches, he refused to be again a candidate, so in 1918 he stepped down and out from the office, leaving behind an enviable record, it being the general opinion that he was one of the best supervisors San Joaquin County ever had.

Since retiring from office, Mr. Newton has given himself exclusively to the occupation of a vineyardist; sixteen years ago having set out about fifty acres of the old Jahant ranch to grapes,—thirty acres to Tokay and twenty acres to wine grapes. He has been steadily improving his vineyard, and today he has it in a fine-bearing condition. He also purchased a twenty acre vineyard adjoining his home place and on each place he has installed pumping plants. He is now the director of the Woodbridge Vineyardist Association, and has done much to raise this to a front rank among similar California organizations.

C. L. Newton

Always a Democrat in politics, Mr. Newton has been active in the councils of his party in county and state politics having served as a member of the county central committee for years as well as a delegate to county and state conventions. He was a member of the state convention that nominated Jas. Budd for governor of California.

With the exception of four years spent in Shasta County, Mr. Newton has made Woodbridge his home since 1869; and he at present resides in the house formerly belonging to the Folger family, which he remodeled. Two sons were born to Mr. and Mrs. Newton, and one is living. Charles Victor died at the age of 26; the other son, D. E. Newton, of Woodbridge, is the field manager of the Pioneer Fruit Company. Mr. Newton is a member of Woodbridge Lodge of Masons; is past master, and with his wife is member of the O. E. S. He also belongs to the Knights of Pythias, and the Native Sons of the Golden West.

JOSEPH S. WEST, M. D.—Among the strong and forceful personalities who have lent their aid to medical science the name of Joseph S. West stands out with peculiar clearness. He was born at Argyle's Landing, Currituck County, N. C., on August 22, 1844, his youth being spent in the usual way, attending school and helping to operate his father's plantation; he then set about to learn engine construction at the Tredegar Iron Works at Richmond, Va. In March, 1861, he entered the service of his country in Company C under Captain W. Prescott, Tredegar Battalion, for the purpose of defense of the Tredegar Iron Works. On August 15, 1861, he joined the Norfolk Light Artillery Blues, C. S. A., under Captain Vickery, stationed at Sewell's Point, on Hampton Roads, Norfolk County, Va., for defense of Norfolk, Portsmouth and Gosport Navy Yard; several naval battles were participated in between the Confederate Virginia (Merrimac) and the U. S. ships Cumberland, Congress, Roanoke, St. Lawrence, etc., and with the famous Monitor, these battles occurring during March, 1862; he also participated during the Seven Days fight with McClellan around Richmond, Va., remaining with the "Blues" until September 21, 1862, when he received a commission in the Confederate Navy as third assistant engineer; he reported for duty to Commodore Josiah Tattnall, flag officer commanding at Savannah, Ga., on October 8 and two days later was assigned to duty on board the C. S. Iron Clad Atlanta, Captain W. Blair, commander, as third assistant engineer and on May 21, 1863, was promoted to second assistant engineer. About June 17, 1863, the Atlanta, then being commanded by Captain Webb, in Warsaw Sound, on the coast of Georgia, engaged in battle with two monitors, the Weehawken and the Nahant, and a wooden "double ender" gunboat. Going aground on a bar, about three miles from land, the Iron Clad finally surrendered, after losing several men. The men on board the ship were paroled and sent ashore, and Mr. West with the officers was held a prisoner until October 16, 1864; meantime being shifted from Warsaw Sound, Ga., to Hilton Head, S. C., to Fortress Monroe, Va., to Philadelphia, to Fort LaFayette, New York Harbor, and to Fort Warren, Boston Harbor, arriving there on July 4, 1863, where the prisoners remained until they were carried back to the James River, Va., where they were exchanged at a landing called Verina, above City Point, General Grant coming aboard the little river steamer on which they were detained and addressing them kindly and assuring them of their exchange. The prisoners were taken up to Richmond, Va., visiting the Secretary of the Navy, who then took them over to President Jefferson Davis. Within the next few days, Mr. West went on board the C. S. gunboat Hampton of the James River fleet, as chief engineer, remaining with her until the evacuation of Richmond, with the other vessels of the fleet guarding the river approach to Richmond. At the evacuation of Richmond, the fleet was commanded by Rear Admiral Raphael Semmes, late commander of the Alabama in her battle with the Kearsarge; the shipping was destroyed at Richmond and the soldiers marched inland as far as Greensboro, N. C., where the most of them joined Gen. Joseph E. Johnson's army, Mr. West taking the rank as junior lieutenant, and on May 1, 1865, the army surrendered to Gen. W. T. Sherman, Mr. West being then twenty years of age.

Returning home, Mr. West was employed, for a time, as steam engineer; later he began reading medicine and attending lectures at the Eclectic Medical Institute and at the Ohio Medical College, both located in Cincinnati, Ohio, and was graduated from the former institution in 1874. Returning to his home at Hickory Ground, Norfolk County, Va., Dr. West began the practice of medicine and continued until March 4, 1878, when he started for California, locating in Colusa, where he engaged in the practice of his profession until his removal to Tracy in 1904. During Dr. West's residence in Colusa, he became very actively connected with the Methodist Church as choir leader, member of the official board, and teacher in the Bible school for many years.

About 1894 Dr. West had the misfortune to be injured in an accident, which within a few months necessitated the amputation of his left leg, just below the hip, and by some mistake in the care he received a poison was introduced into his system which paralyzed the other limb as well as both arms and hands. A man of only ordinary cast of character would have surrendered at least his practice of his profession; but in a wheel chair and carried by his son, he went back and forth to his office on week days and to church on Sunday, where he always led the choir, and taught the Bible class, and was easily the leading spirit in the church as well as in all public matters and community affairs. Along with his professional studies, Dr. West had mastered music in a rare degree. He was also a student of the Greek New Testament, and had some knowledge of Hebrew and was an able critic and expositor of the Scriptures.

Early in 1904, the family located in Tracy, where he became very active in a mercantile line and in the affairs of the community. He was also the founder of the confectionery and ice cream parlor on Central Avenue, which is now conducted by his son, Warwick W. West, whose sketch appears in this work. In 1910, when the town of Tracy was incorporated, Dr. West was among the most active; he served as secretary of the Board of Trade for many years, upholding every movement of any merit for the continued good of the community; he served as clerk of the original high school board and was one of the energetic members of the board which organized the West Side Union high school. Always a strong advocate of irrigation, he worked and sacrificed much in the interest of the first district started, though the successful completion of the system did not come for many years, yet he lived to enjoy some of the results of his labor and sacrifice. He was a member of the board of trustees of the Tracy Methodist Church.

The marriage of Dr. West occurred in the East and united him with Miss Anna Augusta Hasker, a native of Virginia, and five sons and two daughters were born to them. Sidney V., M. D., of Cenco, Cal., was in the late war; Raleigh C., D. D. S., of Oakland, Cal.; Marian M., now Mrs. R. G. Hyatt, an accomplished musician of Los Angeles, Cal.; Warwick W., merchant at Tracy, Cal., whose sketch appears elsewhere in this work; Paul Ambrose, in business in Los Angeles. The two oldest children are deceased. Merriam died in Virginia in infancy and Paul died when twelve years old at Colusa. Mrs. West passed away in Tracy in 1910, while Dr. West passed away on January 24, 1920. Fraternally he was an honored member of the Colusa Lodge of Masons and Odd Fellows, and politically a staunch Democrat. Dr. West lived to see the going of "John Barleycorn" to the fight against which he had given heroic service, and to see the end of the World War and the return of his two sons, Capt. Sidney V., and Paul A., who served overseas, with the 182nd and returned with the 91st Division; he fought in the Argonne and in Flanders, and was badly gassed several times.

PETER KNOLLENBURG.—A pioneer settler of San Joaquin County who had watched and aided the growth from a primitive condition to its present state of prosperity, was Peter Knollenburg, an esteemed veteran of the Civil War, and an honored citizen of his community for the past half century. He was born in Holland and came to this country when but sixteen years of age. On landing here he joined the 35th Massachusetts Regiment and fought for the preservation of the Union. At the close of the war he came to California and shortly after settled in Tracy. For a number of years he was in the draying business, but of recent years lived a retired life. He prized highly the friendship of the old comrades and many times entertained them in his home in Tracy. He always made a gala day of his natal anniversaries and many times hired the Arlington and gave a free show to all those who cared to attend. He attended every session of the grand encampment of the state which was held in Stockton in 1921, hiring a taxi to take him to and from that city. On Decoration Day he was one of the three old Civil War veterans who attended the exercises.

Following a stroke of apoplexy, Mr. Knollenburg was removed to a Stockton hospital and on June 19, 1921, passed away at the age of seventy-eight, survived by his wife, Mrs. Mary Passler Knollenburg, now eighty-two years old, who resides in Tracy with her daughter, Mrs. J. O. McKeany, the older of her two surviving children, the youngest being Mrs. Floyd Kuykendall of Oakland. Mr. Knollenburg was a member of Rawlins Post of Stockton. An estimable citizen, whose busy life was filled with interesting experiences, Mr. Knollenburg stood high in the estimation of the citizens of his community, and his passing away caused deep sorrow to his many friends and acquaintances.

JAMES Y. COATES.—Having resided in Stockton since infancy, County Supervisor James Y. Coates maintains a justifiable pride in San Joaquin's development, with which he has been so conspicuous. As a public official he has promoted institutional, road and bridge improvements; and as a business man he has also met with deserving success.

Mr. Coates was born in Silver Cliff, Colo., on July 10, 1879, but in 1883 his parents, Stephen B. and Phyllis (Harris) Coates brought him to Stockton. His father was a Canadian, while his mother was born in England. He obtained a public school education; and, anxious to put his energies into a business career, put in effective time with the P. A. Buell Lumber Company as clerk. Public service beckoned, however, and he spent four years as deputy county clerk under Eugene D. Graham. He also served as under sheriff with Sheriff Walter F. Sibley, and in the same capacity for Sheriff Wm. H. Riecks.

Since 1906 Mr. Coates has been vitally identified with county affairs; and added recognition came when, in 1914, he was elected supervisor of the Second District, and re-elected in 1918 and again in 1922. His career as supervisor is marked, among other achievements, by paving and road work of varied extent; new buildings, stock barns and other progressive installations at the San Joaquin County Fair Grounds, but notably for the erection of the new $30,000 Detention Home, considered the finest of its kind in California, also the erection of the new isolation ward and old people's home at the San Joaquin County Hospital.

As a member of the firm of Jones-Coates Company, with offices in the Yosemite Building, Supervisor Coates has been unusually successful in attracting settlers and capital here, the firm making a specialty of handling farming property and farm subdivisions. All these years Mr. Coates has been more or less engaged in ranching and the development of farming lands.

This energetic Stocktonian married Miss Grace Sellman, a native of Stockton, daughter of Lafayette Sellman, the well-known pioneer who operated the first laundry here. Mr. Coates is a member of San Joaquin Lodge No. 19, F. & A. M., also of Stockton Commandery No. 8, Knights Templar, as well as Ben Ali Temple, A. A. O. N. M. S., Sacramento. He is also a member of Stockton Lodge No. 218, B. P. O. E. In national politics he is a decided Republican.

FRED A. WEST.—A well-known citizen and representative agriculturist of San Joaquin County, Fred A. West, who is also chief engineer of the city pumping plant, was born near Mark West Hot Springs, Cal., on March 14, 1880, so called in honor of the founder, Mark West, the grandfather of our subject. At the age of fourteen he was a printer's devil on the Sonoma Democrat at Santa Rosa and while there read the Stockton Mail and became greatly interested in Stockton on account of the manufactories. Being mechanically inclined and having had some experience in a machine shop, when he was eighteen years old he decided to go to Stockton, so he borrowed ten dollars from a friend and upon his arrival in Stockton on November 1, 1898, his sole possessions amounted to two dollars and seventy-five cents. He then secured employment in the blacksmith shop and foundry of the Houser-Haines Company and later in the blacksmith shop and construction room of the Holt Manufacturing Company. He first learned to fire the engine of the harvester and later he was sent out with the harvester, first to Fresno and then to Ione. In 1906 he secured his first job with the city of Stockton when he ran the new steam roller on the streets of the city and has been in the employ of the city ever since. He next ran a gas ditching machine; then was transferred to the city pumping station and still later became chief engineer of same. When the new outfall sewer was completed in 1920 and the new $120,000 pumping plant installed Mr. West was put in charge of the plant, which he is handling with thoroughness and capability.

James Foote
11

The marriage of Mr. West occurred in 1907 and united him with Miss Bertha Lehman, a native of Roberts Island and a daughter of the late Henry Lehman, a native of Germany, an early settler of the county, who located on Roberts Island in 1865 and farmed there for many years. Mr. West now farms a forty-nine-acre ranch on the island, the property of Mrs. West. Mr. and Mrs. West are the parents of two children: Elaine and Fred L. Fraternally he is past sachen of the Red Men, past commander of the Maccabees and past president of the Fraternal Order of Eagles.

DAVID R. REYNOLDS.—For the past sixty-nine years, David R. Reynolds has been a resident of San Joaquin County, and he is naturally most familiar with the history of those early days, his mind bearing the impress of the pioneer annals of the Pacific Coast. In San Joaquin County he took up his abode and became influential in the progress and development of his locality.

Mr. Reynolds is a native of Putnam County, Ind., his birth occurring May 1, 1835, and he was one of five sons born to James and Martha (Ramsey) Reynolds, both natives of Kentucky. The eldest son, Richard, a farmer and miner at French Camp, San Joaquin County, died 1915, being then eighty-three. The other three sons are Eldridge and Edward, twins; and James A., residing at Capitola. His great-grandfather in the Reynolds line was a soldier of the Revolutionary war, and his maternal grandfather displayed equal valor in defending American interests in the second war with England. When David R. Reynolds was in his fourth year his parents removed to Grant County, Wis., becoming pioneers of that district. Wisconsin had not then been admitted to the Union, and amid the wild scenes of frontier life our subject was reared to his eighteenth year, when the family started for California, across the plains, being from May until September upon the way. They first settled near the present site of Placerville, but in the fall of 1854 came to San Joaquin County, where the father, James Reynolds, settled upon a ranch near French Camp. He entered land from the Government, and was one of the earliest residents upon what is known as the sand plains. There he remained until his death in 1867, assisting in the pioneer development of the county.

Cutler Salmon, who crossed the plains with the party of which Mr. Reynolds was a member, served in the Black Hawk War in Wisconsin and received from the U. S. Government a claim for 160 acres of land. David R. Reynolds purchased this claim from Mr. Salmon. This was at the time of the second election of Abraham Lincoln to the presidency of the United States and Mr. Lincoln's name appeared on the deed to Mr. Reynolds. Mr. Reynolds farmed this place from 1855 to 1860, then returned East via Panama to Wisconsin. There on May 11, 1862, he married Miss Isabel Harelson, a schoolmate of his boyhood. In 1864, with his bride, he crossed the plains the second time and located on his ranch where he farmed for fifty-two years before retiring and moving to Stockton. He at first owned 160 acres, but as his financial resources increased he added to this property until he owned 320 acres. In the early days grain ran about fifty bushels to the acre and Mr. Reynolds in addition raised considerable stock which he pastured on the San Joaquin River. He was a member of the Grange and the cause of education and religion received his hearty support, serving for twenty-six years as trustee of the Union school district. Mr. and Mrs. Reynolds are the parents of five children: Melvin E., Clyde H. and Matt C. are deceased; and the two daughters, Henrietta and Gertrude Belle. There are two grandchildren, the children of Clyde H.; Gertrude Isabel and M. Clinton. Miss Henrietta Reynolds is widely known for her activity in the restoration of the East Union Cemetery near Manteca. A number of years ago she undertook the plan to restore the church and cemetery to its former beauty and she has worked hard and faithfully among the families of the pioneers and with the aid of the Native Daughters of California, the cemetery has been restored and is a monument to her efforts. A new wire fence has been built and a concrete archway constructed bearing the inscription "Union Cemetery, Memorial to the pioneers of the vicinity". A memorial tablet on the east side of the arch gives the names and dates of the deceased pioneers, the first name being that of W. O. Lewis who came to California via Mexico in 1846. This almost forgotten burial place of the hardy pioneers now shows signs of loving care and the residents of San Joaquin County owe a lasting debt of gratitude to Miss Reynolds for her efforts in restoring this noted and historic cemetery. Miss Gertrude Belle Reynolds is an elocutionist of exceptional ability and a great favorite at Stockton where she has appeared repeatedly at concerts and entertainments. Perhaps no other of Stockton's daughters has received as numerous and flattering press notices as has Miss Reynolds.

D. R. Reynolds is one of California's most honored pioneers. When living at Hangtown, he became acquainted with Mr. J. M. Studebaker, in 1853. Their acquaintance grew into a lasting friendship. Later on Mr. Studebaker went back to his old home at South Bend, Indiana, and then began to build wagons and buggies on an extensive scale. Mr. Studebaker stuck with the gold camp at Hangtown for five years. He did not meet with any great success as a gold-miner, so directed his energies to making wheelbarrows and tunnel cars in a small shop at Hangtown, which was the real beginning of the great Studebaker manufacturing concern, now one of the greatest corporations in the land.

On May 11, 1922, Mr. and Mrs. Reynolds celebrated the sixtieth anniversary of their marriage at their home 745 East Sonora Street, Stockton, which was a happy event in the lives of these old and esteemed pioneers. Mr. Reynolds has a clear mind and a remarkable memory of the events of the early days, his own experience in mining at Hangtown, the depredations of bandits and the swift justice meted out by the Vigilantes. His name should be enduringly inscribed upon the records of the early settlers of San Joaquin County.

ANTHONY HUNTER.—Among one of the most prominent and influential of the early day pioneers of San Joaquin County who left his impress on the development of this famed section and garden spot of the world was the late Anthony Hunter, who was born in County Antrim, Ireland, March 10, 1819. He was a son of Anthony and Eliza (Lynu) Hunter. The mother died when he was a youth, but his father lived to the age of eighty years.

When a mere lad, Anthony, with his grandmother, left Ireland for Glasgow, where he was reared in her home, and was set to work at menial labor in a distillery. From childhood he had a strong inclination toward prohibition and rebelled at being compelled to remain long at such a task, and all this time he never tasted liquor. He was liberal in thought, set in his ways, and inclined strongly to freedom, his aim was to start in a new land. So he chose the country of the Stars and Stripes for its liberal government and for the untrammelled opportunities it afforded.

He boarded a westbound sailing vessel, the "Lord Ashburton," and landed in New York in February of 1844. He went directly to Monroe County, Ohio, and there he invested $500 in a fifty-acre farm; this he held two years and sold to good advantage for $1,000. The next five years he was employed at various jobs, being located near Wheeling, W. Va., as a dairy farmer for a time.

In 1851 he decided to come to California. The journey was made from New York to Aspinwall on an old side-wheeler. He then crossed the Isthmus on muleback to Panama, where he boarded a steamer and arrived in San Francisco August 1, 1851. He went directly to the mines in Calaveras County, and he was occupied at prospecting for nine years, making a marked success, but discontinued it in 1860.

In 1863 Mr. Hunter purchased a ranch of 500 acres near Waterloo, where he engaged extensively as a wheat grower. This ranch he sold in 1867. He went back to Ohio, visiting friends in that state, then went to New York, where he visited in the city and as far west in the state as Westfield. The trip, besides being very pleasant, was also an educational one for him. In 1868 he returned to California and was married at Murphys, being united to Miss Eliza J. McGill, the ceremony taking place June 8, 1868.

In 1868 Mr. Hunter bought a ranch on the Copperopolis Road, in a favored section nine miles east of Stockton. Having noticed the natural climatic conditions favoring that locality, as well as the wonderful fertility of the soil which made it possible to raise large crops in a succession of years, he acted as his insight directed. His first investment was a ranch of 120 acres—the home place; the residence was suitably remodeled and has been the Hunter home ever since. He was also a prominent figure in financial circles in Stockton. On his ranch he developed a small orchard and set out a vineyard. Meantime, after a succession of favorable years, he invested in 322 acres eleven miles east of Stockton on the Linden Road, which is now owned by Miss Hunter. He was one of the first in that part of the county who demonstrated the adaptability of the soil for fruit raising.

The union of Mr. and Mrs. Hunter was blessed with a daughter, Jennie Mateer Hunter, who was a delight and comfort to her parents. As she grew up she displayed marked business acumen. Her father took her into his confidence and close association with him in varied business affairs. His death, occurring as it did on January 21, 1891, was a severe loss to his family and many friends. He was reared a Presbyterian and he held to that denomination; but he was liberal, and as a Christian man he contributed freely to all denominations. Quiet and unassuming, but kind-hearted and generous, he aided much in the development of the valley and the great state which he loved.

MRS. ELIZA J. HUNTER.—It is interesting to chronicle the life history of the pioneer women who in their prime entered the wilderness, braving the perils of savage beast and who endured the hardship and privation incident to the conquering of the virgin soil they claimed as their heritage. Such a worthy character is found in the story of the life of the late Mrs. Eliza J. Hunter, who was born in County Down, Ireland, August 31, 1839.

She was reared at the country home of her parents in Ireland, her education being obtained in the local schools of her native land. Her father, Joseph Magill, was also born in County Down, Ireland, and his father, Thomas Magill, was born in Scotland; he, in turn, was a son of Lord Magill of Scotland, who fought for the freedom of Scotland, and during the reign of Cromwell left his native heath with his family for Ireland, settling in County Down, where he could have religious freedom. Thomas Magill was a farmer in Ireland and a very ardent Presbyterian, observing very strictly the discipline of the church, and insisting on each member of the family observing the Sabbath Day. This same religious zealotness was adhered to by his son, Joseph, and his descendants. Mrs. Hunter's mother was Jennie Mateer, also born in County Down, of Scotch parentage.

In 1866 Eliza J. Magill came to America with her sister and brother-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. John Douglass, and in 1858 she arrived in San Francisco. Miss Magill had two cousins, Mrs. Johnston and Mr. McKee at San Andreas, Calaveras County, and to their respective homes she went to visit.

On June 8, 1868, at Murphys, she was married to Anthony Hunter, with whom she passed a happy married life of almost twenty-three years. Immediately after her marriage she took up her residence and duties on the frontier farm of her husband; here she aided him in his ambition, and they became very successful, accumulating a large acreage. Their only daughter, Jennie Mateer Hunter, was the pride and light of their home, and after the father's death the two lived together and managed the large affairs bequeathed them by Mr. Hunter, and were inseparable in their companionship.

Mrs. Hunter lived twenty-four years and seven months after her husband's passing away, retaining her faculties unimpaired until her death, September 14, 1915. A woman highly honored and beloved, she was a devout member of the First Presbyterian Church of Stockton; by her simple, earnest, and Christian life she left an influence for good in the community and was indeed a great benefactor.

A Hunter.

Eliza J. Hunter.

MISS JENNIE MATEER HUNTER.—Worthily perpetuating the name of a highly honored pioneer family, Miss Jennie Mateer Hunter is a native daughter born on the Hunter homestead near Linden, San Joaquin County. Her parents, the late Anthony and Eliza J. (Magill) Hunter, natives of Ireland of Scotch parentage, were pioneers of the Golden State. Miss Hunter was afforded an unusually good home on completing the public schools. She entered and completed a business course at the Stockton Business College, finishing her education at the celebrated Mills Seminary, Oakland.

In the meantime she was acquiring a thorough knowledge of the ranching business in close association with her beloved father prior to his death, January 21, 1891, and on his death he bequeathed her a ranch of 322 acres, a valuable legacy. However, she remained with her mother at the old Hunter home, ministering to her comfort at all times as well as looking after her business interests; she thus relieved her mother from all unnecessary worry and care. This she faithfully carried out with a daughter's true devotion. She was constantly at her mother's side during the latter's declining years, and no wish was ever left ungratified. On September 14, 1915, at the passing of Mrs. Hunter, death separated the two who had been so closely attached for nearly twenty-five years after the death of her father.

Miss Hunter is a prominent member of the First Presbyterian Church of Stockton, and is active in its many benevolences. She is a member of the auxiliary of the San Joaquin County Pioneers. Intensely interested in ranching, she has been a keen student of progressive ideas and advance made in farming methods, and attributes her success to the selection of assistants in her extensive enterprise. In May, 1921, Miss Hunter accompanied the famous Lundy party on an extended travel tour of the British Isles and Continental Europe. Four months were occupied in the trip, the return being made September 17, 1921. While thus engaged, Miss Hunter made a side trip alone into Ireland, visiting the home in County Down, Ireland, in which occurred the birth of her grandmother, Jennie Mateer Magill; here she met old-time relatives and enjoyed their hospitality. Aside from the many pleasurable experiences, Miss Hunter regards the trip from the standpoint of an education, and one which is never to be forgotten.

